Godfrey O'Malley is our hero's uncle and guardian. Sir Harry Blake is a famous bull-maker and a jovial, good-hearted Irishman of consequence: Member of Parliament before the Union. Frank Webber is a wild, mad-cap college companion of O'Malley's, famous for his exploits. Captain Fred Power is a noble-hearted, reckless officer, who was the first to persuade our hero to join the army. Sparks is an unfortunate, white-haired, ungainly-looking, awkward fellow—another officer, who was perpetually involving himself in "scrapes." Sir George Dashwood is a General officer, in high repute, and of a noble, chivalric disposition, the father of the heroine. Major Monsoon is an old bon-vivant, who has been all over the world, and whose character "looks red in the face," as if it had been pretty deeply tinged with the wearer's peculiarities. Major O'Shaughnessy is "a riotous, good-natured, noisy, loud-swearing, punch-drinking western; full of stories of impossible fox-hunts and unimaginable duels, which all were acted either by himself or by some member of his family." Dr. Maurice Quill, an Irish surgeon, is one of the richest portraits drawn in the book—but, as he is brought to the reader's acquaintance at the close of volume one, he will explain himself.

Lucy Dashwood is the heroine—beautiful of course and high-spirited—a sort of Diana Vernon—in love with O'Malley, but managing to conceal it in the unaccountable manner always practised by heroines. La Senhora is a lovely Portuguese girl—a happy creature, full of light-heartedness, and much more worthy, in our estimation, to be fallen in love with than Miss Lucy Dashwood; though O'Malley, like all other heroes, persists in making himself miserable about the first object of his affections.

We have said enough and perhaps more than enough to assist the comprehension of the reader. The truth is there is no plot to Charles O'Malley—take it up any where and it is capital reading. The author might well have replied in answer to the question, "What story are you relating?"

"Story, God bless you! I have none to tell, sir."

We quote from the first volume a jovial song—which, as completely as anything that could be said and all that has been narrated, lets the reader into a complete knowledge of the character of a bold

IRISH DRAGOON.

O love is the soul of an Irish Dragoon

In battle, in bivouac, or in saloon—

From the tip of his spur to his bright sabertache.

With his soldierly gait and his bearing so high,

His gay laughing look, and his light speaking eye,

He frowns at his rival, he ogles his wench,

He springs in his saddle and chassés the French—

With his jingling spur and his bright sabertache.

His spirits are high, and he little knows care,

Whether sipping his claret, or charging a square—

With his jingling spur and his bright sabertache.

As ready to sing or to skirmish he's found,

To take off his wine or to take up his ground;

When the bugle may call him how little he fears,

To charge forth in column, and beat the Mounseers—

With his jingling spurs and his bright sabertache.

When the battle is over, he gayly rides back

To cheer every soul in the night bivouac—

With his jingling spur and his bright sabertache.

Oh! then you may see him in full glory crown'd,

As he sits with his friends on the hardly won ground,

And hear with what feeling the toast he will give,

As he drinks to the land where all Irishmen live—

With his jingling spur and his bright sabertache.

CHARLES O'MALLEY,
THE IRISH DRAGOON.

CHAPTER I....The Doctor's Tale.

"It is now some fifteen years since—if it was n't for O'Shaughnessy's wrinkles, I could not believe it five—we were quartered in Loughrea. There were, besides our regiment, the fiftieth and the seventy-third, and a troop or two of horse artillery, and the whole town was literally a barrack, and, as you may suppose, the pleasantest place imaginable. All the young ladies, and indeed all those that had got their brevet some years before, came flocking into the town, not knowing but the devil might persuade a raw ensign, or so to marry some of them.

"Such dinner parties—such routes and balls—never were heard of west of Athlone. The gayeties were incessant; and if good feeding, plenty of claret, short whist, country dances, and kissing, could have done the thing, there would n't have been a bachelor with a red coat for six miles around.

"You know the west, O'Malley; so I need n't tell you what the Galway girls are like: fine, hearty, free-and-easy, talking, laughing devils; but as deep and as 'cute as a master in chancery—ready for any fun or merriment; but always keeping a sly lookout for a proposal or a tender acknowledgment, which—what between the heat of a ball-room, whisky negus, white satin shoes, and a quarrel with your guardian—it's ten to one you fall into before you're a week in the same town with them.

"As for the men, I do n't admire them so much: pleasant and cheerful enough, when they're handicapping the coat off your back, and your new tilbury for a spavined

"I cannot permit the reader to fall into the same blunder with regard to the worthy 'Maurice,' as my friend Charles O'Malley has done. It is only fair to state that the doctor in the following tale was hoaxed the 'dragon.' A braver and a better fellow than Quill never existed—equally beloved by his brother officers, as delighted in for his convivial talents. His favorite amusement was to invent some story or adventure, in which, mixing up his own name with that of some friend or companion, the veracity of the whole was never questioned. Of this nature was the pedigree he devised in the last chapter to impose upon O'Malley, who believed implicitly all he told him.

HARRY LORREQUER.

poney and a cotton umbrella; but regular devils if you come to cross them the least in life: nothing but ten paces—three shots a piece—to begin and end with something like Roger de Coverley, when every one has a pull at his neighbor. I'm not saying they're not agreeable, well-informed, and mild in their habits; but they lean overmuch to corduroys and coroners' inquests for one's taste farther south. However, they're a fine people, take them all in all; and, if they were not interfered with, and their national customs invaded, with road-making, petty sessions, grand jury laws, and a stry commission now and then, they are capable of great things, and would astonish the world.

"But, as I was saying, we were ordered to Loughrea, after being fifteen months in detachments about Birr, Tullamore, Kibeggan, and all that country: the change was indeed a delightful one; and we soon found ourselves the centre of the most marked and determined civilities. I told you they were wise people in the west; this was their calculation: the line—ours was the Roscommon militia—are here to-day, there to-morrow; they may be flirting in Tralee this week, and fighting on the Tagus the next; not that there was any fighting there in those times, but then there was always Nova Scotia and St. John's, and a hundred other places that a Galway young lady knew nothing about, except that people never came back from them. Now, what good, what use was there in falling in love with them? mere transitory and passing pleasure that was. But as for us: there we were; if not in Kilkenny, we were in Cork. Safe cut and come again; no getting away under pretence of foreign service; no excuse for not marrying by any cruel pictures of the colonies, where they make spatchcocks of the officers' wives, and scrape their infant families to death with a small tooth comb. In a word, my dear O'Malley, we were at a high premium; and even O'Shaughnessy, with his red head and the legs you see, had his admirers—there now, do n't be angry, Dan—the men, at least, were mighty partial to you.

"Loughrea, if it was a pleasant, was a very expensive place. White gloves and car hire—there was n't a chaise in the town—short whist, too, (God forgive me if I wrong them, but I wonder were they honest?) cost money; and as our popularity rose, our purses fell, till at length when the one was at a flood, the other was something like low water.

"Now, the Roscommon was a beautiful corps—no petty jealousies, no little squabbling among the officers, no small spleen between the major's wife and the paymaster's sister—all was amiable, kind, brotherly, and affectionate. To proceed: I need only mention one fine trait of them; no man ever refused to endorse a brother officer's bill. To think of asking the amount, or even the date, would be taken personally; and thus we went on mutually aiding and assisting each other—the colonel drawing on me, I on the major, the senior captain on the surgeon, and so on—a regular cross-fire of "promise to pay," all stamped and regular.

"Not but that the system had its inconveniences; for sometimes an obstinate tailor or bootmaker would make a row for his money, and then we'd be obliged to get up a little quarrel between the drawer and acceptor of the bill; they could n't speak for some days; and a mutual friend to both would tell the creditor that the slightest imprudence on his part, would lead to bloodshed; and the Lord help him!—if there was a duel—he'd be proved the whole cause of it." This and twenty other plans were employed, and, finally, the matter would be left to arbitration among our brother officers; and, I need not say, they behaved like trumps. But, notwithstanding all this, we were frequently hard pressed for cash; as the colonel said, "It's a mighty expensive corps." Our dress was costly, not that it had much lace and gold on it, but that, what between falling on the road at night, shindies at mess, and other devilment, a coat lasted no time. Wine, too, was heavy on us; for, though we often changed our wine merchant, and rarely paid him, there was an awful consumption at the mess!

"Now, what I have mentioned may prepare you for the fact, that, before we were eight weeks in garrison, Shaugh and myself, upon an accurate calculation of our conjoint finances, discovered that, except some vague promises of discounting here and there through the town, and seven and fourpence in specie, we were innocent of any pecuniary treasures. This was embarrassing; we had both embarked in several small schemes of pleasurable amusement; had a couple of hunters each, a tandem, and a running account—I think it galloped—at every shop in the town.

"Let me pause for a moment here, O'Malley, while I moralize a little in a strain I hope may benefit you. Have you ever considered—of course you have not, you're too young and unreflecting—how beautifully every climate and every soil possesses some one antidote or another to its own noxious influences. The tropics have their succulent and juicy fruits, cooling and refreshing: the northern latitudes have their beasts with fur and warm skin to keep out the frost-bites, and so it is in Ireland; nowhere on the face of the habitable globe does a man contract such habits of small debt, and nowhere, I'll be sworn, can he so easily get out of any scrape concerning them. They have their tigers in the east, their antelopes in the south, their white bears in Norway, their buffaloes in America; but we have an animal in Ireland that beats them all hollow—a country attorney!

"Now, let me introduce you to Mr. Matthew Donevan. Mat, as he was familiarly called by his numerous acquaintances, was a short, florid, rosy little gentleman of some four or five-and-forty, with a well curled wig of the fairest imaginable auburn, the gentle wave of the front locks, which played in infantine loveliness upon his little bullet forehead, contrasting strongly enough with a cunning leer of his eye, and a certain non prius laugh, that, however it might please a client, rarely brought pleasurable feelings to his opponent in a cause.

"Mat was a character in his way: deep, double, and tricky in everything that concerned his profession, he affected the gay fellow; liked a jolly dinner at Brown's hotel; would go twenty miles to see a steeple chase and a coursing match; bet with any one, when the odds were strong in his favor, with an easy indifference about money that made him seem, when winning, rather the victim of good luck than any thing else. As he kept a rather pleasant bachelor's house, and liked the military much, we soon became acquainted. Upon him, therefore, for reasons I can't explain, both our hopes reposed; and Shaugh and myself at once agreed that, if Mat could not assist us in our distress, the case was a bad one.

"A pretty little epistle was accordingly concocted, inviting the worthy attorney to a small dinner at five o'clock the next day, intimating that we were to be perfectly alone, and had a little business to discuss. True to the hour, Mat was there; and, as if instantly guessing that ours was no regular party of pleasure, his look, dress, and manner were all in keeping with the occasion—quiet, subdued, and searching.

"When the claret had been superseded by the whisky, and the confidential hours were approaching, by an adroit allusion to some heavy wager then pending, we brought our finances upon the tapis. The thing was done beautifully; an easy adagio movement—no violent transition; but hang me if old Mat did not catch the matter at once.

"Oh! it's there ye are, captain," said he, with his peculiar grin; "two and sixpence in the pound, and no assets."

"The last is nearer the mark, my old boy," said Shaugh, blurring out the whole truth at once. The wily attorney finished his tumbler slowly, as if giving himself time for reflection, and then, smacking his lips in a preparatory manner, took a quick survey of the room with his piercing green eye.

"A very sweet mare of yours that little mouse-colored one is, with the dip in the back, and she has a trifling curb—may be it's a spavin indeed—in the near hind leg. You gave five-and-twenty for her, now, I'll be bound!"

"Sixty guineas, as sure as my name's Dan," said Shaugh, not at all pleased at the value put upon his hackney; "and, as to spavin or curb, I'll wager double the sum she has neither the slightest trace of one or the other."

"I'll not take the bet," said Mat, dryly; "money's scarce in these parts."

"This hit silenced us both; and our friend continued:

"Then there's the bay horse, a great, strapping, leggy beast he is for a tilbury; and the hunters, worth nothing here; they don't know this country: them's neat pistols; and the tilbury is not bad—"

"Confound you!" said I, losing all patience, "we did not ask you here to appraise our movables; we want to raise the wind without that."

"I see—I perceive," said Mat, taking a pinch of snuff very leisurely as he spoke: "I see. Well, that is difficult: very difficult, just now. I've mortgaged every acre of ground in the two counties near us, and a sixpence more is not to be had that way. Are you lucky at the races?"

"Never win a sixpence."

"What can you do at whist?"

"Revoke, and get cursed by my partner: devil more."

"That's mighty bad; for, otherwise, we might arrange something for you. Well, I only see one thing for it; you must marry: a wife with some money will get you out of your present difficulties, and we'll manage that easily enough."

"Come, Dan," said I, for Shaugh was dropping asleep, "cheer up, old fellow. Donevan has found the way to pull us through our misfortunes. A girl with forty thousand pounds, the best cock-shooting in Ireland; an old family, a capital cellar, all wait ye: rouse up there!"

"I'm convenient," said Shaugh, with a look intended to be knowing, but really very tipsy.

"I did not say much for her personal attractions, captain," said Mat; "nor, indeed, did I specify the exact sum; but Mrs. Rogers Dooley, of Clonakilty, might be a princess—"

"And so she shall be, Mat; the O'Shaughnessys were kings of Ennis in the time of Nero; and I'm only waiting for a trifle of money to revive the title. What's her name?"

"Mrs. Rogers Dooley."

"Here's her health, and long life to her;

And may the devil cut the toes
Of all her foes,
That we may know them by their limping."

"This benevolent wish uttered, Dan fell flat upon the hearth-rug, and was soon sound asleep. I must hasten on; so need only say, that before we parted that night, Mat and myself had finished the half-gallon bottle of Loughrea whisky, and concluded a treaty for the hand and fortune of Mrs. Rogers Dooley; he being guaranteed a very handsome per centage on the property, and lady being reserved—for choice between Dan and myself, which, however, I was determined should fall upon my more fortunate friend.

"The first object which presented itself to my aching senses the following morning, was a very spacious card of invitation from Mr. Jonas Malone, requesting me to favor him with the seductions of my society the next evening to a ball. At the bottom of which, in Mr. Donevan's hand, I read:

"Do not fail; you know who is to be there. I've not been idle since I saw you. Would the captain take twenty-five for the mare?"

"So far so good, thought I, as, entering O'Shaughnessy's quarters, I discovered him endeavoring to spell out his card, which, however, had no postscript. We soon agreed that Mat should have his price; so, sending a polite answer to the invitation, we despatched a still more civil note to the attorney, and begged of him, as a weak mark of esteem, to accept the mouse-colored mare as a present.

"Here O'Shaughnessy sighed deeply, and even seemed affected by the souvenir.

"Come, Dan, we did it all for the best." O! O'Mealey, he was a cunning fellow; but no matter. We went to the ball, and, to be sure, it was a great sight. Two hundred and fifty souls, where there was not good room for the odd fifty: such laughing, such squeezing, such pressing of hands and waists in the staircase! and then such a row and a riot at the top—four fiddles, a key bugle, and a bagpipe, playing, 'Haste to the wedding,' amid the crash of refreshment trays, the tramp of feet, and the sounds of merriment on all sides!"

"It's only in Ireland, after all, people have fun: old and young, merry and morose, the gay and cross-grained, are crammed into a lively country dance; and, ill-matched, ill-suited, go jiggling away together to the blast of a bad band, till their heads, half turned by the noise, the heat, the novelty, and the hubbub, they all get as tipsy as if they were really deep in liquor.

"Then there is that particularly free-and-easy tone in every one about; here go a couple capering daintily out of the ball-room to take a fresh air on the stairs, where every step has its own separate flirtation party; there a riotous old gentleman, with a boarding-school girl for his partner, has plunged smack into a party at loo, upsetting cards and counters, and drawing down curses innumerable. Here are a merry knot round the refreshments, and well they may be; for the negus is strong punch, and the biscuit is tipsy cake—and all this with a running fire of good stories, jokes, and witticisms, on all sides, in the laughter for which even the droll-looking servants join as heartily as the rest.

"We were not long in finding out Mrs. Rogers, who sat in the middle of a very high sofa, with her feet just touching the floor. She was short, fat, wore her hair in a crop, had a species of shining yellow skin, and a turned up nose, all of which were by no means prepossessing. Shaugh and myself were too hard-up to be particular, and so we invited her to dance alternately for two consecutive hours, plying her assiduously with negus during the lulls in the music.

"Supper was at last announced, and enabled us to recruit for new efforts; and so, after an awful consumption of fowl, pigeon-pie, ham, and brandy cherries, Mrs. Rogers brightened up considerably, and professed her willingness to join the dancers. As for us, partly from exhaustion, partly to stimulate our energies and in some degree to drown reflection, we drank deep, and when we reached the drawing-room, not only the agreeable guests themselves, but even the furniture, the venerable chairs, and the stiff old sofa seemed performing 'Sir Roger de Coverley.' How we conducted ourselves till five in the morning, let our cramps confess; for we were both bed-ridden for ten days after; however, at last, Mrs. Rogers gave in; and, reclining gracefully upon a window-seat, pronounced it a most elegant party, and asked me to look for her shawl. While I perambulated the staircase with her bonnet on my head, and more wearing apparel than would stock a magazine, Shaugh was roaring himself hoarse in the street, calling Mrs. Roger's coach.

"Sure, captain," said the lady, with a tender leer, 'it's only a chair.'

"And here it is," said I, surveying a very portly looking old sedan, newly painted and varnished, that blocked up half the hall.

"You'll catch cold, my angel," said Shaugh in a whisper, for he was coming it very strong by this; "get into the chair. Maurice, can't you find those fellows?" said he to me; for the chairmen had gone down stairs, and were making very merry among the servants.

"She's fast now," said I, shutting the door to. "Let us do the gallant thing, and carry her home ourselves." Shaugh thought this a great notion; and, in a minute, we mounted the poles, and sallied forth, amid a great chorus of laughing from all the footmen, maids, and tea-boys that filled the passage."

"The big house, with the bow windows and the pillars captain!" said a fellow, as we issued upon our journey.

"I know it," said I. "Turn to the left as you pass the square."

"Is not she heavy?" said Shaugh, as he meandered across narrow streets with a sidelong motion, that must have suggested to our fair inside passenger some notions of a sea voyage. In truth, I must confess, her progress was rather a devious one; now zigzagging from side to side, now getting into a sharp trot, and then suddenly pulling up at a dead stop, or running the machine chuck against a wall, to enable us to stand still and gain breath.

"Which way now?" cried he, as we swung round the angle of a street, and entered the large market place; 'I'm getting terribly tired.'

"Never give in, Dan? think of Clonakilty, and the old lady herself, and here I gave the chair a hoist that evidently astonished our fair friend; for a very imploring cry issued forth immediately after.

"To the right, quick step, forward—charge!" cried I; and we set off at a brisk trot down a steep and narrow lane.

"Here it is now: the light in the window; cheer up!"

"As I said this, we came short up to a fine portly looking doorway, with great stone pillars and cornice.

"Make yourself at home, Maurice," said he; "bring her in; and so saying we pushed forward for the door was open—and passed boldly into a great flagged hall, silent and cold, and dark as the night itself.

"Are you sure we're right?" said he.

"All right," said I, "go ahead."

"And so we did till we came in sight of a small candle that burned dimly at a distance from us.

"Make for the light," said I; but just as I said so Shaugh slipped and fell flat on the flagway; the noise of his fall sent up a hundred echoes in the silent building, and terrified us both dreadfully; and, after a minute's pause, by one consent, we turned and made for the door, falling almost at every step, and frightened out of our senses, we came tumbling together into the porch, and out in the street, and never drew breath until we reached the barracks. Meanwhile, let me return to Mrs. Rogers. The dear old lady, who had passed an awful time since she left the ball, had just rallied out of a fainting fit when we took to our heels; so, after screaming and crying her best, she at last managed to open the top of the chair, and, by dint of great exertions, succeeded in forcing the door and at length freed herself from bondage. She was leisurely groping her way round it in the dark, when her lamentations being heard without, woke up the old sexton of the chapel—for it was there we placed her—who, entering cautiously with a light, no sooner caught a glimpse of the great black sedan and the figure beside it, than he also took to his heels, and ran like a madman to the priest's house.

"Come, your reverence, come, for the love of mercy; sure didn't I see him myself! O wirra, wirra!"

"What is it, ye ould fool?" said M'Kennay.

"It's Father Con Doran, your reverence, that was buried last week, and there he is up now, coffin and all! saying a midnight mass as lively as ever."

"Poor Mrs. Rogers, God help her! It was a trying sight for her, when the priest and the two coadjutors, and three little boys and the sexton, all came in to lay her spirit; and the shock she received that night, they say, she never got over."

"Need I say, my dear O'Mealey, that our acquaintance with Mrs. Rogers was closed. The dear woman had a hard struggle for it afterward; her character was assailed by all the elderly ladies in Loughrea, for going off in our company, and her blue satin piped with scarlet, utterly ruined by a deluge of holy water bestowed on her by the pious sexton. It was in vain that she originated twenty different reports to mystify the world—and even ten pounds spent in masses for the eternal repose of Father Con Doran only increased the laughter this unfortunate affair gave rise to. As for us, we exchanged into the Line, and foreign service took us out of the road of duns, debts, and devilment, and we soon reformed, and eschewed such low company."

The day was breaking ere we separated, and, amid the rich and fragrant vapors that exhaled from the earth, the faint traces of sunlight dimly sealing, told of the morning. My two friends set out for Torrijos, and I pushed boldly forward in the direction of the Alberche.

It was a strange thing that, although but two days before, the roads we were then travelling had been the line of retreat of the whole French army, not a vestige of their matériel had been left behind. In vain we searched each thicket by the way side for some straggling soldier, some wounded or wearied man: nothing of the kind was to be seen. Except the deeply rutted road, torn by the heavy wheels of the artillery, and the white ashes of a wood fire, nothing marked their progress.

Our journey was a lonely one. Not a man was to be met with: the houses stood untenanted, the doors lay open; no smoke wreathed from their deserted hearths: the peasantry had taken to the mountains, and, although the plains were yellow with the ripe harvest, and the peach hung temptingly upon the trees, all was deserted and forsaken. I had often seen the blackened walls and broken rafters, the traces of the wild revenge and reckless pillage of a retiring army: the ruined castle, and the desecrated altar, are sad things to look upon; but, somehow, a far heavier depression sunk into my heart, as my eye ranged over the wide valleys and broad hills, all redolent of comfort, of beauty, and of happiness, and yet not one man to say this is my home, these are my household gods. The birds carolled gayly in each leafy thicket, the bright stream sung merrily as it rippled through the rocks, the tall corn gently stirred by the breeze seemed to swell the concert of sweet sounds; but no human voice awoke the echoes there. It was as if the earth was speaking in thankfulness to its Maker; while man, ungrateful and unworthy man, pursuing his ruthless path of devastation and destruction, had left no being to say, 'I thank thee for all these.'

The day was closing as we drew near the Alberche, and came in sight of the watch fires of the enemy. Far as the eye could reach, their column extended; but in the dim twilight nothing could be seen with accuracy. Yet from the position their artillery occupied, and the unceasing din of baggage wagons, and heavy carriages towards the rear, I came to the conclusion that a still further retreat was meditated: a picket of light cavalry was posted upon the river's bank, and seemed to watch with vigilance the approaches to the stream.

Our bivouac was a dense copse of pine trees, exactly opposite to the French advanced posts, and there we passed the night—fortunately a calm and star-light one,—for we dared not light fires, fearful of attracting attention.

During the long hours, I lay patiently watching the movements of the enemy till the dark shadows hid all from my sight, and even then, as my ears caught the challenge of a sentry, or the foot-steps of some officer in his round, my thoughts were riveted upon them, and a hundred vague fancies as to the future were based upon no stronger foundation than the click of a firelock or the low-muttered song of a patrol.

Towards morning I slept, and when day broke, my first glance was towards the river side; but the French were gone—noiselessly—rapidly. Like one man, that vast army had departed; and a dense column of dust towards the horizon alone marked the long line of march where the martial legions were retreating.

My mission was thus ended; and, hastily partaking of the humble breakfast my friend Mike provided for me, I once more set out, and took the road towards head quarters.

CHAPTER II.—The Skirmish.

For several months after the battle of Talavera my life presented nothing which I feel worth recording. Our good fortune seemed to have deserted us when our hopes were highest; for from the day of that splendid victory, we began our retrograde movement upon Portugal. Pressed hard by overwhelming masses of the enemy, we saw the fortresses of Ciudad Rodrigo and Almeida fall successively into their hands. The Spaniards were defeated wherever they ventured upon a battle; and our own troops, thinned by sickness and desertion, presented but a shadow of that brilliant army which only a few months previous had followed the retiring French beyond the frontiers of Portugal.

However willing I now am—and who is not?—to recognize the genius and foresight of that great man, who then held the destinies of the Peninsula within his hands, I confess, at the time I speak of, I could ill comprehend and still less feel contented with the successive retreats our forces made, and while the words Torres Vedras brought nothing to my mind but the last resting place before embarkation, the sad fortunes of Corunna were now before me, and it was with a gloomy and desponding spirit I followed the routine of my daily duty.

During these weary months, if my life was devoid of stirring interest or adventure, it was not profitless. Constantly employed at the outposts, I became thoroughly inured to all the roughing of a soldier's life, and learned in the best of schools that tacit obedience which alone can form the subordinate, or ultimately fit its possessor for command himself.

Humble and unobtrusive as such a career must ever be, it was not without its occasional rewards. From General Crawford I more than once obtained most kind mention in his despatches, and felt that I was not unknown or unnoticed by Sir Arthur Wellesley himself. At that time, these testimonies, slight and passing as they were, contributed to the pride and glory of my existence; and, even—shall I confess it?—when some gray hairs are mingling with the brown, and when my old dragoon swagger is taming down into a kind of half-pay shamble, I feel my heart warm at the recollection of them.

Be it so: I care not who smiles at the avowal. I know of little better worth remembering as we grow old than what pleased us while we were young. With the memory of the kind words once spoken, come back the still kinder looks of those who spoke them; and, better than all, that early feeling of budding manhood, when there was neither fear nor distrust. Alas! these are the things, and not weak eyes and tottering limbs, which form the burden of old age. Oh! if we could only go on believing, go on trusting, go on hoping to the last, who would shed tears for the by-gone feats of his youthful days, and when the spirit that evoked them lived young and vivid as before?

But to my story. While Ciudad Rodrigo still held out against the besieging French, its battered walls and breached ramparts sadly foretelling the fate inevitably impending, we were ordered, together with the sixteenth light dragoons, to proceed to Gallegos, to reinforce Crawford's division, then forming a corps of observation upon Massena's movements.

The position he occupied was a most commanding one—the crown of a long mountain ridge, studded with pine copse, and cork trees, presenting every facility for light infantry movements; and here and there gently sloping toward the plain, offering a field for cavalry manoeuvres. Beneath, in the vast plain, were encamped the dark legions of France, their heavy siege artillery planted against the fortress, while clouds of their cavalry caracolled proudly before us, as if in taunting sarcasm at our inactivity.

Every artifice which his natural cunning could suggest, every taunt a Frenchman's vocabulary contains, had been used by Massena to induce Sir Arthur Wellesley to come to the assistance of the beleaguered fortress; but in vain. In vain he relaxed the energy of the siege, and affected carelessness. In vain he asserted in his proclamation that the English were either afraid, or else traitors to their allies. The mind of him he thus assailed was neither accessible to menace nor to sarcasm. Patiently abiding his time, he watched the progress of events, and provided for that future which was to crown his country's arms with success, and himself with undying glory.

Of a different metal was the general formed, under whose arms we were now placed. Hot, passionate, and impetuous, relying upon bold and headlong heroism, rather than upon cool judgment and well-matured plans, Crawford felt in war all the asperity and bitterness of personal conflict. Ill brooking the insulting tone of the wily Frenchman, he thirsted for any occasion of a battle; and his proud spirit chafed against the colder counsels of his superior.

On the very morning we joined, the pickets brought in the intelligence that the French patrols were nightly in the habit of visiting the villages at the outposts, and committing every species of cruel indignity upon the wretched inhabitants. Fired at this daring insult, our General resolved to cut them off, and formed two ambuscades for the purpose.

Six squadrons of the fourteenth were despatched to Villa del Puero, three of the sixteenth to Baguette, while some companies of the ninety-fifth, and the cazadores, supported by artillery, were ordered to hold themselves in reserve; for the enemy were in force at no great distance from us.

The morning was just breaking as an aid-de-camp galloped up with the intelligence that the French had been seen near the Villa del Puero; a body of infantry and some cavalry having crossed the plain, and disappeared in that direction. While our Colonel was forming us, with the intention of getting between them and their main body, the tramp of horses was heard in the wood behind, and in a few moments two officers rode up. The foremost, who was a short stoutly-built man of about forty, with a bronzed face, and an eye of piercing black, shouted out as we wheeled into column:

"Halt, there! why, where the devil are you going? that's your ground." So, saying, and pointing toward the village with his hand, he would not listen to our Colonel's explanation that several stone fences and enclosures would interfere with cavalry movements, but added—

"Forward, I say; proceed."

Unfortunately, the nature of the ground separated our squadron, as the Colonel anticipated; and, although we came on at a topping pace, the French had time to form in square upon a hill, to await us; and when we charged they stood firmly, and, firing with a low and steady aim, several of our troopers fell. As we wheeled round we found ourselves exactly in front of their cavalry, coming out of Baguette; so, dashing straight at them, we revenged ourselves for our first repulse, by capturing twenty-nine prisoners, and wounding several others.

The French infantry were, however, still unbroken; and Col. Talbot rose up with five squadrons of the fourteenth; but the charge, pressed home with all its gallantry, failed also, and the Colonel fell mortally wounded, and fourteen of his troopers around him. Twice we rode round the square seeking for a weak point, but in vain; the gallant Frenchman who commanded, Captain Guache, stood fearlessly amid his brave followers; and we could hear him as he called out from time to time—

"C'est ça, mes enfans! bien fait, mes braves!"

And at length they made good their retreat, while we returned to the camp, leaving thirty-two troopers and our brave Colonel dead upon the field in this disastrous affair.

The repulse we had met with, so contrary to all our hopes and expectations, made that a most gloomy day to all of us. The brave fellows we had left behind us, the taunting cheers of the French infantry, the unbroken ranks against which we rode time after time in vain, never left our minds; and a sense of shame of what might be thought of us at head quarters, rendered the reflection still more painful.

Our bivouac, notwithstanding all our efforts, was a sad one; and, when the moon rose, some drops of heavy rain falling at intervals, in the still, untroubled air, threatened a night of storm; gradually the sky grew darker and darker, the clouds hung nearer to the earth, and a dense thick mass of dark mist shrouded every object; the heavy canonade of the siege was stilled, nothing betrayed that a vast army was encamped near us, their bivouac fires were even imperceptible, and the only sound we heard was the great bell of Ciudad Rodrigo as it struck the hour, and seemed in the mournful cadence of its chime like the knell of the doomed citadel.

The patrol which I commanded to visit on its rounds the most advanced post of our position. This was a small farm house which, standing upon a little rising ledge of ground, was separated from the French lines by a little stream tributary to the Aguda: a party of the fourteenth were picketed here, and beneath them, in the valley, scarce five hundred yards distant, was the detachment of cuirassiers which formed the French outpost. As we neared our picket, the deep voice of the sentry challenged us, and, while all else was silent as the grave, we could hear from the opposite side of the merry chorus of the French chanson a boire, with its clattering accompaniment of glasses, as some gay companions were making merry together.

Within the little hut which contained our fellows, the scene was a different one: the three officers who commanded, sat moodily over a wretched fire of wet wood, a solitary candle dimly lighted the dismantled room, where a table but ill supplied with cheer stood unmind and uncared for.

"Well, O'Malley, cried Baker, as I came in; 'what is the night about, and what's Crawford for next?'"

"We hear," cried another, "that he means to give battle to-morrow, but surely Sir Arthur's orders are positive enough. Gordon himself told me that he was forbid to fight beyond the Coa, but to retreat at the first advance of the enemy."

"I'm afraid," replied I, "that retreating is his last thought just now. Ammunition has just been served out, and I know the horse artillery have orders to be in readiness by daybreak."

"All right," said Hampden, with a half-bitter tone. "Nothing like going through with it. If he is to be brought to a court martial for disobedience, he'll take good care we shan't be there to see it."

"Why, the French are fifty thousand strong," said Baker.

"Look there, what does that mean now? That's a signal from the town." As he spoke, a rocket of great brilliancy shot up into the sky, and, bursting, at length fell in millions of red lustrous sparks on every side, showing forth the tall fortress and the encamped army around it, with all the clearness of noonday. It was a most splendid sight; and, though the next moment all was dark as before, we gazed still fixedly into the gloomy distance; straining our eyes to observe what was hid from our view for ever.

"That must be a signal," repeated Baker.

"Begad! if Crawford sees it, he'll interpret it as a reason for fighting. I trust he's asleep by this time," said Hampden. "By the bye, O'Malley, did you see the fellows at work in the trenches? How beautifully clear it was towards the southward!"

"Yes, I remarked that! and what surprised me was the openness of their position in that direction. Towards the San Benito mole, I could not see a man."

"Ah! they'll not attack on that side—but if we really are—"

"Stay, Hampden," said I, interrupting; a thought has just struck me. At sunset I saw through my telescope the French engineers marking with their white tape the line of a new intrenchment in that quarter. Would it not be a glorious thing to move the tape, and bring the fellows under the fire of San Benito?"

"By Jove, O'Malley, that is a thought worth a troop to you!"

"Far more like to forward his promotion in the next world than in this," said Baker, smiling.

"By no means," added I: "I marked the ground this evening, and have it perfectly in my mind. If we were to follow the bend of the river, I'll be bound to come right upon the spot: by nearing the fortress we'll escape the sentries; and all this portion is open to us."

The project thus loosely thrown out was now discussed in all its bearings. Whatever difficulties it presented were combated so much to our own satisfaction, that at last its very facility dampened our ardor. Meanwhile the night wore on, and the storm of rain so long impending began to descend in very torrents: hissing along the parched ground, it rose in a mist, while over head the heavy thunder rolled in long unbroken peals, the crazy door threatened to give way at each moment, and the whole building trembled to its foundation.

"Pass the brandy down here, Hampden, and thank your stars you're where you are. Eh, O'Malley? You'll defer your trip to San Benito for finer weather."

"Why, in good earnest," said Hampden, "I'd rather begin my engineering at a more favorable season; but if O'Malley's for it—"

"And O'Malley is for it," said I, suddenly.

"Then faith I'm not the man to balk his fancy; and as Crawford is so bent upon fighting to-morrow, it do n't make much difference. Is it a bargain?"

"It is; here's my hand on it."

"Come, come, boys; I'll none of this: we've been prettily cut up this morning already. You shall not go upon this foolish excursion."

"Confound it, old fellow; it's all very well for you to talk, with the majority before you, next step; but here we are, if peace come to-morrow, scarcely better than we left England. No, no, if O'Malley's ready—and I see he is so before me—what have you got there?"

"Oh! I see; that's our tape line; capital fun, by George; the worst of it is, they'll make us Colonels of engineers."

"Now then, what's your plan—on foot or mounted?"

"Mounted, and for this reason: the country is all open; if we are to have a run for it, our thoroughbreds ought to distance them; and, as we must expect to pass some of their sentries, our only chance is on horseback."

"My mind is relieved of a great load," said Hampden; "I was trembling in my skin, lest you should make it a walking party. I'll do any thing you like in the saddle, from robbing the mail to cutting out a frigate; but I never was much of a footpad."

"Well, Mike," said I, as I returned to the room with my trusty follower, "are the cattle to be depended on?"

"If we had a snaffle in Malachi Daly's mouth," (my brown horse,) "I'd be afraid of nothing, sir; but, if it comes to fencing, with that cruel bit—but sure, you've a light hand, and let him have his head, if it's wall."

"By Jove, he thinks it a fox-chase!" said Hampden.

"Is n't it the same, sir?" said Mike, with a seriousness that made the whole party smile.

"Well, I hope we shall not be earthed any way," said I. "Now the next thing is, who has a lantern?—ah! the very thing; nothing better. Look to your pistols, Hampden; and, Mike, here's a glass of grog for you; we'll want you. And now, one bumper for good luck. Eh, Baker, won't you pledge us?"

"And spare a little for me," said Hampden. "How it does rain. If one didn't expect to be waterproofed before morning, they really would n't go out in such weather."

While I busied myself in arranging my few preparations, Hampden proceeded gravely to inform Mike that we were going to the assistance of the besieged fortress, which could not possibly go on without us.

"Tare and ages," said Mike, "that's mighty quare; and the blue rocket was a letter of invitation."

"Exactly," said Hampden; "and you see there's no ceremony between us. We'll just drop in, in the evening, in a friendly way."

"Well, then, upon my conscience, I'd wait, if I was you, till the family was n't in confusion. They have enough on their hands just now."

"So you'll not be persuaded," said Baker. "Well, I frankly tell you, that come what will of it, as your senior officer, I'll report you to-morrow. I'll not risk myself for any such hair-brained expeditions."

"A mighty pleasant look-out for me," said Mike; "if I'm not shot to-night, still I may be flogged in the morning."

This speech once more threw us into a hearty fit of laughter, amid which we took leave of our friends, and set forth upon our way.

CHAPTER III.—The Lines of Ciudad Rodrigo.

The small twinkling lights which shone from the ramparts of Ciudad Rodrigo were our only guide, as we issued forth upon our perilous expedition. The storm raged, if possible, even more violently than before; and gusts of wind swept along the ground with the force of a hurricane; so that, at first, our horses could scarcely face the tempest. Our path lay along the little stream for a considerable way: after which, fording the rivulet, we entered upon the open plain; taking care to avoid the French outposts in the extreme left, which was marked by a bivouac fire, burning under the heavy down-pour of rain, and looking larger through the dim atmosphere around it.

I rode foremost, followed closely by Hampden and Mike: not a word was spoken after we crossed the stream. Our plan was, if challenged by a patrol, to reply in French and press on: so small a party could never suggest the idea of attack; and we hoped in this manner to escape.

The violence of the storm was such, that many of our precautions as to silence were quite unnecessary; and we had advanced to a considerable extent into the plain before any appearance of the encampment struck us. At length, on mounting a little rising ground, we perceived several fires stretching far away to the northward; while, still to our left, there blazed one larger and brighter than the others. We now found that we had not outflanked their position as we intended, and learning from the situation of the fires, that we were still only at the outposts, we pressed sharply forward, directing our course by the twin stars that shone from the fortress.

"How heavy the ground is here!" whispered Hampden, as our horses sunk above the fetlocks; "we had better stretch away to the right, the rise of the hill will favor us."

"Hark!" said I: "did you not hear something? pull up; silence now; yes, there they come. It's a patrol, I hear their tramp." As I spoke, the measured tread of infantry was heard above the storm, and soon after a lantern was seen coming along the causeway near us. The column passed within a few yards of where we stood. I could even recognise the black covering of the skakos as the light fell on them. "Let us follow them," whispered I; and the next moment we fell in upon their track, holding our cattle well in hand and ready to start at a moment.

"Qui est là?" a sentry demanded.

"La deuxième division," cried a hoarse voice.

"Halt! là! le consigne?"

"Wagham!" repeated the same voice as before, while his party resumed their march, and the next moment the patrol was again upon his post, silent and motionless as before.

"En avant, Messieurs!" said I aloud, as soon as the infantry had proceeded some distance; "en avant!"—"Qui est là?" demanded the sentry, as we came along at a sharp trot.

"L'état-major, Wagham," responded I, pressing on without drawing rein; and in a moment we had regained our former position behind the infantry. We had scarcely time to congratulate ourselves upon the success of our scheme, when a tremendous clattering noise in front, mingled with the galloping of horses and the cracking of whips, announced the approach of the artillery as they came along by a narrow road which bisected our path; and, as they passed between us and the column, we could hear the muttered sentences of the drivers, cursing the unreasonable time for an attack, and swearing at their cattle in no measured tones.

"Did you hear that?" whispered Hampden; "the battery is about to be directed against the San Benito, which must be far away to the left. I heard one of the troop saying that they were to open their fire at daybreak."

"All right, now," said I; "look there."

From the hill we now stood upon, a range of lanterns was distinctly visible, stretching away for nearly half a mile.

"There are the trenches: they must be at work, too; see how the lights are moving from place to place! Straight now: forward!"

So saying, I pressed my horse boldly on. We had not proceeded many minutes, when the sounds of galloping were heard coming along behind us.

"To the right, in the hollow," cried I: "be still."

Scarcely had we moved off when several horsemen galloped up, and, drawing their reins to breathe their horses up the hill, we could hear their voices as they conversed together.

In the few broken words we could catch, we guessed that the attack upon San Benito was only a feint to induce Crawford to hold his position, while the French, marching upon his flank and front, were to attack him with overwhelming masses and crush him.

"You hear what's in store for us, O'Malley," whispered Hampden. "I think we could not possibly do better than hasten back with the intelligence."

"We must not forget what we came for, first," said I; and the next moment we were following the horsemen, who, from their helmets, seemed horse artillery officers.

The pace our guides rode at showed us that they knew their ground. We passed several sentries, muttering something at each time, and seeming as if only anxious to keep up with our party.

"They've halted," said I. "Now to the left there: gently here, for we must be in the midst of their lines. Ha! I knew we were right: see there!"

Before us, now, at a few hundred yards, we could perceive a number of men engaged upon the field. Lights were moving from place to place rapidly, while immediately in front, a strong picket of cavalry were halted.

"By Jove, there's sharp work of it to-night," whispered Hampden; "they do intend to surprise us to-morrow."

"Gently now, to the left," said I; as cautiously skirting the little hill, I kept my eye firmly fixed upon the watchfire.

The storm, which for some time had abated considerably, was now nearly quelled, and the moon again peeped forth amid masses of black and watery clouds.

"What good fortune for us!" thought I, at this moment, as I surveyed the plain before me.

"I say, O'Malley, what are those fellows at yonder, where the blue light is burning?"

"Ah! the very people we want; these are the sappers. Now for it! that's our ground: we'll soon come upon their track, now."

We pressed rapidly forward, passing an infantry party, as we went. The blue light was scarcely a hundred yards off: we could even hear the shouting of the officers to their men in the trenches, when suddenly my horse came down upon his head, and rolling over, crushed me to the earth.

"Not hurt, my boy," cried I, in a subdued tone, as Hampden jumped down beside me.

It was the angle of a trench I had fallen into; and though both my horse and myself felt stunned for the moment, we rallied the next minute.

"Here is the very spot," said I: "now, Mike, catch the bridles and follow us closely."

Guiding ourselves along the edge of the trench, we crept stealthily forward: the only watch-fire near was where the engineer party was halted, and our object was to get outside of this.

"My turn this time," said Hampden, as he tripped suddenly, and fell head foremost upon the grass.

As I assisted him to rise, something caught my ankle, and, on stooping, I found it was a cord pegged fast into the ground and lying only a few inches above it.

"Now, steady! see here; this is their working line; pass your hand along it there, and let us follow it out."

While Hampden accordingly crept along on one side, I tracked the cord upon the other; here I found it terminating upon a small mound, where probably some battery was to be erected. I accordingly gathered it carefully up, and was returning toward my friend, when what was my horror to hear Mike's voice, conversing, as it seemed to me, with some one in French.

I stood fixed to the spot, my very heart beating almost in my mouth as I listened.

"Qui êtes vous, donc, mon ami?" inquired a hoarse, deep voice, a few yards off.

"Bon cheval, bon beast, sacre nom de Dieu!" A hearty burst of laughter prevented my hearing the conclusion of Mike's French.

I now crept forward upon my hands and knees, till I could catch the dark outline of the horses, one hand fixed upon my pistol trigger, and my sword drawn in the other. Meanwhile the dialogue continued.

"Vous êtes d'Alsace; n'est-ce pas?" asked the Frenchman, kindly, supposing that Mike's French savored of Strasbourg.

"Oh, blessed Virgin! av' I might shoot him," was the muttered reply.

Before I had time to see the effect of the last speech, I pressed forward with a bold spring, and felled the Frenchman to the earth; my hand had scarcely pressed upon his mouth, when Hampden was beside me. Snatching up the pistol I let fall, he held it to the man's chest, and commanded him to be silent. To unfasten his girdle, and bind the Frenchman's hands behind him was the work of a moment; and, as the sharp click of the pistol-cock seemed to calm his efforts to escape, we soon succeeded in fastening a handkerchief tight across his mouth, and, the next minute, he was placed behind Mike's saddle, firmly attached to this worthy individual by his sword belt.

"Now, a clear run home for it, and a fair start," said Hampden, as he sprang into the saddle.

"Now, then, for it," I replied; as, turning my horse's head toward our lines, I dashed madly forward.

The moon was again obscured, but still the dark outline of the hill which formed our encampment was discernible on the horizon. Riding side by side on we hurried; now splashing through the deep and wet marshes, now plunging through small streams. Our horses were high in mettle, and we spared them not; by taking a wide détour we had outflanked the French pickets, and were almost out of all risk, when suddenly, on coming to the verge of a rather steep hill, we perceived beneath us a strong cavalry picket standing around a watch-fire: their horses were ready saddled, the men accoutred, and quite prepared for the field. While we conversed together in whispers as to the course to follow, our deliberations were very rapidly cut short. The French prisoner, who hitherto had given neither trouble nor resistance, had managed to free his mouth from the encumbrance of the handkerchief; and, as we stood quietly discussing our plans, with one tremendous effort he endeavored to hurl himself and Mike from the saddle, shouting out as he did so,—

"A moi, camarades: sautez moi!"

Hampden's pistol leaped from the holster as he spoke, and, levelling it with a deadly aim, he pulled the trigger; but I threw up his arm, and the ball passed high above his head. To have killed the Frenchman would have been to lose my faithful follower, who struggled manfully with his adversary, and, at length, by throwing himself flatly forward upon the mane of his horse, completely disabled him. Meanwhile, the picket had sprung to their saddles, and looked wildly about on every side.

Not a moment was to be lost; so, turning our horses' heads towards the plain, away we went. One loud cheer announced to us that we had been seen, and the next instant the clash of the pursuing cavalry was heard behind us. It was now entirely a question of speed, and little need we have feared, had Mike's horse not been doubly weighted. However, as we still had considerably the start, and the gray dawn of day enabled us to see the ground, the odds were in our favor. "Never let your horse's head go," was my often repeated direction to Mike, as he spurred with all the desperation of madness. Already the low meadow land was in sight which flanked the stream we had crossed in the morning; but, unfortunately, the heavy rains had swollen it now to a considerable depth, and the muddy current, choked with branches of trees and great stones, was hurrying down like a torrent. "Take the river: never flinch it," was my cry to my companions, as I turned my head and saw a French dragoon, followed by two others, gaining rapidly upon us. As I spoke, Mike dashed in followed by Hampden, and the same moment the sharp ring of a carbine whizzed past me. To take off the pursuit from the others, I now wheeled my horse suddenly round, as if I feared to take the stream, and dashed along by the river's bank.

Beneath me, in the foaming current, the two horsemen labored; now stemming the rush of water, now reeling almost beneath. A sharp cry burst from Mike as I looked; and I saw the poor fellow bend nearly to his saddle. I could see no more, for the chase was now hot upon myself; behind me rode a French dragoon, his carbine pressed tightly to his side, ready to fire as he pressed on in pursuit. I had but one chance; so, drawing my pistol, I wheeled suddenly in my saddle, and fired straight at him. The Frenchman fell while a regular volley from his party rung around me; one ball striking my horse, and another lodging in the pannel of my saddle. The noble animal reeled nearly to the earth, but, as if rallying for a last effort, sprang forward with renewed energy, and plunged boldly into the river.

For a moment, so sudden was my leap, my pursuers lost sight of me; but the bank being somewhat steep, the efforts of my horse to climb, again discovered me, and, before I reached the field, two pistol balls took effect upon me; one slightly grazed my side, but my bridle arm was broken by the other, and my hand fell motionless to my side. A cheer of defiance was, however, my reply, as I turned round in my saddle, and the next moment I was far beyond the range of their fire.

Not a man durst follow; and the last sight I had of them was the dismounted group who stood around their dead comrade; before me rode Hampden and Mike, still at top speed, and never turning their heads backward. I hastened after them; but my poor wounded horse, nearly hamstringed by the shot, became dead lame; and it was past daybreak ere I reached the first outposts of our lines.

CHAPTER IV....The Doctor.

"And his wound? Is it a serious one?" said a round, full voice, as the doctor left my room, at the conclusion of his visit.

"No, sir; a fractured bone is the worst of it; the bullet grazed, but did not cut the artery; and as—"

"Well, how soon will he be about again?"

"In a few weeks, if no fever sets in."

"There is no objection to my seeing him?—a few minutes only—I shall be cautious." So saying, and, as it seemed to me, without waiting for a reply, the door was opened by an aid-de-camp, who, announcing General Crawford, closed it again and withdrew.

The first glance I threw upon the General, enabled me to recognise the officer who on the previous morning had rode up to the picket and given us the orders to charge. I essayed to rise a little as he came forward, but he motioned me with his hand to lie still, while, placing a chair close by my bed, he sat down.

"Very sorry for your mishap, sir; but glad it is no worse. Moreton says that nothing of consequence is injured; there, you must not speak, except I ask you. Hampden has told me every thing necessary; at least, as far as he knew. Is it your opinion, also, that any movement is in contemplation? and from what circumstance?"

I immediately explained, and, as briefly as I was able, the reasons for suspecting such, with which he seemed quite satisfied. I detailed the various changes in the positions of the troops that were taking place during the night, the march of the artillery, and the strong bodies of cavalry that were posted in reserve along the river.

"Very well, sir; they'll not move; your prisoner, sir, quarter-master of an infantry battalion, says not, also. Yours was a bold stroke, but could not possibly have been of service, and the best thing I can do for you is not to mention it; a court-martial is but a poor recompense for a gunshot wound. Meanwhile, when this blows over, I'll appoint you on my personal staff. There, not a word, I beg; and now good-bye."

So saying, and waving me an adieu, with his hand, the gallant veteran withdrew before I could express my gratitude for his kindness.

I had little time for reflecting over my past adventure. Such numbers of my brother officers poured in upon me. All the doctor's cautions respecting quietness and rest were disregarded, and a perfect levee sat the entire morning in my bedroom. I was delighted to learn that Mike's wound, though painful at the moment, was of no consequence, and indeed, Hampden, who escaped both steel and shot, was the worst off among us; his plunge in the river having brought on an ague he had labored under years before.

"The illustrious Maurice has been twice here this morning, but they would not admit him. Your Scotch physician is afraid of his Irish confère, and they had a rare set-to, about Galen and Hippocrates, outside," said Baker.

"By-the-bye," said another, "did you see how Sparks looked when Quill joined us? Egad, I never saw a fellow in such a fright; he reddened up, then grew pale, turned his back, and slunk away at the very first moment."

"Yes, I remember it. We must find out the reason; for Maurice, depend upon it, has been hoaxing the poor fellow."

"Well, O'Malley," growled out the senior major, "you certainly did give Hampden a benefit. He'd not trust himself in such company again, and begad, he says, the man is as bad as the master. That fellow of yours never let go his prisoner till he reached the Quarter General, and they were both bathed in blood by that time."

"Poor Mike, we must do something for him."

"Oh! he's as happy as a king. Maurice has been in to see him, and they've had a long chat about Ireland, and all the national pastimes of whiskey drinking and smashing skulls: my very temples ache at the recollection."

"Is Mister O'Mealey at home?" said a very rich Cork accent, as the well known and most droll features of Dr. Maurice Quill appeared at the door.

"Come in, Maurice, said the major; "and for Heaven's sake behave properly. The poor fellow must not have a row about his bedside."

"A row, a row! Upon my conscience, it is little you know about a row, and there's worse things going than a row."

"Which leg is it?"

"It's an arm, Doctor, I'm happy to say."

"Not your punch hand, I hope. No; all's right. A neat fellow you have for a servant, that Mickey Free. I was asking him about a townsman of his own—one Tim Delany—the very cut of himself; the best servant I ever had. I never could make out what became of him. Old Hobson of the ninety-fifth gave him to me, saying, 'There, he's for you, Maurice, and a bigger thief and a greater blackguard there's not in the sixtieth.'"

"Strong word," said I.

"And true," said he, "he'd steal your molar tooth while you were laughing at him."

"Let me have him, and try my hand on him, any way. I've got no one just now. Anything is better than nothing."

"Well, I took Tim, and sending for him to my room, I locked the door, and, sitting down gravely before him, explained, in a few words, that I was quite aware of his little propensities."

"Now," said I, "if you like to behave well, I'll think you as honest as the chief justice; but, if I catch you stealing, if it be only the value of a brass snuff-box, I'll have you flogged before the regiment, as sure as my name's Maurice."

"O! I wish you had heard the volley of protestations that fell from him, fast as hail. He was a calumniated man; the world conspired to wrong him; he was never a thief nor a rogue in his life; he had a weakness, he confessed, for the ladies, but, except that, he hoped he might die so thin, that he could shave himself with his shin bone, if he ever so much as took a pinch of salt that wasn't his own."

"However this might be, nothing could be better than the way Tim and I got on together. Every thing was in its place—nothing missing—and, in fact, for upwards of a year, I went on wondering when he was to show out in his true colors; for hitherto he had been a phoenix."

"At last,—we were quartered in Limerick at the time,—every morning used to bring accounts of all manner of petty thefts in the barracks; one fellow had lost his belt, another his shoes, a third had three-and-sixpence in his pocket when he went to bed, and woke without a farthing, and so on: every body, save myself, was mulet of something. At length some rumors of Tim's former propensities got abroad; suspicion was excited. My friend Delany was rigidly watched, and some very dubious circumstances attached to the way he spent his evenings."

"My brother officers called upon me about the matter, and, although nothing had transpired like proof, I sent for Tim, and opened my mind on the subject."

"You may talk of the look of conscious innocence, but I defy you to conceive any thing finer than the stare of offended honor Tim gave me as I begun."

"They say it's me, doctor," said he, "do they? And you—you believe them. You allow them to revile me that way? Well, well the world is come to a pretty pass, anyhow. Now, let me ask your honor a few questions?"

"How many shirts had yourself when I entered your service? two, and one was more like a fishing-net! And how many have ye now? eighteen; ay, eighteen bran new cambric ones; devil a hole in one of them! How many pair of stockings had you? three and an odd one: you have two dozen this minute. How many pocket handkerchiefs? one—devil a more! You could only blow your nose two days in the week, and now you may every hour of the twenty-four!—and, as to the trifling articles of small value, snuff-boxes, gloves, boot-jacks, night-caps, and—"

"Stop, Tim, that's enough—"

"No, sir, it is not," said Tim, drawing himself up to his full height; "you have wounded my feelings in a way I can't forget: it is impossible we can have that mutual respect our position demands: farewell, farewell, doctor, and forever!"

"Before I could say another word, the fellow had left the room, and closed the door after him; and, from that hour to this, I never set eyes on him."

In this vein did the worthy doctor run on, till some more discreet friend suggested that, however well intentioned the vain, I did not seem to be fully equal to it; my flushed cheek and anxious eye betraying that the fever of my wound had commenced; they left me, therefore, once more alone, and to my solitary musings over the vicissitudes of my fortune.

CHAPTER V....The Coa.

Within a week from the occurrence of the event just mentioned, Ciudad Rodrigo surrendered, and Crawford assumed another position beneath the walls of Almeida; the Spanish contingent having left us, we were reinforced by the arrival of two battalions, renewed orders being sent not to risk a battle; but, if the French should advance, to retire beyond the Coa.

On the evening of the 21st of July, a strong body of French cavalry advanced into the plain, supported by some heavy guns; upon which Crawford retired upon the Coa, intending, as we supposed, to place that river between himself and the enemy. Three days, however, passed over without any movement upon either side, and we still continued, with a force of scarcely four thousand infantry and a thousand dragoons, to stand opposite to an army of nearly fifty thousand men; such was our position as the night of the 24th set in. I was sitting alone in my quarters; Mike, whose wound had been severer than at first was supposed, had been sent to Almeida, and I was musing in solitude upon the events of the campaign, when the noise and bustle without excited my attention; the roll of artillery wagons, the clash of musketry, and the distant sounds of marching, all proved that the troops were effecting some new movement, and I burned with anxiety to learn what it was. My brother officers, however, came not as usual to my quarters; and, although I waited with impatience while the hours rolled by, no one appeared.

Long, low, moaning gusts of wind swept along the earth, carrying the leaves as they tore them from the trees, and mingling their sad sounds with the noises of the retreating troops; for I could perceive that gradually the sounds grew more and more remote, and only now and then could I trace their position, as the roll of a distant drum swelled upon the breeze, or the more skilful cry of a pibroch broke upon my ear: a heavy downpour of rain followed soon after, and in its unceasing plash drowned all other sounds.

As the little building shook beneath the peals of loud thunder, the lightning flashed in broad sheets upon the rapid river, which, swollen and foaming, dashed impetuously beside my window. By the uncertain but vivid glare of the flashes I endeavored to ascertain where our force was posted; but in vain. Never did I witness such a night of storm: the deep booming of the thunder seeming never for a moment to cease, while the rush of the torrent grew gradually louder, till at length it swelled into one deep and sullen roar, like that of distant artillery.

Weak and nervous as I felt from the effects of my wound, feverish and exhausted by days of suffering and sleepless nights, I paced my room with tottering but impatient steps. The sense of my sad and imprisoned state impressed me deeply; and while, from time to time, I replenished my fire, and hoped to hear some friendly step upon the stair, my heart grew gradually heavier, and every gloomy and depressing thought suggested itself to my imagination. My most constant impression was, that the troops were retiring beyond the Coa, and that forgotten in the haste and confusion of a night march, I had been left behind to fall a prisoner to the enemy.

The sounds of the troops retiring gradually farther and farther favored the idea, in which I was still more strengthened on finding that the peasants who inhabited the little hut had departed, leaving me utterly alone. From the moment I ascertained this fact, my impatience knew no bounds, and, in proportion as I began to feel some exertion necessary on my part, so much more did my nervousness increase my debility, that at last I sank exhausted upon my bed, while a cold perspiration broke out upon my temples.

I have mentioned that the Coa was immediately beneath the house; I must also add, that the little building occupied the angle of a steep but narrow gorge, which descended from the plain to the bridge across the stream. This, as far as I knew, was the only means we possessed of passing the river; so that, when the last retiring sounds of the troops were heard by me, I began to suspect that Crawford, in compliance with his orders, was making a backward movement, leaving the bridge open to the French, to draw them on to his line of march, while he should cross over at some more distant point.

As the night grew later, the storm seemed to increase: the waves of the foaming river dashed against the frail walls of the hut, while its roof, rent by the blast, fell in fragments upon the stream, and all threatened a speedy and perfect ruin.

How I longed for morning! The doubt and uncertainty I suffered nearly drove me distracted. Of all the casualties my career as a soldier opened, none had such terrors for me as imprisonment: the very thought of the long years of inaction and inglorious idleness, was worse than any death. My wounds and the state of fever I was in, increased the morbid dread upon me, and had the French captured me at the time, I know not that madness of which I was not capable. Day broke at last, but slowly and sullenly; the gray clouds hurried past upon the storm, pouring down the torrents as they went, and the desolation and dreariness on all sides was scarcely preferable to the darkness and gloom of night. My eyes were turned ever towards the plain, across which the winter wind bore the plashing rain in vast sheets of water: the thunder crashed louder and louder; but except the sounds of the storm, none others met my ear. Not a man, not a human figure could I see, as I strained my sight towards the distant horizon.

The morning crept over me, but the storm abated not, and the same unchanged aspect of dreary desolation prevailed without. At times I thought I could hear amidst the noises of the tempest something like the roll of distant artillery; but the thunder swelled in sullen roar above all, and left me uncertain as before.

At last, in a momentary pause of the storm, a tremendous peal of heavy guns caught my ear, followed by the long rattling of small arms. My heart bounded with ecstasy. The thought of the battle-field, with all its changing fortunes, was better, a thousand times better, than the despairing sense of desertion I labored under. I listened now with eagerness, but the rain bore down again in torrents, and the crumbling walls and falling timbers left no other sounds to be heard. Far as my eye could reach, nothing could still be seen save the dreary monotony of the vast plain, undulating slightly here and there, but unmarked by a sign of man.

Far away towards the horizon, I had remarked for some time past that the clouds resting upon the earth grew blacker and blacker, spreading out to either side in vast masses, and not broken or wafted along like the rest. As I watched the phenomenon with an anxious eye, I perceived the dense mass suddenly appear, as it were, rent asunder, while a volume of liquid flame rushed wildly out, throwing a lurid glare on every side. One terrific clap, louder than any thunder, shook the air at this moment, while the very earth trembled beneath the shock.

As I hesitated what it might be, the heavy din of great guns again was heard, and from the midst of the black smoke rode forth a dark mass, which I soon recognized as the horse artillery at full gallop. They were directing their course towards the bridge.

As they mounted the little rising ground, they wheeled and unlimbered with the speed of lightning, just as a strong column of cavalry showed above the ridge. One tremendous discharge again shook the field, and ere the smoke cleared away, they were again far in retreat.

So much was my attention occupied with this movement, that I had not perceived the long line of infantry that came from the extreme left, and were now advancing also towards the bridge at a brisk quick step: scattered bodies of cavalry came up from different parts, while from the little valley every now and then a rifleman would mount the rising ground, turning to fire as he retreated. All this boded a rapid and disorderly retreat, and, although as yet I could see nothing of the pursuing enemy, I knew too well the relative forces of each to have a doubt for the result.

At last, the head of a French column appeared above the mist, and I could plainly distinguish the gestures of the officers as they hurried their men onwards. Meanwhile a loud hurra attracted my attention, and I turned my eyes towards the road which led to the river. Here a small body of the 95th had hurriedly assembled; and, formed, again, were standing to cover the retreat of the broken infantry as they passed on eagerly to the bridge: in a second after the French cuirassiers appeared. Little anticipating resistance from a flying and disordered mass, they rode headlong forward, and although the firm attitude and steady bearing of the Highlanders might have appalled them, they rode heedlessly down upon the square, sabring the very men in the front rank. Till now not a trigger had been pulled, when suddenly the word "fire" was given, and a withering volley of balls sent the cavalry column in shivers. One hearty cheer broke from the infantry in the rear, and I could hear "gallant ninety-fifth" shouted on every side along the plain.

The whole vast space before me was now one animated battle ground. Our own troops retiring in haste before the overwhelming forces of the French, occupied every little vantage ground with their guns and light infantry; charges of cavalry coursing hither and thither, while, as the French pressed forward, the retreating columns again formed into squares to permit stragglers to come up. The rattle of small arms, the heavy peal of artillery, the earthquake crash of cavalry, rose on every side, while the cheers which alternately told of the vacillating fortune of the fight, rose amidst the wild pibroch of the Highlanders.

A tremendous noise now took place on the floor beneath me; and looking down, I perceived that a sergeant and party of the sappers had taken possession of the little hut, and were busily engaged piercing the walls for musketry; and before many minutes had elapsed, a company of the rifles were thrown into the building, which, from its commanding position above the road, enfiladed the whole line of march. The officer in command briefly informed me that we had been attacked that morning by the French in force, and "devilishly well thrashed;" that we were now in retreat beyond the Coa, where we ought to have been three days previously, and desired me to cross the bridge and get myself out of the way as soon as I possibly could.

A twenty-four pounder from the French lines struck the angle of the house as he spoke, scattering the mortar and broken bricks about us on all sides. This was warning sufficient for me, wounded and disabled as I was; so, taking the few things I could save in my haste, I hurried from the hut, and, descending the path, now slippery by the heavy rain, I took my way across the bridge and established myself on a little rising knoll of ground beyond, from which a clear view could be obtained of the whole field.

I had not been many minutes in my present position ere the pass which led down to the bridge became thronged with troops, wagons, ammunition carts, and hospital stores, pressing thickly forward amid shouting and uproar: the hills on either side of the way were crowded with troops, who formed as they came up, the artillery taking up their position on every rising ground. The firing had already begun, and the heavy booming of the large guns was heard at intervals amid the rattling crash of musketry: except the narrow road before me, and the high bank of the stream, I could see nothing; but the tumult and din, which grew momentarily louder, told that the tide of battle waged nearer and nearer. Still the retreat continued; and at length the heavy artillery came thundering across the narrow bridge, followed by stragglers of all arms, and wounded, hurrying to the rear; the sharpshooters and Highlanders held the heights above the stream, thus covering the retreating columns; but I could plainly perceive that their fire was gradually slackening, and that the guns which flanked their position were withdrawn, and every thing bespoke a speedy retreat. A tremendous discharge of musketry at this moment, accompanied by a deafening cheer, announced the advance of the French, and soon the head of the Highland brigade was seen descending towards the bridge, followed by the rifles, and the 95th and 14th Light Dragoons, were now formed in column of attack, and the infantry deployed into line; and, in an instant after, high above the din and crash of battle, I heard the word "charge!"

The rising crest of the hill hid them from my sight, but my heart bounded with ecstasy as I listened to the clanging sound of the cavalry advance. Meanwhile, the infantry pressed on, and, forming upon the bank, took up a strong position in front of the bridge: the heavy guns were also unlimbered: riflemen scattered through the low copse wood, and every precaution taken to defend the pass to the last: for a moment all my attention was riveted to the movements upon our own side of stream, when suddenly the cavalry bugle sounded the recall, and the same moment the staff came galloping across the bridge. One officer I could perceive, covered with orders and trappings; his head was bare, and his horse, splashed with blood and foam, moved lamely and with difficulty; he turned in the middle of the bridge, as if irresolute whether to retreat farther: one glance at him showed me the bronzed, manly features of our leader. Whatever his resolve, the matter was soon decided for him; for the cavalry came galloping swiftly down the slope, and in an instant the bridge was blocked up by the retreating forces; while the French as suddenly appearing above the height, opened a plunging fire upon their defenceless enemies; their cheer of triumph was answered by our fellows from the opposite bank, and a heavy cannonade thundered along the rocky valley, sending up a hundred echoes as it went.

The scene now became one of overwhelming interest; the French, posting their guns upon the height, replied to our fire, while their column, breaking into skirmishers, descended the banks to the river edge, and poured in one sheet of galling musketry. The road to the bridge, swept by our artillery, presented not a single file, and, although a movement among the French announced the threat of an attack, the deadly service of the artillery seemed to pronounce it hopeless.

A strong cavalry force stood inactively spectators of the combat on the French side, among whom I saw remarked some bustle and preparation, and, as I looked, an officer rode boldly to the river edge, and, spurring his horse forward, plunged into the stream. The swollen and angry torrent, increased by the late rains, boiled like harm, and foamed around him as he advanced, when suddenly his horse appeared to have lost its footing, and the rapid current, circling around him, bore him along with it. He labored madly, but in vain, to retrace his steps; the rolling torrent rose above his saddle, and all that his gallant steed could do was barely sufficient to keep afloat: both man and horse were carried down between the contending armies. I could see him wave his hand to his comrades as if in adieu: one deafening cheer of admiration arose from the French lines, and the next moment he was seen to fall from his seat, and his body, shattered with balls floated, mournfully upon the stream.

This little incident, to which both armies were witnesses, seemed to have called forth all the fiercer passions of the contending forces; a loud yell of taunting triumph rose from the Highlanders, responded to by a cry of vengeance from the French, and the same moment the head of a column was seen descending the narrow causeway to the bridge; while an officer, with a whole blaze of decorations and crosses, sprung from his horse and took the lead. The little drummer, a child of scarcely ten years old, tripped gayly on, beating his little pas de charge, seeming rather like the play of infancy than the summons to death and carnage, as the heavy guns of the French opened a volume of fire and flame to cover the attacking column; for a moment all was hid from our eyes; the moment after the grape shot swept along the narrow causeway, and the hedge, which, till a second before was crowded with the life and courage of a noble column, was now one heap of dead and dying; the gallant fellow who led them on, fell among the first rank, and the little child, as if kneeling, was struck dead beside the parapet; his fair hair floated across his cold features, and seemed in its motion to lend a look of life, when the heart's throb had ceased for ever. The artillery again re-opened upon us, and, when the smoke had cleared away, we discovered that the French had advanced to the middle of the bridge, and carried off the body of their general. Twice they essayed to cross, and twice the death-dealing fire of our guns covered the narrow bridge with slain, while, by the wild pibroch of the forty-second swelling madly into notes of exultation and triumph, the Highlanders could scarcely be prevented from advancing hand to hand with the foe. Gradually the French slackened their fire, their great guns were one by one withdrawn from the heights, and a dropping, irregular musketry at intervals sustained the fight, which, ere sunset, ceased altogether; and thus terminated the battle of the Coa.

CHAPTER VI....The Night-march.

Scarcely had the night fallen, when our retreat commenced. Tired and weary as our brave fellows felt, but little repose was allowed them; their bivouac fires were blazing brightly, and they had just thrown themselves in groups around them, when the word to fall in was passed from troop to troop, and from battalion to battalion, no trumpet, no bugle called them to their ranks. It was necessary that all should be done noiselessly and speedily, while, therefore, the wounded were marched to the front, and the heavy artillery with them, a brigade of light four pounders, and two squadrons of cavalry held the heights above the bridge, and the infantry, forming into three columns, began their march.

My wound, forgotten in the heat and excitement of the conflict, was now becoming excessively painful, and I gladly availed myself of a place in a wagon, where, stretched upon some fresh straw, with no other covering save the starry sky, I soon fell sound asleep, and neither the heavy jolting of the rough conveyance, nor the deep and rutty road were able to disturb my slumbers. Still, through my sleep, I heard the sounds around me, the heavy tramp of infantry, the clash of the moving squadrons, and the dull roll of artillery; and ever and anon the half-stifled cry of pain, mingling with the reckless carol of some drinking song, all fitted through my dreams, lending to my thoughts of home and friends a memory of glorious war.

All the vicissitudes of a soldier's life passed then in review before me, elicited in some measure by the things about. The pomp and grandeur, the misery and meanness, the triumph, the defeat, the moment of victory and the hour of death were there, and in that vivid dream I lived a life long.

I awoke at length, the cold and chilling air which follows midnight, blew around me, and my wounded arm felt as though it were frozen. I tried to cover myself beneath the straw, but in vain, and as my limbs trembled, and my teeth chattered, I thought again of home, where at that moment the poorest menial of my uncle's house was better lodged than I, and strange to say, something of pride mingled with the thought, and in my lonely heart a feeling of elation cheered me.

These reflections were interrupted by the sound of a voice near me which I at once knew to be O'Shaughnessy's; he was on foot, and speaking evidently in some excitement.

"I tell you Maurice, some confounded blunder there must be; sure he was left in that cottage near the bridge, and no one ever saw him after."

"The French took it from the rifles before we crossed the river. By Jove, I'll wager my chance of promotion against a pint of sherry, he'll turn up somewhere in the morning; those Galway chaps have as many lives as a cat."

"See now, Maurice, I would n't for a full colonelcy any thing would happen to him—I like the boy."

"So do I myself; but I tell you there's no danger of him: did you ask Sparks any thing?"

"Ask Sparks, God help you! Sparks would go off in a fit at the sight of me. No, no—poor creature, it's little use it would be my speaking to him."

"Why so, Doctor," cried I from my straw couch.

"May I never, if it's not him. Charley, my son, I'm glad you're safe. Faith, I thought you were on your way to Verdun by this time."

"Sure, I told you he'd find his way here—but O'Mealey, dear—you're mighty could—a rigour, as old M'Lauchlan would call it."

"E'en sae, Maister Quill," said a broad Scotch accent behind him; "and I canna see any objection to giein' things their right names."

"The top of the morning to you," said Quill, familiarly patting him on the back, "how goes it old brimstone?"

The conversation might not have taken a very amicable turn, had M'Lauchlan heard the latter part of his speech; but as happily he was engaged unpacking a small canteen which he had placed in the wagon, it passed unnoticed.

"Ye'll nae dislike a toothfu' of something warm, Major," said he, presenting a glass to O'Shaughnessy, "and if ye'll permit me, Mr. O'Mealey to help you—"

"A thousand thanks, Doctor; but I fear a broken arm."

"There's naething in the whiskey to prevent the proper formation of callus."

"By the rock of Cashel it never made any one callus," said O'Shaughnessy, mistaking the import of the phrase.

"Ye are nae drinking frae the flask," said the doctor, turning in some agitation toward Quill.

"Devil a bit, my darling. I've a little horn conviancy here, that holds half a pint, nice measure."

I do not imagine that our worthy friend participated in Quill's admiration of the "conviancy," for he added, in a dry tone:

"Ye may as weel tak your liquor frae a glass like a Christian, as stick your nose in a coo's horn."

"By my conscience, you're no small judge of spirits, wherever you learned it," said the major, "it's like Islay malt."

"I was aye reckoned a good ane," said the doctor, "and my mither's brither, Caimbogie, had na his like in the north country. You maybe heered tell what he aince said to the Duchess of Argyle, when she sent for him to taste her claret."

"Never heard of it," quoth Quill; let's have it, by all means. I'd like to hear what the Duchess said to him."

"It was wa what the Duchess said to him, but what he said to the Duchess, ye ken. The way of it was this. My uncle, Caimbogie, was aye up at the castle, for, besides his knowledge of liquor, there was nae his match for deer-stalking, or spearing a salmon, in these parts. He was a great rough carle, it's true, but aye ye'd rather crack wi' than fight wi'."

"Weel, ae day they had a great dinner at the Duke's, and there were plenty o' great southern lords and braw leddies in velvets and satin; and vara muckle surprised they were at my uncle, when he came in wi' his tartan kilt, in full Highland dress, as the head of a clan ought to do. Caimbogie, however, pe'd nae attention to them, but he eat his dinner and drank his wine, and talked away about fallow and red deer, and at last the Duchess, for she was aye fond o' him, addressed him frae the head o' the table—"

"'Caimbogie,' quoth she, 'I'd like to hae your opinion about that wine. It's some the Duke has just received, and we should like to hear what you think of it.'"

"'It's nae sae bad, my leddy,' said my uncle! for ye see he was a man of few words, and never flattered onybody."

"'Then you don't approve much of it?' said the Duchess."

"'I've drank better, and I've drank waur,' quo' he."

"'I'm sorry you don't like it, Caimbogie,' said the Duchess, 'for it can never be popular now, we have such a dependence upon your taste.'"

"'I canna say ower muckle for my taste, my leddy, but ae thing I will say—I've a most damnable AMELL.'"

"I hear that never since the auld walls stood, was there ever the like o' the laughing that followed: the puir Duke himself was carried away and nearly had a fit, and a' the grand lords and leddies a' most died of it. But see here, the carle has nae left a drop o' whiskey in the flask."

"The last glass I drained to your respectable uncle's health," said Quill, with a most professional gravity: "now, Charley, make a little room for me in the straw."

The doctor soon mounted beside me, and, giving me a share of his ample cloak, considerably ameliorated my situation.

"So you knew, Sparks, Doctor," said I, with a strong curiosity to hear something of his early acquaintance.

"That I did: I knew him when he was an ensign in the 10th foot; and, to say the truth, he is not much changed since that time;—the same lively look of a sick codfish about his grey eyes; the same disorderly wave of his yellow hair; the same sad whining voice, and that confounded apothecary's laugh."

"Come, come, Doctor, Sparks is a good fellow at heart: I won't have him abused. I never knew he had been in the infantry; I should think it must have been another of the same name."

"Not at all; there's only one like him in the service, and that's himself. Confound it, man, I'd know his skin upon a bush; he was only three weeks in the 10th, and, indeed, your humble servant has the whole merit of his leaving it so soon."

"Do let me hear how that happened?"

"Simply thus—the jolly 10th were some four years ago the pleasantest corps in the army: from the Lieutenant-Colonel down to the last joined sub. all were out and outers—real gay fellows. The mess was, in fact, like a pleasant club, and if you did not suit it, the best thing you could do was to sell out or exchange into a slower regiment; and, indeed, this very wholesome truth was not very long in reaching your ears some way or other, and a man that could remain after being given this hint, was likely to go afterward without one."

Just as Dr. Quill reached this part of his story, an orderly dragoon galloped furiously past, and the next moment an aid de-camp rode by, calling, as he passed us—

"Close up there—close up! Get forward, my lads—get forward!"

It was evident, from the stir and bustle about, that some movement was being made; and soon after a dropping, irregular fire from the rear, showed that our cavalry were engaged with the enemy: the affair was scarcely of five minutes' duration, and our march resumed all its former regularity immediately after.

I now turned to the doctor to resume his story, but he was gone; at what moment he left I could not say, but O'Shaughnessy was also absent; nor did I again meet them for a considerable time after.

Towards daybreak we halted at Bonares, when my wound demanding rest and attention, I was billeted in the village, and consigned to all the miseries of a sick-bed.

CHAPTER VII....The Journey.

With that disastrous day my campaigning was destined, for some time at least, to conclude. My wound, which grew from hour to hour more threatening, at length began to menace the loss of the arm, and by the recommendation of the regimental surgeons, I was ordered back to Lisbon.

Mike, by this time perfectly restored, prepared every thing for my departure, and, on the third day after the battle of the Coa, I began my journey with downcast spirits and depressed heart. The poor fellow was, however, a kind and affectionate nurse, and, unlike many others, his cares were not limited to the mere bodily wants of his patient: he sustained, as well as he was able, my drooping resolution, rallied my spirits, and cheered my courage. With the very little Portuguese he possessed, he contrived to make every imaginable species of bargain: always managed a good billet; kept every one in good humor, and rarely left his quarters in the morning without a most affecting leave-taking, and reiterated promises to renew his visit.

Our journeys were usually short ones, and already two days had elapsed, when towards nightfall we entered the little hamlet of Jaffra. During the entire of that day, the pain of my wounded limb had been excruciating; the fatigue of the road and the heat had brought back violent inflammation, and, when at last the little village came in sight, my reason was fast yielding to the torturing agonies of my wound; but the transports with which I greeted my resting-place were soon destined to a change: for, as we drew near, not a light was to be seen, not a sound to be heard, not even a dog barked, as the heavy mule cart rattled over the uneven road. No trace of any living thing was there: the little hamlet lay sleeping in the pale moonlight, its streets deserted, and its homes tenantless; our own footsteps alone echoed along the dreary causeway; here and there, as we advanced farther, we found some relics of broken furniture and house gear; most of the doors lay open, but nothing remained within save bare walls; the embers still smoked in many places, upon the hearths, and showed us that the flight of the inhabitants had been recent. Yet every thing convinced us that the French had not been there; there was no trace of the reckless violence and wanton cruelty which marked their footsteps everywhere.

All proved that the desertion had been voluntary: perhaps in compliance with an order of our commander-in-chief, who frequently desired any intended line of march of the enemy to be left thus a desert. As we sauntered slowly on from street to street, half hoping that some one human being yet remained behind, and casting our eyes from side to side in search of quarters for the night, Mike suddenly came running up, saying,

"I have it, sir—I've found it out—there's people living down that small street there—I saw a light this minute as I passed."

I turned immediately, and, accompanied by the mule driver, followed Mike across a little open square into a small and narrow street, at the end of which a light was seen faintly twinkling: we hurried on, and in a few minutes reached a high wall of solid masonry, from a niche of which we now discovered, to our utter disappointment, the light proceeded. It was a small lamp placed before a little waxen image of the Virgin, and was probably the last act of piety of some poor villager, ere he left his home and hearth forever: there it burned brightly and tranquilly, throwing its mellow ray upon the cold deserted stones.

Whatever impatience I might have given way to in a moment of chagrin, was soon repressed, as I saw my two followers, uncovering their heads in silent reverence, kneel down before the little shrine. There was something at once touching and solemn in this simultaneous feeling of homage from the hearts of those removed in country, language, and in blood: they bent meekly down; their heads bowed upon their bosoms, while with muttering voices each offered up his prayer. All sense of their disappointment, all memory of their forlorn state, seemed to have yielded to more powerful and absorbing thoughts as they opened their hearts in prayer.

My eyes were still fixed upon them, when suddenly Mike, whose devotion seemed of the briefest, sprang to his legs, and with a spirit of levity, but little in accordance with his late proceedings, commenced a series of kicking, rap ing, and knocking at a small oak postern, sufficient to have aroused a whole convent from their cells, "House there!—good people within!"—bang, bang, bang: but the echoes alone responded to his call, and the sounds died away at length in the distant streets, leaving all as silent and dreary as before.

Our Portuguese friend, who by this time had finished his orisons, now began a vigorous attack upon the small door, and, with the assistance of Mike, armed with a fragment of granite about the size of a man's head, at length separated the frame from the hinges, and sent the whole mass prostrate before us.

The moon was just rising as we entered the little park, where gravelled walks, neatly kept and well trimmed, bespoke recent care and attention; following a handsome alley of lime trees, we reached a little jet d'eau, whose sparkling fountain shone like diamonds in the moon beams; and, escaping from the edge of a vast shell, ran murmuring amid mossy stones and water lilies, that, however naturally they seemed thrown around, bespoke also the hand of taste in their position. On turning from the spot, we came directly in front of an old but handsome château, before which stretched a terrace of considerable extent. Its balustraded parapet, lined with orange trees, now in full blossom, scented the still air with their delicious odor; marble statues peeped here and there amid the foliage, while a rich acacia, loaded with flowers, covered the walls of the building, and hung in vast masses of variegated blossoms across the tall windows.

As leaning on Mike's arm, I slowly ascended the steps of the terrace, I was more than ever struck with the silence and deathlike stillness around; except the gentle plash of the fountain, all was at rest; the very plants seemed to sleep in yellow moonlight, and not a trace of any living thing was there.

The massive door lay open as we entered the spacious hall, flagged with marble, and surrounded with armorial bearings. We advanced farther, and came to a broad and handsome stair, which led us to a long gallery, from which a suite of rooms opened, looking towards the front part of the building. Wherever we went, the furniture appeared perfectly untouched; nothing was removed; the very chairs were grouped around the windows and the tables; books, as if suddenly dropped from their readers' hands, were scattered upon the sofas and the ottomans; and, in one small apartment, whose blue satin walls and damask drapery bespoke a boudoir, a rich mantilla of black velvet and a silk glove were thrown upon a chair. It was clear the desertion had been most recent; and every thing denoted that no time had been given to the fugitives to prepare for flight. What a sad picture of war was there! to think of those whose home, endeared to them by all the refinements of cultivated life, and all the associations of years of happiness, sent out upon the wide world,—wanderers, and houseless; while their hearth, sacred by every tie that binds us to our kindred, was to be desecrated by the ruthless and savage hands of a ruffian soldiery. I thought of them: perhaps at that very hour their thoughts were clinging round the old walls; remembering each well beloved spot, while they took their lonely path through mountain and through valley: and felt ashamed and abashed at my own intrusion there. While thus my reveries ran on, I had not perceived that Mike, whose views were very practical upon all occasion, had lighted a most cheerful fire upon the hearth, and, disposing a large sofa before it, had carefully closed the curtains, and was in fact making himself and his master as much at home as though he had spent his life there.

"Isn't it a beautiful place, Mither Charles? and this little room, doesn't it remind you of the blue bed-room in O'Malley Castle, barrin the elegant view out upon the Shannon, and the mountain Scariff?"

Nothing short of Mike's patriotism could forgive such a comparison; but, however, I did not contradict him, as he ran on:

"Faith, I knew there was luck in store for us this evening; and ye see the handful of prayers I threw away outside wasn't lost. José's making the beasts comfortable in the stable, and I'm thinking we'll none of us complain of our quarters. But you're not eating your supper; and the beautiful hare pie that I stole this morning, won't you taste it?—well, a glass of Malaga—not a glass of Malaga? O, mother of Moses! what's this for?"

Unfortunately, the fever, produced by the long and toilsome journey, had gained considerably on me, and, except copious libations of cold water, I could touch nothing; my arm, too, was much more painful than before. Mike soon perceived that rest and quietness were most important to me at the moment, and, having with difficulty been prevailed upon to swallow a few hurried mouthfuls, the poor fellow, having disposed cushions around me in every imaginable form for comfort, and having placed my wounded limb in its easiest position, extinguished the lamp, and sat silently down beside the hearth, without speaking another word.

Fatigue and exhaustion, more powerful than pain, soon produced their effects upon me, and I fell asleep, but it was no refreshing slumber which visited my heavy eyelids; the slow fever of suffering had been hour by hour increasing, and my dreams presented nothing but scenes of agony and torture. Now I thought that, unhorsed and wounded, I was trampled beneath the clanging hoofs of charging cavalry; now I felt the sharp steel piercing my flesh, and heard the loud cry of a victorious enemy; then methought I was stretched upon a litter, covered with gore and mangled by grape shot. I thought I saw my brother officers approach and look sadly upon me, while one, whose face I could not remember, muttered, "I should not have known him." The dreadful hospital of Talavera, and all its scenes of agony, came up before me, and I thought I lay waiting my turn for amputation: this last impression, more horrible to me than all the rest, made me spring from my couch, and I awoke; the cold drops of perspiration stood upon my brow, my mouth was parched and open, and my temples throbbed so that I could count their beatings; for some seconds I could not throw off the frightful illusion I labored under, and it was only by degrees I recovered consciousness and remembered where I was. Before me, and on one side of the wood-fire sat Mike, who, apparently deep in thought, gazed fixedly at the blaze: the start I gave on awakening had not attracted his attention, and I could see as the flickering glare fell upon his features, that he was pale and ghastly, while his eyes were riveted upon the fire; his lips moved rapidly, as if in prayer, and his locked hands were pressed firmly upon his bosom; his voice, at first inaudible, I could gradually distinguish, and at length heard the following muttered sentences:

"O, mother of mercy! so far from his home and his people, and so young, to die in a strange land: there it is again." Here he appeared listening to some sounds from without. "Oh, wirra, wirra, I know it well!—the winding sheet, the winding sheet! there it is, my own eyes saw it!" The tears coursed fast upon his pale cheeks, and his voice grew almost inaudible; as, rocking to and fro, for some time he seemed in a very stupor of grief, when at last, in a faint, subdued tone, he broke into one of those sad and plaintive airs of his country, which only need the moment of depression to make them wring the very heart in agony.

His song was that to which Moore has appended the beautiful words, "Come rest on this bosom;" but the burden of his sad melody ran thus:—

"The day was declining,
The dark night drew near,
And the old lord grew sadder,
And paler with fear.
Come listen, my daughter,
Come nearer—O! near,
It's the wind or the water
That sighs in my ear.

"Not the wind nor the water
Now stirr'd the night air,
But a warning far sadder—
The banshee was there,
Now rising, now swelling,
On the night wind it bore
One cadence, still telling,
I want thee, Rossmore!

"And then fast came his breath,
And more fix'd grew his eye;
And the shadow of death
Told his hour was nigh.
Ere the dawn of that morning
The struggle was o'er,
For when thrice came the warning—
A corpse was Rossmore!"

The plaintive air to which these words were sung fell heavily upon my heart, and it needed but the low and nervous condition I was in to make me feel their application to myself. But so it is, the very superstition your reason rejects and your sense spurns, has, from old association, from habit, and from mere nationality, too, a hold upon your hopes and fears that demands more firmness and courage than a sick-bed possesses to combat with success, and I now listened with an eager ear to mark if the banshee cried, rather than sought to fortify myself by any recurrence to my own convictions. Meanwhile Mike's attitude became one of listening attention: not a finger moved; he scarce seemed even to breathe: the state of suspense I suffered from was maddening, and, at last, unable to bear it longer, I was about to speak, when suddenly, from the floor beneath us, one long-sustained note swelled upon the air and died away again, and immediately after, to the cheerful sounds of a guitar, we heard the husky voice of our Portuguese guide, indulging himself in a love ditty.

Ashamed of myself, for my fears, I kept silent; but Mike, who felt only one sensation,—that of unmixt satisfaction at his mistake,—rubbed his hands pleasantly, filled up his glass, drank it, and refilled; while, with an accent of re-assured courage, he briefly remarked:—

"Well, Mr. José, if that be singing, upon my conscience, I wonder what crying is like!"

I could not forbear a laugh at the criticism, and, in a moment, the poor fellow, who, up to that moment, believed me sleeping, was beside me. I saw from his manner that he dreaded lest I had been listening to his melancholy song, and had overheard any of his gloomy forebodings, and, as he cheered my spirits, and spoke encouragingly, I could remark, that he made more than usual endeavors to appear light-hearted and at ease. Determined, however, not to let him escape so easily, I questioned him about his belief in ghosts and spirits; at which he endeavored, as he ever did when the subject was an unpleasant one, to avoid the discussion; but rather perceiving that I indulged in no irreverent disrespect of these matters, he grew gradually more open, treating the affair with that strange mixture of credulity and mockery, which formed his estimate of most things. Now seeming to suppose that any palpable rejection of them might entail sad consequences in future; now half ashamed to go the whole length in his credulity.

"And so, Mike, you never saw a ghost yourself?—that you acknowledge?"

"No, sir, I never saw a real ghost; but sure there's many a thing I never saw; but Mrs. Moore, the house-keeper, sees two. And your grandfather, that's gone,—the Lord be good to him,—used to walk once a year in Lurra Abbey; and sure you know the story about Tim Clinchy, that was seen every Saturday night coming out of the cellar with a candle and a mug of wine, and a pipe in his mouth, till Mr. Barry laid him. It cost his honor, your uncle, ten pounds in masses to make him easy; not to speak of a new lock and two bolts on the cellar door."

"I have heard all about that; but, as you never yourself saw any of these things—"

"But sure my father did, and that's the same any day. My father seen the greatest ghost that ever was seen in the county Cork, and spent the evening with him, that's more."

"Spent the evening with him!—what do you mean?"

"Just that, devil a more nor less. If your honor wasn't so weak, and the story was n't a trying one, I'd like to tell it to you."

"Out with it, by all means, Mike; I am not disposed to sleep; and now that we are upon these matters, my curiosity is strongly excited by your worthy father's experience."

Thus encouraged, having trimmed the fire, and re-seated himself beside the blaze, Mike began; but, as a ghost is no every-day personage in our history, I must give him a chapter to himself.

CHAPTER VIII....The Ghost.

"Well, I believe your honor heard me tell long ago, how my father left the army, and the way, that he took to another line of life, that was more to his liking. And so it was, he was happy as the day was long; he drove a hearse for Mr. Callaghan, of Cork, for many years; and a pleasant place it was; for, ye see, my father was a 'cute man, and knew something of the world; and, though he was a drill devil, and could sing a funny song when he was among the boys, no sooner had he the big black cloak on him, and the weepers, and he seated on the high box, with the six long-tailed blacks before him, you'd really think it was his own mother that was inside, he looked so melancholy and miserable. The sexton and grave-digger was nothing to my father; and he had a look about his eye—to be sure there was a reason for it—that you'd think he was up all night crying; though it's little indulgence he took that way."

"Well, of all Mr. Callaghan's men, there was none so great a favorite as my father: the neighbors were all fond of him."

"A kind crayture, every inch of him," the women would say. "Did ye see his face at Mrs. Delany's funeral?"

"True for you," another would remark; "he mistook the road with grief, and stopped at a shebeen house instead of Kilmurry church."

"I need say no more, only one thing, that it was principally among the farmers and the country people my father was liked so much. The great people, and the quality—I ax you pardon: but sure isn't it true, Mister Charles, they don't fret so much after their fathers and brothers, and they care little who's driving them, whether it was a decent, respectable man like my father, or a chap with a grin on him like a rat-trap? And so it happened, that my father used to travel half the county; going here and there wherever there was trade stirring; and, faix, a man did n't think himself rightly buried if my father was n't there: for ye see he knew all about it; he could tell to a quart of spirits what would be wanting for a wake; he knew all the good criers for miles round; and I've heard it was a beautiful sight to see him standing on a hill, arranging the procession as they walked into the churchyard, and giving the word like a captain."

"Come on, the stiff—now the friends of the stiff—now de peoplace."

"That's what he used to say; and, troth, he was always repeating it when he was a little gone in drink—for that's the time his spirits would rise—and he'd think he was burying half Munster."

"And sure it was a real pleasure and a pride to be buried in them times; for ay it was only a small farmer with a potato garden, my father would come down with the black cloak on him, and three yards of crape behind his hat, and set all the children crying and yelling for half a mile around; and then the way he'd walk before them with a spade on his shoulder, and, sticking it down in the ground, clap his hat on the top of it, to make it look like a chief mourner. It was a beautiful sight!"

"But, Mike, if you indulge much longer in this flattering recollection of your father, I'm afraid we shall lose sight of the ghost entirely."

"No fear in life, your honor, I'm coming to him now; well, it was this way it happened. In the winter of the great frost, about forty-two or forty-three years ago, the old priest of Tulloughmurray took ill and died: he was sixty years priest of the parish, and mightily beloved by all the people; and good reason for it; a pleasanter man, and a more social crayture never lived; 't was himself was the life of the whole country side. A wedding nor a christening wasn't lucky av he wasn't there, sitting at the top of the table, with, maybe, his arm round the bride herself, or the baby on his lap; a smoking jug of punch before him, and as much kindness in his eye as would make the fortunes of twenty hypocrites, if they had it among them. And then he was so good to the poor; the Priory was always full of old men and old women, sitting around the big fire in the kitchen, that the cook could hardly get near it. There they were eating their meals and burning their shins, till they were speckled like a trout's back, and grumbling all the time; but Father Dwyer liked them, and he would have them."

"Where have they to go," he'd say, 'av it wasn't to me? give Molly Kinshela a lock of that bacon. Tim, it's a cowl'd morning. Will ye have a taste of the 'dew?'"

"Ah! that's the way he'd spake to them: but sure goodness is no warrant for living, any more than devilment; and so he got cowl'd in his feet at a station, and he rode home in the heavy snow without his big coat—for he gave it away to a blind man on the road—in three days he was dead."

"I see you're getting impatient; so I'll not stop to say what grief was in the parish when it was known: but troth there never was seen the like before; not a crayture would lift a spade for two days; and there was more whiskey sold in that time than at the whole Ulster fair. Well, on the third day the funeral set out; and never was the equal of it in them parts; first, there was my father: he came special from Cork, with the six horses all in new black, and plumes like little poplar trees; then came Father Dwyer, followed by the two coadjutors in beautiful surplices, walking bare-headed, with the little boys of the Priory-school, two and two."

"Well, Mike, I'm sure it was very fine; but for heaven's sake spare me all these descriptions, and get on to the ghost."

"Faith your honor's in a great hurry for the ghost; maybe you wo n't like him when ye have him; but I'll go faster, if you please. Well, Father Dwyer, ye see, was born at Aghan-lish, of an old family, and he left it in his will that he was to be buried in the family vault; and as Aghan-lish was eighteen miles up the mountains, it was getting late when they drew near. By that time the great procession was all broke up and gone home. The coadjutors stopped to dine at the 'Blue Bellows,' at the cross-roads; the little boys took to pelting snow-balls; there was a fight or two on the way, besides, and, in fact, except an old deaf fellow that my father took to mind the horses, he was quite alone. Not that he minded that same; for when the crowd was gone, my father began to sing a droll song, and tould the deaf chap that it was a lamentation. At last they came in sight of Aghan-lish. It was a lonesome, melancholy looking place, with nothing near it except two or three ould fir trees, and a small slated house with one window, where the sexton lived; and even that same was shut up, and a padlock on the door. Well, my father was not over much pleased at the look of matters; but, as he was never hard put to, what to do, he managed to get the coffin into the vestry; and then when he unharnessed the horses, he sent the deaf fellow with them down to the village to tell the priest that the corpse was there, and to come up early in the morning and perform mass. The next thing to do was to make himself comfortable for the night; and then he made a roaring fire on the old hearth—for there was plenty of bog fir there—closed the windows with the black cloaks, and wrapping two around himself, he sat down to cook a little supper he brought with him in case of need."

"Well, you may think it was melancholy enough to pass the night up there alone with a corpse, in an old ruined church, in the middle of the mountains, the wind howling about on every side, and the snow drift beating against the walls; but as the fire burned brightly, and the little plate of rashers and eggs smoked temptingly before him, my father mixed a jug of the strongest punch, and sat down as happy as a king. As long as he was eating away, he had no time to be thinking of any thing else; but, when all was done, and he looked about him, he began to feel very low and melancholy in his heart. There was the great black coffin on three chairs in the corner; and then the mourning cloaks that he had stuck up against the windows moved backward and forward like living things; and, outside, the wild cry of the plover as he flew past, and the night owl sitting in a nook of the old church. 'I wish it was morning, anyhow,' said my father; 'for this is a lonesome place to be in; and, faix, he'll be a cunning fellow that catches me passing the night this way again.' Now there was one thing distressed him most of all: my father used always to make fun of the ghosts and sperits the neighbors would tell of, pretending there was no such thing; and now the thought came to him, 'Maybe they'll revenge themselves on me to-night when they have me up here alone;' and with that he made another jug stronger than the first, and tried to remember a few prayers in case of need: but somehow his mind was not too clear, and he said afterwards he was always mixing up ould songs and toasts with the prayers, and when he thought he had just got hold of a beautiful psalm, it would turn out to be 'Tatter Jack Walsh,' or 'Limping James,' or something like that. The storm, meanwhile, was rising every moment, and parts of the old abbey were falling, as the wind shook the ruin, and my father's sperits, notwithstanding the punch, were lower than ever."

"I made it too weak," said he, as he set to work on a new jorum; and troth this time that was not the fault of it, for the first sup nearly choked him."

"Ah!" said he now, 'I knew what it was; this is like the thing; and, Mr. Free, you are beginning to feel easy and comfortable: pass the jug: your very good health and song. I'm a little hoarse, it's true, but if the company will excuse—'

"And then he began knocking on the table with his knuckles as if there was a room full of people asking him to sing. In short, my father was drunk as a fiddler; the last brew finished him; and he began roaring away all kinds of droll songs, and telling all manner of stories, as if he was at a great party."

"While he was capering this way about the room, he knocked down his hat, and with it a pack of cards he put into it before leaving home, for he was mighty fond of a game."

"Will ye take a hand, Mr. Free?" said he, as he gathered them up and sat down beside the fire."

"I'm convenient," said he, and began dealing out as if there was a partner forenust him."

"When my father used to get this far in the story, he became very confused. He says, that once or twice he mistook the liquor, and took a pull at the bottle of potteen instead of the punch; and the last thing he remembers was asking poor Father Dwyer if he would draw near the fire, and not be laying there near the door."

"With that he slipped down on the ground and fell fast asleep. How long he lay that way he could never tell. When he awoke and looked up, his hair nearly stood on an end with fright. What do you think he seen fornest him, sitting at the other side of the fire, but Father Dwyer himself: there he was—devil a lie in it—wrayed up in one of the mourning cloaks, trying to warm his hands at the fire."

"Salve hoc nomine patri!" said my father, crossing himself; 'av it's your ghost, God presarve me!'"

"Good evening t'ye, Mr. Free," said the ghost; 'and av I might be bould, what's in the jug?'—for you see my father had it under his arm fast, and never let it go when he was asleep."

"*Pater noster qui es in—*potteen, sir," said my father, for the ghost did n't look pleased at his talking Latin."

"You might have the politeness to ax if one had a mouth on him," then says the ghost."

"Sure, I did n't think the like of you would taste sperits."

"Try me," said the ghost; and with that he filled out a glass, and tossed it off like a Christian."

"Beamish!" says the ghost, smacking his lips."

"The same," says my father; 'and sure what's happened you has not spoilt your taste?'"

"If you'd mix a little hot," says the ghost, 'I'm thinking it would be better; the night is mighty sear.'"

"Any thing that your reverence pleases," says my father, as he began to blow up a good fire to boil the water."

"And what news is stirring?" says the ghost."

"Devil a word, your reverence: your own funeral was the only thing doing last week; times is bad; except the measles, there's nothing in our parts."

"And we're quite dead hereabouts too," says the ghost."

"There's some of us so, any how," says my father, with a sly look. "Taste that, your reverence."

"Pleasant and refreshing," says the ghost; 'and now, Mr. Free, what do you say to a little spoil five, or beggar my neighbor?'"

"What will we play for?" says my father; for a thought just struck him—'maybe it's some trick of the devil to catch my soul.'"

"A pint of Beamish," says the ghost."

"Done," says my father; 'cut for deal; the ace of clubs; you have it.'"

"Now the whole time the ghost was dealing the cards, my father never took his eyes off of him, for he was n't quite asy in his mind at all; but when he saw him turn up the trump, and take a strong drink afterward, he got more at ease, and began the game.

"How long they played it was never rightly known; but one thing is sure, they drank a cruel deal of spirits; three quart bottles my father brought with him were all finished, and by that time his brain was so confused with the liquor, and all he lost—for somehow he never won a game—that he was getting very quarrelsome.

"You have your own luck to it," says he, at last.

"True for you; and, besides, we play a great deal where I come from."

"I've heard so," says my father. "I lead the knave, sir—spades! bad 'cess to it, lost again."

"Now it was really very distressing; for by this time, though they only began for a pint of Beamish, my father went on betting till he lost the hearse and all the six horses, mourning cloaks, plumes, and every thing.

"Are you tired Mr. Free? maybe you'd like to stop?"

"Stop! faith, it's a nice time to stop; of course not."

"Well, what will ye play for now?"

"The way he said these words brought a trembling all over my father, and his blood curdled in his heart. 'Och, murther!' says he to himself, 'it's my sowl he is wanting all the time.'

"I've mighty little left," says my father, looking at him keenly, while he kept shuffling the cards quick as lightning. "Mighty little; no matter, we'll give you plenty of time to pay; and if you can't do it, it shall never trouble you as long as you live."

"Oh, you murdering devil!" says my father, flying at him with a spade that he had behind his chair, "I've found you out."

"With one blow he knocked him down; and now a terrible fight begun, for the ghost was very strong too; but my father's blood was up, and he'd have faced the devil himself then. They rolled over each other several times, the broken bottles cutting them to pieces, and the chairs and tables crashing under them. At last the ghost took the bottle that lay on the hearth, and levelled my father to the ground with one blow; down he fell, and the bottle and the whiskey were both dashed into the fire; that was the end of it, for the ghost disappeared that moment in a blue flame that nearly set fire to my father as he lay on the floor.

"Och! it was a cruel sight to see him next morning, with his cheek cut open, and his hands all bloody, lying there by himself; all the broken glass, and the cards all round him; the coffin too was knocked down off the chair; maybe the ghost had trouble getting into it. However that was, the funeral was put off for a day; for my father could n't speak, and, as for the sexton, it was a queer thing, but when they came to call him in the morning, he had two black eyes, and a gash over his ear, and he never knew how he got them. It was easy enough to know the ghost did it; but my father kept the secret, and never told it to any man, woman, or child in them parts."

CHAPTER IX....Lisbon.

I have little power to trace the events which occupied the succeeding three weeks of my history. The lingering fever which attended my wound detained me during that time at the chateau; and when at last I did reach Lisbon, the winter was already beginning, and it was upon a cold, raw evening that I once more took possession of my old quarters at the Quay de Soderi.

My eagerness and anxiety to learn something of the campaign was ever uppermost, and no sooner had I reached my destination, than I despatched Mike to the Quartermaster's office, so pick up some news, and hear which of my friends and brother officers were then at Lisbon. I was sitting in a state of nervous impatience, watching for his return, when at length I heard footsteps approaching my room, and the next moment, Mike's voice, saying, "The could room, sir, where he was before." The door suddenly opened, and my friend Power stood before me.

"Charley, my boy"—"Fred, my fine fellow," was all either could say for some minutes. Upon my part, the recollection of his bold and manly bearing in my behalf, choked all utterance; while upon his, my haggard cheek and worn look produced an effect so sudden and unexpected that he became speechless.

In a few minutes, however, we both rallied, and opened our store of mutual remembrances since we parted. My career I found he was perfectly acquainted with, and his consisted of nothing but one unceasing round of gayety and pleasure. Lisbon had been delightful during the summer; parties to Cintra, excursions through the surrounding country, were of daily occurrence; and, as my friend was a favorite every where, his life was one of continued amusement.

"Do you know, Charley, had it been any other man than yourself, I should not have spared him; for I have fallen head over heels in love with your little dark-eyed Portuguese."

"Ah! Donna Inez, you mean."

"Yes, it is her I mean, and you need not affect such an air of uncommon nonchalance. She's the loveliest girl in Lisbon, and with fortune to pay off all the mortgages in Connemara."

"O! faith, I admire her amazingly; but, as I never flattered myself upon any preference—"

"Come, come, Charley, no concealment, my old fellow; every one knows the thing's settled. Your old friend, Sir George Dashwood, told me yesterday."

"Yesterday! Why is he here; at Lisbon?"

"To be sure he is; didn't I tell you that before? Confound it, what a head I have! Why, man, he's come out as deputy adjutant-general; but for him I should not have got renewed leave."

"And Miss Dashwood, is she here?"

"Yes, she came with him. By Jove, how handsome she is; quite a different style of thing from our dark friend; but, to my thinking, even handsomer. Hammersley seems of my opinion, too."

"How! is Hammersley at Lisbon?"

"On the staff here. But, confound it, what makes you so red? you have no ill feeling towards him now. I know he speaks most warmly of you; no later than last night, at Sir George's—"

What Power was about to add I know not, for I sprang from my chair, with a sudden start, and walked to the window, to conceal my agitation from him,

"And so," said I, "at length regaining my composure in some measure, 'Sir George also spoke of my name in connection with the senhora!'"

"To be sure he did. All Lisbon does. Why, what can you mean? But I see, my dear boy; you know you are not of the strongest; and we've been talking far too long. Come, now, Charley, I'll say good-night. I'll be with you at breakfast to-morrow, and tell you all the gossip; meanwhile, promise me to get quietly to bed, and so, good night."

Such was the conflicting state of feeling I suffered from, that I made no effort to detain Power. I longed to be once more alone, to think—calmly, if I could—over the position I stood in, and to resolve upon my plans for the future.

My love for Lucy Dashwood had been long rather a devotion than a hope. My earliest dawn of manly ambition was associated with the first hour I met her. She it was who first touched my boyish heart, and suggested a sense of chivalrous ardor within me; and, even though lost to me forever, I could still regard her as the mainspring of my actions, and dwell upon my passion as the thing that hallowed every enterprise of my life.

In a word, my love, however little it might reach her heart, was every thing to mine. It was the worship of the devotee to his protecting saint. It was the faith that made me rise above misfortune and mishap, and led me onward; and in this way I could have borne any thing, every thing, rather than the imputation of fickleness.

Lucy might not—nay, I felt she did not—love me. It was possible that some other was preferred before me; but to doubt my own affection, to suspect my own truth, was to destroy all the charm of my existence, and to extinguish within me forever the enthusiasm that made me a hero to my own heart.

It may seem but poor philosophy; but, alas! how many of our happiest, how many of our brightest thoughts here, are but delusions like this! The dayspring of youth gilds the tops of the distant mountains before us, and many a weary day through life, when clouds and storms are thickening around us, we live upon the mere memory of the past. Some fast-flitting prospect of a bright future, some passing glimpses of a sunlit valley, tinge all our after years.

It is true that he will suffer fewer disappointments, he will incur fewer of the mishaps of the world, who indulges in no fancies such as these; but equally true is it that he will taste none of that exuberant happiness which is that man's portion who weaves out a story of his life, and who, in connecting the promise of early years with the performance of later, will seek to fulfil a fate and destiny.

Weaving such fancies, I fell sound asleep, nor woke before the stir and bustle of the great city aroused me. Power, I found, had been twice at my quarters that morning, but, fearing to disturb me, had merely left a few lines to say that, as he should be engaged on service during the day, we could not meet before the evening. There were certain preliminaries requisite regarding my leave which demanded my appearing before a board of medical officers, and I immediately set about dressing, resolving that, as soon as they were completed, I should, if permitted, retire to one of the small cottages on the opposite bank of the Tagus, there to remain until my restored health allowed me to rejoin my regiment.

I dreaded meeting the Dashwoods. I anticipated with a heavy heart how effectually one passing interview would destroy all my day-dreams of happiness, and I preferred any thing to the sad conviction of hopelessness such a meeting must lead to.

While I thus balanced with myself how to proceed, a gentle step came to the door, and, as it slowly opened, a servant in a dark livery entered.

"Mr. O'Malley, Sir?"

"Yes," said I, wondering to whom my arrival could be thus early known.

"Sir George Dashwood requests you will step over to him as soon as you go out," continued the man; "he is so engaged that he can not leave home, but is most desirous to see you."

"It is not far from here?"

"No, sir; scarcely five minutes' walk."

"Well, then, if you will show me the way, I'll follow you. I cast one passing glance at myself to see that all was right about my costume, and sallied forth.

In the middle of the Black Horse Square, at the door of a large stone-fronted building, a group of military men were assembled, chatting and laughing away together; some reading the lately-arrived English papers; others were lounging upon the stone parapet, carelessly puffing their cigars. None of the facts were known to me; so, threading my way through the crowd, I reached the steps. Just as I did so, a half-muttered whisper met my ear—

"Who did you say?"

"O'Malley, the young Irishman, who behaved so gallantly at the Douro."

The blood rushed hotly to my cheek; my heart bounded with exultation; my step, infirm and tottering but a moment before, became fixed and steady, and I felt a thrill of proud enthusiasm playing through my veins. How little did the speaker of these few and random words know what courage he had given to a drooping heart, what renewed energy to a breaking spirit. The voice of praise, too, coming from those to whom we had thought ourselves unknown, has a magic about it that must be felt to be understood. So it happened, that in a few seconds a revolution had taken place in all my thoughts and feelings, and I, who had left my quarters dispirited and depressed, now walked confidently and proudly forward.

"Mr. O'Malley, sir," said the servant to the officer in waiting, as we entered the ante-chamber.

"Ah! Mr. O'Malley," said the aid-de-camp, in the blandest accent, "I hope you're better. Sir George is most anxious to see you; he is at present engaged with the staff."

A bell rang at the moment, and cut short the sentence; he flew to the door of the inner room, and returning in an instant, said—

"Will you follow me? This way, if you please."

The room was crowded with general officers and aids-de-camp, so that for a second or two I could not distinguish the parties; but no sooner was my name announced, than Sir George Dashwood, forcing his way through, rushed forward to meet me.

"O'Malley, my brave fellow, delighted to shake your hand again. How much grown you are: twice the man I knew you; and the arm too, is it getting on well?"

Scarcely giving me a moment to reply, and still holding my hand tightly in his grasp, he introduced me on every side.

"My young Irish friend, Sir Edward, the man of the Douro. My Lord, allow me to present Lieutenant O'Malley, of the 14th."

"A very dashing thing that of yours, sir, at Ciudad Rodrigo."

"A very senseless one, I fear, my lord."

"No, no, I do n't agree with you at all; even when no great results follow, the morale of an army benefits by acts of daring."

A [rushing fire of kind and civil speeches poured in on me from all quarters, and amid all that crowd of bronzed and war-worn veterans, I felt myself the lion of the moment. Crawford, it appeared, had spoken most handsomely of my name, and I was thus made known to many of those whose reputations were then extending over Europe.

In this happy trance of excited pleasure I passed the morning. All the military chit-chat of the day around me, treated as an equal by the greatest and the most distinguished, I heard all the confidential opinions upon the campaign and its leaders; and in that most entrancing of all flatteries—the easy tone of companionship of our elders and betters—forgot all my griefs, and half believed that I was destined for great things.

Fearing at length that I had prolonged my visit too far, I approached Sir George to take my leave, when drawing my arm within his, he retired toward one of the windows.

"A word, O'Malley, before you go. I've arranged a little plan for you: mind, I shall insist upon obedience. They'll make some difficulty about your remaining here, so that I have appointed you one of our extra aide-de-camp: that will free you from all trouble, and I shall not be very exacting in my demands upon you. You must, however, commence your duties to-day, and, as we dine at seven precisely, I shall expect you. I am aware of your wish to stay in Lisbon, my boy, and, if all I hear be true, congratulate you sincerely; but more of this another time, and so, good bye." So saying, he shook my hand once more, warmly, and, without well feeling how or why, I found myself in the street.

The last words Sir George had spoken threw a gloom over all my thoughts. I saw at once that the report Power had alluded to had gained currency at Lisbon. Sir George believed it; doubtless, Lucy too; and, forgetting in an instant all the emulative ardor that so lately stirred my heart, I took my path beside the river, and sauntered slowly along, lost in my reflections.

I had walked for above an hour, before paying any attention to the path I followed. Mechanically, as it were, retreating from the noise and tumult of the city, I wandered toward the country. My thoughts fixed but upon one theme, I had neither ears nor eyes for aught around me; the great difficulty of my present position now appearing to me in this light—my attachment to Lucy Dashwood, unrequited and unreturned as I felt it, did not permit of my rebutting any report which might have reached her concerning Donna Inez. I had no right, no claim to suppose her sufficiently interested about me to listen to such an explanation, had I even the opportunity to make it. One thing was thus clear to me—all my hopes had ended in that quarter; and, as this conclusion sunk into my mind, a species of dogged resolution to brave my fortune crept upon me, which only waited the first moment of my meeting her to overthrow and destroy forever.

Meanwhile I walked on—now rapidly, as some momentary rush of passionate excitement, now slowly, as some depressing and gloomy notion succeeded—when suddenly my path was arrested by a long file of bullock cars which blocked up the way. Some chance squabble had arisen among the drivers, and, to avoid the crowd and collision, I turned into a gate-way which opened beside me, and soon found myself in a lawn handsomely planted, and adorned with flowering shrubs and ornamental trees.

In the half-dreamy state my musings had brought me to, I struggled to recollect why the aspect of the place did not seem altogether new. My thoughts were, however, far away—now blending some memory of my distant home with scenes of battle and bloodshed, or resting upon my first interview with her whose chance word, carelessly and lightly spoken, had written the story of my life. From this reverie I was rudely awakened by a rustling noise in the trees behind me, and, before I could turn my head, the two forepaws of a large stag-hound were planted upon my shoulders, while the open mouth and panting tongue were close beside my face. My day-dream was dispelled quick as lightning: it was Juan himself, the favorite dog of the senhora, who gave me this rude welcome, and who now, by a thousand wild gestures and bounding caresses, seemed to do the honors of his house. There was something so like home in these joyful greetings, that I yielded myself at once his prisoner, and followed, or rather was accompanied by him toward the villa.

Of course, sooner or later, I should have called upon my kind friends; then why not now, when chance had already brought me so near. Besides, if I held my resolution, which I meant to do, of retiring to some quiet and sequestered cottage till my health was restored, the opportunity might not readily present itself again. This line of argument perfectly satisfied my reason, while a strong feeling of something like curiosity piqued me to proceed, and, before many minutes elapsed, I reached the house. The door, as usual, lay wide open, and the ample hall, furnished like a sitting-room, had its customary litter of books, music and flowers scattered upon the tables. My friend Juan, however, suffered me not to linger here, but, rushing furiously at a door before me, began a vigorous attack for admittance.

As I knew this to be the drawing-room, I opened the door and walked in, but no one was to be seen. A half-open book lay upon an ottoman, and a fan, which I recognized as an old acquaintance, was beside it, but the owner was absent.

I sat down, resolved to wait patiently for her coming, without any announcement of my being there. I was not sorry, indeed, to have some moments to collect my thoughts and restore my erring faculties to something like order.

As I looked about the room, it seemed as if I had been there but yesterday: the folding-doors lay open to the garden, just as I had seen them last; and, save that the flowers seemed fewer, and those which remained of a darker and more sombre tint, all seemed unchanged. There lay the guitar, to whose thrilling cords my heart had bounded; there the drawing over which I had bent in admiring pleasure, suggesting some tints of light or shadow, as the fairy fingers traced them; every chair was known to me, and I greeted them as things I cared for.

While thus I scanned each object around me, I was struck by a little china vase, which, unlike its other brethren, contained a bouquet of dead and faded flowers. The blood rushed to my cheek; I started up; it was one I had myself presented to her the day before we parted. It was in that same vase I placed it; the very table, too, stood in the same position beside that narrow window. What a rush of thoughts came pouring on me! and, O! shall I confess it? how deeply did such a mute testimony of remembrance speak to my heart, at the moment that I felt myself unloved and uncared for by another! I walked hurriedly up and down; a maze of conflicting resolves combating in my mind, while one thought ever recurred—"Would that I had not come there;" and yet, after all, it may mean nothing—some piece of passing coquetry, which she will be the very first to laugh at. I remember how she spoke of poor Howard; what folly to take it otherwise; "Be it so, then," said I, half aloud; and now for my part of the game; and with this I took from my helmet the light blue scarf she had given me the morning we parted, and, throwing it over my shoulder, prepared to perform my part in what I had fully persuaded myself to be a comedy. The time, however, passed on, and she came not; a thousand high-flown Spanish phrases had time to be conned over again and again by me, and I had abundant leisure to enact my coming part; but still the curtain did not rise as the day was wearing. I resolved at least to write a few lines, expressive of my regret at not meeting her, and promising myself an early opportunity of paying my respects under more fortunate circumstances. I sat down accordingly, and, drawing the paper toward me, began, in a mixture of French and Portuguese, as it happened, to indite my billet.

"Senhora Inez"—no—"ma chère Mademoiselle Inez"—confound it, that's too intimate; well, here goes—"Monsieur O'Malley presents his respects"—that will never do; and then, after twenty other abortive attempts, I began thoughtlessly sketching heads upon the paper, and scribbling with wonderful facility in fifty different ways—"Ma charmante amie—ma plus chère Inez" &c., and in this most useful and profitable occupation did I pass another half-hour.

How long I should have persisted in such an employment it is difficult to say, had not an incident intervened, which suddenly, but most effectually put an end to it. As the circumstance is, however, one which, however little striking in itself, had the greatest and most lasting influence upon my future career, I shall, perhaps, be excused in devoting another chapter to its recital.

CHAPTER X....A Pleasant Predicament

As I sat vainly endeavoring to fix upon some suitable and appropriate epithet, by which to commence my note, my back was turned toward the door of the garden, and so occupied was I in my meditations that, even had any one entered at the time, in all probability I should not have perceived it. At length, however, I was aroused from my study by a burst of laughter, whose girlish joyousness was not quite new to me. I knew it well; it was the senhora herself, and the next moment I heard her voice.

"I tell you I'm quite certain I saw his face in the mirror as I passed. O! how delightful—and you'll be charmed with him; so, mind, you must not steal him from me; I shall never forgive you if you do; and look, only look, he has got the blue scarf I gave him when he marched to the Douro."

While I perceived that I myself was seen, I could see nothing of the speaker, and, wishing to hear something further, appeared more than ever occupied in the writing before me.

What her companion replied, I could not, however, catch, but only guess at its import, by the senhora's answer.

"Fi donc!—I really am very fond of him; but, never fear, I shall be as stately as a queen. You shall see how meekly he will kiss my hand, and with what unbending reserve I'll receive him."

"Indeed," thought I, "mayhap, I'll mar your plot a little; but let us listen."

Again her friend spoke, but too low to be heard.

"It is provoking," continued Inez; "I never can remember names, and his was something too absurd; but, never mind, I shall make him a grandee of Portugal. Well, but come along, I long to present him to you."

Here a gentle struggle seemed to ensue; for I heard the senhora coaxingly entreat her, while her companion steadily resisted.

"I know very well you think I shall be so silly, and perhaps wrong; eh, is it not so? but you are quite mistaken. You'll be surprised at my cold and dignified manner. I shall draw myself proudly up, thus, and, courtseying deeply, say, 'Monsieur, J'ai l'honneur de vous saluer.'"

A laugh twice as mirthful as before, interrupted her account of herself, while I could hear the tones of her friend, evidently in expostulation.

"Well, then, to be sure, you are provoking, but you really promise to follow me. Be it so; then give me that moss rose. How you have flattered me: now for it."

So saying, I heard her foot upon the gravel, and the next instant upon the marble step of the door. There is something in expectation that sets the heart beating, and mine throbbed against my side. I waited, however, till she entered, before lifting my head, and then, springing suddenly up, with one bound clasped her in my arms, and pressing my lips upon her roseate cheek, said—

"Ma charmante amie!" To disengage herself from me, and to spring suddenly back, was her first effort; to burst into an immoderate fit of laughing, her second; her cheek was, however, covered with a deep blush, and I already repeated that my malice had gone so far.

"Pardon, mademoiselle," said I, in affected innocence, "if I have so far forgotten myself as to assume a habit of my own country to a stranger."

A half-angry toss of the head was her only reply, and, turning toward the garden, she called to her friend,

"Come here, dearest, and instruct my ignorance upon your national custom; but first let me present to you—I never knew his name—the Chevalier de—What is it?"

The glass door opened as she spoke; a tall and graceful figure entered, and, turning suddenly round, showed me the features of Lucy Dashwood. We both stood opposite each other, each mute with amazement. My feelings let me not attempt to convey; shame, for the first moment stronger than aught else, sent the blood rushing to my face and temples, and the next I was cold and pale as death. As for her, I cannot guess at what passed in her mind. She courtseied deeply to me, and with a half-smile of scarce recognition passed by me, and walked toward a window.

"Comment vous êtes, aimable!" said the lively Portuguese, who comprehended little of this dumb show; "here have I been flattering myself what friends you'd be the very moment you met, and now you'll not even look at each other."

What was to be done? The situation was every instant growing more and more embarrassing; nothing but downright effrontery could get through with it now; and never did a man's heart more fail him than did mine at this juncture. I made the effort, however, and stammered out certain unmeaning common-places. Inez replied, and I felt myself conversing with the headlong recklessness of one marching to a scaffold, a coward's fear at his heart, while he essayed to seem careless and indifferent.

Anxious to reach what I esteemed safe ground, I gladly adverted to the campaign; and, at last, hurried on by the impulse to cover my embarrassment, was describing some skirmish with a French outpost. Without intending, I had succeeded in exciting the senhora's interest, and she listened with sparkling eye and parted lips to the description of a sweeping charge in which a square was broken, and several prisoners carried off. Warming with the eager avidity of her attention, I grew myself more excited, when just when my narrative had reached its climax, Miss Dashwood walked gently toward the bell, rang it, and ordered her carriage; the tone of perfect nonchalance of the whole proceeding struck me dumb. I faltered, stammered, hesitated and was silent. Donna Inez turned from one to the other of us with a look of unfeigned astonishment, and I heard her mutter to herself something like a reflection upon "national eccentricities." Happily, however, her attention was now exclusively turned toward her friend, and, while assisting her to shawl, and extorting innumerable promises of an early visit, I got a momentary reprieve; the carriage drew up also, and, as the gravel flew right and left beneath the horses' feet, the very noise and bustle relieved me.

"Adios!" then said Inez, as she kissed her for the last time, while she motioned to me to escort her to her carriage. I advanced—stopped—made another step forward, and again grew irresolute; but Miss Dashwood speedily terminated the difficulty; for, making me a formal courtesy, she declined my scarce proffered attention, and left the room.

As she did so, I perceived that, on passing the table, her eyes fell upon the paper I had been scribbling over so long, and I thought that for an instant an expression of ineffable scorn seemed to pass across her features, save which—and perhaps even in this I was mistaken—her manner was perfectly calm, easy, and indifferent.

Scarce had the carriage rolled from the door, when the senhora, throwing herself upon a chair, clasped her hands in childish ecstasy, while she fell into a fit of laughing that I thought would never have an end. "Such a scene," cried she, "I would not have lost it for the world: what cordiality! what empressment to form acquaintance! I shall never forget it, Monsieur le Chevalier; your national customs seem to run sadly in extremes. One would have thought you deadly enemies, and, poor me! after a thousand delightful plans about you both."

As she ran on thus, scarce able to control her mirth at each sentence, I walked the room with impatient strides, now resolving to hasten after the carriage, stop it, explain in a few words how all had happened, and then fly from her forever; then the remembrance of her cold, impassive look crossed me, and I thought that one bold leap into the Tagus might be the shortest and easiest solution to all my miseries; perfect abasement, thorough self-contempt had broken all my courage, and I could have cried like a child. What I said, or how I comported myself after, I know not; but my first consciousness came to me, as I felt myself running at the top of my speed far upon the road toward Lisbon.

CHAPTER XI....The Dinner.

It may easily be imagined that I had little inclination to keep my promise of dining that day with Sir George Dashwood. However, there was nothing else for it: the die was cast; my prospects, as regarded Lucy, were ruined forever. We were not, we never could be any thing to each other; and as for me, the sooner I braved my altered fortunes the better; and, after all, why should I call them altered; she evidently never had cared for me; and, even supposing that my fervent declaration of attachment had interested her, the apparent duplicity and falseness of my late conduct could only fall the more heavily upon me.

I endeavored to philosophize myself into calmness and indifference. One by one I exhausted every argument for my defence, which, however ingeniously put forward, brought no comfort to my own conscience. I pleaded the unerring devotion of my heart; the uprightness of my motives; and when called on for the proofs, alas! except the blue scarf I wore in memory of another, and my absurd conduct at the villa, I had none. From the current gossip of Lisbon, down to my own disgraceful folly, all was against me.

Honesty of intention, rectitude of purpose, may be, doubtless they are, admirable supports to a rightly constituted mind; but even then they must come supported by such claims to probability as make the injured man feel he has not lost the sympathy of all his fellows. Now, I had none of these, had even my temperament, broken by sickness, and harassed by unlucky conjectures, permitted my appreciating them.

I endeavored to call my wounded pride to my aid, and thought over the glance of haughty disdain she gave me as she passed on to her carriage; but even this turned against me, and a humiliating sense of my own degraded position sunk deeply into my heart. "This impression at least," thought I, "must be effaced. I cannot permit her to believe—"

"His excellency is waiting dinner, sir," said a lacquey, introducing a finely powdered head gently within the door. I looked at my watch; it was eight o'clock; so, snatching my sabre and shocked at my delay, I hastily followed the servant down stairs, and thus at once cut short my deliberations.

The man must be but little observant, or deeply sunk in his own reveries, who, arriving half an hour too late for dinner, fails to detect in the faces of the assembled and expecting guests, a very palpable expression of discontent and displeasure. It is truly a moment of awkwardness, and one in which few are found to manage with success; the blushing, hesitating, blundering apology of the absent man, is scarcely better than the ill-affected surprise of the more practised offender. The bashfulness of one is as distasteful as the cool impertinence of the other: both are so thoroughly out of place, for we are thinking of neither; our thoughts are wandering to cold soups and rechauffés patés, and we neither care for, nor estimate the cause, but satisfy our spleen by cursing the offender.

Happily for me, I was clad in triple insensibility to such feelings, and with an air of most perfect unconstraint and composure, walked into a drawing-room where about twenty persons were busily discussing what peculiar amiability in my character could compensate for my present conduct.

"At last, O'Malley, at last!" said Sir George. "Why, my dear boy, how very late you are!"

I muttered something about a long walk; distance from Lisbon, &c.

"Ah, that was it. I was right, you see!" said an old lady in a spangled turban, as she whispered something to her friend beside her, who appeared excessively shocked at the information conveyed. While a fat, round-faced little general, after eyeing me steadily through his glass, expressed a sub voce wish that I was upon his staff. I felt my cheek reddening at the moment, and stared around me like one whose trials were becoming downright insufferable, when, happily, dinner was announced, and terminated my embarrassment.

As the party filed past, I perceived that Miss Dashwood was not amongst them, and with a heart relieved for the moment by the circumstance, and inventing a hundred conjectures to account for it, I followed, with the aids-de-camp and the staff, to the dinner-room.

The temperament is very Irish, I believe, which renders a man so elastic, that from the extreme of depression to the very climax of high spirits, there is but one spring. To this I myself plead guilty, and thus scarcely was I freed from the embarrassment which a meeting with Lucy Dashwood must have caused, when my heart bounded with lightness.

When the ladies withdrew, the events of the campaign became the subject of conversation, and upon these, very much to my astonishment, I found myself consulted as an authority. The Douro, from some fortunate circumstance, had given me a reputation I never dreamed of, and I heard my opinions quoted upon topics of which my standing as an officer, and my rank in the service could not imply a very extended observation. Power was absent on duty; and, happily for my supremacy, the company consisted entirely of generals in the commissariat, or new arrivals from England, all of whom knew still less than myself.

What will not iced champagne and flattery do? Singly, they are strong impulses; combined, their power is irresistible. I now heard for the first time that our great leader had been elevated to the peerage, by the title of Lord Wellington; and I sincerely believe, however now I may smile at the confession, that at the moment I felt more elation at the circumstance than he did. The glorious sensation of being in any way, no matter how remotely, linked with the career of those whose path is a high one, and whose destinies are cast for great events, thrilled through me; and in all the warmth of my admiration and pride for our great captain, a secret pleasure stirred within me as I whispered to myself,—"and I, too, am a soldier!"

I fear me, that very little adulation is sufficient to turn the head of a young man of eighteen; and if I yielded to the "pleasant incense," let my apology be, that I was not used to it; and, lastly, let me avow, if I did get tipsy—I liked the liquor. And why not? It is the only tippie I know of that leaves no headache the next morning, to punish you for the glories of the past night. It may, like all other strong potations, it is true, induce you to make a fool of yourself when under its influence; but, like the nitrous oxide gas, its effects are passing, and as the pleasure is an ecstasy for the time, and your constitution none the worse when it is over, I really see no harm in it.

Then, the benefits are manifest; for while he who gives becomes never the poorer for his benevolence, the receiver is made rich indeed. It matters little that some dear kind friend is ready with his bitter draught, to remedy what he is pleased to call its unwholesome sweetness; you betake yourself with only the more pleasure to the "blessed elixir," whose fascinations neither the poverty of your pocket, nor the penury of your brain can withstand, and by the magic of whose spell you are great and gifted. Vive la bagatelle! sayeth the Frenchman. Long live flattery, say I, come from what quarter it will: the only wealth of the poor man,—the only reward of the unknown one; the arm that supports us in failure,—the hand that crowns us in success; the comforter in our affliction,—the gay companion in our hours of pleasure; the lullaby of the infant,—the staff of old age; the secret treasure we lock up in our own hearts, and which ever grows greater as we count it over. Let me not be told that the coin is fictitious, and the gold not genuine; its clink is as musical to the ear as though it bore the last impression of the mint, and I'm not the man to cast an aspersions upon its value.

This little digression, however seemingly out of place, may serve to illustrate what it might be difficult to convey in other words,—namely, that if Charles O'Malley became in his own estimation a very considerable personage that day at dinner, the fault lay not entirely with himself, but with his friends, who told him he was such. In fact, my good reader, I was the lion of the party; the man who saved Laborde; who charged through a brigade of guns; who performed feats which newspapers quoted, though he never heard of them himself. At no time is a man so sugcessful in society as when his reputation chaperones him, and it needs but little conversational eloquence to talk well, if you have but a willing and ready auditory. Of mine, I could certainly not complain; and as, drinking deeply, I poured forth a whole tide of campaigning recital, I saw the old colonels of recruiting districts exchanging looks of wonder and admiration with officers of the ordnance, while Sir George himself, evidently pleased at my debut, went back to an early period of our acquaintance, and related the rescue of his daughter in Galway.

In an instant the whole current of my thoughts was changed. My first meeting with Lucy, my boyhood's dream of ambition, my plighted faith, my thought of our last parting in Dublin, when in a moment of excited madness I told my tale of love. I remember her downcast look, as, her cheek now flushing, now growing pale, she trembled while I spoke. I thought of her, as, in the crash of battle, her image flashed across my brain, and made me feel a rush of chivalrous enthusiasm to win her heart by "doughty deeds."

I forgot all around and about me. My head reeled, the wine, the excitement, my long previous illness, all pressed upon me; and as my temples throbbed loudly and painfully, a chaotic rush of discordant, ill-connected ideas flitted across my mind. There seemed some stir and confusion in the room, but why or wherefore I could not think, nor could I recall my scattered senses, till Sir George Dashwood's voice roused me once again to consciousness.

"We are going to have some coffee, O'Malley. Miss Dashwood expects us in the drawing-room. You have not seen her yet?"

I know not my reply; but he continued,—

"She has some letters for you, I think."

I muttered something, and suffered him to pass on; no sooner had he done so, however, than I turned towards the door and rushed into the street. The cold night air suddenly recalled me to myself, and I stood for a moment endeavoring to collect myself; as I did so, a servant stopped, and, saluting me, presented me with a letter. For a second a cold chill came over me: I knew not what fear beset me. The letter I at last remembered must be that one alluded to by Sir George, so I took it in silence and walked on.

CHAPTER XII....The Letter.

As I hurried to my quarters, I made a hundred guesses from whom the letter could have come; a kind of presentiment told me that it bore, in some measure, upon the present crisis of my life, and I burned with anxiety to read it.

No sooner had I reached the light, than all my hopes on this head vanished; the envelope bore the well-known name of my old College chum, Frank Webber, and none could, at the moment, have more completely dispelled all chance of interesting me. I threw it from me with disappointment, and sat moodily down to brood over my fate.

At length, however, and almost without knowing it, I drew the lamp towards me and broke the seal. The reader being already acquainted with my amiable friend, there is less discretion in communicating the contents, which ran thus.

"Trinity College, Dublin, No. 2, Oct. 5, 1810.

"MY DEAR O'MALLEY:—Nothing short of your death and burial, with or without military honors, can possibly excuse your very disgraceful neglect of your old friends here.—Nesbitt has never heard of you, neither has Smith. Outley swears never to have seen your handwriting, save on the back of a protested bill. You have totally forgotten me, and the Dean informs me that you have never condescended a single line to him; which latter inquiry on my part nearly cost me a rustication.

"A hundred conjectures to account for your silence—a new feature in you since you were here—are afloat. Some assert that your soldiering has turned your head, and that you are above corresponding with civilians. Your friends, however, who know you better, and value your worth, think otherwise; and having seen a paragraph about one something O'Malley being tried by court-martial for stealing a goose, and mistreating the woman that owned it, ascribe your not writing to other motives. Do, in any case, relieve our minds; say, is it yourself, or only a relative that's mentioned?

"Herbert came over from London with a long story about your doing wonderful things—capturing cannon and general officers by scores, but devil a word of it is extant; and if you have really committed these acts, they have 'misused the king's press' damnable: for, neither in the Times nor the Post are you heard of. Answer this point; and say also if you have got promotion; for what precise sign you are algebraically expressed by at this writing, may do Fitzgerald for a fellowship question. As for us we are juggling along, semper eadem—that is, worse and worse.—Dear Cecil Cavendish, our gifted friend, slight of limb and soft of voice, has been rusticated for immersing four bricklayers in that green receptacle of stagnant water and duckweed, yclept the 'Haha.' Roper, equally unlucky, has taken to reading for honors, and obtained a medal, I fancy: at least his friends shy him, and it must be something of that kind. Belson—poor Belson (fortunately for him he was born in the nineteenth, not the sixteenth century, or he'd be most likely ornamenting a pile of fagots)—ventured upon some stray excursions into the Hebrew verbe—the Professor himself never having transgressed beyond the declensions; and the consequence is, he is in disgrace among the seniors. And as for me, a heavy charge hangs over my devoted head even while I write. The senior lecturer, it appears, has been for some time past instituting some very singular researches into the original state of our goodly college at its founding. Plans and specifications, showing its extent and magnificence, have been continually before the board for the last month; and in such repute have been a smashed door-sill or an old arch, that freshmen have now abandoned conic sections for crowbars, and instead of the Principia, have taken up the pickaxe. You know, my dear fellow, with what enthusiasm I enter into any scheme for the aggrandizement of our Alma Mater, so I need not tell you how ardently I adventured into the career now opened to me. My time was completely devoted to the matter: neither means nor health did I spare, and in my search for antiquarian lore, I have actually undermined the old wall of the fellows' garden, and am each morning in expectation of hearing that the big bell near the commons hall has descended from its lofty and most noisy eminence, and is snugly reposing in the mud. Meanwhile, accident put me in possession of a most singular and remarkable discovery. Our chambers—I call them ours, for old association sake—are, you may remember, in the old square.—Well, I have been fortunate enough, within the very precincts of my own dwelling, to contribute a very wonderful fact to the history of the university—alone—unassisted—unaided—I labored at my discovery. Few can estimate the pleasure I felt—the fame and reputation I anticipated. I drew up a little memoir for the board, most respectfully and civilly worded, having for title the following:—

ACCOUNT

Of a remarkable Subterranean Passage, lately discovered in the Old Building of Trinity College, Dublin, With Remarks upon its Extent, Antiquity, and Probable Use.

By F. WEBBER, Senior Freshman.

"My dear O'Malley, I'll not dwell upon the pride I felt in my new character of antiquarian. It is enough to state, that my very remarkable tract was well considered and received, and a commission appointed to investigate the discovery, consisting of the vice-provost, the senior lecturer, old Woodhouse, the sub-dean, and a few more.

"On Tuesday last they came accordingly, in full academic costume. I, being habited most accurately in the like manner, and conducting them with all form into my bed-room, where a large screen concealed from view the entrance to the tunnel alluded to. Assuming a very John Kembleish attitude, I struck this down with one hand, pointing with the other to the wall, as I exclaimed, 'There! look there!'

"I need only quote Barrett's exclamation to enlighten you upon my discovery, as, drawing in his breath with a strong effort, he burst out:

"May the devil admire me, but it's a rat-hole."

"I fear, Charley, he's right; and, what's more, that the board will think so, for this moment a very warm discussion is going on among that amiable and learned body, whether I shall any longer remain an ornament to the university. In fact, the terror with which they fled from my chambers, overturning each other in the passage, seemed to imply that they thought me mad; and I do believe my voice, look, and attitude would not have disgraced a blue cotton dressing-gown and a cell in 'Swift's.' Be this as it may, few men have done more for college than I have.—The sun never stood still for Joshua with more resolution than I have rested in my career of freshman; and if I have contributed little to the fame, I have done much for the funds of the university; and when they come to compute the various sums I have paid in, for fines, penalties, and what they call properly 'impositions,' if they do not place a portrait of me in the examination-hall, between Archbishop Usher and Flood, then do I say there is no gratitude in mankind; not to mention the impulse I have given to the various artisans whose business it is to repair lamps, windows, chimneys, iron railings, and watchmen, all of which I have devoted myself to, with an enthusiasm for political economy well known, and registered in the College-street police-office.

"After all, Charley, I miss you greatly. Your second in a ballad is not to be replaced; besides, Carlisle bridge has got low; medical students and young attorneys affect minstrelsy, and actually frequent the haunts sacred to our muse.

"Dublin is, upon the whole, I think, worse; though one scarcely ever gets tired laughing at the small celebrities—"

Master Frank gets here indiscreet, so I shall skip.

"And so the Dashwoods are going too; this will make mine a pitiable condition, for I really did begin to feel tender in that quarter. You may have heard she refused me; this, however, is not correct, though I have little doubt it might have been—had I asked her.

"Hammersly has, you know, got his congé. I wonder how the poor fellow took it, when Power gave him back his letters and his picture. How you are to be treated remains to be seen; in any case you certainly stand first favorite."

I laid down the letter at this passage, unable to read further. Here, then, was the solution of the whole chaos of mystery; here's the full explanation of what had puzzled my aching brain for many a night long. These were the first letters I had myself delivered into Hammersly's hands; this the picture he had trodden to dust beneath his heel the morning of our meeting. I now felt the reason of his taunting allusion to my "success," his cutting sarcasm, his intemperate passion. A flood of light poured at once across all the dark passages of my history—and Lucy, too—dare I think of her? A rapid thought shot through my brain. What, if she had really cared for me! What, if for me she had rejected another's love! What, if, trusting to my faith, my pledged and sworn faith, she had given me her heart! O, the bitter agony of that thought! to think that all my hopes were shipwrecked, with the very land in sight.

I sprang to my feet with some sudden impulse, but as I did so, the blood rushed madly to my face and temples, which beat violently; a parched and swollen feeling came about my throat; I endeavored to open my collar, and undo my stock, but my disabled arm prevented me. I tried to call my servant, but my utterance was thick, and my words would not come; a frightful suspicion crossed me that my reason was tottering. I made towards the door, but as I did so, the objects around me became confused and mingled, my limbs trembled, and I fell heavily upon the floor; a pang of dreadful pain shot through me as I fell—my arm was rebroken; after this, I knew no more; all the accumulated excitement of the evening bore down with one fell swoop upon my brain:—ere day broke I was delirious.

I had a vague and indistinct remembrance of hurried and anxious faces around my bed, of whispered words, and sorrowful looks; but my own thoughts careered over the bold hills of the far west, as I trod them in my boyhood, free and high of heart, or recurred to the din and crash of the battle-field, with the mad bounding of my war-horse, and the loud clang of the trumpet; perhaps the acute pain of my swollen and suffering arm, gave the character to my mental aberration; for I have more than once observed among the wounded in battle, that even when torn and mangled by grape from a howitzer, their ravings have partaken of a high feature of enthusiasm, shouts of triumph, and exclamations of pleasure; even songs have I heard—but never once the low mutterings of despair, and the scarce stifled cry of sorrow and affliction.

Such were the few gleams of consciousness which visited me, and even to such as these I became soon insensible.

Few like to chronicle, fewer still to read, the sad history of a sick-bed. Of mine, I know but little. The throbbing pulses of the erring brain, the wild fancies of lunacy, take no note of time. There is no past nor future—a dreadful present, full of its hurried and confused impressions, is all that the mind beholds; and even when some gleams of returning reason flash upon the mad confusion of the brain, they came like sunbeams through a cloud, dimmed, darkened, and perverted.

It is the restless activity of the mind in fever, that constitutes its most painful anguish; the fast-fitting thoughts, that rush ever onwards, crowding sensation on sensation, an endless train of exciting images, without purpose or repose; or even worse, the straining effort to pursue some vague and shadowy conception, which evades us ever as we follow, but which mingles with all around and about us—haunting us at midnight as in the noonday.

Of this nature was a vision which came constantly before me, till at length, by its very recurrence, it had assumed a kind of real and palpable existence; and, as I watched it, my heart thrilled with the high ardor of enthusiasm and delight, or sank into the dark abyss of sorrow and despair. The dawning of morning, the daylight sinking, brought no other image to my aching sight, and of this alone, of all the impressions of the period, has my mind retained any consciousness.

Methought I stood within an old and venerable cathedral, where the dim, yellow light fell with a rich but solemn glow upon the fretted capitals, or the grotesque tracings of the oaken carvings, lighting up the faded gildings of the stately monuments, and tinting the varied hues of time-worn banners. The mellow notes of a deep organ filled the air, and seemed to attune the sense to all the awe and reverence of the place, where the very foot-fall, magnified by its many echoes, seemed half a profanation. I stood before an altar; beside me, a young and lovely girl, whose bright brown tresses waved in loose masses upon a neck of snowy whiteness; her hand, cold and pale, rested within my own; we knelt together, not in prayer, but a feeling of deep reverence stole over my heart, as she repeated some few half-uttered words after me; I knew that she was mine. O! the ecstasy of that moment, as, springing to my feet, I darted forward to press her to my heart, when suddenly an arm was interposed between us, while a low but solemn voice rung in my ears, "Sist not, for thou art false and traitorous; thy vow, a perjury; and thy heart, a lie!" Slowly and silently the fair form of my loved Lucy, for it was her, receded from my sight. One look, one last look of sorrow—it was scarce reproach—fell upon me, and I sunk back upon the cold pavement, broken-hearted and forsaken.

This dream came with daybreak, and with the calm repose of evening; the still hours of the waking night brought no other image to my eyes, and when its sad influence had spread a gloom and desolation over my wounded heart, a secret hope crept over me, that again the bright moment of happiness would return, and once more beside that ancient altar I'd kneel beside my bride and call her mine.

For the rest, my memory retains but little; the kind looks which came around my bedside brought but a brief pleasure, for in their affectionate beaming I could read the gloomy prestige of my fate. The hurried but cautious step, the whispered sentences, the averted gaze of those who sorrowed for me, sunk far deeper into my heart than my friends then thought of. Little do they think, who minister to the sick or dying, how each passing word, each fitting glance, is noted, and how the pale and stilly figure, which lies all but lifeless before them, counts over the hours he has to live by the smiles or tears around him.

Hours, days, weeks, rolled over, and still my fate hung in the balance; and while, in the wild enthusiasm of my erring faculties, I wandered far in spirit from my bed of suffering and pain, some well remembered voice beside me would strike upon my ear, bringing me back, as if by magic, to all the realities of life, and investing my almost unconscious state with all the hopes and fears about me.

One by one, at length, these fancies fled from me, and to the delirium of fever succeeded the sad and helpless consciousness of illness, far, far more depressing; for as the conviction of sense came back, the sorrowful aspect of a dreary future came with them.

CHAPTER XIII....The Villa.

The gentle twilight of an autumnal evening, calm, serene, and mellow, was falling, as I opened my eyes to consciousness of life and being, and looked around me. I lay in a large and handsomely furnished apartment, in which the hand of taste was as evident in all the decorations, as the unsparing employment of wealth; the silk draperies of my bed, the inlaid tables, the ormolu ornaments which glittered upon the chimney-piece, were one by one, so many puzzles to my erring senses. I opened and shut my eyes again and again, and essayed by every means in my power to ascertain if they were not the visionary creations of a fevered mind. I stretched out my hands to feel the objects; and even while holding the freshly-plucked flowers in my grasp I could scarce persuade myself that they were real. A thrill of pain at this instant recalled me to other thoughts, and I turned my eyes upon my wounded arm, which, swollen and stiffened, lay motionless beside me. Gradually, my memory came back, and to my weak faculties some passages of my former life were presented, not collectively it is true, nor in any order, but scattered, isolated scenes. While such thoughts flew past, my ever-rising question to myself was, "Where am I now?" The vague feeling which illness leaves upon the mind, whispered to me of kind looks and soft voices; and I had a dreamy consciousness about me of being watched, and cared for, but wherefore, or by whom I knew not.

From a partly open door which led into a garden, a mild and balmy air fanned my temples, and soothed my heated brow; and as the light curtain waved to and fro with the breeze, the odor of the rose and the orange tree filled the apartment.

There is something in the feeling of weakness which succeeds to long illness of the most delicious and refined enjoyment. The spirit emerging as it were from the thralldom of its grosser prison, rises high and triumphant above the meaner thoughts and more petty ambitions of daily life. Purer feelings, more ennobling hopes succeed; and gleams of our childhood, mingling with our premises for the future, make up an ideal existence, in which the low passions and cares of ordinary life enter not or are forgotten. "T is then we learn to hold converse with ourselves; 't is then we ask how has our manhood performed the promises of its youth? or, have our ripened prospects borne out the pledges of our boyhood? "T is then, in the calm justice of our lonely hearts we learn how our failures are but another name for our faults, and that what we looked on as the vicissitudes of fortune, are but the fruits of our own vices. Alas, how short-lived are such intervals. Like the fitful sunshine in the wintry sky, they throw one bright and joyous tint over the dark landscape; for a moment the valley and the mountain-top are bathed in a ruddy glow; the leafless tree and the dark moss seem to feel a touch of spring; but the next instant it is past—the lowering clouds and dark shadows intervene, and the cold blast, the moaning wind, and the dreary waste are once more before us.

I endeavored to recall the latest events of my career, but in vain; the real and the visionary were inextricably mingled; and the scenes of my campaigns were blended with hopes, and fears, and doubts, which had no existence save in my dreams. My curiosity to know where I was, grew now my strongest feeling, and I raised myself with one arm, to look around me. In the room all was still and silent, but nothing seemed to intimate what I sought for. As I looked, however, the wind blew back the curtain which half concealed the sash door, and disclosed to me the figure of a man, seated at a table; his back was toward me; but his broad sombrero hat and brown mantle bespoke his nation; the light blue curl of smoke which wreathed gently upward, and the ample display of long-necked, straw-wrapped flasks, also attested that he was enjoying himself with a true peninsular gusto, having probably partaken of a long siesta.

It was a perfect picture in its way of the indolent luxury of the South; the rich and perfumed flowers, half closing to the night air, but sighing forth a perfumed "buenas noches," as they betook themselves to rest; the slender shadows of the tall shrubs, stretching motionless across the walks; the very attitude of the figure himself was in keeping, as supported by easy chairs, he lounged at full length, raising his head ever and anon, as if to watch the wreath of eddying smoke as it rose upward from his cigar, and melted away in the distance.

"Yes," thought I, as I looked for some time, "such is the very type of his nation. Surrounded by every luxury of climate, blessed with all that earth can offer of its best and fairest, and yet only using such gifts as mere sensual gratifications." Starting with this theme, I wove a whole story for the unknown personage, whom, in my wandering fancy I began by creating a grandee of Portugal, invested with rank, honors, and riches, but who, effeminated by the habits and usages of his country, had become the mere idle voluptuary, living a life of easy and inglorious indolence. My further musings were interrupted at this moment, for the individual to whom I had been so complimentary in my reverie, slowly arose from his recumbent position, flung his loose mantle carelessly across his left shoulder, and, pushing open the sash door, entered my chamber. Directing his steps to a large mirror, he stood for some minutes contemplating himself with what, from his attitude, I judged to be no small satisfaction. Though his back was still toward me, and the dim twilight of the room too uncertain to see much, yet I could perceive that he was evidently admiring himself in the glass. Of this fact I had soon the most complete proof; for as I looked, he slowly raised his broad-leaved Spanish hat with an air of most imposing pretension, and bowed reverently to himself.

"Come va, vostra Senhoria," said he.

The whole gesture and style of this proceeding struck me as so ridiculous, that in spite of all my efforts, I could scarcely repress a laugh. He turned quickly round and approached the bed. The deep shadow of the sombrero darkened the upper part of his features, but I could distinguish a pair of fierce-looking moustaches beneath, which curled upward toward his eyes, while a stiff-point beard stuck straight from his chin. Fearing lest my rude interruption had been overheard, I was framing some polite speech in Portuguese, when he opened the dialogue by asking in that language, how I did.

I replied, and was about to ask some questions relative to where, and in whose protection I then was, when my grave-looking friend, giving a pirouette upon one leg, sent his hat flying into the air, and cried out in a voice that not even my memory could fail to recognise—

"By the rock of Cashel, he's cured! he's cured!—the fever's over! Oh, Master Charles dear! oh, Master darling! and you ain't mad, after all."

"Mad! no faith; but I shrewdly suspect you must be." "Oh, devil a taste! but spake to me, honey—spake to me, acushla."

"Where am I? whose house is this? What do you mean by this disguise—that beard?"

"Whist, I'll tell you all, av you have patience; but are you cured?—tell me that first: sure they was going to cut the arm off you, 'till you got out of bed, and with your pistols sent them flying, one out of the window, and the other down stairs; and I bade the little chap with the saw myself till he could n't know himself in the glass."

While Mike ran on at this rate, I never took my eyes from him, and all my poor faculties were equal to was to convince myself that the whole scene was not some vision of a wandering intellect. Gradually, however, the well-known features recalled me to myself, and, as my doubts gave way at length, I laughed long and heartily at the masquerade absurdity of his appearance.

Mike, meanwhile, whose face expressed no small mistrust at the sincerity of my mirth, having uncloaked himself, proceeded to lay aside his beard and moustaches, saying, as he did so—

"There now, darling; there now master dear; de n't be grinning that way; I'll not be a Portugee any more, av you'll be quiet and listen to reason."

"But, Mike, where am I? Answer me that one question."

"You're at home, dear; where else would you be?"

"At home," said I, with a start, as my eye ranged over the various articles of luxury and elegance around, so unlike the more unpretending features of my uncle's house; "at home!"

"Ay, just so; sure isn't it the same thing. It's euld Don Emanuel that owns it; and won't it be your own when you're married to the lovely creature herself?"

I started up, and placing my hand upon my throbbing temple, asked myself if I were really awake; or if some flight of fancy had not carried me away beyond the bounds of reason and sense. "Go on, go on," said I, at length, in a hollow voice, anxious to gather from his words something like a clue to this mystery. "How did this happen?"

"Av ye mean how you come here, faith it was just this way:—after you got the fever, and beat the doctors, devil a one could go near you but myself and the major."

"The major—Major Monsoon?"

"No, Major Power himself. Well he told your friends up here how it was going very hard with you, and that you were like to die; and the same evening they sent down a beautiful litter, as like a hearse as two peas, for you, and brought you up here in state; devil a thing was wanting but a few people to raise a cry to make as fine a funeral as ever I seen; and sure I set up a whillilew myself in the Black Horse square, and the devils only laughed at me."

"Well, you see, they put you into a beautiful elegant bed, and the young lady herself sat down beside you, betune times fanning you with a big fan, and then drying her eyes, for she was weeping like a waterfall. Don Miguel," says she to me,—for, ye see, I put your cloak on by mistake when I was leaving the quarters,—"Don Miguel, questa hidalgo é vuestro amigo?"

"My most particular friend," says I, God spare him many years to be so."

"Then take up your quarters here," said she, "and don't leave him; we'll do every thing in our power to make you comfortable."

"I'm not particular," says I; the run of the house—"

"Then this is the Villa Nove?" said I with a faint sigh.

"The same," replied Mike; "and a sweet place it is for eating and drinking—for wine in buckets full, av ye axed for it,—for dancing and singing every evening, with as pretty cratures as ever I set my eyes upon. Upon my conscience, it's as good as Galway; and good manners it is they have. What's more, none of your liberties nor familiarities with strangers, but it's Don Miguel, devil a less.—"Don Miguel, av it's pleasing to you to take a drop of Xeres before your meat,—or would you have a shaugh of a pipe or cigar when you're done; that's the way of it."

"And Sir George Dashwood," said I, "has he been here? has he inquired for me?"

"Every day, either himself or one of the staff comes galloping up at luncheon time to ask after you; and then they have a bit of tender discourse with the senhora herself. Oh! devil a bit of need ye fear them, she's true blue; and it isn't the major's fault upon my conscience it isn't; for he does be coming the blarney over her in beautiful style."

"Does Miss Dashwood ever visit here?" said I, with a voice faltering and uncertain enough to have awakened suspicions in a more practised observer.

"Never once; and that's what I call unnatural behaviour after you saving her life; and if she wasn't—"

"Be silent, I say."

"Well—well, there; I won't say any more; and sure it's time for me to be putting on my beard again. I'm going to the casino with Catrina, and sure it's with real ladies I might be going an if it wasn't for Major Power, that told them I wasn't an officer; but it is all right again. I gave them a great history of the Frees from the time of Cuilla na Toole, that was one of the family, and a cousin of Moses, I believe; and they behave well to one that comes from an ould stock."

"Don Miguel! Don Miguel," said a voice from the garden.

"I'm coming my angel; I'm coming, my turtle dove," said Mike, arranging his moustaches and beard with amazing dexterity. "Ah, but it would do your heart good av you take a peep at us about twelve o'clock, dancing, 'dirty James' for a belero, and just see Miss Catrina, the lady's maid, doing, cover the buckle, as neat as nature. There now, there's the lemonade near your hand, and I'll leave you the lamp, and you may go asleep as soon as you please, for Miss Inez won't come in to-night to play the guitar, for the doctor said it might do you harm now."

So saying, and before I could summon presence of mind to ask another question, Don Miguel wrapped himself in the broad folds of his Spanish cloak, and strode from the room with the air of an hidalgo.

I slept but little that night; the full tide of memory rushing in upon me, brought back the hour of my return to Lisbon and the wreck of all my hopes, which, from the narrative of my servant, I now perceived to be complete. I dare not venture upon recording how many plans suggested themselves to my troubled spirit, and were in return rejected. To meet Lucy Dashwood—to make a full and candid declaration—to acknowledge that flirtation alone with Donna Inez—a mere passing, boyish flirtation—had given the colouring to my innocent passion, and that in heart and soul I was hers and hers only. This was my first resolve, but alas! if I had not courage to sustain a common interview, to meet her in the careless crowd of a drawing-room, what could I do under circumstances like these; besides, the matter would be cut very short by her coolly declaring that she had neither right nor inclination to listen to such a declaration. The recollection of her look as she passed me to her carriage came flashing across my brain and decided this point. No, no! I'll not encounter that; however appearances for the moment had been against me, she should not have treated me thus coldly and disdainfully. It was quite clear she had never cared for me; wounded pride had been her only feeling; and so as I reasoned, I ended by satisfying myself that in that quarter all was at an end for ever.

Now then for dilemma number two, I thought—the senhora. My first impulse was one of any thing but gratitude to her, by whose kind, tender care my hours of pain and suffering had been soothed and alleviated. But for her, and I should have been spared all my present embarrassment—all my shipwrecked fortunes; but for her I should now be the aid-de-camp residing in Sir George Dashwood's own house, meeting with Lucy every hour of the day, dining beside her, riding out with her, pressing my suit by every means and with every advantage of my position; but for her and her dark eyes—and, by-the-by, what eyes they are, how full of brilliancy, yet how teeming with an expression of soft and melting sweetness; and her mouth too, how perfectly chiselled those full lips—how different from the cold unbending firmness of Miss Dashwood's—not but I have seen Lucy smile too, and what a sweet smile—how it lighted up her fair cheek, and made her blue eyes darken and deepen till they looked like heaven's own vault. Yes, there is more poetry in a blue eye. But still Inez is a very lovely girl, and her foot never was surpassed; she is a coquette, too, about that foot and ankle—I rather like a woman to be so. What a sensation she would make in England—how she would be the rage; and then I thought of home and Galway, and the astonishment of some, the admiration of others, as I presented her as my wife; the congratulations of my friends, the wonder of the men, the tempered envy of the women. Methought I saw my uncle, as he pressed her in his arms say, "Yes, Charley, this is a prize worth campaigning for."

The stray sounds of a guitar which came from the garden broke in upon my musings at this moment. It seemed as if a finger was straying heedlessly across the strings. I started up, and to my surprise perceived it was Inez. Before I had time to collect myself, a gentle tap at the window aroused me; it opened softly, and while from an unseen hand a bouquet of fresh flowers was thrown upon my bed; before I could collect myself to speak, the sash closed again and I was alone.

CHAPTER XIV....The Visit.

MIKE's performance at the masquerade had doubtless been of the most distinguished character, and demanded a compensating period of repose, for he did not make his appearance the entire morning. Toward noon, however, the door from the garden gently opened, and I heard a step upon the stone terrace, and something which sounded to my ears like the clank of a sabre. I lifted my head, and saw Fred Power beside me.

I shall spare my readers the recital of my friend, which however, more full and explanatory of past events, contained in reality little more than Mickey Free had already told me. In fine, he informed me, that our army by a succession of retreating movements, had deserted the northern provinces, and now occupied the entrenched lines of Torres Vedras. That Massena, with a powerful force, was still in march; re-enforcements daily pouring in upon him—and every expectation pointing to the probability that he would attempt to storm our position.

"The wise heads," remarked Power, "talk of our speedy embarkation—the sanguine and the hot-headed rave of a great victory, and the retreat of Massena; but I was up at head quarters last week with despatches, and saw Lord Wellington myself."

"Well, what did you make out? did he drop any hint of his own views?"

"Faith, I can't say he did; he asked me some questions about the troops just landed—he spoke a little of the commissary department—damned the blankets—said that green forage was bad food for the artillery horses—sent me an English paper to read about the O. P. riots, and said the harriers would throw off about six o'clock, and that he hoped to see me at dinner."

I could not restrain a laugh at Power's catalogue of his lordships topics. "So," said I, "he at least does not take any gloomy views of our situation."

"Who can tell what he thinks; he's ready to fight, if fighting will do any thing—and to retreat if that be better. But that he'll sleep an hour less, or drink a glass of claret more—come what will of it—I'll believe from no man living."

"We've lost one gallant thing in my case, Charley," resumed Power. "Busaco was, I'm told, a glorious day, and our people were in the heat of it. So that if we do not leave the Peninsula now—that will be a confounded chagrin. Not for you, my poor fellow, for you could not stir; but I was so cursed foolish to take the staff appointment—thus one folly ever entails another."

There was a tone of bitterness in which these words were uttered, that left no doubt upon my mind—some arrière pensée remained lurking behind them. My eyes met his—he bit his lip, and coloring deeply, rose from the chair, and walked toward the window.

The chance allusion of my man Mike flashed upon me at the moment, and I dared not trust myself to break silence. I now thought I could trace in my friend's manner less of that gay and careless buoyancy which ever marked him. There was a tone, it seemed, of more grave and sombre character, and even when he jested, the smile his features bore was not his usual frank and happy one, and speedily gave way to an expression I had never before remarked. Our silence, which had now lasted for some minutes, was becoming embarrassing—that strange consciousness, that to a certain extent we were reading each others thoughts, made us both cautious of breaking it; and when at length, turning abruptly round, he asked, "When I hoped to be up, and about again?" I felt my heart relieved from I knew not well what load of doubt and difficulty that oppressed it. We chatted on for some little time longer, the news of Lisbon, and the daily gossip furnishing our topics.

"Plenty of gayety, Charley; dinners and balls to no end; so get well, my boy, and make the most of it."

"Yes," I replied, "I'll do my best; but be assured the first use I'll make of health will be to join the regiment. I am heartily ashamed of myself for all I have lost already—though not altogether my fault."

"And will you really join at once?" said Power, with a look of eager anxiety I could not possibly account for.

"Of course, I will—what have I—what can I have to detain me here?"

What reply he was about to make at this moment I know not—but the door opened, and Mike announced Sir George Dashwood.

"Gently, my worthy man, not so loud if you please," said the mild voice of the general, as he stepped noiselessly across the room, evidently shocked at the indiscreet tone of my follower. "Ah, Power, you here! and our poor friend, how is he?"

"Able to answer for himself at last, Sir George," said I, grasping his proffered hand.

"My poor lad, you've had a long bout of it; but you've saved your arm, and that's well worth the lost time. Well! I've come to bring you good news; there's been a very sharp cavalry affair, and our fellows have been the conquerors."

"There again, Power; listen to that: we are losing every thing!"

"Not so; not so, my boy," said Sir George, smiling blandly but archly. "There are conquests to be won here as well as there; and, in your present state, I rather think you fitted for such as these." Power's brow grew clouded, he essayed a smile, but it failed; and he rose and hurried toward the window.

As for me, my confusion must have led to a very erroneous impression of my real feelings; and I perceived Sir George anxious to turn the channel of the conversation.

"You see but little of your host, O'Malley," he resumed; "he is ever from home; but I believe nothing could be kinder than his arrangements for you. You are aware that he kidnapped you from us! I had sent Forbes over to bring you to us, your room was prepared, every thing in readiness, when he met your man Mike, setting forth upon a mule, who told him you had just taken your departure for the villa. We both had our claim upon you, and, I believe, pretty much on the same score. By the-by, you have not seen Lucy since your arrival. I never knew it till yesterday, when I asked if she did not find you altered."

I blundered out some absurd reply—blushed, corrected myself, and got confused; which Sir George, attributing doubtless to my weak state rose soon after, and, taking Power along with him, remarked, as he left the room, "we are too much for him yet—I see that: so we'll leave him quiet some time longer." Thanking him in my heart for his true appreciation of my state, I sunk back upon my pillow to think over all I had heard and seen.

"Well, Mister Charles," said Mike, as he came forward with a smile, "I suppose you heard the news? The 14th beat the French down at Merca there, and took seventy prisoners; but, sure, it's little good it'll do after all."

"And why not, Mike?"

"Musha, isn't Boney coming himself? He's bringing all the Russians down with him, and going to destroy us entirely."

"Not at all, man; you mistake. He's nothing to do with Russia, and has quite enough on his hands at this moment."

"God grant it was truth you were talking! but you see I read it myself in the papers, or Sergeant Hagarty did, which is the same thing—that he's coming with the Cossacks."

"With who? with what?"

"With the Cossacks."

"What the devil do you mean? Who are they?"

"O, Tower of Ivory! did you never hear of the Cossacks, with the red beards and the red breeches, and long poles with pike-heads on them, that does all the devilment on horseback—spiking and spitting the people like larks?"

"The Cossacks, is it you mean? The Cossacks?"

"Ay, just so, the Cossacks. They're from Clare Island and thereabouts; and there's more of them in Meath. They're my mother's people, and was always real devils for fighting."

I burst out into an immoderate fit of laughing at Mike's etymology, which thus converted Hetman Platoff into a Galway man.

"Oh, murder, isn't it cruel to hear you laugh that way? There now, alanna! be aisy, and I'll tell you more news. We've the house to ourselves to-day. The old gentleman's down at Bethlem, and the daughter's in Lisbon, making great preparation for a grand ball they're to give when you're quite well."

"I hope I shall be with the army in a few days, Mike; and certainly if I'm able to move about, I'll not remain longer at Lisbon."

"Arrah, don't say so, now! When was you ever so comfortable? Upon my conscience, it's more like Paradise than any thing else. If ye see the dinner we sit down to every day; and as for drink—if it wasn't that I sleep on a ground floor, I'd seldom see a blanket."

"Well, certainly, Mike, I agree with you, these are hard things to tear ourselves away from."

"Are n't they now, sir? and then Miss Catherine, I'm teaching her Irish!"

"Teaching her Irish! for Heaven's sake, what use can she make of Irish?"

"Ah, the creature, she does n't know better; and, as she was always bothering me to learn her English, I promised one day to do it; but ye see, somehow I never was very proficient in strange tongues; so I thought to myself, Irish will do as well. So, you perceive, we're taking a course of Irish literature, as Mr. Lynch says in Athlone; and, upon my conscience, she's an apt scholar."

"Good morning to you, Katey," says Mr. Power to her the other day, as he passed through the hall. "Good morning, my dear, I hear you speak English perfectly now!"

"Aonia mon dioul," says she, making a courtesy.

"Be the powers, I thought he'd die with the laughing."

"Well, my dear, I hope you don't mean it—do you know what you're saying?"

"Honor bright, major!" says I; "honor bright!" and I gave him a wink at the same time.

"Oh, that's it!" said he, "is it?" and so he went off holding his hands to his sides with the bare laughing; and your honor knows it was n't a blessing she wished him, for all that."

CHAPTER XV.—The Confession.

What a strange position this of mine, thought I, a few mornings after the events detailed in the last chapter. How very fascinating in some respects—how full of all the charm of romance, and how confoundingly difficult to see one's way through!

To understand my cogitation right, figurez vous, my dear reader, a large and splendidly furnished drawing-room, from one end of which an orangery in full blossom opens; from the other side is seen a delicious little boudoir, where books, bronzes, pictures, and statues, in all the artistic disorder of a lady's sanctum, are bathed in a deep purple light from a stained glass window of the thirteenth century.

At a small table beside the wood fire, whose mellow light is flitting with the sunbeams upon the carpet, stands an antique silver breakfast service, which none but the hand of Benvenuto could have chiselled; beside it sits a girl, young and beautiful—her dark eyes, beaming beneath their long lashes, are fixed with an expression of watchful interest upon a pale and sickly youth who, lounging upon a sofa opposite, is carelessly turning over the leaves of a new journal, or gazing steadfastly on the fretted gothic of the ceiling, while his thoughts are travelling many a mile away. The lady being the Senhora Inez; the nonchalant invalid, your unworthy acquaintance, Charles O'Malley.

What a very strange position, to be sure.

"Then you are not equal to this ball to-night?" said she, after a pause of some minutes.

I turned as she spoke; her words had struck audibly upon my ear—but, lost in my reverie, I could but repeat my own fixed thought—how strange to be so situated!

"You are really very tiresome, signor, I assure you, you are. I have been giving you a most elegant description of the Casino fete, and the beautiful costume of our Lisbon belles, but I can get nothing from you but this muttered something, which may be very shocking, for aught I know. I'm sure your friend, Major Power, would be much more attentive to me, that is," added she, archly, "if Miss Dashwood were not present."

"What—why—you don't mean that there is any thing there—that Power is paying attention to—"

"Madre divina, how that seems to interest you, and how red you are; if it were not that you never met her before, and that your acquaintance did not seem to make rapid progress, then I should say that you are in love with her yourself."

I had to laugh at this, but felt my face blushing more and more. "And so," said I, affecting a careless and indifferent tone, "the gay Fred. Power is smitten at last."

"Was it so very difficult a thing to accomplish?" said she, slyly.

"He seems to say so, at least. And the lady, how does she appear to receive his attentions?"

"Oh, I should say with evident pleasure and satisfaction, as all girls do the advances of men they don't care for, nor intend to care for."

"Indeed," said I, slowly, "indeed, senhora," looking into her eyes as I spoke, as if to read if the lesson were destined for my benefit.

"There, don't stare so! every one knows that."

"So you don't think, then, that Lucy—I mean Miss Dashwood—why are you laughing so?"

"How can I help it? your calling her Lucy is so good, I wish she heard it; she's the very proudest girl I ever knew."

"But to come back; you really think she does not care for him?"

"No more than for you; and I may be pardoned for the simile, having seen your meeting. But let me give you the news of our own fête. Saturday is the day fixed; and you must be quite well—I insist upon it. Miss Dashwood has promised to come—no small concession; for, after all, she has never once been here since the day you frightened her. I can't help laughing at my blunder—the two people I had promised myself should fall desperately in love with each, and who will scarcely meet."

"But I trusted," said I pettishly, "that you were not disposed to resign your own interest in me?"

"Neither was I," said she, with an easy smile, "except that I have so many admirers. I might even spare to my friends; though after all, I should be sorry to lose you—I like you."

"Yes," said I, half bitterly, "as girls do those they never intend to care for; is it not so?"

"Perhaps yes, and perhaps—but is it going to rain? How provoking! and I have ordered my horse. Well, Signor Carlos, I leave you to your delightful newspaper, and all the magnificent descriptions of battles, and sieges, and skirmishes for which you seem doomed to pine without ceasing. There, don't kiss my hand twice, that's not right."

"Well, let me begin again—"

"I shall not breakfast with you any more: but tell me, am I to order a costume for you in Lisbon; or will you arrange all that yourself? You must come to the fête you know."

"If you would be so very kind"

"I will then be so very kind; and, once more, adieu!" So saying, and with a slight motion of her hand, she smiled a good-by, and left me.

What a lovely girl! thought I, as I rose and walked to the window, muttering to myself Othello's line, and

"When I love thee not, chaos is come again."

In fact, it was the perfect expression of my feeling—the only solution to all the difficulties surrounding me being to fall desperately, irretrievably in love with the senhora, which, all things considered, was not a very desperate resource for a gentleman in trouble. As I thought over the hopelessness of one attachment, I turned calmly to consider all the favorable points of the other. She was truly beautiful, attractive in every sense; her manner most fascinating, and her disposition, so far as I could pronounce, perfectly amiable. I felt already something more than interest about her; how very easy would be the transition to stronger feeling. There was an eclat, too, about being her accepted lover that had its charm. She was the belle par excellence of Lisbon; and then a sense of pique crossed my mind as I reflected what would Lucy say of him whom she had slighted and insulted, when he became the husband of the beautiful and millionaire Senhora Inez.

As my meditations had reached thus far, the door opened stealthily, and Catherine appeared, her finger upon her lips, and her gesture indicating caution. She carried on her arm a mass of drapery covered by a large mantle, which, throwing off as she entered, she displayed before me a rich blue domino with silver embroidery. It was large and loose in its folds, so as thoroughly to conceal the figure of any wearer. This she held up before me for an instant without speaking, when at length, seeing my curiosity fully excited, she said,—

"This is the senhora's domino. I should be ruined if she knew I showed it; but I promised—that is, I told—"

"Yes, yes, I understand," relieving her embarrassment about the source of her civilities; "go on."

"Well, there are several others like it, but with this small difference, instead of a carnation, which all the others have embroidered upon the cuff, I have made it a rose: you perceive. La Senhora knows nothing of this: none save yourself know it. I'm sure I may trust you with the secret."

"Fear not in the least, Catherine; you have rendered me a great service. Let me look at it once more: ah, there's no difficulty in detecting it. And you are certain she is unaware of it?"

"Perfectly so; she has several other costumes, but in this one I know she intends some surprise; so be upon your guard."

With these words, carefully once more concealing the rich dress beneath the mantle, she withdrew; while I strolled forth to wonder what mystery might lie beneath this scheme, and speculate how far I myself was included in the plot she spoke of.

For the few days which succeeded I passed my time much alone. The senhora was but seldom at home; and I remarked that Power rarely came to see me. A strange feeling of half-coolness had latterly grown between us, and, instead of the open confidence we formerly indulged in when together, we appeared now rather to chat over things of mere every-day interest than our own immediate plans and prospects. There was a kind of pre-occupation, too, in his manner that struck me: his mind seemed ever straying from the topics he talked of to something remote; and altogether he was no longer the frank and reckless dragoon I had ever known him. What could be the meaning of this change? Had he found out by any accident that I was to blame in my conduct towards Lucy—had any erroneous impression of my interview with her reached his ears? This was the most improbable; besides, there was nothing in that to draw down his censure or condemnation, however represented; and was it that he was himself in love with her—that, devoted heart and soul to Lucy, he regarded me as a successful rival, preferred before him! Oh! how could I have so long blinded myself to the fact! This was the true solution of the whole difficulty. I had more than once suspected this to be so; now all the circumstances of proof poured in upon me. I called to mind his agitated manner the night of my arrival in Lisbon, his thousand questions concerning the reason of my furlough; and then, lately, the look of unfeigned pleasure with which he heard me resolved to join my regiment the moment I was sufficiently recovered. I also remembered how assiduously he pressed his intimacy with the senhora, Lucy's dearest friend here; his continual visits at the villa; those long walks in the garden, where his very look betokened some confidential mission of the heart. Yes, there was no doubt of it; he loved Lucy Dashwood! Alas! there seemed to be no end to the complication of my misfortunes; one by one I appeared fated to lose whatever had a hold upon my affections, and to stand alone unloved and uncared for in the world. My thoughts turned toward the senhora, but I could not deceive myself into any hope there. My own feelings were untouched, and hers I felt to be equally so. Young as I was, there was no mistaking the easy smile of coquetry, the merry laugh of flattered vanity, for a deeper and holier feeling. And then I did not wish it otherwise. One only had taught me to feel how ennobling, how elevating, in all its impulses can be a deep-rooted passion for a young and beautiful girl! from her eyes alone had I caught the inspiration—that made me throb for glory and distinction. I could not transfer the allegiance of my heart, since it had taught that very heart to beat high and proudly. Lucy, lost to me for ever as she must be, was still more than any other woman ever could be. All the past clung to her memory, all the prestige of the future must point to it also.

And Power: why had he not trusted, why had he not confided in me? Was this like my old and tried friend? Alas! I was forgetting that in his eye I was the favored rival, and not the despised, rejected suitor.

It is past now, thought I, as I rose and walked into the garden; the dream that made life a fairy tale is dispelled; the cold reality of the world is before me, and my path lies a lonely and solitary one. My first resolution was to see Power, and relieve his mind of any uneasiness as regarded my pretensions; they existed no longer. As for me I was no obstacle to his happiness; it was then but fair and honorable that I should tell him so; this done, I should leave Lisbon at once: the cavalry had for the most part been ordered to the rear, still there was always something going forward at the outposts.

The idea of active service, the excitement of a campaigning life cheered me, and I advanced along the dark alley of the garden with a lighter and a freer heart. My resolves were not destined to meet delay: as I turned the angle of a walk Power was before me; he was leaning against a tree, his hands crossed upon his bosom, his head bowed forward, and his whole air and attitude betokening deep reflection.

He started as I came up, and seemed almost to change color.

"Well, Charley," said he, after a moment pause, "you look better this morning; how goes the arm?"

"The arm is ready for service again, and its owner most anxious for it. Do you know, Fred, I'm thoroughly weary of this life?"

"They're little better, however, at the lines; the French are in position, but never adventure a movement, and except some few affairs at the pickets, there is really nothing to do."

"No matter, remaining here can never serve one's interests, and besides, I have accomplished what I came for—"

I was about to add "the restoration of my health," when he suddenly interrupted me, eyeing me fixedly as he spoke.

"Indeed! indeed! is that so?"

"Yes," said I, half puzzled at the tone and manner of the speech; "I can join now when I please; meanwhile, Fred, I have been thinking of you. Yes, don't be surprised, at the very moment we met you were in my thoughts."

I took his arm as I said this, and led him down the alley.

"We are too old, and I trust, too true friends, Fred, to have secrets from each other, and yet we have been playing this silly game for some weeks past; now, my dear fellow, I have yours, and 'tis only fair justice you should have mine, and faith I feel you'd have discovered it long since. Had your thoughts been as free as I have known them to be. Fred, you are in love; there, don't wince, man, I know it; but hear me out. You believe me to be sad also; nay, more, you think that my chances of success are better, stronger than your own; learn then, that I have none, absolutely none. Don't interrupt me now, for this avowal cuts me deeply; my own heart alone knows what I suffer as I record my wrecked fortunes, but I repeat it, my hopes are at an end for ever; but, Fred my boy, I cannot lose my friend too. If I have been the obstacle to your path I am so no more. Ask me not why; it is enough that I speak in all truth and sincerity. Ere three days I shall leave this, and with all the hopes that once beamed upon my fortunes, and all the happiness, nay, not all, my boy, for I feel some thrill at my heart yet as I think that I have been true to you."

I know not what more I spoke, nor how he replied to me. I felt the warm grasp of his hand, I saw his delighted smile; the words of grateful acknowledgments his lips uttered, conveyed but an imperfect meaning to my ear, and I remembered no more.

The courage which sustained me for the moment sunk gradually as I meditated over my avowal, and I could scarcely help accusing Power of a breach of friendship for exacting a confession which, in reality, I had volunteered to give him. How Lucy herself would think of my conduct was ever occurring to my thoughts, and I felt, as I ruminated upon the conjectures it might give rise to, how much more likely a favorable opinion might now be formed of me, than when such an estimation could have crowned me with delight. Yes, thought I, she will at least learn to know him, who loved her with truth and with devoted affection; and, when the blight of all his hopes is accomplished, the fair fame of his fidelity will be proved. The march, the bivouac, the battle-field, are now all to me; and the campaign alone presents a prospect which may fill up the aching void that disappointed and ruined hopes have left behind them.

How I longed for the loud call of the trumpet, the clash of the steel, the tramp of the war-horse, though the proud distinction of a soldier's life were less to me in the distance than the mad and whirlwind passion of a charge, and the loud din of the rolling artillery.

It was only some hours after, as I sat alone in my chamber, that all the circumstances of our meeting came back clearly to my memory, and I could not help muttering to myself, "It is indeed a hard lot, that to cheer the heart of my friend I must bear witness to the despair that sheds darkness on my own."

CHAPTER XVI....My Charger.

Although I felt my heart relieved of a heavy load by the confession I had made to Power, yet still I shrank from meeting him for some days after; a kind of fear lest he should in any way recur to our conversation continually beset me, and I felt that the courage which bore me up for my first effort would desert me on the next occasion.

My determination to join my regiment was now made up, and I sent forward a resignation of my appointment to Sir George Dashwood's staff, which I had never been in health to fulfil, and commenced with energy all my preparations for a speedy departure.

The reply to my rather formal letter was a most kind note written by himself. He regretted the unhappy case which had so long separated us, and though wishing, as he expressed it, to have me near him, perfectly approved of my resolution.

"Active service alone, my dear boy, can ever place you in the position you ought to occupy, and I rejoice the more at your decision in this matter, as I feared the truth of certain reports here, which attribute to you other plans than those which a campaign suggests. My mind is now easy on this score, and I pray you forgive me if my congratulations are mal à propos."

After some hints for my future management, and a promise of some letters to his friends at head-quarters, he concludes:

"As this climate does not seem to suit my daughter, I have applied for a change, and am in daily hope of obtaining it. Before going, however, I must beg your acceptance of the charger which my groom will deliver to your servant with this. I was so struck with his figure and action, that I purchased him before leaving England without well knowing why or wherefore. Pray let him see some service under your auspices, which he was most unlikely to do under mine. He has plenty of bone to be a weight-carrier, and they tell me also that he has speed enough for anything."

Mike's voice in the lawn beneath interrupted my reading farther, and on looking out I perceived him and Sir George Dashwood's servant standing beside a large and striking-looking horse, which they were both examining with all the critical accuracy of adepts.

"Arrah, is n't he a darling, a real beauty every inch of him?"

"That 'ere splint don't signify nothing; he aren't the worse of it," said the English groom.

"Of course it does n't," replied Mike. "What a forehead! and the legs, clean as a whip."

"There 's the best of him, though," interrupted the other, patting the strong hind-quarters with his hand.

"There 's the stuff to push him along through heavy ground and carry him over timber."

"Or a stone wall," said Mike, thinking of Galway.

My own impatience to survey my present had now brought me into the enclosure, and before many minutes were over I had him saddled, and was carolling around the lawn with a spirit and energy I had not felt for months long. Some small fences lay before me, and over these he carried me with all the ease and freedom of a trained hunter. My courage mounted with the excitement, and I looked eagerly around for some more bold and dashing leap.

"You may take him over the avenue gate," said the English groom, divining with a jockey's readiness what I looked for; "he 'll do it, never fear him."

Strange as my equipment was, an undress jacket flying loosely open, and a bare head, away I went. The gate which the groom spoke of was a strongly barred one of oak timber, nearly five feet high—its difficulty as a leap only consisted in the winding approach to it, and the fact that it opened upon a hard road beyond it.

In a second or two a kind of half fear came across me. My long illness had unnerved me, and my limbs felt weak and yielding; but as I pressed into the center, that secret sympathy between the horse and his rider shot suddenly through me, I pressed my spurs to his flanks and dashed him at it.

Unaccustomed to such treatment, the noble animal bounded madly forward; with two tremendous plunges, he sprang wildly into the air, and shaking his long mane with passion, stretched out at the gallop.

My own blood boiled now as tempestuously as his; and with a shout of reckless triumph I rose him at the gate. Just at the instant two figures appeared before it—the corpse had concealed their approach hitherto—but they stood now as if transfixed: the wild attitude of the horse, the not less wild cry of his rider, had deprived them for the time of all energy, and overcome by the sudden danger, they seemed rooted to the ground. What I said, spoke, begged, or imprecated, heaven knows—not I; but they stirred not! One moment more, and they must lie trampled beneath my horse's hoofs. He was already on his haunches for the bound; when wheeling half aside, I faced him at the wall—it was at least a foot higher, and of solid stone masonry—and as I did so, I felt that I was periling my life to save theirs. One vigorous dash of the spur I gave him as I lifted him to the leap. He bounded beneath it quick as lightning—still with a spring like a rocket he rose into the air, cleared the wall, and stood trembling and frightened on the road outside.

"Safe, by Jupiter! and splendidly done, too," cried a voice near me, that I immediately recognized as Sir George Dashwood's.

"Lucy, my love, look up; Lucy, my dear, there's no danger now. She has fainted. O'Malley, fetch some water—fast. Poor fellow, your own nerves seem shaken—why you 've let your horse go; come here, for heaven's sake; support her for an instant; I 'll fetch some water."

It appeared to me like a dream. I leaned against the pillar of the gate; the cold and death-like features of Lucy Dashwood lay motionless upon my arm; her hand falling heavily upon my shoulder, touched my cheek; the tramp of my horse, as he galloped onward, was the only sound that broke the silence, as I stood there, gazing steadfastly upon the pale brow and paler cheek, down which a solitary tear was slowly stealing. I know not how the minutes passed—my memory took no note of time—but at length a gentle tremor thrilled her frame, a slight, scarce perceptible blush colored her fair face, her lips slightly parted, and heaving a deep sigh, she looked around her, and gradually her eyes turned and met mine. Oh, the bliss unutterable of that moment! It was no longer the look of cold scorn she had given me last—the expression was one of soft and speaking gratitude; she seemed to read my very heart, and know its truth. There was a tone of deep and compassionate interest in the glance; and forgetting all—everything that had passed—all save my unaltered, unalterable love, I kneeled beside her, and, in words burning as my own heart burned, poured out my tale of mingled sorrow and affection, with all the eloquence of passion. I vindicated my unshaken faith, reconciling the conflicting evidences with the proofs I proffered of my attachment. If my moments were measured, I spent them not idly. I called to witness how every action of my soldier's life emanated from her—how her few and chance words had decided the character of my fate, if aught of fame or honor were my portion, to her I owed it. As hurried onwards by my ardent hopes, I forgot Power and all about him, a step on the gravel walk came rapidly nearer, and I had but time to assume my former attitude beside Lucy, as her father came up.

"Well, Charles, is she better? Oh, I see she is—here we have the whole household at our heels"—so saying, he pointed to a string of servants pressing eagerly forward with every species of restoratives that Portuguese ingenuity has invented."

The next moment we were joined by the senhora, who, pale with fear, seemed scarcely less in need of assistance than her friend.

Amid questions innumerable—explanations sought for on all sides—mistakes, and misconceptions as to the whole occurrence—we took our way towards the villa, Lucy walking between Sir George and Donna Inez, while I followed, leaning upon Power's arm.

"They've caught him again, O'Malley," said the General, turning half round to me; "he seemed too much frightened as any of us."

"It is time, Sir George, I should think of thanking you. I never was so mounted in my life—"

"A splendid charger, by Jove," said Power; "but, Charley my lad, no more feats of this nature, if you love me: no girl's heart will stand such continual assaults as your winning horsemanship submits it to."

I was about making some half angry reply, when he continued, "There, do n't look sulky, I have news for you. Quill has just arrived. I met him at Lisbon; he has got leave of absence for a few days, and is coming to our masquerade here this evening."

"This evening!" said I, in amazement; "why is it so soon?"

"Of course it is. Have you not got all your trappings ready? The Dashwoods came out here on purpose to spend the day—but come, I'll drive you into town. My library is ready, and we'll both look out for our costumes." So saying, he led me along towards the house, when, after a rapid change of my toilet, we set out for Lisbon.

CHAPTER XVII....Maurice.

It seemed a conceded matter between Power and myself that we should never recur to the conversation we held in the garden; and so, although we dined tête à tête that day, neither of us ventured by any allusion the most distant, to advert to what it was equally evident, was uppermost in the minds of both.

All our endeavors, therefore, to seem easy and unconcerned, were in vain; a restless anxiety to seem interested about things and persons we were totally indifferent to, pervaded all our essays at conversation. By degrees, we grew weary of the parts we were acting, and each relapsed into a moody silence, thinking over his plans and projects, and totally forgetting the existence of the other.

The decanter was passed across the table without speaking, a half nod intimated the bottle was standing, and except an occasional malediction upon an intractable cigar, nothing was heard.

Such was the agreeable occupation we were engaged in, when, towards nine o'clock, the door opened, and the great Maurice himself stood before us.

"Pleasant fellows, upon my conscience, and jovial over their liquor; confound your smoking; that may do very well in a bivouac. Let us have something warmer!"

Quill's interruption was a most welcome one to both parties, and we rejoiced with a sincere pleasure at his coming.

"What shall it be, Maurice? Port or sherry mulled, and an anchovy?"

"Or what say you to a bowl of bishop?" said I.

"Hurra for the church, Charley, let us have the bishop; and, not to disparage Fred's taste, we'll be eating the anchovy while the liquor's concocting."

"Well, Maurice, and now for the news. How are matters at Torres Vedras? Any thing like movement in that quarter?"

"Nothing very remarkable. Massena made a reconnaissance some days since, and one of our batteries threw a shower of grape among the staff, which spoiled the procession, and sent them back in very disorderly time. Then we've had a few skirmishes to the front with no great results—a few court-martials—bad grub and plenty of grumbling."

"Why, what would they have? It's a great thing to hold the French army in check, within a few marches of Lisbon."

"Charley, my man, who cares two-pence for the French army, or Lisbon, or the Portuguese, or the junta, or any thing about it; every man is pondering over his own affairs. One fellow wants to get home again, and be sent upon some recruiting station. Another wishes to get a step or two in promotion, to come to Torres Vedras, where even the grand armée can't. Then some of us are in love, and some more of us are in debt. There is neither glory nor profit to be had: but here's the bishop, smoking and steaming with an odour of nectar."

"And our fellows, have you seen them lately?"

"I dined with yours on Tuesday—was it Tuesday? Yes; I dined with them. By-the-by, Sparks was taken prisoner that morning."

"Sparks taken prisoner! poor fellow. I am sincerely sorry. How did it happen, Maurice?"

"Very simply. Sparks had a forage patrol toward Yieda, and set out early in the morning with his party. It seemed that they succeeded perfectly, and were returning to the lines; when poor Sparks, always susceptible where the sex are concerned, saw, or thought he saw, a lattice gently open as he rode from the village, and a very taper finger make a signal to him. Dropping a little behind the rest, he waited till his men had debauched upon the road, when, riding quietly up, he coughed a couple of times to attract the fair unknown—a handkerchief waved in reply, from the lattice which was speedily closed, and our valiant cornet accordingly dismounted and entered the house."

"The remainder of the adventure is soon told; for, in a few seconds after, two men mounted on one horse were seen galloping at top speed towards the French lines. The foremost being a French officer of the fourth cuirassiers—the gentleman with his face to the tail, our friend Sparks; the lovely unknown being a vieille moustache of Loisson's corps, who had been in a skirmish some days before, and lay waiting an opportunity of rejoining his party. One of our prisoners knew this fellow well; he had been promoted from the ranks, and was a Hercules for feats of strength: so that, after all, Sparks could not help himself."

"Well, I'm really sorry, but, as you say, Sparks' tender nature is always the ruin of him."

"Of him! ay and of you—and of Power—and of myself—of all of us. Isn't it the sweet creatures that make fools of us from Father Adam down to Maurice Quill; neither sparing age nor rank in the service—half-pay, nor the veteran battalion it's all one. Pass the jug there, O'Shaughnessy—"

"Ah, by-the-by, how 's the major?"

"Charmingly: only a little bit in a scrape just now. Sir Arthur—Lord Wellington I mean—had him up for his fellows being caught pillaging, and gave him a devil of a rowing a few days ago."

"Very disorderly corps yours, Major O'Shaughnessy," said the General; "more men up for punishment than any regiment in the service."

"Shaugh muttered something, but his voice was lost in a loud cock-a-doodle-doo, that some bold chanticler set up at the moment."

"If the officers do their duty, Major O'Shaughnessy, these acts of insubordination cannot occur."

"Cock-a-doo-doo-doo, was the reply. Some of the staff found it hard not to laugh; but the General went on."

"If, therefore, the practice does not cease, I 'll draft the men into West India regiments."

"Cock-a-doo-doo-doo."

"And if any articles pillaged from the inhabitants are detected in the quarters, or about the person of the troops—"

"Cock-a-doo-doo-doo," screamed louder here than ever.

"Damn that cock. Where is it?"

"There was a general look around on all sides, which seemed in vain; when a tremendous repetition of the cry resounded from O'Shaughnessy's coat pocket: thus detecting the valiant Major himself in the very practice of his corps. There was no standing this: every one burst out into a peal of laughing; and Lord Wellington himself could not resist, but turned away muttering to himself as he went—'Damn'd robbers—every man of them,' while a final war note from the Major's pocket closed the interview."

"Confound you, Maurice; you 've always some villainous narrative or other. You never crossed a street for shelter without making something out of it."

"True this time, as sure as my name 's Maurice; but the bowl is empty?"

"Never mind, here comes its successor. How long can you stay amongst us?"

"A few days at most. Just took a run off to see the sights; I was all over Lisbon this morning: saw the Inquisition and the cells, and the place where they tried the fe l lows—the kind of grand jury room, with the great picture of Adam and Eve at the end of it. What a beautiful creature she is! hair down to her waist, and such eyes! 'Ah, ye darling!' said I to myself, small blame to him for what he did. Would n't I ate every crab in the garden, if ye asked me!"

"I must certainly go see her, Maurice. Is she very Portuguese in her style?"

"Devil a bit of it. She might be a Limerick woman, with elegant brown hair, and blue eyes, and a skin like snow."

"Come, come, they've pretty girls in Lisbon too, doctor."

"Yes, faith," said Power, "that they have."

"Nothing like Ireland, boys; not a bit of it; they're the girls for my money; and where's the man can resist them? From St. Patrick, that had to go live in the Wicklow mountains—"

"St. Kevin, you mean, doctor."

"Sure it's all the same, they were twins. I made a little song about them one evening last week—the women I mean."

"Let's have it, Maurice; let's have it, old fellow. What's the measure?"

"Short measure: four little verses, devil a more."

"But the time, I mean?"

"Whenever you like to sing it—here it is:"

THE GIRLS OF THE WEST.

Air—"Tiddy ye Gander."
With feeling—but not too slow.

I.
You may talk, if you please,
Of the brown Portuguese,
But, wherever you roam, wherever you roam,
You nothing will meet,
Half so lovely or sweet,
As the girls at home, the girls at home.

II.
Their eyes are not sloes,
Nor so long is their nose,
But, between me and you, between me and you,
They are just as alarming,
And ten times more charming,
With hazel and blue, with hazel and blue.

III.
They do n't ogle a man,
O'er the top of their fan,
Till his heart's in a flame, his heart's in a flame,
But though bashful and shy,
They've a look in their eye,
That just comes to the same, just comes to the same.

IV.
No mantillas they sport,
But a petticoat short,
Shows an ankle the best, an ankle the best,
And a leg; but, O murdher!
I dare not go further,
So here's to the West; so here's to the West.

"Now that really is a sweet little thing. Moore's, is n't it?"

"Not a bit of it; my own muse, every word of it."

"And the music?" said I.

"My own, too. Too much spice in that bowl; that's an invariable error in your deivers of drink, to suppose that the tittle you start with, can please your palate to the last; they forget that as we advance either in years or lush, our tastes simplify."

"Nous ravons aux premieres amours. Is n't that it?"
"No, not exactly, for we go even farther; for if you mark the progression of a sensible man's fluids, you'll find what an emblem of life it presents to you. What is his invariable glass of chablis that he throws down with his oysters, but the budding expectancy of boyhood—the appetizing sense of pleasure to come; then follows the sherry, with soup, that warming glow, which strength and vigor, in all their consciousness impart, as a glimpse of life is opening before him. Then youth succeeds—buoyant, wild, tempestuous youth—foaming and sparkling, like the bright champagne, whose stormy surface subsides into a myriad of bright stars."

"Œil de Perdeux."

"Not a bit of it; woman's own eye; brilliant, sparkling, life-giving—"

"Devil take the fellow, he's getting poetical."

"Ah, Fred! if that could only last; but one must come to the burgundies with his maturer years. Your first glass of hermitage is the algebraic sign for five and thirty—the glorious burst is over; the pace is still good to be sure, but the great enthusiasm is past. You can afford to look forward—but, confound it, you've a long way to look back also."

"I say, Charley, our friend has contrived to finish the bishop during his disquisition; the bowl's quite empty."

"You do n't say so, Fred. To be sure, how a man does forget himself in abstract speculations; but let us have a little more, I've not concluded my homily."

"Not a glass, Maurice; it's already past nine; we are pledged to the masquerade, and before we've dressed and got there, it will be late enough."

"But I'm not disguised yet, my boy, nor half."

"Well, they must take you au naturel, as they do your countrymen the potatoes."

"Yes, doctor, Fred's right; we had better start."

"Well, I can't help it; I've recorded my opposition to the motion, but I must submit; and now that I'm on my legs, explain to me what's that very dull looking old lamp up there."

"That's the moon, man; the full moon."

"Well, I've no objection; I'm full too; so come along, lads."

CHATER XVIII.—The Masquerade.

To form one's impression of a masked ball from the attempts at this mode of entertainment in our country, is but to conceive a most imperfect and erroneous notion. With us the first coup d'œil is every thing; the nuns, the shepherdesses, the Turks, sailors, eastern princes, watchmen, moonshoes, mile-stones, devils, and quakers, are all very well in their way, as they pass in review before us, but when we come to mix in the crowd, we discover that except the turban and the cowl, the crook and the broad-brim, no further disguise is attempted or thought of. The nun, forgetting her vow and her vestments, is flirting with the devil; the watchman, a very fastidious elegant, is ogling the fishwoman through his glass, while the quaker is performing a pas-sed Alberti might be proud of, in a quadrille of riotous Turks and half-tipsy Hindoos; in fact, the whole wit of the scene consists in absurd associations; apart from this, the actors have rarely any claims upon your attention; for even supposing a person to clever enough to sustain his character, whatever it be, you must also supply the other personages of the drama; or, in stage phrase, he'll have nothing to play up to. What would be Bardolf without Pistol? what Sir Lucius O'Trigger without Acres? It is the relief which throws out the disparities and contradictions of life which affords us most amusement; hence it is, that one swallow can no more make a summer than one well-sustained character can give life to a masquerade. Without such sympathies, such points of contact, all the leading features of the individual, making him act and be acted upon are lost; the characters being mere parallel lines, which, however near they approach, never bisect or cross each other.

This is not the case abroad: the domino, which serves for mere concealment, is almost the only dress assumed, and the real disguise is therefore thrown from necessity upon the talents, whatever they be, of the wearer. It is no longer a question of a beard or a spangled mantle, a Polish dress or a pasteboard nose; the mutation of voice, the assumption of a different manner, walk, gesture, and mode of expression, are all necessary, and no small tact is required to effect this successfully.

I may be pardoned this little digression, as it serves to explain in some measure how I felt on entering the splendidly lit up salons of the villa, crowded with hundreds of figures in all the varied costumes of a carnival. The sounds of laughter, mingled with the crash of the music, the hurrying hither and thither of servants with refreshments, the crowds gathered around fortune-tellers, whose predictions threw the parties at each moment into shouts of merriment; the eager following of some disappointed domino, interrogating every one to find out a lost mask. For some time I stood an astonished spectator at the kind of secret intelligence which seemed to pervade the whole assemblage, when suddenly a mask, who for some time had been standing beside me, whispered in French,—

"If you pass your time in this manner, you must not feel surprised if your place be occupied."

I turned hastily round, but she was gone. She, I say, for the voice was clearly a woman's; her pink domino could be no guide, for hundreds of the same color passed me every instant; the meaning of the allusion I had little doubt of. I turned to speak to Power, but he was gone, and for the first moment in my life the bitterness of rivalry crossed my mind. It was true I had resigned all pretensions in his favor; my last meeting with Lucy had been merely to justify my own character against an impression that weighed heavily on me; still I thought he might have waited—another day and I should be far away, neither to witness or grieve over his success.

"You still hesitate," whispered some one near me.

I wheeled round suddenly but could not detect the speaker, and was again relapsing into my own musings, when the same voice repeated,

"The white domino with the blue cape. Adieu."

Without waiting to reflect upon the singularity of the occurrence, I now hurried along through the dense crowd, searching on every side for the domino.

"Is n't that O'Malley?" said an Englishman to his friend.

"Yes," replied the other, "the very man we want. O'Malley, find a partner; we have been searching a vis-à-vis this ten minutes." The speaker was an officer I had met at Sir George Dashwood's.

"How did you discover me?" said I suddenly.

"Not a very difficult thing, if you carry your mask in your hand that way," was the answer.

And I now perceived, that in the distraction of my thoughts I had been carrying my mask in this manner since coming into the room.

"There now, what say you to the blue domino. I saw her foot, and a girl with such an instep must be a waltzer."

I looked round, a confused effort at memory passing across my mind; my eyes fell at the instant upon the embroidered sleeve of the domino, where a rosebud worked in silver at once reminded me of Catrina's secret. Ah, thought I, La Senhora herself. She was leaning upon the arm of a tall and portly figure in black; who this was I knew not, nor sought to discover, but at once advancing towards Donna Inez asked her to waltz.

Without replying to me she turned towards her companion, who seemed as it were to press her acceptance of my offer; she hesitated, however, for an instant, and curtsying deeply, declined it. Well, thought I, she at least has not recognised me.

"And yet, senhora," said I, half jestingly, "I have seen you join a bolero before now."

"You evidently mistake me," was the reply, but in a voice so well feigned as almost to convince me she was right.

"Nay, more," said I, "under your own fair auspices did I myself first adventure one."

"Still in error, believe me; I am not known to you."

"And yet I have a talisman to refresh your memory should you dare me further."

At this instant my hand was grasped warmly by a passing mask. I turned round rapidly, and Power whispered in my ear—

"Yours for ever, Charley; you've made my fortune."

As he hurried on I could perceive that he supported a lady on his arm, and that she wore a loose white domino with a deep blue cape. In a second all thought of Inez was forgotten, and anxious only to conceal my emotion, I turned away and mingled in the crowd. Lost to all around me, I wandered carelessly, heedlessly on, neither noticing the glittering throng around, nor feeling a thought in common with the gay and joyous spirits that flitted by. The night wore on, my melancholy and depression growing ever deeper, yet so spell-bound was I that I could not leave the place. A secret sense that it was the last time we were to meet had gained entire possession of me, and I longed to speak a few words ere we parted for ever.

I was leaning at a window which looked out upon the court-yard, when suddenly the tramp of horses attracted my attention, and I saw by the light moonlight a group of mounted men whose long cloaks and tall helmets announced dragoons, standing around the porch. At the same moment the door of the salon opened, an officer in undress, splashed and travel-stained, entered. Making his way rapidly through the crowd, he followed the servant, who introduced him towards the supper-room. Thither the dense mass now pressed to learn the meaning of the singular apparition. While my own curiosity, not less excited, led me toward the door; as I crossed the hall, however, my progress was interrupted by a group of persons, among whom I saw an aid-de-camp of Lord Wellington's staff, narrating as it were, some piece of newly arrived intelligence. I had no time for further inquiry, when a door opened near me, and Sir George Dashwood, accompanied by several general officers, came forth; the officer I had first seen enter the ball-room along with them. Every one was by this time unmasked, and eagerly looking to hear what had occurred.

"Then, Dashwood, you'll send an orderly at once to Lisbon?" said an old general officer beside me.

"This instant, my Lord. I'll despatch an aid-de-camp. The troops shall be in marching order before noon. Oh, here's the man I want! O'Malley, come here. Mount your horse and dash into town: send for Brotherton and M'Gregor to quarters, and announce the news as quickly as possible."

"But what am I to announce, Sir George?"

"That the French are in retreat. Massena in retreat, my lad."

A tremendous cheer at this instant burst from the hundreds in the salon, who now heard the glorious tidings. Another cheer and another followed—ten thousand voices arose amid the crash of the band, as it broke into a patriotic war chant. Such a scene of enthusiasm and excitement I never witnessed. Some wept with joy. Others threw themselves into their friends' arms.

"They're all mad, every mother's son of them," said Maurice Quill, as he elbowed his way through the mass; "and here's an old vestal won't leave my arm. She has already embraced me three times, and we've finished a flask of Malaga between us."

"Come, O'Malley, are you ready for the road?"

My horse was by this time standing saddled at the font. I sprang at once to the saddle, and, without waiting for a second order, set out for Lisbon. Ten minutes had scarce elapsed—the very shouts of the delighted city were still ringing in my ears, when I was once again back at the villa. As I mounted the steps into the hall, a carriage drew up; it was Sir George Dashwood's; he came forward—his daughter leaning on his arm.

"Why, O'Malley, I thought you had gone."

"I have returned, Sir George. Colonel Brotherton is in waiting, and the staff also. I have received orders to set out for Benejos, where the 14th are stationed, and have merely delayed to say adieu."

"Adieu, my dear boy, and God bless you," said the warm-hearted old man, as he pressed my hand between both his. "Lucy, here's your old friend about to leave; come and say good-by."

Miss Dashwood had stopped behind to adjust her shawl. I flew to her assistance. "Adieu, Miss Dashwood, and for ever," said I, in a broken voice, as I took her hand in mine. "This is not your domino," said I, eagerly, as a blue silk one peeped from beneath her mantle; "and the sleeve, too—did you wear this?" She blushed slightly, and assented.

"I changed with the senhora, who wore mine all the evening."

"And Power, then, was not your partner?"

"I should think not—for I never danced?"

"Lucy, my love, are you ready? Come, be quick."

"Good-by, Mr. O'Malley, and au revoir n'est pas?"

I drew her glove from her hand, as she spoke, and pressing my lips upon her fingers, placed her within the carriage. "Adieu, and au revoir," said I; the carriage turned away, and a white glove was all that remained to me of Lucy Dashwood.

The carriage had turned the angle of the road, and its retiring sounds were growing gradually fainter, ere I recovered myself sufficiently to know where I stood. One absorbing thought alone possessed me. Lucy was not lost to me for ever; Power was not my rival in that quarter—that was enough for me. I needed no more to nerve my arm, and steel my heart. As I reflected thus, the long loud blast of a trumpet broke upon the silence of the night, and admonished me to depart. I hurried to my room to make my few preparations for the road, but Mike had already anticipated every thing here, and all was in readiness.

But one thing now remained—to make my adieu to the senhora. With this intent I descended a narrow winding stair which led from my dressing-room, and opened by a little terrace upon the flower-garden beside her apartments.

As I crossed the graveled alley, I could not but think of the last time I had been there. It was on the eve of my departure for the Douro. I recalled the few and fleeting moments of our leave-taking, and a thought flashed upon me,—what, if she cared for me! What, if, half in coquetry, half in reality, her heart was mixed up in those passages which daily association give rise to?

I could not altogether acquit myself of all desire to make her believe me her admirer; nay more, with the indolent abandon of my country, I had fallen into a thousand little schemes to cheat the long hours away, which having no other object than the happiness of the moment, might yet color all her life with sorrow.

Let no one rashly pronounce me a coxcomb, vain and pretentious, for all this. In my inmost heart I had no feeling of selfishness mingled with the consideration. It was from no sense of my own merits, no calculation of my own chances of success, that I thought thus. Fortunately, at eighteen, one's heart is uncontaminated with such an alloy of vanity. The first emotions of youth are pure and holy things, tempering our fiercer passions, and calming the rude effervescence of our boyish spirits; and when we strive to please, and hope to win affection, we insensibly fashion ourselves to nobler and higher thoughts, catching from the source of our devotion a portion of that charm that idealizes daily life, and makes our path in it a glorious and a bright one.

Who would not exchange all the triumphs of his later days, the proudest moments of successful ambition, the richest trophies of hard won daring, for the short and vivid flash that first shot through his heart and told him he was loved. It is the opening consciousness of life, the first sense of power that makes of the mere boy a man; a man in all his daring and his pride, and hence it is that in early life we feel ever prone to indulge those fancied attachments which elevate and raise us in our own esteem. Such was the frame of my mind as I entered the little boudoir, where once before I had ventured on a similar errand.

As I closed the sash-door behind me, the grey dawn of breaking day scarcely permitted my seeing any thing around me, and I felt my way toward the door of an adjoining room, where I supposed it was likely I should find the senhora. As I proceeded thus with cautious step and beating heart, I thought I heard a sound near me. I stopped and listened, and was about again to move on, when a half-stifled sob fell upon my ear. Slowly and silently guiding my steps toward the sound, I reached a sofa, when my eyes growing by degrees more accustomed to the faint light, I could detect a figure which, at a glance, I recognised as Donna Inez. A cashmere shawl was loosely thrown round her, and her face was buried in her hands. As she lay, to all seeming, still and insensible before me, her beautiful hair fell heavily upon her back and across her arm, and her whole attitude denoted the very abandonment to grief. A short convulsive shudder which slightly shook her frame alone gave evidence of life, except when a sob, barely audible in the death-like silence, escaped her.

I knelt silently down beside her, and gently withdrawing her hand placed it within mine. A dreadful feeling of self-condemnation shot through me as I felt the gentle pressure of her taper fingers, which rested without a struggle in my grasp. My tears fell hot and fast upon that pale hand, as I bent in sadness over it, unable to utter a word; a rush of conflicting thoughts passed through my brain, and I knew not what to do. I now had no doubt upon my mind that she loved me, and that her present affliction was caused by approaching departure.

"Dearest Inez," I stammered out at length, as I pressed her hands to my lips, "dearest Inez,"—a faint sob and a slight pressure of her hand was the only reply. "I have come to say good-by," continued I, gaining a little courage, as I spoke, "a long good-by, in all likelihood. You have heard that we are ordered away: there, do not sob, dearest, and believe me, I had wished ere we parted, to have spoken to you calmly and openly; but alas! I cannot: I scarcely know what I say."

"You will not forget me?"—said she in a low voice, that sunk into my very heart. "You will not forget me?" as she spoke, her hand dropped heavily upon my shoulder, and her rich luxuriant hair fell upon my cheek. What a devil of a thing is proximity to a downy cheek and a black eyelash, more especially when they belong to one, whom you are disposed to believe not indifferent to you. What I did at this precise moment there is no necessity for recording, even had not an adage interdicted such confessions, nor can I now remember what I said; but I can well recollect how, gradually warming with my subject, I entered into a kind of half declaration of attachment, intended most honestly to be a mere exposé of my own unworthiness to win her favor; and my resolution to leave Lisbon and its neighborhood for ever.

Let not any one blame me rashly if he has not experienced the difficulty of my position. The impetus of love-making is like the ardor of a fox-hunt. You care little that the six bar gate before you is the boundary of another gentleman's preserves, or the fence of his pleasure ground. You go slap along at a smashing pace, with your head up, and your hand low, clearing all before you. The opposing difficulties to your progress giving half the zest, because all the danger to your career. So it is with love; the gambling spirit urges one ever onward, and the chance of failure is a reason for pursuit, where no other argument exists. "And you do love me?" said the senhora, with a soft low whisper that most unaccountably suggested anything but comfort to me.

"Love you, Inez? By this kiss—I'm in an infernal scrape!" said I, muttering this last half sentence to myself.

"And you'll never be jealous again?"

"Never, by all that's lovely—your own sweet lips. That's the very last thing to reproach me with."

"And you'll promise not to mind that foolish boy? For, after all, you know, it was a mere flirtation—if even that."

"I'll never think of him again," said I, while my brain was burning to make out her meaning. "But, dearest, there goes the trumpet call!"

"And as for Pedro Mascarenhas, I never liked him."

"Are you quite sure, Inez?"

"I swear it—so no more of him. Gonzalez Cordenza—I've broke with him long since. So that you see, dearest Frederic—"

"Frederic," said I, starting almost to my feet with amazement, while she continued, "I'm your own, all your own."

"Oh, the coquette, the heartless jilt," groaned I, half aloud—"and O'Malley, Inez, poor Charley,—what of him?"

"Poor thing—I can't help him—but he's such a puppy, the lesson may do him good."

"But perhaps he loved you, Inez?"

"To be sure he did: I wished him to do so—I can't bear not to be loved—but, Frederic, tell me, may I trust you—will you keep faithful to me?"

"Sweetest Inez, by this last kiss I swear that such as I kneel before you now, you'll ever find me?"

A foot upon the gravel walk without, now called me to my feet—I sprang toward the door, and before Inez had lifted her head from the sofa, I had reached the garden. A figure muffled up in a cavalry cloak, passed near me, but without noticing me, and the next moment I had cleared the paling and was hurrying toward the stable where I had ordered Mike to be in waiting.

The faint streak of dull pink which announces the coming day, stretched beneath the dark clouds of the night, and the chill air of the morning was already stirring in the leaves.

As I passed along by a low beech hedge which skirted the avenue, I was struck by the sound of voices near me. I stopped to listen, and soon detected in one of the speakers my friend, Micky Free, of the other I was not long in ignorance.

"Love you, is it—bathershin? It's worship you—adore you, my darling—that's the word—there, acushla, don't cry—dry your eyes—oh, murther, it's a cruel thing to tear oneself away from the best of living, with the run of the house in drink and kissing. Bad luck to it for campaigning, any way, I never liked it!"

Catrina's reply—for it was her—I could not gather; but Mike resumed—

"Ay, just so, sore bones and wet grass, accadenté, and half rations. Oh, that I ever saw the day, when I took to it. Listen to me now, honey; here it is, on my knees I am before you, and thro' it's not more nor three, maybe four, young women I'd say the like to; had scam to me if I would n't marry you out of the face this blessed morning just as soon as I'd look at ye. Arrah, there now, don't be screeching and bawling; what'll the neighbors think of us, and my own heart's destroyed with grief entirely."

Poor Catrina's voice returned an inaudible answer, and not wishing any longer to play the eaves-dropper, I continued my path toward the stable. The distant noises from the city announced a state of movement and preparation, and more than one orderly passed the road near me at a gallop. As I turned into the wide court yard, Mike, breathless and flurried with running, overtook me.

"Are the horses ready, Mike?" said I; "we must start this instant."

"They've just finished a peck of oats a piece, and faix that same may be a stranger to them this day six months."

"And the baggage, too?"

"On the cars, with the staff and the light brigade. It was down there I was new to see all was right."

"Oh, I'm quite aware; and now bring out the cattle. I hope Catrina received your little consolations well. That seems a very sad affair."

"Murder, real murder, devil a less. It's no matter where you go, from Clonmel to Chaney, it's all one; they've a way of getting round you. Upon my soul it's like the pigs they are."

"Like pigs, Mike? That appears a strange compliment you've selected to pay them."

"Ay, just like the pigs, no less. Maybe you never heard what happened to myself up at Morroaho?"

"Look to that girth there. Well, go on."

"I was coming along one morning, just as day was beginning to break, when I sees a slip of a pig trotting before me, with nobody near him; but as the road was lonely, and myself rather down in heart, I thought, misha! but ye're fine company anyhow, av a body could only keep you with him. But, ye see, a pig—saving your presence—is a baste not easily flattered, so I did n't waste time and blarney upon him, but I took off my belt and put it round its neck as neat as need be; but as the devil's luck would have it, I did n't go half an hour when a horse came galloping up behind me. I turned round, and, by the blessed light, it was Sir Dinny himself was in it!"

"Sir Dinny Pack?"

"Yes, bad luck to his hook nose. 'What are you doing there, my fine fellow?' says he. 'What's that you have dragging there behind you?'"

"A boneen, sir," says I; "is n't he a fine crature?—av he was n't so troublesome."

"Troublesome, troublesome—what do you mean?"

"Just so," says I; "is n't he persecuting the life of me the whole morning, following me about everywhere I go? Contrary bastes they always was."

"I advise you to try and part company, my friend, notwithstanding," says he; "an' maybe it's the same end you'll be coming to, and not long either." And faix, I took his advice; and ye see, Mister Charles, it's just as I was saying, they're like the women, the least thing in life is enough to bring them after us, av ye only put the 'comether' upon them."

"And now adieu to the Villa Nuova," said I, as I rode slowly down the avenue, turning ever and anon in my saddle to look back on each well-known spot.

A heavy sigh from Mike responded to my words.

"A long, a last farewell," said I, waving my hand toward the trelliced walls now half hidden by the trees, and as I spoke, that heaviness of the heart came over me that seems inseparable from leave-taking. The hour of parting seems like a warning to us, that all our enjoyments and pleasures are here destined to a short and merely fleeting existence; and, as each scene of life passes away never to return, we are made to feel that youth and hope are passing with them; and that, although the fair world be as bright, and its pleasures as rich in abundance, our capacity of enjoyment is daily, hourly diminishing, and while all around us smiles in beauty and happiness, that we, alas, are not what we were.

Such was the tenor of my thoughts as I reached the road, when they were suddenly interrupted by my man Mike, whose meditations were following a somewhat similar channel, though at last inclining to different conclusions. He coughed a couple of times, as if to attract my attention, and then, as it were half thinking aloud, he muttered—

"I wonder if we treated the young ladies well, any how, Mister Charles, for faix I've my doubts on it."

THINGS WHICH DON'T OFTEN HAPPEN.—The Boston Transcript thinks events like the following are of rare occurrence:—"Despising a well dressed roguery—honoring merit and virtue in rags—dispensing with luxuries in order to be charitable—paying tailors in advance—patronising real skill and merit instead of quackery—suffering a man in misfortune to go by without helping him along with a kick—reading the standard and classic poets when the country weekly papers furnish a regular supply of 'original poetry'—milkmen neglecting to increase their stock in trade by the addition of water—lawyers and doctors refusing to receive fees on account of the poverty of their clients or patients."

FATHER AND SON.—In the Senate of this state are two gentlemen of the name of Plumb, who hold the relation to one another of father and son. We do not recollect to have heard of a similar circumstance in any other legislative body.—[Hartford Courant.

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1841.

ENLARGEMENT OF THE NEW WORLD.

We have the satisfaction to announce to the numerous readers of our paper, that, in consequence of the great success which has attended the NEW WORLD from the first day of its publication to this, and on account of the recent accessions to our list of subscribers, we have determined to enlarge its dimensions, from the first of July next, BEING THE PERIOD OF THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE NEW QUARTO VOLUME.

The Quarto Volume of the New World, to commence on the first of July, will be considerably increased in size, and will contain four printed columns on each page, instead of three as heretofore. Thus each number will hereafter consist of sixteen elegantly printed pages—SIXTY-FOUR COLUMNS—one half more "matter" than the ALBION, literary journal, which is sold at Six Dollars a year, and as much as the SPIRIT OF THE TIMES, sporting journal, which is sold at Ten Dollars a year, and three times as much as the NEW YORK MIRROR, a journal of taste, which is sold at Five Dollars a year. The Terms of the Quarto New World will not be altered, but continue to be Three Dollars for one year, or Five Dollars for two years.

The Folio Edition will contain nine columns on each page, instead of eight.

THE MARCH OF INTELLECT.

[The following eloquent remarks, uttered in a tone of truthful indignation, are extracted from a lecture, pronounced during the last season before one of our literary societies by Charles F. Hoffman, Esq., author of "A Winter in the West," and "Greyslaer." They are a just rebuke to that innovating, proud and tyrannical spirit, which wrongs and oppresses while it professes to improve and enlighten.]

Commerce, I fear, and not the indignant soul of national honor—the grasping spirit of Commerce must be held responsible for that audacious insult to humanity which the most powerful and enlightened nation in the world is at this moment perpetrating in China! The language is strong but believe it to be justifiable! Justifiable not the less because the civilized world, as it stands agape with eager curiosity to behold the dismemberment of the Celestial Empire, seems wholly unmindful that the annals of nations do not present a more gross and flagrant instance of the invasion of human rights!

Philosophers indeed—and I grieve to have heard of such among the ripest statesmen of our own land,—philosophers may, in contemplation of the conquest of China, seek to reconcile humanity to the outrage, by preaching to us the regenerating effect of the march of mind among a decayed and benighted people. That march of mind! The murderous wheels of her own Juggernaut were merciful to its crushing footsteps in Southern and Central India. Yet philosophy or "enlightened philanthropy," rather, (so called,) can see a blessed dispensation for Asia, for the human race at large, in its onward progress through the sister realms of the fated earth!

But when was moral sophistry wanting in the world to apologise for the brilliant exercise of Power, however debauched and misapplied?

If the territories of rude tribes are to be ravished from them, it tells us that savage man occupies too much room with his wild hunting grounds; (an argument, by the way, that in crowded Europe would cut up the park of every nobleman into two acre lots!) if the ports and cities of a remote and inoffensive people are to be seized, and the people themselves to be trampled upon, it tells us that they are a dwindled and dotard race—laggards behind the age, who need the whip and the spur to quicken their sluggish pace—a stultified race which knows not how to use the advantages which God has given them—advantages of which they were in possession a thousand years before the birth of modern European civilization. The wild Indian has no rights because he belongs to a new people. He is a mere child of nature, who has not yet come to a majority, and therefore can claim no estate in the earth which God gave to us all. The tame Indian, as the Chinaman may well be called, should have his claims to the enjoyment of our common patrimony set aside because he is in his driving dotage, and needs younger and bricker spirits to look after his affairs.

A high morality—a most expansive benevolence this!

It is true that this worn-out and effeminate race still manage by frugality and industry to support the most redundant population within their confines. But what are the homely virtues of frugality and industry compared with the blessings which the steam-engine will confer upon them? Absurd people! they might with its wonderful mechanical aid get along with half the exercise of these self-denying virtues!

Shall we not also give them that still mightier engine of our social system, that searching and all-controlling machine called "public opinion!" Shall we not give them this in exchange for the antiquated Patriarchal system which is said so intimately to regulate their households and influence their lives? Foolish people! Do they not know that the onward progress of our Anglo-Saxon race always bears the antidote where it scatters a bane? Will not the march of mind that forces the drunken drug upon them bring also our temperance societies along with it?

It is true, that in this instance the march of mind is the march of an invading army. But that Christian army—fresh from its last year's slaughter in Afghanistan—hot with the present taste of blood in Syria—will it not tell them that "Wars are over in this enlightened age?"

Alas! that the disciples of the gentle and just-minded Confucius should so little comprehend the benovolent errand of those who call themselves after a still gentler, a far holier teacher! What though the bayonet of the soldier must, in their unhappy case, precede the ferule of "the school-master!" What though the trampled homes of their affections must, for a season, be converted into the barracks of a fierce and brutal soldiery!—will not "the schools and academies," that will succeed in turn, compensate for the lost endearments of wife, children, and friends?

I would not be interpreted, while holding up this wretched cant to the scorn of thinking men—I would not be interpreted in anything I have said about the so-called march of mind, as undervaluing those glorious triumphs in mechanical science by which the real progress of our race, in one department of mind, may be traced with so much certainty. But, beneficial as its fruits have been in some instances, I confess myself to have little faith and less sympathy in that meddling, society-mongering, power-usurping spirit which is now abroad in the world under the taking name of "the march of the human intellect"—a spirit that would substitute a sort of universal moral mechanism for the personal exercises of the virtues of the heart; the outward pressure of combinations of men for the inward training of the individual man; legions of self-constituted schoolmasters for the fireside lessons of HOME.

Like every other species of fanaticism that has ever vexed the world, it doubtless is well-meaning in its views. But while I regard those views as founded upon a most shallow philosophy—the philosophy of the head and not of the heart—a system of ethics in which every principle of conduct refers first to expediency and last to God—I am appalled at its extension under the vicious shapes in which I see it coiling around society. I shrink with doubt and suspicion from its prying, inquisitorial practices at home. I recoil with fear and alarm from its meddling proselytism abroad; and, when that ardor of proselytism harries it so far as to excuse the tyrannical and armed invasion of an innocent people, which has not yet been subjected to any of its Procrustean operations,—I see only in these standard-bearers in the march of human improvement, the enemies of humanity itself. I revolt from their dogmas with indignation and disgust.

From our Foreign Correspondent.

LONDON, May 1, 1841.

LITERARY.—I send you Campbell's life of Petrarch, which is published to-day, and appears, from a rapid glance to be extremely interesting. The Memoirs and Journals of the late L. E. L. with several of her unpublished writings, edited by Laman Blanchard, will be out in a few days. You will probably receive an early copy per next steamer. With this you will have "The Fawn of Spring Vale," and other new tales by Carleton, author of the Traits and stories of the Irish Peasantry—also the first number of George Cruikshank's "Omniibus"—which is running a great business here—8,000 faces the first week. You will find a great deal of fun in this. "Summer Morning," a charming new poem by Thomas Miller, the Basket-Maker, author of "Rural Sketches," &c. is also enclosed. These seem to be the most attractive among the novelties.

Mr. Silk Buckingham has done three goodly octavos, (price two guineas) of his American Researches, dedicated to Prince Albert, who "condescended to observe," to Mr. B., "that the feelings of good-will toward the American people under which the work was undertaken could not fail, at the present moment, of producing a desirable effect."

Dana's "Two Years Before the Mast," has had an immense run here. Mr. Moxon told me that he had sold seven thousand, and that the Lords of the Admiralty had ordered 100 copies for the use of the Navy. Bulwer, Lord Brougham, and others had praised it in warm terms. It was reprinted also by a cheap man in Fleet street, who told me that he sold 5000 copies in a fortnight, at 1s. per copy.

The work of Dr. Grant, the American missionary to Persia, on the Nestorian Christians, and their identity with the lost tribes—etc., is to be published next week by Mr. Murray; who is also bringing out Dr. Robinson's important work on the Geography of Palestine. One of these days they will begin to think here that the benighted Americans can do something in literary operations, "as well as others."

Of the recent publications, the following may be mentioned:—Borrow's account of the Gypsies of Spain; (very curious;) Corse de Leon, a new novel by James; De Clifford, or the Constant Man, by Ward; The Love Match, by Mrs. Maberley; The Philosophy of Mystery, by W. C.

Dendy; The Religion, Agriculture, etc., of the ancient Egyptians, by Sir I. G. Wilkinson; a new edition of Dean Swift's works, in two large volumes, edited by Roscoe, and containing some new pieces; The Election, a Poem—"very original and spirited"; A History of Duelling, by Dr. Millingen; Titmarsh's Comic Tales, with Yellow-Plush Correspondence, etc., collected, 2 volumes; A History of the Fine Arts in Britain, by W. S. Taylor; The Literature of Italy, by L. Mariotti; A Selection of the Despatches of the Duke of Wellington, in one large volume; Discoveries in Ancient Lycia—a Second Journey to Asia Minor, by Charles Fellows, Esq., etc., etc.

Mr. Catlin's work on the Indians is to be published about the first of June in two large volumes, with 400 plates. He has autograph signatures of the Queen, Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, Queen Dowager, and several of the nobility, in his subscription-book.

The National Intelligencer states that the "National Institution for the Promotion of Science" is rapidly "going ahead." At the last meeting, letters were read from various parts of the world, promising collections, books, and communications, and announcing such as were already on the way.

It is well known that Mr. Secretary WEBSTER, upon his accession to the Department of State, allowed the Institution to use the spacious unoccupied apartment and rooms in the basement story of the new Patent Office, where the collection already in the possession of the Institution is now being arranged; and Mr. Secretary BADGER has entrusted to the care of the Institution the extensive and interesting collection of specimens in all branches of Natural History, lately received from the Exploring Squadron, in the preparing and arranging of which accomplished naturalists are now engaged. Animated by an equal zeal for whatever will advance the history and science of his country, Mr. BELL, Secretary at War, has entrusted to the Institution the whole interesting collection of Indian Portraits, which has heretofore hung on the walls of the War Office passage. We understand, also, that with the Portraits will be sent a fine collection of Indian curiosities.

MIDSHIPMEN'S APPOINTMENTS.—It is stated in the Madisonian, that during the seven and a half months between July 17, 1840, and March 3, 1841, inclusive, the number of midshipmen appointed was SEVENTY-FIVE. Of these, twenty were appointed between July, 1840, and January following; fifty-five were appointed during January and February, and the first day of March, 1841; and of these, eighteen were appointed during the three last days of the late reign, and fourteen of this number on the 3d of March.

DEATH OF MASTER HUGHES.—Master Hughes, the young musician from Wales, who with two younger brothers has travelled considerably over this country on a professional tour, was drowned in the Hudson river last week. Being up at Newburg they were induced to go upon the river, in a sail boat, to see the fishermen raise their nets. By some mismanagement the boat was upset, and the eldest of the boys, Joseph T. Hughes, aged 14, was carried away by the current and drowned. The others of the party, six in number, were saved.

ST. DOMINGO.—A French Naval officer gives the following sad account of the condition of the formerly rich and flourishing island of Hayti:

"We embarked on board the Nereide, on the 24th December. On the 25th we were at fort Royal, to receive orders from the Admiral who despatched us on the 29th to St. Domingo, where we were to take on board the five millions of francs which the Consul General had informed us were ready. We have been three days at anchor in this famous republic, and all that I can say to you of the misery of the people, will scarce suffice to give you any idea of it.

I have been every where, and every where have seen nothing but degradation and corruption. Men in rags compose the army, and exhibit a most ludicrous military masquerade. Cavalry on foot, manoeuvre like horses, at the word of command, trot, gallop, &c. Both officers and soldiers are without shoes: one has spurs tied by a cord to his naked feet, another has made himself spurs with a piece of iron drove into a wooded sole tied to his foot, and one whole company which I inspected minutely, had not a single musket which would go off. The officers, in rags, ask charity.

Slothfulness, poverty in its most hideous form—and in the negro it is most hideous, alone meet your eye at the town of Port au Prince. The fields are overrun by brambles, logwood trees, and the rapacious lichens, which obstruct the roads and destroy the old plantations. With the exceptions of a few gardens which are here and there cultivated by the negroes—gardens far inferior to those of our worst slaves—there is no cultivation whatever.

The only product of the island is coffee, and that every year diminishes so materially, that the time is not far distant when it will produce none at all. No more is planted, and the old coffee plantations are not even taken care of. The owners gather the crops from their own field, in the midst of briars and weeds—no laborers being to be had the one not being willing to work for the other."

☞ The steamship Britannia sailed from Boston on Sunday, with 77 passengers for Liverpool and 4 for Halifax—all she could take. Applications from 30 more were from necessity refused.

SOUTH AMERICAN ANTIQUITIES.—A paper was lately read before the Royal Geographical Society in London, by Lord John Russell, containing an itinerary of a journey of Lieut. Caddy and Mr. Watson, from Belize to the celebrated ruins of Palatay in Guatemala. The account says:

"Notwithstanding their grandeur and immense extent, they were not known to travellers until the latter part of the last century, when it required the aid of 100 Indians to cut down the trees by which they were surrounded, so profuse was the vegetation. The remains were evidently of Egypto-Indian architecture, and in them was seen the true Saracenic arch, which has not hitherto been met with out of the country of the Saracens. The travellers were 48 days in the ruins, making sketches, and returning to Belize through a country rich in every variety of natural produce, and with which an extensive and advantageous commerce with Great Britain might be carried on."

WESTERN RAILROAD.—60,000 hogs are now annually brought to Brighton, from the neighborhood of Albany and Troy. It is calculated that the number will be increased from two to four fold, by the completion of the Western Railroad, and the facility it will furnish to bring them.

30,000 head of cattle are slaughtered at and near Albany and Troy. Most of these will come over the Western Railroad. In driving cattle 100 or 200 mile you reduce, by the fatigue of the animal, the quality from meat to No. 1, besides losing in weight. This is avoided by the Railroad. The animal can get to Brighton then in the most perfect order, without loss of weight, or quality, or flavor.—[Boston Transcript.

OUR NEW VOLUME.—The third volume of the Quarto edition of the New World will commence the first week in July. It is now the time for new subscribers to send in their names. Let it be remembered that $5 a year in advance will procure two copies for a year or one copy for two years; and that six dollars sent in advance will procure the same number of copies together with a beautiful copy of SEARS'S PICTORIAL BIBLE.

The New World.

A New Enlarged Quarto Volume.

COMMENCING THE FIRST WEEK IN JULY.

The Third Volume of the Quarto form of the NEW WORLD will commence on the 3d of July, when it will be much enlarged, and four columns given on each page, instead of three, making sixty-four columns of choice reading, without any increase in the price. New Volumes will always begin on the 1st of July and 1st of January, making two in each year, of 416 pages each, to which a handsome title page, and a copious index will be given.

The NEW WORLD is a Journal of Popular Literature, Criticism, Science and the Arts. It is supplied with articles by the first living writers of the United States and Great Britain. The first number was issued in June, 1840, and its circulation has steadily increased to this day, till it counts more readers than any other newspaper of its kind in the world. This is owing to the fact of its having given to the public, for so long a time, and always in advance of any other print, the most popular works of the most approved authors.

A novel and striking feature of the New World is, that it has given besides the great literary productions of the day, the discourses of eminent divines. In future these discourses will be presented even more frequently than heretofore; but not too often to interfere with other interesting articles.

In addition to all these new and popular works, these eloquent discourses, this comprehensive journal has given the best poems and periodical papers which have appeared in the English and American Magazines. What has been done is an earnest of what will be done.

The New World is divided into various departments, viz:—Original Articles; First American Editions; Periodical Literature; The Scrap Book; The Literary World; The Musical World; The Dramatic World; The Political World; The World of Science and Art; Patchwork; Latest Intelligence.

We cannot forbear to add in conclusion, that the New World studiously avoids all party politics; and is conducted on principles of the strictest morality. No profane or improper jest, no vulgar allusion, no irreligious sentiment, is allowed to soil its pages. Reverence of God and respect to man govern it always. The rule of the Editor is never to publish a line which he would hesitate to read aloud in the hearing of virtuous and intelligent females. Thus the New World is made an unexceptionable Family Newspaper, and is earnestly recommended to the regard of every friend of a pure literature, as well as of correct morals and the public good.

Terms of Subscription.

Three Dollars a year—Two copies one year, or one copy two years, for Five Dollars—payment always in advance. All remittances must be in current funds, and either post-paid or free.

☞ TO CLUBS.—For $20 current New-York funds, free of postage, nine copies will be sent one year.

A Splendid Offer.

Each subscriber who shall remit $6 in New York or Eastern funds, for two years in advance, will be presented with an elegantly bound copy of #### Sears's Pictorial Illustrations of the Bible.

Also a copy of the same work will be given to any individual who will procure two new subscribers for one year, and remit $6 therefor.

Any person procuring five new subscribers, and remitting $15 in current New-York funds, shall receive the New World one year, and also a copy of the Bible.

Clubs of ten persons, associating together, and remitting FIFTY DOLLARS, shall receive the NEW WORLD two years each, and each also a copy of the Pictorial Bible.

☞ Postmasters are requested to act as Agents, to whom 25 per cent will be allowed on each subscription at $3, if the balance is remitted in current funds. Specimen copies sent to all who wish to examine the work, if the request be made free of expense.

☞ All those papers with whom we exchange, will please copy the above two or three times, and send a copy marked. Those who may have copied the Prospectus as published last week are requested to correct as above.

LOVE AND JEALOUSY,

AN ALLEGORY.

YOUNG Love sat once in a sycamore tree
That stood by a cottage door;
The saucy boy with his arrows played,
And counted them o'er and o'er.
"Oh! Love," he cried, "is lord of all,
The lowly and the proud;
Love reigns supreme in the lonely vale,
And he reigns in the gaudy crowd!"

The urchin laughed a merry laugh,
As he sat in the sycamore tree— [world,
"Oh, there's nought," he cried, "in the wide, wide
There is nought but yields to me!
Come hither, come hither, all you who sway
The destinies of man,
Two subjects of mine dwell in this cot,
Come win them, he who can!"

He spoke; and straight before his eyes
A hideous form appeared—
"T was Poverty, gaunt, and clothed in rags—
And the cottage door she neared.
She lifted the latch and she entered in,
And awhile did her dark brows lower;
But Love still sat in the sycamore tree,
And Poverty had no power.

And then came Wealth, in gorgeous robes
And priceless gems arrayed,
And he soon chased Poverty far away,
With his pomp and vain parade.
He strewed temptation in the path,
And he thought to gain the field;
But Love still sat in the sycamore tree,
And Wealth was forced to yield.

And then came a form with a lofty brow,
And an eye of kindling flame—
Great power has he in the hearts of men,
And Ambition is his name.
He whispered tales of fame and power,
And promised mighty things;
But Love laughed loud in the sycamore tree,
And merrily trimmed his wings.

Then form on form came hurrying in,
And strove that pair to win:
Some only reached the cottage door,
Some boldly entered in.
And every art and every wile
Was tried by all in turn;
But Love still sat in the sycamore tree,
And laughed them all to scorn.

At last, came one whose venomous breath
Like a blight on Love did fall;
Ah! wo betide the luckless heart
That once becomes his thrall!
He looked on Love with a withering glance
Of his lustreless, cold, green eye;
And Love dropped down from the sycamore tree,
And heaved a deep, deep sigh.

"Begone! begone!" then Jealousy cried,
"Thy place is here no more;
For the Love that Jealousy once has chased,
Can nought again restore!"
Love gathered his arrows and flew away,
By dear experience taught,
That he who boasts may find ere long
What peril his words have brought. J. M.

MY LIFE IS A FAIRY'S GAY DREAM.

BY ANNA CORA MOWATT.

My life is a fairy's gay dream,
And thou art the genii, whose wand
Tints all things around with the beam,
The bloom of Titania's bright land.

A wish to my lips never sprung,
A hope in mine eyes never shone,
But, ere it was breathed by my tongue,
To grant it thy footsteps have flown.

Thy joys, they have ever been mine,
Thy sorrows, too often thine own,
The sun that on me still would shine,
O'er thee threw its shadows alone.

Life's garland then let us divide,
Its roses I'd fain see thee wear,
For once—but I know thou wilt chide—
Ah! leave me its thorns, love, to bear!

EVENING.

I love to walk abroad at even,
And gaze up in the starry blue,
Where shine the twinkling lamps of heaven,
Unaccounted by a mortal's view.

Or stand beside some flowing river,
And listen to its music sweet,
While on its tide the moon-beams quiver,
Quick dancing with their tiny feet.

Or in the forest hear the sighing
The night-wind makes in every tree—
Or echo from the hills replying
To bells that tinkle on the lea.

Or sit me by some spray-clad fountain,
And watch the mists all thick and dun,
That roll along the distant mountain
Unbroken by the morning sun.

Or stand upon the rocks of ocean,
And listen to the swelling roar
Of starlit waves, with ceaseless motion,
Fast breaking on the pebbly shore.

To me 'tis sweet to walk at even,
And with a swelling heart to view
The beauties of the earth and heaven,
Of gazed upon, yet ever new.

HOPE.

Gentle lady, cease thy sorrow,
Grief from Hope should solace borrow;
What were life if Hope were lost?
A helmless ship by tempests tost.
Gentle lady, cease thy sorrow,
Hope may bring a bright to-morrow.

Sorrow robs the heart of pleasure,
Hope restores it without measure;
Sorrow dims the sparkling eye,
Hope the tear-drop hastes to dry—
Gentle lady, cease thy sorrow,
Hope may bring a bright to-morrow. J. M.

A DEATH BED.

BY JAMES ALDRICH.

Her suff'ring ended with the day,
Yet lived she at its close,
And breathed the long, long night away,
In statue-like repose.

But when the sun, in all his state,
Illum'd the eastern skies,
She passed through Glory's Morning-gate,
And walked in Paradise!

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

Let me now turn to a man of a very different description—Mr. Aubrey. He had now spent nearly a year in the real study of the law; during which time I have not the least hesitation in saying that he had made—notwithstanding all his dreadful drawbacks—at least five times the progress that is generally made by even the most successful of those who devote themselves to the legal profession. He had, moreover, during the same period, produced five or six very brilliant political dissertations, and several contributions to historical literature; and the reader will not be surprised to learn, that such exertions as these, and such anxieties as were his, had told visibly on him. He was very thin; his cheek had lost its color; his eye was oppressed; his spirits had lost their buoyancy, except in the few intervals which he was permitted, by his harassing labors, of domestic enjoyment. He still bore up against his troubles with an unyielding resolution; feeling that Providence had called upon him to do his uttermost, and await the result with patience and faith. Nothing had occurred during this long interval to brighten his prospects—to diminish his crushing load of liability by a hair's weight. But his well-disciplined mind now stood him in noble stead, and enabled him to realize a daily consciousness of advancement in the pursuits to which he had devoted himself.

You may imagine the alarm occasioned him, on his return from the Temple on the evening of the day on which Gammon had paid his remarkable visit to Miss Aubrey, which I have been describing, by the sight of the troubled countenances of his wife and sister. Mrs. Aubrey had returned home within about half an hour after Gammon's leaving Vivian Street, and to her Miss Aubrey instantly communicated the extraordinary proposal which he had made to her, all, in fact, that had passed between them—with the exception of the astounding information concerning their probable restoration to Yatton. The two ladies had, indeed, determined on concealing the whole matter from Mr. Aubrey—at all events for the present; but their perceptible agitation increasing as he questioned them concerning the cause of it, rendered concealment impossible, and they told him frankly the singular and most embarrassing incident which had happened in his absence. Blank amazement was succeeded by vivid indignation in Mr. Aubrey as soon as he had heard what had passed; and for several hours he was excessively agitated. In vain they tried to soothe him; in vain did Kate throw her arms fondly round him, and implore him, for all their sakes, to take no notice to Mr. Gammon of what had happened; in vain did she protest that she would give him instant intelligence of any future attempt by Mr. Gammon to renew his offer; in vain did they both remind him, with great emotion, of the fearful power over all of them which was in Mr. Gammon's hands. He was peremptory and inflexible, and, moreover, frank and explicit; and told them, on quitting home the next morning, that, though they might rely on his discretion and temper, he had resolved to communicate that day, either personally or by letter with Mr. Gammon; not only peremptorily forbidding any renewal of his proposals, but also requesting him to discontinue his visits in Vivian street.

"Oh, Charles! Charles! be punctually home by six!" exclaimed they, as he embraced them both at parting, and added, bursting afresh into tears, "do consider the agony—the dreadful suspense we shall be in all day!"

"I will return by six, to a minute! Do not fear for me!" he replied, with a smile—which, however, instantly disappeared, as soon as he had quitted their presence.

Old Mr. Quirk was the next morning, about ten o'clock, over head and ears in business of all kinds—and sadly missed the clear-headed and energetic Gammon; so, fearing that that gentleman's indisposition must still continue, inasmuch as there were no symptoms of his coming to the office as usual, he took off his spectacles, locked his room-door, in order to prevent any one by any possibility looking on any of the numerous letters and papers lying on his table; and set off to make a call upon Mr. Gammon—whose countenance, flushed and harassed, strongly corroborated what he said on the subject of his indisposition. Still, he said, he could attend to any business which Mr. Quirk was prepared then to mention; whereupon Mr. Quirk took from his pocket a piece of paper, put on his glasses, and put questions to him from a number of memoranda which he had made for the purpose. Gammon's answers were brief, and pointed, and explicit, on all matters mentioned—as might have been expected from one of his great ability and energy—but his muddle-headed companion could not carry away a single clear idea of what had been so clearly told him; and without allowing the fact, of which he felt, however, a painful consciousness, simply determined to do nothing that he could possibly avoid doing, till Mr. Gammon made his re-appearance at the office, and reduced the little chaos there into something like form and order.

Before he quitted Mr. Gammon, that gentleman quietly and easily led conversation toward the subject of the various outstanding debts due to the firm.

"Ah, drat it!" quoth the old gentleman, briskly—"the heaviest you know, is—eh?—Suppose, however," he added, apprehensively, and scratching his head, "I must not have that—I mean that fellow Aubrey's account—without coming to words."

"Why—stay! stay," said Mr. Gammon, with a gravely thoughtful air—"I do not see that, either, Mr. Quirk. Forbearance has its limits. It may be abused, Mr. Quirk."

"Ecce! I should think so!" quoth Mr. Quirk, eagerly, "and I know who's abused somebody's forbearance—eh, Gammon?"

"I understand you, my dear sir," replied Gammon, with a sigh—"I fear I must plead no longer for him—I have gone already, perhaps, much further than my duty to the firm warranted."

"It's a heavy balance, Gammon—a very heavy balance, £1446 14s. 6d., to be outstanding so long—he agreed to pay interest on 't—did n't he, eh?—But really something ought to be done in it; and—come, Gammon! as you've had your time so long, now comes mine!—Turn him over to me."

"I should be very sorry to distress him, poor devil!"

"Distress him? Our bill must be paid. D—n him! why don't he pay his debts? I pay mine; you pay yours; he must pay his."

"Certainly. By the way," said Gammon, suddenly, "if you were to take bold and decided steps, his friends would undoubtedly step forward and relieve him."

"Ay! ay! What think you of three days—give him three days to turn about in? There he's living all the while in a d—d fine house at the West End, like a gentleman—looks down, I'll be sworn, on us poor attorneys, already, beggar as he is, because he's coming to the bar. Now mind, Gammon, no nonsense! I won't stand your coming in again as you did before—if I write—honor between thieves, eh?"

"I pledge my honor to you, my dear sir, that I will interfere no more; but the law must take its course."

"That 's it!" said Mr. Quirk, rubbing his hands gleefully; "I'll tip him a tickler before he's a day older than shall wake him up—ah, ha!"

"You will do me one favor, Mr. Quirk, I am sure," said Mr. Gammon, with that civil but peremptory manner of his which invariably commanded Quirk's assent to his suggestions—"you will insert a disclaimer in the letter of its emanating from me—or being with my consent."

"Oh lud, yes! yes! anything."

"Nay—rather against my wish, you know, eh? just for appearance's sake—as I have always appeared so infernally civil to the man, till now."

"Will you draw it up yourself? And then, so as the other matter 's all right—no flinching—stick in as much palaver, Gammon!—ah ha!—as you like!" replied Quirk; who, as the proposal involved only a greater measure of discourtesy on his part, without any sacrifice of his interest, regarded it with perfect indifference. He took his leave of Gammon in far higher spirits than those which he had carried with him. It having been thus determined on by the partners, that within a day or two's time, Mr. Aubrey should be required to pay the whole balance, under penalty of an arrest—Gammon, on being left alone, folded his arms as he sat beside his breakfast table—and meditated on the probable results of this his first hostile move against Mr. Aubrey. "I wonder whether she 's told him," thought he, with a slight palpitation—which was somewhat increased by a pretty sharp knock at his outer door. The color suddenly deserted his cheek as he started from his seat, scattering on the floor nearly a dozen unopened letters which had been lying at his elbow on the table; and he stood still for a moment to subdue a little of his agitation, so as to enable him to present himself with some show of calmness before the visitor whom he felt perfectly certain that he should see on opening the door. He was right. The next minute beheld him ushering into his room, with a surprising degree of self-possession, Mr. Aubrey, whose countenance showed embarrassment and agitation.

"I have called upon you, Mr. Gammon," commenced Aubrey, taking the seat to which Mr. Gammon, with great courtesy, motioned him, and then resumed his own, "in consequence of your visit yesterday in Vivian street—of your surprising interview with my sister—your most unexpected, extraordinary proposal to her."

Mr. Gammon listened respectfully, with an air of earnest attention, evidently not intending to make any reply.

"It cannot surprise you, sir, that I should have been made acquainted with it immediately on my return home yesterday evening. It was undoubtedly my sister's duty to do so; but she did it, I am bound to acknowledge to you, sir, with great reluctance, as a matter of exquisitely painful delicacy. Sir, she has told me all that passed between you."

"I cannot presume, Mr. Aubrey, to find fault with anything Miss Aubrey may have thought proper to do; she cannot do wrong," replied Gammon, calmly, though Mr. Aubrey's last words had occasioned him lively anxiety as to the extent of Miss Aubrey's communications to her brother. He observed Mr. Aubrey's eyes fixed upon him steadfastly, and saw that he was laboring under much excitement. "If I have done anything calculated to inflict the slightest pain upon a lady for whom I have so profound"—he saw the color mounting into Mr. Aubrey's cheek, and a sterner expression appearing in his eye—"a respect, or upon you, or any of your family, I am distressed beyond measure."

"I perfectly appreciate, Mr. Gammon, the position in which we stand with regard to each other. Though I am fearfully changed in respect of fortune, I am not a whit changed—we are none of us changed," he continued proudly, "in respect of personal feelings and character."

He paused: Gammon spoke not. Presently Mr. Aubrey resumed—"I am, as we are all, very deeply sensible of the obligation which you have conferred upon us. We all feel that we are, to a great extent, placed at your mercy."

"Pray—I beg, Mr. Aubrey, that you will not speak in a strain which really hurts my feelings," interrupted Gammon, earnestly; "and which nothing on my part has justified, nor can justify."

"Sir, I meant nothing in the least calculated to wound your feelings, but merely to express my own; and let me, Mr. Gammon, without the least reserve or circumlocution, inform you that both my sister and I have felt the most vivid displeasure—dissatisfaction—at your conduct of yesterday; and I have deemed it expedient to lose no time in informing you that your proposals are utterly out of the question, and can never be entertained, under any circumstances, for one moment."

Had Aubrey been, instead of the mere pauper he really was, and in the presence of one whom he knew to be able to cast him instantly into prison, at that moment in the position he had formerly occupied, of wealth and greatness, he could not have spoken with an air of more dignified determination, and even hauteur, which Gammon perceived and fully appreciated.

"I am undoubtedly aware, sir, of the disparity between Miss Aubrey and myself in point of position," said he, coldly.

"I have said nothing of the kind that I am aware of, nor would I, on any account, say anything offensive to you, Mr. Gammon; but it is my duty to speak explicitly and decisively. I therefore now beg you to understand that your overtures must not, in any shape, or at any time, be renewed; and this I must insist upon without assigning or suggesting any reason whatever."

Gammon listened attentively and silently.

"I presume, Mr. Gammon, that I cannot be misunderstood?" added Mr. Aubrey, with a very perceptibly increased peremptoriness of manner.

"It would be difficult to misunderstand what you say, sir," replied Gammon; in whose dark bosom Mr. Aubrey's words had, as it were, stung and roused the serpent pride—which might have been seen with crest erect, and glaring eyes. But Mr. Gammon's external manner was calm and subdued.

"It gives me pain to be forced to add, Mr. Gammon," continued Mr. Aubrey, "that after what has taken place, we all of us feel—that it will be better for you to discontinue your visits at my house. I am sure your own delicacy will appreciate the necessity which exists for such a suggestion on my part?"

"I perfectly understand you, Mr. Aubrey," replied Gammon, in the same grave and guarded manner which he had preserved throughout their interview. "I shall offer no apology, sir, for conduct which I do not feel to require one. I conceive that I had a perfect right to make, with all due deference and respect, the offer which it appears has given you so much offence; for reasons, it may be, which justify you, but which I cannot speculate upon, nor do I wish to do so. It is impossible ever to see Miss Aubrey without becoming sensible of her loveliness, both of person and character. I have paid them homage: for the rest, the issue is simply—unfortunate. While I may not feel disposed, even if inclined, to disregard your strict and solemn injunctions, I take leave to say, that my feelings towards Miss Aubrey, cannot alter; and if in no other way they can be gratified, there is yet one which"—here he looked greatly moved, and changed color—"yet remains open for me, to exhibit my regard for her in a tenfold anxiety to preserve her—to preserve all of you, Mr. Aubrey, from the approach of difficulty and danger. That much Miss Aubrey may have also told to you, of what passed between us yesterday." He paused—from emotion apparently; but he was only considering intently whether he should endeavor to ascertain whether Mr. Aubrey had been put by his sister in possession of his—Gammon's—last communication to her; and then, however that might be, whether he should himself break the matter to Mr. Aubrey. But he decided both questions in the negative, and proceeded, with a little excitement of manner—"There are dangers menacing you, I grieve to say, Mr. Aubrey, of the most serious description, which I may possibly be unable to avert from you! I fear I am losing that hold upon others which has enabled me hitherto to save you from rapacity and oppression! I regret to say I can answer for others no longer; but all that man can do, still will I do. I have been most bitterly—most fearfully disappointed; but you shall ever find me a man of my word—of as high and rigid honor, perhaps even, Mr. Aubrey, as yourself"—he paused, and he felt that he had made an impression on his silent auditor—"and I hereby pledge myself, in the presence of God, that so far as in me lies, there shall not a hair of any of your heads be touched." Again he paused. "I wish, Mr. Aubrey, you knew the pressure which has been for some time upon me—nay, even this very morning"—he cast a melancholy and reluctant eye towards the letters which he had gathered up, and which he had placed beside him on the breakfast table—"I have received a letter; I know the hand-writing; I almost dread to open it." Mr. Aubrey changed color.

"I am at a loss to know to what, in particular, you are alluding, Mr. Gammon?" he interrupted, anxiously.

"I will not at present say more on the subject; I devoutly hope my negotiations may be successful, and that the affair may not for many months, or even years, be forced upon your attention! Still, were I to do so one effect, at least, it would have—to satisfy you of my honorable and disinterested motives in the offer which I presumed to make Miss Aubrey."

"Well, sir," replied Mr. Aubrey, with a melancholy air, and sighing deeply, "I can only place my trust in Providence—and I do. I have suffered much already; and if it be the will of Heaven that I suffer more, I hope I have not suffered already—in vain!"

"Mr. Aubrey," said Gammon, gazing at him with a brightening eye, "my very soul owns the sublime presence of VIRTUE, in your person! It is exalting—it is ennobling—merely to be permitted to witness so heroic an example of constancy as you exhibit!" He paused, and for some moments there was silence. "You do not distrust me, Mr. Aubrey?" said Gammon at length, with a confident air.

"No, Mr. Gammon!" replied Mr. Aubrey, eyeing him steadfastly. "I am not aware that I ever had any reason for doing so."

Shortly afterward he took his departure; and as he bent his steps slowly, and with thoughtful air towards the Temple, he saw one or two things, on his own part, during his interview with Gammon to regret—his sternness and pride; but nothing on the part of Gammon that had not been admirable. Could Mr. Aubrey, however, but have seen the satanic smile which settled upon Mr. Gammon's features, as soon as, after cordially shaking his hand, he had calmly shut the door upon Mr. Aubrey, it might have occasioned some few misgivings as to that gentleman's sincerity. Mr. Gammon resumed his seat, and meditated upon their recent interview. Almost the first glance which he had caught of Mr. Aubrey's countenance, and the very first tones of his voice which he had caught, had inspired Gammon with a deadly animosity towards poor Aubrey, whose pride Gammon resolved to trample upon and crush into the dust. He was acquainted with the state of Aubrey's little finances, almost to a pound; for Aubrey had, under the circumstances, felt it even a duty to be frank with him upon that subject. He turned over in his mind, with great anxiety, the matter of the two promissory notes for five thousand pounds each, which he held in his hands, and which would be the best mode of setting into motion, but with the hands of another, those two dreadful instruments of torture and oppression—which, judiciously applied, might have the effect of humbling the pride and breaking the determination of Aubrey and of his sister. Long he considered the subject, in every point of view; and at length—"Ay, that will do!" said he to himself aloud; sighed, smiled, and gently tapped his fingers upon his ample forehead. Shortly afterward, having ordered his laundress to take away the breakfast things, he took the pen, ink, and paper, and sketched off the following draft of a letter, to be copied by Mr. Quirk, and signed in the name of the firm, and sent, Gammon finally determined, early in the ensuing week:—

Saffron Hill, 9th July, 18—.

"DEAR SIR—Owing to a most serious and unexpected pecuniary outlay which we are called upon to make, we feel ourselves compelled to avail ourselves of whatever resources lie within our reach. Having been disappointed in several quarters, we are obliged to remind you of the heavy balance we have against you of L.1446, 14s. 6d. You must be aware of the length of time during which it has been standing; and trust you will forgive us if we now apprise you that it is absolutely impossible for us to allow of any more delay. Unless, therefore, the whole of the above balance, or at least L.1000 of it, be paid within three days of the date hereof, we regret to inform you we have finally made up our minds to let the law take its usual course. We feel the less hesitation in saying thus much, because we are persuaded that, with a little caution you might long ago have liquidated this heavy balance, or the greater part thereof." (Mr. Gammon wrote as nearly in the peculiar style of Mr. Quirk as he could.)

"In writing thus, Messrs. Quirk and Snap feel it only due to their partner, Mr. Gammon, to add that he is no party to this application. Messrs. Q. and S. have felt, however, in making it, that the interests of the firm have already suffered long enough, through their deference to the personal wishes and feelings of one of the members of the firm; and but for whom, their heavy balance would have been called for long ago, and no doubt, in due course discharged.

"We regret being unable to vary or depart from the determination above expressed; and most sincerely hope your resources are of that nature that we shall be spared the unpleasantness of letting the law take its usual course."

"And we remain,

"Dear sir,

"Yours most respectfully,

"QUIRK, GAMMON, & SNAP.

"Charles Aubrey, Esq., Vivian Street."

Exactly on the seventh day from that on which Mr. Gammon had made his ill-omened advances toward Miss Aubrey, did the above dreadful and heartless letter reach its destination—being delivered to Mr. Aubrey's hands while he was intently perusing a very heavy set of papers, which, at his request, Mr. Weasel had allowed him to take home. The painful scene which ensued I shall spare the reader—only mentioning that poor Miss Aubrey became almost frantic, treating herself as the sole occasion of this disaster. That very morning, at breakfast, had he been talking of selling out, of their precious remnant in the funds, the sum of £105, to enable him to become a pupil with Mr. Crystal—at the suggestion of the Attorney-General.

What was to be done in this fearful emergency, none of them knew—except consenting to an immediate sale of all their plate, books, and furniture. Their affliction, indeed, knew no bounds. Even Mr. Aubrey, though for a long time he bore up heroically, was at length overcome by the agonies of the dear beings whose ruin was involved in his own.

Had not Gammon been prompt in his vengeance? So thought they all.

What was to be done? A word will suffice to explain Mr. Aubrey's position fully. It will be recollected, that about a twelvemonth before, he had been left in possession of a balance of L.1063, after paying the sum of L.4000 to Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, Messrs. Runningtons, and Mr. Parkinson, in the way which has been already mentioned. Since then, by his incessant exertions, he had realised the sum of L.150 by his contributions to literary journals; and, by means of a severe and systematic economy, this sum together with about L.200 taken from his store of L.1063, had sufficed to cover their whole year's expenditure. 'Twas impossible to carry economy further than they did, without, poor souls, positive injury to their health, and stinting the little children, as Mr. and Mrs. Aubrey often said to each other, when alone, with tears and sighs of anguish.

Alas! misfortune followed him like a bloodhound, let him turn his steps whithersoever he might! Naturally anxious to make the most of his little store of L.1063, so long as any considerable portion of it could be spared from their immediate personal necessities, he looked about in all directions for some safe and profitable investment, which might produce him a little more income than could be derived from the funds. He cautiously avoided having the slightest connection with any of the innumerable jointstock speculations then afloat, and of which he saw distinctly the mischievous and ruinous tendency; and this moreover in spite of the artful occasional representations of Mr. Gammon. Having consulted his banker, and also a member of the House of Commons—one of the city members—a man of immense wealth, and great mercantile experience and sagacity, and with whom he had been intimate, while in the House—confirmed by their approval, and also that of Mr. Weasel and Messrs. Runnington, all of whom poor Aubrey anxiously consulted concerning the disposal of this his little ALL.

About six weeks after the period of his settlement with Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, he invested L.500, in the purchase of a particular foreign stock. Safe and promising as it appeared, however at the very moment when it was in the highest repute with capitalists of all descriptions both at home and abroad—from scarce any assignable reason, but for one of the many unaccountable instances of fluctuation to which property of that kind is proverbially liable, Aubrey had hardly held his scrip for a month, when—alas! to his dismay, he found it falling—falling—falling—down, down, down, it went till his scrip was so much waste paper! His loss was irretrievable. This wealthy member whom he had consulted, lost nearly one hundred and twenty thousand pounds, and was driven to the very verge of ruin. Mr. Weasel even, caution personified, in dealing with the little accumulation of his hard earnings, lost upwards of a thousand pounds; and Mr. Runnington, about double that sum. It required a great stretch of fortitude on the part of Mr. Aubrey to sustain this severe and sudden blow with anything like equanimity. You should have seen and heard Mrs. Aubrey and Miss Aubrey on that occasion, in order fully to appreciate the rich and melting tenderness of woman's sympathy.

This left him only a sum of about L.350 in the funds, and in his banker's hands a little balance of some fifty or sixty pounds to meet his current expenses. The above sum, at the time when Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap's letter reached him, had been necessarily diminished to about L.290; this was all the money he had in the world, to save himself, and those dependant on him, from absolute destitution. Yet he was now peremptorily called upon, within three days' time, to pay the sum of L.1446, 14s. 6d.

He hurried off, early the next morning, in consternation, to Messrs. Runningtons. Mr. Runnington with a heavy heart and a gloomy countenance, set off instantly, alone, to the office of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap. He saw Mr. Gammon, who told him, with a well dissembled air of disgust, to go in to Mr. Quirk, or Mr. Snap. He did so, and found them inexorable. Mr. Quirk doggedly told Mr. Runnington that he had been out of pocket long enough, and would not be fooled by one of his own partners any longer. Mr. Runnington quitted them fairly at his wife's end; and on his return, told Mr. Aubrey, whom he had left at his office, that he had done, and could do, "nothing with the vultures of Saffron Hill." Mr. Runnington felt that his unhappy client, Mr. Aubrey, was far too critically situated with respect to Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, to admit of his threatening, on Mr. Aubrey's behalf, to refer their exorbitant and monstrous bill to taxation. He knew not, in fact, what suggestion to offer—what scheme to devise—to extricate Mr. Aubrey from his present dreadful dilemma. As for applying for pecuniary assistance from his friends, Mr. Aubrey's soul revolted at the bare thought.—What—borrow! Overwhelmed as he already was, it would be grossly unprincipled. Was not one alive of his generous friends at that moment under a liability on his behalf of more than ten thousand pounds? No: with gloomy composure he felt that, at last, his hour was come; that a prison wall must soon intervene between him—poor broken-hearted soul!—and the dear, beloved beings from whom, as yet he had never been once separated—no! not for one moment deprived of blessed intercourse and communion with them, his wife—Kate—his unconscious little children—

Kate, however, got desperate; and, unknown to her brother, though with the full privy of his weeping wife, wrote off a long—a heart-rending letter to good old Lady Stratton, whose god-daughter she was, telling her everything. Kate was up half the night writing that letter, and it was blistered with her tears. She took it very early in the morning, herself to the post office, and she and Mrs. Aubrey awaited the issue with the most trembling and fearful solicitude.

I have hardly heart to recount the events which followed upon poor Kate's adventure; but they form a striking exemplification of the mysterious manner in which frequently Providence, for its own awful and wise purposes, sees fit to accumulate troubles and sorrows upon the virtuous.

Old Lady Stratton had been for some months in very feeble health, and the receipt of Kate's letter occasioned her infinite distress. It will be remembered that she had long before effected a policy of insurance upon her life for £15,000, always intending to bequeath it as a little portion to poor Kate. She had many months—in fact, nearly a year and half before—given the necessary instructions to her solicitor, good Mr. Parkinson, of Griston, for making her will, so as to carry into effect her kind intentions towards Kate; bequeathing also legacies of £500 apiece to each of Mr. Aubrey's little children. How it came to pass, however, I scarcely knew—except by referring it to that sad superstitious weakness which makes people often procrastinate the execution of so all-important an instrument as a will; but, at the time when Kate's letter arrived, her ladyship's will had not been executed, but still lay, merely in draft, at Mr. Parkinson's office. Feeling greatly indisposed, however, shortly after she had received Miss Aubrey's letter, she sent off an express to Mr. Parkinson to attend her with her will; and, a few minutes afterward her attendants found it necessary to send off another express for her physician Dr. Goddard. Before drawing a check for the sum of £700 or £800, on which she intended instantly to place at Mr. Aubrey's disposal, she awaited Mr. Parkinson's return, that he—who managed all her affairs—might inform her of the exact balance then at her banker's. He was absent from Griston when the express arrived, but he was followed, and about seven o'clock that evening entered Lady Stratton's residence carrying with him the draft of her will, ready prepared for execution. His chief clerk also accompanied him, lest, by any possibility, a witness should be wanting. The countenances of the domestics warned him that there was not one moment to be lost; and he hastened at once into Lady Stratton's bed-chamber. There she lay the venerable old lady, partially propped up by pillows—her long white hair partially visible from under her cap. A hasty whisper from Dr. Goddard apprised him of the very critical situation of Lady Stratton. Writing materials stood ready prepared in the room against Mr. Parkinson's arrival. She recognized him, on his passing the foot of the bed, and in a feeble voice whispered—"My will!—my will!"

[Oh, hasten! delay not an instant, Mr. Parkinson! If you did but know what depends on your movements—could you but at this moment—oh me!—could you but catch a glimpse of the scene this instant passing in Vivian street!—Give her the pen, Mr. Parkinson—guide her hand—place it upon the paper.]

But it was too late. Before the pen could be placed within her fingers, those fingers had become incapable of holding it—for Lady Stratton at that moment experienced the paralytic seizure which Dr. Goddard had been dreading for three or four hours before. 'T was useless; pen, ink, and paper were removed. She lingered till about nine o'clock the next morning, when, in the presence of Mr. Parkinson, who had not quitted the room for one instant, death released the venerable sufferer. She had thus died intestate; and all her personal property—Lady Stratton had none other—became the property of her ladyship's next of kin. Had this event happened but two years before, that next of kin would have been—Mr. Aubrey; but now—will the reader have patience to read it!—that next of kin was—TITTLERAT TITMOUSE! Alas! there could be no question about the matter; and it was the knowledge of that contingency that had distracted Mr. Parkinson from the moment that he received his last ineffectual summons to the bedside of Lady Stratton. Yes, Mr. Titmouse had now become entitled to all the goods, chattels, credits, and effects which were of the late Lady Stratton; and before she had been laid in Yaton churchyard, not far from her beloved friend who had preceded by a few months only—Mrs. Aubrey—Mr. Parkinson received a letter from Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap, as the solicitors of Mr. Titmouse, giving him formal notice of the title of their client, and requesting Mr. Parkinson to lose no time in making an inventory of the effects of her ladyship, to whom Mr. Titmouse intended to administer immediately. Mr. Gammon himself went down, and arrived the day after the funeral. Guess his excitement on discovering the windfall which came to his client, Mr. Titmouse, in the policy for £15,000, the existence of which they had, of course, never dreamed of!

But there was another discovery, which occasioned him not a little excitement, as his flushed cheek and suspended breath testified—alas! poor Aubrey's bond for £2000, with interest at five per cent!—an instrument which poor Lady Stratton, having always intended to destroy, latterly imagined that she had actually done so. It had, however, got accidentally mingled with other papers, which had found their way, in the ordinary course, to Mr. Parkinson, and who was himself ignorant of its existence, since it lay folded in a letter addressed to Lady Stratton, till it turned up while he was sorting the papers, in obedience to the instructions of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap. He turned pale and red by turns—did Mr. Parkinson—as he held the accursed document in his fingers, and—his sense of duty prevailed. Of course the obligee of the bond, and, as such, entitled to the principal money secured by it, together with all arrears of interest which might be due upon it, was, Mr. TITTLERAT TITMOUSE.

Surely it is hard to imagine a more dismal and wanton freak of fortune than this—as far, at least, as concerned poor Kate Aubrey.

"FLY! FLY!—For God's sake fly! Lose not one moment of the precious respite which, by incredible efforts, I have contrived to secure you—a respite of but a few hours—and wrung from heartlessness and rapacity. In justice, much injured man! to yourself—to all you hold dear upon earth—to the precious interests entrusted to your keeping, and involved in your destiny—again I say Fly! Quit the country, if it be but for never so short a time, till you or your friends shall have succeeded in arranging your disordered affairs. Regard this hasty and perhaps incoherent note, in what light you please—but I tell you it comes, in sacred confidence, from a firm and inalienable friend, whose present desperate exertions in your behalf you will one day perhaps to appreciate. Once more, I conjure you to fly!—I see the rack preparing for you!—Will you stay to be tortured!—and, in the presence of the incomparable beings?—my feelings overpower me! Indeed, Mr. Aubrey, if you disregard this note, through weak fears as to the writer's sincerity, or a far weaker and a wild notion of Quixotic honor and heroism—remember, in the moment of being overwhelmed, this note—and then, do justice to its writer.—Your faithful, unhappy, disinterested friend, O. G."

"P. S.—For God's sake, burn, or otherwise destroy this note, as soon as you shall have read it."

Such was the letter which found its way into Mr. Aubrey's hands, just as the time which had been fixed by Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, for payment of their bill, was expiring, and which occasioned him, as may be easily imagined, dreadful disquietude. It had found him in a state of the deepest depression—but yet vigorously striving to preserve, in the presence of his wife and sister, a semblance of composure and cheerfulness. More to pacify them than to satisfy himself, he had walked about town during the two preceding days till ready to drop with exhaustion, in fruitless quest of those who might be disposed to advance him a thousand pounds on his own personal security, and on terms he scarce cared how exorbitant, to free him, at all events for a while, from his present exigency. All had been, however, in vain—indeed, he had no hopes from the first. And what was then to be done? His soul seemed dying away within him. At times he almost lost all consciousness of his situation, and what was passing around him. It appeared to be the will of Heaven that his misfortunes should press him down, as it were, by inches into the dust, and crush him. Those there were, he well knew, who needed but to be apprized of his circumstances, to step forward and generously relieve him from his difficulties. But where was all that to end? What real good could it serve? Awfully involved as he was already—one, alone, of his friends being at that moment under a liability which must be discharged within three months, of nearly eleven thousand pounds—was he to place others in a similar situation? What earthly prospect had he of ever repaying them? Lamentable as was his position, his soul recoiled from the bare thought. But then came before his anguished eye, his wife—his sister—his children; and he flung himself, in an ecstasy, on his knees, remaining long prostrate—and, for a while, the heaven that was over his head seemed to be brass, and the earth that was under him, iron. His heart might be wrung, however, and his spirit heavy and darkened; but no extent or depth of could cause him to forget those principles of honor and integrity by which all his life had been regulated. He resolved, therefore, to submit to the impending stroke with calmness, as to inevitable ruin, and would not hear of any further applications to his friends, which indeed, he felt would be only encouragement to those who held him in thralldom to renew their exactions, when they found each succeeding pressure successful. Poor Kate had told him, as soon as her letter had been put into the post, of her application to Lady Stratton, and told him with trembling apprehensions as to the consequences; but did she think her fond broken-hearted brother could chide her? He looked at her for a moment, with quivering lip and eyes blinded with tears—and then wrung her hand, simply expressing a hope, that, since the step had been taken, it might be, in some measure at least, successful.

Mr. Gammon's letter, as I have already intimated, filled Mr. Aubrey with inexpressible alarm. Again and again he read it over with increasing agitation, and at the same time uncertain as to its true character and import—as to the real motive and object of its writer. Was he guilty of the duplicity which Mrs. Aubrey and Kate so vehemently imputed to him? Was he actuated by revenge? Or was he, as represented by Mr. Quirk's letter, overpowered by his partners, and still sincere in his wishes to shield Mr. Aubrey from their rapacity? Or was Mr. Gammon suggesting flight only as a snare? Was he to be seduced into an act warranting them in proceeding to instant extremities against him? What could be the other matters so darkly alluded to in the letter? Were they the two promissory notes of five thousand pounds each, which he had deposited with Mr. Gammon, who at length was peremptorily required by Mr. Titmouse to surrender them up, and permit them to be put in suit? They were payable on demand—he shuddered! Might it be, that Titmouse was desperately in want of money, and had therefore overpowered the scruples of Gammon, and disregarded the sacred pledge with which he assured Titmouse the notes had been given? Mr. Aubrey rejoiced that Mr. Gammon's letter had been placed in his hands by the servant when alone in his study, wither he had gone to write a note to Mr. Runnington; and resolved not to apprise Mrs. Aubrey and Kate of its arrival. The fourth day after the receipt of Messrs. Quirk and Snap's letter had now elapsed. Mr. Aubrey did not venture to quit the house, all of them being as may be well imagined, in a state of pitiable distress, and agitation, and suspense. Thus also passed the fifth day—still the blow descended not; was the arm extended to inflict it held back still by Mr. Gammon continuing thus the "incredible efforts" spoken of in his note? The sixth morning dawned on the wretched family. They all rose at a somewhat earlier hour than usual. They could scarce touch the spare and simple breakfast spread before them, nor enjoy—nay they could hardly bear—the prattle and gambols of the lively little ones, Charles and Agnes, whom at length they dispatched back again to the nursery; for they were, in the highest possible state of excitement and anxiety, awaiting the arrival of the postman—this being the first morning on which they could, in the ordinary course, receive a letter from Lady Stratton in answer to that of Kate. 'Twas now a little past ten. The breakfast things had been removed, and on hearing the agitating though long expected rat-tat of the postman a few doors down the street, Mrs. Aubrey and Kate started to the window. Their hearts beat violently when their eye caught sight of him, with his arm full of letters, knocking at the door opposite. How long they were in answering his summons, and in paying the postage! Then he stood for nearly a minute laughing with a servant in the adjoining area—intolerable was all this to the agitated beings who were thus panting for his arrival—then he glanced at his letters, and crossed the street, making for their door.

"Heaven! He has a letter!" cried Miss Aubrey, gleefully—"I sha'n't wait for Fanny!" and, flying to the front door, plucked it open the instant after the postman had knocked. He touched his hat on seeing the beautiful but agitated lady, who stretched forth her hand, exclaiming, "Fanny will pay you"—but in an instant her cheek was blanched, and she nearly fell to the floor, at sight of the black border, and the black seal, and the strange handwriting. For a moment or two she seemed to have lost the power of speech or motion; but presently beat her trembling steps into the parlor. "Oh! Charles—Agnes—I feel as if I were going to die—look"—she faltered, sinking in to the nearest chair, while Mr. Aubrey, with much agitation, took the ominous-looking letter which she extended toward him. 'Twas from Mr. Parkinson; and lo! the news of Lady Stratton's death, and the lamentable circumstances attending it; that she died intestate—and that Mr. Titmouse had, as next of kin, become entitled to all she had left behind her. All this disastrous intelligence was conveyed in a few hurried lines. "My God!" exclaimed Mr. Aubrey, on having glanced over them. His color fled, and he pressed his hand against his forehead. "She is dead!" said he in a low tone, at the same time giving Kate the letter, and hastening to Mrs. Aubrey, who seemed nearly fainting. Each had uttered a faint scream on hearing his words. Mrs. Aubrey swooned in his arms—and Kate sat like a statue, without even glancing at the fatal letter which she held in her hand, but gazing in a sort of stupor at her brother. She was unable to rise to Mrs. Aubrey's assistance—of whose state, indeed, she appeared, from her vacant eye, to be hardly aware. At length a slight sigh announced the returning consciousness of Mrs. Aubrey; and at the same time Miss Aubrey, with a manifestly desperate effort, regained her consciousness, and with a cheek white as the letter she was looking at, read it over.

"This is very—very—dreadful—Heaven is forsaking us!" at length she murmured, gazing wofully at her brother and sister.

"Say not so—but rather God's will be done," faltered Mr. Aubrey, his voice and his countenance evincing the depth of his affliction. "God help us!" he added in a tone, which at length, thrilling through the overcharged heart of his sister, caused her to weep bitterly; and if ever there was a mournful scene, it was that which ensued, ere this doomed family, slowly recovering from the first stunning effects of the shock which they had just received, had become aware of the full extent of their misery. They had ever felt toward Lady Stratton, who, as has been already said, had been poor Kate's godmother—as toward a parent; and their affection had been doubled after the death of Mrs. Aubrey. Now she was gone; she who would have stood for at least a little while between them and ruin, was gone! And by an inscrutable and awful Providence, that which she had secretly destined to them—and which would have effectually shielded them from the cruelty and rapacity of their enemies—had been diverted from them, into the coffers of the most selfish and worthless of mankind—who seemed, indeed, as if he had been called into existence only to effect their ruin; even, as it were, the messenger of Satan to buffet them! At length, however, the first natural transports of their grief having subsided, their stricken hearts returned to their allegiance toward Heaven; and Mr. Aubrey, whose noble constancy at once strengthened and encouraged his partners in affliction with many just and pious reflections, reminded them that they were in the hands of God, who intended all earthly suffering—however harsh and apparently undeserved its infliction—to contribute infallibly to the ultimate benefit of his children. And he reminded them, on that melancholy occasion, of the example afforded by one whose sufferings had transcended theirs—the patriarch Job: on whom were suddenly—and to him apparently without any reason or motive, except the infliction of suffering—accumulated almost every species of evil that can befall humanity. The sudden and total loss of his substance, and of all his servants, he appears to have borne with fortitude. At length, however, was announced to him the loss of all his sons and daughters.

Then Job arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground and worshipped,

And said, naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: blessed be the name of the Lord.

In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly.

Out of respect to the memory of their dear, venerable, departed friend, they drew down all the blinds of their little house, thereby spreading around them a gloom similar to that within. A sad, a mournful little group they looked! This last sorrow seemed for a while to divert their thoughts from the peril which momentarily menaced them. They talked with frequent emotion, and with many tears, of their late friend—recalling fondly innumerable little traits of her gentle and benignant character. Toward the close of the day, their souls were subdued into resignation to the will of the allwise Disposer of events: they had, in some measure, realized the consolations of an enlightened and scriptural piety.

They met the next morning, at breakfast, with a melancholy composure. The blinds being drawn down, prevented the bright sunshine out of doors from entering into the little room where their frugal breakfast was spread, and where prevailed a gloom more in unison with their saddened feelings. To all who sat round the table, except little Charles, the repast was slight indeed: he had shortly before begun to breakfast down stairs, instead of in the nursery; and, merry little being!—all unconscious of the destination to which, in all human probability, he was destined—and of the misery which oppressed and was crushing his parents—he was rattling away cheerfully, as if nothing could disturb or interrupt the light-heartedness of childhood. They all started on hearing the unexpected knock of the general postman. He had brought them a letter from Dr. Tatham; who, it seemed, was aware of the letter which had been the day before dispatched to them by Mr. Parkinson. The little doctor's letter was exceedingly touching and beautiful; and it was a good while before they could complete its perusal, owing to the emotion which it occasioned them. 'T was indeed full of tender sympathy—of instructive incentive to resignation to the will of God.

"Is not that indeed the language of a devout and venerable minister of God?" said Mr. Aubrey—"whose figure is daily brightening with the glory reflected from the heaven which he is so rapidly approaching? In the order of nature, a few short years must see him, also, removed from us."

"Then we shall indeed be desolate!" said Miss Aubrey, shedding tears.

"Heaven is speaking to us through one of its ministers in this letter! Let us listen in reverent humility!" They remained silent for some moments, Mr. Aubrey re-perusing the long and double written letter of which he had been speaking. Presently he heard a knock at the street door—an ordinary single knock—such as was by no means unusual at that period of the morning; yet he scarce knew why—it disconcerted him. He kept, however, his eye upon the letter, while he heard Fanny opening the door—then a word or two whispered—after which the parlor door was hastily opened, and Fanny stood there, pale as death, and unable, evidently from fright, to speak—a heavy step was heard in the passage—and then there stood behind the terror-stricken girl a tall stout man in a drab great-coat, with a slouched hat, and a thick walking-stick in his hand—looking over her shoulder into the parlor, whose dismayed occupants soon shared the panic of poor Fanny.

"Beg your pardon, sir," said he, civilly advancing into the room, and removing his hat—"is your name Charles Aubrey?"

"It is, sir," said Mr. Aubrey, rising from his chair—by which time a second man was standing at the door.

"You're my prisoner, sir," said the man, stepping close up to the wretched Aubrey, and touching him on the shoulder, at the same time holding out a thin slip of paper—the warrant by virtue of which he was then acting. The moment that he advanced toward Mr. Aubrey a dreadful shriek burst from Mrs. Aubrey and Kate, who sprung forward, and threw their arms wildly round him. He implored them to restrain their feelings—though evidently greatly agitated himself.

"Will you let me look at your warrant?" said he, mildly, to the man who had arrested him, and remained standing close beside him. Mr. Aubrey, glancing over the warrant, saw that he was arrested for fourteen hundred pounds and upward, at the suit of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap.

"You see, sir, it's only my duty to do this here," said the officer respectfully, evidently touched by the agony of the two beautiful women who still clung wildly round one about to be torn ruthlessly from their arms—"do n't take on so, ladies; there's no great harm done yet."

"For mercy's sake, Agnes! Kate! as you love me!—Be calm! You afflict me beyond measure," said Mr. Aubrey, who, though he had grown very pale, yet preserved under the circumstances a remarkable degree of self-possession. 'T was, however, a scene which he had been endeavoring to realize to himself, and prepare for daily, if not hourly, for the last week.

"Oh mercy! mercy!—for God's sake have mercy on him! on us!" exclaimed Mrs. Aubrey and Kate.

"Oh, good men! kind men! have mercy!" cried Kate, desperately; "what are you going to do with him?"

"No harm, miss, you may depend on't—only he must go with us, seeing we're obligated to take him."

"For Heaven's sake, do n't—do n't, for mercy's sake!" cried Kate, turning her agonized face toward the man, her hair partially dishevelled, and her arms still clasping her brother with frantic energy. Mrs. Aubrey had swooned, and lay insensible in her husband's arms, supported by his knee; while Fanny, herself half distracted, was striving to restore her by rubbing her cold hands.

"Lord, ladies! do n't, do n't take on in this way; you're only a-hurting of yourselves, and you do n't do the gentleman any good, you know; 'cause, in course, he's all the sorer for going," said the second man, who had by this time entered the room, and stood looking on concernedly. But Miss Aubrey repeated her inquiries with wild and frantic impetuosity, for some time not aware that Mrs. Aubrey lay insensible beside her.

"Jemmy, run and fetch the lady a glass of water from the kitchen—she's gone clean dead—run, my man!" said the officer to his follower, who immediately obeyed him, and presently returned with a glass of water; by which time, both Kate, and her brother, and Fanny, were endeavoring, with great agitation, to restore Mrs. Aubrey, whose prolonged swoon alarmed them, and in whose sufferings the sense of their own seemed for a while absorbed. The two men stood by, grasping their huge walking-sticks and their hats, in silence. At length Mrs. Aubrey showed symptoms of recovery, uttering a long, deep sigh.

"I say, Master," at length whispered the follower, "this here seems a bad business, don't it?"

"Jemmy, Jemmy! you a'n't got half the pluck of a bum! There's nothing in all this when one's used to it, as I am."

"P'raps the gemman don't rightly owe the money, after all?"

"Don't he, eh? And they've sworn he does?—No chaffing. The sooner (I'm thinking) we have him off from all this here blubbering, the better."

"Bless'd if I ever I see'd two such beautiful women afore. I don't half like it; I wish we'd nabbed him in the street—and"—he lowered his whisper—"if there's much o' this here sort o' work to be done, I've had enough of being a bum already, an' I'll go back to my business again, bad as it is."

"My good men!" said Kate, approaching them, and speaking with forced calmness—pushing aside her disordered hair from her pale cheeks, "Can't you leave him here—only a day longer?"

"Can't, miss; it's quite impossible; it's not to be done for no money short of debt and costs," said the officer respectfully, but rather doggedly, as if he were getting tired of the scene. "One would think that we were a-goin' to murder the gemman! Once for all, if so be he will only go as a gemman should, to my little place in Chancery Lane—(my name's Grab, miss, at your service, and there a'n't a better conducted lock-up nor mine in London, I assure you, nor where debtors is more comfortably looked arter)—he's no need to be there above a day or two—it may be less—and of course his friends will come and bail him out: so don't be a-going on so when it's no manner o' use!"

"Charles! My love!" murmured Mrs. Aubrey, faintly—"they surely will not separate us? Oh! let us go together—I don't care where we go to, so long as I am with you."

"Do not ask it, my darling! my heart's love!" replied Mr. Aubrey, tenderly, as he supported her in his arms, and against his knee—and a tear fell from his eye upon her cheek—"I shall be exposed to but little inconvenience, I am certain. There can be no violence or insult offered me so long as I am submissive; and I shall soon, please God, be back."

"Oh, Charles!" I shall die; I shall never survive seeing you carried away!"—she was becoming increasingly vehement.

"Agnes, Agnes!" said her husband, reprovingly, "the mother must not desert her children; my heart will ache every moment that I am absent, if I think that my dear little ones have not a mother's protection."

"Kate will take care of them, love!" said Mrs. Aubrey, faintly; and her husband tenderly kissed her forehead. While this hurried colloquy between the wretched couple was proceeding, Kate was talking in low but impassioned tones to the two officers, who listened to her respectfully, but shook their heads.

"No, miss; it can't be; it can't indeed."

"But you shall have every thing—I have still a good many handsome dresses; jewels, all—all. Surely they will fetch something; and then there's a plate, and books, and furniture—you can't think Mr. Aubrey is going basely to run away."

"If, as how, miss, (you see,) it was only ourselves that you had to do with—but Lord love you, miss! we're only officers, and has our duty to do, and must do it!—why, we'd go a little out of our way for to oblige a lady; but the people you must go to is the gemma whose names is here," pointing to the warrant; "they're the people as the money's owing to—Quirk, Gammon!"

"Do n't name them! They are fiends! They are villains! They are robbing, then, ruining, my wretched brother!" exclaimed Miss Aubrey, with dreadful vehemence.

"Kate, Kate!" cried Mr. Aubrey, kindly but peremptorily—"in mercy to me, be silent! Restrain your feelings, or really I must hasten my departure."

"Oh, Charles!" faltered Miss Aubrey, sinking down on a chair exhausted, and burying her face in her handkerchief.

"Now, sir, if you please," commenced Grab, turning to Mr. Aubrey, "we must be thinking of going, seeing I expect I've another job on hand to-day; would you prefer coaching or walking it? Excuse me, sir, I've seen many such things as this; and I know it's only a haggawating of your feelings to be stopping here—the longer the worse! What must be, had better be done at once, and got over with. I've been a-telling this here young lady a many times, that it's no use fretting—and that in course you'll be soon back again, when you've done what's needful; so had n't my man here better go and get a coach?"

"It is so, indeed!" exclaimed Mr. Aubrey, with a profound sigh—and endeavored for some time, by all the means in his power, to soothe and pacify his wretched companions.

"Can I speak a word with you alone, before I go?" he presently inquired of the officer.

"In course, sir," replied Grab; and, promising to return in a minute or two's time, Mr. Aubrey quitted the room with Grab close at his heels; and presently they were both standing in his little study.

"Betwixt ourselves, sir," quoth Grab, in a confidential tone, "you've rather keen hands to deal with;" here he laid his finger along his nose, and winked his eye—"and you'll lose no time in turning yourself about. You understand, sir?"

"Perfectly," replied Mr. Aubrey, with a sigh. "Who gave you your instructions in this matter?"

"Mr. Snap—the junior partner—it was him that brought this here warrant to me."

"Are you sure? Was it not Mr. Gammon?"

"No, sir; Snap—Snap; that little cockatoo of a chap. Mr. Gammon called at my office half an hour afterward, to be sure."

"I thought so," interrupted Mr. Aubrey quickly, his face flushing, and feeling relieved from a vast pressure.

"Ay," continued Grab, phlegmatically, "he'll see you don't come to much harm in this matter."

"What do you mean?" inquired Mr. Aubrey, surprisedly.

"Lord! I could tell by his way. He called to say that since they had resolved to go agin you, he hoped we'd show you every attention, and deal easy by you."

"Indeed!"

"Ay—indeed! And I think he said it was a cruel business—nay, I'm sure he did; and that, as for him, he washed his hands on't!" Mr. Aubrey seemed confounded.

"I do n't somehow think him and his partners are on the best of terms together—but that's no business o' mine, you know, sir! And now, sir, excuse me, but we must be jogging."

"But, my friend, is there really no way," enquired Mr. Aubrey with manifest perturbation, "by which I can delay accompanying you for a few hours?"

"Oh can't sir—unpossible!"

"You can remain in possession here—I will be in your custody—I have a little plate, books, and furniture, which would surely stand sufficient security."

"It's no use, sir; go you must—and that without much longer shilly-shallying. It's no use!"

Aubrey seemed for a moment overpowered by his emotions.

"I fear, myself, that there is no alternative," said he; "but it will almost break the hearts of those ladies—one of whom is my wife!" His voice faltered.

"You take my advice, sir! Let my man start off for a coach—you have a shirt or two put up, and an amusing book—or a bit of a cribbage-board, or a pack of cards, if they're at hand—and give 'em the slip: I assure you it's much the best way; and when you're once out of the house, they'll come to, and make up their minds to it—never fear 'em."

"Send, then, for a coach—delay, I see, is worse than useless," said he, hastily, hearing steps approaching the study door, which was thrust open, and Mrs. Aubrey and Miss Aubrey entered, unable any longer to endure his absence—and as if fearful lest, in mercy to them, he should be contriving to leave them secretly. Grab, having dispatched his follower for a coach, at Mr. Aubrey's earnest request to be left alone for a few minutes, withdrew—but first cast a keen scrutinizing eye at the window—the chimney—and then, having closed the door, stood outside, in a position which commanded both door and window.

"Now, my own Agnes! my sweet Kate!" commenced Aubrey, in a low earnest tone, having bolted the door to secure themselves from interruption during the few precious moments which remained to them before the arrival of the coach—"I must within a very few minutes, leave you! Remember—remember, loves!—I am unfortunate, but I am not disgraced—I look on this as a dispensation of Providence—a wise and good Providence;—let us all learn submission—resignation! Whether or not we are really the victims of treachery and hypocrisy, I am unable at present to tell; but let us learn to bear this last crowning indignity with the fortitude of Christians!—relying on it, that God will overrule the most trying and disastrous events for our good!—Kneel down! Let us bow before the throne of Heaven, and supplicate its blessing and support, in this our greatest extremity!" He said this calmly, but his face was deadly pale, and his voice faltered—while they clung round him and heaved convulsive sobs, as they half unconsciously sunk on their knees with him. Then they rose—and certainly a gracious Providence had not listened in vain to the earnest, heartfelt cries that were uttered by those persecuted and heart-broken beings: for they felt a sense of composure stealing over their troubled bosoms—as if they had seen for a moment a bright light glancing through the gloom of their sorrows. Yet poor nature was wrung—wrung indeed! Mr. Aubrey proceeded to make some little preparations for his departure—putting a five-pound note into his pocket—and leaving but little more behind him; and the servant being summoned into the room, was dispatched to put up a change of linen for him. He then implored and conjured them, as they loved him, to struggle against their feelings;—and to rely upon his pledge to send them, within ten hours at the farthest, intelligence of his movements—assuring them of his confident belief, that in less than twenty-four hours he should have returned to them. While he was speaking in this strain, Mrs. Aubrey suddenly quitted the room, and after a moment's absence returned, her pallid, agitated countenance overspread with a wild smile of delight, as she exclaimed breathlessly—"There, love! Dearest Charles! He says there is no harm in the world in going with you in the coach—and, indeed, we may have rooms to ourselves!"

"My sweet Agnes."

"I will—I will go with you, Charles! Nothing shall prevent me—even if I leave you at the door of the place you are going to!"

It was in vain for Mr. Aubrey to protest—as he did, both earnestly and vehemently;—her impassioned importunities were irresistible, and she rushed breathlessly up stairs to prepare her dress to accompany him on his brief but melancholy journey. Within a very few minutes she returned, just as the sound of the coach wheels approaching the door was heard. Mr. Aubrey and Kate perceived the dangerous excitement under which she was laboring, and dreaded its effects: yet what could be done? He could not prolong his stay—and it would be infinitely more dangerous to leave her behind, now that she had set her heart upon accompanying him, than to permit her to go with them. She carried down little Agnes in her arms—and had been almost suffocating her and little Charles, who walked after her, with kisses and convulsive embraces. Both of the children were crying bitterly; and as soon as Mrs. Aubrey had reached the parlor door, and heard the coach-steps letting down, she fell into violent hysterics.

"I'll tell you what, sir," said Grab, as he stood close beside Mr. Aubrey, who was supporting Mrs. Aubrey—"it would n't be amiss if I was to say you should come along with me at once, while this poor lady's insensible—and then?"

"Oh! for God's sake—for God's sake! Remember your promise!" cried Aubrey, and in a voice which nearly reached the officer's heart: as it was he simply shrugged his shoulders, and awaited the issue with no little impatience, but in silence. 'T was in the midst of this heart-rending scene, which ensued during the next half hour, that Kate displayed the strength of character which so remarkably distinguished her; and completely mastering her own agitated feelings, she essentially contributed toward Mrs. Aubrey's restoration to a state which would admit of her at length setting off. The children had been removed—Mr. Aubrey having bid them an agonizing adieu; for he knew not what accident or contrivance might occur to prevent his return to them—and after embracing his weeping sister, he supported Mrs. Aubrey, Grab closely following them, into the coach. All three having got in, "Jem," as he was called, shut up the door, and jumping up on the coach-box, they drove away.

Poor Mrs. Aubrey, on taking her seat, drew from before her agitated yet beautiful countenance the long dark veil which she had drawn down while passing from the house into the coach, and gazed at Mr. Aubrey with such an expression of mingled tenderness and agony, as was almost sufficient to have broken the stony heart of Grab. She also held her husband's hand convulsively grasped within her own—as though fearful of their being even yet violently separated from each other.

As they went along, in answer to Aubrey's anxious enquiries concerning the nature of the scenes which awaited him, Mr. Grab told him that his—Grab's—lock-up was in Chancery-Lane, and would be found as comfortable a place as need be. He informed his prisoner, further, that he might have his choice—whether to occupy a private room with a bed-room opening into it—or go into the public room, where would be also some dozen other debtors—and in which case, of course, Mrs. Aubrey must return home alone. Mr. Aubrey enquired what would be the expense of the private room, and was horrified on hearing—two guineas and a half a-day, paid in advance!—exclusive of board and attendance, which doubtless would be charged for on a commensurate scale. The prisoner and his wife gazed at each other in silence, and felt sick at heart.

"The smallest room—at the very top of the house—would suffice for both a sitting-room and bed-room," said Aubrey—"and we do not care a straw for furniture!"

"The room I told you of, or the public room, is all I've to offer you," replied Grab, somewhat doggedly—"and you need n't cry out before you're hurt; for it may be your friends will bail you out before the night—before much harm's done!" Sick at heart, his wretched companions continued silent for the remainder of the journey, till the coach drew up opposite the door of the house of which they had been speaking. It was about halfway up Chancery-Lane, on the right hand side as you entered from the Strand. "T was a small, narrow, dingy-looking house, at the corner of a miserable court. The solitary window, level with the door, was strongly secured within by thick perpendicular iron bars. The outer door, at the top of a flight of about a dozen well-worn steps, stood open, leaving exposed to view an inner door, at about a couple of yards' distance from the outer one; and on this inner door was a brass plate bearing the terrifying name—

GRAB.

The upper part of the door was of glass, and secured from within, like the window, by strong iron bars. Aubrey's soul sunk within him as his eye took in these various points of the dismal building he was thus compelled to enter. The follower, immediately on the coach drawing up, jumped down, and running up the steps of the house, knocked at the inner door, and hurrying back, opened the coach-door and let down the steps.

"Now, Jarvey—what's the damage?" enquired Grab, before any of them got out.

"Six shillings your honor."

"You must tip, sir," quoth Grab to Mr. Aubrey—who thereupon counted out all the silver he had, except one solitary sixpence, and they descended, followed up the steps of the house closely by Grab. Their hearts failed them, as they heard the sound of heavy jingling keys from within opening the door; and the next moment they stood within a short, narrow and dark passage—the sallow, ill-looking man who had opened the door, instantly closing, barring, and locking it upon them.

"This here's the public room," quoth Grab, with the confident air of a man who feels in his own house: and, half opening a door on his left, they caught a glimpse of a number of men—some smoking; others sitting with their feet on the table, reading the newspapers; others playing at cards; and almost all of them drinking, and either laughing, talking, or singing.

"Now, sir—does this here suit your fancy?" enquired Grab, rather sharply. Mr. Aubrey felt his wife leaning heavily on his arm. "Mercy! I shall faint! I feel choked!" she whispered.

"Show us instantly up stairs, to your private room—ceest what it may," said Mr. Aubrey hastily.

"It's only fair to tell you, sir, you pay in advance—and for the whole day, though you should be out again in a quarter of an hour's time—it's the rule of the house."

"Show us up stairs, sir, without delay," said Mr. Aubrey peremptorily.

"Jemmy—show 'em up!" exclaimed Grab, briskly—on which Jem went forward, followed by Mr. Aubrey, almost entirely supporting Mrs. Aubrey—who appeared very faint—up to the narrow and angular staircase. This led them into a tolerably well-furnished room; and Mrs. Aubrey, on entering it, sunk exhausted on the sofa. Here, again, the two windows were strongly secured with iron bars, which gave a peculiarly miserable appearance to the room. The unhappy couple gazed around them for a moment, in silence.

"Beg your pardon, sir," said Grab, entering the room—"but must trouble you for two, twelve, six; always pay in advance, as I told you a-coming."

Aubrey, involuntarily shuddering, took out his pocket-book—Mrs. Aubrey bursting into tears—and handed to Grab the only money he had—his five-pound note, requesting change.

"The lady would, perhaps, like a glass of negus?" inquired Grab.

"Certainly—bring up immediately a glass of cold sherry and water," replied Mr. Aubrey.

"That will be just two, five, six to bring back—shall have it directly, sir—change and all. Here's your bed-room, sir," he added—opening a small door opposite the window—and then withdrew by that through which they had entered. When he had withdrawn, leaving them alone, Aubrey folded his arms tenderly around his wife, and kissed her cold pale cheek, and then helped her to remove her bonnet, which, with its heavy black veil, evidently oppressed her. Her rich dark hair fell disordered over her tippet; and with her flushed cheek, and restless eye, would have given the beholder a vivid picture of beauty and virtue in distress.

"Do promise me, Charles!" said she, looking fondly at him, "that I may go with you wherever they will allow you to take me."

"I trust, Agnes, that I shall be at large again before long. This is really a comfortable room," he added, evading her question.

"If only Kate and the children were here," she replied, tremulously. "Poor things! I wonder what they are doing just now! Kate will break her heart, poor girl, if we do n't return soon!"

"Never fear, Agnes! But let us look what kind of a bed-room they have given us. I hope we shall have no occasion, however, to occupy it. Come, let us see!"

"T was very small and close, to be sure, and had but one narrow window, secured, like all the others, by strong iron bars. It overlooked a little flagged yard, about fourteen feet square, surrounded on all sides by high walls, portions of adjoining houses. It was here that the prisoners "took the air," and their escape was effectually prevented by close and strong bars of iron passing from side to side, at about ten feet distance from the ground. They looked down, and beheld two or three men sitting and standing beneath, who looked more like animals caged in a menagerie than mere human beings. "T was to Aubrey a sickening sight, and he turned from the window, and they both re-entered the front room as Grab returned with the sherry and water, and the change, which he told down on the table. He then asked what they would like to have for dinner—cutlets, steaks, or chops—as he wished to know before Mrs. Grab went out "to order the house dinner." They seemed, however, to loathe the idea of eating, not a little to the annoyance of their truly hospitable host. Aubrey, earnestly begging him to send off a message instantly, with his card, to Mr. Runnington.

"A couple of shillings for the man, sir," said Grab; and, having received it, withdrew, leaving Mr. and Mrs. Aubrey to themselves for nearly an hour and a half; at the end of which period, their hearts leaped for joy to see Mr. Runnington enter the room, with a countenance full of concern and sympathy.

"Well, but you shall not be much longer in this hateful hole, at any rate," said he, after some half-hour's anxious conversation with them; and ringing the bell, directed the man to send Grab up stairs, and to fetch pen, ink, and paper. In a few minutes Grab appeared. "You've no objection, I suppose, Grab, to discharge Mr. Aubrey on my undertaking?"

"In course not, sir," replied Grab, readily; but he was a good deal disappointed at so abrupt a close to his exactious. Mr. Runnington sat down and began to write. "You had better send off to the office, and see if there's anything else there," he added, (meaning that Grab should search, as he was bound to do, for any other writs against Mr. Aubrey which might be lodged with the sheriff, before discharging his prisoner out of custody.)

"You do n't apprehend anything there, do you?" enquired Mr. Runnington, rather seriously, without taking his eye from the paper on which he was writing.

"Heaven only knows! But I think not," replied Aubrey.

The following was the undertaking given by Mr. Runnington, and which operated as an instant release of his oppressed and truly persecuted client:

"Aubrey ats. Quirk and others.

"We hereby undertake to procure the execution of a good and sufficient bail-bond herein, for the above-named defendant, in due time.

RUNNINGTON & Co.,
Defendant's Attorneys.

"To Mr. Grab,
"Officer to the Sheriff of Middlesex."

With this document lying before them, and awaiting the messenger's return from the sheriff's office, Mr. Runnington and Mr. Aubrey conversed together anxiously on the subject of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap's bill. Mr. Aubrey was sufficiently acquainted with the general course of practice to be aware, that beyond requiring him to put in bail to the action, (special bail, as it is called,) no effective step could be taken against him for several months to come; i. e. till Michaelmas term in the ensuing November,* however eager and active the plaintiffs might be: so that he had an interval of at least four months, in which, as the phrase is, "to turn himself about," and endeavor to discover some mode of extricating himself from his present serious dilemma. After reminding Mr. Aubrey that neither a peer of the realm, nor a member of parliament, nor an attorney, could become bail for him, Mr. Runnington requested the names of two or three confidential friends to whom he might apply to become security for Mr. Aubrey; and as he should be at any time able to exonerate them from liability, by surrendering his person to his creditors, he felt no hesitation in applying to them to perform for him this act of kindness. "By the way," said Mr. Runnington, in the course of their conversation, and with apparent carelessness, "could I say a word or two to you on a little matter of business? And will Mrs. Aubrey excuse us for a moment?" turning toward her. She bowed, and they withdrew for a moment into the adjoining bed-room.

"Put this into your pocket," said Mr. Runnington, taking out the day's newspaper; "and when you have an opportunity, read the account of what took place yesterday in the Court of King's Bench. It startled me not a little, I can tell you; and the reason of my not having been at the office when your messenger arrived was, that I had not returned from Vivian Street, whither, and to the Temple, I had gone in search of you. For heaven's sake don't alarm Mrs. Aubrey, or Miss Aubrey; but, if any thing occurs to you, do not lose one moment in putting yourself into communication with us. If possible, I will call at Vivian Street this evening." With this they returned to the sitting-room, nothing in their appearance calculated to alarm Mrs. Aubrey, or even attract her attention.

Shortly afterward Grab entered the room.

"All right, sir!" said he to Mr. Runnington; and added, turning to Mr. Aubrey, "you're no longer in my custody, sir; and I hope you'll never be again."

"Oh, Charles! thank God!—Let us not stay another moment!" exclaimed Mrs. Aubrey, joyously starting up, and putting on her bonnet. "Oh, let us get once more into the open street!—the sweet fresh air!—Kate will go wild with joy to see us again!—Oh, dear Mr. Runnington! how can we sufficiently thank you?" she added, turning towards him enthusiastically. Within a few minutes' time they had quitted that dismal scene; they were again apparently free. On first stepping into the bright cheering sunlight, and bustling noisy street, it had a sort of freshness—of novelty—to them. Now they were free to go whithersoever they chose!—Oh, blessed LIBERTY!—let an Englishman lose thee for but an hour, to become aware of thy value!—It seemed to the Aubreys, as if ten times the real interval had elapsed between their entering and quitting the scene of his incarceration. With what exhilarated spirits they hastened homeward! as if a millstone were no longer suspended from their necks. But Mr. Aubrey suddenly bethought himself of the newspaper given him by Mr. Runnington; and it cost him, indeed, a great effort to assume a cheerfulness so foreign to his feelings.

While, however, they are thus walking homeward, intending, in the event of Mrs. Aubrey becoming fatigued, to take a shilling drive on their way, let me, in order to enable the reader to appreciate the paragraph to which Mr. Runnington had called Aubrey's attention, turn for a while from the virtuous and afflicted couple, to trace the leading movements of that master spirit of evil, Mr. Gammon; for which purpose, it will be necessary to take up the history from the evening of the day in which Mr. Aubrey had called at Mr. Gammon's chambers, to forbid him visiting any longer at Vivian Street. By that time, Mr. Gammon had thoroughly thought out his plan of operations. What had passed between him and Miss Aubrey and her brother, had satisfied him that the time for calling into action all his forces had arrived; and the exact end he proposed to himself, was to plunge Mr. Aubrey at once into apparently inextricable and hopeless difficulty—into total ruin—so as to render them all more accessible to Mr. Gammon's advances, and to force Miss Aubrey into entertaining his addresses, as the sole means of effecting her brother's liberation. For this purpose, it would be necessary to make him debtor to so large an amount as would preclude the interference of even the most liberally-disposed of his friends. They might very probably go as far as fifteen hundred pounds on his behalf, who could not be brought to think of nearly twelve thousand pounds—it being borne in mind, that one alone of Mr. Aubrey's friends, Lord de la Zouch, was already liable, on his behalf, to some eleven thousand pounds, which would become payable on the ensuing 24th of January. But the mask was not yet to be thrown off: Gammon resolved to appear the firm friend of Mr. Aubrey to the last; deprecating vehemently, and striving to avert from him, the very proceedings which he was all the while, with secret skill and vigor, urging on against him. He determined, therefore, to recall Titmouse's attention to the two promissory notes for £5,000 each; to pretend reluctance to allow them to be put in suit, and yet give him clearly to understand that he might do so, without giving mortal offence to Gammon.

At the moment of the reader's being re-introduced to Mr. Gammon, that gentleman was sitting, about nine o'clock in the evening, at his chambers, beside a table, on which were placed a lustrous lamp, a number of papers, and coffee. In one hand he held the rough draft of his rent-charge, which had that day been sent to him by Mr. Frankpledge, and he was occasionally making pencil memoranda on the margin as he went along. He would sometimes pause in his task, as if his thoughts wandered to other subjects; his countenance looked harassed, his ample brow seemed laden with anxiety. Certainly, great as was his energy, clear as was his head, and accustomed as he was to the dispatch of business of even the most difficult and varied description, all his powers were at that moment taxed to their very uttermost stretch, as a hasty glance round the room will satisfy the reader. On the sofa lay several piles of loose papers. First, there were the drafts, briefs—and voluminous they were—which he was now preparing, or rather settling, in the following actions for bribery penalties, coming on for trial at the ensuing Yorkshire Assizes:

"WIGLEY v. GAMMON, (S. J.)"

"Same v. MUDDLETON, (S. J.)"

"Same v. BLOODUCK, (S. J.)"

"Same v. WOODLOUSE, (S. J.)"

All these serious actions were being pushed forward with great vigor, at the instance of Lord de la Zouch, who had, moreover, directed them all to be made special jury causes.

Secondly, a monstrous mass of papers, also lying on the sofa, contained the heterogeneous elements, out of which it required a head as clear as Gammon's to draw up a brief for the defence in a very complicated case of conspiracy—"The KING v. MIDDLETON, SNAKE, and OTHERS,"—and which was coming on for trial at the ensuing King's Bench sittings for London; it having been removed, on account of its great difficulty and importance, by certiorari from the Old Bailey. It ought to have been by this time prepared; yet Mr. Gammon had scarcely even looked at the papers, though the credit of their office was at stake, as the case had attracted a large share of public attention.

Thirdly, there were scattered about complete masses of papers connected with the various joint-stock companies in which Mr. Gammon was concerned, either openly or secretly—either professionally or as a share-holder; the management of many of them requiring infinite vigilance and tact. These matters, however, and many others which had accumulated upon him, till the bare thoughts of them oppressed and distracted him, he had altogether neglected, occupied as he was by the absorbing pursuit of Miss Aubrey, and the consummation of his schemes and purposes respecting Titmouse and the Yatton property. As if all this had not been sufficient, there was yet another of a totally different description. Gammon was writing a series of very popular and powerful attacks in the Sunday Flash, upon a certain Tory ex-Minister—in fact, endeavors to write him down—and this with the privacy, and even occasional assistance, of one whom Gammon intended, in due time, to make great use of, as soon as his lordship should have sufficiently committed himself; viz. my Lord Blossom and Box. Now, Gammon had for three weeks running disappointed the numerous readers of the Sunday Flash, during which period, also, he had been almost baited to death upon the subject, by old Quirk, the chief proprietor of the paper; and that very evening, the odious viper, its editor, had been there badgering him till he had given a positive pledge to prepare an article against the ensuing Saturday. All these things put together, were enough for one strong-headed man to bear up against, and Gammon felt very nearly overwhelmed; and the reader will think it very excusable in Mr. Gammon, that he felt such difficulty in commanding his thoughts even to the interesting task of settling the draft of his own rent-charge on the Yatton proerty. He was not quite satisfied with the way in which Frankpledge had tinkered up the "consideration" shadowed forth in Gammon's instructions, and was just sketching off one compounded of a "certain sum of five thousand pounds of good and lawful money of Great Britain, by the aforesaid Oily Gammon, at or before the execution of these presents, paid to the said Tittlebat Titmouse, and the receipt whereof the said Titmouse acknowledged, and from the same and every part thereof, released and discharged the said Oily Gammon, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns" (!!!) And "of the great skill, and exertion, and sacrifices of the said Oily Gammon, for and on behalf of the said Tittlebat Titmouse, in the recovery of the Yattson property," &c. &c.

I say he had just finished off this little matter, and was varying one or two of the expressions, when a sharp knock at his door announced the arrival of the intelligent grantor of the aforesaid annuity, Mr. Titmouse himself, whose stylish cab was at that moment standing opposite to the entrance to the Thieves' Inn, in Holburn, having brought him direct from the House of Commons, whither, however, he was to return by eleven o'clock, till which time he had paired off, in order to enable him to come and consult Mr. Gammon on one or two important matters. Poor Titmouse had conceived, since his memorable interview with Gammon formerly related, a violent hatred of Mr. Gammon; but which was almost absorbed in his dread of that gentleman, who had such unlimited power over him. The sudden and serious diminution of his income by Gammon's rent charge, almost turned his head upside down, and occasioned a pother in his little bosom which was all the greater for his being unable to admit any sympathising friend into his confidence. He had become fidgety and irritable to a high degree; his countenance and demeanor troubled and depressed; from all which, the more intimate among his brother senators naturally inferred that he had lost large sums at play, or was harassed by his election expenses; or had quarreled with his mistress, or been found out by his wife; or been kicked, and dared not call out the aggressor; or that some other such accident as frequently happens to young gentlemen of fashion, had befallen him. Now, to be candid with the reader, Titmouse certainly was getting into rather deep water. Formidable creditors were beginning to look somewhat sternly after him from various quarters; his upholsterer was becoming troublesome; his wine-merchant insisted on at least four hundred pounds on account; Messrs. Jewel and Nicknack were surprised at having received no payment for sundry expensive articles of Jewelry and virtu. His coach-maker, his tailor, a host of household creditors, were getting very restless. He had a running account of some £600 or £800 at the Gliddington, in respect of his parliamentary and other dinners at that fashionable establishment. His yacht was a dreadful drain upon him; he had been unfortunate in his sporting speculations. In short, if Gammon had his anxieties, so had Titmouse. He felt himself getting terribly out at elbows; so much so, that he could no longer give that calm and undivided attention to his parliamentary duties which his enlightened constituents had a right to expect at his hands; and, in short, the sole occasion of his calling on Gammon, was to see if that gentleman could devise some mode of once more replenishing his empty coffers—a further mortgage on the Yattson property being the exact mode of doing so which he was about to propose to Gammon. It required some tact, however, as he felt, to broach that subject, in the present position of affairs; so he avowed that he had called to see if Mr. Gammon's deeds were ready for signing—as he, Titmouse, was anxious to get it off his mind. Time was very precious with Mr. Gammon: he therefore lost not a moment in plucking aside the thin disguise of Titmouse, and discovering the real object of his visit. Mr. Gammon looked very serious indeed, on hearing the account of Titmouse's prodigal expenditure, and remonstrated with him earnestly, and even authoritatively; but it instantly occurred to him—could there possibly be a better opportunity for broaching the subject of the two promissory notes?

"My dear Titmouse," said he, with great kindness of manner, "notwithstanding all I have felt it my duty to say, I do sincerely wish it were in my power to serve you in this emergency. But we really must spare old Yattson for a little; you've sadly burthened her already. We shall be killing the goose to get at the golden egg, if we do n't mind what we're about!"

"——! But what the devil's to be done, Mr. Gammon? For, 'pon my soul, I'm most particular hard up, and something must be done."

"We must bethink ourselves of our other resources, my dear sir—let us see"—he paused, with his hand resting on his forehead for a few moments—"Oh! by the way—certainly," he added suddenly—"but no! it's a thousand pities; but my word is pledged."

"Eh? what? does any thing strike you, Gammon?—'Pon my life, what is it?" inquired Titmouse, pricking up his ears.

"Why, yes, certainly," replied Gammon, musingly, adding, as if he did not intend Titmouse to hear him, "to be sure it would put ten thousand—nay, with the interest, nearly eleven"—

"The devil it would! What would! My stars, Mr. Gammon!" exclaimed Titmouse, eagerly—"Do let us know what it is!"

"Why, I was certainly thinking, at the moment," replied Gammon, with a sigh, "of that poor devil Aubrey's two notes for £5,000 a-piece and interest."

Titmouse's face suddenly fell. "Oh, Lord! is that all? Hang the fellow! he's a beggar—squeezed dry—nothing more to be got out of him!" he exclaimed, with mingled chagrin and contempt. "A'n't worth powder and shot! Blood from a stone—won't have any thing worth taking this ten years to come!"

"Poor fellow!" quoth Gammon.

"'Pon my soul, Gammon, it's me you may say that of, I rather think!"

"Why," said Gammon, glancing rather keenly at Titmouse, "my first and greatest duty on earth, my dear Titmouse, is to you—to look after, to secure your interests; and candor compels me to say, that, whatever may be my feelings toward that unfortunate person, still, I think, you've only to squeeze him pretty hard, and blood would come from other people. Eh! you understand?"

"By Jove!—Indeed!—No! But would it really? How?

—Squeeze away, then, and be ——! Please bring an action against the fellow the first thing in the morning! Put him in jail, and he'll get the money, I'll warrant him! Dem the fellow! why don't he pay his debts? It's devilish hard on me, a'n't it? Did n't I forgive him forty thousand pounds? By the way, I'd forgot there's the other ten thousand that Lord de la Zouch is surety for—when do we touch that?"

"Oh! we've taken a bond for that, which will not fall due before—let me see—the 24th of next January."

"'Pon my soul, what a cursed bore! But can't one do any thing with it before then?"

"What! Sue on it before it's due!"

"No—egad! I mean, raise the wind on it. Surely Lord de la Zouch's name is ——"

"Whew!" thought Gammon, "that stroke certainly had never occurred to me! Ay, he's right, the little fool! Old Fang will advance £8,000 or £9,000, or more, even. I'll see to it, by Jove!" Then he said aloud, "It may be possible, certainly, my dear Titmouse, but I see very great obstacles in the way."

"Some cursed law point—eh?"

"Yes; but I assure you I will turn my best attention to it," he added; and proceeded to bring back Titmouse to the point at which he had started off. "And speaking of poor Aubrey—it's certainly true that you have been, I may say, extravagantly liberal to him—forbearing beyond example; and I can't think that any one can be expected, when he knows a wave of his hand will put some eleven thousand pounds into his pocket, to stand by idle for ever! It is not in human nature!"

"No; 'pon my life it is n't," quoth Titmouse, with a puzzled air, quite unable to make out whether Gammon intended to favor or discourage the notion of immediately proceeding against Aubrey; which Gammon observing, he proceeded—"At all events, I should say, that if you consider that your own necessities!"

"Demme! I should think so!" interposed Titmouse.

"Required it—and, as you very properly observed, you are the best judge; certainly!"—he paused: surely Titmouse now saw his drift!

"Yes—'pon my soul!" exclaimed Titmouse.

"Why, in that case, it is only due to myself to say I can be no party to it: I have had to bear enough already that was due to others; and since I have solemnly pledged my word of honor to Mr——"

"What the devil do you mean, Gammon? Cuss me, if I can make you out a bit!" interrupted Titmouse snappishly.

"You misunderstand me, my dear Titmouse! Once for all, I say, if you want the money, you must at once sue on the bill notes; and my opinion is, you'll get the money—only, I must not appear in it, you know! But if you choose to employ some other solicitor—there's that Mr. Spitfire, for instance—to compel me to give up the notes!"

"Oh, Lord! Honor! No, no!—So bless me Heaven! I did n't mean anything of the kind," cried Titmouse alarmedly, fearful of offending Gammon, who could scarcely conceal his impatience and disgust at the stupidity of Titmouse.

"I cannot make you understand me, Titmouse! What I mean is, it is my duty not to let my feelings interfere with your interests. I now, therefore, advise you immediately to put yourself into the hands—as far as this little business is concerned—of some other solicitor, say Mr. Spitfire, in Scorpion Court; and whatever he tells you to do—do without hesitation. You will probably tell him that, if he demands the two notes on your behalf, I may, for form's sake, resist; but I know I shall be ordered to give them up! Well—I can't help it!"

"Honor now, Gammon! May I do as I like?" enquired Titmouse.

"Honor!"

"And you won't be angry? Not a bit! eh?"

"On my sacred word of honor!" replied Gammon solemnly, placing his hand on his breast.

"Then fire away, Flannagan!" cried Titmouse joyfully, snapping his fingers. "By Jove, here goes! Here's for a jolly squeeze! Ah, ha! Ten thousand drops of blood!—by Jove, he'll bleed to death! But, by the way, what will Mr. Quirk say?"

"Curse Mr. Quirk!" cried Gammon, impatiently; "you know the course you are to pursue—you are your own master, surely! What has Mr. Quirk to do with you, when I allow you to act in this way?"

"To be sure! Well! here's a go! Was n't it a lucky thought of mine to come here to night? But do n't you forget the other ten thousand—the two makes twenty thousand, by Jove! I'm set up again—ah, ha! And as soon as ever the House is up, if I do n't cut away in my span-new yacht, with a lot of jolly chaps, to the East Indies, or some other place that'll take us a good six weeks, or so, to go and come back in. Hello! Is that eleven o'clock striking?" he enquired with a start, taking out his watch; "It is, by Jove! and my pair's up; they'll be dividing—I'm off! Goodnight!"

"You remember where Mr. Spitfire lives? In Scorpion Court, Strand. I must say, he's one of the most respectable men in the profession; and so quick!"

"Ah—I remember! I'll be with him the moment after breakfast!" replied Titmouse: Gammon shook him by the hand—feeling, when he had shut both his doors, as if he had been playing with an ape. "Oh, thou indefinable and undiscoverable principle regulating human affairs!" thought he, falling into a reverie, a bitter scowl settling on his strongly marked features; "of what nature soever thou art, and if any such there really be, what conceivable purpose can'st thou have had in view in placing this execrable idiot and me, in our relative positions?" He pursued this line of reflection for some time, till he had got into a far more melancholy and misanthropical humor than he had ever before fallen into—till, recollecting himself, and with a deep sigh, he rang for a fresh supply of coffee from his drowsy landress; and then exerted himself vigorously till nearly five o'clock in the morning, at which hour he got, exhausted, into bed.

During the ensuing day, sure enough, he received a letter signed "Simon Spitfire," and dated from "Scorpion Court," informing him that its respectable writer "was instructed to apply to him, on the part of Mr. Titmouse, for the immediate delivery up of two promissory notes for £5,000 each, given by one Charles Aubrey to the aforesaid Titmouse," and "begging Mr. Gammon's immediate attention thereto." Gammon immediately copied out and sent a letter ter which he had prepared before-hand—taking very high ground indeed, but slipping in an encouraging admission of the strict legal right of Mr. Spitfire's client. "I was, in short, a lovely letter—showing its writer to be one of the most fastidiously high-minded men living; but producing not the least favorable effect upon the mind of Mr. Spitfire, who instantly forwarded a formal and peremptory demand of the two documents in question. Gammon wrote a second letter, alluding to an unguarded admission made in his former letter, which he most devoutly hoped would not be used against him; and in terms of touching and energetic eloquence, re-asserted that, though the letter of the law might be against him, he conceived that, in point of honor, and, indeed, of justice, he was warranted in adhering to the solemn promise he had made to a gentleman for whom he entertained the most profound respect; and, in short, he flatly refused to give up the instruments demanded. Inconceivable was the exultation of Mr. Spitfire, on finding himself getting so much the better of so astute a person as Mr. Gammon; he took an opportunity of showing to every one who came to the office, how Mr. Gammon had laid himself open to the superior tactics of Mr. Spitfire. He then wrote a fine flourishing letter to wind up the correspondence, and stick into an affidavit, in the course of which he apprised Mr. Gammon that the Court of King's Bench would be immediately applied to for a rule calling upon him forthwith to deliver up the documents in question. On this, Mr. Gammon drew up an imposing and admirable affidavit, setting forth all the correspondence; and, as soon as he had been served with the rule nisi, he instructed the Attorney-General, Mr. Sterling, and Mr. Crystal, to "show cause" against it; knowing, of course, as well as counsel, with whom he did not think it necessary to hold a consultation, (for fear they should press him to give up the notes without showing cause,) that there was no earthly chance of successfully resisting the rule. When he took his seat under the Attorney-General, just before that learned person rose to show cause against the rule, he touched Mr. Gammon on the shoulder, and very warmly complimented him on the highly honorable and friendly feeling which he had manifested toward the unfortunate Mr. Aubrey; but he feared that the case, as far as the legal means went, was too plain for argument; but he had looked with unusual care over the affidavits on which the rule had been obtained, and at the form of the rule itself—and rejoiced to say he felt confident that he should be able to discharge the rule, with costs:—at which Mr. Gammon turned suddenly pale—with joyous surprise, as the Attorney-General imagined; he not knowing Gammon so well as we do. The reader is now in a position to appreciate the following report of what took place—and (inter nos) which said report had been drawn up for the Morning Groul, by Mr. Gammon himself.

"COURT OF KING'S BENCH.

Yesterday.

(In Banco.)

Ex parte TITMOUSE.

"This was a rule, obtained by Mr. SUTTLE on a previous day of the term, calling upon Mr. Gammon, of the firm of Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, to show cause why he should not forthwith deliver up to Mr. Titmouse, M. P. for Yattson, two promissory notes, each for the payment, on demand to that gentleman, of £5,000, with interest, by Charles Aubrey. The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, MR. STERLING, and MR. CRYSTAL, now appeared to show cause—and took a preliminary objection to the form of the rule. After a very long discussion, the Court decided that the rule might be moulded so as to meet the facts of the case, and directed cause to be shown on the merits.

"From the affidavits filed in answer to the rule, it appeared that shortly after the termination of the late important case of Doe dem. Titmouse v. Aubrey, (in which, it will be recollected, the lessor succeeded in establishing his right to a very large estate in Yorkshire,) Mr. Gammon had been very active in endeavoring to effect an amicable arrangement concerning the mesne profits; and after great exertions, had persuaded his client, Mr. Titmouse, to enter into an arrangement highly advantageous to Mr. Aubrey—who was to be released, (as we understood,) from no less a sum than Sixty Thousand Pounds, due in respect of the mesne profits, on giving the two promissory notes, which were the subject of the present application. It further appeared, that on obtaining Mr. Aubrey's signature to these promissory notes, Mr. Gammon had explicitly and repeatedly assured him that he need be under no apprehension of being called on for payment for several years; but that the notes should remain in the hands of Mr. Gammon, and should not be put in suit till after a twelvemonth's notice had been given to Mr. Aubrey. It did not distinctly appear whether Mr. Titmouse was ever made aware of this understanding between Mr. Gammon and Mr. Aubrey—at all events, nothing had ever passed in writing upon the subject. Mr. Gammon, on the contrary, frankly admitted it to be possible that Mr. Titmouse might have been under the impression, while surrendering so great a claim against Mr. Aubrey, that the sum secured by the two promissory notes was to have been before this time liquidated. There was no affidavit made on the subject by Mr. Aubrey. It also appeared that Mr. Titmouse had not hitherto received any portion of the large amount, £20,000, yet due in respect of the mesne profits. The affidavits read by the Attorney-General set forth a correspondence which had taken place between Mr. Titmouse's solicitor and Mr. Gammon, in which the latter insisted, in the most strenuous terms, upon the honorable engagement under which he conceived himself to be to Mr. Aubrey, and solemnly declared his belief that Mr. Aubrey was under a similar impression; at the same time, there were expressions in Mr. Gammon's letters, from which it was plain that he admitted the right, in point of strict law, of Mr. Titmouse to the documents in question. It also appeared from the affidavits of Mr. Titmouse, and was not denied by those of Mr. Gammon, that the former had repeatedly urged the latter to deliver up the notes, or commence proceedings against Mr. Aubrey—but that Mr. Gammon had, on all such occasions previous to the present one, succeeded in dissuading him from his purpose. It had, moreover, been alleged on behalf of Mr. Titmouse, that Mr. Gammon was acting in collusion with Mr. Aubrey, to defeat the just claim of Mr. Titmouse; but this the Attorney-General indignantly disclaimed on the part of Mr. Gammon, whose conduct throughout showed the nicest sense of honor, and the utmost possible anxiety to interfere between an unfortunate gentleman and utter ruin. But,

"The Court, without calling on Mr. SUBTLE, (with whom were Mr. Gosse and Mr. Mud,) said the rule must clearly be made absolute. The legal right of Mr. Titmouse to the notes was admitted by Mr. Gammon's own affidavit; and there was no pretence for holding, that as against Mr. Titmouse, Mr. Gammon, who was only one of that gentleman's attorneys, had any right to withhold the documents in question. No authority from Mr. Titmouse to Mr. Gammon to make the alleged representations to Mr. Aubrey, had been shown, and consequently that gentleman could in no way be bound by them. He was not even shown to have been aware of them. It was not pretended that Mr. Gammon, or any of his partners, had any lien on the notes, which must be therefore given up to Mr. Titmouse. With respect to the imputation against Mr. Gammon, of being in collusion with Mr. Aubrey, Lord Widdington added, that from what his lordship himself knew of Mr. Aubrey, it was impossible for a moment to imagine him capable of any thing inconsistent with the strictest honor; and that Mr. Gammon's conduct showed that, though mistaken as to the extent of his power over the notes entrusted to him, he had acted from the purest motives, and evinced an honorable anxiety to serve the interests of one whom he believed to be unfortunate. The rule was then made absolute; but on Mr. Subtle applying for the costs, the remainder of the day was occupied in an elaborate discussion upon the question—which, however, was eventually referred to the Master."

Nor was this all. The intelligent editor of the Morning Groul, happening to cast his eye over the above, while lying in proofs, made it the subject of an eloquent leading article, in which were contained many just and striking reflections on the frequent inconsistency between law and justice, of which the present, he said, was a glaring instance. It was truly lamentable to find truth, and honor, generosity, and justice, all sacrificed to the wretched technicalities, the petty quirks and quibbles, of the law—which required a radical reform. Indeed, the whole system of our jurisprudence called for the most searching revision, which, he hoped, would ere long take place. Then followed some powerful animadversions upon the conduct of Lord Widdington in giving effect to such pettifogging subterfuges as had that day served plainly to defeat the ends of justice; and the article concluded by calling upon his lordship to resign his seat on the bench, and make way for a more liberal and enlightened successor, who would decide every case that came before him, according to the dictates of natural equity and common sense, without being trammelled by such considerations as at present fettered and impeded the due administration of justice. It did so happen, that this same incompetent Lord Widdington had called down upon himself and his court the foregoing philippic, by having imposed a smart fine upon the publisher of the Morning Groul, and superadded a twelvemonth's imprisonment, for a very gross and infamous libel upon an amiable and dignified ecclesiastic; and this, too, his lordship had done, after overruling an almost interminable series of frivolous and vexatious technical objections to the proceedings, urged by the defendant's counsel, in conformity with his urgent instruction to take every possible advantage.

At the earliest moment at which Mr. Aubrey could, without suspicion, extricate himself from the embraces of his overjoyed wife, sister, and children, on his return to Vivian street, he withdrew to his study, in order to despatch some letters, but principally, as the reader may easily imagine, to peruse the paper given him by Mr. Runnington with such ominous significance. His eye soon caught the words, "Ex parte Titmouse,"—and he read through the above report of the proceedings with exceeding agitation. He read it over twice or thrice, and felt really sick at heart.

"Oh, unfortunate Gammon!" he exclaimed, at length, aloud, laying down the paper, and sinking into his chair. "Surely I am the weakest, or you the subtlest of mankind!" He turned over in his thoughts every thing that he could recollect of Gammon's conduct from the first moment that they had met. He felt completely baffled and bewildered—and again perused the report of the proceedings in the King's Bench—and would have again relapsed into thought, but his eye happened to alight on two or three notes lying on his table, where they had been placed by Fanny, having come in his absence. He opened the first listlessly, not knowing the hand-writing; but, on unfolding it, he started violently on recognising the hand-writing of Gammon within; and with mingled wonder and fear, read as follows:

"TRAVELER'S INN.

"Dear Sir: God only knows when or where these hasty lines will find you. I am forced to address them to Vivian street, being in total ignorance of your intended movements. If you have not taken my advice, and withdrawn from the kingdom, I know not what grievous indignity may not have befallen you. You may have been torn from your family, and now incarcerated in prison, the victim of a most cruel and inveterate rapacity. My conscience bears me witness that I can say—I can do—no more on your behalf. I am grossly misrepresented—I am insulted, by having base and sinister motives attributed to me, for my conduct toward you—for my anxious and repeated interference in your behalf. In the Morning Groul of to-day you will probably see—if you have not already seen—the report of some proceedings against me, yesterday, in the Court of King's Bench. It may apprise you of the last desperate stand I have made in your behalf. It is with bitter regret—it is with a feeling of deep indignation that I tell you I am unable to fulfil my solemn, my deliberate, my repeated promise to you concerning the two promissory notes which you deposited with me, in implicit reliance on my honor. Alas! you must prepare for the worst! Mr. Titmouse and his new adviser can have, of course, but one object in requiring the surrender of the two promissory notes, which I have already been compelled to give up, under peril of an attachment for contempt of court. I have strained, God knows! every nerve on your behalf; have all but fatally quarreled with Mr. Titmouse, and with my partners; and I stand in some measure compromised, by the recent proceedings, before the profession and the public—and all in vain! Yet, once more—if you are not blinded and infatuated beyond all example or belief—I implore you, in the name of Heaven—by every consideration that should influence a man of honor and of feeling—fly!—lose not a second after reading these lines, (which I entreat you to destroy when read,) or that second may involve your ruin—and the ruin of all connected with you! Believe me, your distressed—your unalterable friend,

O. G."

Mr. Aubrey laid down this letter; and sinking back again into his chair, yielded for some moments to an impulse very nearly akin to despair. "Oh God!" he exclaimed, pressing his hand against his aching forehead—to what hast thou destined us, thy wretched creatures!—I am forbidden to believe—I cannot—I will not believe—that thou hast made us only to torment us; yet, alas! my spirit is at last drooping under these accumulating evils!—Oh God! Oh God! I am blind! Give me sight to discover thy will concerning me!—Oh, give me not up to despair! Break not the bruised reed! Quench not the smoking flax!—What is to become of me? Is this man thy messenger of evil to me? Is he the subtle and vindictive fiend I fear him to be? What can be his object—his motive—for resorting to such tortuous and complicated scheming against us as must be his, if he be playing thy hypocrite—Or is he really what he represents himself? And am I guilty of groundless distrust—of gross ingratitude?—What shall I think, what can I do? Oh, my God, preserve my senses to me—my understanding! My brain seems reeling! My perceptions are becoming disturbed!—Perhaps this very night, the frightful scene of the morning may be acted over again! again my bleeding heart be torn from those it loves—to whom thou hast united it! A deep sigh, or rather groan, burst from him; and leaning over the table, he buried his face in his hands, and remained for some time in that posture.

"What am I to do?" he presently inquired, rising, and walking to and fro. "Fly—he says! Were I weak and unprincipled enough to do so, should I not, in all human probability, fall into the deepest pit he has dug for me? But be that as it may—fly I will not! Never! Never! Those dear—those precious beings in yonder"—his heart thrilled within him—"may weep for me, but shall never blush for me!"

"Why—how horrid is my position! Ten—ten thousand pounds and upwards, must either I pay, or Lord de la Zouch for me, within a few months; here is a second ten thousand pounds, with nearly five hundred pounds of interest; I am to-day arrested for nearly fifteen hundred pounds; and this man Titmouse holds my bond for two thousand pounds more, and interest! Is it, then, thy will, O God! that I am to sink beneath thy troubles? Am I to perish from thy sight? To be crushed beneath thy displeasure?—Or, merciful!—wilt Thou save me, when there is none other to help?"

Calmness seemed stealing insensibly over his troubled spirit; his agitated feelings sank gradually into an indescribable and wonderful repose; in that dismal moment of extreme suffering, his soul became blessedly sensible of its relationship to God;—that he was not the miserable victim of chance—as the busy spirit of darkness incessantly whispered in his ear—but in the hands of the Father of the spirits of all flesh, who listened, in his behalf, to the pleading of One touched with the feeling of our infirmities—who was in all points tempted, even as we are. His fainting soul felt sustained as by the grace for which it had sought; the oil and balm of a sound scriptural consolation were poured into his wounds. Before his quickened eye arose many bright figures of those who had overcome the fiercest assaults of the Evil One, resisting even unto death: he felt for a moment compassed about by a great cloud of witnesses to the mercy and goodness of God. Oh, in that moment, how wonderfully little seemed the sorrows which had before appeared so great! He felt, in a manner, at once humbled and exalted. Invisible support clung to his confident soul—as it were the arm of Him who will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able; but will, with the temptation, also make a way to escape, that we may be able to bear it. He sank silently upon his knees; and with clasped hands, and his face raised toward heaven, with profound contrition of spirit, yet with firm faith, besought the mercy which God has promised to those who thus will ask for it. Thus occupied, he did not perceive the door gently opened, and by Mrs. Aubrey—who, closing it hastily after her, flung her arm round his neck, sinking down beside him, and in a low, fond voice, exclaimed—"Oh, my own love! My own Charles! My poor, oppressed, persecuted, heart-broken husband! Pray for me—me also!" He gently returned her embrace, looking at her unutterable things; and after they had remained thus for a few moments, they arose. He gazed at her with unspeakable tenderness, and a countenance full of serenity and resignation. He gently soothed her agitated feelings, and succeeded in communicating to her a measure of the composure which he experienced himself. Before they had quitted that little room, he had even apprised her, faithfully, of the peril which momentarily menaced them—and again the cold waters gushed over her soul. At length, however, she had recovered her self-possession sufficiently to return to the room she had quitted, and instantly blanched Miss Aubrey's cheek by communicating the new terrors which threatened them.

Just as they were finishing dinner—a mere mockery, however, of a meal—a double knock at the door occasioned them all not a little agitation; but, as the event proved, needlessly, since it announced the arrival of only their kind experienced friend, Mr. Runnington—who evidently felt infinitely relieved at finding that Mrs. Aubrey and Miss Aubrey had been made acquainted by Mr. Aubrey with the additional source of apprehension afforded by the report of the King's Bench proceedings. Mr. Runnington felt assured that within twenty-four hours' time proceedings would be taken against Mr. Aubrey; whom, however, he reminded that as in the former, so in the anticipated case, the extent of his immediate anxiety would be the finding bail for so very serious an amount: but that difficulty surmounted, he would be safe from personal annoyance and apprehension till the ensuing November.

Mr. Aubrey then proceeded to inform Mr. Runnington of the death of old Lady Stratton, and the grievous events connected with it, amidst the tears and sobs of Mrs. Aubrey and Kate. Though he said but little, his countenance showed how truly shocked he was at the intelligence. "Never in my experience," at length he observed, "a thirty-six years' experience in the profession, have I heard of, or met with, such a case of complicated misfortune as yours! 'But is is,' as the old proverb has it, 'a long lane that has no turning.' We must trust, my dear sir, to the chapter of accidents."

"Oh, Mr. Runnington!" interrupted Aubrey, with animation, "there is no such thing. It is the order of Providence."

They then entered into a long conversation; in the course of which—"If our fears—our worst fears—be confirmed," observed Runnington, "and they venture to put in suit these two notes—then they will have thrown down the gauntlet. I'll take it up—and there's no knowing what may turn up, when we come to close quarters. First and foremost, I'll tax every farthing of the alleged 'balance' of their monstrous bill—ay, I'll stake my reputation on it, that I leave them not a shilling; but, on the contrary, prove that you have already greatly overpaid them."

"Alas! have I not, however, pledged myself to Mr. Gammon not to do so?" interrupted Aubrey.

"Pshaw!—Forgive me, but this is absurd. Indeed, Mr. Aubrey, it is really out-heroding Herod! All is fair against adversaries such as these! Besides, if you must be scrupulous and fastidious—and I honor you for it—there's another way of putting it, which I fancy settles the matter. By Mr. Titmouse putting these bills in suit, Messrs. Quirk, Gammon and Snap's promise to you is not performed—it is broken; and so there is an end of yours, which is dependent upon the promise of theirs."

"That is only on the supposition that they are playing me false—whereas the proceedings yesterday in court, especially when coupled with Mr. Gammon's letters to me"

"All hollow! hollow!" replied Mr. Runnington, shaking his head. "False and hypocritical! Who could trust to Gammon? This fellow Titmouse, whom they are doubtless fleecing daily, is in all probability desperately driven; and they have allowed him to get hold of these two bills after a sham resistance on the part of Gammon, in order to call forward your friends to the rescue—that's their game, depend upon it!" Mr. Aubrey fired at the bare thought. "Yet I must own I am at a loss to discover what motive or object Mr. Gammon can have for going so far out of his way to secure your good opinion, or for wrapping himself in so impenetrable a disguise. He is a very, very deep devil, that Gammon; and, depend upon it, has some sinister purpose to effect, which you will by and by discover!" Mr. Aubrey then, for the first time, acquainted Mr. Runnington with Gammon's recent proposals to Miss Aubrey, at which Mr. Runnington seemed for some moments struck dumb with astonishment.

"I presume," at length said he, turning with a brief and sad smile toward Miss Aubrey, whose reddening cheek betokened the interest she felt in the conversation—"I presume, Miss Aubrey, there is no chance of our seeing you pass into—Mrs. Gammon?"

"I should rather think not, Mr. Runnington," she replied, with sufficient loftiness of manner; "and I am quite at a loss to conceive what could possibly have put such a thing into his head."

"Certainly, Mr. Runnington," said Aubrey, "I can undertake to say that my sister never gave him any encouragement."

"Encouragement?—Horrid man!" exclaimed Miss Aubrey, with great vivacity. "I could never bear him—you know it, Charles—so do you Agnes!" Mr. Runnington made no further observation on the subject, though his thoughts were very busy: he was satisfied that he was beginning to discover a clue of Gammon's conduct—for that that gentleman was acting with profound duplicity, Mr. Runnington entertained no doubt whatever; and he resolved to watch his every motion connected with Mr. Aubrey, closely.

"What will be the earliest period," inquired Mr. Aubrey, "at which Mr. Titmouse, if so disposed, can put in suit my bond given to the late Lady Stratton?"

"As soon as he has obtained the grant of letters of administration, which cannot take place till the end of fourteen days from her ladyship's death; that being one difference, as you are aware, between the powers of an executor and an administrator." Mr. Aubrey sighed, and made no reply; while Mr. Runnington looked at him for some moments in silence, as if doubting whether to mention something which had occurred to him. At length—"Of course, Mr. Aubrey," he commenced, "one does not like to raise groundless hopes or fears; but, do you know, I am by no means free from doubts as to the reality of Lady Stratton's intestacy—whether the draft of her proposed will, brought to her by Mr. Parkinson, could not be admitted to probate. Very—very nice questions, as you must be aware, often arise out of cases like these! Since seeing you this morning, I have written off to Mr. Parkinson for full and private information on the point; and if I get a satisfactory answer, with your consent I will certainly lodge a caveat against the grant of titles of administration. That would indeed checkmate them! But I have very slight hopes indeed of receiving such an answer as one could wish," added Mr. Runnington, fearful of exciting fruitless expectations. Shortly afterwards Miss Aubrey, who had appeared for some little time laboring under considerable excitement, addressing her brother, said, with evident embarrassment: "Charles, I am very anxious to mention something that has occurred to me of a very singular nature—if you think I am at liberty to do so; and I shall first ask you and Mr. Runnington, whether, under the circumstances, you consider me entitled to disclose what I allude to."

"Kate, Kate!—what is this? What do you mean? You quite alarm me!" inquired her brother, with an amazed air.

"Suppose Mr. Gammon, on the occasion of his calling upon me, which has been recently mentioned, volunteered a statement of a very, very extraordinary description—one that has ever since quite haunted me, day and night. Mind, Charles—I say that, in the first instance, he volunteered it, only expressing an earnest wish that I should mention it to no one; on which I said I should make no promise, but act as I might think proper; and after my saying this, he made the communication I allude to. Should I be at liberty," continued Miss Aubrey, eagerly and anxiously, "now to disclose what he told me? I am dying to do it, if I may, honorably."

"My dear Kate, I really fear you are wandering—that you are overcome with the sufferings you have gone through to-day," said her brother tenderly, and with infinite concern.

"Indeed, Charles, I am not," she answered, with great earnestness.

"Then I am of opinion that you may most certainly mention any thing so communicated to you—I have no doubt, Kate."

"Nor I, Miss Aubrey," added Mr. Runnington eagerly; "nay, I go further—with a man like him, I think it is your duty to disclose any thing he may have said to you."

"Miss Aubrey paused for a few moments, and then mentioned the singular circumstance with which the reader is already acquainted; namely, Mr. Gammon's distinct and solemn assurance to her, that he possessed the power of restoring her brother to the possession of Yatton; and that, too, by legal and honorable means; and that, if she would but promise to receive him as her suitor, he would pledge himself to replace them all at Yatton before claiming the performance of his promise."

Mr. Aubrey, Mrs. Aubrey, and Mr. Runnington, all listened to this strange story in silence, and gazed in astonishment at Miss Aubrey.

"Forgive me, dear madam," said Mr. Runnington at length, exchanging an incredulous glance with her brother, "if I—I—express a doubt whether you are not laboring under a complete misconception."

"'Tis impossible, Kate!" added her brother; but he knew, at the same time, his sister's strong sense; and all doubt vanished from his mind and that of Mr. Runnington on her calmly and distinctly repeating what she had just said—giving even the very expressions made use of by Mr. Gammon, and which, she said, they might easily believe had made a very deep impression on her mind.

"It's inconceivable!" exclaimed her brother, after a long pause.

"It's an audacious and cruel falsehood, in my opinion," said Mr. Runnington; and all again were silent. Then he hastily ran his eye over the main points in the late proceedings by which Mr. Aubrey had been ejected from Yatton. "Either," he continued, after a pause, "he is a gross liar, or is laboring under insanity—or there has been shocking, atrocious villany practised against you. If he is in his senses, and he speaking the truth—gracious Heaven! he must have brought forward a series of perjured witnesses at the trial."

"Did he drop any hint, Kate, as to the means by which he could bring about such a result?" inquired her brother after a long pause, during which he too had been, like Mr. Runnington, reflecting on the course of proof by which the case of Titmouse had been supported.

"No—not the remotest; of that I am certain. I observed that particularly; though shortly afterward, I was so overcome by what he had said, and also by the manner in which he said it, that I fainted. Mr. Gammon must have carried me to the sofa; for when I came to myself I was lying there—though, when I felt myself losing my consciousness, I was standing near the window, which I had risen to open."

"It's the most amazing thing I ever heard in my life, I protest!" exclaimed Mr. Runnington, thoughtfully; while Mr. Aubrey rose from his chair, and walked a few steps to and fro, obviously laboring under much excitement.

"Kate, Kate!" said he rather vehemently, "you should have told me this the instant you next saw me!"

For Heaven's sake, be calm, dearest Charles!" cried Mrs. Aubrey, herself not a little agitated by the extraordinary intelligence just communicated by Kate, for the first time, even to her. Poor Miss Aubrey, on seeing the way in which her communication had been received, heartily regretted having mentioned the matter.

"This will require very great consideration, Mr. Aubrey, to know how to deal with it, and with Gammon," said Runnington. "I am inclined to think, at present, that he would hardly have ventured upon so outrageous a piece of folly, as making such a representation as this, had there been no foundation for it in fact; and yet, I am quite astonished that a man so acute, so signally self-possessed, should have so committed himself—he must have been under some great excitement at the moment."

"He certainly was, or at least seemed, a good deal agitated while he was with me," quoth Kate, coloring a little.

"That is highly probable, Miss Aubrey," replied Mr. Runnington, with a faint smile. "It must have appeared to him as one of the most likely occurrences, that Miss Aubrey should mention to you, Mr. Aubrey, so extraordinary a circumstance! It is very, very difficult to imagine Mr. Gammon thrown off his guard, on any occasion."

Then ensued an anxious and prolonged conversation on the subject, in which many conjectures were made, but without leading to any satisfactory issue; quite a new light seemed now thrown upon all his past acts, and the whole tenor of his conduct. They read over his last two notes with new and deep interest, on the supposition that, while writing them he was conscious of possessing the power which he had represented. All was mystery. Then was discussed the question, as to the propriety of either Mr. Runnington or Mr. Aubrey applying to Mr. Gammon on the subject—a step which was, however, postponed for future and more mature consideration. Another thing suggested itself to Mr. Aubrey, but he kept it to himself: should he at once apprise Mr. Gammon of the fact that Kate was in a manner unquestionably engaged to Mr. Delamere, and so, at once and for ever, extinguish all hope on the part of Mr. Gammon?

The evening, however, was now advancing, and Mr. Runnington pressed upon Mr. Aubrey the object he had chiefly had in view in calling. It was to prevail on Mrs. Aubrey and himself to accompany him that evening to his country house, which lay in the direction of Richmond, at about six miles distance from town, and where, for a brief interval, they might enjoy a respite from the frightful suspense and danger to which they were at present exposed in Vivian street. Mrs. Aubrey and Kate most earnestly seconded the kind importunities of Mr. Runnington; and after considerable hesitation Mr. Aubrey consented. It was accordingly arranged, that, Mr. Runnington's carriage not being in town, he should return within an hour with a glass coach; and that, during the ensuing day, Mrs. Runnington should drive to town for the purpose of bringing back with her Miss Aubrey, and little Charles and Agnes. This having been determined upon, Mr. Runnington quitted them, promising to return within an hour, when he hoped to find them ready to start, and equipped for a several days sojour. As soon as he had left the house, Mr. Aubrey's scruples began to revive: it appeared to him, that though it might be for a short time only, still it was, in effect, an absconding from his creditors: and there is no knowing but that his fastidious scruples, his delicate sense of rectitude, might have led him after all to send off Mrs. Aubrey alone, when, poor soul! he was spared the trial by an incident which occurred about half an hour after Mr. Runnington's departure. Mrs. Aubrey was sitting in the parlor in a travelling dress, fondling little Agnes, and talking earnestly to Kate about the management of the two children, and other matters; while Mr. Aubrey, also ready to start, was in the study selecting a book or two to take with him, when a heavy single knock at the door, unaccompanied by the sound of coach-wheels, nearly paralysed all three of them. Suffice it to say, that within a few minutes' time the wretched and almost heart-broken Aubrey was a second time in custody, and at the suit of Tittlebat Titmouse, Esq., M. P., for the principal sum of ten thousand pounds, and interest for twelve months, at the rate of five pounds per centum per annum. The agonizing scene which ensued I shall leave entirely to the reader's imagination—observing only, that the two minions of the law into whose hands Aubrey had now fallen, seemed totally indifferent to the anguish they witnessed. Their chief was a well-known sheriff's officer—one VICE; short, fat, bloated; deeply pitted with the small-pox; close-cut black hair, almost as coarse as that of a hog; while the expression of his features was at once callous and insolent. Aubrey perceived at a glance that he had no consideration or mercy to expect at the hands of such a man as this; and the fellow very much resembled his master.

"You're my prisoner, sir," said Vice, walking up to Aubrey, and with an air of matter-of-fact brutality taking hold of his collar with one hand, while in the other he held his warrant. "If you like to clap a great coat on, as it's getting late, you may; but the sooner you're off out of the way of all this here noise, the better—I should say."

"For God's sake wait for a few minutes—I have a friend coming," said Aubrey, his wife clinging to his arm.

"D—d if I wait a moment, that's flat!" quoth Vice, glancing at the two boxes in the passage, and guessing from them, and the travelling dress of Mrs. Aubrey, that he had arrived just in the very nick of time to prevent an escape.

"For the love of Heaven, stay only five minutes!" cried Kate, passionately wringing her hands—but she might as well have addressed a blacksmith's anvil as either of the men who were now masters of her doomed brother's person.

"'Tis useless, Kate—'tis in vain, my love!" said he, with a melancholy air; and turning to Vice, who, with his companion, stood at only a few inches' distance from him—"perhaps you will allow me to write down the address of the place you are taking me?" he enquired, somewhat sternly.

"Write away then, and make haste: for, write or no write, you're off!"

Mr. Aubrey hastily wrote down in pencil, for Mr. Runnington, "VICE—Squeezum Court, Cary Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields;" and then, having hastily drawn on his great coat—without taking with him even a change of linen—(for Vice would seem to have got the idea of a rescue into his head, and who, besides, was anxious to run not, the least risk with a ten thousand pounds' debtor)—tore himself from the frenzied embrace of his wife and sister, and quitted the house. Vice had refused even to let his man go in quest of a hackney-coach, or to wait while Fanny ran for one; and the moment they had got into the street, the cries of Mrs. Aubrey and Kate yet ringing in Mr. Aubrey's ears, Vice put his arm with rough familiarity into that of Mr. Aubrey, directing his follower to do the same; and in this style they hurried Mr. Aubrey along the whole of the distance between Vivian Street and Squeezum Court; he uttering not one single word—but his heart almost bursting. Vice had received his instructions from Mr. Spitfire, who was a very dashing practitioner, and, perfectly well knowing the value of every day toward the close of term, had got his affidavit of debt prepared and ready sworn, and every thing in readiness, even before the rule had been made absolute against Mr. Gammon. As the two captors and their prize—a gentleman between two ruffians—passed at a smart pace along the streets, they attracted considerable attention; now and then, even a little crowd would follow them for half the length of the street. Once Mr. Aubrey caught the words—"Poor fellow! Forgery no doubt—he's a dead man in a month!"

Vice's look-up was, though similar in its general appearance, yet of a much inferior description to that of Grab. It was smaller and meaner. They reached it a little after eight o'clock.

"Are you for the parlor, or the common room?" enquired Vice, as soon as they had entered the house.

"Which you please," replied Aubrey, quickly and gloomily.

"Pr'aps you'd better show the gemman up-stairs," said the follower, hesitatingly, to his master.

"You pay extra up-stairs," quoth Vice; "which shall it be?"

"I have no money, sir, to spare—I know your extortion-ating!"

"Oh, come along then!" replied Vice, insolently; and in a minute or two Mr. Aubrey found himself in a tolerably large, but low room, at the back of the house, lit by three or four candles. There were some ten or twelve persons in it, who were smoking, drinking, reading the newspapers, playing at cards, dice, pitch-farthing, and so forth. All seemed in good spirits, and suspended for a moment their various occupations to scrutinize the new-comer—on whom the door was in a twinkling closed and locked.

"Now, sir, just in time to cut in," said a thin pale man, stepping briskly up to him from a table at which he and two others had just begun to play a rubber. "Now, sir," he continued, in a confident tone, working the edges of the cards rapidly through his fingers with the air of an adept, and then proffering the pack to Mr. Aubrey.

"I do not play," replied Aubrey in a low tone.

"Better take a card—drive dull care away: you'll be devilish dull here without play of some sort."

"I do not play, sir—I certainly shall not," repeated Mr. Aubrey, somewhat peremptorily.

"Only half-crown points—can't hurt you," he continued, with a flippant air; and Mr. Aubrey walked from him with an air of disgust toward another part of the room.

"You're a liar!" said one of two men playing at drafts, to the other, a dispute having arisen about the game as Mr. Aubrey passed them.

"You're a cheat!" was the answer, on which the man so addressed suddenly and violently flung a half-empty tumbler of brandy and water at the other; it took effect on the forehead of his companion, who fell stunned from his chair, on which there was a general rush toward the spot. In the midst of this sickening scene the door was opened by Vice—

"Hollo—what's the matter?" said he, locking the door after him, and coming up to the group round the fallen and miserable man who had been struck.

"Who did it?" cried he, fiercely, on catching sight of the prostrate man.

"I did," answered the perpetrator of the outrage, "he called me a cheat."

"You did!" quoth Vice, suddenly grasping him by the collar, as with the hand of a giant, and forcing him, despite his struggling, down to the floor, when he put one knee on his breast, and then shook him till he began to get black in the face.

"D—n it, Vice, do n't murder him," cried one of the bystanders—all of whom seemed disposed to interfere; but at this point, the man who had been struck, and had been lying for some minutes motionless, suddenly began to dash about his arms and legs convulsively—for he had fallen into a fit of epilepsy. The attention of all present was now absorbed by this one dreadful figure; and the man whom Vice had quitted, rose flushed and breathless from the floor, and looked with a face of horror upon the victim of his ungovernable passions.

"I must get a doctor," quoth Vice, "presently," approaching the door; and in passing Mr. Aubrey, who sat down looking exceedingly agitated—"Oh—here you are!" said he; "come along with me."

"I hope this poor man will be properly attended to."

"That's my look-out, not your's," replied Vice, rudely—"come you along with me!" and, unlocking the door, he motioned Mr. Aubrey, and, after sending off a man for a surgeon, led Mr. Aubrey into a kind of office—where he was instantly clasped by the hands by Mr. Runnington, who had been there some five minutes. He looked like an angel in the eyes of Mr. Aubrey, who returned his cordial pressure with convulsive energy, but in silence, for his shocked and overcharged feelings forbade him utterance. Mr. Runnington looked both annoyed and distressed—for Vice had refused to discharge his prisoner on Mr. Runnington's undertaking, telling him the sum was a trifle too large for running any risk; and, in short, he peremptorily refused to do it without a written authority from the under-sheriff; and added, he knew it was useless for Mr. Runnington to make the application—for they had only a few months before been "let in" for eight hundred pounds in that same way—so that Mr. Runnington had better, said Vice, be looking after a good bail-bond. In a word, Vice was inexorable; and a hint of the possibility of Mr. Aubrey's flight to the continent, dropped by Mr. Spitfire to the under-sheriff, had caused that functionary to advise Vice "to look sharp after his bird."

"At all events, let Mr. Aubrey be shown into your parlor, Vice," said Mr. Runnington, "and I will settle with you when I return. I am just going to the office, to see what I can do with Mr. Ridley."

"It's no manner of use; and besides, it's ten to one you don't catch him—he's gone to Clapham by this time," said Vice, looking up at the dusky Dutch clock over the fireplace. But Mr. Runnington was not to be so easily discouraged, and started off on his friendly errand; on which Vice led Mr. Aubrey up-stairs into his "parlor," telling him, as they went up-stairs, that there were only two other "gentlemen" there, and so "them three could make it comfortable to one another, if they liked." Vice added, that as he had only one double-bedded room at liberty, they must agree among themselves which should sleep on the sofa—or perhaps take it by turns.

On entering the parlor two figures were visible; one that of a tall, pale, emaciated, gentlemanly person of about forty, who lay on the sofa, languidly smoking a cigar, more, apparently, to assuage pain than for the purpose of mere indulgence. The other was a portly gray-haired man, apparently about fifty, and also of gentlemanly appearance. He was standing with his back to the fire-place—one hand thrust into his waist-coat, and the other holding a tumbler, which he raised to his lips as Vice entered, and having drained it, requested him to replenish it. "T was the third tumbler of strong brandy and water that evening that he had just dispatched; and his restless and animated eye and voluble utterance, testified to the influence of what he had been drinking. On Vice's retiring, this gentleman began to address Mr. Aubrey in a rapid and somewhat incoherent strain—telling him of the accident which had that morning befallen him; for that Vice had laid his rough hand upon him just as he was embarking in an Indianman, off Blackwall, to bid farewell to this "cursed country" for ever. This man had been a great merchant in the city, and for a series of years universally respected. He had married a fashionable wife; and their ambition and absurd extravagance, combined with losses unquestionably originating in a want of confidence on the part of his mercantile connections, occasioned solely by his ostentation, irregularities, and inattention to business, drove him to gambling speculations. Unfortunately there, he took to courses of downright dishonesty; availing himself of his character as trustee, executor, and otherwise, to draw out of the funds from time to time, very large sums of money, to the utter ruin of some twenty or thirty unfortunate families, whose deceased relatives had quitted life with implicit confidence in his integrity. The guilty splendor thus secured him lasted for some few years, when an accident set him suddenly wrong—a beautiful girl, for whom he was sole trustee, and every farthing of whose fortune he had appropriated to his own purposes, applied to him for the immediate settlement of her property. The next morning he had stopped payment; Mincing lane was in a ferment—astonishment prevailed at the Exchange. Who could have thought it! said everybody. He was nowhere to be seen or heard of—but at length intelligence of his movements having been obtained by one of his numerous distracted victims, led to his apprehension in the way that has been already mentioned. Of all this Mr. Aubrey, of course, could know nothing; but nevertheless, he was somewhat struck with the man's countenance and manner; but with what awful interest would Mr. Aubrey have regarded him, had he known that the miserable being before him had determined upon self-destruction—and that within ten days' time he would actually accomplish his frightful purpose! For he was found in bed, a ghastly object, with his head almost severed from his body.

In the other—a ruined roué—Mr. Aubrey was infinitely shocked at presently recognizing the features of one whom he had slightly known at Oxford. This was a member of an ancient and honorable family, and born to a princely fortune, which he had totally dissipated in every conceivable mode of extravagance and profligacy, both at home and abroad, and with it had also ruined his constitution. He had taken honors at Oxford, and was expected to have been very eminent in Parliament. But at college his tendency to profligacy rapidly developed itself. He became notorious for his debaucheries, and made ostentation of his infidelity. He had returned from France only a few days before, in an advanced stage of consumption; and having been pounced upon by one of his numerous infuriate creditors, hither he had been brought the evening before—and would be the next morning lodged in the Fleet, as he could procure no bail; and there he might, possibly, live till he could apply to take the benefit of the insolvent act! He at length recognized Mr. Aubrey; and raising himself up on the sofa, extended his wasted hand to Mr. Aubrey, who shook it kindly—much shocked at his appearance. What a marvellous difference between the characters of these two men!

After about half-an-hour's absence, Mr. Runnington returned, much dispirited. Mr. Ridley was not to be found; and, consequently, Mr. Aubrey must remain in his wretched quarters all night, and till probably an advanced period of the ensuing day—till, in short, Mr. Runnington had obtained responsible sureties for his putting in bail to the action. Having whispered a few words to Mr. Aubrey in the adjoining room, and slipped a five pound note into his hand, Mr. Runnington took his leave, pledging himself to lose not one moment in procuring his release; and charged with innumerable fond expressions to Mrs. Aubrey, to Kate, and to his children—to whom Mr. Runnington promised to go that night. "This is almost the bitterest moment of my life," faltered poor Aubrey; "it is very hard to bear!" and he wrung Mr. Runnington's hand—that gentleman being almost as much affected as his truly unfortunate client; who, however, on being left by Mr. Runnington, felt grateful indeed to the Almighty for so powerful and invaluable a friend.

Neither Mr. Aubrey nor Mr. Somerville—that was the name of his early acquaintance—quitted the sitting-room during the whole of the night; but as their companion retired early to the adjoining room, and immediately fell into heavy sleep, they at length entered into conversation together—conversation of a melancholy, but deeply interesting, and, I may even add, instructive character. Mr. Aubrey's notes of it are by me; but I will not risk fatiguing the indulgent reader's attention. When the chill gray morning broke, it found the two prisoners still in earnest conversation; but shortly afterward nature yielded, and they both fell asleep—Mr. Aubrey, with an humble and fervent inward prayer, commending those dear beings who were absent to the protection of Heaven, and imploring it also for himself.

Immediately on quitting Mr. Aubrey, Mr. Runnington, according to his promise, went direct to Vivian street, and the scene which he had endeavored to prepare for encountering, on their finding him return unaccompanied by Mr. Aubrey, was indeed most overpowering to his feelings, and heart-rending. Alas! how confidently had they reckoned upon an issue similar to that which had so happily occurred in the morning. 'T was the first time—the very first time—since their troubles that Mr. Aubrey and Mrs. Aubrey had been separated for one single night. And he was now the inmate of a prison! Mrs. Aubrey and Kate sat up the livelong night—a memorable and miserable night to them—counting hour after hour, whose flight was announced by the neighboring church clock. Their eyes were swollen with weeping, and their throbbing temples ached, as, at the first glimpse of dull daybreak, they drew aside the parlor curtain and threw open the window. They were, indeed, with some of old, weary of watching.

How little they thought—how little had Mr. Runnington been aware—that Mr. Gammon had been in the neighborhood from an early hour in the evening till a late hour of the night! Mr. Runnington had twice passed him without observation; and Gammon having witnessed, from a little distance, the cruel indignity which had been inflicted upon Aubrey, by dragging him like a felon along the streets, walked to and fro in the adjoining streets till long after Mr. Runnington's final departure, unable to muster resolution enough to call at the house, though he had once or twice paused opposite the door. His heart failed him, however, altogether; and, finally abandoning his intention, he returned to his chamber, disappointed and harassed.

About mid-day, thanks to the energetic friendship of Mr. Runnington, and the promptitude of those whose names had been given to him by Mr. Aubrey, he made his appearance in Vivian street. He saw Mrs. Aubrey and Kate as he passed, sitting at the window, anxiously on the look-out. They also saw him—sprang to the door—and opening it while he was in the act of knocking, they were instantly locked in each other's embrace. He looked pale and harassed, certainly; but, 'twas he—the beloved husband and brother—Providence had permitted them once more to meet! All their recent pangs were for a moment forgotten and drowned in the overflowing joy of such a re-union. He was already sufficiently subdued; but when he heard the footsteps of his children pattering rapidly down stairs—and heard their little voices continually, and in eager accents exclaiming, "Papa!—my papa!—where is papa?"—and when they ran up to him, and he felt their little arms round his neck—then he was overpowered—his lip quivered convulsively, and he could not refrain from bursting into tears. Oh, 't was home, poor oppressed soul!—after all—to which Providence had permitted him to return, and where he saw himself suddenly surrounded by those precious objects of his undivided and unutterable love! Indeed, there he was thankful; his heart—all their hearts—overflowed with gratitude. Toward the evening, they received a visit from Mr. and Mrs. Neville, who were infinitely shocked on hearing of the events of the last few days, and of which they had not had the slightest intimation, living, as they did, at so great a distance, and not having seen their friends the Aubreys for several weeks. Poor souls! they also had their troubles—"t was wonderful how they contrived to exist upon the paltry pittance obtained by his ministerial duties; but they came ever with cheerfulness—unaffected and refreshing cheerfulness; they never uttered a murmur at the thorny desert which life seemed destined to prove to them, but had always a comfortable word for their weary fellow pilgrims. What a happy evening they passed together! Poor Neville was in high spirits; for an article of his, full of profound research and delicate criticism, which had cost him a great deal of labor to prepare, had at length been accepted by the editor of a classical and ecclesiastical Review, who had forwarded to him a check for ten guineas. Mr. Aubrey could scarce refrain from tears, when the simple-minded and generous Neville pressed upon him the acceptance of, at least the half of these, the unexpected proceeds of his severe toil. While they were thus sitting together, in eager and delightful conversation, there came a knock to the door, which, as may be easily believed, a little disturbed them all; but it proved to be a gentleman who asked for Miss Aubrey; and on her requesting him to come forward, who should it be, but the "gentleman" of my Lord de la Zouch; and while the color mounted into her cheek, and her heart fluttered, he placed in her hands a packet, which had just arrived from the Continent.

They all insisted on having it opened then and there; and in a few minutes' time, behold their eager admiring eyes were feasted by the sight of a most superb diamond necklace—and at the bottom of the case was a small card—which Kate, blushing violently, thrust into her bosom, in spite of all Mrs. Aubrey's efforts. There was a long letter addressed to Mr. Aubrey from Lord de la Zouch, who, with Lady de la Zouch, had been for some weeks at Paris—and one from her ladyship to Kate; and, from its bulky appearance, 't was evident either that Lady de la Zouch must have written her a prodigious long letter, or enclosed one to her from some one else. They saw Kate's uneasiness about this letter, and considerably forbore to rally her upon it. Poor girl!—she burst into tears when she looked at the glittering trinket which had been presented to her—and reflected that its cost would probably be more than would suffice to support her brother and his family for a couple of years. Her heart yearned toward them, and she longed to convert her splendid present into a form that should minister to their necessities. While touching upon this part of my history—which I always approach with diffident reluctance, as matter too delicate to be handled before the public—I must nevertheless pause for a moment, and apprise the reader of one or two little circumstances, before returning to the main course of the narrative.

Mr. Delamere was at that moment at Rome, in the course of making the usual tour of Europe, and was not expected to return to England for some months—perhaps for a year. But before quitting England he had laid close siege to Kate Aubrey; and had, indeed, obtained from her a promise, that if ever she became any one's wife, it should be his. That their engagement was sanctioned most cordially by Lord and Lady de la Zouch—two persons of as generous and noble a spirit as breathed in the world—must have been long ago abundantly manifest to the reader; and they did not the less appreciate the value of the prize secured by their son, because of the proud and delicate sense Miss Aubrey manifested of the peculiarly trying position in which she stood with relation to them. Kate's own notion upon the subject was somewhat indefinite, she having resolved not to listen to any proposal for a union with Delamere, until her unfortunate brother's affairs had assumed a more cheering and satisfactory aspect; and that might not be for some years to come. If she replied to the letter from Delamere, enclosed by Lady de la Zouch—and reply she must, to acknowledge this brilliant present—it would be the first letter she had ever written to him, which will account, in a measure, for her embarrassment. And though all of them kept up a correspondence with Lord and Lady de la Zouch—from obvious considerations of honorable delicacy and pride, they never gave the slightest intimation of the dreadful pressure they were beginning daily to experience. Lord de la Zouch remained under the impression that Mr. Aubrey was struggling, it might be slowly, but still successfully, with his difficulty; and had made up his mind, when called upon, to pay the amount of the bond into which he had entered in Aubrey's behalf, almost as a matter of course. As Aubrey desired evidently to maintain a reserve upon the subject of his private affairs, Lord de la Zouch, whatever might be his fears and suspicions, forbore to press his inquiries. How little, therefore, were either Lord and Lady de la Zouch, or their son, aware of the position in which their packets would find the Aubreys!

Within a few days, Mr. Runnington, by duly completing special bail in the two actions of Quirk and others v. Aubrey, and Titmouse v. Aubrey, had relieved Mr. Aubrey from all grounds of immediate personal apprehension for several months to come—for at least half a year; and on quitting Vivian Street, one evening, after announcing this satisfactory result of his labors, he slipped into Mr. Aubrey's hand, as he took leave of him at the door, a letter, which he desired Mr. Aubrey to read, and if he thought it worth while, to answer—at his leisure. Guess the emotions of lively gratitude, of deep respect, with which he perused the following:—

"MY DEAR SIR—You have once or twice, lately, been so kind as to express yourself obliged by the little professional services which I have recently rendered you in the ordinary course of practice. Permit me, in my turn, then, to ask a great favor of you; and, knowing your refined and exquisite sensibility, I make the request with some little apprehension, lest I should in any way wound it. I earnestly beg that you will accept a trifling loan of three hundred pounds, to be repaid as soon as you may be enabled to do so with perfect convenience to yourself. If, unhappily for yourself, that time should never arrive, believe me, you will not occasion me the slightest imaginable inconvenience; for a long and successful practice has made me long since independent of my profession, and of the world, as will, I am confident, be the case with you, should Providence spare your life. I happen to have been aware that, but for recent occurrences, it was your intention, about this time, to have commenced a second year's study, with either Mr. Crystal, or Mr. Mansfield the conveyancer. You will now, I trust, carry your intention into effect, without delay. I should venture to suggest, that at this period of the year, when the gentlemen of the common-law bar quit town for the circuit, (as will be the case within a few weeks with Mr. Crystal,) it would hardly answer your purpose to enter the chambers of a gentleman in that department; but that, as conveyancers remain in town, you will find it answer your purpose immediately to enter the chambers of Mr. Mansfield, and re-occupy your mind with those invigorating and invaluable studies in which you have already made, as I hear, so great a progress; and which will serve to divert your thoughts from those wretched objects on which otherwise they will be too apt to dwell.

"You will find that I have this day paid in to your credit, at your bankers, the sum of £300. And believe me to remain, my dear sir,

"Ever your most sincere and faithful friend,

C. RUNNINGTON."

"P. S.—Do not give yourself one moment's concern about the expense of the recent proceedings, which is, I assure you, very trifling."

I say that Mr. Aubrey read this letter with heartfelt gratitude, and permitted no morbid fastidiousness to interfere with his determination to avail himself of the generous and opportune assistance of Mr. Runnington; and he resolved, moreover, to profit by his very judicious suggestions as to the course of his study, and to commence, as soon as possible, his attendance at the chambers of Mr. Mansfield. Thus, suddenly relieved, for a considerable and a definite interval, from the tremendous pressure to which he had been latterly subject, he, and indeed all of them, experienced great buoyancy and exhilaration of spirits. Could, however, their sense of tranquility and security be otherwise than shortlived? What sort of a prospect was that before them? Terrifying and hopeless, indeed. As daily melted away the precious interval between the present time and the dreadful month of November—midst whose gloomy haze was visible to his shuddering eyes the dismal porch of a prison, where he must be either immured for his life, or its greater portion, or avail himself of the bitter ignominious immunity afforded by the insolvent laws—the hearts of all of them sunk to their former depth of oppression. Still, he resolved to work while it was day; and he addressed himself to his studies with redoubled energy, and of course made proportionate advances. But all this suffering—amid all this exertion, mental and physical—began to leave visible traces in his worn and emaciated appearance; and I grieve to add, that the same cause not a little impaired the beauty and injured the spirits of the devoted and incomparable women whom Heaven had given to him like angels for his companions.

Such being the footing upon which matters stood between Mr. Delamere and Kate Aubrey, what chance had Mr. Gammon of obtaining the bright object upon which he had set his dark and baleful eye, and to secure which he was racking his brain, and devising such intricate schemes of deliberate and cruel villainy? As well might Gammon have sighed after the planet Venus—sweet star of eve!—as sought to get Kate Aubrey into his arms. Yet full before his mind's eye stood ever her image—though one would have thought that there was sufficient in his own circumstances to occupy every spare thought and feeling. Suppose the action of penalties went against him, and he should be at once fixed with a liability for some five thousand pounds, including debt and costs? And more than that sum he had recently lost in a speculation in foreign stock, besides standing in a very precarious position with respect to certain of the many speculations in which he had launched both himself and others. Under these circumstances, it became hourly of greater importance to him to secure the annuity of £2,000 pounds on the Yatten property, which he had with such difficulty extorted from Titmouse. He resolved, moreover, to try the experiment of raising money on the bond of Lord de la Zouch; and it also occurred to him as possible, that even if he should fail in the main object which he had proposed to himself, in his artful and oppressive proceedings against Aubrey, yet they might be the means of bringing forward friends to extricate him from his difficulties, by discharging the sums for which he was liable. It was, therefore, not till he had set into train the various matters which have been laid before the reader in the present portion of this history, that he set off on a hurried visit to Yorkshire, in order to ascertain the state of Lady Stratton's affairs; to make arrangements for collecting the evidence against the impending trials for bribery; and carry into effect some preliminary measure for augmenting the whole of the Yatten rent-roll, by nearly £2,000 a-year. His first interview with Mr. Parkinson apprised him distinctly of the exceedingly precarious nature of the alleged intestacy of Lady Stratton. Good Mr. Parkinson was no match for Mr. Gammon, but would have been much more nearly so if he could have done but one thing—held his tongue: but he was a good-natured, easy-tempered chatterer, and Gammon always extracted from him, in a few moments, whatever he knew upon any subject. 'T was thus that he succeeded in obtaining conclusive evidence of the intestacy; for Gammon discovered that the unexecuted draft of the intended will had never been seen by Lady Stratton, or read over to her; but had been drawn up by Mr. Parkinson himself, a day or two after receiving her ladyship's instructions;—that those instructions, moreover, had been merely oral.

"It is one of the most melancholy cases I ever met with!" exclaimed Gammon, with a sigh; "I suppose the reverses of the Aubrey family frequently formed a subject of her ladyship's conversation?"

"Oh, she has talked with me for hours together—and even very shortly before her last illness."

"It is, methinks, enough to raise the poor old lady from her grave, to find her property diverted thus to one who does not want it, and who was a total stranger!"

"Ay, it is indeed!"

"I am a little surprised, to tell you the truth, that under the circumstances, her ladyship should not have thought of at least sharing the policy between Miss Aubrey and Mr."

"I do assure you that that is the very thing I have heard her several times talking about, lately!"

"That will do, thought his wily companion; "thank God, she's clearly intestate then, for Parkinson's draft does not contain her last will and testament—that will do—thank you, my honest friend!" This was what was passing through Gammon's mind, while a sympathizing expression was upon his face, and he shook his head, and deplored the untoward event which had happened, in very pathetic terms indeed. On quitting Mr. Parkinson, Gammon thus pursued the train of his thoughts:

"What if I should allow this paper to be admitted to probate? Let me see—it will give Miss Aubrey some fifteen thousand pounds:—or one might take out administration in favor of Titmouse, and then suggest to her that I had the means of nullifying the proceedings, and carrying into effect Lady Stratton's intentions—the letter may be repeated at any time.—Stay, however. It is by no means impossible, that when Parkinson comes to communicate with Aubrey, or that deep old fellow Runnington, they may think of lodging a caveat against our letter of administration; but they'll fail—for Parkinson must speak conclusively on that point. So, perhaps, the better way will be, to take out administration in the usual way, and see what they will do. Then, there's Aubrey's bond—poor devil!—is it not unfortunate for him? But that shall be reserved; let us see the effect of the others first."

When Mr. Gammon returned to Yatton from the late Lady Stratton's residence, he found several letters awaiting his arrival. One was from Mr. Quirk—poor muddle-headed old soul!—all went wrong with him, the moment that he missed Gammon from beside him. He wrote letters every day, that were a faithful type of the confusion that always prevailed in his thoughts; for though he was "up to" the ordinary criminal business of the office, in which he had had some forty years' experience, their general business had latterly become so extended, and to Quirk, complicated, that his head, as it were, spun round from morning to night, and all he could do was to put himself, and every body about him, into a bustle and fever. So, he told Gammon, in this his last letter, that every thing was going wrong, and would do so till "good friend Gammon returned;" and, moreover, the old gentleman complained that Snap was getting very careless and irregular in his attendance—and, in fact, he—Quirk—had something very particular to say to Gammon, when they met, about the aforesaid Snap—about this the reader shall hear in due time. Then came a letter from the Earl of Dreddlington, marked "Private and confidential," containing a most important communication, to the effect that his lordship had that day granted an audience to a scientific gentleman of great eminence, and particularly well skilled in geology; and he had satisfied the Earl of a fact which the aforesaid scientific gentleman told his lordship he had discovered after a very close geological survey of the superficial strata of the Isle of Dogs—viz. that at a very little depth from the surface there ran, in parallel strata, very rich beds of copper and lead alternately, such as could not fail of making a quick and enormous return. His lordship, therefore, suggested the immediate formation of a company to purchase the Isle of Dogs, and work the mines. His lordship "begged to be favored with" Mr. Gammon's views on this subject, by return of post. In a postscript, his lordship informed Gammon that he had just parted with all his Golden Egg shares, at a considerable profit; and that the Gunpowder and Fresh Water Company's shares were rising daily, on account of the increasing probability of a universal war. Gammon did not think it worth while to send any answer to the letter of his senior partner, but wrote off a very polite and confidential letter to the Earl, begging his lordship would do him the honor of taking no steps in the matter till Mr. Gammon could have the honor of waiting upon his lordship in town. This letter over, Gammon wrote off a letter to the secretary of the VULVURE INSURANCE COMPANY, giving them notice of the death of Lady Stratton, who was insured to the amount of £15,000, which, her ladyship having died intestate, the writer's client, Tittlebat Titmouse, Esq., M. P. for Yatton, had become entitled to as only next of kin: That Mr. Titmouse intended to administer forthwith, and formal evidence would be furnished to the company, in due time, of the completion of Mr. Titmouse's legal title to the policy.

But here the skittish, frolicsome, and malicious jade, Fortune, after petting and fondling Titmouse, and overwhelming him with her favors, suddenly turned round and hit him a severe slap in the face, without the least provocation on his part, or rhyme or reason on hers. And it happened on this wise. DAPPER SMUG, Esq., the secretary, wrote by return of post, saying, that he had laid Mr. Gammon's letter before the directors; and as soon as he should have learned their pleasure on the subject, he would write to Mr. Gammon again. And so he did—to request that gentleman to communicate with Messrs. Screw & Company, the Company's solicitors. This Mr. Gammon did, and in due time received a letter to the astounding purport and effect following—that is to say, that they had carefully considered the case, and regretted sincerely that they could not feel it their duty to recommend the directors to pay the policy. The directors had a duty, sometimes a very painful one, to perform to the public; and, in short, it was plain they intended to resist the claim altogether. Gammon wrote in astonishment to know the grounds of their refusal; and at length discovered that they considered themselves in possession of decisive evidence to show that the policy was vitiated through the concealment of a material fact on the part of the Lady Stratton—possibly unintentionally—viz. that she was subject to the GOVT. Gammon made anxious inquiries of the servants, and of Dr. Goddard, and of others, who expressed infinite astonishment, declaring that she had never once exhibited the slightest symptoms of the complaint. Messrs. Screw, however, were politely inflexible—they declared that they had the positive testimony of several witnesses, one of them an eminent physician, to the fact that, during the very week in which the policy had been executed, she had experienced an attack of gout, which had confined her to the sofa for three days. [The fact was, that her ladyship had about that time been confined to the sofa, but merely from her heel having been galled a little by a tight shoe.] They, moreover, sent to Mr. Gammon the full name of the officer in whose name the company sued—the aforesaid Dapper Smug; and requested Mr. Gammon to send process to them in the usual way. Gammon, on inquiry, learned the character of the Company, and almost gnashed his teeth in rage and despair; so at it they went—TITMOUSE (Adm'r.) v. SMUG; a declaration as long as my arm; pleas to match it; then a commission to examine witnesses abroad, principally a Dr. Podagra, who had settled in China; then a bill of discovery filed in behalf of the Company; a cross bill filed by Mr. Titmouse against the Company. Here, in short, was in truth, "a mighty pretty quarrel." The stake was adequate; the Company rich; Mr. Titmouse eager; Gammon infuriate; and there was not the least chance of the thing being decided at all for three or four years to come, and poor Titmouse was thus not only kept out of a comfortable round sum of money, but obliged to carry on all the while an expensive and harassing litigation. He was not for insuring with a Company that looks so sharply after the interests of its shareholders. But as far as Titmouse and Gammon were concerned, it seemed a dead-lock, and at a somewhat critical conjuncture too.

DUST TO DUST.

Dust to dust! the tolling bell
Peals the mournful "Fare thee well!"
Dust to dust! the solemn drum
Warns again of doom to come.
Dust to dust! the good and brave,
Great and lowly, lord and slave,
Wrinkled age with silver hair,
Youth and strength and beauty fair,
Both the venal and the just
Own the doom of Dust to dust!

Pass the solemn pageant by!
Who shall be the next to die?
Who shall read his neighbor's face,
And the mystic dooming trace?
He of firmest heart and limb,
Death may soonest call for him,
While the victim, lingering ill,
Breathes the air of heaven still.
While there's life there's hope and trust,
Till the hour of Dust to Dust!

Honored ashes, noble clay
Mingles with the dust to-day.
Drooping round the sable urn,
See a mighty nation mourn.
Glorious in Memory's breath,
Now the soldier sleeps in death.
In the earth he loved to plough,
Lowly dwells the farmer now.
Lifted to a nation's trust,
Falls the Ruler, Dust to Dust!

Dust to dust! The story's told,
O'er the dust the stone is rolled,
And where darts the spirit then,
That must fill the thoughts of men.
Dust to dust! what power may save
Mortal dust from earthly grave?
Dust to dust! the chant of Doom
While we hasten to the tomb.
Man is feeble, God is just!
Requiescat! Dust to Dust!

SLEEP IS MATTER.

An infinite number of speculative geniuses have been employed, time out of mind, in determining whether this world of ours were matter, or only an ideal phantom, as "baseless as the fabric of a vision." Multitudes have inclined to the latter opinion; and the arguments by which they have endeavored to establish it are at once ingenious and unsatisfactory. They assert that the evidence of our senses is illusive, and neither does nor can demonstrate the certainty of our own existence, much less that of extraneous appearances around us. We feel, say they, the same conviction, for the time being, that the scenery exhibited to us in our dreams is real, which we do when beholding it in our waking moments. There is the same brightness of images, the same clearness of sound, and the same busy activity of thought in the one case as in the other. We believed, at first, that the vision was real; we believed afterwards that it was not so—and yet there was the same foundation for either belief, viz. the evidence of our senses. Indeed, we can have no other evidence, ultimately, of any thing; and though it may be said the evidence of what we perceive when awake is constantly found to contradict that of our dreaming perceptions, still it may be demanded in reply, What does the objection prove? It only proves that we perceive different things under different circumstances, and not by any means that either perception is false. If, therefore, we now count our dreams as empty illusions, so should we under other circumstances, and for this same reason, too, consider our former every-day occurrences as nothing but chimerical reveries, the "semblance of things unknown," the "airy shadows of a shade."

Such is the outline of the sceptic creed—a creed founded on hypothesis and supported by conjecture, a mass of idle speculation, commencing in doubt and terminating in uncertainty. I cannot yield my assent to doctrines so romantic, especially when supported by a train of reasoning evidently no better than sophistry, and carrying with it paradox and guess-work, which the plainest understanding cannot help but condemn. I cannot follow that wild path, but choose rather, though it be with deferential trembling, to walk in the steps of great Sir Isaac Newton while I endeavor to prove a proposition belonging to the true philosophy—one which has hitherto been too little illustrated, but which shall be shown to be correct by the most satisfactory demonstration.

I propose to prove that Sleep is Matter.

Now, matter, according to the L. L. D.s who understand such things—and they are "honorable men"—matter is an extended, solid, inactive and moveable substance, heavy withal, and susceptible of infinite divisibility.

We are to prove, then, first, that sleep is extended. By our observation we know that people and other animals do occasionally fall asleep in America, and from the credible testimony of foreigners we learn that the same accident likewise befalls the inhabitants of other countries. Bears, for instance, lie torpid in their dens for months together, and flies and swallows waste half their time in slumber, and that, too, in various portions of the earth. The wandering Arab of the desert, the son of frozen Lapland, and the indolent and lonely being who takes up his abode in the confines of Austral Asia, are equally addicted to the custom of sleeping. Now, as these countries are so widely remote, and sleep pervades them all at once, it inevitably follows that sleep is extended, at least in space; nor is it less extended in time; for, that the phenomenon occurs in our own times no one will pretend to deny, and that it occurred anciently we have written testimony: "Etiam bonus Homerus aliquando dormi tat"—that is, "Good old Homer occasionally takes a nap." Long, then, has sleep continued in time; widely has it been diffused over space. It is extended, therefore, and by consequence possesses one of the properties of matter.

Sleep is also "solid"—this is the second argument. "It is from resistance to the touch," says Dr. Enfield, "that we acquire the idea and infer the property of 'solidity.'"

Now, who does not know not only that we meet with resistance, but that we are compelled to shake a person who is fast asleep before we can effectually bring him to his senses? The said slumber, therefore, must be solid, because it resists the touch.

Again, when we talk of the soundness of timber, do we not mean its solidity? For if it is sound, it is undecayed, and if undecayed then solid. Just so we speak of sleep and call it sound obviously because it is undecayed and, therefore, solid. A very common expression is "sound sleep," by which we mean solid sleep. So far it is found nothing different from matter.

The next point to be established concerning sleep is that it is "inactive." Rest, or a state of inactivity, is the result and natural consequence of sleep, that is, sleep produces inactivity. But everything produces after its kind, therefore sleep is in itself inactive, or else it could not produce inactivity. Perhaps it may be objected that people sometimes walk in their sleep. Yes, but the objection does not reach the point—does not touch the case: for somnambulism, or walking in sleep, is not the effect of sleep itself, but of a dreaming, which is quite another thing.

The less we are disturbed by dreams, the sounder is our sleep; and then we hear nothing about walking. It may be said, however, that snoring is not the effect of dreams. It is not an action either; it is "vox et præterea nihil."

The fourth argument, that sleep is matter, is, that it is "moveable." The light of the sun cannot illuminate more than half the earth at once—where it shines is day—opposite to this is the shade of the earth. As the globe revolves, the shadow passes successively over the surface, producing night. If, then, this shadow travels round the globe, it must carry the night with it. But wherever night is, there is sleep; consequently, sleep must be carried round the earth, by its diurnal revolutions. Wherefore sleep is moveable; which was to be proved.

That sleep is portable, is also proved by observation. We have seen children in that state, carried from place to place, without waking. Whence the proposition is manifest.

In the fifth place, sleep is "heavy." This is made to appear from the fact that when people find themselves extremely drowsy, they also find it necessary to nod. Now what else can account for this nutation of the head, when oppressed with insupportable drowsiness? It stands on the same shoulders, is supported by the same muscles, and yet, when overloaded with sleep, it will incline—droop—nod: like the pale poppy, when the evening dews have filled its cups. Sleep must certainly be "heavy."

Nextly and lastly, we are to prove that sleep is "infinitely divisible." Were one animal to enjoy all the sleep there is, he would be a sluggish creature, I woen; but, instead of that, the fact is, that sleep is apportioned among the many: by which means we all get a comfortable share of it, and these shares are separate from each other: for, otherwise, we could not pass between two dogs, that lay asleep on the floor, without falling asleep ourselves, which is contrary to experience. Hence it is plain that sleep is divided into separate portions, and is, therefore, divisible. But because the number of animals, which we may suppose asleep at one and the same time, is indefinitely great: or, in other words, infinite, each having his separate portion of sleep, it necessarily follows, that the number of these portions must be infinite also. And, being separate, they are divided. Therefore, sleep is divided into an infinite number of separate shares, or portions. That is, sleep is infinitely divisible, according to the proposition.

This divisibility applies only to space. Let us see whether it be not equally true with respect to duration. One may sleep eight hours, or half an hour, or three minutes; nay, he may sleep only a single wink, or even half that, which is done by shutting one eye. And here let me remark, that sleep has been split up into naps ever since Adam, and these being indefinitely short, and succeeding each other at very short intervals throughout this lapse of ages, must of course be infinitely divided. Hence, with respect to time, also, sleep is infinitely divisible.

We have now demonstrated that sleep possesses extension, solidity, inaction; that it can be moved, is heavy, and is capable of infinite divisibility. Wherefore, since it possesses all the properties of matter, the conclusion is irresistible that sleep is matter. Lest after all, however, there should be some one unconvinced—still hesitating—still doubtful whether sleep is in fact a material substance, let him set up without sleep, for three or four nights in succession, and I will undertake to say he will no longer think it immaterial.

THE SILK GOWN.—"To be or not to be" is the question which is now agitating the Wesleyan body throughout this country, on the subject of wearing clerical gowns in the pulpits of the society, by its itinerant ministers Mr. Welsh, in a pamphlet which he has published, states, that the system, if adopted by all the itinerant preachers, will cost the society £7,000. The Rev. S. D. Waddy, a popular Wesleyan preacher, having had a silk gown presented to him by some ladies in his congregation, has appeared therein in public, but his so doing has not met with the approval of the office-bearers of the Society in Hull. The Rev. Mr. Bunting, at Manchester, also appeared in one on the same day as Mr. Waddy, which circumstance being strongly disapproved, Mr. Bunting has withdrawn himself until the Conference, when the matter will come on for discussion.—[English paper.]

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1841.

CHARLES O'MALLEY.

An EXTRA containing the previous parts of the second volume of this story, is for sale at the office and by all the agents of the NEW WORLD.

OUR NEW VOLUME.—The third volume of the Quarto edition of the New World will commence the first week in July. It is now the time for new subscribers to send in their names. Let it be remembered that $5 a year in advance will procure two copies for a year or one copy for two years; and that six dollars sent in advance will procure the same number of copies together with a beautiful copy of SEARS'S PICTORIAL BIBLE.

ENLARGEMENT OF THE NEW WORLD.

We have the satisfaction to announce to the numerous readers of our paper, that, in consequence of the great success which has attended the NEW WORLD from the first day of its publication to this, and on account of the recent accessions to our list of subscribers, we have determined to enlarge its dimensions, from the first of July next, BEING THE PERIOD OF THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE NEW QUARTO VOLUME.

The Quarto Volume of the New World, to commence on the first of July, will be considerably increased in size, and will contain four printed columns on each page, instead of three as heretofore. Thus each number will hereafter consist of sixteen elegantly printed pages—SIXTY-FOUR COLUMNS—one half more "matter" than the ALBION, literary journal, which is sold at Six Dollars a year, and as much as the SPIRIT OF THE TIMES, sporting journal, which is sold at Ten Dollars a year, and three times as much as the NEW YORK MIRROR, a journal of taste, which is sold at Five Dollars a year. The Terms of the Quarto New World will not be altered, but continue to be Three Dollars for one year, or Five Dollars for two years.

The Folio Edition will contain nine columns on each page, instead of eight.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

Since our last issue, we have published an extra number of the New World, in both editions, which has been, or now is sent to all of you gratuitously. That number contains previous parts of Charles O'Malley, the most popular and interesting series of papers, if we except Ten Thousand a Year, which is now issuing from the press. Barnaby Rudge, though a wonderful story, and in no manner unworthy of the genius of Boz, is not looked for with so general and lively an interest as either of its rivals. We earnestly advise you to commence the perusal of Charles O'Malley with the extra number. Do not throw it aside, because there has been a previous volume. We assure you that the connection of the different parts is so slight that you will experience just as much pleasure in the perusal of what has been and will be, in advance of any other newspaper, published in the New World, as if you had pondered every preceding line. Try it; but do not, we pray you, throw the chapters aside without dipping into them to ascertain their quality. After a good taste, our word for it, you will go on with a surprising appetite. There is a zest in every sketch, which renders it independent of the condiments of simple romance.

Hereafter TEN THOUSAND A YEAR will not be published every week, for the plain reason that none is left to publish. We have now "caught up" with Blackwood's Magazine, in which the novel appears every month: in this number you have all that was printed in Blackwood for May, and now must, of necessity, wait for the arrival of the June number before our readers can receive any further information concerning the erratic proceedings of the illustrious Tittlebat Titmouse, M. P., the deep-laid plots of the astute Gammon, or the meek endurance of the pious Aubrey. Is there one of our subscribers so happy as not to have read Ten Thousand a Year? We say so happy, because he, who has not read it, has a pleasure in reserve, the magnitude of which he should measure only by his love and appreciation of the humorous and the pathetic, the sentimental and the strong.

There are some, who object to reading a story from week to week or month to month; because they say they cannot endure repeated pauses in the interest—that they are by these tantalized and distressed; they "prefer to wait till it is all done, and then go back and read the whole together." This is unwise, and such persons deprive themselves of a gratification of which they are ignorant, until they have habituated themselves to keeping alive their memory of the incidents and characters of a story. To us there is the same pleasure in the occasional perusal of Ten Thousand a Year, Charles O'Malley, Barnaby Rudge, Guy Fawkes, and Stanley Thorn, that there is in receiving letters and news from different sets and circles of our friends, among whom certain interesting events are continually transpiring. We should as soon think of refusing to hear how these friends were getting on in life, and of deferring all knowledge of their concerns till the whole tale of their history could be told—as of declining these admirable stories, because they are still in a state of progression.

As a finale to these remarks, we beg leave to inquire of our subscribers whether they have consulted their receipts and, having ascertained the time of the expiring of their subscriptions, renewed them for another year? This inquiry should perhaps come from the Publisher, and lies more strictly within his province than ours; but, as you are on rather more familiar terms with the Editor, and cherish, as he trusts, a kindly understanding with him, we considered that you would rather be spoken to by us on so delicate a subject. Now, do not on any consideration whatsoever, let us think of parting company; but, order the New World for one year longer at all events. We have glorious, good matter in reserve—original, from the pens of favorite American authors—selected, from the most popular writers of Great Britain. Our English correspondent, an American gentleman residing in London, a man of fine talents and well acquainted with the leading literati and the publishers abroad, stands ready to forward to us all that is new and valuable, and to purchase, without regard to expense, early copies and proof-sheets of the best works in the press.

From our having relinquished our daily paper and resolved to devote ourselves exclusively to the care of the New World, we shall be able to improve it greatly in its editorial department, and in its general arrangement. But of this we leave our kind subscribers to judge; heartily trusting that they will continue to accompany us on the journey, so auspiciously and pleasantly begun.

THE CHARITY OF CHRIST AND THE CHARITY OF THE LAW.—It is well-nigh impossible, while examining the precedents established by the practice of the common-law in England, and while consulting the statute-books of many States in this enlightened and religious republic, to believe that the former were the judicial decisions, and the latter the legislative enactments, of Christian men. Many of them are opposed diametrically to the spirit of Christ: they violate with bold effrontery the plainest maxims of his code; they are wicked and oppressive; they afflict and crucify the innocent, and suffer the guilty to go free. Be it our duty to expose these laws; be it our duty, from time to time, to denounce them to the world, to denounce also those by whom, in opposition to the will of mankind, they are unblushingly maintained!

We now refer to the subject of IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT—not to argue upon it, not to show the reasons of its iniquity, not to relate instances of barbarity, or to insist that it ought to be abolished. All this have we done in times past—and more than this, by God's help, will we do in future. But now we are drawn to this moving theme by the contemplation of a picture, painted in saddest colours, and full of an expressive sorrow which wrings the heart. Friend of humanity, whosoever thou art! read the story of the Aubreys, in Ten Thousand A-Year—read, "till thine eyes are fountains of tears," a narrative of wrong and contumely, that will cause thee to exclaim, with the indignant Cowper—

"There is no flesh in man's obdurate heart,
It does not feel for man. The natural bond
Of brotherhood is severed like the flax
Which falls asunder at the touch of fire."

The case of Aubrey is not fictitious; no man, who has contemplated the operations of the law of imprisonment for debt, can hesitate to acknowledge its reality, its truthfulness, its exact copy of life. What a scene is that in which the victim is first borne away from the humble sphere of his affections! How vivid the description! How startling the words! We almost hear them, as we read, "piercing the night's dull ear," and pleading

"Like angels, trumpet-tongued
Against the deep damnation of his taking off."

A subsequent scene—in which the same circumstances occur with exasperated force, and which was acted at the instigation of a villain still more atrocious than the cold-blooded scoundrels by whom the debtor was first engaoled—is left almost wholly to the imagination of the reader—and feeble must be its power if, catching the genius of the author, it cannot deepen the gloom and enhance the anguish. Can anything be more terrible than the Satanic indifference of the bailiff, who, accustomed to such calamity, laughs at its effects? Yes—yes! the sin of the ruthless creditor, who, seizing the dagger which the LAW places in his hand, plunges it to the hilt in the heart of his bondman.

THE LAW!—"Rare law! most equitable law!"—the LAW, framed by legislators who called themselves Christian, persisted in by legislators who get down on their knees sometimes and pray to be forgiven, lifting up to Heaven hands dyed in innocent blood! Is this exaggeration? Is heart-breaking no murder? Is not ruin synonymous with destruction? Where so great a boon as liberty? take that and life is worthless; take that, and Death becomes the only emancipator. We know the answer that will meet us here; we are told that the poor debtor, who will swear that he has not a fragment of property remaining, can be released. Truly, this is comforting. All that your debtor has to do is to take oath before God that his wife and children are beggars—that they have not a morsel to eat and that nothing is left for them but water to drink and air to breathe, and some scanty raiment with which to cover their nakedness. And it were well, if this were all. The debtor has a stout heart, strong hands, eyes to see, ears to hear, "and mind to apprehend;" he can work, work, work, from the early morning far into the night-season. But of what avail is this—we ask bitterly, of what avail will be his labor? Has not his creditor a right to all his subsequent earnings? Has not his creditor the power to put him in jail a second time, a third time, a fourth time, as many times as he pleases? Must he not "swear out" again—again, providing not for his own household and being worse than an infidel, avow that his family are reduced to beggary?

But, "the end of these things is at hand." Popular indignation is kindled, and the lovers of justice and mercy should omit no occasion to fan the sacred flame. Already in our own State have the people forced their representatives to say "No man shall be imprisoned for debt." Let the fiat be repeated from limit to limit of the Republic. Let the watchword be, LIBERTY TO THE UNFORTUNATE—liberty of person; and, by and by, in Heaven's good time, may follow, in spite of the tyranny and ignorance of legislators, liberty of action and FREEDOM FROM DEBT.

THE CURRENCY.—Complaints concerning the wretched and almost hopeless condition of the currency of this country, were never louder or more frequent than at present. It is well-nigh impossible to transmit money from the South and West to the North—so serious is the loss on exchanges. A National Bank, or a General Institution of some kind must be established, or the country will continue to experience the same dreadful convulsions, by which it has been tortured for four years past.

Before the next number of this journal shall be printed, the specially-summoned Congress will have assembled at Washington, and we shall all have read the Message of President Tyler. The returns of elections, printed in another column, will show to our readers that the Administration majority in the two Houses will be much larger than was anticipated, even by the most sanguine of the Whigs. We receive this as a forcible declaration of the people of those States, in which the elections have been held, that they are not only in favor of, but determined to have, a monied establishment under the General Government, by whose controlling power there can be a fixed system of exchange between the remote cities of the country. There is no doubt but that President Tyler will urge those measures, which are advocated by the opponents of the Sub Treasury, as peculiarly their own; he will receive the support of a large majority in the National Legislature, and thus something efficient may be brought to pass awhile sooner than we have dared to anticipate. One point seems to be generally agreed upon: something must be done, something decided: whatever that something is to be, let us know it, and speedily. We are wearied of this perpetual transition, this unrest, this toppling over to-day of what was erected yesterday.

Our country resembles a man in paralysis. A course of treatment has been adopted which, having given no measure of relief to the patient, must be relinquished for another. The physicians are shortly to meet in consultation, and our trust is, that whatever they may prescribe may be speedily administered, so that the cure, if it be possible, may take place before the fits become more frequent and more dangerous.

THE BOSTON ATLAS.—This paper, which has, from the period of its passing into the proprietary and editorial charge of the lamented Richard Haughton, been conducted with singular skill, ability and enterprise, is now in the hands of William Hayden and Thomas M. Brewer, Esquires, by whom it was purchased from Mr. James Haughton, the executor and legatee of the late owner. Of the character and talents of Mr. Hayden, we can speak from personal acquaintance in terms of sincere respect. He has, for several years past, filled with honor to himself and satisfactorily for his fellow-citizens, an important office in the municipal government. Meanwhile his interest in the political welfare of his state and country has been unremitting, and the daily press is indebted to him for many an able disquisition and many a happy paragraph. He is, moreover, a poet, and a wit of no mean order, with a heart full of jovial good-will and "moved with the concord of sweet sounds." He has furnished for many "celebrations" in his native city, spirited odes and humorous songs. Though a staunch Whig, he has always enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the distinguished members of the opposite party.

Mr. Brewer is, we are told, a younger man than Mr. Hayden; of his capacities we could not but form a favorable estimate, from the fact of his having been invested by Mr. Haughton with the whole care of the Atlas. He is, as we learn from "mouths of wisest censure," and infer from the efficiency with which the Atlas has of late been conducted—a gentleman of available talents and large attainments. Under such management, we feel assured that the Boston Atlas will continue to assert and to maintain the high political rank which it has so honorably won.

OUR POST OFFICE.—Mr. Gordon, the newly-appointed Postmaster of Boston, was duly installed in the premises on Monday morning. He has long been known to many of our citizens, as a business man of great activity, and if he serves the public as Postmaster, with as much zeal as he has served the Whig party for the last few years, there will be no cause of complaint.

Mr. Greene, the late incumbent, has been a most faithful and accommodating officer, and his regrets for the loss of office must be, in some degree, consoled by the testimony which the press uniformly bears to his worth. Whatever necessities there might exist for the change, we are sure they would not arise from any want of ability or faithfulness in him. We never heard a complaint against him, except from one individual. His administration has been impartial, and his demeanor, as a public officer, courteous and polite to all, of whatever political creed. We know not what his plans of life for the future may be; but, as we doubt not they will be honorable to himself and useful to others, we sincerely hope they may be successful to the extent of his own wishes. He has a more liberal heart than some who handle more gold, and we hope he may never feel the want of means to gratify his generous dispositions.—[Boston Courier.

Valuable indeed is praise so justly bestowed. Mr. Nathaniel Greene is a man far above the influences of party clamor and political strife. He breathes "a nobler ether, a sublimer air." His whole affections have been given, during late years, to literary pursuits. He has made himself master of the chief languages, and translated books from the German and Italian with singular fidelity and elegance. To him the true spirit of life comes only "in the still air of delightful studies." All his leisure hours are spent in his library—and it is a touching fact, that all he expects to "lay up" from the emoluments of eight years' service in the Post Office are his books. Before his appointment as Postmaster, by General Jackson, he had become involved in certain pecuniary engagements. In the faithful discharge of these he has paid all the money he could save beyond what was requisite for careful and economical living.

Mr. Greene is turned out of the Post Office to make room for an honorable and deserving Whig. Yet no man ever more faithfully and satisfactorily discharged the duties incumbent upon him. He never interfered in elections; he never was an active partizan: he was only a silent and staunch friend of Democracy and of the principles which controlled the administrations of Jackson and Van Buren.

We join our heartfelt wishes to those of the Editor of the Boston Courier that success may attend him in whatever business he may choose to pursue.

ANNUAL FAIR OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE.—The fourteenth Annual Fair of the American Institute will be held in this city in the early part of October next. Accommodations will be provided for every kind of agricultural and horticultural productions, for machines and implements, steam power, &c. Suitable places will be assigned for exhibiting cattle, horses, and other farming stock; also, for the exhibition of American manufactures of all kinds. The State Legislature, with a view to promote the interests of Agriculture and Household Manufactures have granted the Institute the sum of $950 per annum for five years, thus enabling it to reward industry more liberally than heretofore. The Institution requests all the multiplied interests of industry and art to make their contributions of the best specimens, that the most perfect miniature view may be presented of the skill, the genius, and the ample resources of our country at the coming anniversary.

☞ The District Attorney of the United States for the State of New York has served our Attorneys, Messrs. Deming and Rafferty, with a declaration considerably longer than the one hundred and nineteenth Psalm, full of the usual legal absurdities and nonsense, in consequence of our having refused to pay to the Postmaster of New York the sum of forty dollars, being the amount of fines imposed upon us for sending eight Prospectuses of the New World inclosed in papers to St. Louis Missouri. We maintain that our so doing was no violation of the Post Office Laws; and we are determined to abide a legal decision, being willing to endure the vexation and expense of a suit for the sake of having the question decided.

It is a notorious fact—a fact that has been stated a thousand times in the newspapers—that Prospectuses of the Extra Globe have been sent to all parts of the United States. And yet, we will venture to assert, that paper has never been fined. It seems to us that all the officers of this Government avail themselves of every means in their power to fleece the people.

ESPY IS COMING—LOOK OUT FOR MORE RAIN!—It is with feelings akin to grief that finds relief only in tears—tears being the heart's rain—that we make known to our gentle readers in the state of New-York and the adjacent country that Mr. Espy is in this vicinity. He is, or was, or has been lecturing at Albany—next we shall hear of him lecturing in New-York. Why doesn't he make an Almanac and his fortune at the same time, and suffer us to have a little dry weather? It has been pouring and pouring almost continually since his return from his European tour—during which the Eastern hemisphere was visited with perpetual deluges. We propose a meeting of the principal citizens at the Croton Water-works, to remonstrate against

Mr. Espy's proceedings, and to pass a resolution thus—namely, to wit, viz:

Resolved, That the rain has been increasing, is increasing, and ought to be diminished.

THE N. O. PICAYUNE informs us that the New York Mirror "still maintains the favorite corner it has won in popular estimation and under the polished conduction of George P. Morris &c." "Conduction" is a vile noun-substantive; but we are glad to learn, though from a distance, that the Mirror continues to flourish and devoutly hope that it may live a thousand years and that its shadow may never be less.

HOW TO PRESERVE HEALTH.—It is stated in a foreign paper that M. Fourcault, a French Physician has recently made some important discoveries and experiments, which go to show that an important means of preserving or of restoring health is, a due attention to the access of air to every part of the external surface of the body. He succeeded in producing at pleasure in animals, before healthy, suppressions of perspiration, conjections of the blood, the derangement of the internal organs, affections of the heart and the foundation of aggregation of matter in the lungs, analogous to the tubercles in pulmonary consumption, and even death itself as the consequence.

The means by which he arrived at these results, was the simple prevention of the access of air to the skin, which by checking the functions of perspiration, caused the matters usually carried off through their agency to be thrown back upon the internal organ.

The Literary World.

TO PUBLISHERS.

In the haste and turmoil, the "hurly-burly" and "bustle-bustle" of editing a daily newspaper, instances may have occurred in which we have neglected to notice with such particularity as they deserved, the works, original and republished, which have been forwarded to us by our mindful friends, the publishers. But now since "the still beginning, never-ending task is over" and "the hurly-burly's done," we shall be enabled to expatiate more largely in the pleasant fields of literature and to tell our readers of those productions which refresh and invigorate the mind, which are calculated "To raise the morals and to mend the heart."

Let all new books, therefore, be sent without delay to the Editor of the New World and they shall without delay be spoken of with an unprejudiced criticism.

It is no exaggeration to say—numbering five readers for each paper sent from this office (and many have fifty readers)—that the New World is scanned by one hundred thousand persons. It is no small advantage to a book that its mere name should be announced to so numerous a body of intelligent people; and we hope that this fact will be generally appreciated.

All announcements of works in the press will be immediately inserted and without charge, when sent to us by publishers, who regularly forward their new books.

A GRAMMAR OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE, in a series of letters, addressed to every American Youth by Hugh A. Pue. Philadelphia Published by the author.

The present to us of this diminutive treatise was accompanied by a note from the author, which politely requested us to speak of it (the treatise, not the note—an example, by the way, of the obscurity sometimes attending the use of pronouns, which should be avoided by "every American youth" as it deserved.) This we should have done without the author's request and, possibly, without his permission. Your book will not do, Mr. Hugh A. Pue. There is a grammatical error in the very first sentence of the preface which commences "If it was invariably true," and which should commence "If it were invariably true." It behoves grammarians as well as divines not to be guilty of these precise sins which they condemn in others. When they blunder, they should blunder rhetorically. Mr. Pue, you should be ashamed of yourself. Proh Pudor.

As an evidence of the sublime style of Mr. Hugh A. Pue, we must quote a single paragraph. Positively—however much pressed for room—we cannot deny ourselves this gratification. It is perfectly superb; there is a sort of—so to speak—war-horse magnificence about it, which, trampling on the imagination of the reader, kicks up the dust of admiration and envelopes us in a cloudy obfuscation of indiscernible effulgence. It is excellently adapted to the comprehension of "every American youth," and must inspire him with such a passion for grammar that he will rush into it, as Fanny Kemble would say, "like mad."

But, instruction, instead of carrying the listener up to some dizzy height, upon which, owing to the strangeness of the element, and the intoxication occasioned by the rapid ascension, he is unable to keep his feet, and is therefore precipitated headlong to the level from which he rose, gradually draws him up an endless inclined plane; from which he can fairly see the country through which he passes; and thereby obtain the information necessary to all travellers through life! Instead of leading its votary through the air, in a phantom's trail, to pluck the colors from the rainbow, and therewith gild the flowery artificials of his fancy, instruction gently guides him through amaranthine bowers, where he can revel in their bosoms, and decorate his brow with branches from the tree of knowledge! Instead of being the meteor which gleams across our vision, as across the firmament, astounding by its grandeur, then fading forever from our view, INSTRUCTION is the fixed star, which beams with never dying brightness, on the admiring, aspiring beholder. And like a solar orb, its great possession is its durability. It does not become dimmed by time; nor less admired by intimate acquaintance with; nor destitute of interest, by being pondered over. Reflection is its nurse; examination is its daily nourishment. It will last long, long after every atom of eloquence has been obliterated from the memory.

TWO YEARS BEFORE THE MAST.—The Newburyport Herald states that the Harpers gave Mr. Dana only $200 for the copyright of this work. They have sold, it says, already 30,000 copies, on which they have made $5000, and expect to realize $5000 more from it.—[National Intel.

If the Newburyport Herald states that, it states what is totally unfounded in fact. Whatever the Harpers gave Mr. Dana for "Two Years Before the Mast," it was as much as he asked for it—and we think that was $250. But no matter: the price given for this book has been made a subject for newspaper paragraphs written in a sort of indignant spirit, as if the Harpers were to blame for not giving more for a thing than they could get it for. If a small dealer in domestic goods, belonging to Newburyport, goes to Boston and makes a purchase from A. & A. Lawrence, or James K. Mills & Co. on very favorable terms, and, afterwards, the kind of goods he bought, from being unexpectedly of a superior fabric, from scarcity or other reason, grows in great demand, we rather think that he would pocket the profits and not send one penny of them to the wholesale merchants; and we guess, moreover, that nobody would go into a fit of virtuous anger, because he bought them as cheaply as he did. Now, for the life of us, we cannot see any difference between a purchaser of books and a purchaser of goods. The former has just as clear a right to get an article at a low price as the latter. So much for "the principle of the thing"—now for the particular case.

If we were to take half what is said about the matter of this book of Mr. Dana's for truth, we should suppose that the Messrs. Harper—than whom more honorable, more conscientious or more liberal men never breathed—had taken advantage of the author's youth and inexperience and cajoled him out of his manuscripts for a sum very inferior to their value. Now the agreement was made by persons every way competent—who were very well satisfied. Nothing is more difficult than for an author to get his first work published: if he be successful, his future productions can be disposed of easily enough. If the Harpers had had sufficient prescience by which to ascertain the exact sale of Mr. Dana's book, they would cheerfully have given more for it. As it was, their offer was a generous one, and the only wonder is that publishers, so distinguished and so busy with standard publications, would publish a first work on any terms. We are well assured that the author himself has not joined in the senseless clamor that has been made. His success has been deservedly great.

Instead of 30,000 copies of the book, less than 10,000 have been sold. Instead of having made $5000 from the sale, the Harpers have not made $500; the book being sold so cheaply that the profit on each volume is very small. Such are the facts of this case. To hear people talk, one would suppose that the Harpers, who publish hundreds of thousands of books every year, expected to retire from business on the strength of a small duodecimo, which is sold for two shillings and sixpence!

THE PROGRESS OF DEMOCRACY; illustrated in the History of Gaul and France. By Alexander Dumas. Translated by An American. New-York: J. & H. G. Langley.

We are glad of an opportunity to call the attention of our readers to this work in an English dress—a work, the most original in design, and at least among the most able in execution, of all contemporary productions.

In giving some account of its details, and in expressing our opinion of its merits, we beg leave at the outset to say that we have read it, from beginning to end, and found its perusal a far more entertaining recreation than the reading of ordinary novels; for the incidents are facts, and the philosophical reflections both profound and brilliant. It is emphatically the work of a man; of a practised writer; of a comprehensive mind; of a commanding intellect; one who groups his incidents as a painter does his figures, and presents at a glance their relative importance and the influence they exert upon each other in the grand landscape of history.

Indeed, it is a matter of surprise to us that any writer could within the brief compass of three hundred duodecimo pages convey to his readers the essential facts of Gallic and French history down to the accession of Philip de Valois; and it is still more surprising that he could invest this abridged record with an interest altogether fascinating; yet both of these things are realized in "The Progress of Democracy."

The work, as the title sets forth, combines two characteristics, historical and political; and these are not presented in separate departments, but wrought together so ingeniously that the reader becomes a republican and a de-more rat before he knows it; for the historical facts bear so directly upon the political theory, and so perfectly support it in all its points, that the truth of one seems to be as incontestable as the truth of the other; and, however much one might be disposed to cavil and to argue the question, he would be very much puzzled, unless he has more shrewdness than we have, to know where to begin his dissent and his controversy.

The style of the historical narrative is necessarily concise; yet it is so enlivened by pertinent anecdote as never to flag for an instant; and when, at intervals, the author reviews his facts in a comprehensive summary, the brilliant language and imagery of DUMAS reminds us that he, and not the mere chronologist, is the master-spirit of the drama. Perhaps the most striking instance of this transition in style is to be found at the close of the Second Part of the work, where the author considers the alleged dismemberment of the empire of Charlemagne.

As a book of reference, this work is especially valuable; for it shows at a glance the dates of prominent events, not in France merely, but in Europe; and, besides, it gives the original orthography of the names of distinguished individuals with all the gradations of change that they have undergone down to the present incongruous nomenclature. Among the notes, we find one of those ingenious and elaborate Latin acrostics written by the monks of a past age, in which each line is made to begin and end with the same letter.

This work is an additional triumph for its distinguished author. He was already the most successful French dramatist of the age; and his "Impressions of Travel" have overborne all competition in that department of writing. His novels, too, though limited in number, are certainly not surpassed in excellence by any of his contemporaries. But as a historian and political economist, the world had scarcely thought of looking to DUMAS: nevertheless, though the field was new to him, and though his occupation of it was unexpected to the public, he has taken permanent possession of it and won, in its area, an unfading laurel.

Of the manner of the translation it is not requisite to say more than that it conveys to the American reader the full meaning and spirit of the original, and is recommended by a style, singularly pure and elegant.

The volume is tastefully brought out, and is worthy of a prominent shelf in each well-chosen library.

MECHANIC'S OWN BOOK.—Mr. A. V. Blake of New York has published a work called The Artist's Guide, and Mechanic's Own Book, embracing a large variety of principles, useful explanations, receipts, &c., applicable to the various employments of men, by JAMES PILKINGTON, 490 pages 12 mo. The mechanical execution of the volume is neat, and as far as we can perceive, accurate. It is well designed for usefulness not only to mechanics, but will be found instructive and useful to families.

POEMS OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.—CHARLES S. FRANCIS, Broadway, has just published two volumes of the complete Poetical works of Sir Walter Scott. These will be immediately followed by the first volume of his Life by Lockhart. The Poems will be completed in twelve numbers, and the Life in eight; price twenty-five cents a volume.

Part 1, of volume 2d, of the Flora of North America, by Drs. Torrey and Gray, has just been published.

A "Southern Quarterly Review" is about to be started at New Orleans by Messrs. D. K. Whittaker and James Ritchie.

THE DOUBLE, DOUBLE NOTION, is postponed till the 10th of June, when it will be positively published. Price 25 cents single, five copies for $1, or $18 per hundred, in advance. Orders sent to this Office from our agents or others will be forwarded to Boston.

LITERARY.—Harper & Brothers announce as in press the following, among other new works:

"INCIDENTS OF TRAVEL IN CENTRAL AMERICA, CHIAPAS, and YUCATAN. By John L. Stephens, Esq., Author of 'Incidents of Travel in Egypt, Arabia Petrea, and the Holy Land.' With a Map and 80 Engravings." 2 vols. 8vo.

"AMERICA;—Historical, Statistic, and Descriptive. By James S. Buckingham, Esq. In 2 vols. 8vo. Embellished with seventy Engravings on Wood, and a portrait of the Author on Steel."

"The History of Christianity, from the Birth of Christ to the Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire. By the Rev. H. H. Milman." 8vo.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

The criticisms lately published in the Express, "prepared by an educated and intelligent foreigner," have no doubt been very gratifying to the natives, particularly to those of them whose labors have contributed to furnish subjects for such general annihilation.

It has been wisely observed that it requires more intelligence and sagacity to discover beauties than defects. Should this observation be applied to the "intelligent foreigner," it would certainly place him in the same predicament, as to merit, in which he represents the Academy. It may be, however, that our critic has wholly mistaken the design of the Academy, and if so he ought to be furnished with the requisite information; or rather he should have taken the pains to obtain this information before he commenced his very unique attack; this however could hardly be expected from a foreigner.

The National Academy of Design does not pretend to be an exhibition of perfect specimens of painting or sculpture: it does not even pretend to have a choice selection from American artists. The nature of the institution renders the admission of even bad pictures sometimes unavoidable; unavoidable in consequence of the influence of friends and patrons. In fine, the Academy was instituted for the encouragement of artists, particularly young artists, and the tone and manner of criticisms which it naturally invites are such as patrons of learning bestow upon youthful aspirants after literary fame, whose undeveloped genius gives tokens of future greatness. To try a sophomore by the measure of Newton's attainments, and pronounce him an ignoramus, a dolt, a fool, a blockhead, an idiot, were not less unjust, unwise and ridiculous than to set up a model of perfection, by which to search out the defects of pictures in an Academy of paintings. We do not intend these remarks to imply that the Academy of Design is made up of schoolboy materials; but to assert that it makes no pretensions to complete or even comparative attainments in the arts which it is designed to promote; and that the absence of such pretensions ought to disarm even cold censure. If the institution had boasted of its attainments, or set itself up to compete with the art and genius of Europe, it might then have been in tolerable taste and decorum for a "foreigner learned and intelligent" to open his inkhorn and pour out the contents thereof unblushingly. Any "foreigner" might then be pardoned even though he had no mercy on himself, for who that is an American has not learned to succumb to the indomitable arrogance of European quackery? How much more then must they stand abashed when a "foreign gentleman," educated and intelligent, takes up the quill to write down their presumption!

We are not an artist and have no special interest in the academy of design, except as we are American, and feel an interest in whatever contributes to our national improvement. This fact, however, is sufficient to arouse us to a sense of the wrongs inflicted through the Express newspaper, upon an institution which contributes so much, despite its defects, to the pleasure of our citizens and to the encouragement of the fine arts. We do not intend to question the veracity of that paper in stating that the criticisms alluded to are from the pen of "an educated and intelligent foreigner;" yet we must be allowed to put in a demurrer, at least to the adjectives setting forth his qualifications as a critic. Why a foreigner should busy himself in this matter, in such a style and manner, for the instruction of American citizens, is certainly unaccountable upon any principle consistent with common courtesy or good breeding. That "an educated and intelligent foreigner" should thus employ his talents, would seem rather a contradiction between pretensions and achievements. That he has travelled through Europe and had an opportunity to examine the best pictures of the best artists in the old world, cannot be reasonably doubted, since his criticisms, in many instances, upon the comparative merits of the paintings in the Academy of Design, prove emphatically

How much a dunce that has been sent to roam, (Rome?) Exceeds a dunce who's always kept at home.

Not being an artist, and of course unacquainted with the technical language proper to be used in criticising paintings, we cannot fully appreciate many of the terms employed by this "educated and intelligent foreigner." One would be led to suppose, however, that the painter's vocabulary must be rather small and extremely frigid, judging from the terms and phrases made use of. "Hard," "too hard," "stiff," "cold," "rigid," &c., are terms which are appreciable when they apply to icebergs and granite; but we cannot perceive their force when applied to a portrait. But granting that these are proper words to be used in criticising a portrait, their appropriateness can only be ascertained by a knowledge of the original.

Is a portrait "stiff" or "cold," or "hard," or "rigid," or "pale," or "deathlike?" so perhaps is the original; and American artists are famous for making a true copy; so much so that they have been sent for from England and France to take likenesses of the nobility of those very countries in which an "educated and enlightened foreigner" acquired his critical skill. "Middling," "scholar-piece," "insignificant," "elaborate," "poor," "soft," "good," "bad," and a few others, constitute the remainder of the terms employed. There is certainly great merit in being able to despatch a critique in half a dozen words—effective words—without the employment of useless verbiage. Such a manner is valuable too, particularly to the artist under the falchion and for whose especial encouragement the death-blow is given! For instance: No. 69, "Scholar piece." No. 73, "Poor, stiff." No. 74, "Stiff and bad." No. 88, "Not worth the place." No. 89, "Hard, cold." No. 92, "Insignificant, stiff, and bad." No. 83, "A poor picture." No. 115, "Stiff and bad." No. 121, "At most, the work of a sign-painter." No. 126, "Hard, stiff and bad," &c. &c. Great economy of words, and elaborate thinking certainly, and very salutary to the poor wretches who have spent weeks and months in producing a specimen of their genius, to wither and disappear under the cabalistic words, "hard, cold, cold stiff, stiff cold, hard cold!" Perhaps the gentlemen had been listening to the coal carriers, or he may have suffered from icebergs on his passage to this country, or he may have had a cold in the head, affecting his vision, as "jaundice" is very often in the eye of the beholder and not in the object which he looks upon.

It would exceed the proper bounds of a notice to follow "an intelligent and educated foreigner" throughout the catalogue and notice all his remarks. Our object is to show, by a selection of a few pictures which he has pronounced "good" or "bad," "cold" or "rigid," "soft" or "hard," that he has applied these terms at random, totally misjudged the merits or demerits of the paintings, or else (if he is really educated and intelligent) acted in the matter from motives of secret and unaccountable malice. It may be proper to state that most of the pictures which he has deigned to praise are really good specimens. To fall upon Inman, Ingham, or Cole, as fit only for sign painters, as he has done upon a few of the best portrait painters in the United States, (and they are the best in the world,) would defeat any motive of spleen, envy, malice or revenge, that might possibly seek gratification in the critic's breast. It were wise, then, to bestow a little praise betimes, as a sort of necessary foil in the inglorious play of general denunciation.

It may also be proper to premise that the "educated and intelligent foreigner" is all the while looking after style. There is some certain style of painting which he has set up as the beau-ideal of perfection, and every thing must square with this or pass through the Procrustean ordeal. Now American artists seek to paint after nature, and if nature is stiff and cold, and rigid or hard, why if they cannot boast of a beautiful, soft picture, they ought at least to have the merit of making a true copy. If the originals of all the portraits in the Academy should present themselves, each by the side of his or her respective portrait, the imitation would tell a story very different from that which an "educated and intelligent foreigner" has published.

Nos. 158 and 159, which our critic is pleased to condemn as "very bad," "dreadful faces," "a sign painter would make it better," &c. are much more true to nature, and look more like human beings than No. 157, which is lauded excessively by this Dutch critic. He was a better critic than one "educated and intelligent foreigner," who a year or two since said of the portraits in the Academy, that many of them were "painted with malicious fidelity."

No. 70, by the painter of No. 157, appears as though the boy had been beset by leeches and completely exsanguinated. No. 157 is little better. The mastoid muscle is very badly inserted, making a right angle with the line of shadow on the right side of the bust. The style of this artist is artificial in the highest degree, and should be avoided by all who would take nature as their model.

Look at the snuff-brown inanities of a German miniature painter, which the intelligent critic calls master pieces; and the drawing on parchment which he proclaims a chef d'œuvre. Not one of the heads are correctly drawn, and the hands and drapery are bad in the extreme.

Our educated and intelligent German, finding, according to the prevailing tea-tray taste in his country, that No. 157 was indeed a charming picture, (what appears in the eyes of our critic to constitute its chief excellence, is its beautiful face—its beauty as a picture merely,) and having fallen in love with it, he next meets a sober dame, just as we find ladies of this lower world sitting in their parlors. But alas! "Bad picture, the face very bad, the position wrong, the tout ensemble stiff!" Indeed! How much better it would be for artists to paint petrified angels, nymphs and fairies! Sign painters are good enough to paint ladies!

No. 159 is condemned without mercy. Our critic has no relish for the realities of sober life. He is all for "style" and "managing," and pretty faces; every thing else is "bad," "hard," "stiff," "dreadful," or the work of a "sign-painter." Let visitors to the Academy compare this painting which he condemns, with No. 160, which he praises, and form their own opinion of the criticisms of an "educated and intelligent foreigner."

No. 155. "The cow in the foreground is incorrectly drawn." There is no cow in the foreground of this picture: there is a bull in the foreground of No. 156. Is that what the writer means?

No. 136. "Bad style—the eyes too rigid." This is the portrait of an Albino. Has the critic never seen an Albino? The eyes of an Albino look pretty rigid in the living subject.

No. 177 is "middling." Compare this with No. 111 or 233.

No. 179. "A good picture." Our critic has a great predilection for pictures having pretty faces. This is indeed a good picture, but so thorough a critic ought to have noticed that the position is very "stiff." The painting is no better than Nos. 175 and 183, which he says are too bad to be criticised, but the picture is handsomer, that's enough.

No. 194. "Portrait of a Boy by E. Mooney, in a bad style," and No. 209, "Group of children by A. B. Durand, badly done." Compare these portraits with fancy sketches Nos. 218, 224, and 225, upon which our critic bestows so much praise. He does not seem to consider the advantage which our artist has in a fancy piece, to make a pretty picture.

No. 216. Portrait of a gentleman, by J. P. Rossiter. A very fine head, the expression good and the style elegant. A style elegant! Here we have something of the same style as Nos. 157, 160 and 181. People may appear so in Germany but they do not in America.

Nos. 232 and 236 are praised by our critic. They are in style! It may be proper here to mention that most of the pictures lauded by an "educated and intelligent foreigner," have either been painted in Europe, or are imitations of European style. A style which our artists generally reject as being false to nature, and prejudicial to the art of imitation, which is the legitimate object of the artist. Some of these paintings are the work of very young artists who have been in Italy and other parts of Europe, and brought style over with them. Two at least of the paintings were painted by the pupil of an artist who, in the opinion of an "educated and enlightened foreigner," ought not presume to put paintings in the Academy. This young artist and his boss ought to change places certainly.

No. 94. Portrait of a gentleman, by J. W. Whitehorn. We cannot judge of it the place is too bad." The place is indeed bad; but our critic judges of 93, standing along side of it in the same line! This (No. 94) is one of the best paintings in the Academy. No. 73, by the same artist—criticised as "poor, stiff"—is also an excellent portrait—the whole painting is perfectly natural and easy, and executed in a masterly manner—and as our critic says of the artist who painted No. 157, "If we were in love nobody else than this artist should paint our sweetheart," so if I wished a true likeness of a friend the painter of No. 73 is the artist that should paint for me. Compare No. 111, "poor stiff," (by Alexander) with the gaudy thing, No. 120, which takes the eye of an educated and intelligent foreigner!

"No. 133. A fine well drawn picture." Notice the left arm, dislocated at the elbow, and the right arm almost as thick at the wrist as any where else. This however is a good picture, but our artist, so learned and intelligent, nought not to have passed by these defects when, for less faults, he wholly condemns paintings by the score.

We shall notice only one more of an "educated and intelligent foreigner's" criticisms. "No. 59. Portrait of D. Stevens, (Dr. Stevens,) by H. Inman. Hard and cold." Little need be said here. Dr. Stevens is extensively known; and many thousands who visit the Academy will be ready at once to pronounce the criticism unjust. The Portrait is a true likeness of the Doctor, and every one of his friends and acquaintances will recognize it as such. Is it hard and cold? Bring the Doctor alongside, with scalpel in hand, and if he is not as hard and cold as the picture, then, Mr. "Foreigner," will be your time to censure.

It ought to be borne in mind by critics who visit the Academy of Design, that most if not all the paintings exhibited there were designed for private parlors. A painting that is colored so as to be properly adapted to the light in a parlor, cannot bear the powerful light which pours upon it from the sky lights of the Academy, and vice versa. The light varies considerably also, so that a picture which appears well at 10 o'clock A. M. will be seen to great disadvantage three hours afterwards.

We have already taken far too much notice of the unworthy object of these remarks, and should not have noticed them at all but for their outrageous and ungentlemanly character. Mr. Brooks, in his travels, has frequently alluded to the prejudices entertained by foreigners to anything American; why his columns should have been the medium of propagation for these very prejudices is indeed unaccountable.

Dramatic World.

THE NEW TRAGEDY.

Judge Conrad's tragedy of AYLMERE was produced by Mr. FORRESTER at the Park Theatre on Monday evening to a good house and with decided success.

We are disposed to pronounce this the best American tragedy that has yet appeared: it is likely, by its happy adaptation to the popular taste, to retain permanent possession of the stage; nor will it, in our judgment, like several others that have been written for Mr. FORRESTER, die with that distinguished tragedian. Indeed, it is one of the few plays which can be performed and made successful with no other support than that of a good stock company—and that is about as high praise as can be conceded to any tragedy in the language.

Aylmere is rather redundant in incident, or action. Each of its five acts contains enough materiel for an entire play, when diluted after the present fashion of book-making: and this fact, while it evinces the author's richness of invention, is, nevertheless, a fault. It confuses the audience and renders the progress of the story rather unintelligible, and in certain parts, tedious.

The language, too, is unequal, at times rising to brilliant poetry, but often descending to common-places; and, occasionally, the repetition of particular words, such as "chapel-house," "festering," "pale," "rotten," &c., seems to show that the author's poverty in language is proportioned to his richness in thought. Whenever a word occurs so frequently as to suggest to the audience the idea of repetition, the existence of a fault is indisputable.

There is, besides, to our apprehension, an inconsistency in the plot. The ostensible motive of Aylmere and his associates in raising the standard of rebellion, is the general wrong, the oppression of the people, collectively: yet the domestic griefs of Aylmere are brought forward so much more conspicuously than the common oppression, that we can hardly imagine him, at least, to be actuated by other motives than private revenge. The cause is indeed ample for this result: he might well "move heaven and earth" to accomplish his vengeance: but there is something contradictory between his avowed and his real motives in pursuing it.

In some respects, the play is rather too melodramatic for the dignity of tragedy. Certain things happen rather artificially. For instance, when Clifford is surprised by Aylmere in taking liberties with his wife, he, (Clifford) happens to be unarmed. Again, when Aylmere encounters Say in the forest, the latter is unarmed: and as Aylmere, having cast down his knife, to be even with him, is about to grasp him, a host of troops, till that moment not thought or heard of, opportunely rush in as if they rose out of the earth.

And now, having with entire candor pointed out these faults, we with equal candor acknowledge they are all we were able to discover after a careful attention to the first performance.

The merits of Aylmere are far more numerous and obvious. The cottage-scene, where Aylmere makes himself, his wife, and his child, known to his mother, is very beautifully executed by the author, and was most charmingly played by FORRESTER "and the rest." A following scene, where Clifford sets forth to Say the rights of the people, is also very excellent. Mr. MURDOCK played it with great truth and effect. The closing scene of the second act is highly dramatic and powerfully wrought—almost too much so, in fact, for the effect of what follows. But we forbear further specification as to the play itself, for we cannot recall the details with sufficient distinctness to render justice to the author. We say, therefore, in general, the interest and the action are, for the most part, capably sustained throughout the piece; and the conclusion is worthy of what preceded it. The subject is new and judiciously chosen; and we shall be extremely disappointed, in every sense of the word, if the unanimous verdict of the audience is not fully confirmed by all who may hereafter witness the representation of this tragedy.

Mr. FORRESTER's performance of Aylmere was as nearly faultless as anything he has ever undertaken. Mild, affectionate, tender, agonized, furious and exulting, when he should be and as he should be—it was a triumphant demonstration of histrionic power, enthusiastically acknowledged by an admiring audience. The applause at the close of the second act continued nearly all the time the drop-curtain was down.

We do not think, however, that the audience, though admiring, were at all times discriminating; for some of FORRESTER's best points were wholly overlooked by them. We were particularly struck with several instances of his quiet, colloquial delivery of lines in a style worthy of the elder Kean, which seemed to pass with the audience as matters of course, (as Garrick's acting in Hamlet did to old Partridge,) and which therefore should have been—but were not—highly applauded. By the way, this overlooking of quiet points, is a matter on which we confess to extreme sensitiveness. Your critics will most gravely and magisterially denounce rambling in every form: yet they invariably applaud to the echo these very whirlwinds; and the moment a truly natural, simple, beautiful point is made in a quiet way, they will begin to yawn and ask what's o'clock. "A plague o' such fellows!"

Mr. FORRESTER deserves great credit for the liberal manner in which he brings forward this and other American plays; and we trust the public will not be slow in making an adequate return, as far as crowding to witness his performance may accomplish that result.

It is but justice to the several members of the Park company to say, that they acquitted themselves with great credit, and contributed materially to the success of the new tragedy.

THE NEXT CONGRESS.

The Extra Session of the twenty-seventh Congress will commence on Monday the 31st instant. The following table shows the names of the members, arranged by states, together with the parties to which they belong. The names of the Administration, or Whig members, are in Roman letters, those of the Opposition, or Van Buren, in Italics. New members who succeed others of the same politics are marked with an asterisk [*]; those who succeed members of different politics and are gains to the parties to which they belong, are designated by a dagger [†].

The U. S. SENATE consists, when full, of fifty-two members. In the present Senate there is one vacancy—in the delegation from Tennessee—which will not be filled in time for the Extra Session. The present members are as follows:

MISSOURI.—[By General Ticket.]
John N. Miller, †John C. Edwards,
ARKANSAS. †Jacob M. Howard,
Edward Cross, MISSISSIPPI.
3 Members—Elec. 2d Aug. 2 Members—Elec. 1st Nov.

Total—Administration, 140; Opposition, 95; Vacant, 7. Last Congress about 127 Van Buren; 115 Whig.

The election in Alabama taken on the 20th. There is no doubt of the election of the members named in the above table. Mississippi and Illinois have not yet elected their members. It is probable the former will send two Administration and the latter three Opposition members.

There are three seats contested, viz: one from Maine. Noyes, Ad. vs. Lowell, Opp.; one from Virginia, Smith, Opp. vs. Banks, Opp.; and one from Ohio, Duncan, Opp. vs. Pendleton, Ad.

ADJOURNED.—The Legislature of New-York adjourned on Wednesday the 26th inst. after a session of one hundred and forty-two days; having passed three hundred and fifty-two laws. For the six last days of the session the opposition had a majority in the House, owing to the absence, from sickness and other causes, of several Whig members,

Latest Intelligence.

STEAM-SHIP PRESIDENT—ANOTHER RUMOR.—A letter received in this city, dated Montreal, May 22d, says that Captain Dunn, of a timber-ship, had arrived at Quebec, and states that he left England April 21st, and when three days out positively saw the President making for the Azores.

This report is highly improbable. The latest Quebec papers make no mention of the above rumor; and it is not likely the President would attempt to reach the Azores, when it would be easier to reach England.

MELANCHOLY SHIPWRECK.—A dreadful casualty occurred on the 18th inst. in St. Lawrence bay. The brig Minstrel of Limerick, Ireland, with one hundred and forty-one passengers, emigrants intending to settle in Canada, struck on the Red Island reef, and almost instantly sunk. Upward of one hundred passengers embarked in the boats, but the vessel went down so suddenly that the painters of the boats could not be cast off, and the people who had embarked in them perished with their equally unfortunate companions on board the ship. Of 150 souls, four of the crew and four of the passengers alone remained to tell the sad tale. These embarked in the gig which was towing astern, and were saved by the rope, which attached it to the vessel, breaking when she went down.

COLLISION AT SEA.—The packet ship Susquehanna, from Liverpool to Philadelphia, came in collision with another vessel, on the 8th inst. while going at the rate of eight knots an hour. A vessel being observed immediately on the larboard bow, the helm was put up to avoid a collision, by which act the Susquehanna was brought immediately into contact with another vessel on the other bow. The second vessel was discovered too late to avoid a crash. The stranger vessel, after the first shock, slewed round, passed immediately by the side of the Susquehanna, and the captain states that he was unable to discover any person on board. He cannot say whether she went down or not. One of the hands says that he saw her masts fall. The Susquehanna was considerably injured.

LAND SLIDE AT QUEBEC.—A most distressing accident occurred at Quebec on the morning of the 17th inst. A large mass of Cape Diamond, with the wall from the Governor's garden to the base of the citadel, gave way, and buried under masses of stone and earth eight houses in Champlain street, opposite the Custom-house. Twenty-six persons have been dug out of the ruins, and six persons besides are missing.

Henry W. Beeson, Opp. and Andrew Stewart, Adm. are the candidates for Congress in the Fayette and Greene District, Pa. to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Hook. There is but but little doubt of the election of Mr. Beeson. The election took place on the 25th instant.

Dr. Bethune and lady of Philadelphia have sailed to the Mediterranean, with a view to the improvement of the Doctor's health.

GREAT BANK ROBBERY.—The Frederick, (Md.) County Bank, was entered on Saturday night last and robbed of $185,976 50; of which $10,059 38 was in gold, and $134,967 in notes of the bank, and $8,738 16 in notes and checks of other banks. A reward of $10,000 is offered by the directors for the detection of the robber and the recovery of the money.

FIRE AT RALEIGH, N. C.—A serious fire occurred at Raleigh on the night of the 14th inst. A stable in which the fire originated, together with five houses, and the extensive boarding-house of the Misses Pulliam were consumed. The fire was prevented from extending by blowing up the house adjoining.

The steamboat Brazil, with a full cargo of lead was sunk in the Upper Mississippi on the 7th inst, by striking a ledge of rocks.

SEIZURE OF AMERICAN FISHERMEN.—Several fishing vessels belonging to Rockport, Mass. have been seized by the British Provincial authorities and confiscated, on the pretext that they were within three miles of the British coast. They were captured by virtue of the following sentence found in a treaty between the U. States and Great Britain:

"And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry or cure, any fish on or within three miles of any coasts, bays, creeks or harbors, &c."

SCOTLAND.—The Episcopal Church of Scotland mourns the recent loss of her Primus, the venerable Bishop Walker. Though at an advanced age he was of great value to the Church. He had long been in feeble health.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church is in session at Philadelphia. The Rev. Robert J. Breckinridge, D. D., of Baltimore, was elected Moderator, and the Rev. James C. Barnes of Ohio, Temporary Clerk.

Mr. L. F. Tasistro, tragedian, is lecturing at Richmond, Va. on the writings of Shakspeare.

SWEETS FOR THE SWEET.—Mr. J. F. McJilton, poet, is agent in Baltimore for Pease's Hoarhound Candy.

The rate of passage between New-York and Boston, by way of Norwich, is $3, and not $5, as had been stated. The boats on this line are admirably conducted, and it is rapidly becoming the favorite route.

YALE COLLEGE.—The whole expenses for the past year were $30,000, and the receipts $31,000.

The Bunker Hill Monument is to be completed before the next winter.

THE PRESIDENT.—The following is a list of the passengers in the ill-fated President. In the list heretofore published the names of "Mr. Howell and friend" are given. That friend was Mrs. Howell, who was married to Mr. H. a few hours before the President sailed.

P. C. Pfeiffer, of New-York; A. R. Warburg, New-York; Lieutenant F. Lenox, (second son of the Duke of Richmond,) and Mr. W. H. Courtenay, (son of Mr. P. Courtenay, M. P. for Bridgewater,) British army; Tyrone Power and servant, England; C. A. D. Meisegares, Philadelphia; S. Maile, New-York; C. S. Cadet, Buenos Ayres; T. Palmer, Baltimore; Dr. M. Lerner, Cuba; T. Blancher, Cuba; John Fraser, New-York; A. Van Lohe, jun. Amsterdam; A. L. Byrne, London; — Thorndike, New-York; W. W. Martin, England; E. B. Howell and Lady, New-York; Anson Livingston, New-York; Rev. G. G. Cookman, Washington City, (formerly Chaplain to the U. S. Senate); D. Duchar, Scotland; B. Morris and child; E. Berry, J. C. Roberts, New-York; J. Leo Wolfe, wife and child; Master Mohring; Robert Hamilton Dundas, British Navy. Total 28, and two children.

The officers, crew and servants numbered about 80 souls.

WHIG GAINS AT LATE ELECTIONS.

In Maryland .....	3 do
In North Carolina .....	12 do
In Tennessee .....	1 do

Being a clear gain of 12 Members.

While in three other States, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Kentucky, the Whigs have held their own.—[Nat. Intelligencer.

Gov. Porter of Pennsylvania has ordered a special election for member of Congress in the Somerset District, to supply the place vacated by the death of Hon. Charles Ogle. Samuel Barclay, at present in the State Senate, will probably be nominated by the Whigs, and, if so, elected by a large majority.

RASCALITIES.—A man, named Fowler, was caught in the act of robbing the store of Messrs. Lane & Co. Boston, on the 21st inst. On the same night some villain or villains entered the stable of Lawrence Sinnott, and cut the throat of a valuable horse.

A man was lost overboard from the Caledonia on her late passage, and drowned. £50 were raised for his family by the passengers and crew.

MURDER.—Wm. Keaton, of Wilkinson county Ga. was shot with a pistol by one Samuel M. Pitman on the 4th inst. and died on the 10th. $150 reward has been offered for Pitman.

The stable of Mr. Fifield, the keeper of the Franklin house in Newburyport, was destroyed by fire on the 21st instant, between 10 and 11 o'clock. Loss about $800; no insurance.

The St. Louis murderers were brought into Court to answer the indictments on charge of having murdered Baker and Weaver. They both firmly plead not guilty and had old and experienced counsel assigned for their defence.

Captain J. N. Sawyer of schr. Hero, died on the passage from Havana to New-Orleans, on the 8th inst. of yellow fever. He belonged to Mystic, Conn.

We learn from the Bangor Democrat that the President of the Frankfort Bank has been arrested on a charge of swindling and bound over for trial. The substance of the charge against him is that he took the funds of the bank, purchased stock of various persons at fifty per cent., sold it at par, kept the profits, and paid the bank in wild land at $2 50 per acre that was worthless.

LOSSES AT SEA.—The Marine Insurance offices of Philadelphia have lost, since the 1st of April last, nearly one hundred thousand dollars.

The Richmond Compiler complains of a serious drawback to the enjoyment of the beautiful capitol square of that city. It is that Wild Onions (a vegetable by the way, that we are not acquainted with) have taken almost entire possession of the square, and give forth a not very delightful odor when trespassed upon, to the great discomfort of those poets and others who love to recline in the cool shade.

PRECOCIOUS VILLAINY.—A young man 15 years of age, was arrested in Harrisburg, Pa. on the 14th inst. on the charge of endeavoring to induce some of his associates to join him in a plot to shoot the keeper of the State Treasury, rifle his pockets of the keys and then rob the Department.

A man in New Orleans has recently recovered $2000 from the owners of the steamboat Gen. Brown, the value of some horses lost by the explosion of that boat at Helena, in the year 1838.

ESCAPED.—All the prisoners, five in number, who were confined in the jail at Amherst, N. H., broke out on Wednesday night of last week, and escaped.

The Merchants' Bank of New Orleans, owned by U. S. Bank of Pennsylvania, has been purchased by Mr. Yorke for the sum of $570,000.

Mr. David Scott, elected by the Whigs of Genesee County to represent them in the Assembly, has gone over to the Opposition.

THE BANKS OF THE UNION.—The number of Banks in the United States is about 700—with 130 branches, and an aggregate capital of $360,000,000.

LIBERAL DONATION.—Edmund Wallis, deceased, of Richmond, Va., left to the Female Orphan Asylum of that city, the sum of $15,000.

A BALLAD.

THE WORDS BY PARK BENJAMIN—COMPOSED BY HENRY COOD WATSON.

The musical score is written for voice and piano. It features a key signature of one sharp (F#) and a time signature of 6/8. The score is divided into six systems, each with a vocal line and a piano accompaniment. The lyrics are written below the vocal line.

She knows not I love her — she nev - er shall know, For the feel - ing so sub - tle and fine, That now lives in this heart, will van - ish like snow, When it falls in a beak - er of wine. She dreams of an - oth - er—her thoughts are a - way, Or they rest but a mo - ment on me; Like the beams of the moon that il - lu - mine the spray, But reach not the depths of the sea: Like the beams of the moon, That reach not the depths of the sea.

SUMMER MORNING.

BY THOMAS MILLER,

AUTHOR OF "A DAY IN THE WOODS," "RURAL SKETCHES," "SCENERY OF THE COUNTRY," "ROYSTON GOWER," "FAIR RICHMOND," ETC.

MORNING again breaks through the mines of Heaven,
And shakes her jewelled kirtle on the sky,
Heavy with rosy gold. Aside she driven
The vassal clouds, which bow as she draws nigh,
And catch her scattered gems of orient die,
The pearlèd ruby which her pathway strews;
Argent and amber, now thrown useless by:
The uncolored clouds wear what she doth refuse,
For only once does Morn her sun-dyed garments use.

No print of sheep-track yet hath crushed a flower;
The spider's web with silvery dew is hung
As it was beaded ere the daylight hour:
The hooked bramble just as it was strung,
When on each leaf the Night her crystals flung,
Then hurried off, the dawning to elude;
Before the golden-beaked blackbird sung,
Or ere the yellow-brooms, or gorses rude,
Had bared their armed heads in lowly gratitude.

From Nature's old cathedral sweetly ring
The wild-bird choir—burst of the woodland band,
Green-hooded aunts, who 'mid the blossoms sing;
Their leafy temple, gloomy, tall and grand,
Pillared with oaks, and roofed with Heaven's own hand.
Hark! how the anthem rolls through arches dun:—
"Morning again is come to light the land;
The great world's Comforter, the mighty Sun,
Has yoked his golden steeds, the glorious race to run."

The dusky foragers, the noisy rooks,
Have from their green high city-gates rushed out,
To rummage furrowy fields and flowery nooks;
On yonder branch now stands their glossy scout.
As yet no busy insects buzz about,
No fairy thunder o'er the air is rolled;
The drooping buds their crimson lips still pout;
Those stars of earth, the daisies white, unfold,
And soon the buttercups will give back "gold for gold."

"Hark! hark! the lark" sings 'mid the silvery blue;
Behold her flight, proud man! and lowly bow.
She seems the first that does forgive and sue,
As though the guilty stain which lurks below
Had touched the flowers that drooped above her brow,
When she all night slept by the daisies' side;
And now she soars where purity doth flow,
Where new-born light is with no sin allied,
And pointing with her wings Heaven-ward our thoughts would guide.

In belted gold the bees with "merry march"
Through flowery towns go sounding on their way:
They pass the streaked woodbine's sun-stained arch,
And onward glide through streets of sheeted May.
Nor till they reach the summer-roses stay,
Where maiden-buds are wrapt in dewy dreams,
Browsy through breathing back the new-mown hay,
That rolls its fragrance o'er the fringed streams,—
Mirrors in which the Sun now decks his quivering beams

Uprise the lambs, fresh from their flowery slumber,
(The daisies they pressed down rise from the sod;—)
He guardeth them who every star doth number,
Who called His Son a lamb,—the Lamb of God;
And for His sake withdrew th' uplifted rod,
Bidding each cloud turn to a silvery fleece,
The imaged flock for which our Shepherd trod
The paths of sorrow, that we might find peace:—
Those emblems of his love will wave till time shall cease.

On the far sky leans the old ruined mill,
Through its rent sails the broken sunbeams glow,
Gilding the trees that belt the lower hill,
And the old thorns which on its summit grow.
Only the reedy marsh that sleeps below,
With its dwarf bushes, is concealed from view;
And now a struggling thorn its head doth show,
Another half shakes off the smoky blue,
Just where the dusty gold streams through the heavy dew:

And there the hidden river lingering dreams,
You scarce can see the banks which round it lie;
That withered trunk, a tree, or shepherd seems,
Just as the light or fancy strikes the eye.
Even the very sheep, which graze hard by,
So blend their fleeces with the misty haze,
They look like clouds shook from the unsunned sky,
Ere morning o'er the eastern hills did blaze:—
The vision fades as they move further on to graze.

A chequered light streams in between the leaves,
Which on the greensward twinkle in the sun:
The deep-voiced thrush his speckled bosom heaves,
And like a silver stream his song doth run,
Down the low vale, edged with fir trees dun.
A little bird now hops beside the brook,
"Peeking" about like an affrighted nun;
And ever as she drinks doth upward look,
Titters and drinks again, then seeks her cloistered nook.

What varied colours o'er the landscape play!
The very clouds seem at their ease to lean,
And the whole earth to keep glad holiday.
The lowliest bush that by the waste is seen,
Hath changed its dusky for a golden green
In honor of this lovely Summer Morn:
The rutted roads did never seem so clean,
There is no dust upon the wayside thorn,
For every bud looks as if newly born.

A cottage girl trips by with side-long look,
Steadying the little basket on her head:
And where a plank bridges the narrow brook
She stops, to see her fair form shadowed;
The stream reflects her cloak of russet red;
Below she sees the trees and deep blue sky,
The flowers which downward look in that clear bed,
The very birds which o'er its brightness fly:—
She parts her loose blown hair, then wondering passes by.

Now other forms move o'er the footpaths brown
In twos and threes; for it is Market-day.
Beyond those hills stretches a little town,
And thitherward the rustics bend their way,
Crossing the scene in blue, and red, and grey;
Now by green hedge-rows, now by oak-trees old,
As they by stile or thatched cottage stray.
Peep through the rounded hand, and you'll behold
Such gems as Morland drew, in frames of sunny gold.

A laden ass, a maid with wicker maun,
A shepherd lad driving his lambs to sell,
Gaudy-dressed girls move in the rosy dawn,
Women whose cloaks become the landscape well,
Farmers whose thoughts on crops and prizes dwell;
An old man with his cow and calf draws near.
Anon you hear the Village Carrier's bell;
Then does his grey old tilted cart appear,
Moving so slow, you think he never will get there.

They come from still green nooks, woods old and hoary,
The silent work of many a summer night,
Ere those tall trees attained their giant glory,
Or their dark tops did tower that cloudy height:
They come from spots which the grey hawthorn's light,
Where stream-kissed willows make a silvery shiver.
For years their steps have worn those footpaths bright
Which wind along the fields and by the river,
That makes a murmuring sound, a "ribble-bibble" ever.

A troop of soldiers pass with stately pace,—
Their early music wakes the village street:
Through yon white blinds peeps many a lovely face,
Smiling—perchance unconsciously how sweet!
One does the carpet press with blue-veined feet,
Not thinking how her fair neck she exposes,
But with white foot timing the drum's deep beat;
And when again she on her pillow dozes,
Dreams how she'll dance that tune "morn' Summer's richest roses.

So let her dream, even as beauty should!
Let the white plumes athwart her slumbers sway!
Why should I steep their swaling snow in blood,
Or bid her think of battle's grim array?
Truth will too soon her blinding star display,
And like a fearful comet meet her eyes.
And yet how peaceful they pass on their way!
How grand the sight as up the hill they rise!—
I will not think of cities reddening in the skies.

How sweet those rural sounds float by the hill!
The grasshopper's shrill chirp rings o'er the ground,
The jingling sheep-bells are but seldom still,
The clapping gate closes with hollow bound,
There's music in the church-clock's measured sound.
The ring-dove's song, how breeze-like comes and goes,
Now here, now there, it seems to wander round:
The red cow's voice along the upland flows;
His bass the brindled bull from the far meadow lows.

"Cuckoo! cuckoo!" ah! well I know thy note,
Those summer-sounds the backward years do bring,
Like Memory's locked-up barge once more afloat:
They carry me away to life's glad spring,
To home, with all its old boughs rustling.
'Tis a sweet sound! but now I feel not glad;
I miss the voices which were wont to sing,
When on the hills I roamed, a happy lad.
"Cuckoo!" it is the grave—not these—that makes me sad.

Tell me, ye sages, whence these feelings rise,—
Sorrowful mornings on the darkened soul;
Glimpses of broken, bright, and stormy skies,
O'er which this earth—the heart—has no control?
Why does the sea of thought thus backward roll?
Memory's the breeze that through the cordage raves,
And ever drives us on some home-ward shoal,
As if she loved the melancholy waves
That, murmuring, shore-ward break, over a reef of graves.

Hark how the merry bells ring o'er the vale,
Now near, remote, or lost, just as it blows.
The red cock sends his voice upon the gale,
From the thatched grange his answering rival crows:
The milkmaid o'er the dew-bathed meadow goes,
Her tucked-up kirtle ever holding tight:
And now her song rings through the green hedge-rows,
Her milk-kit hoops glitter like silver bright:—
I hear her lover singing somewhere out of sight.

Where soars that spire, our rude forefathers prayed;
Thither they came, from many a thick-leaved dell
Year after year, and o'er those footpaths strayed,
When summoned by the sounding Sabbath-bell,—
For in those walls they deemed that God did dwell.
And still they sleep within that bell's deep sound.
Yon Spire doth here of no distinction tell:
O'er rich and poor, marble, and earthly mound,
The Monument of all,—it marks one common ground.

See yonder smoke, before it curls to Heaven
Mingles its blue among the elm-trees tall;
Shrinking like one who fears to be forgiven,
So on the earth a rain doth prostrate fall,
And 'mid the bending green each sin recall.
Now from their beds the cottage-children rise,
Roused by some early playmate's noisy bawl;
And on the door-step standing, rub their eyes,
Stretching their little arms, and gaping at the skies.

The leaves "drop, drop," and dot the crisped stream
So quick, each circle wears the first away;
Far out the tufted bulrush seems to dream,
And to the ripple nods its head away;
The water-flugs with one another play,
Bowling to every breeze that blows between,
While purple dragon-flies their wings display:
The restless swallow's arrowy flight is seen,
Dimpling the sunny wave, then lost amid the green.

The boy who last night passed that darksome lane,
Trembling at every sound, and pale with fear;
Who shook when the long leaves talked to the rain,
And tried to sing, his sinking heart to cheer;
Hears now no brook wail ghost-like on his ear,
No dead-man's groan in the black-beetle's wing:
But where the deep dyed butterflies appear,
And on the flowers like folded pea blooms swing,
With napless hat in hand he after them doth spring.

In the far sky the distant landscape melts,
Like piled clouds tinged with a darker hue;
Even the wood which yon high upland belts
Looks like a range of clouds, of deeper blue.
One withered tree bursts only on the view,—
A bald bare oak, which on the summit grows,
(And looks as if from out the sky it grew:)
That tree has borne a thousand wintry snows,
And seen unnumbered mornings gild its gnarled boughs.

You weather-beaten gray old finger post
Stands like Time's land-mark pointing to decay;
The very roads it once marked out are lost:
The common was encroached on every day
By grasping men who bore an unjust sway,
And rent the gift from Charity's dead hands.
The post does still one broken arm display,
Which now points out where the New Workhouse stands,
As if it said "Poor man! those walls are all thy lands."

Where o'er yon woodland-stream dark branches bow,
Patches of blue are let in from the sky,
Throwing a chequered underlight below,
Where the deep waters steeped in gloom roll by;
Looking like Hope, who ever watcheth night,
And throws her cheering ray o'er Life's long night,
When wearied man would fain lie down and die.
Past the broad meadow now it rolleth bright,
Which like a mantle green seems edged with silver light.

All things, save Man, this Summer morn rejoice:
Sweet smiles the sky, so fair a world to view;
Unto the earth below the flowers give voice;
Even the wayside-weed of homeliest hue
Looks up erect amid the golden blue,
And thus it speaketh to the thinking mind:—
"O'erlook me not! I for a purpose grew,
Though long mayest thou that purpose try to find,
On us one sunshine falls! God only is not blind!"

England, my country!—land that gave me birth!
Where those I love, living or dead, still dwell,

Most sacred spot—to me—of all the earth;
England! "with all thy faults I love thee well."
With what delight I hear thy Sabbath bell
Fling to the sky its ancient English sound,
As if to the wide world it dared to tell
We own a God, who guards this envied ground, Bulwarked with martyrs' bones—where Fear was never found.

Here might a sinner humbly kneel and pray,
With this bright sky, this lovely scene in view,
And worship Him who guardeth us alway!—
Who hung these lands with green, this sky with blue,
Who spake, and from these plains huge cities grew;
Who made thee, mighty England! what thou art,
And asked but gratitude for all His due.
The Giver, God! claims but the beggar's part,
And only doth require "a humble, contrite heart."

JANE SINCLAIR; OR THE FAWN OF SPRING-VALE.

BY WILLIAM CARLETON,
AUTHOR OF "FARDOROUGH THE MIST," "TRAITS AND STORIES OF THE IRISH PEASANTRY," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

JANE SINCLAIR was the third and youngest daughter of a dissenting clergyman, in one of the most interesting counties in the north of Ireland. Her father was remarkable for that cheerful simplicity of character which is so frequently joined to a high order of intellect, and an affectionate warmth of heart. To a well tempered zeal in the cause of faith and morals, he added a practical habit of charity, both in word and deed, such as endeared him to all classes, but especially to those whose humble condition in life gave them the strongest claim upon his virtues, both as a man and a pastor. Difficult, indeed, would it be to find a minister of the Gospel, whose practice and precept corresponded with such beautiful fitness, nor one who, in the midst of his own domestic circle, threw such calm lustre around him as a husband and a father. A temperate grave but sweet, wit playful and innocent, and tenderness that kept his spirit benignant to error without any compromise of duty, were the links which bound all hearts to him. Seldom have I known a Christian clergyman who exhibited in his own life so much of the unaffected character of apostolic holiness, nor one of whom it might be said with so much truth, that "he walked in all the commandments of the Lord blameless."

His family, which consisted of his wife, one son, and three daughters, had, as might be expected, imbibed a deep sense of that religion, the serene beauty of which shone so steadily along their father's path of life. Mrs. Sinclair had been well educated, and in her husband's conversation and society found further opportunity of improving, not only her intellect, but her heart. Though respectfully descended, she could not claim relationship with what may be emphatically termed the gentry of the country; but she could with that class so prevalent in the north of Ireland, which ranks in birth only one grade beneath them. I say in birth; for in all the decencies of life, in the unostentatious bounties of benevolence, in moral purity, domestic harmony, and a conscientious observance of religion, both in the comeliness of its forms, and the cheerful freedom of its spirit, this class ranks immeasurably above every other which Irish society presents. They who compose it are not sufficiently wealthy to relax those pursuits of honorable industry which constitute them, as a people, the ornament of our nation; nor does their good sense and decent pride permit them to follow the dictates of a mean ambition, by struggling to reach that false elevation, which is as much beneath them in all the virtues that grace life, as it is above them in the dazzling dissipation which renders the violation or neglect of its best duties a matter of fashionable etiquette, or the shameful privilege of high birth. To this respectable and independent class did the immediate relations of Mrs. Sinclair belong, and as might be expected, she failed not to bring all its virtues to her husband's heart and household—there to soothe him by their influence, to draw fresh energy from their mutual intercourse, and to shape the habits of their family into that perception of self-respect and decent propriety, which, in domestic duty, dress, and general conduct, uniformly results from a fine sense of moral feeling, blended with high religious principle.

This, indeed, is the class whose example has diffused that spirit of keen intelligence and enterprise throughout the north which makes the name of an Ulster manufacturer or merchant a synonyme for integrity and honor. From it is derived the creditable love of independence which operates upon the manners of the people and the physical soil of the country so obviously, that the natural appearance of the one may be considered as an appropriate exponent of the moral condition of the other. Aided by the genius of a practical and impressive creed, whose simple grandeur gives elevation and dignity to its followers;—this class it is which, by affording employment, counsel and example to the lower classes, brings peace and comfort to those who inhabit the white cottages and warm farmsteads of the north, and lights up its cultivated landscapes, its broad champaigns, and peaceful vales, into an aspect so smiling, that even the very soil seems to proclaim and partake of the happiness of its inhabitants. Indeed, few spots in the north could afford the spectator a better opportunity of verifying our observations as to the mild beauty of the country, than the residence of the amiable clergyman whose unhappy child's fate has furnished us with the affecting circumstances we are about to lay before the reader.

Spring-vale House, Mr. Sinclair's residence, was situated on an eminence that commanded a full view of the sloping valley from which it had its name. Along this vale, winding toward the house in a northern direction, ran a beautiful tributary stream, accompanied for near two miles in its progress by a small but well constructed road, which indeed had rather the character of a green lane than a public way, being but very little of a thoroughfare. Nothing could surpass this delightful vale in the soft and serene character of its scenery. Its sides partially wooded, and cultivated with surpassing taste, were not so precipitous as to render habitation in its bosom inconvenient. They sloped up gradually and gracefully on each side, presenting to the eye a number of snow-white residences, each standing upon the brow of some slight table or undulation, and surrounded by ground sufficiently spacious to allow of green lawns ornamented plantations and gardens, together with a due proportion of land for cultivation and pasture. From Mr. Sinclair's house the silver bends of this fine stream gave exquisite peeps to the spectator as they wound out of the wood which here and there clothed its banks, occasionally dipping into the water. On the left, attached to the glebe-house of the Protestant pastor of the parish, the eye rested upon a pond smooth as a mirror, except where an occasional swan, as it floated onward without any apparent effort, left here and there a slight quivering ripple behind it. Farther down, springing from between two clumps of trees, might be seen the span of a light and elegant arch, from under which the river gently wound away to the right; and beyond this, on the left, about a hundred yards from the bank, rose up the slender spire of the parish church, out of the bosom of the old beeches that overshadowed it, and threw a solemn gloom upon the peaceful graveyard at its side. About two hundred yards again to the right, in a little green shelving dell, beneath the house, stood Mr. Sinclair's modest white meeting-house, with a large ash tree hanging over each gable, and a row of poplars behind it. The valley at the opposite extremity opened upon a landscape bright and picturesque, dotted with those white residences which give that peculiar character of warmth and comfort for which the northern landscapes are so remarkable. Indeed, the eye could scarcely rest upon a richer expanse of country than lay stretched out before it, nor can we omit to notice the singularly unique and beautiful effect produced by the numerous bleach-grounds that shone at various degrees of distance, and contrasted so sweetly with the surface of a land deeply and delightfully verdant.

In the far distance rose the sharp outlines of a lofty mountain, whose green and sloping base melted into the "sun-silvered" expanse of the sea, on the smooth bosom of which the eye could snatch brilliant glimpses of the snow-white sails that sparkled at a distance as they fell under the beams of the noonday sun. The landscape was indeed beautiful in itself, but still rendered more so by the delicate aerial tints which lay on every object, and touched the whole into a mellower and more exquisite expression.

Such was the happy valley in which this peaceful family resided; each and all enjoying that tranquillity which sheds its calm contentment over the unassuming spirits of those who are ignorant of the crimes that flow from the selfishness and ambition of busy life. To them, the fresh breezes of morning, as they rustled through the living foliage, and stirred the modest flowers of their pleasant path, were fraught with an enjoyment which bound their hearts to every object around them, because to each of them these objects were the sources of habitual gratification. On them the dewy stillness of evening descended with tender serenity, as the valley shone in the radiance of the sinking sun; and by them was held that sweet and rapturous communion with nature, which, as it springs earliest in the affections, so does it linger about the heart when all the other loves and enmities are forgotten.

Every thing was beautiful in the history of unhappy Jane Sinclair's melancholy fate. The evening of the incident to which the fair girl's misery might eventually be traced was one of the most calm and balmy that could be witnessed even during the leafy month of June. With the exception of Mrs. Sinclair, the whole family had gone out to saunter leisurely by the river side; the father between his two eldest daughters, and Jane, then sixteen, sometimes chatting to her brother William, and sometimes fondling a white dove, which she had petted and trained with such success, that it was then amenable to almost every light injunction she laid upon it. It sat on her shoulder, which, indeed, was its usual seat, would peck her cheek, cower as if with a sense of happiness in her bosom, and put its bill to her lips, from which it was usually fed, either to demand some sweet reward for its obedience, or to express its attachment by a profusion of innocent caresses. The evening, as we said, was fine; not a cloud could be seen, except a pile of feathery masses that hung far up at the western gate of heaven; the stillness was profound; no breathing, even of the gentlest zephyr, could be felt; the river beside them, which was here pretty deep, seemed motionless; not a leaf on the trees stirred; the very aspens were still as if they had been marble; and the whole air was warm and fragrant. Although the sun wanted more than an hour of setting, yet from the bottom of the vale they could perceive the broad shafts of light which shot from his mild disk through the snowy clouds we have mentioned, like bars of lambent radiance, almost palpable to the touch. Yet, although this delightful silence was so profound, the heart could perceive, beneath its stillest depths, that voiceless harmony of progressing life, which, like the music of a dream, can reach the soul independently of the senses, and pour upon it a sublime sense of natural inspiration.

Something like this appears to have been felt by the group we have alluded to. Mr. Sinclair, after standing for a moment on the banks of the river, and raising his eyes to the solemn splendor of the declining sun, looked earnestly around him, and then out upon the glowing landscape that stretched beyond the valley, after which, with a spirit of high enthusiasm, he exclaimed, catching at the same time the fire and grandeur of the poet's noble conception—

"These are thy glorious works, Parent of good!
Almighty! thine this universal frame—
Thus wondrous fair—thyself how wondrous then—
To us invisible, or dimly seen—
In these thy lowest works."

There was something singularly impressive in the burst of piety which the hour and the place drew from the venerable pastor, as indeed there was in the whole group, as they listened in the attitude of deep attention to his words. Mr. Sinclair was a tall, fine looking old man, whose white flowing locks fell down on each side of his neck. His figure appeared to fine advantage, as, standing a little in front of his children, he pointed with his raised arm to the setting sun; behind him stood his two eldest girls, the countenance of one turned with an expression of awe and admiration toward the west; that of the other fixed with mingled reverence and attention on her father. William stood near Jane, and looked out thoughtfully toward the sea, while Jane herself, light and young and beautiful, stood with a flushed face, in the act of giving a pat of gentle rebuke to the snow-white dove on her bosom. At length they resumed their walk, and the conversation took a lighter turn. The girls left their father's side, and strolled in many directions through the meadow. Sometimes they pulled wild flowers, if marked by more than ordinary beauty, or gathered the wild mint and meadow-sweet to perfume their dairy, or culled the flowery woodbine to shed its delicate fragrance through their sleeping-rooms. In fact, all their habits and amusements were pastoral, and simple, and elegant. Jane accompanied them as they strolled about, but was principally engaged with her pet, which flew, in capricious but graceful circles over her head, and occasionally shot off into the air, sweeping in mimic flight behind a green knoll, or a clump of trees, completely out of her sight; after which it would again return, and folding its snowy pinions, drop affectionately upon her shoulder, or into her bosom. In this manner they proceeded for some time, when the dove again sped off across the river, the bank of which was wooded on the other side. Jane followed the little creature with a sparkling eye, and saw it wheeling to return, when immediately the report of a gun was heard from the trees directly beneath it, and the next moment it faltered in its flight, sank, and with feeble wing, struggled to reach the object of its affection. This, however, was beyond its strength. After sinking gradually toward the earth, it had power only to reach the middle of the river, into the deepest part of which it fell, and there lay fluttering upon the stream.

The report of the gun, and the fate of the pigeon, brought the personages of our little drama with hurrying steps to the edge of the river. One scream of surprise and distress proceeded from the lips of its fair young mistress, after which she wrung her hands, and wept and sobbed like one in absolute despair.

"Oh, dear William," she exclaimed, "can you not rescue it? Oh, save it—save it; if it sinks I shall never see it more. Oh, papa, who could be so heartless as to injure a creature so inoffensive!"

"I know not, my dear Jane; but cruel and heartless must the man be that could perpetrate a piece of such wanton mischief. I should rather think it some idle boy who knows not that it is tame."

"William, dear William, can you not save it?" she inquired again of her brother; "if it is doomed to die, let it die with me;" and the affectionate girl continued to weep bitterly.

"Indeed, my dear Jane, I never regretted my ignorance of swimming so much as I do this moment. The truth is, I cannot swim a stroke, otherwise I would save poor little Ariel for your sake."

"Do not take it so much to heart, my dear child," said her father; "grief, girl, ought not to be so violent for the death of a favorite bird."

"Oh, papa, who can look upon its struggles for life, and not feel deeply; remember it was mine, and think of its attachment to me."

There was, indeed, something very painful and affecting in the situation of the beautiful wounded dove. Even Mr. Sinclair himself, in perceiving its unavailing struggles, felt as much; nor were the other two girls unaffected any more than Jane herself. Their eyes became filled with tears, and Maria, the eldest, said, "It is better, Jane, to return home. Poor mute creature! the view of its sufferings is, indeed, very painful."

Just then a tall, slender youth, apparently about eighteen, came out from the trees on the other bank of the river, but on seeing Mr. Sinclair and his family, he paused and appeared to feel somewhat embarrassed. It was evident that he had seen the bird wounded, and followed the course of its flight, without suspecting that it was tame, or that there was any person near to claim it. The distress of the females, however, especially of its mistress, immediately satisfied him that it was theirs, and he was about to withdraw into the wood again, when the situation of poor Ariel caught his eye. He instantly took off his hat, flung it across the river, and plunging in, swam toward the dove, which was now nearly exhausted. A few strokes brought him to the spot, on reaching which, he caught the bird in one hand, held it above the water, and, with the other, swam down toward a slope in the bank a few yards below the spot where the party stood. Having gained the bank, he approached them, but was met half way by Jane, whose eyes, now sparkling through her tears, spoke her gratitude in language much more eloquent than any her tongue could utter.

The youth first examined the bird, with a view to ascertain where it had been wounded, and immediately placed it with much gentleness in the eager hands of its mistress. "It will not die, I should think, in consequence of the wound," he observed, "which, though pretty severe, has left the wing unbroken. The body, at all events, is safe. With care it may recover."

William then handed him his hat, and Mr. Sinclair having thanked him for an act of such humanity, insisted that he should go home with them, in order to procure a change of apparel. At first he declined this offer, but, after a little persuasion, he yielded with something of shyness and hesitation: accordingly, without loss of time, they all reached the house together.

Having been prevailed on to take a glass of cordial, he immediately withdrew to William's apartment, for the purpose of changing his dress. William, however, now observed that he got pale, and that in a few minutes afterward his teeth began to chatter, whilst he shivered excessively.

"You had better lose no time in putting these dry clothes on," said he; "I am rather inclined to think bathing does not agree with you, that is, if I am to judge by your present paleness and trembling."

"No," said the youth, "you are right; it is a pleasure which, for the last two years I have been forbidden. I feel very chilly, indeed, and you will excuse me for declining the use of your clothes. I must return home forthwith."

Young Sinclair, would not hear of this. After considerable pains he prevailed on him to change his dress, but no argument could induce him to stop for a moment longer than until this was effected.

The family, on his entering the drawing room to take his leave, were surprised at a determination so sudden and unexpected; but when Mr. Sinclair noticed his extreme paleness, he suspected that he had got ill, and that it might not be delicate to press him.

"Before you leave us," said the good clergyman, "will you not permit us to know the name of the young gentleman to whom my daughter is indebted for the rescue of her dove?"

"We are as yet but strangers in the neighborhood," replied the youth; "my father's name is Osborne. We have not been more than three days in Mr. Williams's residence, which, together with the whole of the property annexed to it, my father has purchased."

"I am aware, I am aware: then you will be a permanent neighbor of ours," said Mr. Sinclair; "and believe me, my dear boy, we shall always be happy to see you at Springvale; nor shall we soon forget the generous act which first brought us acquainted."

Whilst this short dialogue lasted, two or three shy side-long glances passed between him and Jane. So extremely modest was the young man that, from an apprehension lest these glances might have been noticed, his pale face became lit up with a faint blush, in which state of confusion he took his leave.

CHAPTER II.

Conversation was not resumed among the Sinclairs for some minutes after his departure, each, in fact, having been engaged in reflecting upon the surpassing beauty of his face, and the uncommon symmetry of his slender but elegant person. Their impression, indeed, was rather that of wonder than of mere admiration. His face shone with that rosy light of life's prime, which only glows on the human countenance during the brief period that intervenes between the years of the thoughtless boy and those of the confirmed man: and whilst his white brow beamed with intellect, it was easy to perceive that the fire of deep feeling and high-wrought enthusiasm broke out in timid flashes from his dark eye. His modesty, too, by tempering the full lustre of his beauty, gave to it a character of that graceful diffidence, which above all others makes the deepest impression upon a female heart.

"Well, I do think," said William Sinclair, "that young Osborne is decidedly the finest boy that I ever saw—and yet we have not seen him to advantage."

"I hope his health may not be injured by what has occurred," observed Agnes, the second daughter; "he appeared ill."

"That, Agnes, is more to the point," said Mr. Sinclair; "I fear the boy is by no means well; and I am apprehensive, from the deep carnation of his cheek, and his subsequent paleness, that he carries within him the seeds of early dissolution. He is too delicate, almost too ethereal for earth."

"If he becomes an angel," said William, smiling, "with a very slight change, he will put some of them out of countenance."

"William," said the father, "never, while you live, attempt to be witty at the expense of what is sacred or solemn."

"I beg your pardon, father—I was wrong—but I spoke heedlessly."

"I know you did, Billy; but in future avoid it. Well, Jane, how is your bird?"

"I think it is better, papa; but one can form no opinion so soon."

"Go, show it to your mamma—she is the best doctor among us—follow her advice, and no doubt she will add its cure to the other triumphs of her skill."

"Jane is fretting too much about it," observed Agnes; "why, Jane, you are just now as pale as young Osborne himself."

This observation turned the eyes of the family upon her; but scarcely had her sister uttered the words when the young creature's countenance became the color of crimson, so deeply, and with such evident confusion did she blush. Indeed she felt conscious of this, for she rose, with the wounded dove lying gently between her hands and bosom, and passed, without speaking, out of the room.

"Do not you think, papa," observed Miss Sinclair, "that there is a striking resemblance between young Osborne and Jane? I could not help remarking it."

"There decidedly is, Maria, now that you mention it," said William.

The father paused a little, as if to consider the matter, and then added with a smile—

"It is very singular, Mary; but indeed I think there is—both in the style of their features and their figure."

"Osborne is too handsome for a man," observed Agnes; "yet, after all, one can hardly say so, his face, though fine, is not feminine."

"Beauty, my children!—alas, what is it? Often—too often, a fearful, a fatal gift. It is born with us, and not of our own merit; yet we are vain enough to be proud of it. It is, at best, a flower that soon fades—a light that soon passes away. Oh! what is it when contrasted with those high principles whose beauty is immortal, which brighten by age, and know neither change nor decay. There is Jane—my poor child—she is indeed very beautiful and graceful, yet I often fear that her beauty, joined as it is to an overwrought sensibility, may, before her life closes, occasion much sorrow either to herself or others."

"She is all affection," said William.

"She is all love, all tenderness, all goodness; and may the grace of her Almighty Father keep her from the wail and woe which too often accompany the path of beauty in this life of vicissitude and trial."

A tear of affection for his beautiful child stood in the old man's eyes as he raised them to Heaven, and the loving hearts of his family burned with tenderness toward this their youngest and best beloved sister.

The sun had now gone down, and, after a short pause, the old man desired William to summon the other members of the household to prayers. The evening worship being concluded, the youngsters walked in the lawn before the door until darkness began to set in, after which they retired to their respective apartments for the night.

Sweet and light be your slumbers, O ye that are peaceful and good—sweet be your slumbers on this night so calm and beautiful; for, alas! there is one among you into whose innocent bosom has stolen that destroying spirit which will yet pale her fair cheek, and wring many a bitter tear from the eyes that love to look upon her. Her early sorrows have commenced this night, and for what mysterious purpose who can divine?—but, alas, alas, her fate is sealed—the fawn of Springvale is stricken, and even now carries in her young heart a wound that will never close.

Osborne's father, who had succeeded to an estate of one thousand per annum, was the eldest son of a gentleman whose habits were badly calculated to improve the remnant of property which ancestral extravagance had left him.

Ere many years the fragment which came into his possession dwindled into a fraction of its former value, and he found himself with a wife and four children—two sons and two daughters—struggling on a pittance of two hundred a year. This, to a man possessing the feelings and education of a gentleman, amounted to something like retributive justice upon his prodigality. His conflict with poverty, however, (for to him it might be termed such,) was fortunately not of long duration. A younger brother who, finding he must fight his own battle in life, had embraced the profession of medicine, very seasonably died, and Osborne's father succeeded to a sum of twelve thousand pounds in the funds, and an income in landed property of seven hundred per annum. He now felt himself more independent than he had ever been, and with this advantage, that his bitter experience of a heartless world had completely cured him of all tendency to extravagance. And now he would have enjoyed as much happiness as is the usual lot of man, were it not that the shadow of death fell upon his house, and cast its cold blight upon his children. Ere three years had elapsed he saw his eldest daughter fade out of life, and in less than two more his eldest son was laid beside her in the same grave. Decline, the poetry of death, in its deadly beauty came upon them, and whilst it sung its song of life and hope to their hearts, treacherously withdrew them to darkness and the worm.

Osborne's feelings were those of thoughtlessness and extravagance; but he had never been either a libertine or a profligate, although the world forbore not when it found him humbled in his poverty, to bring such charges against him. In truth, he was full of kindness, and no parent ever loved his children with deeper or more devoted affection. The death of his noble son and beautiful girl brought down his spirit to the most mournful depths of affliction. Still he had two left, and, as it happened, the most beautiful, who more than equally possessed his affections. To them was gradually transferred that melancholy love which the heart of the sorrowing father had carried into the grave of the departed; and alas! it appeared as if he had come back to those who had lived loaded with the malady of the dead. The health of the surviving boy became delicate, and, by the advice of his physician, who pronounced the air in which they lived unfavorable, Osborne, on hearing that Mr. Williams, a distant relation, was about to dispose of his house and grounds, immediately became the purchaser. The situation, which had a southern aspect, was dry and healthy, the air pure and genial, and, according to the best medical opinions, highly beneficial to persons of a consumptive habit.

For two years before this—that is, since his brother's death—the health of young Osborne had been watched with all the tender vigilance of affection. A regimen in diet, study, and exercise, had been prescribed for him by his physician, the regulations of which he was by no means to transgress. In fact, his parents lived under a sleepless dread of losing him, which kept their hearts expanded with that inexpressible and burning love, which none but a parent so circumstanced can ever feel.

But, independently of his extraordinary personal advantages, all his dispositions were so gentle and affectionate, that it was not in human nature to entertain a harsh feeling toward him. Although modest and shrinking, he possessed a mind full of intellect and enthusiasm: his imagination, too, overflowed with creative power, and sought the dreamy solitudes of noon, that it might, far from the bustle of life, shadow forth those images of beauty which come thickly only upon those whose hearts are most susceptible of its forms. Many a time has he sat alone upon the brow of a rock or hill, watching the clouds of heaven, or gazing on the setting sun, or communing with the thousand aspects of nature in a thousand moods, his young spirit relaxed into that elysian reverie which, beyond all other kinds of intellectual enjoyment, is the most seductive to a youth of poetic temperament.

There were, indeed, in Osborne's case, too many of those light and scarcely perceptible tokens which might be traced, if not to a habit of decline, at least to a more than ordinary delicacy of constitution. The boy was consequently enjoined to avoid all violent exercise, to keep out of currents, while heated to drink nothing cold, and above all things never to indulge in the amusement of cold bathing.

Such were the circumstances under which Osborne first appeared to the reader, who may now understand the extent of his alarm on feeling himself so suddenly and seriously affected by his generosity in rescuing the wounded dove. His mere illness on this occasion was a matter of much less anxiety to himself than the alarm which he knew it would occasion his parents and his sister. On his reaching home he mentioned the incident which occurred, admitted that he had been rather warm on going into the water, and immediately went to bed. Medical aid was forthwith procured, and although the physician assured them that there appeared nothing serious in his immediate state, yet was his father's house a house of wail and sorrow.

The next day the Sinclairs, having heard in reply to their inquiries through the servant who had been sent home with his apparel, that he was ill, the worthy clergyman lost no time in paying his parents a visit on the occasion. In this he expressed his regret, and that also of his whole family, that any circumstance relating to them should be the means, even accidentally, of affecting the young gentleman's health. It was not, however, until he dwelt upon the occurrence in terms of approbation, and placed the boy's conduct in a generous light, that he was enabled to appreciate the depth and tenderness of their affection for him. The mother's tears flowed in silence on hearing this fresh proof of his amiable spirit, and the father, with a foreboding heart, related to Mr. Sinclair the substance of that which we have detailed to the reader, connected with the health of himself and his family.

Such was the incident which brought these two families acquainted, and ultimately ripened their intimacy into friendship.

Much sympathy was felt for young Osborne by the other members of Mr. Sinclair's household, especially as his modest and unobtrusive deportment, joined to his extraordinary beauty, had made so singularly favorable an impression upon them. Nor was the history of that insidious malady, which had already been so fatal to his sister and brother, calculated to lessen the interest which his first appearance had excited. There was one young heart among them which sank, as if the weight of death had come over it, on hearing this melancholy account of him whose image was now for ever the star of her fate, whether for happiness or sorrow. From the moment their eyes had met in those few shrinking but flashing glances by which the spirit of love conveys its own secret, she felt the first painful transports of the new affection, and retired to solitude with the arrow that struck her so deeply yet quivering in her bosom.

The case of our fair girl differed widely from that of many young persons, in whose heart the passion of love larks unknown for a time, throwing its soft shadows of delight and melancholy over their peace, whilst they themselves feel unable in the beginning to develop those strange sensations which take away from their pillows the unbroken slumber of early life.

Jane, from the moment her eyes rested on Osborne, felt and was conscious of feeling the influence of a youth so transcendently fascinating. Her love broke not forth gradually like the trembling light that brightens into the purple flush of morning, neither was it fated to sink calm and untroubled like the crimson tints that die only when the veil of night wraps them in its shadow. Alas, no! it sprang from her heart in all the neontide strength of maturity—a full-grown passion, incapable of self-restraint, and conscious only of the wild and novel delight arising from its own indulgence. She could not despair, she could scarcely doubt; for on thinking of the blushing glances so rapidly stolen at herself, and of the dark brilliant eye from whence they came, she knew that the soul of him she loved spoke to her in a language that was mutually understood.

To others, at the present stage of her affection, she appeared more silent than usual, and evidently fond of solitude, a trait which they had not observed in her before. But these were slight symptoms of what she felt; for, alas, the day was soon to come that was to overshadow their hearts for ever—when never, never more were they and she, in the light of their own innocence, to sing like the morning stars together, or to lay their untroubled heads in the slumbers of the happy.

CHAPTER III.

More than a month had now elapsed since the first appearance of Osborne as one of the dramatis personæ of our narrative. A slight fever, attended with less effect upon the lungs than his parents anticipated, had passed off, and he was once more able to go abroad and take exercise in the open air. The two families were now in the habit of visiting each other almost daily; and what tended more and more to draw closer the bonds of good feeling between them, was the fact of the Osbornes being members of the same creed, and attendants at Mr. Sinclair's place of worship. Jane, while Charles Osborne was yet ill, had felt a childish diminution of affection for her convalescent dove, while at the same time something whispered to her that it possessed a stronger interest in her heart than it had ever done before. This may seem a paradox to such of our readers as have never been in love; but it is not at all irreconcilable to the analogous and often conflicting states of feeling produced by that strange and mysterious passion. The innocent girl was wont, as frequently as she could without exciting notice, to steal away to the garden, or the fields, or the river side, accompanied by her mute companion, to which with pouting carresses she would address a series of rebukes for having been the means of occasioning the illness of him she loved.

"Alas, Ariel, little do you know, sweet bird, what anxiety you have caused your mistress—if he dies I shall never love you more! Yes, coo, and flatter—but I do not care for you; no, that kiss won't satisfy me until he is recovered—then I shall be friends with you, and you shall be my own Ariel again."

She would then pat it petulantly; and the beautiful creature would sink its head, and slightly expand its wings, as if conscious that there was a change of mood in her affection.

But again the innocent remorse of her girlish heart would flow forth in terms of tenderness and endearment; again would she pat and cherish it; and with the artless caprice of childhood exclaim—

"No, my own Ariel, the fault was not yours; come, I shall love you—and I will not be angry again; even if you were not good I would love you for his sake. You are now dearer to me a thousand times than you ever were; but alas! Ariel, I am sick, I am sick, and no longer happy. Where is my lightness of heart, and where, oh where is the joy I used to feel?"

Even this admission, which in the midst of solitude could reach no other human ear, would startle the bashful creature into alarm; and while her cheek became alternately pale and crimson at such an avowal thus uttered aloud, she would wipe away the tears that arose to her eyes whenever the depths of her affection were stirred by these pensive broodings which gave its sweetest charm to youthful love.

In thus seeking solitude, it is not to be imagined that our young heroine was drawn thither by a love of contemplating nature in those fresher aspects which present themselves in the stillness of her remote recesses. She sought not for their own sakes the shades of the grove, the murmuring cascade, nor the voice of the hidden rivulet that occasionally stole out from its leafy cover, and ran in music toward the ampler stream of the valley. No, no; over her heart and eye the spirit of their beauty passed idly and unfelt. All of external life that she had been wont to love and admire gave her pleasure no more. The natural arbors of woodbine, the fairy dells, and the wild flowers that peeped in unknown sweetness about the hedges, the fairy-firs, the blue-bells, the cowslips, with many others of her fragrant and graceful favorites, all, all charmed her, alas, no more. Nor at home, where every voice was tenderness, and every word affection, did there exist in her stricken heart that buoyant sense of enjoyment which had made her youth like the music of a brook, where every thing that broke the smoothness of its current only turned it into melody. The morning and evening prayer—the hymn of her sisters' voices—their simple spirit of tranquil devotion—and the touching solemnity of her father, worshipping God upon the altar of his own heart—all, all this, alas—alas, charmed her no more. Oh, no—no; many motives conspired to send her into solitude, that she might in the sanctity of unproving nature cherish her affection for the youth whose image was ever, ever before her. At home such was the timid delicacy of her love, that she felt as if its indulgence even in the stillest depths of her own heart, was disturbed by the conversation of her kindred, and the familiar habits of domestic life. Her father's, her brother's, and her sister's voices, produced in her a feeling of latent shame, which, when she supposed for a moment that they could guess her attachment, filled her with anxiety and confusion. She experienced, beside, a sense of uneasiness on reflecting that she practised, for the first time in their presence, a dissimulation so much at variance with the opinion she knew they entertained of her habitual candor. It was, in fact, the first secret she had ever concealed from them; and now the suppression of it in her own bosom, made her feel as if she had withdrawn that confidence which was due to the love they bore her. This was what kept her so much in her own room, or sent her abroad to avoid all that had a tendency to repress the indulgence of an attachment that had left in her heart a capacity for no other enjoyment. But in solitude she was far from everything that could disturb those dreams in which the tranquillity of nature never failed to entrance her. There it was where the mysterious spirit that raises the soul above the impulses of animal life, mingled with her being, and poured upon her affection the elemental purity of that original love which in the beginning preceded human guilt.

It is indeed far from the contamination of society—in the stillness of solitude when the sentiment of love comes abroad before its passion, that the heart can be said to idealize the object of its devotion, and to forget that its indulgence can ever be associated with error. This is, truly, the angelic love of youth and innocence; and such was the nature of that which the beautiful girl felt.

The evening on which Jane and Charles Osborne met for the first time, unaccompanied by their friends, was one of those to which the power of neither pen nor pencil can do justice. The sun was slowly sinking among a pile of those soft crimson clouds, behind which fancy is so apt to picture to itself the regions of calm delight that are inhabited by the happy spirits of the blest; the sycamore and hawthorn were yet musical with the hum of bees, busy in securing their evening burthen for the hive. Myriads of winged insects were sporting in the sunbeams; the melancholy plaint of the ring-dove came out sweetly from the trees, mingled with the songs of other birds, and the still sweeter voice of some happy groups of children at play in the distance. The light of the hour, in its subdued but golden tone, fell with singular clearness upon all nature, giving to it that tranquil beauty which makes every thing the eye rests upon glide with quiet rapture into the heart. The moth butterflies were fluttering over the meadows, and from the low stretches of softer green rose the thickly-growing grass-stalks, having their slender ears bent with the mellow burthen of wild honey—that ambrosial feast for the lips of innocence and childhood. It was, indeed, an evening when love would bring forth its sweetest memories, and dream itself into those ecstasies of tenderness that flow from the mingled sensations of sadness and delight.

It would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to see on this earth a young creature, whose youth and beauty, and slender grace of person gave her more the appearance of some visionary spirit, too exquisitely ideal for human life. Yet was there still apparent in her, something that preserved, with singular power, the delightful reality that she was of humanity, and subject to all those softer influences that breathe their music so sweetly over the chords of the human heart. The delicate bloom of her cheek, shaded away as it was, until it melted into the light that sparkled from her complexion—the snowy forehead, the flashing eye, in which sat the very soul of love—the lips, blushing of sweets—her whole person breathing the warmth of youth and feeling, and so characteristic in the easiness of its motions of that graceful flexibility that has never been known to exist separated from the power of receiving varied and profound emotions—all this told the spectator, too truly, that the lovely being before him was not of another sphere, but one of the most delightful that ever appeared in this.

But hush!—here is a strain of music! Oh! who is it breathes forth that gush of touching melody which flows in such linked sweetness from the flute of an unseen performer? How soft, how gentle, but oh, how very mournful are the notes! Surely, they would seem to come from one whose heart has been brought low by the ruined hopes of an unrequited passion. But, fair girl, why this sympathy in one so young? Why is thy bright eye dewy with tears for the imaginary sorrows of another? And again—but hush!—why that flash of delight and terror?—that sudden suffusion of red over thy face and neck—and, even now, that paleness like death! Thy heart, thy heart!—why does it throb, and why do thy knees totter? Alas! it is even so; he, the Endymion of thy dreams, as beautiful as even thou thyself in thy purple dawn of womanhood—he from whom thou now shrinkest, yet whom thou darest not to meet, is approaching, and bears in his very beauty the charm that will darken thy destiny.

The appearance of Osborne, unaccompanied, taught this young creature to know the full extent of his influence over her. Delight, terror, and utter confusion of thought and feeling, seized upon her the moment he became visible. She wished herself at home, but had no power to go; she blushed, she trembled, and, in the tumult of the moment, lost all presence of mind and self-possession. He had come from behind a hedge, on the path-way along which she walked, and was consequently approaching her, so that it was evident they must meet. On seeing her he ceased to play, paused a moment, and, were it not that it might appear cold, and rather remarkable, he, too, would have retraced his steps homeward. In truth, both felt equally confused and equally agitated; for, although such an interview had been, some time previously, the dearest wish of their hearts, yet would they both almost have felt relieved, had they had an opportunity of their escaping it. Their first words were uttered in a low, hesitating voice, amid pauses occasioned by the necessity of collecting their scattered thoughts, and with countenances deeply blushing from a consciousness of what they felt. Osborne turned back, mechanically, and accompanied her in a walk. After this there was a silence for some time, for neither had courage to renew the conversation—At length Osborne, in a faltering voice, addressed her.

"Your dove," said he, "is quite recovered, I hope?"

"Oh, yes," she replied, "it is perfectly well again."

"It is an exceedingly beautiful bird, and remarkably docile."

"I have had little difficulty in training it," she returned, and then added very timidly, "it is also very affectionate." The youth's eyes sparkled, as if he were about to indulge in some observation suggested by her reply, but, fearing to give it expression, he paused again: in a few minutes, however he added—

"I think there is nothing that gives one so perfect an idea of purity and innocence as a snow-white dove, unless I except a young and beautiful girl, such as—"

He glanced at her as he spoke, and their eyes met, but in less than a moment they were withdrawn and placed upon the earth.

"And of meekness and holiness too," she observed after a little.

"True; but perhaps I ought to make another exception," he added, alluding to the term by which she herself was then generally known. As he spoke, his voice expressed considerable hesitation.

"Another exception," she answered inquiringly; "it would be difficult, I think, to find any other emblem of innocence so appropriate as a dove."

"Is not a Faun still more so?" he replied; "it is so gentle and meek, and its motions are so full of grace, and timidity and beauty. Indeed I do not wonder, when an individual of your sex resembles it in the qualities I have mentioned, that the name is sometimes applied to her."

The tell-tale cheek of the girl blushed a recognition of the compliment implied in the words, and, after a short silence, she said, in a tone that was any thing but indifferent, and with a view of changing the conversation—

"I hope you are quite recovered from your illness?"

"With the exception of a very slight cough, I am," he replied.

"I think," she observed, "that you look somewhat paler than you did."

"That paleness does not proceed from indisposition, but from a far different"—he paused again, and looked evidently abashed. In the course of a minute, however, he added, "yes, I know I am pale, not because I am unwell, for my health is nearly if not altogether restored, but because I am unhappy."

"Strange," said Jane, "to see one unhappy at your years."

"I think I know my own character and disposition well," he replied; "my temperament is naturally a melancholy one; the frame of my mind is like my body, very delicate, and capable of being affected by a thousand slight influences which pass over hearts of a stronger mould, without ever being felt. Life to me, I know, will be productive of much pain, and much enjoyment, while its tenure lasts, but that, indeed, will not be long. My sands are measured, for I feel a presentiment, a mournful and prophetic impression, that I am doomed to go down into an early grave."

The tone of passionate enthusiasm which pervaded these words, uttered as they were in a voice wherein pathos and melody were equally blended, appeared to be almost too much for a creature whose sympathy in all his moods and feelings was then so deep and congenial. She felt some difficulty in repressing her tears, and said, in voice which no effort could keep firm—

"You ought not to indulge in those gloomy forebodings; you should struggle against them, otherwise they will distress your mind, and injure your health."

"Oh, you do not know," he proceeded, his eyes sparkling with that light which is so often the beacon of death—"you do not know the fatal fascination by which a mind, set to the sorrows of a melancholy temperament, is charmed out of its strength. But no matter how dark may be my dreams—there is one light for ever, ever before me—one figure of grace and beauty—oh, how could I deny myself the contemplation of a vision that pours into my soul a portion of itself, and effaces every other object but an entrancing sense of its own presence. I cannot, I cannot—it bears me away into a happiness, that is full of sadness—where I indulge alone, without knowing why, in 'my feast of tears'—happy! happy! so I think, and so I feel; yet why is my heart sunk, and why are all my visions filled with death and the grave?"

"Oh, do not talk so frequently of death," replied the beautiful girl, "surely you need not fear it for a long while. This morbid tone of mind will pass away when you grow into better health and strength."

"Is not this hour calm?" said he, flashing his dark eyes full upon her; "see how beautiful the sun sinks in the west!—alas! so I should wish to die—as calm, and the meral lustre of my life as radiant."

"And so you shall," said Jane, in a voice full of that delightful spirit of consolation which, proceeding from such lips, breathes the most affecting power of sympathy, "so you shall, but like him, not until after the close of a long and well-spent life."

"That—that," said he, "was only a passing thought. Yes, the hour is calm, but even in such stillness, do you not observe that the aspen there to our left, this moment quivers to the breezes which we cannot feel, and by which not a leaf of any other tree about us is stirred—such I know myself to be, an aspen among men, stirred into joy or sorrow, whilst the hearts of others are at rest. Oh, how can my foretaste of life be either bright or cheerful, for when I am capable of being moved by the very breathings of passion, what must I not feel in the blast, and in the storm—even now, even now!"—The boy, here overcome by the force of his own melancholy enthusiasm, paused abruptly, and Jane, after several attempts to speak, at last said, in a voice scarcely audible—

"Is not hope always better than despair?"

Osborne instantly fixed his eyes upon her, and saw, that although hers were bent upon the earth, her face had become overspread with a deep blush. While he looked she raised them, but after a single glance, at once quick and timid, she withdrew them again, a still deeper blush mantling upon her cheek. He now felt a sudden thrill of rapture fall upon his heart, and rush almost like a suffocating sensation to his throat; his being became for a moment raised to an ecstasy too intense for the power of description to portray, and, were it not for the fear which ever accompanies the disclosure of first and youthful love, the tears of exulting delight would have streamed down his cheeks.

Both had reached a little fairy dell of vivid green concealed by trees on every side, and in the middle of which rose a large Yew, around whose trunk had been built a seat of natural turf, whereon those who strolled about the grounds might rest, when heated or fatigued by exercise or the sun. Here the girl sat down.

A change had now come over both. The gloom of the boy's temperament was gone, and his spirit caught its mood from that of his companion. Each at the moment breathed the low, anxious, and tender timidity of love, in its purest character. The souls of both vibrated to each other, and felt depressed with that sweetest emotion which derives all its power from the consciousness that its participation is mutual. Osborne spoke low, and his voice trembled; the girl was silent but her bosom panted, and her frame shook from head to foot. At length Osborne spoke.

"I sometimes sit here alone, and amuse myself with my flute: but of late—of late—I can bear no music that is not melancholy."

"I, too, prefer mournful—mournful music," replied Jane. "That was a touching air you played just now."

Osborne put the flute to his lips, and commenced playing over again the air she had praised; but, on glancing at the fair girl, he perceived her eyes fixed upon him with a look of such deep and devoted passion as utterly overcame him. Her eyes, as before, were immediately withdrawn, but there dwelt again upon her burning cheek such a consciousness of her love as could not, for a moment, be mistaken. In fact she betrayed all the confused symptoms of one who felt that the state of her heart had been discovered. Osborne, ceased playing; for such was his agitation that he scarcely knew what he thought or did.

"I cannot go on," said he, in a voice which equally betrayed the state of his heart; "I cannot play;" and at the same time he seated himself beside her.

Jane rose as he spoke, and in a broken voice full of an expression like distress, said hastily—

"It is time I should go;—I am—I am too long out."

Osborne caught her hand, and in words that burned with the deep and melting contagion of his passion, said simply:

"Do not go;—oh do not yet go!"

She looked full upon him, and perceived that as he spoke his face became deadly pale, as if her words were to seal his happiness or misery.

"Oh do not leave me now," he pleaded; "do not go, and my life may yet be happy."

"I must," she replied, with great difficulty; "I cannot stay: I do not wish you to be unhappy; and whilst saying this, the tears that ran in silence down her cheeks proved too clearly how dear his happiness must ever be to her."

Osborne's arm glided round her waist, and she resumed her seat,—or rather tottered into it.

"You are in tears," he exclaimed. "Oh could it be true! Is it not, my beloved girl? It is—it is—love! Oh surely, surely it must—it must!"

She sobbed aloud once or twice: and, as he kissed her unresisting lips, he tenderly and passionately asked, "oh, my best beloved and dearest, say is it love?" She murmured out, "It is; it is; I love you."

Oh life! how dark and unfathomable are thy mysteries! And why is it that thou permittest the course of true love, like this, so seldom to run smooth, when so many who, uniting through the impulses of sordid passion, sink into a state of obtuse indifference, over which the lights and shadows that touch thee into thy finest perceptions of enjoyment pass in vain.

It is a singular fact, but no less true than singular, that since the world began there never was known any instance of an anxiety, on the part of youthful lovers, to prolong to an immoderate extent, the scene in which the first mutual avowal of their passion takes place. The excitement is too profound, and the waste of those delicate spirits, which are expended in such interviews, is much too great to permit the soul to bear such an excess of happiness long. Independently of this, there is associated with it an ultimate enjoyment, for which the lovers immediately fly to solitude; there, in the certainty of waking bliss, to think over and over again of all that has occurred between them, and to luxuriate in the conviction, that at length the heart has not another wish, but sinks into the solitary charm which expands it with such a sense of rapturous and exulting delight.

The interview between our lovers was, consequently, not long. The secret of their hearts being known, each felt anxious to retire, and to look with a miser's ecstasy upon the delicious hoard which the scene we have just described had created. Jane did not reach home until the evening devotions of the family were over, and this was the first time she had ever, to their knowledge, been absent from them before. Borne away by the force of what had just occurred, she was proceeding up to her own room, after reaching home, when Mr. Sinclair, who had remarked her absence, desired that she should be called into the drawing-room.

"It is the first neglect," he observed, "of a necessary duty, and it would be wrong in me to let it pass without at least pointing it out to the dear child as an error, and knowing from her own lips why it has happened."

Terror and alarm, like what might be supposed to arise from the detection of secret guilt, seized upon the young creature so violently, that she had hardly strength to enter the drawing-room without support: her face became the image of death, and her whole frame tottered and trembled visibly.

"Jane, my dear, why were you absent from prayers this evening?" inquired her father, with his usual mildness of manner.

This question, to one who had never yet been, in the slightest instance, guilty of falsehood, was indeed a terrible one; and especially to a girl so extremely timid as was this his best beloved daughter.

"Papa," she at last replied, "I was out walking;" but as she spoke, there was that in her voice and manner which betrayed an insincere reply.

"I know, my dear, you were; but although you have frequently been out walking, yet I do not remember that you ever stayed away from our evening worship before. Why is this?"

Her father's question was repeated in vain. She hung her head and returned no answer. She tried to speak, but from her parched lips not a word could proceed. She felt as if all the family that moment were conscious of the occurrence between her and her lover; and if the wish could have relieved her, she would almost have wished to die, so much did she shrink abashed in their presence.

"Tell me, my daughter," proceeded her father, more seriously, "has your absence been occasioned by anything that you are ashamed or afraid to mention? From me, Jane, you ought to have no secrets: you are yet too young to think away from your father's heart and from your mother's also; speak candidly, my child—speak candidly—I expect it."

As he uttered the last words, the head of their beautiful beautiful flower sank upon her bosom, and in a moment she lay insensible upon the sofa on which she had been sitting.

This was a shock for which neither the father nor the family were prepared. William flew to her—all of them crowded about her, and scarcely had he raised that face so pale, but now so mournfully beautiful in its insensibility, when her mother and sisters burst into tears and wailings, for they feared at the moment that their beloved one must have been previously seized with sudden illness, and was then either taken, or about to be taken from their eyes for ever. By the coolness of her father, however, they were directed how to restore her, in which, after a lapse of not less than ten minutes, they succeeded.

When she recovered, her mother folded her in her arms, and her sisters embraced her with tenderness and tears. Her father then gently caught her hand in his, and said with much affection:

"Jane, my child, you are ill. Why not have told us so?" The beautiful girl knelt before him for a moment, but again rose up, and hiding her head in his bosom, exclaimed, weeping—

"Papa, bless me, oh, bless me, and forgive me."

"I do; I do," said the old man; and as he spoke, a few large tears trickled down his cheeks, and fell upon her golden locks.

CHAPTER IV.

It is a singular fact, but one which we know to be true, that not only the affection of parents, but that of brothers and sisters, goes down with greater tenderness to the youngest of the family, all other circumstances being equal. This is so universally felt and known, that it requires no further illustration from us. At home, Jane Sinclair was loved more devotedly in consequence of being the most innocent and beautiful of her father's children; in addition to this, however, she was cherished with that peculiar sensibility of attachment by which the human heart is always swayed toward its youngest and its last.

On witnessing her father's tenderness, she concealed her face in his bosom, and wept for some time in silence, and by a gentle pressure of her delicate arms, as they encircled his neck, intimated her sense of his affectionate indulgence toward her; and perhaps could it have been understood, a tacit acknowledgment of her own unworthiness on that occasion to receive it.

At length, she said, after an effort to suppress her tears, "Papa, I will go to bed."

"Do, my love; and, Jane, forget not to address the Throne of God before you sleep."

"I did not intend to neglect it, papa. Mamma, come with me." She then kissed her sisters and bade good night to William; after which she withdrew, accompanied by her mother, whilst the eyes of those who remained were fixed upon her with love, and pride, and admiration.

"Mamma," said she, when they reached the apartment, "allow me to sleep alone to-night."

"Jane, your mind appears to be depressed, darling," replied her mother. "Has any thing disturbed you, or are you really ill?"

"I am quite well, mamma, and not at all depressed; but do allow me to sleep in the closet bed."

"No, my dear, Agnes will sleep there, and you can sleep in your own as usual; the poor girl will wonder why you leave her, Jane; she will feel so lonely, too."

"But, mamma, it would gratify me very much, at least for this night. I never wished to sleep away from Agnes before; and I am certain she will excuse me when she knows I prefer it."

"Well, my love, of course I can have no objection; I only fear you are not so well as you imagine yourself. At all events, Jane, remember your father's advice to pray to God; and remember this, besides, that from me at least, you ought to have no secrets. Good night, dear, and may the Lord take care of you."

She then kissed her with an emotion of sorrow for which she could scarcely account, and passed down to the room wherein the other members of the family were assembled.

"I know not what is wrong with her," she observed, in reply to their inquiries; "she declares she is perfectly well, and that her mind is not at all depressed."

"In that I agree with her," said William; "her eye occasionally sparkled with something that resembled joy more than depression."

"She begged of me to let her sleep alone to-night," continued the mother, "so that you, Agnes, must lie in the closet bed."

"She must, certainly, be unwell, then," replied Agnes, "or she would hardly leave me. Indeed, I know that her spirits have not been so good of late as usual. For some weeks past she has been quite changed, and seldom spoke at all after going to bed. Neither did she sleep so well lately as she used to do."

"She is, indeed, a delicate flower," observed her father, "and a very slight blast, poor thing, will make her droop—droop perhaps into an early grave!"

"Do not speak so gloomily, my dear Henry," said her mother. "What is there in her particular case to justify any such apprehension?"

"Her health has been always good, too," observed Maria; "but the fact is, we love her so affectionately that many things disturb us about her which we would never feel if we loved her less."

"Mary," said her father, "you have in a few words expressed the true state of our feelings with respect to the dear child. We shall find her, I trust, in good health and spirits in the morning; and please the Divine Will, all will again be well—but what's the matter with you, Agnes?"

Mr. Sinclair had, a moment before, observed that an expression of thought, blended with sorrow, overshadowed the face of his second daughter. The girl, on hearing her father's inquiry, looked mournfully upon him, whilst the tears ran silently down her cheeks.

"I will go to her," said she, "and stay with her if she will let me. Oh, papa, why talk of an early grave for her? How could we lose her? I could not—and I cannot bear even to think of it."

She instantly rose and proceeded to Jane's room, but in a few minutes returned, saying, "I found her at prayers, papa."

"God bless her, God bless her! I knew she would not voluntarily neglect so sacred a duty. As she wishes to be alone, it is better not to disturb her; solitude and quiet will no doubt contribute to her composure, and it is probably for this purpose that she wishes to be left to herself."

After this the family soon retired to bed, with the exception of Mr. Sinclair himself, who, contrary to his practice, remained for a considerable time longer up than usual. It appeared, indeed, as if the shadow of some coming calamity had fallen upon their hearts, or that the affection they entertained for her was so mysteriously deep as to produce that prophetic sympathy which is often known to operate in a presentiment of sorrow that never fails to be followed by disaster. It is difficult to account for this singular succession of cause to effect, as they act upon our emotions, except probably by supposing that it is an unconscious development of those latent faculties which are decreed to expand into full growth in a future state of existence. Be this as it may, these loving relatives experienced upon that night a mood of mind such as they had never before known, even when the hand of death had taken a brother and sister from among them. It was not grief, but a wild kind of dread, slight, it is true, but distinct in its character, and not dissimilar to that fear which falls upon the spirits during one of those glooms that precede some dark and awful convulsion of nature. Her father remained up, as we have said, longer than the rest, and in the silence which succeeded their retirement for the night, his voice could be occasionally heard in deep and earnest supplication. It was evident that he had recourse to prayer; and by some of the expressions caught from time to time, they gathered that "his dear child," and "her peace of mind," were the object of the foreboding father's devotions.

Jane's distress, at concealing the cause of her absence from prayers, though acute at the moment of inquiry, was nevertheless more transient than one might suppose from the alarming effects it produced. Her mind was at the time in a state of tumult and excitement, such as she had never till then experienced, and the novel guilt of dissimulation, by superinducing her first impression of deliberate crime, opposed itself so powerfully to the exulting sense of her new-born happiness, that both produced a shock of conflicting emotions which a young mind, already so much exhausted, could not resist. She felt, therefore, that a strange darkness shrouded her intellect, in which all distinct traces of thought and all memory of the past were momentarily lost. Her frame, too, at the best but slender and much enfeebled by the preceding interview with Osborne, and her present embarrassment, could not bear up against this chaotic struggle between delight and pain. It was, no doubt, impossible for her relatives to comprehend all this, and hence their alarm. She was too pure and artless to be suspected of concealing the truth; and they consequently entertained not the slightest suspicion of that kind; but still their affections were aroused, and what might have terminated in an ordinary manner, ended in that unusual mood we have described.

With a scrupulous attention to her father's precepts, as well as from a principle of early and sincere piety, she strove on reaching her bed-room to compose her mind in prayer, and to beg the pardon of Heaven for her wilful suppression of the truth. This was a task, however, to which she was altogether unequal. In vain she uttered words expressive of her sorrow, and gave language to sentiments of deep repentance; there was but one idea, but one image in her mind, viz. her impassioned lover, and the certainty that she was the object of his affection. Again and again she attempted to pray, but still with the same success. It was to no purpose she resolved to banish him from her thoughts, until at least the solemn act of her evening worship should be concluded; for ere she had uttered half a sentence the image would return to mock her devotions. In this manner she continued for some time, striving to advance with a sincere heart in her address to heaven; again recommencing with a similar purpose, and as often losing herself in those visions that wrapped her spirit in their transports. At length she arose, and for a moment felt a deep awe fall upon her. The idea that she could not pray, seemed to her as a punishment annexed by God to her crime of having tampered with the love of truth, and disregarded her father's injunctions not to violate it. But this, also, soon passed away: she lay down, and at once surrendered her heart and thought and fancy to the power of that passion, which like the jealous tyrant of the East, seemed on this occasion resolved to bear no virtue near the heart in which it sat enthroned. Such, however, was not its character, as the reader will learn when he proceeds; true love being in our opinion rather the guardian of the other virtues than their foe.

CHAPTER V.

The next morning, when Jane awoke, the event of yesterday flashed on her memory with a thrill of pleasure that made her start up into a recumbent posture in the bed. Her heart bounded, her pulse beat high, and a sudden sensation of hysterical delight rushed to her throat with a transport that would have been painful, had she not passed out of a state of such panting ecstasy and become dissolved in tears. She wept, but how far did she believe the cause of her emotion to be removed from sorrow? She wept, yet alas! alas! never did tears of such delight flow from a source that drew a young heart onward to greater darkness and desolation. Weep on, fair girl, in thy happiness; for the day will come when thou wilt not be able to find one tear in thy misery!

Her appearance the next morning exhibited to the family no symptom whatever of illness. On the contrary, she never looked better, indeed seldom so well. Her complexion was clearer than usual, her spirits more animated, and the dancing light of her eye plainly intimated by its sparkling that her young heart was going on the way of its love rejoicing. Her family were agreeably surprised at this, especially when they reflected upon their anxiety concerning her on the preceding night. To her distress on that occasion they made not the slightest allusion; they felt it sufficient that the beloved of their hearts was well, and that from the evident flow of her spirits there existed no rational grounds for any apprehension respecting her. After breakfast she sat sewing for some time with her sisters, but it was evident that her mind was not yet sufficiently calm to permit her as formerly to sustain a proper part in their conversation. Ever and anon they could observe by the singular light which sparkled in her eyes, as with a sudden rush of joy, that her mind was engaged on some other topic, and this at a moment when some appeal or interrogatory to herself rendered such abstracted enjoyment more obvious. Sensible, therefore, of her incompetency as yet to regulate her imagination so as to escape notice, she withdrew in about an hour to her own room, there once more to give a loose to its indulgence.

Our readers may perceive that the position of Jane Sinclair in her own family, was not very favorable to the formation of a firm character. The regulation of a mind so imaginative, and of feelings so lively and susceptible, required a hand of uncommon delicacy. Indeed her case was one of unusual difficulty. In the first place, her meekness and extreme sweetness of temper rendered it almost impossible in a family where her own qualities predominated, to find any deviation from duty which might be seized upon without harshness as a pretext for inculcating those precautionary principles that were calculated to strengthen the weak points which her character may have presented. Even those weak points, if at the time they could be so termed, were perceptible only in the exercise of her virtues, so that it was a matter of some risk, especially in the case of one so young, to reprove an excess on the right side, lest in doing so you checked the influence of the virtue that accompanied it. Such errors, if they can be called so, when occurring in the conduct of those whom we love, are likely to call forth any thing but censure. It is naturally supposed, and in general with too much truth, that time and experience will remove the excess, and leave the virtue not more than equal to the demands of life upon it. Her father, however, was, as the reader may have found, by no means ignorant of those traits in the constitution of her mind from which danger or happiness might ultimately be apprehended; neither did he look on them with indifference. In truth, they troubled him much, and on more than one occasion he scrupled not fully to express his fears of their result. It was he, the reader perceives, who, on the evening of her first interview with Osborne, gave so gloomy a tone to the feelings of the family, and impressed them at all events more deeply than they otherwise would have felt, with a vague presentiment of some unknown evil that was to befall her. She was, however, what is termed the pet of the family, the centre to which all their affections turned; and she herself felt conscious of this, there is little doubt that the extreme indulgence and almost blameable tenderness which they exercised toward her, did by imperceptible degrees disqualify her from undergoing with firmness those conflicts of the heart to which a susceptibility of the finer emotions rendered her peculiarly liable. Indeed among the various errors prevalent in domestic life, there is scarcely one that has occasioned more melancholy consequences than that of carrying indulgence toward a favorite child too far; and creating under the slightest instances of self-denial a sensitiveness or impatience, arising from a previous habit of being gratified in all the whims and caprices of childhood or youth. The fate of favorite children in life is almost proverbially unhappy; and we doubt not that if the various lunatic receptacles were examined, the maledy, in a majority of cases, might be traced to an excess of indulgence and want of proper discipline in early life. Had Mr. Sinclair insisted on knowing from his daughter's lips the cause of her absence from prayers, and given a high moral proof of the affection he bore her, it is probable that the consciousness on her part of his being cognizant of her passion, would have kept it so far within bounds as to submit to the control of reason instead of ultimately subverting it. This, however, he unhappily omitted to do, not because he was at all ignorant that a strict sense of duty, and a due regard for his daughter's welfare, demanded it; but because her distress, and the childlike simplicity with which she cast herself upon his bosom, touched his spirit, and drew forth all the affection of a parent who "loved not wisely but too well."

Love, however, will not be long without its object, nor can the soul be happy in the absence of its counterpart. For some time after the interview in which the passion of our young lovers was revealed, Jane found solitude to be the same solace to her love, that human sympathy is to affliction. The certainty that she was now beloved, caused her heart to lapse into those alternations of repose and enjoyment which above all other states of feeling nourish its affections. Nature wore in her eyes a new aspect, was clothed with such beauty, and breathed such a spirit of love and harmony, as she only perceived now for the first time. Her parents were kinder and better, she thought, than they had before been to her; and her sisters and brother seemed endued with warmer affections and brighter virtues than they had ever possessed. Every thing near her and about her partook in a more especial manner of this delightful change; the servants were won by sweetness so irresistible—the dogs were more kindly caressed, and Ariel, her own Ariel, was, if possible, more beloved.

IMPROMPTU.

[Written on a visiting card, in the absence of the lady to whom it was addressed.]

BY ANNA CORA MOWATT.

MARY! thou art not here; yet all around
Breathes of thy soft and gentle influence.
The flowers, in sweet profusion that abound,
The birds, books, pictures, charming soul and sense,
All, speak of woman's tender love, and care,
And whisper thy pure spirit lingers here;
E'en as that charmed stone, which oft of yore
Apollo's gifted lyre at noon-day bore,
Gave sweetly forth the same melodious tone,
And woke to music, when that lyre was gone!

* The stone on which Apollo placed his lyre, when reposing from the noon-day heat, was anciently supposed ever after to emit a sweet sound in his absence.

A HISTORICAL ROMANCE.

BY WM. HARRISON AINSWORTH,

Book the Third.

CHAPTER I....How Guy Fawkes was put to the Torture.

INTIMATION of the arrest of Guy Fawkes having been sent to the Tower, his arrival was anxiously expected by the warders and soldiers composing the garrison, a crowd of whom posted themselves at the entrance of Traitor's Gate, to obtain a sight of him. As the bark that conveyed the prisoner shot through London Bridge, and neared the fortress, notice of its approach was given to the lieutenant, who, scarcely less impatient, had stationed himself in a small circular chamber in one of the turrets of St. Thomas's or Traitor's Tower, overlooking the river. He hastily descended, and had scarcely reached the place of disembarkation when the boat passed beneath the gloomy archway; the immense wooden wicket closed behind it; and the officer in command springing ashore, was followed more deliberately by Fawkes, who mounted the slippery stairs with a firm footstep. As he gained the summit, the spectators pressed forward, but Sir William Waad, ordering them in an authoritative tone to stand back, fixed a stern and scrutinizing glance on the prisoner.

"Many vile traitors have ascended those steps," he said, "but none so false-hearted, none so blood-thirsty as you."

"None ever ascended them with less misgiving, or with less self-reproach," replied Fawkes.

"Miserable wretch! Do you glory in your villainy?" cried the lieutenant. "If anything could heighten my detestation of the pernicious creed you profess, it would be to witness its effects on such minds as yours. What a religion must that be, which can induce its followers to commit such monstrous actions, and delude them into the belief that they are pious and praiseworthy!"

"It is a religion, at least, that supports them at seasons when they most require it," rejoined Fawkes.

"Peace!" cried the lieutenant fiercely, "or I will have your viperous tongue torn out by the roots."

Turning to the officer, he demanded his warrant, and glancing at it, gave some directions to one of the warders, and then resumed his scrutiny of Fawkes, who appeared wholly unmoved, and steadily returned his gaze.

Meanwhile, several of the spectators, eager to prove their loyalty to the King, and abhorrence of the plot, loaded the prisoner with execrations, and finding these produced no effect, proceeded to personal outrage. Some spat upon his face and garments; some threw mud gathered from the slimy steps upon him; some pricked him with the points of their halberds; while others, if they had not been checked, would have resorted to greater violence. Only one bystander expressed the slightest commiseration for him. It was Ruth Ippgrave, who with her parents formed part of the assemblage.

A few kindly words pronounced by this girl moved the prisoner more than all the insults he had just experienced. He said nothing, but a slight and almost imperceptible quivering of the lip, told what was passing within. The jailer was extremely indignant at his daughter's conduct, fearing it might prejudice him in the eyes of the lieutenant.

"Get hence, girl," he cried, "and stir not from thy room for the rest of the day. I am sorry I allowed thee to come forth."

"You must look to her, Jasper Ippgrave," said Sir William Waad, sternly. "No man shall hold an office in the Tower who is a favorer of papacy. If you were a good Protestant, and a faithful servant of King James, your daughter could never have acted thus unbecomingly. Look to her I say,—and to yourself."

"I will, honorable sir," replied Jasper, in great confusion. "Take her home directly," he added in an undertone to his wife. "Lock her up till I return, and scourge her if thou wilt. She will ruin us by her indiscretion."

In obedience to this injunction, Dame Ippgrave seized her daughter's hand, and dragged her away. Ruth turned for a moment to take a last look at the prisoner, and saw that his gaze followed her, and was fraught with an expression of the deepest gratitude. By way of showing his disapproval of his daughter's conduct, the jailer now joined the bitterest of Guy Fawkes's assailants; and ere long the assemblage became infuriated to such an ungovernable pitch, that the lieutenant, who had allowed matters to proceed thus far in the hope of shaking the prisoner's constancy, finding his design fruitless, ordered him to be taken away. Escorted by a dozen soldiers with calivers on their shoulders, Guy Fawkes was led through the archway of the Bloody Tower, and across the green to the Beauchamp Tower. He was placed in the spacious chamber on the first floor of that fortification, now used as a mess-room by the Guards. Sir William Waad followed him, and seating himself at a table, referred to the warrant.

"You are here called John Johnson. Is that your name?" he demanded.

"If you find it thus written, you need make no further inquiry from me," replied Fawkes. "I am the person so described. That is sufficient for you."

"Not so," replied the lieutenant; "and if you persist in this stubborn demeanor, the severest measures will be adopted toward you. Your sole chance of avoiding the torture is making a full confession."

"I do not desire to avoid the torture," replied Fawkes. "It will wrest nothing from me."

"So all think till they have experienced it," replied the lieutenant; "but greater fortitude than yours has given way before our engines."

Fawkes smiled disdainfully, but made no answer.

The lieutenant then gave directions that he should be placed within a small cell adjoining the larger chamber, and that two of the guards should remain constantly beside him, to prevent him from doing himself any violence.

"You need have no fear," observed Fawkes. "I shall not destroy my chance of martyrdom."

At this juncture, a messenger arrived, bearing a despatch from the Earl of Salisbury. The lieutenant broke the seal, and after hurriedly perusing it, drew his sword, and desiring the guard to station themselves outside the door approached Fawkes.

"Notwithstanding the enormity of your offence," he observed, "I find his Majesty will graciously spare your life, provided you will reveal the names of all your associates, and disclose every particular connected with the plot."

Guy Fawkes appeared lost in reflection, and the lieutenant, conceiving he had made an impression upon him, repeated the offer.

"How am I to be assured of this?" asked the prisoner.

"My promise must suffice," rejoined Waad.

"It will not suffice to me," returned Fawkes. "I must have a pardon signed by the King."

"You shall have it on one condition," replied Waad. "You are evidently troubled with few scruples. It is the Earl of Salisbury's conviction that the heads of many important Catholic families are connected with this plot. If they should prove to be so,—or, to be plain, if you will accuse certain persons whom I will specify, you shall have the pardon you require."

"Is this the purport of the Earl of Salisbury's despatch?" asked Guy Fawkes.

The lieutenant nodded.

"Let me look at it," continued Fawkes. "You may be practising upon me."

"Your own perfidious nature makes you suspicious of treachery in others," cried the lieutenant—"Will this satisfy you?"

And he held the letter toward Guy Fawkes, who instantly snatched it from his grasp.

"What ho!" he shouted, in a loud voice, "what ho!" and the guards instantly rushed into the room. "You shall learn why you were sent away. Sir William Waad offered me my life on the part of the Earl of Salisbury, provided I will accuse certain innocent parties—innocent, except that they are Catholics—of being leagued with me in my design. Read this letter, and see whether I speak not the truth."

And he threw it among them. But no one stirred, except a warder, who, picking it up, delivered it to the lieutenant.

"You will now understand whom you have to deal with," pursued Fawkes.

"I do," replied Waad; "but were you as unyielding as the walls of this prison, I would shake your obduracy."

"I pray you not to delay the experiment," said Fawkes.

"Have a little patience," retorted Waad. "I will not baulk your humor, depend upon it."

With this he departed, and repairing to his lodgings, wrote a hasty despatch to the Earl, detailing all that had passed, and requesting a warrant for the torture, as he was apprehensive if the prisoner expired under the severe application that would be necessary to force the truth from him, he might be called to account. Two hours afterward, the messenger returned with the warrant. It was in the handwriting of the King, and contained a list of interrogations to be put to the prisoner, concluding by directing him "to use the gentler torture first, et sic per gradus ad incrementum. And so God speed you in your good work!"

Thus armed, and fearless of the consequences, the lieutenant summoned Jasper Ippgrave.

"We have a very refractory prisoner to deal with," he said, as the jailer appeared. "But I have just received the royal authority to put him through all the degrees of torture if he continues obstinate. How shall we begin?"

"With the Scavenger's Daughter and the Little Ease, if it please you, honorable sir," replied Ippgrave. "If these fail, we can try the gauntlets and the rack; and lastly, the dungeon among the rats, and the hot stone."

"A good progression," said the lieutenant, smiling. "I will now repair to the torture chamber. Let the prisoner be brought there without delay. He is in the Beauchamp Tower."

Ippgrave bowed, and departed, while the lieutenant, calling to an attendant to bring a torch, proceeded along a narrow passage communicating with the Bell Tower. Opening a secret door within it, he descended a flight of stone steps, and traversing a number of intricate passages, at length stopped before a strong door, which he pushed aside and entered the chamber he had mentioned to Ippgrave. This dismal apartment has already been described. It was that in which Viviana's constancy was so fearfully approved. Two officials in the peculiar garb of the place—a sable livery—were occupied in polishing the various steel implements. Besides these, there was the surgeon, who was seated at a side table reading by the light of a brazen lamp. He instantly arose on seeing the lieutenant, and began with the other officials to make preparations for the prisoner's arrival. The two latter concealed their features by drawing a large black capoch, or hood, attached to their gowns, over them, and this disguise added materially to their lugubrious appearance. One of them took down a broad iron hoop, opening in the centre with a hinge, and held it in readiness. Their preparations were scarcely completed when heavy footsteps announced the approach of Fawkes and his attendants. Jasper Ippgrave ushered them into the chamber, and fastened the door behind them. All the subsequent proceedings were conducted with the utmost deliberation, and were therefore doubly impressive. No undue haste occurred, and the officials, who might have been mistaken for phantoms or evil spirits, spoke only in whispers. Guy Fawkes watched their movements with unaltered composure. At length, Jasper Ippgrave signified to the lieutenant that all was ready.

"The opportunity you desired of having your courage put to the test is now arrived," said the latter to the prisoner.

"What am I to do?" was the reply.

"Remove your doublet, and prostrate yourself," subjoined Ippgrave.

Guy Fawkes obeyed, and when in this posture began audibly to recite a prayer to the Virgin.

"Be silent," cried the Lieutenant, "or a gag shall be thrust into your mouth."

Kneeling upon the prisoner's shoulders, and passing the hoop under his legs, Ippgrave then succeeded, with the help of his assistants, who added their weight to his own, in fastening the hoop with an iron button. This done, they left the prisoner, with his limbs and body so tightly compressed together, that he was scarcely able to breathe. In this state he was allowed to remain for an hour and a half.

The surgeon then found on examination, that the blood had burst profusely from his mouth and nostrils, and in a slighter degree from the extremities of his hands and feet.

"He must be released," he observed in an undertone to the lieutenant. "Further continuance might be fatal."

Accordingly the hoop was removed, and it was at this moment that the prisoner underwent the severest trial. Despite his efforts to control himself, a sharp convulsion passed across his frame, and the restoration of impeded circulation and respiration occasioned him the most acute agony.

The surgeon bathed his temples with vinegar, and his limbs being chafed by the officials, he was placed on a bench.

"My warrant directs me to begin with the 'gentler tortures,' and to proceed by degrees to extremities," observed the lieutenant, significantly. "You have now had a taste of the milder sort, and may form some conjecture what the worst are like. Do you still continue contumacious?"

"I am in the same mind as before," replied Fawkes, in a hoarse but firm voice.

"Take him to the Little Ease, and let him pass the night there," said the lieutenant. "To-morrow, I will continue the investigation."

Fawkes was then led out by Ippgrave and the officials, and conveyed along a narrow passage, until arriving at a low door, in which there was an iron grating, it was opened, and disclosed a narrow cell about four feet high, one and a few inches wide, and two deep. Into this narrow receptacle, which seemed totally inadequate to contain a tall and strongly-built man like himself, the prisoner was with some difficulty thrust, and the door locked upon him.

In this miserable plight, with his head bent upon his breast—the cell being so contrived that its wretched inmate could neither sit, nor recline at full length within it—Guy Fawkes prayed long and fervently, and no longer troubled by the uneasy feelings which had for some time troubled him, he felt happier in his forlorn condition than he had been when anticipating the full success of his project.

"At least," he thought, "I shall now win myself a crown of martyrdom, and whatever my present sufferings may be, they will be speedily effaced by the happiness I shall enjoy hereafter."

Overcome, at length, by weariness and exhaustion, he fell into a sort of doze—it could scarcely be called sleep—and while in this state, fancied he was visited by Saint Winifred, who, approaching the door of the cell, touched it, and it instantly opened. She then placed her hand upon his limbs, and the pain he had hitherto felt in them subsided.

"Your troubles will soon be over," murmured the Saint, "and you will be at rest. Do not hesitate to confess. Your silence will neither serve your companions, nor yourself."

With these words the vision disappeared, and Guy Fawkes awoke. Whether it was the effect of imagination, or that his robust constitution had in reality shaken off the effects of the torture, it is impossible to say, but it is certain that he felt his strength restored to him, and attributing his recovery entirely to the marvellous interposition of the Saint, he addressed a prayer of gratitude to her. While thus occupied, he heard—for it was so dark he could distinguish nothing—a sweet low voice at the grating of the cell, and imagining it was the same benign presence as before, paused and listened.

"Do you hear me?" asked the voice.

"I do," replied Fawkes. "Is it the blessed Winifred who again vouchsafes to address me?"

"Alas, no!" replied the voice, "it is one of mortal mould. I am Ruth Ippgrave, the jailer's daughter. You may remember that I expressed some sympathy in your behalf at your landing at Traitor's Gate to-day, for which I incurred my father's displeasure. But you will be quite sure I am a friend, when I tell you I assisted Viviana Radcliffe to escape."

"Ha!" exclaimed Guy Fawkes, in a tone of great emotion.

"I was in some degree in her confidence," pursued Ruth; "and if I am not mistaken, you are the object of her warmest regard."

The prisoner could not repress a groan.

"You are Guy Fawkes," pursued Ruth. "Nay, you need have no fear of me. I have risked my life for Viviana, and would risk it for you."

"I will disguise nothing from you," replied Fawkes. "I am he you have named. As the husband of Viviana—for such I am—I feel the deepest gratitude to you for the service you rendered her. She bitterly reproached herself for having placed you in so much danger. How did you escape?"

"I was screened by my parents," replied Ruth. "It was given out by them that Viviana escaped through the window of her prison, and I was thus preserved from punishment. Where is she now?"

"In safety, I trust," replied Fawkes. "Alas! I shall never behold her again."

"Do not despair," returned Ruth. "I will try to effect your liberation; and though I have but slender hope of accomplishing it, still there is a chance."

"I do not desire it," returned Fawkes. "I am content to perish. All I lived for is at an end."

"This shall not deter me from trying to save you," replied Ruth; "and I still trust there is happiness in store for you with Viviana. Amid all your sufferings, rest certain there is one who will ever watch over you. I dare not remain here longer, for fear of a surprise. Farewell!"

She then departed, and it afforded Guy Fawkes some solace to ponder on the interview during the rest of the night.

On the following morning, Jasper Ippgrave appeared, and placed before him a loaf of the coarsest bread, and a jug of dirty water. His scanty meal ended, he left him, but returned in two hours afterward with a party of halberdiers, and desiring him to follow him, led the way to the torture-chamber. Sir William Waad was there when he arrived, and demanding in a stern tone whether he still continued obstinate, and receiving no answer, ordered him to be placed in the gauntlets. Upon this, he was suspended from a beam by his hands, and endured five hours of the most excruciating agony—his fingers being so crushed and lacerated that he could not move them.

He was then taken down, and still refusing to confess, was conveyed to a horrible pit, adjoining the river, called, from the loathsome animals infesting it, "the dungeon among the rats." It was about twenty feet wide and twelve deep, and at high tide was generally more than two feet deep in water.

Into this dreadful chasm was Guy Fawkes lowered by his attendants, who, warning him of the probable fate that awaited him, left him in total darkness. At this time the pit was free from water; but he had not been there more than an hour, when a bubbling and hissing sound proclaimed that the tide was rising, while frequent splashes convinced him that the rats were at hand. Stooping down, he felt that the water was alive with them—that they were all around him—and would not, probably, delay their attack. Prepared as he was for the worst, he could not repress a shudder at the prospect of the horrible death with which he was menaced.

At this juncture, he was surprised by the appearance of a light, and perceived at the edge of the pit a female figure bearing a lantern. Not doubting it was his visitant of the former night, he called out to her, and was answered in the voice of Ruth Ippreve.

"I dare not remain here many minutes," she said, "because my father suspects me. But I could not let you perish thus. I will let down this lantern to you, and the light will keep away the rats. When the tide retires you can extinguish it."

So saying, she tore her kerchief into shreds, and tying the slips together, lowered the lantern to the prisoner, and without waiting to receive his thanks, hurried away.

Thus aided, Guy Fawkes defended himself as well as he could against his loathsome assailants. The light showed that the water was swarming with them—that they were creeping by hundreds up the sides of the pit, and preparing to make a general attack upon him.

At one time, Fawkes determined not to oppose them, but to let them work their will upon him; but the contact of the noxious animals made him change his resolution, and he instinctively drove them off. They were not, however, to be easily repulsed, and returned to the charge with greater fury than before. The desire of self-preservation now got the better of every other feeling, and the dread of being devoured alive giving new vigor to his crippled limbs, he rushed to the other side of the pit. His persecutors, however, followed him in myriads, springing upon him, and making their sharp teeth meet in his flesh in a thousand places.

In this way the contest continued for some time, Guy Fawkes speeding round the pit, and his assailants never for one moment relaxing in the pursuit, until he fell from exhaustion, and his lantern being extinguished, the whole host darted upon him.

Thinking all over, he could not repress a loud cry, and it was scarcely uttered, when lights appeared, and several gloomy figures bearing torches were seen at the edge of the pit. Among these he distinguished Sir William Waad, who offered instantly to release him if he would confess.

"I will rather perish," replied Fawkes, "and I will make no further effort to defend myself. I shall soon be out of the reach of your malice."

"This must not be," observed the lieutenant to Jasper Ippreve, who stood by. "The Earl of Salisbury will never forgive me if he perishes."

"Then not a moment must be lost, or those ravenous brutes will assuredly devour him," replied Ippreve. "They are so fierce that I scarcely like to venture among them."

A ladder was then let down into the pit, and the jailor and the two officials descended. They were just in time. Fawkes had ceased to struggle, and the rats were attacking him with such fury that his words would have been speedily verified, but for Ippreve's timely interposition.

On being taken out of the pit, he fainted from exhaustion and loss of blood; and when he came to himself, found he was stretched upon a couch in the torture-chamber, with the surgeon and Jasper Ippreve in attendance. Strong broths, and other restoratives, were then administered; and his strength being sufficiently restored to enable him to converse, the lieutenant again visited him, and questioning him as before, received a similar answer.

In the course of that day and the next, he underwent at intervals various kinds of torture, each more excruciating than the preceding, all of which he bore with unabated fortitude. Among other applications, the rack was employed with such rigor, that his joints started from their sockets, and his frame seemed torn asunder.

On the fourth day, he was removed to another and yet gloomier chamber, devoted to the same dreadful objects as the first. It had an arch stone ceiling, and at the further extremity yawned a deep recess. Within this there was a small furnace, in which fuel was placed ready to be kindled, and over the furnace lay a large black flag, at either end of which were stout leathern straps. After being subjected to the customary interrogatories of the lieutenant, Fawkes was stripped of his attire, and bound to the flag. The fire was then lighted, and the stone gradually heated. The writhing frame of the miserable man ere long showed the extremity of his sufferings, but as he did not even utter a groan, his tormentors were compelled to release him.

On this occasion, there were two personages present who had never attended any previous interrogation. They were wrapped in large cloaks, and stood aloof during the proceedings. Both were treated with the most ceremonious respect by Sir William Waad, who consulted them as to the extent to which he should continue the torture. When the prisoner was taken off the heated stone, one of those persons advanced toward him, and gazed curiously at him.

Fawkes, upon whose brow thick drops were standing, and who was sinking into the oblivion brought on by overwrought endurance, exclaimed, "It is the King," and fainted.

"The traitor knew your Majesty," said the lieutenant. "But you see it is in vain to attempt to extort anything from him."

"So it seems," replied James, "and I am greatly disappointed, for I was led to believe that I should hear a full confession of the conspiracy from his own lips. How say you, good master surgeon, will he endure further torture?"

"Not without danger of life, your Majesty, unless he has some days' repose," replied the surgeon, "even if he can endure it then."

"It will not be necessary to apply it further," replied Salisbury. "I am now in full possession of the names of all the principal conspirators, and when the prisoner finds further concealment useless, he will change his tone. Tomorrow, the commissioners appointed by your Majesty for the examination of all those concerned in this dreadful project, will interrogate him in the lieutenant's lodgings, and I will answer with my life that the result will be satisfactory."

"Enough," said James. "It has been a painful spectacle, which we have just witnessed, and yet we would not have missed it. The wretch possesses undaunted resolution, and we can never be sufficiently grateful to the beneficent Providence that prevented him from working his ruthless purpose upon us. The day on which we were preserved from his Gunpowder Treason shall ever hereafter be kept sacred in our Church, and thanks shall be returned to Heaven for our wonderful deliverance."

"Your Majesty will act wisely," replied Salisbury. "The ordinance will impress the nation with a salutary horror of all Papists and traitors, for they are one and the same thing. Such a fearful example shall be made of those miscreants as shall, it is to be hoped, deter all others from following their cause. Not only shall they perish infamously, but their names shall for ever be held in execration."

"Be it so," rejoined James. "It is a good legal maxim—Crescente malitia, crescere debuit et poena."

Upon this, he left the chamber, and traversing a number of subterranean passages with his attendants, crossed the draw-bridge near the Byward Tower to the wharf, where his barge was waiting for him, and returned in it to Whitehall.

At an early hour in the following day the commissioners appointed to the examination of the prisoner met together in a large room on the second floor of the lieutenant's lodgings, afterward denominated, from its use on this occasion, the Council Chamber. Affixed to the walls of this room may be seen at the present day a piece of marble sculpture, with an inscription commemorative of the event. The commissioners were nine in number, and included the Earls of Salisbury, Northampton, Nottingham, Suffolk, Worcester, Devon, Marr, and Dunbar, and Sir John Popham, Lord Chief Justice. With these were associated Sir Edward Coke, attorney-general, and Sir William Waad.

The apartment in which the examination took place is still a spacious one, but at the period in question it was much larger and loftier. The walls were panelled with dark lustrous oak, covered in some places with tapestry, and adorned in others with paintings. Over the chimney-piece hung a portrait of the late sovereign, Elizabeth. The commissioners were grouped round a large heavily carved oak table, and, after some deliberation together, it was agreed that the prisoner should be introduced.

Sir William Waad then motioned to Topcliffe, who was in attendance with half-a-dozen halberdiers, and a few moments afterward a panel was pushed aside, and Guy Fawkes was brought through it. He was supported by Topcliffe and Ippreve, and it was with the greatest difficulty he could drag himself along. So severe had been the sufferings to which he had been subjected, that they had done the work of time, and placed more than twenty years on his head. His features were thin and sharp, and of a ghastly whiteness, and his eyes hollow and bloodshot. A large cloak was thrown over him, which partially concealed his shattered frame and crippled limbs; but his bent shoulders, and the difficulty with which he moved, told how much he had undergone.

On seeing the presence in which he stood, a flush for a moment rose to his pallid cheek, his eye glowed with its wonted fire, and he tried to stand erect—but his limbs refused their office—and the effort was so painful, that he fell back into the arms of his attendants. He was thus borne forward by them, and supported during his examination. The Earl of Salisbury then addressed him, and enlarging on the magnitude and horrible nature of his treason, concluded by saying that the only reparation he could offer was to disclose not only all his own criminal intentions, but the names of his associates.

"I will hide nothing concerning myself," replied Fawkes; "but I shall be for ever silent respecting others."

The Earl then glanced at Sir Edward Coke, who proceeded to take down minutes of the examination.

"You have hitherto falsely represented yourself," said the Earl. "What is your real name?"

"Guy Fawkes," said the prisoner.

"And do you confess your guilt?" pursued the Earl.

"I admit that it was my intention to blow up the King and the whole of the lords spiritual and temporal assembled in the Parliament House with gunpowder," replied Fawkes.

"And you placed the combustibles in the vault where they were discovered?" demanded Salisbury.

The prisoner answered in the affirmative.

"You are a Papist?" continued the Earl.

"I am a member of the Church of Rome," returned Fawkes.

"And you regard this monstrous design as righteous and laudable—as consistent with the religion you profess, and as likely to uphold it?" said the Earl.

"I did so," replied Fawkes. "But I am now convinced that Heaven did not approve it, and I lament that it was ever undertaken."

"Still you refuse to make the only reparation in your power—you refuse to disclose your associates?" said Salisbury.

"I cannot betray them," replied Fawkes.

"Traitor! it is needless," cried the Earl; "they are known to us—nay, they have betrayed themselves. They have risen in open and armed rebellion against the King; but a sufficient power has been sent against them; and if they are not ere this defeated and captured, many days will not elapse before they will be lodged in the Tower."

"If this is the case, you require no information from me," rejoined Fawkes. "But I pray you name them to me."

"I will do so," replied Salisbury; "and if I have omitted any, you can supply the deficiency. I will begin with Robert Catesby, the chief contriver of this hell-engendered plot—I will next proceed to the superior of the Jesuits, Father Garnet; next, to another Jesuit priest, Father Oldcorne; next, to Sir Everard Digby—then, to Thomas Winter and Robert Winter—then, to John Wright and Christopher Wright—then, to Ambrose Rookwood, Thomas Percy, and John Grant—and lastly, to Robert Keyes."

"Are these all?" demanded Fawkes.

"All we are acquainted with," said Salisbury.

"Then add to them the names of Francis Tresham, and of his brother-in-law, Lord Mounteagle," rejoined Fawkes. "I charge both with being privy to the plot."

"I have forgotten another name," said Salisbury, in some confusion, "that of Viviana Radcliffe, of Ordsall Hall. I have received certain information that she was wedded to you while you were resident at White Webbe, near Epping Forest, and was cognisant of the plot. If captured, she will share your fate."

Fawkes could not repress a groan.

Salisbury pursued his interrogations, but it was evident from the increasing feebleness of the prisoner, that he would sink under it if the examination was further protracted. He was therefore ordered to attach his signature to the minutes taken by Sir Edward Coke, and was placed in a chair for that purpose. A pen was then given him, but for some time his shattered fingers refused to grasp it. By a great effort, and with acute pain, he succeeded in tracing his Christian name thus:—

Guy

While endeavoring to write his surname, the pen fell from his hand, and he became insensible.

CHAPTER II.—Showing the troubles of Viviana.

On coming to herself, Viviana inquired for Garnet, and being told that he was in the chamber alone, she repaired thither, and found him pacing to and fro, in the greatest perturbation.

"If you come to me for consolation, daughter," he said, "you come to one who cannot offer it. I am completely prostrated in spirit by the disastrous issue of our enterprise; and though I tried to prepare myself for what has taken place, I now find myself utterly unable to cope with it."

"If such is your condition, father," replied Viviana, "what must be that of my husband, upon whose devoted head all the weight of this dreadful calamity now falls? You are still at liberty—still able to save yourself—still able, at least, to resist unto the death, if you are so minded. But he is a captive in the Tower, exposed to every torment that human ingenuity can invent, and with nothing but the prospect of a lingering death before his eyes. What is your condition compared with his?"

"Happy—most happy daughter," replied Garnet, "and I have been selfish and unreasonable. I have given way to the weakness of humanity, and I thank you from the bottom of my heart for enabling me to shake it off."

"You have indulged false hopes, father," said Viviana, "whereas I have indulged none, or rather all has come to pass as I desired. The dreadful crime with which I feared my husband's soul would have been loaded is now uncommitted, and I have a firm hope of his salvation. If I might counsel you, I would advise you to surrender yourself to justice, and by pouring out your blood on the scaffold, wash out your offence. Such will be my own course. I have been involuntarily led into connection with this plot; and though I have ever disapproved of it, since I have not revealed it, I am as gully as if I had been its contriver. I shall not shun my punishment. Fate has dealt hardly with me, and my path on earth has been strewn with thorns, and cast in grief and trouble. But I humbly trust that my portion hereafter will be with the blessed."

"I cannot doubt it, daughter," replied Garnet; "and though I do not view our design in the light that you do, but regard it as justifiable, if not necessary, yet with your feelings, I cannot sufficiently admire your conduct. Your devotion and self-sacrifice is wholly without a parallel. At the same time, I would try to dissuade you from surrendering yourself to our relentless enemies. Believe me, it will add the severest pang to your husband's torture to know that you are in their power. His nature is stern and unyielding, and persuaded as he is of the justice of his cause, he will die happy in that conviction, certain that his name, though despised by our heretical persecutors, will be held in reverence by all true professors of our faith. No, daughter, fly and conceal yourself till pursuit is relinquished, and pass the rest of your life in prayer for the repose of your husband's soul."

"I will pass it in endeavoring to bring him to repentance," replied Viviana. "The sole boon I shall ask from my judges will be permission to attempt this."

"It will be refused, daughter," replied Garnet, "and you will only destroy yourself, not aid him. Rest satisfied that the Great Power who judges the hearts of men, and implants certain impulses within them, for his own wise but inscrutable purposes, well knows that Guy Fawkes, however culpable his conduct may appear in your eyes, acted according to the dictates of his own conscience, and in the full confidence that the design would restore the true worship of God in this kingdom. The failure of the enterprise proves that he was mistaken—that we were all mistaken—and that Heaven was unfavorable to the means adopted—but it does not prove his insincerity."

"These arguments have no weight with me, father," replied Viviana; "I will leave nothing undone to save his soul, and whatever may be the result, I will surrender myself to justice."

"I shall not seek to move you from your purpose, daughter," replied Garnet, "and can only lament it. Before, however, you finally decide, let us pray together for direction from on high."

Thus exhorted, Viviana knelt down with the priest before a small silver image of the Virgin, which stood in a niche in the wall, and they both prayed long and earnestly. Garnet was the first to conclude his devotions, and as he gazed at the up-turned countenance and streaming eyes of his companion, his heart was filled with admiration and pity.

At this juncture the door opened, and Catesby and Sir Everard Digby entered. On hearing them, Viviana immediately arose.

"The urgency of our business must plead an excuse for the interruption, if any is needed," said Catesby; "but do not retire, madam. We have no secrets from you now. Sir Everard and I have fully completed our preparations," he added to Garnet. "Our men are all armed and mounted in the court, and are in high spirits for the enterprise. As the service, however, will be one of the greatest danger and difficulty, you had better seek a safe asylum, father, till the first decisive blow is struck."

"I would go with you, my son," rejoined Garnet, "if I did not think my presence might be a hindrance. I can only aid you with my prayers, and those can be more efficaciously uttered in some secure retreat, than during a rapid march, or dangerous encounter."

"You had better retire to Coughton with Lady Digby and Viviana," said Sir Everard. "I have provided a sufficient escort to guard you thither—and, as you are aware, there are many hiding-places in the house, where you can remain undiscovered in case of search."

"I place myself at your disposal," replied Garnet. "But Viviana is resolved to surrender herself."

"This must not be," returned Catesby. "Such an act at this juncture would be madness, and would materially injure our cause. Whatever your inclinations may prompt, you must consent to remain in safety, madam."

"I have acquiesced in your proceedings thus far," replied Viviana, "because I could not oppose them without injury to those dear to me. But I will take no further share in them. My mind is made up as to the course I shall pursue."

"Since you are bent upon your own destruction—for it is nothing less—it is the duty of your friends to save you," rejoined Catesby. "You shall not do what you propose, and when you are yourself again, and have recovered from the shock your feelings have sustained, you will thank me for my interference."

"You are right, Catesby," observed Sir Everard: "it would be worse than insanity to allow her to destroy herself thus."

"I am glad you are of this opinion," said Garnet. "I tried to reason her out of her design, but without avail."

"Catesby," cried Viviana, throwing herself at his feet, "by the love you once professed for me—by the friendship you entertained for him who unhesitatingly offered himself for you, and your cause, I implore you not to oppose me now."

"I shall best serve you, and most act in accordance with the wishes of my friend, by doing so," replied Catesby. "Therefore, you plead in vain."

"Alas!" cried Viviana, "My purposes were ever thwarted. You will have to answer for my life."

"I should, indeed, have it to answer for, if I permitted you to act as you desire," rejoined Catesby. "I repeat, you will thank me ere many days have passed."

"Sir Everard," exclaimed Viviana, appealing to the knight, "I entreat you to have pity upon me."

"I do sincerely sympathize with your distress," replied Digby, in a tone of the deepest commiseration; "but I am sure what Catesby advises is for the best. I could not reconcile it to my conscience to allow you to sacrifice yourself thus. Be governed by prudence."

"Oh, no—no!" cried Viviana, distractedly. "I will not be stayed. I command you not to detain me."

"Viviana," said Catesby, taking her arm, "this is no season for the display of silly weakness either on our part or yours. If you cannot control yourself, you must be controlled. Father Garnet, I entrust her to your care. Two of my troop shall attend you, together with your own servant, Nicholas Owen. You shall have stout horses, able to accomplish the journey with the greatest expedition, and I should wish you to convey her to her own mansion, Ordsall Hall, and to remain there with her till you hear tidings of us."

"It shall be as you direct, my son," said Garnet. "I am prepared to set out at once."

"This is well," replied Catesby.

"You will not do me this violence, sir," cried Viviana.

"I appeal against it, to you, Sir Everard."

"I cannot help you, Madam," replied the knight, "indeed, I cannot."

"Then heaven, I trust, will help me," cried Viviana, "for I am wholly abandoned of man."

"I beseech you, madam, put some constraint upon yourself," said Catesby. "If, after your arrival at Ordsall, you are still bent upon your rash and fatal design, Father Garnet shall not oppose its execution. But give yourself time for reflection."

"Since it may not be otherwise, I assent," replied Viviana. "If I must go, I will start at once."

"Wisely resolved," replied Sir Everard.

Viviana then retired, and soon afterward appeared equipped for her journey. The two attendants and Nicholas Owen were in the court-yard, and Catesby assisted her into the saddle.

"Do not lose sight of her," he said to Garnet, as the latter mounted.

"Rest assured I will not," replied the other.

And taking the direction of Coventry, the party rode off at a brisk pace.

Catesby then joined the other conspirators, while Sir Everard sent off Lady Digby and his household, attended by a strong escort to Coughton. This done, the whole party repaired to the courtyard, where they called over the muster-roll of their men, to ascertain that none were missing—examined their arms and ammunition—and finding all in order, sprang to their steeds, and putting themselves at the head of the band, rode toward Southam and Warwick.

CUPID RESTORED TO SIGHT.

BY ANNA CORA MOWATT.

Said Sophy, one day, with an air of conceit,
To the amorous suitor that sighed at her feet,
"Oh! no; I'll not marry—what charm e'er can bind,
"Since Cupid once wedded no longer is blind!"
Delusion takes wing as the bridal torch dies,
And Hymen, too surely, gives Love back his eyes,
"Then, ere the moon wanes, who knows but he'll trace
"Deformities strange in the once-worshipped face!"
Believe it not, dearest," the fond swain replied,
And smiled, as the lady still doubtfully sighed,
"Ah! wherefore, the sight he regains, should you rue?
"T is but given your virtues more clearly to view."

Master Humphrey's Clock.

BARNABY RUDGE.

BY CHARLES DICKENS, ESQ.

CHAPTER XXIII.

TWILIGHT had given place to night some hours, and it was high noon in those quarters of the town in which "the world" condescended to dwell—the world being then, as now, of very limited dimensions and easily lodged—when Mr. Chester reclined upon a sofa in his dressing-room in the Temple, entertaining himself with a book.

He was dressing, as it seemed, by easy stages, and having performed half the journey was taking a long rest. Completely attired as to his legs and feet in the trimmest fashion of the day, he had yet the remainder of his toilet to perform. The coat was stretched, like a refined scarecrow, on its separate horse; the waistcoat was displayed to the best advantage; the various ornamental articles of dress were severally set out in most alluring order; and yet he lay dangleing his legs between the sofa and the ground, as intent upon his book as if there was nothing before him.

"Upon my honor," he said, at length raising his eyes to the ceiling with the air of a man who was reflecting seriously on what he had read; "upon my honor, the most masterly composition, the most delicate thoughts, the finest code of morality, and the most gentlemanly sentiments in the universe! Ah Ned, Ned, if you would but form your mind by such precepts, we should have but one common feeling on every subject that could possibly arise between us!"

This apostrophe was addressed, like the rest of his remarks, to empty air: for Edward was not present, and the father was quite alone.

"My Lord Chesterfield," he said, pressing his hand tenderly upon the book as he laid it down, "if I could but have profited by your genius soon enough to have formed my son on the model you have left to all wise fathers, both he and I would have been rich men. Shakspeare was undoubtedly very fine in his way: Milton good, though prosy; Lord Bacon deep, and decidedly knowing; but the writer who should be his country's pride, is my Lord Chesterfield."

He became thoughtful again, and the toothpick was in requisition.

"I thought I was tolerably accomplished as a man of the world," he continued, "I flattered myself that I was pretty well versed in all those little arts and graces which distinguish men of the world from bores and peasants, and separate their character from those intensely vulgar sentiments which are called the national character. Apart from any natural prepossession in my own favor, I believed I was. Still, in every page of this enlightened writer, I find some captivating hypocrisy which has never occurred to me before, or some superlative piece of selfishness to which I was utterly a stranger. I should quite blush for myself before this stupendous creature, if, remembering his precepts, one might blush at anything. An amazing man! a nobleman indeed! any King or Queen may make a Lord, but only the Devil himself—and the Graces—can make a Chesterfield."

Men who are thoroughly false and hollow, seldom try to hide those vices from themselves; and yet in the very act of avowing them, they lay claim to the virtues they feign most to despise. "For," say they, "this is honesty, this is truth. All mankind are like us, but they have not the candor to avow it." The more they affect to deny the existence of any sincerity in the world, the more they would be thought to possess it in its boldest shape; and this is an unconscious compliment to truth on the part of these philosophers, which will turn the laugh against them to the Day of Judgment.

Mr. Chester, having extolled his favorite author as above recited, took up the book again in the excess of his admiration and was composing himself for a further perusal of its sublime morality, when he was disturbed by a noise at the outer door; occasioned as it seemed by the endeavors of his servant to obstruct the entrance of some unwelcome visitor.

"A late hour for an importunate creditor," he said, raising his eyebrows with an indolent expression of wonder as if the noise were in the street, and one with which he had not the smallest personal concern. "Much after their accustomed time. The usual pretence I suppose. No doubt a heavy payment to make to-morrow. Poor fellow, he loses time, and time is money as the good proverb says—I never found it out though. Well. What now? You know I am not at home."

"A man, Sir," replied the servant, who was to the full as cool and negligent in his way as his master, "has brought home the riding-whip you lost the other day. I told him you were out, but he said he was to wait while I brought it in, and would not go till I did."

"He was quite right," returned his master, "and you're a blockhead, possessing no judgment or discretion whatever. Tell him to come in, and see that he rubs his shoes for exactly five minutes first."

The man laid the whip on the chair, and withdrew. The master, who had only heard his foot upon the ground and had not taken the trouble to turn round and look at him, shut his book, and pursued the train of ideas his entrance had disturbed.

"If time were money," he said, handing his snuff-box, "I would compound with my creditors, and give them—let me see—how much a day? There's my nap after dinner—an hour—they're extremely welcome to that, and to make the most of it. In the morning, between my breakfast and the paper, I could spare them another hour; in the evening before dinner, say another. Three hours a day. They might pay themselves in calls, with interest, in twelve months. I think I shall propose it to them. Ah, my centaur, are you there?"

"Here I am," replied Hugh, striding in, followed by a dog, as rough and sullen as himself; "and trouble enough I've had to get here. What do you ask me to come for, and keep me out when I do come?"

"My good fellow," returned the other, raising his head a little from the cushion and carelessly surveying him from top to toe, "I am delighted to see you, and to have, in your being here, the very best proof that you are not kept out. How are you?"

"I'm well enough," said Hugh impatiently.

"You look a perfect marvel of health. Sit down."

"I'd rather stand," said Hugh.

"Please yourself, my good fellow," said Mr. Chester rising, slowly pulling off the loose robe he wore, and sitting down before the dressing-glass. "Please yourself by all means."

Having said this in the politest and blandest tone possible, he went on dressing, and took no further notice of his guest, who stood in the same spot as uncertain what to do next, eyeing him sulkily from time to time.

"Are you going to speak to me, master?" he said, after a long silence.

"My worthy creature," returned Mr. Chester, "you are a little ruffled and out of humor. I'll wait till you're quite yourself again. I am in no hurry."

This behavior had its intended effect. It humbled and abashed the man, and made him still more irresolute and uncertain. Hard words he could have returned, violence he would have repaid with interest; but this cool, complacent, contemptuous, self-possessed reception, caused him to feel his inferiority more completely than the most elaborate arguments. Everything contributed to this effect. His own rough speech, contrasted with the soft persuasive accents of the other; his rude bearing, and Mr. Chester's polished manner; the disorder and negligence of his ragged dress, and the elegant attire he saw before him; with all the unaccustomed luxuries and comforts of the room, and the silence that gave him leisure to observe these things, and feel how ill at ease they made him; all these influences, which have too often some effect on tutored minds and become of almost resistless power when brought to bear on such a mind as his, quelled Hugh completely. He moved by little and little nearer to Mr. Chester's chair, and glancing over his shoulder at the reflection of his face in the glass, as if seeking for some encouragement in its expression, said at length, with a rough attempt at reconciliation,

"Are you going to speak to me, master, or am I to go away?"

"Speak you," said Mr. Chester, "speak you, good fellow. I have spoken, have I not? I am waiting for you."

"Why, look'ee, sir," returned Hugh with increased embarrassment, "am I the man that you privately left your whip with before you rode away from the Maypole, and told to bring it back whenever he might want to see you on a certain subject?"

"No doubt the same, or you have a twin brother," said Mr. Chester, glancing at the reflection of his anxious face; "which is not probable, I should say."

"Then I have come, sir," said Hugh, "and I have brought it back, and something else along with it. A letter, sir, it is, that I took from the person who had charge of it." As he spoke, he laid upon the dressing-table, Dolly's last epistle. The very letter that had cost her so much trouble.

"Did you obtain this by force, my good fellow?" said Mr. Chester, casting his eye upon it without the least perceptible surprise or pleasure.

"Not quite," said Hugh. "Partly."

"Who was the messenger from whom you took it?"

"A woman. One Varden's daughter."

"Oh, indeed!" said Mr. Chester, gaily. "What else did you take from her?"

"What else?"

"Yes," said the other, in a drawling manner, for he was fixing a very small patch of sticking-plaster on a very small pimple near the corner of his mouth. "What else?"

"Well—a kiss," replied Hugh, after some hesitation.

"And what else?"

"Nothing."

"I think," said Mr. Chester, in the same easy tone, and smiling twice or thrice to try if the patch adhered—"I think there was something else. I have heard a trifle of jewellery spoken of—a mere trifle—a thing of such little value, indeed, that you may have forgotten it. Do you remember anything of the kind—such as a bracelet now, for instance?"

Hugh, with a muttered oath, thrust his hand into his breast, and drawing the bracelet forth, wrapped in a scrap of bay, was about to lay it on the table likewise, when his patron stopped his hand and bade him put it up again.

"You took that for yourself, my excellent friend," he said, "and may keep it. I am neither thief nor a receiver. Do n't show it to me. You had better hide it again, and lose no time. Do n't let me see where you put it either," he added, turning away his head.

"You're not a receiver!" said Hugh, bluntly, despite the increasing awe in which he held him. "What do you call that, master?" striking the letter with his heavy hand.

"I call that quite another thing," said Mr. Chester coolly. "I shall prove it presently, as you will see. You are thirsty, I suppose?"

Hugh drew his sleeve across his lips, and gruffly answered yes.

"Step to that closet, and bring me a bottle you will see there, and a glass."

He obeyed. His patron followed him with his eyes, and when his back was turned, smiled as he had never done when he stood beside the mirror. On his return he filled the glass, and bade him drink. That dram despatched, he poured him out another, and another.

"How many can you bear?" he said, filling the glass again.

"As many as you like to give me. Pour on. Fill high. A bumper with a bead in the middle! Give me enough of this," he added, as he tossed it down his hairy throat, "and I'll do murder if you ask me!"

"As I do n't mean to ask you, and you might possibly do it without being invited if you went on much further," said Mr. Chester with great composure, "we will stop, if agreeable to you my good friend, at the next glass.—You were drinking before you came here."

"I always am when I can get it," cried Hugh boisterously, waving the empty glass above his head, and throwing himself into a rude dancing attitude. "I always am. Why not? Ha ha ha! What's so good to me as this? What ever has been? What else has kept away the cold on bitter nights, and driven hunger off in starving times? What else has given me the strength and courage of a man, when men would have left me to die, a puny child! I should never have had a man's heart but for this. I should have died in a ditch. Where's he who when I was a weak and sickly wretch, with trembling legs and fading sight, bade me cheer up, as this did? I never knew him; not I. I drink to the drink, master, Ha ha ha!"

"You are exceedingly cheerful young man," said Mr. Chester, putting on his cravat with great deliberation, and slightly moving his head from side to side to settle his chin in its proper place. "Quite a boon companion."

"Do you see this hand, master," said Hugh, "and this arm?" baring the brawny limb to the elbow. "It was once mere skin and bone, and would have been drunk in some poor church-yard by this time, but for the drink."

"You may cover it," said Mr. Chester, "it's sufficiently real in your sleeve."

"I should never have been spirited up to take a kiss from the proud little beauty, master, but for the drink," cried Hugh. "Ha ha ha! It was a good one. As sweet as honey-suckle I warrant you. I thank the drink for it. I'll drink to the drink again, master. Fill me one more. Come. One more!"

"You are such a promising fellow," said his patron, putting on his waistcoat with great nicety, and taking no heed of his request, "that I must caution you against having too many impulses from the drink, and getting hung before your time. What's your age?"

"I do n't know."

"At any rate," said Mr. Chester, "you are young enough to escape what I may call a natural death for some years to come. How can you trust yourself in my hands on so short an acquaintance with a halter round your neck? What a confiding nature yours must be!"

Hugh fell back a pace or two and surveyed him with a look of mingled terror, indignation, and surprise. Regarding himself in the glass with the same complacency as before, and speaking as smoothly as if he were discussing some pleasant chit-chat of the town, his patron went on:

"Robbery on the king's highway, my young friend, is a very dangerous and ticklish occupation. It is pleasant, I have no doubt, while it lasts; but like many other pleasures in this transitory world, it seldom lasts long. And really if, in the ingenuousness of youth, you open your heart so readily on the subject, I am afraid your career will be an extremely short one."

"How 's this?" said Hugh, "What do you talk of, master? Who was it set me on?"

"Who?" said Mr. Chester, wheeling sharply round, and looking at him for the first time. "I did n't hear you. Who was it?"

Hugh faltered, and muttered something which was not audible.

"Who was it? I am curious to know," said Mr. Chester, with surpassing affability. "Some rustic beauty perhaps? But be cautious, my good friend. They are not always to be trusted. Do take my advice do, and be careful of yourself." With these words he turned to the glass again, and went on with his toilet.

Hugh would have answered him that he, the questioner himself, had set him on, but the words stuck in his throat. The consummate art with which his patron had led him to this point, and managed the whole conversation, perfectly baffled him. He did not doubt that if he had made the retort which was on his lips when Mr. Chester turned round and questioned him so keenly, he would straightway have given him into custody and had him dragged before a justice with the stolen property upon him; in which case it was certain he would have been hung as it was that he had been born. The ascendancy which it was the purpose of the man of the world to establish over this savage instrument, was gained from that time. Hugh's submission was complete. He dreaded him beyond description; and felt that accident and artifice had spun a web about him, which at a touch from such a master-hand as his, would bind him to the gallows.

With these thoughts passing through his mind, and yet wondering at the very same time how he who came there rioting in the confidence of this man (as he thought,) should be so soon and so thoroughly subdued, Hugh stood cowering before him, regarding him uneasily from time to time, while he finished dressing. When he had done so, he took up the letter, broke the seal, and throwing himself back in his chair, read it leisurely through.

"Very neatly worded upon my life! Quite a woman's letter, full of what people call tenderness, and disinterestedness, and heart, and all that sort of thing!"

As he spoke, he twisted it up, and glancing lazily round at Hugh as though he would say "You see this?" held it to the flame of the candle. When it was in a full blaze, he tossed it into the grate, and there it smouldered away.

"It was directed to my son," he said, turning to Hugh, "and you did quite right to bring it here. I opened it on my own responsibility, and you see what I have done with it. Take this, for your trouble."

Hugh stepped forward to receive the piece of money he held out to him. As he put it in his hand, he added:

"If you should happen to find anything else of this sort, or to pick up any kind of information you may think I would like to have, bring it here will you—my good fellow?"

This was said with a smile which implied—or Hugh thought it did—"fail to do so at your peril!" He answered that he would.

"And do n't," said his patron, with an air of the very kindest patronage, "do n't be at all downcast or uneasy respecting that little rashness we have been speaking of. Your neck is as safe in my hands, my good fellow, as though a baby's fingers clasped it, I assure you. Take another glass. You are quieter now."

Hugh accepted it from his hand, and looking stealthily at his smiling face, drank the contents in silence.

"Do n't you—ha ha!—do n't you drink to the drink any more?" said Mr. Chester, in his most winning manner.

"To you, sir," was the sullen answer, with something approaching to a bow. "I drink to you."

"Thank you. God bless you. By the bye, what is your name, my good soul? You are called Hugh, I know, of course—your other name?"

"I have no other name."

"A very strange fellow! Do you mean that you never knew one, or that you do n't choose to tell it? Which?"

"I'd tell it if I could," said Hugh, quickly. "I can't. I have been always called Hugh; nothing more. I never knew, nor saw, nor thought about a father; and I was a boy of six—that 's not very old—when they hung my mother up at Tyburn for a couple of thousand men to stare at. They might have let her live. She was poor enough."

"How very sad!" exclaimed his patron with a condescending smile. "I have no doubt she was an exceedingly fine woman."

"You see that dog of mine?" said Hugh, abruptly.

"Faithful, I dare say?" rejoined his patron, looking at him through his glass; "and immensely clever? Virtuous and gifted animals, whether man or beast, always are so very hideous."

"Such a dog as that, and one of the same breed, was the only living thing except me that howled that day," said Hugh. "Out of the two thousand odd—there was a larger crowd for its being a woman—the dog and I alone had any pity. If he'd have been a man, he'd have been glad to be quit of her, for she had been forced to keep him lean and half-starved; but being a dog, and not having a man's sense, he was sorry."

It was dull of the brute, certainly," said Mr. Chester, "and very like a brute."

Hugh made no rejoinder, but whistling to his dog, who sprang up at the sound and came jumping and sporting about him, bade his sympathising friend good night.

"Good night," he returned. "Remember; you're safe with me—quite safe. So long as you deserve it, my good fellow, as I hope you always will, you have a friend in me, on whose silence you may rely. Now do be careful of yourself, pray do, and consider what jeopardy you might have stood in. Good night! bless you!"

Hugh truckled before the hidden meaning of these words as much as such a being could, and crept out of the door so submissively and subserviently—with an air, in short, so different from that with which he had entered—that his patron, on being left alone, smiled more than ever.

"And yet," he said, as he took a pinch of snuff, "I do not like their having hanged his mother. The fellow has a fine eye, and I am sure she was handsome. But very probably she was coarse—red-nosed perhaps, and clumsy feet. Aye. It was all for the best, no doubt."

With this comforting reflection, he put on his coat, took a farewell glance at the glass, and summoned his man, who promptly attended, followed by a chair and its two bearers.

"Foh!" said Mr. Chester. "The very atmosphere that centaur has breathed, seems tainted with the cart and ladder. Here, Peak, bring some scent and sprinkle the floor; and take away the chair he sat upon and air it; and dash a little of that mixture upon me. I am stifled!"

The man obeyed; and the room and its master being both purified, nothing remained for Mr. Chester but to demand his hat, to fold it jauntily under his arm, to take his seat in the chair and be carried off; humming a fashionable tune.

CHAPTER XXIV.

How the accomplished gentleman spent the evening in the midst of a dazzling and brilliant circle; how he enchanted all those with whom he mingled by the grace of his deportment, the politeness of his manner, the vivacity of his conversation, and the sweetness of his voice; how it was observed in every corner, that Chester was a man of that happy disposition that nothing ruffled him, that he was one on whom the world's cares and errors sat as lightly as his dress, and in whose smiling face a calm and tranquil mind was constantly reflected; how honest men, who by instinct knew him better, bowed down before him nevertheless, deferred to his every word, and courted his favorable notice; how people, who really had good in them, went with the stream, and fawned and flattered, and approved, and despised themselves while they did so, and yet had not the courage to resist; how, in short, he was one of those who are received and cherished in society (as the phrase is) by scores who individually would shrink from and be repelled by the object of their lavish regard; are things of course which will suggest themselves. Matter so commonplace needs but a passing glance, and there an end.

The despisers of mankind—apart from the mere fools and mimics, of that creed—are of two sorts. They who believe their merit neglected and unappreciated, make up one class; they who receive adulation and flattery, knowing their own worthlessness, compose the other. Be sure that the coldest-hearted misanthropes are ever of this last order.

Mr. Chester sat up in bed next morning, sipping his coffee, and remembering with a kind of contemptuous satisfaction how he had shone last night, and how he had been caressed and courted, when his servant brought in a very small scrap of dirty paper, tightly sealed in two places, on the inside whereof was inscribed in pretty large text these words. "A friend. Desiring of a conference. Immediate. Private. Burn it when you've read it."

"Where in the name of the Gunpowder Plot did you pick up this?" said his master.

It was given him by a person then waiting at the door, the man replied.

"With a cloak and dagger?" said Mr. Chester.

With nothing more threatening about him, it appeared, than a leather apron and a dirty face. "Let him come in." In he came—Mr. Tappertit; with his hair still on end, and a great lock in his hand, which he put down on the floor in the middle of the chamber as if he were about to go through some performances in which it was a necessary agent.

"Sir," said Mr. Tappertit with a low bow, "I thank you for this condescension, and am glad to see you. Pardon the menial office in which I am engaged, sir, and extend your sympathies to one who, humble as his appearance is, has inn'ard workings far above his station."

Mr. Chester held the bed-curtain farther back, and looked at him with a vague impression that he was some maniac, who had not only broken open the door of his place of confinement, but had brought away the lock. Mr. Tappertit bowed again, and displayed his legs to the best advantage.

"You have heard, sir," said Mr. Tappertit, laying his hand upon his breast, "of G. Varden Locksmith and bell-hanger and repairs neatly executed in town and country, Clerkenwell, London?"

"What then?" asked Mr. Chester.

"I am his 'prentice, sir."

"What then?"

"Ahem!" said Mr. Tappertit. "Would you permit me to shut the door sir, and will you further, sir, give me your honour bright, that what passes between us is in the strictest confidence?"

Mr. Chester laid himself calmly down in bed again, and turning a perfectly undisturbed face toward the strange apparition, which had by this time closed the door, begged him to speak out, and to be as rational as he could, without putting himself to any very great personal inconvenience.

"In the first place sir," said Mr. Tappertit, producing a small pocket-handkerchief, and shaking it out of the folds, "as I have not a card about me (for the envy of masters debases us below that level) allow me to offer the best substitute that circumstances will admit of. If you will take that in your own hand, sir, and cast your eye on the right-hand corner," said Mr. Tappertit, offering it with a graceful air. "you will meet with my credentials."

"Thank you," answered Mr. Chester, politely accepting it, and turning to some blood-red characters at one end.—"Four. Simon Tappertit. One." Is that the—

"Without the numbers, sir, that is my name," replied the prentice. "They are merely intended as directions to the washerwoman, and have no connection with myself or family. Your name, sir," said Mr. Tappertit, looking very hard at his nightcap, "is Chester, I suppose? You need n't pull it off, sir, thank you. I observe E. C. from here. We will take the rest for granted."

"Pray, Mr. Tappertit," said Mr. Chester, "has that complicated piece of ironmongery which you have done me the favour to bring with you, any immediate connexion with the business we are to discuss?"

"It has not, sir," rejoined the 'prentice. "It's going to be fitted on a ware-us door in Thames Street."

"Perhaps, as that is the case," said Mr. Chester, "and as it has a stronger flavour of oil than I usually refresh my bedroom with, you will oblige me so far as to put it outside the door?"

"By all means, sir," said Tappertit, suiting the action to the word.

"You'll excuse my mentioning it, I hope?"

"Don't apologise, sir, I beg. And now, if you please, to business."

During the whole of this dialogue, Mr. Chester had suffered nothing but his smile of unvarying serenity and politeness to appear upon his face. Sim Tappertit, who had far too good an opinion of himself to suspect that anybody could be playing upon him, thought within himself that this was something like the respect to which he was entitled, and drew a comparison from this courteous demeanor of a stranger, by no means favorable to the worthy locksmith.

"From what passes in our house," said Mr. Tappertit, "I am aware that your son keeps company with a young lady against your inclinations. Sir, your son has not used me well."

"Mr. Tappertit," said the other, "you grieve me beyond description."

"Thank you, sir," replied the 'prentice. "I'm glad to hear you say so. He's very proud, sir, is your son; very haughty."

"I am afraid he is haughty," said Mr. Chester. Do you know I was really afraid of that before; and you confirm me?"

"To recount the menial offices I've had to do for your son, sir," said Mr. Tappertit; "the chairs I've had to hand him, the coaches I've had to call for him, the numerous degrading duties, wholly unconnected with my indenters, that I've had to do for him, would fill a family Bible. Beside which, sir, he is but a young man himself, and I do not consider 'thank'ee Sim,' a proper form of address on those occasions."

"Mr. Tappertit, your wisdom is beyond your years. Pray go on."

"I thank you for your good opinion, sir," said Sim, much gratified, "and will endeavor so to do. Now sir, on this account (and perhaps for another reason or two which I need n't go into) I am on your side. And what I tell you is this—that as long as our people go backward and forward, to and fro, up and down, to that there jolly old Maypole, lettering and messaging, and fetching and carrying, you could n't help your son keeping company with that young lady by deputy—not if he was minded night and day by all the Horse Guards, and every man of 'em in the very fullest uniform."

Mr. Tappertit stopped to take breath after this, and then started fresh again.

"Now, sir, I am coming to the point. You will inquire of me, 'how is this to be prevented?' I'll tell you how. If an honest, civil, smiling gentleman like you—"

"Mr. Tappertit—really—"

"No, no, I'm serious," rejoined the 'prentice, "I am, upon my soul. If an honest, civil, smiling gentleman like you, was to talk but ten minutes to our old woman—that's Mrs. Varden—and flatter her up a bit, you'd gain her over for ever. Then there's this point got—that her daughter Dolly,—here a flush came over Mr. Tappertit's face—"would n't be allowed to be a go-between from that time forward; and till that point's got, there's nothing ever will prevent her. Mind that."

"Mr. Tappertit, your knowledge of human nature—"

"Wait a minute," said Sim, folding his arms with a dreadful calmness. "Now I come to the point. Sir, there is a villain at that Maypole, a monster in human shape, a vagabond of the deepest dye, that unless you get rid of, and have kidnapped and carried off at the very least—nothing less will do—will marry your son to that young woman, as certainly and surely as if he was the Archbishop of Canterbury himself. He will, sir, for the hatred and malice he bears to you; let alone the pleasure of doing a bad action, which to him is its own reward. If you knew how this chap, this Joseph Willet—that's his name—comes backward and forward to our house, libelling, and denouncing, and threatening you, and how I shudder when I hear him, you'd hate him worse than I do,—worse than I do, sir," said Mr. Tappertit wildly, putting his hair up straighter, and making a crunching noise with his teeth; "if such a thing is possible."

"A little private vengeance in this, Mr. Tappertit?"

"Private vengeance, sir, or public sentiment, or both combined—destroy him," said Mr. Tappertit. "Miggs says so too. Miggs and me both say so. We can't bear the plotting and undermining that takes place. Our souls recoil from it. Barnaby Rudge and Mrs. Rudge are in it likewise; but the villain, Joseph Willet, is the ringleader. Their plottings and schemes are known to me and Miggs. If you want information of 'em, apply to us. Put Joseph Willet down, sir. Destroy him. Crush him. And be happy."

With these words, Mr. Tappertit, who seemed to expect no reply, and to hold it as a necessary consequence of his eloquence that his hearer should be utterly stunned, dumb-founded and overwhelmed, folded his arms so that the palm of each hand rested on the opposite shoulder, and disappeared after the manner of those mysterious warners of whom he had read in cheap story-books.

"That fellow," said Mr. Chester, relaxing his face when he was fairly gone, "is good practice. I have some command of my features, beyond all doubt. He fully confirms what I suspected, though; and blunt tools are sometimes found of use, where sharper instruments would fail. I fear I may be obliged to make great havoc among these worthy people. A troublesome necessity! I quite feel for them."

With that he fell into a quiet slumber:—subsided into such a gentle, pleasant sleep, that it was quite infantine.

CHAPTER XXV.

Leaving the favored, and well-received, and flattered of the world; him of the world most worldly, who never compromised himself by an ungentlemanly action and was never guilty of a manly one; to lie smilingly asleep—for even sleep, working but little change in his dissembling face, became with him a piece of cold, conventional hypocrisy—we follow in the footsteps of two slow travellers on foot, making towards Chigwell.

Barnaby and his mother. Grip in their company, of course.

The widow, to whom each painful mile seemed longer than the last, toiled wearily along; while Barnaby, yielding to every inconstant impulse, flattered here and there, now leaving her far behind, now lingering far behind himself, now darting into some by-lane or path and leaving her to pursue her way alone, until he stealthily emerged again and came upon her with a wild shout of merriment, as his wayward and capricious nature prompted. Now he would call to her from the topmost branch of some high tree by the roadside; now, using his tall staff as a leaping-pole, come flying over ditch or hedge or five-barred gate; now run with surprising swiftness for a mile or more on the straight road, and halting, sport upon a patch of grass with Grip till she came up. These were his delights; and when his patient mother heard his merry voice, or looked into his flushed and healthy face, she would not have abated them by one sad word or murmur, though each had been to her a source of suffering in the same degree as it was to him of pleasure.

It is something to look upon enjoyment, so that it be free and wild and in the face of nature; though it is but the enjoyment of an idiot. It is something to know that Heaven has left the capacity of gladness in such a creature's breast; it is something to be assured that, however lightly men may crush that faculty in their fellows, the Great Creator of mankind imparts it even to his despised and slighted work. Who would not rather see a poor idiot happy in the sunlight, than a wise man pining in a darkened jail!

Ye men of gloom and austerity, who paint the face of Infinite Benevolence with an eternal frown; read in the Everlasting Book, wide open to your view, the lesson it would teach. Its pictures are not in black and sombre hues, but bright and glowing tints; its music—save when ye drown it—is not in sighs and groans, but songs and cheerful sounds. Listen to the million voices in the summer air, and find one dismal as your own. Remember, if ye can, the sense of hope and pleasure which every glad return of day awakens in the breast of all your kind who have not changed their nature; and learn some wisdom even from the witless, when their hearts are lifted up they know not why, by all the mirth and happiness it brings.

The widow's breast was full of care, was laden heavily with secret dread and sorrow; but her boy's gaiety of heart gladdened her, and beguiled the long journey. Sometimes he would bid her lean upon his arm, and would keep beside her steadily for a short distance; but it was more his nature to be rambling to and fro, and she better liked to see him free and happy, even than to have him near her, because she loved him better than herself.

She had quitted the place to which they were travelling, directly after the event which had changed her whole existence; and for two-and-twenty years had never had courage to revisit it. It was her native village. How many recollections crowded on her mind when it appeared in sight!

Two-and-twenty years. Her boy's whole life and history. The last time she looked back upon those roofs among the trees, she carried him in her arms, an infant. How often since that time had she sat beside him night and day, watching for the dawn of mind that never came; how had she feared, and doubted, and yet hoped, long after conviction forced itself upon her! The little stratagems she had devised to try him, the little tokens he had given in his childish way—not of dullness but of something infinitely worse, so ghastly and unchild-like in its cunning—came back as vividly as if but yesterday had intervened. The room in which they used to be; the spot in which his cradle stood; he, old and elfin-like in face, but ever dear to her, gazing at her with a wild and vacant eye, and crooning some uncouth song as she sat by and rocked him; every circumstance of his infancy came thronging back, and the most trivial, perhaps, the most distinctly.

His older childhood, too; the strange imaginings he had; his terror of certain senseless things—familiar objects he endowed with life; the slow and gradual breaking out of that one horror, in which, before his birth, his darkened intellect began; how, in the midst of all, she had found some hope and comfort in his being unlike another child, and had gone on almost believing in the slow development of his mind until he grew a man, and then his childhood was complete and lasting; one after another, all these old thoughts sprang up within her, strong after their long slumber and bitterer than ever.

She took his arm and they hurried through the village street. It was the same as it was wont to be in old times, yet different too, and wore another air. The change was in herself, not it; but she never thought of that, and wondered at its alteration, and where it lay, and what it was.

The people all knew Barnaby, and the children of the place came flocking round him—as she remembered to have done with their fathers and mothers round some silly beggarman, when a child herself. None of them knew her; they passed each well-remembered house, and yard, and homestead; and striking into the fields, were soon alone again.

The Warren was the end of their journey. Mr. Haredale was walking in the garden, and seeing them as they passed the iron-grate, unlocked it, and bade them enter that way.

"At length you have mustered heart to visit the old place," he said to the widow. "I am glad you have."

"For the first time, and the last, sir," she replied.

"The first for many years, but not the last."

"The very last."

"You mean," said Mr. Haredale, regarding her with surprise, "that having made this effort, you are resolved not to persevere, and are determined to relapse? This is unworthy of you. I have often told you, you should return here. You would be happier here than elsewhere, I know. As to Barnaby, it's quite his home."

"And Grip's," said Barnaby, holding the basket open. The raven hopped gravely out, and perching on his shoulder and addressing himself to Mr. Haredale, cried—as a hint, perhaps, that some temperate refreshment would be agreeable—"Polly put the kettle on, we'll all have tea!"

"Hear me, Mary," said Mr. Haredale kindly, as he motioned her to walk with him toward the house. "Your life has been an example of patience and fortitude, except in this one particular, which has given me great pain. It is enough to know that you were cruelly involved in the calamity which deprived me of an only brother, and Emma of her father, without being obliged to suppose (as I sometimes am) that you associate us with the author of our joint misfortunes."

"Associate you with him, sir!" she cried.

"Indeed," said Mr. Haredale, "I think you do. I almost believe that because your husband was bound by so many ties to our relation, and died in his service and defence, you have come in some sort to connect us with his murder."

"Alas!" she answered. "You little know my heart, sir. You little know the truth!"

"It is natural you should do so; it is very probable you may, without being conscious of it," said Mr. Haredale, speaking more to himself than her. "We are a fallen house. Money, dispensed with a most lavish hand, would be a poor recompense for sufferings like yours; and thinly scattered by hands so pinched and tied as ours, it becomes a miserable mockery. I feel it so, God knows," he added, hastily. "Why should I wonder if she does?"

"You do me wrong, dear sir, indeed," she rejoined with great earnestness; "and yet when you come to hear what I desire your leave to say—"

"I shall find my doubts confirmed!" he said, observing that she faltered and became confused. "Well!"

He quickened his pace for a few steps, but fell back again to her side.

"And have you come all this way at last, solely to speak to me?"

She answered, "Yes."

"A curse," he muttered, "upon the wretched state of us proud beggars, from whom the poor and rich are equally at a distance; the one being forced to treat us with a show of cold respect; the other condescending to us in their every deed and word, and keeping more aloof, the nearer they approach us. Why, if it were pain to you, (as it must have been) to break for this slight purpose the chain of habit forged through two-and-twenty years, could you not let me know your wish, and beg to come to you?"

"There was not time, sir," she rejoined. "I took my resolution but last night, and taking it, felt that I must not lose a day—a day! an hour—in having speech with you."

They had by this time reached the house. Mr. Haredale paused for a moment, and looked at her as if surprised by the energy of her manner. Observing, however, that she took no heed to him, but glanced up, shuddering, at the old walls with which such horrors were connected in her mind, he led her by a private stair into his library, where Emma was seated at a window, reading.

The young lady, seeing who approached, hastily rose, and laid aside her book, and with many kind words, and not without tears, gave her a warm and earnest welcome. But the widow shrunk from her embrace as though she feared her, and sank down trembling on a chair.

"It is the return to this place after so long an absence," said Emma, gently. "Praying, dear uncle—or stay—Barnaby will run himself and ask for wine—"

"Not for the world," she cried. "It would have another taste—I could not touch it. I want but a minute's rest. Nothing but that."

Miss Haredale stood beside her chair, regarding her with silent pity. She remained for a little time quite still; then rose and turned to Mr. Haredale, who had sat down in his easy chair, and was contemplating her with fixed attention.

The tale connected with the mansion borne in mind, it seemed, as has been already said, the chosen theatre for such a deed as it had known. The room in which this group were now assembled—hard by the very chamber in which the act was done—dull, dark, and sombre; heavy with worm-eaten books; deadened and shut in by faded hangings, muffling every sound; shadowed mournfully by trees whose rustling boughs gave ever and anon a spectral knocking at the glass; wore, beyond all others in the house, a ghastly, gloomy air. Nor were the group assembled there, unfitting tenants of the spot. The widow, with her marked and startling face and downcast eyes; Mr. Haredale stern and despondent as ever; his niece beside him, like, yet most unlike, the picture of her father, which gazed reproachfully down upon them from the blackened wall; Barnaby, with his vacant look and restless eye; were all in keeping with the place, and actors in the legend. Nay, the very raven, who had hopped upon the table and with the air of some old necromancer appeared to be profoundly studying a great folio volume that lay open on a desk, was strictly in unison with the rest, and looked like the embodied spirit of evil biding his time of mischief.

"I scarcely know," said the widow, breaking silence, "how to begin. You will think my mind disordered."

"The whole tenor of your quiet and reproachless life since you were last here," returned Mr. Haredale, mildly, "shall bear witness for you. Why do you fear to awaken such a suspicion? You do not speak to strangers. You have not to claim our interest or consideration for the first time. Be more yourself. Take heart. Any advice or assistance that I can give you, you know is yours of right, and freely yours."

"What if I came, sir," she rejoined, "I, who have but one other friend on earth, to reject your aid from this moment, and to say that henceforth I launch myself upon the world, alone and unassisted, to sink or swim as Heaven may decree!"

"You would have, if you came to me for such a purpose," said Mr. Haredale calmly, "some reason to assign for conduct so extraordinary, which—if one may entertain the possibility of anything so wild and strange—would have its weight of course."

"That, sir," she answered, "is the misery of my distress. I can give no reason whatever. My own bare word is all that I can offer. It is my duty my imperative and bounden duty. If I did not discharge it, I should be a base and guilty wretch. Having said that, my lips are sealed, and I can say no more."

As though she felt relieved at having said so much, and had nerved herself to the remainder of her task, she spoke from this time with a firmer voice and heightened courage.

"Heaven is my witness, as my own heart is—and yours, dear young lady, will speak for me, I know—that I have lived, since that time we all have bitter reason to remember, in unchanging devotion, and gratitude to this family. Heaven is my witness that go where I may, I shall preserve those feelings unimpaired. And it is my witness, too, that they alone impel me to the course I must take, and from which nothing now shall turn me, as I hope for mercy."

"These are strange riddles," said Mr. Haredale.

"In this world, sir," she replied, "they may, perhaps, never be explained. In another, the Truth will be discovered in its own good time. And may that time," she added in a low voice, "be far distant!"

"Let me be sure," said Mr. Haredale, "that I understand you, for I am doubtful of my own senses. Do you mean that you are resolved voluntarily to deprive yourself of those means of support you have received from us so long—that you are determined to resign the annuity we settled on you twenty years ago—to leave house, and home, and goods, and begin life anew—and this, for some secret reason or monstrous fancy which is incapable of explanation, which only now exists, and has been dormant all this time? In the name of God, under what delusion are you laboring?"

"As I am deeply thankful," she made answer, "for the kindness of those, alive and dead, who owned this house; and as I would not have its roof fall down and crush me, or its very walls drip blood, my name being spoken in their hearing; I never will again subsist upon their bounty, or let it help me to subsistence. You do not know," she added, suddenly, "to what uses it may be applied; into what hands it may pass. I do, and I renounce it."

"Surely," said Mr. Haredale, "its uses rest with you."

"They did. They rest with me no longer. It may be—it is—devoted to purposes that mock the dead in their graves. It never can prosper with me. It will bring some other heavy judgment on the head of my dear son, whose innocence will suffer for his mother's guilt."

"What words are these!" cried Mr. Haredale, regarding her with wonder. "Among what associates have you fallen? Into what guilt have you ever been betrayed?"

"I am guilty yet innocent; wrong, yet right; good in intention, though constrained to shield and aid the bad. Ask me no more questions, sir; but believe that I am rather to be pitied than condemned. I must leave my house tomorrow, for while I stay there, it is haunted. My future dwelling, if I am to live in peace, must be a secret. If my poor boy should ever stray this way, do not tempt him to disclose it or have him watched when he returns; for if we are hunted, we must fly again. And now this load is off my mind, I beseech you—and you, dear Miss Haredale, too—to trust me if you can, and think of me kindly as you used to do. If I die and cannot tell my secret even then (for that may come pass), it will sit the lighter on my breast in that hour for this day's work; and on that day, and every day until it comes, I will pray for and thank you both, and trouble you no more."

With that she would have left them, but they detained her, and with many soothing words and kind entreaties besought her to consider what she did, and above all to repose more freely upon them, and say what weighed so sorely on her mind. Finding her deaf to their persuasions, Mr. Haredale suggested as a last resource, that she should confide in Emma, of whom, as a young person and one of her own sex, she might stand in less dread than of himself. From this proposal, however, she recoiled with the same indescribable repugnance she had manifested when they met. The utmost that could be wrung from her was, a promise that she would receive Mr. Haredale at her own house next evening, and in the meantime re-consider her determination and their dissuasions—though any change on her part, as she told them, was quite hopeless. This condition made at last, they reluctantly suffered her to depart, since she would neither eat nor drink within the house; and she and Barnaby, and Grip, accordingly went out as they had come, by the private stair and garden gate; seeing and being seen by no one by the way.

It was remarkable in the raven that during the whole interview he had kept his eye on his book with exactly the air of a very sly human rascal, who, under the mask of pretending to read hard, was listening to everything. He still appeared to have the conversation very strongly in his mind, for although, when they were alone again, he issued orders for the instant preparation of innumerable kettles for purposes of tea, he was thoughtful, and rather seemed to do so from an abstract sense of duty, than with any regard to making himself agreeable, or being what is commonly called good company.

They were to return by the coach. As there was an interval of full two hours before it started, and they needed rest and some refreshment, Barnaby begged hard for a visit to the Maypole. But his mother, who had no wish to be recognized by any of those who had known her long ago, and who feared that Mr. Haredale might, on second thoughts, despatch some messenger to that place of entertainment in quest of her, proposed to wait in the churchyard instead. As it was easy for Barnaby to buy and carry thither such humble viands as they required, he cheerfully assented, and in the churchyard they sat down to take their frugal dinner.

Here again, the raven was in a highly reflective state; walking up and down when he had dined, with an air of elderly complacency which was strongly suggestive of his having his hands under his coat-tails; and appearing to read the tombstones with a very critical taste. Sometimes, after a long inspection of an epitaph, he would strop his beak upon the grave to which it referred, and cry in his hoarse tones, "I'm a devil, I'm a devil, I'm a devil!" but whether he addressed his observations to any supposed persons below, or merely threw them off as a general remark, is matter of uncertainty.

It was a quiet pretty spot, but a sad one for Barnaby's mother; for Mr. Reuben Haredeale lay there, and near the vault in which his ashes rested, was a stone to the memory of her own husband, with a brief inscription recording how and when he lost his life. She sat here, thoughtful and apart, until their time was out, and the distant horn told that the coach was coming.

Barnaby, who had been sleeping on the grass, sprung up quickly at the sound; and Grip, who appeared to understand it equally well, walked into his basket straightway, entreating society in general (as though he intended a kind of satire upon them in connection with churchyards) never to say die on any terms. They were soon on the coach-top and rolling along the road.

It went round by the Maypole and stopped by the door. Joe was from home, and Hugh came sluggishly out to hand up the parcel it called for. There was no fear of old John coming out. They could see him from the coach-roof fast asleep in his cosy bar. It was a part of John's character. He made a point of going to sleep at the coach's time. He despised gadding about; he looked upon coaches as things that ought to be indicted; as disturbers of the peace of mankind; as restless, bustling, busy, horn-blowing contrivances, quite beneath the dignity of men, and only suited to giddy girls that did nothing but chatter and go a-shopping. "We know nothing about coaches here, sir," John would say, if an unlucky stranger made inquiry touching the offensive vehicles; "we do n't book for 'em; we'd rather not; they're more trouble than they're worth, with their noise and rattle. If you like to wait for 'em you can; but we do n't know any thing about 'em; they may call and they may not—there's a carrier—he was looked upon as quite good enough when I was a boy."

She dropped her veil as Hugh climbed up, and while he hung behind, and talked to Barnaby in whispers. But neither he nor any other person spoke to her, or noticed her, or had any curiosity about her; and so, an alien, she visited and left the village where she had been born, and had lived a merry child, a comely girl, a happy wife—where she had known all her enjoyment of life, and had entered on its hardest sorrows.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"And you're not surprised to hear this, Varden?" said Mr. Haredeale. "Well! You and she have always been the best friends, and you should understand her if anybody does."

"I ask your pardon, sir," rejoined the locksmith. "I did n't say I understood her. I would n't have the presumption to say that of any woman. It's not so easily done. But I am not so much surprised, sir, as you expected me to be, certainly."

"May I ask why not, my good friend?"

"I have seen, sir," returned the locksmith with evident reluctance, "I have seen in connexion with her, something that has filled me with distrust and uneasiness. She has made bad friends; how, or when, I do n't know; but that her house is a refuge for one robber and cut-throat at least, I am certain. There, sir! Now it's out."

"Varden!"

"My own eyes, sir, are my witnesses, and for her sake I would be willingly half-blind, if I could but have the pleasure of mistrusting 'm. I have kept the secret till now, and it will go no further than yourself, I know; but I tell you that with my own eyes—broad awake—I saw, in the passage of her house one evening after dark, the highwayman who robbed and wounded Mr. Edward Chester, and on the same night threatened me."

"And you made no effort to detain him?" said Mr. Haredeale quickly.

"Sir," returned the locksmith, "she herself prevented me—held me, with all her strength, and hung about me until he had got clear off. And having gone so far, he related circumstantially all that had passed upon the night in question."

This dialogue was held in a low tone in the locksmith's parlor, into which honest Gabriel had shown his visitor on his arrival. Mr. Haredeale had called upon him to entreat his company to the widow's that he might have the assistance of his persuasion and influence; and out of this circumstance the conversation had arisen.

"I forbore," said Gabriel, "from repeating one word of this to anybody, as it could do her no good and might do her great harm. I thought and hoped, to say the truth, that she would come to me, and talk to me about it, and told me how it was; but though I have purposely put myself in her way more than once or twice, she never touched upon the subject—except by a look, more than could have been put into a great many words. It said among other matters 'Do n't ask me anything' so imploringly, that I did n't ask her anything. You'll think me an old fool I know, sir. If it's any relief to call me one, pray do."

"I am greatly disturbed by what you tell me," said Mr. Haredeale, after a silence. "What meaning do you attach to it?"

The locksmith shook his head doubtfully out of the window at the falling light.

"She cannot have married again," Mr. Haredeale.

"Not without our knowledge surely, sir."

"She may have done so, in the fear that it would lead, if known, to some objection or estrangement. Suppose she married incautiously—it is not improbable, for her existence has been a lonely and monotonous one for many years—and the man turned out a ruffian, she would be anxious to screen him, and yet would revolt from his crimes. This might be. It bears strongly on the whole drift of her discourse yesterday, and would quite explain her conduct. Do you suppose Barnaby is privy to these circumstances?"

"Quite impossible to say, sir," returned the locksmith, shaking his head again: "and next to impossible to find out from him. If what you suppose is really the case, I tremble for the lad—a notable person, sir, to put to bad uses."

"It is not possible, Varden," said Mr. Haredeale, in a still lower tone of voice than he had spoken yet, "that we have been blinded and deceived by this woman from the beginning? It is not possible that this connexion was formed in her husband's lifetime, and led to his and my brother's—"

"Good God, sir," said Gabriel, interrupting him, "do n't entertain such dark thoughts for a moment. Five-and-twenty years ago, where was there a girl like her? A gay, handsome, laughing, bright-eyed damsel! Think what she was, sir. It makes my heart ache now, even now, though I'm an old man with a woman for a daughter, to think what she was, and what she is. We all change, but that's with Time; Time does his work honestly, and I do n't mind him. A fig for Time, sir. Use him well, and he's a hearty fellow, and scorns to have you at a disadvantage. But care and suffering (and those have changed her) are devils, sir—secret, undermining devils—who tread down the brightest flowers in Eden, and do more havoc in a month than Time does in a year. Picture to yourself for one minute what Mary was before they went to work with her fresh heart and face—do her that justice, and say whether such a thing is possible."

"You're a good fellow, Varden," said Mr. Haredeale. "and are quite right. I have brooded on that subject so long, that every breath of suspicion carries me back to it. You are quite right."

"It is n't, sir," cried the locksmith with brightened eyes, and sturdy, honest voice; "it is n't because I courted her before Rudge, and failed, that I say she was too good for him. She would have been as much too good for me. But she was too good for him; he wasn't free and frank enough for her. I don't reproach his memory with it, poor fellow; I only want to put her before you as she really was. For myself, I'll keep her old picture in my mind; and thinking of that, and what has altered her, I'll stand her friend and try to win her back to peace. And damme, sir," cried Gabriel, "with your pardon for the word, I'd do the same, if she had married fifty highwaymen in a twelvemonth; and think it in the Protestant Manual too, though Martha said it was n't, tooth and nail, till doomsday!"

If the dark little parlor had been filled with a dense fog, which, clearing away in an instant, left it all radiance and brightness, it could not have been more suddenly cheered than by this outbreak on the part of the locksmith. In a voice nearly as full and round as his own, Mr. Haredeale cried "Well said!" and bade him come away without more parley. The locksmith complied right willingly; and both getting into a hackney-coach which was waiting at the door, drove off straightway.

They alighted at the street corner, and dismissing their conveyance, walked to the house. To their first knock at the door there was no response. A second met with the like result. But in answer to the third, which was of a more vigorous kind, the parlor window sash was gently raised, and a musical voice cried:

"Haredeale, my dear fellow, I am extremely glad to see you. How very much you have improved in your appearance since our last meeting! I never saw you looking better. How do you do?"

Mr. Haredeale turned his eyes towards the casement whence the voice proceeded, though there was no need to do so, to recognize the speaker, and Mr. Chester waved his hand and smiled a courteous welcome.

"The door will be opened immediately," he said. "There is nobody but a very dilapidated female to perform such offices. You will excuse her infirmities? If she were in a more elevated station of society, she would be gouty. Being but a hewer of wood and a drawer of water, she is rheumatic. My dear Haredeale, these are natural class distinctions, depend upon it."

Mr. Haredeale, whose face resumed its lowering and distrustful look the moment he heard the voice, inclined his head stiffly, and turned his back upon the speaker.

"Not opened yet!" said Mr. Chester. "Dear me! I hope the aged soul has not caught her foot in some unlucky cobweb by the way. She is there at last! Come in, I beg!"

Mr. Haredeale entered, followed by the locksmith. Turning with a look of great astonishment to the old woman who had opened the door, he inquired for Mrs. Rudge—for Barnaby. They were both gone, she replied, wagging her ancient head, for good. There was a gentleman in the parlor, who perhaps could tell them more. That was all she knew.

"Pray, sir," said Mr. Haredeale, presenting himself before this new tenant, "where is the person whom I came here to see?"

"My dear friend," he returned, "I have not the least idea."

"Your trifling is ill-timed," retorted the other in a suppressed tone and voice, "and its subject ill-chosen. Reserve it for those who are your friends, and do not expend it on me. I lay no claim to the distinction, and have the self-denial to reject it."

"My dear, good sir," said Mr. Chester, "you are heated with walking. Sit down, I beg. Our friend is—"

"Is but a plain honest man," returned Mr. Haredeale, "and quite unworthy of your notice."

"Gabriel Varden by name, sir," said the locksmith bluntly.

"A worthy English yeoman!" said Mr. Chester. "A most worthy yeoman, of whom I have frequently heard my son Ned—darling fellow—speak, and have often wished to see. Varden, my good friend, I am glad to know you. You wonder now," he said, turning languidly to Mr. Haredeale, "to see me here. Now, I am sure you do."

Mr. Haredeale glanced at him—not fondly or admiringly—smiled, and held his peace.

"The mystery is solved in a moment," said Mr. Chester; "in a moment. Will you step aside with me one instant. You remember our little compact in reference to Ned, and your dear niece, Haredeale? You remember the list of asstants in their innocent intrigue? You remember these two people being among them? My dear fellow, congratulate yourself, and me. I have bought them off."

"You have done what?" said Mr. Haredeale.

"Bought them off," returned his smiling friend. "I have found it necessary to take some active steps toward setting this boy and girl attachment quite at rest, and have begun by removing these two agents. You are surprised? Who can withstand the influence of a little money! They wanted it, and have been bought off. We have nothing more to fear from them. They are gone."

"Gone!" echoed Mr. Haredeale. "Where?"

"My dear fellow—and you must permit me to say again, that you never looked so young; so positively boyish as you do to-night—the Lord knows where; I believe Columbus himself wouldn't find them. Between you and me they have their hidden reasons, but upon that point I have pledged myself to secrecy. She appointed to see you here to-night I know, but found it inconvenient, and could n't wait. Here is the key of the door. I am afraid you'll find it inconveniently large; but as the tenement is yours, your good-nature will excuse that, Haredeale, I am certain!"

DEER-STALKING IN INDIA.

THE glare of a tropical sun-rise was brightening up a gloomy amphitheatre of hills on the skirts of that eternal forest which forms a barrier between the barren table land of the Deccan and the palm-fringed coast of Koman, when a dark figure was seen galloping along the path which led to the jungle. The noise of the horse's hoofs roused a party of natives, who were squatting in a circle round a fire in front of a ruined hut. One long whiff was inhaled by each of the group from the humble hookah that had been passing round the party, and every man starting up, arranged his turban, and salaamed to the earth as a tall gaunt European dismounted from a panting Arab. Exposure to the sun had bronzed his features nearly to the tint of their own complexions, and black mustaches gave a still more Asiatic character to the weather-beaten features of the exiled sportsman. Gaiters of deerskins, and belt of a tiger's hide, from which hung an Affghau knife, would have told the nature of his pursuits, if the dress of dark green had not already betrayed the deer-stalker. A hunting cap of green velvet, indented by repeated falls, completed his unbecoming, but characteristic costume. Without a word being spoken, a heavy double rifle was handed to him by a peon, and loaded with the utmost care, much to the edification of a band of half-naked beaters, armed with clubs and hatchets, who watched every motion with a grin of savage delight. Till the balls were hammered home, not a word was uttered; and then silence was first broken by one brief question in Hindustanee, addressed to the leader of the band—

"Any news of the wandering tiger?"

"The big thief would not come to eat your highness's bullets yesterday, but the star of your fate is great, and she will be in the toils of the hunter before night, God willing; Burmah and the other shikarees are now watching the path where she comes down every day."

"Very good; we must not disturb that part of the jungle; send the people to mark on the high ground any herds that may be returning from feed, and if I cannot track up a deer before I reach them, we can have a beat in the large ravines."

So saying, the deer-stalker strode down the hill, followed by one attendant, who quickly exchanged his white-cotton frock and gaudy turban for a head dress of leaves and a pair of short brown drawers, leaving the rest of his person naked. There was nothing at first sight remarkable in the lean, wiry figure of the Mussulman, who followed his master with a noiseless tread that hardly rustled the fallen leaves. But look at him again, and you can trace in the springy step and a restless eagle-eye that glanced keenly at every bush, one whose life had been spent among the beasts of the forest. He had been promoted to the rank of Jemmadax of Blice, (equivalent to a sergeant), for the courage he displayed by rushing in single-handed, and cutting down a wounded tiger which had seized one of the beaters at a hunting party; and he was now the favorite attendant of the eccentric sportsman who had witnessed and rewarded his gallantry.

The cold damp mist was rising like wreaths of smoke from every valley, and the bushes wet with the dews of night, showered down their sparkling drops as they brushed by. The jackal's long-protracted howl, as he sneaked like a felon to his den at the approach of day; the merry carol of the shrill-voiced jungle fowl, welcomed the rising sun; and the clear wild scream of the painted partridge from his roost before he alighted, rung in their varied notes through the jungle. The grating cry of the toucan, spreading his piebald wings before the breeze, mingled with the glad notes of the brilliant mina of the ghauts, while he sat smoothing his ruffled plumage for his first flight. Troops of monkeys alternately chattered, and raising that howl which Cole-ridge says he can compare only to the din of iron bars rattling up Fleet street; the wail of one hundred bagpipes playing at once, and the silly laughter of a crowd of drunken men. The jungle seemed to teem with life, and the whole was calculated to raise the spirits even of those whose ear was daily accustomed to listen to and discriminate the cry of every inhabitant of the forest. A sound far more welcome to his ears, the sharp bark of the axis deer, raised its voice with the others, and hearing it approach, both dropped, and knelt listening behind a tree, like figures carved from the rock, till the patter of feet approaching became distinctly audible. In another instant a spotted buck stood before them, clearing a path through the cover with his spreading antlers. The long rifle was slowly raised; for one second it rested motionless on the sinewy hand; the trigger was pressed, and a soft plash followed the sharp crack of the fatal tube.

"Within an inch of his elbow," muttered the Englishman.

"The Sahab has made him eat a good ball!" shouted the Mussulman; and both rushed to the spot where the buck, after springing into the air, staggered with the life-blood welling from his side into the thickest part of the bamboo-jungle. The trail was plain, and the Mussulman followed it up with the ardor of a bloodhound, till the traces from single drops became splashes of frothy crimson, and the wounded deer was seen struggling to force his tottering frame through the interwoven cover. Again the grooved bore sent its deadly contents with fatal precision, and the buck dropped lifeless, hit between the ears. With the ferocity of a beast of prey throwing itself on its victim, the excited peon dashed at his game, eager to offer up his brief prayer, and bleed the deer, still kicking in his last agonies, ere life was quite extinct. He was just in time, and after breaking the deer, the two proceeded on their beat in silence, examining every spot where there were traces of game having harbored, either from the nibbled branches, or the broken bark against which the bucks had been rubbing their horns.

Some miles were traversed without meeting a recent trail. A jungle dog would occasionally trot across their path, giving an inquiring look, more of curiosity than fear, at the intruders; and small game of all sorts, from the peafowl to the quail, rose before them unheeded. The sun was now high enough to make objects visible on the dark background, where but a few minutes ago nothing could be distinguished amidst the maze of impenetrable jungle. On a bare peak about a mile distant, the eye of the Mussulman had been riveted for several minutes, and he now extended his lean black arm toward it, with a look that spoke more expressively than words. A spy-glass was unslung, and a minute survey taken in silence, during which a group of deer was clearly distinguished feeding upon the high summit. Their position rendered all attempts to approach them useless; they were watched for some time in hopes of their moving to a more favorable situation. At least an hour elapsed before any change in their situation afforded a chance of success; when a doe, wandering with her fawn on the plain below toward a favorite nullah, enticed them to join her. As the two men were unseen by any of the herd, a run was now made to intercept them before they could reach the cover. By the time they had gained a narrow neck of land commanding the pass, none of them were visible; but a panting dog returning from the ravine, sufficiently explained the reason. The sportsman therefore returned to one of the look-out men, posted on a rising ground which overlooked the whole jungle, to ascertain if the deer had passed. Their line was immediately telegraphed to one of the deep valleys where they were certain to lay up; and here a beat was arranged with that skill which a knowledge of the country and the habits of the animal, and the experience of years, in all that related to woodcraft, rendered almost certain of succeeding. The deer, after one attempt to break back, passed at a canter within seventy yards of the post where the unerring rifle-shot was concealed behind a fence of leaves. A noble buck which led the herd was selected, and the ball told with that dull sound so welcome to the sportsman's ear. The buck, struck behind the shoulder, staggered a few paces, and dropped in a small nullah, where he lay kicking till the knife of his pursuer ended his struggles.

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1841.

OUR NEW VOLUME.—The third volume of the Quarto edition of the New World will commence the first week in July. It is now the time for new subscribers to send in their names. Let it be remembered that $5 a year in advance will procure two copies for a year or one copy for two years; and that six dollars sent in advance will procure the same number of copies together with a beautiful copy of SEAR'S PICTORIAL BIBLE.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.—This document which was delivered to Congress at 12 o'clock on Tuesday, reached New-York in the surprisingly short time of nine hours and thirty-three minutes.

We are disappointed in this message. Its brevity is its great merit; and really it is no inconsiderable one: its style too, in a literary point of view, is very respectable. But its political character is very equivocal. It is of the non-committal school. No one can tell whether the author is for or against a National Bank: what, in his opinion, is the proper way to liquidate the public debt of eleven millions: and even the war question is left in a fog. As for the Bankrupt Law—certainly one of the most important subjects before the people for years—it is not even referred to. The Treasury and the Post Office are in a different situation from what the late heads of those Departments have, severally, represented.

In short, the Message, if intended as a show-off for popular effect and to gain any sort of reputation or respect with the people, is in all respects a failure—more so than any message that we remember ever to have read.

The deep regrets which we felt, in common with our fellow-citizens of both parties, at the loss of President Harrison, have been keenly revived by this "one sin of omission," in the Message of President Tyler. The subject of a NATIONAL BANKRUPT LAW—a subject upon which a strong, pervading, enduring interest is felt, from one extreme of the country to the other—is passed over in silence. This is disrespectful, if not contemptuous toward the people of the United States, nine-tenths of whom have loudly demanded the passage of this law. Perhaps Mr. Tyler is as ignorant of this fact as he declares himself to be of the wishes of the people touching the establishment of a Bank of the U. S. He thinks that the people, in the late elections, very determinately expressed their disapprobation of the Sub-treasury scheme, but omitted to signify their wishes concerning the manner in which the financial affairs of the country should be conducted. How could they do so? It was impossible. But there was a point, about which the people were sufficiently explicit—and if Mr. Tyler be ignorant of this fact, he had better set about informing himself as speedily as possible. At the late Presidential contest, thousands—yes, hundreds of thousands of votes were cast for the Harrison and Tyler electors, because it was stated again and again that the Whigs would insure to the country a National Bankrupt Law—would cause us to hear the joyous clang of chains—"joyous," to use the language of Mr. Webster, "because heard falling from the limbs of men."

There is no manner of doubt upon our minds that had Mr. Van Buren boldly declared himself in favor of this law, and urged on his party to effect its passage, he would have been, in spite of the financial troubles of the country, re-elected. This may seem a sweeping assertion; but let us look a little into the matter. Suppose that the bankrupts of this State had not voted for Harrison, (and that they did vote for him expressly on this question can be demonstrated,) where would have been his majority? Why, from this city alone a petition was last winter sent to Congress signed with the names of FOURTEEN THOUSAND voters. There are more than a hundred thousand bankrupts in this State. Suppose that these men had been forewarned that, in the very first message which would be transmitted by a Whig President to a Whig Congress, not the remotest allusion would be made to a National Bankrupt Law—would not six thousand of that number have refused to vote with the Whigs? Suppose, moreover, that Mr. Van Buren had avowed himself determined to effect the passage of such a law, would not six thousand others, from the great crowd of bankrupt voters, have sustained him, in spite of his Sub-Treasury? Where, then, where would have been the vote of New-York? Yes! the votes of the Bankrupts carried this State for the Whig candidates. Let this Extra Session refuse to listen to these petitions and "give the go by" to this law; and the fall elections will speak to the Whig leaders and the Whig President in tones that Mr. Tyler will be able to interpret without resorting to the Representatives of the People.

Maine, which went with the Whigs by a small majority, was carried by the Bankrupts; Michigan was carried by the Bankrupts; Pennsylvania was carried by the Bankrupts; Mississippi was carried "all hollow" by the Bankrupts. Had Mr. Van Buren favored the law; had it been passed and signed by him, he would have received the votes of all these States, as easily as the Whigs will lose them if they shut their ears to the demands of the people. The votes of these States, added to those which he received, would have given Mr. Van Buren one hundred and forty-nine votes in the Electoral College.

The importance of a National Bankrupt Law, as an instrument of political power, as an element of political feeling, has been strangely overlooked by both parties. But it has been a question of inappreciable interest to large classes of men in every section of the country; it has influenced their suffrages to a great extent, and it will soon control them. It must control them, if it be utterly impossible to get anything done by Congress for the good of the country, unless it be turned into a party question. But the attempt will be made with the most strenuous and determined energy. The scenes of the last winter and the winter previous will be acted over again. Petitions after petitions will be poured, like a deluge, upon both houses of Congress; and it is not an improbable thing that a majority of the names of all the voters in the United States will be signed to them—computing their number by that cast in the last Presidential election. It will then be seen whether the Representatives will have the effrontery to neglect this subject, to imitate the example of the President and treat it with contemptuous silence. If the repeated commands of the people, our unmistakeable will, is to be regarded in this way, we had better relinquish the democratic element of our Government and choose an aristocracy at once.

A CANDIDATE FOR THE PRESIDENCY.—It seems determined by certain political schemers to give us a succession of Military and Naval Heroes for President. We have hitherto taken the flower of the Army and now we are to be made glorious by a coronation from the Navy Department. The individual pitched upon with no tardy resolution, is Commodore Charles Stewart; and the "Old Ironsides Club" in Philadelphia, have written him a letter nominating him for the Presidency, and he has answered it accepting the nomination, because—poor man! he "conceives that it is not the part of patriotism to shun any duty which may be required by his fellow-citizens," and not because he "either seeks or desires it. Well now! that is complying, certainly, and, moreover, it presents an edifying spectacle to the view of mankind—it is a touch of the moral sublime! A second Cesar puts away a second crown offered to him by a second—no, not by a second Antony, but by the Old Ironsides Club. The parallel cannot be called exact, for Cesar in this instance accepts the crown, though with the most magnificent and dignified reluctance—a reluctance more positive if possible, than that of a coy young damsel, who, however much she is dying to get married, avows that she would not be otherwise than single on any earthly consideration.

We are delighted with the modesty of the Commodore; it is as great as his magnanimity, which is surpassed only by his courage. Now if modesty, magnanimity and courage be not deemed qualifications sufficient for a candidate for the Presidency, we should like to know what are? It has been learnedly and frequently observed that the first step toward knowledge is a saving conviction of our ignorance. Now, why not make the first approaches to glory in the same way? The Commodore does; for he independently asserts that he is "filled with the most profound sense of his own deficiencies;" and this cannot be all that he is filled with, for he lets out a profusion of statesman-like reflections that overwhelm the understanding, while they dazzle the imagination.

He entertains the recondite and very novel opinion that "In the Constitution of the United States, will be found every essential rule for the guidance of those who may be designated by the people to carry out its principles." He would have a strict construction of that instrument and thinks, "If this fundamental principle [what fundamental principle?] be deviated from, each part of the Constitution may be successfully invaded, until the intent of the framers will gradually disappear, and every original landmark be forever obscured in the dark and bewildering mazes of a latitudinous construction." Now there is a flourish of rhetoric here and a Johnsonian fullness of expression and rotundity of language that one would hardly expect from a bluff sailor, the like of whom, as is set down by those faithful chroniclers the novelists, generally indulge in phrases such as "shiver my timbers! damn my eyes!" and other elegant little speeches. Kingdom alive! what could be finer than "obscured in the dark and bewildering mazes of a latitudinous construction"? It is "scrumptious" in the extreme.

We might go on and shew many similar reasons, gleaned from the Commodore's epistle, why he ought to be nominated for the Presidency "right off" and no questions asked. But we do not like to do so, because, great as we acknowledge him to be, and as he has proved himself to be to the satisfaction of all future generations by the authorship of the just-quoted sentence, he is now our candidate. No! we scorn to go into the Navy when the Army contains a meteor of coruscating splendor and unobscured brilliancy—one who, to all the valor of a soldier, adds the accomplishments of a poet. Attention, America! we nominate for President of this free and enlightened Republic, LIEUT. G. W. PATTEN, U. S. ARMY.

"The sun had gone down with his battle-stained eye."

THE WEATHER.—During the last week, the weather has been uncommonly fine, and the showers on Monday and Tuesday have brought on vegetation surprisingly. Every thing wears a new appearance. The plum and apple trees are in full bloom, and the prospect of an abundance of fruit, is more promising than for many years. Usually we have severe frosts after the season of blossoms; but the lateness of the present season will prove a blessing—although the mass of the people have considered it precisely the reverse—as the fear of frost is now past.

There has never been a better week for planting than the last, and we are happy to say that it has been improved. Most of the corn is in the ground, and so rapid has been the vegetation, we have seen some shooting out of the ground which had only been planted five days. We see no reason to distrust Him who has promised that "seed time and harvest shall not fail."—[Owego Advertiser.]

We copy the foregoing not only for the cheering information which it imparts, but on account of the healthful tone in which it is written. The pen of the editor must have been guided by a grateful heart. We are tired of the fault-finding, captious spirit that prevails in these latter days; not only do people grumble at what has happened, but they fume and fret about misfortunes which have no real existence, but which may possibly come to pass. They should remember the precept of the illustrious John Milton:

"Be not over-exquisite
To cast the fashion of uncertain evils."

How much better is that philosophy, which, reposing on the goodness of God, takes all things for good and looks with placid eye on the bright side of human life! Of late, how has the weather been turned into a topic of railing! And yet the ongoings of vegetation have been arrested till the reign of the frost was over; the blossoms of the fruit have been kept in the bough till they could burst out into soft airs and genial warmth: and Nature, like a careful mother, has nursed her offspring in her breast till they could grow lustily, without danger of stint or decay. For this, upon her lap, should the ready libations be poured; for this, from the souls of men nourished by her benefits, should ascend the acceptable incense of gratitude to Him, who bountifully bestows his gifts even on the undeserving.

We expect to see, during the present year, as in all past years, complaints about bad harvests and short crops; but we hope our readers will place no reliance on such statements, or, if they do, never refuse to be grateful—but, remembering how much reason they still have for content, give thanks to that kind Heaven which has so

"adorned this happy land
And scattered blessings with a liberal hand."

How NICE.—The editors of some of the Cincinnati papers are feasting on strawberries and cream furnished by some of their friends. How considerate the people of Cincinnati are,

"THE FAWN OF SPRING-VALE."—It is with feelings of more than ordinary satisfaction that we call the reader's attention to the affecting and beautiful story, commenced in the present number of our paper. For beauty of style, and correctness and eloquence of expression, we hardly know where it is surpassed. Though entirely different from "The Sketch-Book," it approaches more nearly to its standard than any other we can call to mind. The author thus alludes to its "moral" in his preface:

"Of the 'Fawn of Spring-vale' I have simply to say, that the moral I trust is a wholesome one. I wrote the tale to warn sensitive and sentimental young ladies that the foolish indulgence of a first affection, and the nursing of it into the great business of their lives, is not only a piece of egregious folly, so far as they themselves are concerned, but also a source of calamity—and not unjustly so—to those parents and relatives who choose to make pets of them in such soft and sentimental nonsense. Many an early grave and mad-house is filled with young ladies who are gifted with 'exquisite sensibility.'"

MONS. ALEXANDER VATTÉMARE.—This philanthropist—for philanthropist he deserves to be called in the best sense of the word—is about to leave this country for his native France. He goes home after an absence of twenty months from his family. His time has been spent in the United States almost exclusively in an exercise of benevolent efforts for the Cause of Literature and Science. He has prosecuted with all his mind and more than all his strength—for his health has failed—his grand and noble design of establishing between all the nations of the earth, a system of exchanges of works of art and science, books, pictures, &c. He has sent many thousand volumes home and will in return cause to be presented to the public libraries and institutions of our country, works of foreign countries, equally numerous and valuable. It may be said, on the whole, that Mr. Vattémare has succeeded in his magnificent project.—He will leave on the 8th inst., in the packetship, Duchesse D'Orléans, for Havre. The good wishes of the American people will accompany him across the sea and dwell with him in France.

The Literary World.

BIOGRAPHY AND POETICAL REMAINS OF THE LATE MARGARET MILLER DAVIDSON, by Washington Irving. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard, 12mo. pp 359.

The thought has been so often expressed that true genius adorns whatsoever it touches, that it now wears all the triteness of a proverb. Its truth has never struck us more forcibly than in looking over this tribute to the memory of a marvellous child, who perished, not like Chatterton, in pride, but in all humility—trusting in Heaven, and looking to that bright clime where the rose never fades, the leaf never falls and the music never dies away. It requires no vivid fancy to depict this being—"too lovely and too early lost"—as an angel, made twin in seraphic beauty with the sister who had preceded her, and with whom she now wanders on embracing pinions through the clear empyrean of the celestial realm.

It is enough for the lover of literature that an author, so distinguished and so esteemed, should have undertaken this task; we sit down to the book with a confident feeling of being gratified—but gratification rises into delight when we find with what simple yet admirable skill the duty has been performed. Mr. Irving has arranged the little treasures, deposited in his keeping, with a taste not inferior to that which has marked his more prominent performances. The "remains," together with the memorials of the child's brief life, were committed to the editor by the mother of Margaret, who shows herself to have been a woman of good talents and a refined education. Her reminiscences are as pathetic as can be imagined; they seem to gush from the deep wells of her affection, and to flow out unrestrained. Of these Mr. Irving has availed himself with skill and consideration, and entwined them happily with his own beautiful narrative.

With the story of Lucretia Davidson, on whose name, to adopt Mr. Irving's expression, "the reading world has long set a cherishing value," our readers are familiar. Her biography has been written by President Morse of the American Society of Arts, and by Miss Sedgwick as a contribution to Mr. Sparks's excellent library of American biography. Southey, the poet, wrote an article in the London Quarterly Review, in which he quoted many of Lucretia's productions and told the wonderful psychological truths connected with the development of her premature genius and death. This article gave celebrity to its subject—and an American child of fifteen is better known in Great Britain, than many prolific characters who still live to astonish our Western World with feats of noble verse-making.

This book will undoubtedly receive as much attention from the reviewers as that of Lucretia; and, if we are not mistaken, be regarded with greater astonishment. The poems are sometimes marked by an originality of idea and a felicity of expression which would surprise and delight us in the productions of an established author—but, when we come to reflect that they are the emanations of the immature mind of a child, who "spoke in numbers" almost before her words could be distinctly articulated, we regard them as inspired and the direct expression of thoughts sent from Heaven. We remember hearing it said during the life-time of Margaret that Lucretia had a sister still more remarkable than herself; we afterward encountered and read with charmed attention some verses ascribed to her by the newspapers—and now we are lost in wonder at the evidences of genius, which here meet our eyes like the breaking light of morning.

We will not attempt to repeat the incidents of little Margaret's life—it was, for the most part, bright and merry, though chequered by disease and saddened at its close by the consciousness of approaching death; let it suffice that we offer to the reader convincing proofs of what has been asserted and which may serve as inducements for his obtaining this charming volume. At the age of eight Margaret lived with her family at Plattsburgh, after having been upon excursions to Saratoga Springs and the city of New-York. It must have been an oasis in her life; for the excursions had "improved her health and given a fresh impulse to her mind."

She resumed her studies with great eagerness; her spirits rose with mental exercise; she soon was in one of her veins of intellectual excitement. She read, she wrote, she danced, she sang, and was for the time the happiest of the happy. In the freshness of early morning, and toward sunset, when the heat of the day was over, she would stroll on the banks of the Saranac, following its course to where it pours itself into the beautiful Bay of Cumberland in Lake Champlain. There the rich variety of scenery which bursts upon the eye; the islands, scattered, like so many gems, on the broad bosom of the lake; the green mountains of Vermont beyond, clothed in the atmospherical charms of our magnificent climate; all these would inspire a degree of poetic rapture in her mind, mingled with a sacred melancholy; for these were scenes which had often awakened the enthusiasm of her deceased sister Lucretia.

Not long after this she paid another visit to her friends and relatives in this city. Margaret had never been to the theatre but once—and it seemed to her fairy land. She determined, by way of providing entertainment for her young companions, to "get up" a play. Accordingly all the preparations were made and nothing remained but to write the tragedy! But we must not withhold a word of the following description:

Margaret was called upon to produce the play. "Oh!" she replied, "I have not written it yet."—"But how is this!—Do you make the dresses first, and then write the play to suit them?"—"Oh!" replied she gaily, "the writing of the play is the easiest part of the preparation; it will be ready before the dresses." And, in fact, in two days she produced her drama, "The Tragedy of Alethia." It was not very voluminous, to be sure, but it contained within it sufficient of high character and astounding and bloody incident to furnish out a drama of five times its size. A king and queen of England resolutely bent upon marrying their daughter, the Princess Alethia, to the Duke of Ormond. The princess most perversely and dolorously in love with a mysterious cavalier, who figures at her father's court under the name of Sir Percy Lennox, but who, in private truth, is the Spanish king, Rodrigo, thus obliged to maintain an incognito on account of certain hostilities between Spain and England. The odious nuptials of the princess with the Duke of Ormond proceed: she is led, a submissive victim, to the altar; is on the point of pledging her irrevocable word; when the priest throws off his sacred robe, discovers himself to be Rodrigo, and plunges a dagger into the bosom of the king. Alethia instantly plucks the dagger from her father's bosom, throws herself into Rodrigo's arms, and kills herself. Rodrigo flies to a cavern, renounces England, Spain, and his royal throne, and devotes himself to eternal remorse. The queen ends the play by a passionate apostrophe to the spirit of her daughter, and sinks dead on the floor.

The little drama lies before us, a curious specimen of the prompt talent of this most ingenious child, and by no means more incongruous in its incidents than many current dramas by veteran and experienced playwrights.

The parts were now distributed and soon learnt; Margaret drew out a play-bill, in theatrical style, containing a list of the dramatic personæ, and issued regular tickets of admission. The piece went off with universal applause; Margaret figuring, in a long train, as the princess, and killing herself in a style that would not have disgraced an experienced stage heroine.

Are not the following lines, written by this baby, when her heart was full of sorrow at being obliged to leave the shore of her native lake, "beautiful exceedingly." By what modern "poetess" have they, in their pure and simple depth of feeling, been excelled?

MY NATIVE LAKE.

Thy verdant banks, thy lucid stream,
Lit by the sun's resplendent beam,
Reflect each bending tree so light
Upon thy bounding bosom bright.
Could I but see thee once again,
My own, my beautiful Champlain!
The little isles that deck thy breast,
And calmly on thy bosom rest,
How often, in my childish glee,
I've sported round them, bright and free!
Could I but see thee once again,
My own, my beautiful Champlain!
How oft I've watch'd the fresh'ning shower
Bending the summer tree and flower,
And felt my little heart beat high
As the bright rainbow graced the sky.
Could I but see thee once again,
My own, my beautiful Champlain!
And shall I never see thee more,
My native lake, my much-loved shore?
And must I bid a long adieu,
My dear, my infant home, to you?

Shall I not see thee once again,
My own, my beautiful Champlain?

Seldom have we let fall the tears of sympathy over more true pathos than that which breathes in the stanzas, "On the death of my sister Anna Eliza;" "To my mother oppressed with sorrow;" "On the corpse of my little brother, Kent." The very title of the latter is heart-breaking—and how we grieve with the poor girl when she exclaims, with an agony as deep as that of the King of Israel when he mourned for Absalom—

"But thou art gone! and this cold clay
Is all that now remains of thee!"

The lines entitled "Farewell to Ruremont" are a wonderful specimen of easy and graceful versification. But it is useless to repeat remarks like these. We should be glad to give many examples of how truly they might be said—but we cannot. Of the lines to her sister Lucretia, Mr. Irving justly says that "they breathe the heavenly aspirations of her young spirit in strains quite unearthly. We may have read poetry more artificially perfect in its structure but never any more truly divine in its inspiration." The maturity of the child's mind—her judgment ripened far, far beyond her years—can be as satisfactorily shown as her sweet and brilliant fancy. Take two examples. The criticism she makes upon Mrs. Hemans is as accurate as possible.

"I will endeavor to answer your question about Mrs. Hemans. I have read several lives of this distinguished poetess, by different authors, and in all of them find something new to admire in her character and venerate in her genius! She was a woman of deep feeling, lively fancy, and acute sensibilities—so acute, indeed, as to have formed her chief unhappiness through life. She mingles her own feelings with her poems so well, that in reading them you read her character. But there is one thing I have often remarked: the mind soon wearies in perusing many of her pieces at once. She expresses those sweet sentiments so often, and introduces the same stream of beautiful ideas so constantly, that they sometimes degenerate into monotony. I know of no higher treat than to read a few of her best productions, and comment upon and feel their beauties; but perusing her volume is to me like listening to a strain of sweet music repeated over and over again, until it becomes so familiar to the ear, that it loses the charm of variety."

How much more good sense—how much more of a philosophic mind—how much more of freedom from that prejudice which rejects what is new because it is incomprehensible—how much more of a prophetic spirit, is displayed in what this child writes about "Animal Magnetism" than in the opinions and verdicts often pronounced by the wise among grown men!

"You ask what I think of animal magnetism? My dear Hetty, I have not troubled my head about it. I hear of it from every quarter, and mentioned so often with contempt, that I have thought of it only as an absurdity. If I understand it rightly, the leading principle is the influence of one mind upon another; there is undoubtedly such an influence, to a reasonable degree, but as to throwing one into a magnetic sleep—presenting visions before their eyes of scenes passing afar off, it seems almost too ridiculous! Still it may all be true! A hundred years since, what would have been our feelings to see what is now here so common, a steam engine, breathing fire and smoke, gliding along with the rapidity of thought, and carrying at its black heels a train which a hundred men would fail to move? We know not but this apparent absurdity, this magnetism, may be a great and mysterious secret, which the course of time will reveal and adapt to important purposes."

This is extracted from a letter to one of her young friends—of whom, considering her necessarily secluded life, she had many warmly attached. Indeed who would not have loved the dear Margaret,

"The good, the gentle and the beautiful,
The child of light and genius?"

Alas, that we must continue the quotation and exclaim,

"She is gone
Like some bright exhalation which the dawn
Robes in its golden hues!"

Sometimes her prose rises to a degree of beauty, scarcely less delightful than that which marks her verses. Read this from a letter to her excellent friend, Miss Sedgwick:

"Do, if possible, try the Ballston air once more. It has been useful to you once, it might be still more so now. You will find warm hearts to welcome you, and we will do all in our power to make your visit pleasant to you. The country does indeed look beautiful! The woods are teeming with wild flowers, and the air is full of melody. The soft, wild warbling of the birds is far more sweet to me than the most labored performances of art; they may weary by repetition, but what heart can resist the influence of a lovely day ushered in by the morning song of those sweet carollers! and even to sleep, as it were, by their melodious evening strain. How I wish you could be here to enjoy it with me."

Ample as are our columns, they do not afford "room and verge enough" to contain the many exquisite poems, which, for their intrinsic merit, and had they been written by a man of fifty instead of a girl who died at fifteen, would be worthy of extract. These few fragments in blank verse are quite perfect, and as read if chosen as the best in some great work.

"Consumption! child of wo, thy blighting breath
Marks all that's fair and lovely for thine own,
And, sweeping o'er the silver chords of life,
Blends all their music in one death-like tone.

"What strange, what mystic things we are!
With spirits longing to outlive the stars.
* * * * * but even in decay
Hasting to meet our brethren in the dust.
As one small dew-drop runs, another drops
To sink unnoticed in the world of waves.

"O it is sad to feel that when a few short years
Of life are past, we shall lie down, unpitied
And unknown, amid a careless world;
That youth and age and revelry and grief
Above our heads shall pass, and we alone
Shall sleep! alone shall be as we have been,
No more. * * * * *

It is with regret that we arrest our pen—commonly employed upon themes, how much less inspiring!—and conclude this notice with another recommendation to the reader to procure this work.

From our Washington Correspondent.

WASHINGTON, Tuesday Evening, June 1st, 1841.

Since I had the pleasure of addressing your readers last, the CONGRESSIONAL CAMPAIGN, from which so much has been so long expected, has begun. THE FIRST DAY'S SITTING is always attractive to the crowds that flock to the metropolis with the advent of Congress; but the peculiar interest which was felt in the election of new officers for the House, and the circumstances under which the two Houses were convened, called together, yesterday, a larger assemblage at the Capitol, than usual.

The choice of speaker was determined on, in caucus, on Saturday evening. One hundred and six Whig Members attended. The meeting determined very properly that the nomination of any gentleman should depend on his receiving a majority of the whole Administration votes in the House. After several ballots, JOHN WHITE of KENTUCKY, received seventy-two votes, and was declared duly nominated.

The choice of Clerk was not settled in the caucus—at least there was a misunderstanding in reference to it, on the part of a considerable number of friends of the Administration, including several of the most distinguished gentlemen in the House. It is certain that Mr. SMITH of MAINE, received only a minority of the whole number of Whig votes in the House: and many members regarded the result as no nomination. Notwithstanding this difficulty, Mr. MACLEOD withdrew from the contest (in compliance with the decision of a majority of the caucus in favor of Mr. Smith,) and declined to allow his name to be used, except on condition that there should be a new nomination. He would not consent to take the office, unless at the hands of the Whig majority in the House.

The Speaker's election was carried in the house, without any trouble on the first ballot. Mr. WHITE, on being conducted to the Chair, made a very happy speech, which will show to the country his disposition to discharge the duties of the office with impartiality; and his character is a good warrant that he will ever act with firmness and decision. Now that the excitement of the contest is over, there seems to be a very general concurrence in the opinion I formed at the last session, and was among the first to express publicly, that the selection will be a most fortunate one for the interests of the House.

Mr. SMITH, (the gentleman nominated in caucus for Clerk, though by a minority of the dominant party,) could not unite the Whigs—many of whom remembered his course a few weeks back, it is said, and could not forget it sufficiently to induce them to contribute to his elevation. Neither could Mr. Clarke gain the vote of the Whigs—for other reasons. The part of policy was, unquestionably, to have made a new nomination; and to have selected a gentleman who, it was known, could have concentrated on himself the whole Whig vote, as he was, at the least, the second choice of both divisions, and would have been acceptable to the whole Whig force. But the chance was lost, and Mr. Clarke was elected by a union of some thirty or forty Whigs with the whole opposition forces. Party men will see that was an unfortunate result, in a party point of view.

There has been debate in both Houses already, about the proper official title of the President. The question was raised on the motion for sending a committee to inform the President that Congress was in session. It was started by Mr. McKeon in the House, yesterday, and by Mr. Allen of Ohio in the Senate to-day. But it met with no favor in either branch. The position taken by Mr. Wise, in the House, is unquestionably according to the true construction of the Constitution. It is the office itself which devolves on the Vice President, not merely the duties and rights of the Presidential office. The House voted down Mr. McKeon's proposition (which, in effect, denied Mr. Tyler the title of President) without a division. In the Senate it obtained only eight votes, although Mr. Allen and Mr. Tappan of Ohio both spoke at some length upon it. Mr. Walker of Miss. (Oppos.) and Mr. Calhoun, both resisted it—and maintained that Mr. TYLER is in fact, and should be styled, "PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES."

It was supposed by some that a question would also arise as to the title of Mr. SOUTHWARD. It was virtually decided to-day, that he is only President pro tem., and a Senator from New-Jersey—and not Vice President. For he voted as a Senator, in the usual course of calling the yeas and nays. Were he regarded as Vice President he would be entitled only to a casting vote; and New-Jersey would be called on to elect another Senator.

The two important questions as to the titles of the two first officers of the Government being settled—the Joint Committee of the two Houses, Messrs. Huntington and Archer, (Senators,) and Messrs. Sergeant and Dawson, (Representatives,) proceeded to the White House, and speedily returned, accompanied by Mr. Robert Tyler, now acting as the Private Secretary of the President. The Committee having announced that the President would transmit a Message to each House immediately, Mr. Robert Tyler was introduced successively to each House by the appropriate officer, and delivered the Message, of which copies were sent to you, by the Express that started at 12 o'clock.

The reading of this long-looked for paper was listened to with the deepest interest; and the friends of the Administration generally expressed great gratification at its spirit and the views and opinions of the President on the leading questions of the day.

It elicited no debate in the Senate, except that gentlemen on both sides expressed a desire to reduce the expenditure for printing; and only five thousand copies, in all, of the Message were ordered to be printed by that body. In the House, there was a loose and rambling debate about economy and retrenchment, in which two or three noisy young men figured; but it came to nothing. Ten thousand copies of the Message and Documents were ordered to be printed; none without the Documents. Perfectly right, this; for the Message goes into every newspaper, but the Documents go into very few except the largest journals of the great cities; and yet the public interest demands that they should be widely circulated.

Another desultory discussion took place to-day, about the seats in the Hall of Representatives. Mr. Pickens desired that they should be numbered, and that the members should draw for them by lot. This occasioned a great waste of words, and a consumption of much time that might have been far more profitably employed. The best way would be to remove all the desks and chairs, and then there would not be half as much travelling as there is now. The members are furnished too luxuriously, by far.

The truth is, something must be done to stop the eternal babbling of certain honorable members. The audience were nauseated with it to-day. Every man ought to be kept strictly to the point; and should be put down in some manner or other, when he undertakes to talk about matters and things in general.

Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS signalized himself by a speech in favor of the Right of Petition to-day, on his motion to rescind the standing rule of the last House, on the subject of abolition petitions, memorials, &c. &c. It was able, of course—but too discursive for good taste.

There is little news stirring in this city. I write you a shorter letter than usual: so you may have room to publish what you like of the official documents that will be forthcoming at this season.

You may report to your gay readers, that there is a considerable number of fashionables here, in spite of the terrors of our June sun—which, to-day, are quite equal to those of July usually. The gardens of the Capitol and President's House, and other promenades are filled with groups in these balmy evenings, enjoying the air; and the moonlight strawberry parties have also begun; and aquatic excursions; and voyages to Piney Point, Old Point, for salt-water bathing, soft crabs, oysters, and for other comforts, will follow by and by. The Summer Session will be as pleasant a one as can be in this region.

The Old World.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND. ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA.

On Wednesday morning, the rapid steamer Acadia, Captain Miller, came in fine style into Boston harbor, from a pleasant passage of thirteen days and a half. Nothing is heard from the President by this arrival—except that, in one of the papers brought from Halifax, it is stated that a schooner from Newfoundland reported that a boat, belonging to Fortune Bay, had arrived there with the story that a vessel from France had reached that island, which had picked up the Captain and sixteen seamen of an American steamer—who said that 56 other persons were lost. This is wholly incredible; and no doubt remains on our minds that the President was lost wholly, and that all on board perished.

We give our correspondent's letter:

From our own Correspondent.

LONDON, May 17th, 1841.

The new budget by this steamer will be extremely limited. I send you all such items as you will be interested in.

Two horrible and distressing disasters have occurred at sea. The ship Brooklyn sailed on the 10th from Liverpool for New-York, and when off Point Lynas, in the Channel, she ran down the brig Mary Scott, of 300 tons, inward bound from Valparaiso. The brig instantly sank, and the captain and four of the seamen were drowned. The mate and seven seamen escaped in the boat and were picked up.

The other was the loss of the ship Wm. Brown, bound from Liverpool to Philadelphia, with a crew of 17, and 65 steerage passengers. She struck an iceberg on the 19th of April, in lat. 43 N. and long. 49 W. and went down soon after. The captain and seven persons got off in the jolly boat, and the mate with thirty-three others in the long boat; but, as the mate represents, the boat could not live with so many in such a sea, and, by his order, seventeen of these poor people were thrown overboard! The scene must have been heart-rending. I send you the full particulars elsewhere. One hour after this massacre, (as it has been called,) they fell in with a vessel—the ship Crescent, of Portsmouth, N. H.—on board of which they were received and from which the mate and crew were sent to Havre in the Ville de Lyon. They were examined by the American Consul and are now in prison. The Crescent, also bound for Havre, had not arrived.

The fate of the President is yet a mystery. Some hope was excited by the fact that a large steamer had been seen on the 10th of April—lat. 12, long. 33—steering N. N. E. without steam; but Captain Keane, late commander of the President, insists that this could not be her—and thinks she may yet be heard from at the West Indies. The President cost £80,000. Eighty per cent premium has been paid for insurance upon a part of her cargo. The British Queen is withdrawn, and the company intend to sell her.

The debate on the Ministerial project has continued six days—or rather nights, for it reaches into the "small hours" of morning—and is not yet concluded.

The Sugar question is mixed up with that of Slavery—and there is a coalition of the leading Anti-Slavery men—(many of them holding West India plantations) with the Tory party in opposing the reduction of duties on Foreign Sugars—because they are "Slave-labor" Sugars—i. e. the poor people of England must pay a duty of 300 per cent. on their Sugar because the free blacks in the Colonies cannot or will not make it as cheap as it can be had elsewhere. The absurdity and one-sidedness of this disinterested philanthropy is well exposed by those journals who have sense enough to see through a millstone. The division will take place this week—and all are on the qui-vive to know whether Ministers will resign or dissolve Parliament, in case of the defeat, which is anticipated.

Elliot's settlement of the Chinese question gives no satisfaction at all. The chief object of the expedition was not effected—and not a word was said in the agreement respecting the opium trade.

Espartaco has been elected sole Regent of Spain, and it is ominously stated that the young Queen was soon after taken very ill. The ex-Queen Christiana, has arrived in Paris.

An insurrection has broken out in Candia; and another near Moscow, to suppress which troops were withdrawn from Poland.

The Earl of Waldegrave is now in the Marshal Sea prison, on to which he has been sentenced for six months and fined £200 besides, for an assault on a policeman.

A motion in the House of Commons for the removal of Lord Cardigan from his regiment was defeated.

The Carnival "Festival" for the benefit of the sons of the Clergy, took place on the 13th. at St. Paul's—i. e.—there was a sermon and some very fine music, including the Coronation Anthem. The music always attracts a large audience to the big church on such occasions. "No tickets are required"—but you are stopped at the door and expected to "contribute" at least half a crown to the plate held for that purpose. There is a gold door and a silver door—i. e.—none are admitted to the best seats but those who pay gold. Prince Albert was there with the Lord Mayor, Alderman, Archbishops and Bishops; and he afterwards dined with these and made a speech in "good English," at Merchant Tailors' Hall.

"The Princess Royal" says the Court Circular, "drove out yesterday in a barouche and four." Her royal Highness must be an expert whip, for a young lady of six months.

It is said that Mr. Power the comedian, had $30,000 in specie with him in the President. His wife has entirely lost her reason and her hair has turned white.

Lord Palmerston and Sir John Cam Hobhouse (the friend of Byron,) are to be raised to the Peerage.

Mlle Rachel, the great French tragic actress is now performing in London at Her Majesty's theatre.

Hyde Park has been densely crowded this week, the weather continuing to be delightful. The Queen takes an airing almost every day, and so does the Princess Royal. I was driving through the triumphal arch opposite Hyde Park yesterday, when I suddenly popped upon the Royal carriage and four. The passage was not wide enough for two vehicles—so I had to "back out" as gracefully and promptly as the circumstances permitted.

The Queen is to be invited to visit Ireland this summer, a meeting having been held in Dublin for that purpose.

Thomas Barnes, Esq. the principal editor of the "Times" died on the 7th. He was a schoolmate of Thomas Moore and Leigh Hunt.

The Admiralty have ordered a new war-steamer to be fitted with the "propeller."

The fêtes in Paris in honor of the christening of the young prince went off quietly and were very brilliant. On the 5th of May the anniversary of Napoleon's death was celebrated at the Invalids by religious ceremonies, attended by several Marshals and Generals of the empire, members of both Houses of the Legislature, deputations from the different corps of the garrison, the Invalids, National Guards, the persons formerly attached to the Imperial Household, &c. After the abolition, the gold crown, voted by the municipality of Cherbourg, was deposited on the tomb by the Mayor of that city, next to the sword and hat of the Emperor.

Postscript—Tuesday evening, May 18th. The "Great Debate" is again adjourned to this evening, and may last two or three days more. It is of course the topic of the day. It is strongly asserted that the Ministers have resolved to resign immediately, if the question goes against them.

A statement has been signed by the British and American Consuls at Havre, which seems to justify the course of the mate, Mr. Brown, as the only way of preserving the survivors. The 17 were thrown overboard at 10 in the evening, and the Crescent appeared at 6 o'clock next morning and not as before stated.

This is the month of "Anniversaries," "Society dinners," "festivals" and conventions of all sorts, and there are probably more strangers in London at present than in any other three months in the year.

The Great Western arrived on Friday evening, just 13 days. She is as regular as clock-work. The Columbia's letters were not received till Monday. The Siddons packet of the 25th April is in, but the New-York of the 19th is not.

The great Metropolis immense and overgrown as it is already, is spreading itself out on all sides almost as rapidly as our own most thriving towns. The number of large and costly private residences now going up is almost incredible. In one neighborhood alone—Paddington, near Hyde Park, there are nearly 1000 houses—mostly of the first class—now being built. The enormous wealth and resources of the English cannot be doubted after taking a walk through the splendid wooden squares, streets and "places" of the West end—particularly in Piccadilly, and the regions of Hyde and Roger Parks. The Nation may be in a consumption, but they have something left yet to pay the doctor's bill.

2nd P. S. 6 P. M.—Consols for account closed to-day at 90½. Money was in demand at 6 per cent., but this was considered temporary. The underwriters at Lloyd, took £1000 on the President to-day at 70 per cent.

Nothing else new.

LITERARY.

Lord John Russell presided on Monday at Exeter Hall at the thirty-sixth annual meeting of the British and Foreign School Society. It was stated that there were at present under course of instruction in the model schools of the society 659 boys and 480 girls, making a total added to those announced on a former occasion, of 51,696. The erection of the new school would cost 13,000l., and the whole funds of the society did not reach 15,000l. The contributions, after Lord John Russell's speech, were considerable.

"The Life and Literary Remains of L. E. L." by Laman Blanchard is just out. I send you a copy, and you will find it a very attractive book. The mystery attending the untimely fate of this gifted lady is not wholly cleared up by her biographer—yet there is abundant evidence against the supposition that she died by her own hand. The volumes contain a tragedy and several poems and prose pieces never before published. The Essays on the Female Characters of Scott are charmingly written.

"The Pictorial Shakespeare" is now nearly completed, and as you know, it places all other editions far in the shade. The immensely laborious and intelligent research displayed in the illustrations, both pictorial and literary, are beyond all praise. The wood engravings are truly beautiful. I send with this the sheets of the June number of Charles O'Malley. You will receive them hereafter from two to four weeks in advance of publication in England—as also the new work by the same author which is to follow this.

I also send you a volume of capital tales, illustrated by Cruikshank, which I should think would be a treat to the New Worlders—and a little squib called "Written Caricatures," etc., etc. Yours, X. Y. Z.

APPALLING OCCURRENCE AT SEA: SHOCKING MASSACRE.

An arrival at Havre has brought intelligence of one of the most appalling occurrences we ever remember to have taken place,—the massacre of a number of helpless creatures, part of the survivors of a wreck, by their more vigorous companions in suffering, on the plan of self-preservation. The particulars of this most horrid and most revolting event will be found in the following extracts from letters and papers:

"HAVRE, May 10.
"The Louis Philippe (New-York packet-ship) has this moment arrived. Information having reached the town, that some ship-wrecked seamen were on board, the excitement was beyond all description. On the arrival in dock, a strong body of the gendarmerie were in waiting, and immediately took into custody the mate and eight of the crew of the ship William Brown, bound from Liverpool for Philadelphia, which was sunk by an iceberg in the latter part of last month. As yet, I cannot give you precise dates for any thing, except that these men were taken from the Crescent, which vessel picked them up in their long-boat. But a tale of horror is to be told about them. It appears that, when the vessel struck, thirty-three passengers, the mate, and eight of the crew took to the long-boat. The captain, three of the crew, and eleven passengers took to the jolly-boat. All the rest sank with the vessel. The boats parted in the night. Some days after the mate and crew determined (as they say in order to lighten the boat) to throw seventeen passengers overboard, which they accomplished, and some of the most horrid and revolting scenes took place. There were two brothers and a sister of one family: the brothers were thrown over, and the sister jumped in after them. One fine boy prayed for a few minutes to say his prayers: they refused, and hurled him into the sea at once. Some clung to the sides of the boat, praying for mercy; but their hands were cut off, and they were pushed into the deep. One hour after this massacre the Crescent fell in with the boat, and saved the survivors of this horrid deed. The passengers remained on board the Crescent. The crew arrived in the Ville de Lyon. They are now under examination before the American Consul."

HAVRE, May 13.
The all-engrossing conversation is the horrid massacre committed by the boat's crew of the Wm. Brown of the sixteen poor creatures they threw overboard. The Crescent, which is bound for this port, with the mate and the passengers saved, is most anxiously looked for every hour. The plea of necessity, which the crew advance, must be made out most strongly to justify so dreadful an alternative. No lots were drawn; but it is understood that the mate gave the order to the men to begin the work of destruction. The following frightful statement, made by the mate, has been forwarded to the American Consul by the Captain of the Crescent, per the Ville de Lyon:

(Copy.)

At sea, on board the ship Crescent, April 23.
Account of the loss of the ship William Brown, of Philadelphia, Captain George L. Harris, which left Liverpool the 13th of March, having seventeen of the ship's crew, and sixty-five steerage passengers, freighted for Philadelphia.

"The passage was very rough, accompanied by squalls and loss of sails. On the night of the 19th of April, in lat. 43 30 N., and 49 W. long., making all sail in open sea, and running ten knots an hour, the larboard side of the vessel struck upon an iceberg, which stove her in. At ten minutes past nine at night we struck upon another. I then proposed to the Captain to take up sail as quickly as possible, which we did; and sounding the pump, found two feet of water in the hold. On going below I found that the vessel was rapidly making water. All hands set to work to disengage the boats, and at eleven o'clock, they were alongside. I descended into the longboat with eight of the crew, and thirty-three of the passengers; the Captain, Lieutenant, a lady, and five sailors embarked in the jollyboat, and we fastened the boats together. At midnight the vessel sank, carrying with her thirty-three persons. We remained alongside each other until five o'clock in the morning. Captain Harris then informed us of his intention of leaving us, and making the best of his way to Newfoundland, and advised me to do the same.

"My boat being full and heavy, I could not manage it; to pursue that route was impossible: I therefore directed my course south. In the afternoon we fell in with a large quantity of ice. Throughout the night the wind blew with violence from the north in squalls, with rain and hail, and a very heavy sea. Finding that the boat was literally surrounded by small masses of ice, that the water was gaining upon her, I thought it improbable she could hold out unless relieved of some of her weight. I then consulted the sailors, and we were of opinion that it was necessary to throw overboard those who were nearly dead, until we had room enough to work our boat and take to our oars. The weather becoming worse, it was almost impossible to keep the boat afloat and free from the ice. At daybreak we were still surrounded by icebergs. On counting the passengers, sixteen were missing, and the rest were in a desperate state and almost stiff from cold. At six o'clock in the morning we perceived to the westward a sail steering an easterly course. We exerted every effort to approach it. The captain being aloft to steer his ship through the ice, saw our boat and notwithstanding the danger to his own ship, made sail for us. On Thursday morning, at seven o'clock we were along side of her; and before she received us all on board, was struck by the ice, which stove in the boat.—We however succeeded in saving her. Banks and islands of ice were in sight as far as the eye could reach. I then ascertained that it was the Crescent of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Captain G. F. Ball, bound from New-York to Havre. We met the kindest reception on board, and assistance, in the way of food and clothing, were lavished upon us."

(Signed) S. J. BALL, Captain of the Crescent.

(From Gallucci's Messenger.)

We are enabled to add to the account given yesterday of the loss of the William Brown, on her passage from Liverpool to Philadelphia, the following melancholy particulars, derived from a statement drawn up by some of the survivors, and remitted to Capt. Ball, of the Crescent.

"The ship was of Philadelphia; her company consisted of seventeen persons, and she had sixty-five steerage passengers, nearly all Irish, with a full cargo on board. She had a rough passage out, and struck at 9 P. M., when going under all sails at the rate of ten knots an hour, in lat. 43 deg. 40 min. north, and long. 43 deg. 39 min. west by account. She stove in her larboard bow, and, within two minutes, struck another field of ice. The ship soon began to fill, and the captain and crew got out the boats, which were cleared away at eleven. At midnight the ship went down, and the thirty passengers, who could not be taken into the boats, went down in her. The boats lay by each other till five A. M., when the captain, in the cutter steered for Newfoundland. The longboat, being very heavily laden with so many persons, forty-two in all, could not be managed, and was obliged to steer to the south. At night she fell in with more ice, and the wind came on to blow hard; the boat began to leak badly, and shipped a good deal of water. Finding she was likely to sink, the mate consulted with the crew, and it was deemed necessary to throw overboard such of the passengers as were nearly dead. Sixteen were then thrown into the sea, and perished; whilst the rest were nearly stiff with the extreme cold. Shortly after a ship hove in sight, and the Captain, who was up aloft looking out for ice, saw the boat, and stood for her at the imminent risk of his own safety. This proved to be the Crescent, and they were received with the greatest humanity and kindness on board. At that time ice was in sight on the surface of the Atlantic as far as the eye could reach. Out of the passengers saved, ten were women."

The Havre Journal adds to this dreadful narrative, that the first passenger thrown over was a woman! Sisters and relations were afterwards thrown over: and a young boy, who begged for respite to say his prayers, was not allowed it, but was sent into the deep! This journal adds, that the most serious rumors are afloat as to the cause and nature of this catastrophe, which, however, cannot be cleared up until the Crescent, which is daily expected, arrives with the surviving passengers. The American Consul, at Havre, has interrogated the sailors of the William Brown, brought by the Ville de Lyon, and has had them committed to prison.

HAVRE, May 13.
The American ship Crescent, Capt. Ball, arrived here yesterday evening, with the remainder of the passengers of the Wm. Brown, who were saved in the long-boat. The arrival of this vessel has confirmed all the horrid details of the dreadful scene which took place during the night of the 20th and 21st of April. Of the sixteen passengers thrown into the sea, fourteen were men and two women; of the seventeen saved, fifteen are women and two are men. One of these men was seized for the purpose of being thrown overboard by the crew of the boat. He cried out to the mate to save him and not to tear him from his wife. The mate told the men not to separate man and wife, if it were possible to help it. He fell into the bottom of the boat and was saved. A boy of twelve years old was thrown overboard. He caught hold of the boat, and favored by the darkness of the night, crouched under the bows and was saved.

All the women saved are young, except the mother of a Scotch family from Dumfriesshire, who, with her five daughters and a servant girl, was saved: her name is Edgar. Her husband and a son are settled in Germantown, near Philadelphia. A young woman, with her infant at her breast, succeeded in getting into the boat with her husband; they are among the survivors. His name is Patrick, from Cookstown, county Tyrone, the property of Col. Stewart. Several persons from that gentleman's estate or neighborhood have met with a watery grave. One family of the name of Leyden, (sixteen in all,) sunk with the vessel; another family, named Corr—father, mother, and five children—sunk at the same time; the little boy who was thrown from the boat was one of that family. He had not a soul left belonging to him. They were also from Col. Stewart's property.

A Mrs. Anderson, with three children, who was going to join her husband, a medical gentleman, settled at Cincinnati, sunk with the ship. Miss Anderson and a Miss Bradley were thrown into the sea from the long-boat. The tales which the survivors relate are piteous, horrifying. The crew and passengers have been examined by the British and American Consuls this morning, and the impression is, that the dreadful act of throwing their fellow-creatures overboard was of imperative necessity; but, it is hoped, the two Consuls will give publicity to the examination, in order that the public mind may be satisfied on this point. Truly the circumstances must be made out in the clearest way to palliate such an act. We have emigrant ships sailing every week, and, if it is held as law that "might is right," it had better be declared so, and that the crew are justified, under extremities, in throwing overboard who and as many as they think right, without casting lots, or making any other choice than their will.

The Havre Journal states that the sailors of the William Brown have been interrogated separately as to the cause and circumstances of the dreadful catastrophe in the long boat of the ship, and that having each given the same account, without any attempts at prevarication, and shown that they were driven to it by sheer necessity, the American Consul has had them set at liberty. It appears that the boat was letting in water very fast, and that the crowd was so great that it was impossible to tell where the leak was. It was only after the passengers had been thrown overboard that it was found that the plug had come out, and if this had not been stopped, the boat must have sunk.

THE BREACH OF PROMISE HEALED BY MARRIAGE, AND THE LAWYER NON-SUITED.—Some three years ago a sprightly young milliner, of Pearl street, named J. F. received the attentions of George —, a clerk in the office of a wealthy cotton broker in Wall street, with the full expectation that, as she discarded all other loves for him, he would, like the gentle dove, select her as his mate. After the usual interchanges of sentiments and feelings on this subject, eight months since, George, the lover, summoned sufficient courage to his assistance to proffer her his hand in marriage. The offer, as may be supposed, received a cordial acceptance, and the "bidding and cooing" pair coventured privately together to become husband and wife. The month of April was then selected as the period at which the nuptial knot was to be tied by the priest; and George and Jane (like Adam and Eve in Paradise) walked hand in hand together—to run and hire for themselves a house. One was finally selected and agreed for; the furniture to garnish it was furnished and left in the lady's possession; the intended guests, at the instance of the lover, were notified of the approaching marriage feast, and requested to be ready to grace it with their presence; and more than all, the considerate George purchased some handsome linen for his dear, which the patient needle of Jane was to ply upon and convert into shirts for a very special occasion. Smooth as the unruffled wave of the summer sea glided away the moments that motioned toward bliss. But in an unexpected moment a fearful change came on, and a portentous cloud was lowering over the sunny face of George which foretold an approaching storm.

Other passions had been suffered to agitate his bosom—other affections had circled themselves about his too susceptible heart—and on Sunday the 12th April, he called upon her whom he had vowed to wed, and startled her mind to terror, and that terror into a tempest, by telling her that he would not marry her—he was attached to another and an older flame, that was consuming him.

To drive the barbed arrow deeper home, he also demanded the furniture he had purchased, and the linnen he had placed into her hands to be converted into shirts. This instantly aroused the amiable anger of Jane, and quick as the electric spark, she replied that she would "break the furniture to atoms and tear the shirts to tatters," before he should re-possess himself of the one or the other. George alarmed at this magnificent display of spirit, then withdrew, and came no more to heal the angry wounds he had made.

To punish such perfidy as this, the lady Jane then betook herself to the office of a gentleman, learned in the law for advice—and a suit for breach of marriage promise was converted out of the best materials, in a trice. The fearful oath was taken; and her signature was affixed to the statement we have above substantially made. The council addressed a brief billet-doux to George, politely advising him that a suit at law, or a suit in Hymen's court, were his only alternative. George then began to feel as if his purse was in danger, and he sent a faithful friend to Jane to entreat her not to proceed. This seemed only to whet her appetite for law, and the law, she persisted in asserting, should settle the affair.

The aid of her lawyer was again invoked, and a suit was filled up and signed, for $5000, damages for "trespass on the case," in refusing to marry Jane according to his promise.

The threat of a law-suit had however brought George to his senses, and again he called to instruct. Jane called upon her lawyer for counsel—and after a grave consultation Jane said she would compromise with George for $200 in cash, and let the lawsuit die. With this pacific purpose she met her former lover, and then reported to her counsel that she believed he would marry her if she would express her consent. She retired and returned again, and informed her counsel that the breach of promise was about to be healed at the altar, and that George had once more agreed to make her his wife. The next easterly wind brought a rumor to the counsel that the twain were one; and he be-thought himself suddenly that he had not been paid for services and money expended. He penned a polite letter to Jane, reminding her of his fees, and addressing her as Miss F.; but she laconically replied that she was no longer Miss F., but Mrs. G.—and that he might whistle to the winds for his fees, for she would give him none. The lawyer bit his lips and soliloquized as follows: "I was waited upon by a lorn and deserted maiden for relief. I gave her my assistance in services and moneys paid for fees, and was instrumental in procuring her a husband. She has all she wishes, and I have nothing. Now, as I am the non-suited party in this cause, I will issue my writ for the non-compromising wife and husband; and collect my fees, though it should sink into the vortex of the law every sack of cotton in the shop." And though the suit for the fees has not yet been brought, the lawyer is inexorable in his demands, and Jane and George will probably learn to their cost that when the ire of the law is once aroused, not all the kisses in the catechism of marriage can stay its vengeance, unless the fees be paid.

DESTRUCTION OF THE NATIONAL THEATRE.—The indisputable evidence of incendiarism on the afternoon of Friday caused unusual precaution to be used to guard against the recurrence of fire. The watch was doubled and carefully kept up throughout the night and early morning. Mr. Russell and wife lodged in the Theatre, and were deeply solicitous for its safety.

Examinations were made by the manager, or some one for him, as late as two o'clock, and all seemed safe. The watchmen kept their vigils faithfully until after day had dawned, and the sun had risen before they had left. But the incendiary slept not at that hour; for as soon as the watchmen left the Theatre was evidently entered and the torch applied to materials already there or prepared. At a quarter before 7 o'clock, when all was still, the crackling flames were heard working at the wood within. Soon they burst fiercely forth from the upper southwestern front, while they raged rapidly within. The efforts to stay the raging sea of fire were of no avail, except to save the adjacent buildings, as the Theatre was doomed to fall and the flames were streaming from the windows and roof.

Latest Intelligence.

ANOTHER BANK ROBBERY.—The Frederick County Bank of Maryland was entered by false keys between Saturday evening and Monday morning of last week, and $185,976 54 stolen. The robbers, it appears, opened four locks, without disturbing the President, who lodged in the room over the Bank. The property stolen is described as follows:

In Gold .....	$10,049 38
In notes and bills of other banks, and checks, .....	8,738 10
In notes of the Frederick County Bank.....	134,967 00
State 6 per cent. Bonds.....	6,000 00
State 6 per cent. certificates.....	14,000 00
5 per cent. sterling bonds.....	12,222 00

LOSS OF THE WHALE SHIP SHYLOCK.—Capt. Taber, master of this vessel, arrived at Boston last week, and gives the particulars of her loss. She ran upon the breakers near the Feeje Islands on the 20th of June, 1840. They succeeded in launching two boats in which all of the crew but seven embarked and made for one of the Friendly Islands, about 200 miles distant. After three nights and two days of extreme suffering—being without water or provisions—they succeeded in reaching the Island, where they were kindly received by the natives. Of the seven left on the ship, three were drowned while preparing a raft, and the others succeeded in reaching Truth Island, where they remained until rescued by a ship visiting that Island.

LUMBER.—The Bangor (Maine) Whig says: "There is a great demand in our market for lumber the present season. Our harbor is now full of vessels, and there is not lumber enough in market to supply the demand. Good seasoned lumber brings $21, 14, 9."

A disaster of a most melancholy character recently occurred in Quebec, by the falling of a portion of Cape Diamond, burying underneath the mass of earth and stones a number of buildings, in which were at the time about forty or fifty individuals. At the latest accounts thirty-two bodies had been recovered, beside a number who had received more or less injuries.

GENERAL HARRISON'S REMAINS.—The family of Gen. Harrison have yielded to the request of the citizens of Cincinnati, and permitted them to take order for removing his remains to North Bend for interment. The Committee of Removal is to leave Cincinnati for Washington, in the performance of their solemn office of duty and affection, about the 10th of June.

BANK CASE.—A case is now pending before the Chancery Court of South Carolina, in which Henry Shultz and the State Bank are plaintiffs, and the Bank of the State of Georgia, the City Council of Augusta, and G. B. Lamar, are defendants, in which the property in dispute amounts, costs, income and interest, to $68,182 dollars 91 cents, and which suit has now been pending about 20 years.

MICHIGAN CITY, Indiana, (and the only port of that State on Lake Michigan,) is growing steadily to importance. Five vessels have been loading there at one time this Spring: one of them took 1,300 barrels of Pork; another 1,200 barrels of Flour; and there are now 3,000 of Pork, and 5,000 of Flour waiting for shipment.

The birthday of her Britannic Majesty was brilliantly noticed at Montreal on the 22d inst. The troops were out, and were reviewed by the Commander-in-chief and Maj. Gen. Clitherow, accompanied by their respective staffs. The ships, of which there were an unusual number in port, were decorated with every diversity of flags, &c.

A SAD PICTURE.—It is stated that we have in the United States nine thousand six hundred and fifty-seven distilleries of spirituous liquors, which distilled last year 36,343,236 gallons—upwards of two gallons for every man, woman and child in the country. In the State of Pennsylvania alone there are 707 distilleries, exceeding in quantity any other two States in the Union, the annual manufacture of which amounts to 8,784,138 gallons.

An attempt was made on Monday of last week to rob the Branch Bank of Virginia, at Danville. After getting in, the villains became frightened and decamped, leaving their tools behind them. A reward of $500 has been offered for their detection.

A severe hail-storm on the 4th ult. visited Monmouth, Ill., coming with a whirling motion and demolishing the glass on all sides of the houses. The hail-stones were two inches thick on the ground, and the trees were as bare as in January.

Hon. Bates Cooke, late Comptroller of the State of New-York, died in Buffalo on the 30th ult. Mr. Cooke not long since resigned his office on account of his ill health.

COMMODORE ALEXANDER CLAXTON, Commander of the American squadron in the Pacific, died at Talcahuano on the 7th of March. His remains were conveyed to Valparaiso, where the funeral took place on the 12th.

DEATH OF GEN. GLASSCOCK.—Gen. Thos. Glasscock, formerly member of Congress from Georgia, died on the 20th ultimo, in consequence of a fall from a horse.

Bishops DOANE and MEAD both sailed for England in the Caledonia from Boston. They are both in the pursuit of health.

THE GAZELLE.—The brig Rattler at Salem, brought home a beautiful Gazelle. This animal is celebrated for the beauty of its eyes.

The Legislature of New-Hampshire met at Concord on Wednesday last.

Gen. ARMISTEAD is relieved from the command of the army in Florida; Col. Worth, of the 8th regiment, succeeds him in the command.

UNIVERSITY OF MARYLAND.—John Prentiss, Esq., who, for eight years past, has discharged the duties of President of the collegiate department of this University, with distinguished ability and success, has resigned his situation on account of ill-health, and is succeeded by Horace Morison, Esq.

NEW SEMINARY.—The Protestant Episcopal Church of Maryland have purchased the late residence of Gen. Ringgold, in Washington County, Md., and intend to establish a Seminary there for the instruction of youth. The place is said to be admirably situated for an institution of this kind. The mansion cost originally 10,000 dollars.

GEORGIA.—The population of Georgia according to the late census, is 689,690; of whom 405,181 are whites, 2522 free colored persons, and 281,987 slaves. Representative population, 576,798. White persons over 20 years of age who cannot read and write, 80,754.

CANADA.—There is a report that Lord Sydenham will vacate his office of Governor General early in the fall, and will be succeeded by Lord Morpeth, or Sir C. Metcalfe.

COAL.—The amount of coal shipped at Pottsville, Pa. during the fortnight ending May 28, was 16,788 tons, and the number of boats employed 262. During the same time last year the amount shipped was 60,902 tons.

Hon. P. K. Lawrence, Judge of the U. S. District Court, died at New-Orleans on the 19th.

PARENTAL AGONY.—It has been mentioned in this paper that among the passengers on board the ill-fated President was Lord Fitzroy Lennox, second son of the Duke of Richmond. A letter has been received in Montreal, from a gentleman who lives near Goodwood, the country seat of the Duke, in which the terrible anxiety of the parents is thus briefly but touchingly alluded to:

"The Duke of Richmond has walked, for days and days, from sunrise to sunset, on the London road, to receive any news that might be forthcoming of the absent vessel. Both he and the Duchess are looking like spectres, so intense has been their agony of mind."

TRADE OF HAVANA.—The number of vessels arrived at this port in 1840 were 1,582—the amount of tonnage 255,430.

The value of imports in 1840 was $14,556,138; being a diminution of $1,792,838 compared with the former year. From the U. States, $3,412,927; decrease, $528,292.

In the following articles of prime necessity, as the Havana paper calls them, there has been a considerable increase:

	In 1839.	In 1840.
Arrobes of rice.....	403,231	491,673
do. of Codfish.....	149,329	172,732
Brls. pork.....	1,465	1,415
Pounds sperm candles.....	96,403	124,363
Arrobes tallow do.....	33,454	37,779

Of Spanish flour imported, there is an increase of about 10,000; and a diminution on other kinds of an equal amount.

The value of exports in 1840 was $11,184,828; being an increase of $1,456,938 upon those of the previous year. From the U. States, $2,916,260; decrease, $100,353.

FROM RIO JANEIRO.—By the bark Serene, arrived at Baltimore on the 28th ult., dates have been received from Rio to April 2d. The Emperor had granted the President of Rio Grande the power to pardon all individuals that might be worthy of his imperial clemency, who would abandon the revolutionists and submit to the government.

A new mine of antimony has been discovered near Rio, and one of silver within the precincts of the city.

The U. S. corvette Marion sailed from Rio for Pernambuco on the 6th of April.

Gen. Rosas had refused the title of Grand Marshal which the Legislature had conferred upon him. He had again tendered his resignation.

It was rumored that a revolution had occurred in Paraguay, in consequence of which the five members of the Junta had been made prisoners.

The coronation of the Emperor was to take place on the 23d of April. Great preparations were making.

The bark Canton arrived the same day from Monte Video. The Buenos Ayrean Squadron of two brigs and four schooners were lying off Monte Video, under command of Admiral Brown, with the intention of preventing the Monte Videan fleet from proceeding up the river.

A PLEASURE EXCURSION OF FOUR THOUSAND MILES.—The Cincinnati papers announce two expeditions to start about the first of June, for the Falls of St. Anthony, on the Upper Mississippi, and all intermediate landing places. One notice states that "the new, elegant and fast-running steamboat Nonpareil, Richard A. Mermon, master, will leave the port of Cincinnati, on a pleasure excursion for the above places," &c. The public are likewise informed that "the fast-running and light draught steamer Brazil, Capt. Smith, will leave Cincinnati for the Falls of St. Anthony, stopping at all intermediate places long enough for passengers to view the curiosities of the country." The Brazil starts some ten days later than the other. Both boats are provided with bands of music and other appliances for amusement. There are not many countries in the world where a pleasure trip of nearly four thousand miles could be thus got up through the interior.

ANECDOTE OF GEN. JACKSON.—The following anecdote of the old General, we find related in the U. S. Gazette:

One evening an officer presented himself to General Jackson, and complained that certain of the soldiers had got together in a tent, and were making a great noise.

"What are they doing?" asked the General with some feeling.

"They are praying now, but they have been singing."

"And is that a crime?"

"The articles of war order punishment for any unusual noise."

"God forbid," said the General, "that praying should be an unusual noise in any camp!"

THE JUNE NUMBER OF CHARLES O'MALLEY.

We have received by the steamer Acadia, just arrived at Boston, the June number of Charles O'Malley, being at least a fortnight in advance of the regular receipt in this country.

It will be published ENTIRE in the New-World of next week—in which number "The Fawn of Spring Vale" will also be continued.

THE FIRST VOLUME OF CHARLES O'MALLEY.

The following is a specimen of the communications which we have received, since issuing a fortnight since, an extra number of the Quarto New World, containing the first chapters of second volume of Charles O'Malley.

New York, May 24th, 1841.

DEAR SIR—Upon purchasing one of your "Extra New Worlds," I found that the story of "Charles O'Malley" was not commenced, but at the Second Volume. I have taken your paper since last January, and was not aware that you had ever published the foregoing parts, and I trouble you with this to inquire whether you can supply several others and myself with it.

Could you not favor the community with it suitable for binding with the Quarto New World, in the form of extras? Praying you to consider this,

I remain, dear sir, respectfully, &c.

Of course we have not published the "foregoing parts," since the introduction of the extra number distinctly states as much; but, for the sake of obliging our readers, we will publish the whole of the first volume of Charles O'Malley in Extra numbers of the Quarto Edition—making a neat and elegant pamphlet of 48 pages—comprising 144 columns of the Quarto New World—and neatly bound in French paper-covers. We have already commenced the printing of it and it will be ready for sale in a few days. Agents are requested to notify the purchasers of the New World of this fact and to send in their orders.

The Extra number containing the first chapters of the second volume was sent gratuitously to old subscribers. The first volume will also be sent free to all those who will remit to us THREE DOLLARS, (current money,) either in renewal of their subscription for one year, or so that their accounts may stand credited for a year after the expiration of their present term of subscription.

To all new subscribers, subscribing for one year, we shall send gratuitously the first volume of CHARLES O'MALLEY and the extra numbers already or to be issued before the first of July next.

Our agents throughout the country will please to take pains to make these facts distinctly understood by the readers of the New World.

VOLUME II.

BY HARRY LORREQUER.

CHAPTER XIX. . . . The Lines.

WHEN we reached Leucas, we found that an officer of Lord Wellington's staff had just arrived from the lines, and was occupied in making known the general order from head quarters; which set forth, with customary brevity, that the French armies, under the command of Massena, had retired from their position, and were in full retreat; the second and third corps, which had been stationed at Villa Franca, having marched during the night of the fifteenth in the direction of Manal. The officers in command of divisions were ordered to repair instantly to Pero Negro, to consult upon a forward movement, Admiral Berkley being written to, to provide launches to pass over General Hill's, or any other corps which might be selected, to the left bank of the Tagus. All was now excitement, heightened by the unexpected nature of an occurrence which not even speculation had calculated upon. It was but a few days before, and the news had reached Torres Vedras, that a powerful reinforcement was in march to join Massena's army, and their advanced guard had actually reached Santarem. The confident expectation was, therefore, that an attack upon the lines was meditated. Now, however, this prospect existed no longer; for scarcely had the heavy mists of the lowering day disappeared, when the vast plain, so lately peopled by the thickened ranks and dark masses of a great army, was seen in its whole extent deserted and untenanted.

The smouldering fires of the pickets alone marked where the troops were posted, but not a man of that immense force was to be seen. General Fane, who had been despatched with a brigade of Portuguese cavalry and some artillery, hung upon the rear of the retiring army, and from him we learned that the enemy were continuing their retreat northward, having occupied Santarem with a strong force to cover the movement. Crawford was ordered to the front with the light division, the whole army following in the same direction, except Hill's corps, which, crossing the river at Velada, was intended to harass the enemy's flank, and assist our future operations.

Such, in brief, was the state of affairs when I reached Villa Franca toward noon, and received orders to join my regiment, then forming part of Sir Stapleton Cotton's brigade.

It must be felt, to be thoroughly appreciated, the enthusiastic pleasure with which one greets his old corps after some months of separation—the bounding ecstasy with which the eye rests on the old familiar faces, dear by every association of affection and brotherhood; the anxious look for this one and for that—the thrill of delight sent through the heart as the well-remembered march swells upon the ear; the very notes of that rough voice, which we had heard amid the crash of battle and the rolling of artillery, speaks softly to our senses, like a father's welcome: from the well tattered flag that waves above us, to the proud steed of the war-worn trumpeter, each has a niche in our affection.

If ever there was a corps calculated to increase and foster these sentiments, the Fourteenth Light Dragoons was such. The warm affection, the truly heart-felt regard, which existed among my brother officers, made our mess a happy home. Our veteran colonel, grown gray in campaigning, was like a father to us; while the senior officers, tempering the warm blood of impetuous youth with their hard-won experience, threw a charm of peace and tranquillity over all our intercourse that made us happy when together, and taught us to feel that, whether seated around the watch-fire, or charging amid the squadrons of the enemy, we were surrounded by those, devoted heart and soul to aid us.

Gallant fourteenth!—over first in every gay scheme of youthful jollity, as foremost in the van to meet the foe—how happy am I to recall the memory of your bright looks and bold hearts! of your manly daring and your bold frankness—of your merry voices, as I have heard them in the battle or in the bivouac! Alas, and alas! that I should indulge such recollections alone! how few—how very few—are left of those with whom I trod the early steps of life! whose bold career I have heard above the clashing sabres of the enemy—whose broken voices I have listened to above the grave of a comrade. The dark pines of the Pyrenees wave above some; the burning sands of India cover others; and the wide plains of Salamanca are now your abiding place.

"Here comes O'Malley!" shouted out a well-known voice as I rode down the little slope, at the foot of which a group of officers were standing beside their horses.

"Welcome, thou man of Galway!" cried Hampden; "delighted to have you once more among us. How comfoundedly well the fellow is looking!"

"Lisbon beef seems better prog than commissariat biscuit!" said another.

"A' weel, Charlie?" said my friend the Scotch doctor; "how's a' wi' ye, man? Ye seem to thrive on your mishaps! How cam' ye by that braw beastie ye're mounted on?"

"A present, doctor; the gift of a very warm friend."

"I hope you invited him to the mess, O'Malley! For, by Jove, our stables stand in need of his kind offices! There he goes! Look at him! What a slashing pace for a heavy fellow!" This observation was made with reference to a well known officer of the Commander-in-Chief's staff, whose weight—some eight-and-twenty stone—never was any impediment to his bold riding.

"Egad, O'Malley, you'll soon be as pretty a light weight as our friend yonder. Ah! there's a storm going on there! Here comes the colonel!"

"Well, O'Malley, are you come back to us! Happy to see you, boy!—hope we shall not lose you again in a hurry!—We can't spare the scape-graces! There's plenty of skirmishing going on!—Crawford always asks for the scape-graces for the pickets!"

I shook my gallant colonel's hand, while I acknowledged, as best I might, his ambiguous compliment.

"I say, lads," resumed the colonel; "squad your men and form on the road! Lord Wellington's coming down this way to have a look at you! O'Malley, I have General Crawford's orders to offer you your old appointment on his staff; without you prefer remaining with the regiment!"

"I can never be sufficiently grateful, sir, to the general; but, in fact—I think—that is, I believe—"

"You'd rather be among your own fellows. Out with it, boy! I like you all the better! but come, we mustn't let the general know that; so that I shall forget to tell you all about it. Eh? is n't that best? But join your troop now; I hear the staff coming this way."

As he spoke, a crowd of horsemen were seen advancing toward us at a sharp trot; their waving plumes and gorgeous equipments denoting their rank as generals of division. In the midst, as they came nearer, I could distinguish one whom, once seen, there was no forgetting; his plain blue frock and gray trowsers unstrapped beneath his boots, not a little unlike the trim accuracy of the costume around him. As he rode to the head of the leading squadron, the staff fell back and he stood alone before us: for a second there was a dead silence, but the next instant—by what impulse tell who can—one tremendous cheer burst from the entire regiment. It was like the act of one man; so sudden, so spontaneous. While every cheek glowed, and every eye sparkled with enthusiasm, he alone seemed cool and unexcited, as gently raising his hand, he motioned them to silence.

"Fourteenth, you are to be where you always desire to be—in the advanced guard of the army. I have nothing to say on the subject of your conduct in the field, I know you; but, if in pursuit of the enemy, I hear of any misconduct toward the people of the country, or any transgression of the general orders regarding pillage, by G—, I'll punish you as severely as the worst corps in the service, and you know me."

"Oh, tear and ages, listen to that; and there's to be no plunder after all," said Mickey Free, and for an instant the most I could do was not to burst into a fit of laughter. The word "Forward" was given at the moment, and we moved past in close column, while that penetrating eye which seemed to read our very thoughts scanned us from one end of the line to the other.

"I say, Charley," said the captain of my troop in a whisper, "I say, that confounded cheer we gave got us that lesson; he can't stand that kind of thing."

"By Jove, I never felt more disposed than to repeat it," said I.

"No, no, my boy, we'll give him the honors, nine times nine; but wait till evening. Look at old Merivale there. I'll swear he's saying something very civil to him. Do you see the old fellow's happy look?"

And so it was; the bronzed hard cast features of the veteran soldier were softened into an expression of almost boyish delight, as he sat bare-headed, bowing to his very saddle, while Lord Wellington was speaking.

As I looked, my heart throbbed painfully against my side, my breath came quick, and I muttered to myself, "What would I not give to be in his place now!"

CHAPTER XX. . . . The Retreat of the French.

It is not my intention, were I even adequate to the task, to trace with anything like accuracy the events of the war at this period. In fact, to those who, like myself, were performing a mere subaltern character, the daily movements of our own troops, not to speak of the continual changes of the enemy, were perfectly unknown, and an English newspaper was more ardently longed for in the Peninsula, than by the most eager crowd of a London coffee room; nay, the results of the very engagements we were ourselves concerned in, more than once, first reached us through the press of our own country. It is easy enough to understand this. The officer in command of a regiment, and, how much more, the captain of a troop, or the subaltern under him, knows nothing beyond the sphere of his own immediate duty; by the success or failure of his own party his knowledge is bounded, but how far he or his may influence the fortune of the day or of what is taking place elsewhere, he is totally ignorant; and an old fourteenth man did not badly explain his ideas on the matter, who described Busaco as "a great noise and a great smoke, booming artillery and rattling small arms, infernal confusion, and to all seeming incessant blundering, orders and counter-orders, ending with a crushing charge, when, not being hurt himself nor having hurt anybody, he felt much pleased to learn that they had gained a victory." It is then sufficient for all the purposes of my narrative, when I mention that Massena continued his retreat by Santarem and Thomar, followed by the allied army, who, however desirous of pressing upon the rear of their enemy, were still obliged to maintain their communication with the lines, and also to watch the movement of the large armies, which, under Ney and Soult, threatened at any unguarded moment to attack them in flank.

The position which Massena occupied at Santarem, naturally one of great strength, and further improved by intrenchments, defied any attack on the part of Lord Wellington, until the arrival of the long expected reinforcements from England. These had sailed in the early part of January, but, delayed by adverse winds, only reached Lisbon on the second of March, and so correctly was the French marshal apprized of the circumstance, and so accurately did he anticipate the probable result, that on the fourth he broke up his encampment, and recommenced his retrograde movement, with an army now reduced to forty thousand fighting men, and with two thousand sick; destroying all his baggage and guns that could not be horsed. By a demonstration of advancing upon the Zézere, by which he held the allies in check, he succeeded in passing his wounded to the rear, while Ney, appearing with a large force suddenly at Leiria, seemed bent upon attacking the lines: by these stratagems two days' march were gained, and the French retreated upon Torres Novas and Thomar, destroying the bridges behind them as they passed.

The day was breaking on the 12th of March, when the British first came in sight of the retiring enemy. We were then ordered to the front, and, broken up into small parties, threw out as skirmishers. The French chasseurs, usually not indisposed to accept this species of encounter, showed now less of inclination than usual, and either retreated before us, or hovered in masses to check our advance; in this way the morning was passed, when towards noon we perceived that the enemy were drawn up in battle array, occupying the height above the village of Redinha. This little straggling village is situated in a hollow traversed by a narrow causeway, which opens by a long and dangerous defile upon a bridge; on either side of which a dense wood afforded a shelter for light troops, while upon the commanding eminence above, a battery of heavy guns was seen in position.

In front of the village a brigade of artillery and a division of infantry were drawn up so skilfully as to give the appearance of a considerable force; so that when Lord Wellington came up, he spent some time in examining the enemy's position. Erskine's brigade was immediately ordered up, and the fifty-second and ninety-fourth, and a company of the forty-third were led against the wooded slopes upon the French right. Picton simultaneously attacked the left, and in less than an hour both were successful, and Ney's position was laid bare; his skirmishers, however, continued to hold their ground in front, and La Ferrière, a colonel of hussars, dashing boldly forward at this very moment, carried off fourteen prisoners from the very front of our line. Deceived by the confidence of the enemy, Lord Wellington now prepared for an attack in force. The infantry were therefore formed into line, and, at the signal of three shots fired from the centre, began their foremost movement.

Bending up a gentle curve, the whole plain glistened with the glancing bayonets, and the troops marched majestically onward; while the light artillery and the cavalry bounding forward from the left and centre rushed eagerly toward the foe. One deafening discharge from the French guns opened at the moment, with a general volley of small arms. The smoke for an instant obscured every thing; and when that cleared away, no enemy was to be seen.

The British pressed madly on, like heated blood-hounds; but, when they descended the slope, the village of Redinha was in flames, and the French in full retreat beyond it; a single howitzer seemed our only trophy, and even this we were not destined to boast of, for from the midst of the crashing flame and dense smoke of the burning village, a troop of dragoons rushed forward, and, charging our infantry, carried it off. The struggle, though but for a moment, cost them dear: twenty of their comrades lay dead upon the spot; but they were resolute and determined, and the officer who led them on, fighting hand to hand with a soldier of the forty-second, cheered them as they retired. His gallant bearing, and his coat covered with decorations, bespoke him one of note, and well it might: he who thus perilled his life to maintain the courage of his soldiers at the commencement of a retreat, was no other than Ney himself, le plus brave des braves. The British pressed hotly on, and the light troops crossed the river almost at the same time with the French. Nry, however, fell back upon Condeixa, where his main body was posted, and all further pursuit was for the present abandoned.

At Casa Nova and at Foz d'Aronce, the allies were successful: but the French still continued to retire, burning the towns and villages in their rear, and devastating the country along the whole line of march by every expedient of cruelty the heart of man has ever conceived. In the words of one whose descriptions, however fraught with the most wonderful power of painting, are equally marked by truth—"Every horror that could make war hideous attended this dreadful march. Distress, conflagration, death in all modes—from wounds, from fatigue, from water, from the flames, from starvation—vengeance, unlimited vengeance—was on every side." The country was a desert!

Such was the exhaustion of the allies, who suffered even greater privations than the enemy, that they halted upon the 16th, unable to proceed further, and the river Ceira, swollen and unfordable, flowed between the rival armies.

The repose of even one day was a most grateful interruption to the harassing career we had pursued for some time past; and it seemed that my comrades felt, like myself, that such an opportunity was by no means to be neglected; but, while I am devoting so much space and trespassing on my readers' patience thus far with narrative of flood and field, let me steal a chapter for what will sometimes seem a scarcely less congenial topic, and bring back the recollection of a glorious night in the Peninsula.

CHAPTER XXI....Patrick's Day in the Peninsula.

The révillée had not yet sounded, when I felt my shoulder shaken gently as I lay wrapped in my cloak beneath a prickly pear-tree.

"Lieutenant O'Malley, sir; a letter, sir; a bit of a note, your honor," said a voice that bespoke the bearer and myself were countrymen. I opened it, and with difficulty by the uncertain light read as follows:

"DEAR CHARLEY,

"As Lord Wellington, like a good Irishman as he is, would n't spoil Patrick's day by marching, we've got a little dinner at our quarters to celebrate the holy times, as my uncle would call it. Maurice, Phil Grady, and some regular trumps will all come; so do n't disappoint us. I've been making punch all night, and Casey, who has a knack at pastry, has a goose-pie as big as a portmanteau. Sharp seven, after parade. The second battalion of the fusiliers are quartered at Melanté, and we are next them. Bring any of yours worth their liquor. Power is, I know, absent with the staff; perhaps the Scotch doctor would come—try him. Carry over a little mustard with you, if there be such in your parts. Yours, D. O'SHAUGHNESSY."

"Patrick's Day, and raining like blazes."

Seeing that the bearer expected an answer, I scrawled the words "I'm there" with my pencil on the back of the note, and again turned myself round to sleep. My slumbers were, however, soon interrupted once more; for the bugles of the light infantry and the hoarse trumpet of the cavalry sounded the call, and I found to my surprise that, though halted, we were by no means destined to a day of idleness. Dragoons were already mounted carrying orders hither and thither, and staff-officers were galloping right and left. A general order commanded an inspection of the troops, and within less than an hour from daybreak the whole army was drawn up under arms. A thin drizzling rain continued to fall during the early part of the day, but the sun gradually dispelled the heavy vapor; and, as the bright verdure glittered in its beams, sending up all the perfumes of a southern clime, I thought I had never seen a more lovely morning. The staff was stationed upon a little knoll beside the river, round the base of which the troops defiled, at first in orderly then in quick time, the bands playing, and the colors flying. In the same brigade with us the eighty-eighth came, and, as they neared the commander-in-chief, their quick step was suddenly stopped, and, after a pause of a few seconds, the band struck up "St. Patrick's Day;" the notes were caught up by the other Irish regiments, and amid one prolonged cheer from the whole line, the gallant fellows moved past.

The grenadier company were drawn up beside the road, and I was not long in detecting my friend O'Shaughnessy, who wore a tremendous shamrock in his shako. "Left face, wheel! quick, march! do n't forget the mustard!" said the bold major, and a loud roar of laughing from my brother-officers followed him off the ground. I soon explained the injunction, and, having invited some three or four to accompany me to the dinner, waited with all patience for the conclusion of the parade.

The sun was setting as I mounted, and, joined by Hampden, Baker, the Doctor, and another, set out for O'Shaughnessy's quarters. As we rode along, we were continually falling in with others bent upon the same errand as ourselves, and ere we arrived at Melanté, our party was some thirty strong; and truly a most extraordinary procession did we form; few of the invited came without some contribution to the general stock; and, while a staff officer flourished a ham, a smart hussar might be seen with a plucked turkey, trussed for roasting; most carried bottles, as the consumption of fluid was likely to be considerable; and one fat old major jogged along on a broken-winded pony, with a basket of potatoes on his arm. Good fellowship was the order of the day, and certainly a more jovial squadron seldom was met together than ours. As we turned the angle of a rising ground a hearty cheer greeted us, and we beheld in front of an old ordnance marquee a party of some fifty fellows engaged in all the pleasing duties of the cuisine. Maurice, conspicuous above all, with a white apron and a ladle in his hand, was running hither and thither, advising, admonishing, instructing, and occasionally imprecating; ceasing for a second his functions, he gave us a cheer and a yell like that of an Indian savage, and then resumed his duties beside a huge boiler, which, from the frequency of his explorations into its contents, we judged to be punch.

"Charley, my son, I've a place for you; do n't forget. Where's my learned brother?—havin't you brought him with you? Ah, doctor, how goes it?"

"Nae that bad, Master Quill: a' things considered, we've had an awfu' time of it lately."

"You know my friend Hampden, Maurice. Let me introduce Mr. Baker—Mr. Maurice Quill. Where's the major?"

"Here I am, my darling, and delighted to see you. Some of yours, O'Malley, ain't they? proud to have you, gentlemen. Charley, we are obliged to have several tables; but you are to be beside Maurice, so take your friends with you. There goes the roast beef: my heart warms to that old tune."

Amid a hurried recognition and shakings of hands on every side, I elbowed my way into the tent, and soon reached a corner, where, at a table for eight, I found Maurice seated at one end; a huge purple-faced major, whom he presented to us as Bob Mahon, occupied the other. O'Shaughnessy presided at the table next us, but near enough to join in all the conviviality of ours.

One must have lived for some months upon hard biscuits and harder beef to relish as we did the fare before us, and to form an estimate of our satisfaction. If the reader cannot fancy Van Amburgh's lions in red coats and epaulets, he must be content to lose the effect of the picture. A turkey rarely fed more than two people, and few were abstemious enough to be satisfied with one chicken. The order of the viands, too, observed no common routine, each party being happy to get what he could, and satisfied to follow up his pudding with fish, or his tart with a sausage. Sherry, champagne, London porter, Malaga, and even, I believe, Harvey's sauce, were hob-nobbed in; while hot punch, in tea-cups or tin vessels, was unsparingly distributed on all sides. Achilles himself, they say, got tired of eating, and though he consumed something like a prize ox to his own cheek, he at length had to call for cheese, so that we at last gave in, and having cleared away the broken tumblers and baggage-carts of our army, cleared for a general action.

"Now, lads!" cried the major, "I'm not going to lose your time and mine, by speaking, but there are a couple of toasts I must insist upon your drinking with all the honors; and, as I like despatch, we'll couple them. It so happens that our old island boasts of two of the finest fellows that ever wore Russia ducks. None of your nonsensical geniuses, like poets, or painters, or any thing like that; but downright, straight-forward, no-humbug sort of devil may-care and bad-luck-to-you kind of chaps—real Irishmen! Now it's a strange thing that they both had such an antipathy to vermin, they spent their life in hunting them down and destroying them; and whether they met toads at home, or Johnny Crapauds abroad, it was all one. (Cheers.) Just so, boys; they made them leave that; but I see you are impatient, so I'll not delay you, but fill to the brim, and, with the best cheer in your body, drink with me the two greatest Irishmen that ever lived, 'St. Patrick and Lord Wellington.'"

The Englishmen laughed long and loud, while we cheered with an energy that satisfied even the major.

"Who is to give us the chant? Who is to sing St. Patrick?" cried Maurice. "Come, Bob, out with it."

"I'm four tumblers too low for that yet," growled out the major.

"Well then, Charley, be you the man; or why not Dennis himself? Come, Dennis, we cannot better begin our evening than with a song; let us have our old friend Larry M'Hale."

"Larry M'Hale," resounded from all parts of the room, while O'Shaughnessy rose once more to his legs.

"Faith, boys, I'm always ready to follow your lead, but what analogy can exist between Larry M'Hale and the toast we have just drunk I can't see, for the life of me; not but Larry would have made a strapping light company man had he joined the army."

"The song, the song!" cried several voices.

"Well, if you will have it, here goes."

LARRY M'HALE.

AIR—It's a bit of a thing, &c.

I.

"Oh! Larry M'Hale he had little to fear,
And never could want when the crops did n't fail,
He'd a house and demesne and eight hundred a-year,
And the heart for to spend it had Larry M'Hale!
The soul of a party,—the life of a feast,
An illigant song he could sing, I'll be bail;
He would ride with the rector, and drink with priest,
Oh! the broth of a boy was old Larry M'Hale."

II.

"It's little he cared for the judge or recorder,
His house was as big and as strong as a jail;
With a cruel four pounder, he kept all in great order,
He'd murder the country, would Larry M'Hale.
He'd a blunderbuss too; of horse pistols a pair;
But his favorite weapon was always a flail:
I wish you could see how he'd empty a fair,
For he handled it neatly, did Larry M'Hale."

III.

"His ancestors were kings, before Moses was born,
His mother descended from great Grana Uaile:
He laughed all the Blakes and the Frenchs to scorn;
They were mushrooms compared to old Larry M'Hale.
He sat down every day to a beautiful dinner,
With cousins and uncles enough for a tail;
And, though loaded with debt, oh! the devil a thinner
Could law or the sheriff make Larry M'Hale."

IV.

"With a larder supplied and a cellar well stored,
None lived half so well, from Fair-Head to Kinsale,
As he piously said, 'I've a plentiful board,
'And the Lord he is good to old Larry M'Hale.'
So fill up your glass, and a high bumper give him,
It's little we'd care for the tithes or repale;
For ould Erin would be a fine country to live in,
If we only had plenty like LARRY M'HALE."

"Very singular style of person your friend Mr. M'Hale," lisped a spoony looking cornet at the end of the table.

"Not in the country he belongs to, I assure you," said Maurice; "but I presume you were never in Ireland."

"You are mistaken there," resumed the other; "I was in Ireland, though I confess not for a long time."

"If I might be so bold," cried Maurice, "how long?"

"Half an hour, by a stop watch," said the other, pulling up his stock; "and I had quite enough of it in that time."

"Pray give us your experiences," cried out Bob Mahon: "they should be interesting, considering your opportunities."

"You are right," said the cornet; "they were so; and, as they illustrate a feature in your amiable country, you shall have them."

A general knocking upon the table announced the impatience of the company, and when silence was restored the cornet began:

"When the Bermuda transport sailed from Portsmouth for Lisbon, I happened to make one of some four hundred interesting individuals, who, before they became food for powder, were destined to try their constitutions on pickled pork. The second day after our sailing, the winds became adverse; it blew a hurricane from every corner of the compass but the one it ought, and the good ship, that should have been standing straight for the Bay of Biscay, was scudding away under a double-reefed topsail toward the coast of Labrador. For six days we experienced every sea-mancœuvre that usually preludes a shipwreck; and at length when, what from sea-sickness and fear, we had become utterly indifferent to the result, the storm abated, the sea went down, and we found ourselves lying comfortably in the harbor of Cork, with a strange suspicion on our minds that the frightful scenes of the past week had been nothing but a dream."

"Come, Mr. Medicot," said the skipper to me, 'we shall be here for a couple of days to refit; had you not better go ashore and see the country?'

"I sprang to my legs with delight; visions of cowslips, larks, daisies, and mutton chops floated before my excited imagination, and in ten minutes I found myself standing at that pleasant little inn at Cove which, opposite Spike Island, rejoices in the name of the Goat and Garters."

"Breakfast, waiter," said I; 'a beefsteak—fresh beef, mark ye; fresh eggs, bread, milk, and butter, all fresh.' No more hard tack, thought I, no salt butter, but a genuine land breakfast."

"Up stairs, No. 4, sir," said the waiter, as he flourished a dirty napkin, indicating the way.

"Up stairs I went, and in due time the appetizing little déjeuner made its appearance. Never did a minor's eye revel over his broad acres with more complacent enjoyment, than did mine skim over the matton and the muffin, the teapot, the trout, and the devilled kidney, so invitingly spread out before me. Yes, thought I, as I smacked my lips, this is the reward of virtue; pickled pork is a probationary state that admirably fits us for future enjoyments. I arranged my napkin upon my knee, seized my knife and fork, and proceeded with most critical acumen to bisect a beefsteak. Scarcely, however, had I touched it, when with a loud crash the plate smashed beneath it, and the gravy ran piteously across the cloth. Before I had time to account for the phenomenon, the door opened hastily, and the waiter rushed into the room, his face beaming with smiles, while he rubbed his hand in an ecstasy of delight."

"It's all over, sir," said he, 'glory be to God, it's all done.'"

"What's over? what's done?" inquired, I with impatience.

"Mr. M'Mahon is satisfied," replied he, 'and so is the other gentleman.'"

"Who and what the devil do you mean?"

"It's all over, sir, I say," replied the waiter again; 'he fired into the air.'"

"Fired in the air. Was there a duel in the room below stairs?"

"Ye, sir," said the waiter with a benign smile.

"That will do," said I, as seizing my hat I rushed out of the house, and hurrying to the beach took a boat for the ship. Exactly half an hour had elapsed since my landing, but even those short thirty minutes had fully as many reasons that, although there may be few more amusing, there are some safer places to live in than the green island."

A general burst of laughter followed the cornet's story, which was heightened in its effect by the gravity which he told it.

"And, after all," said Maurice Quill, "now that people have given up making fortunes for the insurance companies, by living to the age of Methuselah, there's nothing like being an Irishman. Into what other part of the habitable globe can you cram so much of adventure into one year? Where can you be so often in love, in liquor, or in debt? and where can you get so merrily out of the three? Where are promises to marry and promises to pay treated with the same gentlemanly forbearance? and where, when you have lost your heart and your fortune, are people found so ready to comfort you in your reverses? Yes," said Maurice, as he filled his glass up to the brim, and eyed it luciously for a moment, "Yes, darling, here's your health; the only girl I ever loved—in that part of the country I mean. Give her a bumper, lads, and I'll give you a chant!"

"Name! name! name!" shouted several voices from different parts of the table.

"Mary Draper!" said Maurice, filling his glass once more, while the name was re-echoed by every lip at the table.

"The song! the song!"

"Faith, I hope I have n't forgotten it," quoth Maurice.

"No; here it is."

So saying, after a couple of efforts to assure the pitch of his voice, the worthy doctor began the following words to that very popular melody, "Nancy Dawson:"

"MARY DRAPER."

AIR—Nancy Dawson.

"Don't talk to me of London dames,
Nor rave about your foreign flames,
That never lived—except in dramas,
Nor alone, except on paper;
I'll sing you 'bout a girl I knew,
Who lived in Ballywhacnacrew,
And, let me tell you, mighty few
Could equal Mary Draper."

"Her cheeks were red, her eyes were blue,
Her hair was brown, of deepest hue,
Her foot was small, and neat to view,
Her waist was slight and taper;
Her voice was music to your ear,
A lovely brogue, so rich and clear,
Oh, like I ne'er again shall hear
As from sweet Mary Draper."

"She'd ride a wall, she'd drive a team,
Or with a fly she'd whip a stream,

Or maybe sing you 'Rousseau's Dream,'
For nothing could escape her;
I've seen her too—upon my word—
At sixty yards bring down a bird,
Oh! she charmed all the Forty-third!
Did lovely Mary Draper.

"And at the spring assizes ball,
The junior bar would one and all
For all her fav'rite dances call,
And Harry Deane would eaper;
Lord Clare would then forget his lore,
King's Counsel, voting law a bore,
Were proud to figure on the floor,
For love of Mary Draper.

"The parson, priest, sub-heriff too,
Were all her slaves, and so would you,
If you had only but one view
Of such a face and shape, or
Her pretty ankles—but, oh no,
It's only west of old Athlone
Such girls were found—and now they're gone;
So here 's to Mary Draper."

"So here 's to Mary Draper," sang out every voice, in such efforts to catch the tune as pleased the taste of the motley assembly.

"For Mary Draper & Co. I thank you," said Maurice. "Quill drinks to Dennis," added he in a grave tone, as he nodded to O'Shaughnessy. "Yes, Shaugh, few men better than ourselves know these matters, and few have had more experience of the three perils of Irishmen—love, liquor, and the law of arrest."

"It's little the latter has ever troubled my father's son," replied O'Shaughnessy; "our family have been writ proof for centuries, and he'd have been a bold man who would have ventured with an original or a true copy within the precincts of Killinaboula."

"Your father had a touch of Larry M'Hale in him," said I, "apparently."

"Exactly so," replied Dennis: "not but they caught him at last; and a scurvy trick it was, and well worthy of him who did it! Yes," said he, with a sigh, "it is only another among the many instances where the better features of our nationality have been used by our enemies as instruments for our destruction; and, should we seek for the causes of unhappiness in our wretched country, we should find them rather in our virtues than in our vices, and in the bright rather than in the darker phases of our character."

"Metaphysics, by Jove!" cried Quill, "but all true at the same time. There was a messmate of mine in the Roscommon, who never paid car-hire in his life. 'Head or harp, Paddy!' he would cry. 'Two pennies or nothing.' 'Harp! for the honor of ould Ireland,' was the invariable response, and my friend was equally sure to make head come uppermost; and, upon my soul, they seem to know the trick at the Home Office."

"That must have been the same fellow that took my father," cried O'Shaughnessy, with energy.

"Let us hear the story, Dennis," said I.

"Yes," said Maurice, "for the benefit of self and fellows, let us hear the stratagem!"

"The way of it was this," resumed O'Shaughnessy; "my father, who, for reasons registered in the King's Bench, spent a great many years of his life in that part of Ireland geographically known as lying west of the law, was obliged, for certain reasons of family, to come up to Dublin. This he proceeded to do with due caution: two trusty servants formed an advance guard, and patrolled the country for at least five miles in advance; after them came a skirmishing body of a few tenants, who, for the consideration of never paying rent, would have charged the whole Court of Chancery, if needful. My father himself, in an old chaise victualled like a fortress, brought up the rear; and, as I said before, he was a bold man who would have attempted to have laid siege to him. As the column advanced into the enemy's country, they assumed a closer order, the patrol and the picket falling back upon the main body; and in this way they reached that most interesting city called Kibbegan. What a fortunate thing it is for us in Ireland that we can see so much of the world without foreign travel, and that any gentleman for six and eight pence can leave Dublin in the morning and visit Timbuctoo against dinner-time! Don't stare! it's truth I'm telling; for dirt, misery, smoke, unaffected behavior, and black faces, I'll back Kibbegan against all Africa. Free-and-easy pleasant people ye are, with a skin as begrimed and as rugged as your own potatoes! But to resume: the sun was just rising in a delicious morning of June, when my father—whose loyal antipathies I have mentioned made him also an early riser—was preparing for the road. A stout escort of his followers were as usual under arms to see him safe in the chaise, the passage to and from which every day being the critical moment of my father's life.

"It's all right, your honor," said his own man as, armed with a blunderbuss, he opened the bed-room door.

"Time enough, Tim," said my father: close the door, for I have 'nt finished my breakfast."

"Now, the real truth was, that my father's attention was at that moment withdrawn from his own concerns, by a scene which was taking place in a field beneath his window.

"But a few minutes before a hack-chaise had stopped upon the road side; out of which sprang three gentlemen, who, proceeding into the field, seemed bent upon something which, whether a survey or a duel, my father could not make out. He was not long, however, to remain in ignorance. One with an easy lounging gait strode towards a distant corner; another took an opposite direction; while the third, a short puffy gentleman, in a red handkerchief and a rabbit-skin waistcoat, proceeded to open a mahogany box, which, to the critical eyes of my respected father, was agreeably suggestive of bloodshed and murder.

"A duel, by Jupiter!" said my father rubbing his hands. "What a heavenly morning the scoundrels have, not a leaf stirring, and a sod like a billiard-table."

"Meanwhile, the little man who officiated as second, it would appear, to both parties, bustled about with activity little congenial to his shape; and, what between snapping the pistols, examining the flints, and ramming down the charges, had got himself into a sufficient perspiration before he commenced to measure out the ground.

"Short distance and no quarter!" shouted one of the combatants from the corner of the field.

"Across a handkerchief if you like!" roared the other.

"Gentlemen every inch of them!" responded my father.

"Twelve paces!" cried the little man. "No more and no less. Don't forget that I am alone in this business!"

"A very true remark!" observed my father; "and an awkward predicament yours will be if they are both shot!"

"By this time the combatants had taken their places, and the little man, having delivered the pistols, was leisurely retiring to give the word. My father, however, whose critical eye was never at fault, detected a circumstance which promised an immense advantage to one at the expense of the other; in fact, one of the parties was so placed with his back to the sun, that his shadow extended in a straight line to the very foot of his antagonist.

"Unfair! unfair!" cried my father, opening the window as he spoke, and addressing himself to him of the rabbit-skin. "I crave your pardon for the interruption," said he; "but I feel bound to observe that that gentleman's shadow is likely to make a shade of him."

"And so it is," observed the short man: "a thousand thanks for your kindness; but the truth is, I am totally unaccustomed to this kind of thing, and the affair will not admit of delay."

"Not an hour!" said one.

"Not five minutes!" growled the other of the combatants.

"Put them up north and south!" said my father.

"Is it thus?"

"Exactly so: but now again the gentleman in the brown coat is covered with the ash-tree."

"And so he is!" said rabbit-skin, wiping his forehead with agitation.

"Move them a little to the left," said he.

"That brings me upon an eminence," said the gentleman in blue; "I'll be d—d if I'll be made a cock-shot of."

"What an awkward little thing it is in the hairy waistcoat!" said my father; "he's lucky if he don't get shot himself."

"May I never! if I'm not sick of you both!" ejaculated rabbit-skin, in a passion. "I've moved you round every point of the compass, and the devil a nearer we are than ever."

"Give us the word," said one.

"The word!"

"Downright murder," said my father.

"I do n't care," said the little man; "we shall be here till doomsday."

"I can't permit this," said my father. "Allow me—;" so saying, he stepped upon the window sill, and leaped down into the field.

"Before I can accept of your politeness," said he of the rabbit-skin, "may I beg to know your name and position in society?"

"Nothing more reasonable," said my father. "I'm Miles O'Shaughnessy, Colonel of the Royal Raspers: here is my card."

"The piece of pasteboard was complacently handed from one to the other of the party, who saluted my father with a smile of most courteous benignity.

"Colonel O'Shaughnessy," said one.

"Miles O'Shaughnessy," said another.

"Of Killinaboula Castle," said the third.

"At your service," said my father bowing as he presented his snuff-box: "and now to business, if you please; for my time also is limited."

"Very true," observed he of the rabbit-skin, and, as you observe, now to business; in virtue of which, Colonel Miles O'Shaughnessy, I hereby arrest you in the king's name. Here is the writ: it's at the suit of Barnaby Kelley, of Loughrea, for the sum of £1583 19s. 7½d. which—

"Before he could conclude the sentence, my father discharged one obligation, by implanting his closed knuckles in his face. The blow well aimed and well intentioned, sent the little fellow summersetting like a sugar hogshead. But, alas! it was of no use; the others, strong and able-bodied, fell both upon him, and after a desperate struggle succeeded in getting him down. To tie his hands, and convey him to the chaise, was the work of a few moments; and, as my father drove by the inn, the last object which caught his view was a bloody encounter between his own people and the myrmidons of the law, who in great numbers had laid siege to the house during his capture. Thus was my father taken; and thus, in reward for yielding to a virtuous weakness in his character, was he consigned to the ignominious duration of a prison. Was I not right, then in saying that such is the melancholy position of our country, the most beautiful traits in our character are converted into the elements of ruin?"

"I dinna think ye hae made out your case, major," said the Scotch doctor, who felt sorely puzzled at my friend's logic.

"If your faether had na' gi'en the bond—"

"There is no saying what he would n't have done to the bailiffs," interrupted Dennis, who was following up a very different train of reasoning.

"I fear me, Doctor," observed Quill, "you are very much behind us in Scotland. Not but that some of your chieftains are very respectable men, and would n't get on badly even in Galway."

"I thank thee muckle for the compliment," said the doctor dryly; "but I hae my doubts they'd think it aye, and they're ornery carls that's no' ower safe to meddle wi'."

"I'd as soon propose a hand of spoiled five to the Pope of Rome, as a joke to one of them," returned Maurice.

"Maybe ye are na' wrang there, Maister Quell."

"Well," cried Hampden, "if I may be allowed an opinion, I can safely aver I know no quarters like Scotland—Edinburgh beyond any thing or anywhere I was ever placed in."

"Always after Dublin," interposed Maurice, while a general chorus of voices re-echoed the sentiment.

"You are certainly in a strong majority," said my friend against me; "but still I recant not my original opinion. Edinburgh before the world. For hospitality that never tires; for pleasant fellows that improve every day of your acquaintance; for pretty girls that make you long for a repeal of the canon about being only singly blessed, and lead you to long for a score of them; Edinburgh before the world."

"Their ankles are devilish thick," whispered Maurice.

"A calumny, a base calumny!"

"And then they drink—"

"Oh—"

"Yes; they drink very strong tea."

"Shall we hae a glass o' sherry together, Hampden," said the Scotch doctor, willing to acknowledge his defence of auld Reekie.

"And we'll take O'Malley in," said Hampden; "he looks imploringly."

"And now to return to the charge," quoth Maurice.—"In what particular dare ye contend the palm with Dublin? We'll not speak of beauty. I can't suffer any such profane turn in the conversation as to dispute the superiority of Irish women's lips, eyes, noses, and eye-brows, to any thing under heaven. We'll not talk of gay fellows; egad we needn't. I'll give you the garrison; a decent present, and I'll back the Irish bar for more genuine drolle-ry, more epigram, more ready sparkling fun, than the whole rest of the empire—ay, and all her colonies—can boast of."

"They are nae remarkable for passing the bottle, if they resemble their gifted advocate," observed the Scotchman.

"But they are for filling and emptying both, making its current as it glides by like a rich stream glittering in the sunbeams with the sparkling lustre of their wit. Lord, how I'm blown! Fill my panniken, Charley; there's no subduing a Scot. Talk with him, fight with him, and he'll always have the best of it: there's only one way of concluding the treaty—"

"And that is—"

"Blarney him. Lord bless you he can't stand it. Tell him Holyrood's like Versailles, and the Tromachs finer than Mount Blanc; that Gordie Buchanan was Homer, and the Cannongate Herculeum,—then ye have him on the hip. Now ye never can humbug an Irishman that way; he knows you're quizzing him when you praise his country."

"Ye are right, Hampden," said the Scotch doctor in reply to some observation. "We are vara primitive in the hielands, and we keep to our ain national customs in dress and every thing; and we are vara slow to learn; and even when we try we are nae ower successfu' in our imitations, which sometimes cost us dearly enough. Ye may have heard, maybe, of the M'Nab o' that ilk, and what happened him with the king's equeury?"

"I am not quite certain," said Hampden "if I ever heard the story."

"It's nae muckle of a story; but the way of it was this:—When Montrose came back from Loudon, he brought with him a few Englishers to show them the Highlands, and let them see something of deer-stalking. Among the rest, a certain Sir George Sowerby, an aid-de-camp or an equeury of the prince. He went out every morning to shoot with his hair curled like a woman, and dressed like a dancing-master. Now, there happened to be at the same time at the castle the Laird o' M'Nab; he was a kind of cousin of the Montrose; and a rough old tyke of the true highland breed—wha' thought that the head of a clan was fully equal to any king or prince. He sat opposite to Sir George at dinner the day of his arrival, and could not conceal his surprise at the many new fangled ways of feeding himself the Englishman adopted. He ate his saumon wi' his fork in ae hand, and a bittock of bread in the other; he would na touch the whiskey; helped himself to a cutlet wi' his fingers; but, what was maist extraordinary of all, he wore a pair of braw white gloves during the whole time o' dinner; and, when they came to tak away the cloth, he drew them off with a great air, and threw them into the middle of it, and then, leisurely taking another pair off a silver salver which his ain man presented, he pat them on for the desert. The M'Nab, who, although an auld-fashioned carle, was aye fond of bringing something new hame to his friends, remarked the Englisher's proceeding with great care, and the next day he appeared at dinner wi' a huge pair of highland mittens, which he wore to the astonishment of all and the amusement of most, through the whole three courses; and exactly as the Englishman changed his gloves, the M'Nab produced a fresh pair of goat's wool, four times as large as the first, which, drawing on with prodigious gravity, he threw the others into the middle of the cloth, remarking as he did so—

"Ye see, captain, we are never ower auld to learn."

"All propriety was now at an end, and a hearty burst of laughter from one end of the table to the other convulsed the whole company; the M'Nab and the Englishman being the only persons who did not join in it, but sat glowering at each other like twa tigers; and, indeed, it need a' the Montrose's interference that they had na' quarreled upon it in the morning."

"The M'Nab was a man after my own heart," said Maurice; "there was something very Irish in the lesson he gave the Englishman."

"I'd rather ye'd told him that than me," said the doctor drily; "he would na hae thanked ye for mistaking him for one of your countrymen."

"Come, doctor!" said Dennis, "could not ye give us a stave? Have ye nothing that smacks of the brown fern and the blue lakes in your memory?"

"I hae na a sang in my mind just noo except Johany Cope; which maybe might not be ower pleasant for the Englishers to listen to."

"I never heard a Scotch song worth sixpence," quoth Maurice, who seemed bent on provoking the doctor's ire. "They contain nothing save some puling sentimentality about lasses with lint white locks, or some absurd laudations of the barley bree."

"Hear till him! hear till him!" said the doctor, reddening with impatience.

"Show me anything," said Maurice, "like the Cruiskeen Lawn or the Jug of Punch; but who can blame them after all? You can't expect much from a people with an imagination as naked as their own knees."

"Maurice, Maurice," cried O'Shaughnessy reprovingly, who saw that he was pushing the other's endurance beyond all bounds.

"I mind weel," said the Scotchman, "what happened to aye o' your countrymen who took upon him to jest as you are doing now. It was to Laurie Cameron he did it."

"And what said the redoubted Laurie in reply?"

"He did na say muckle, but he did something."

"And what might it be?" inquired Maurice.

"He threw him ower the brig of Ayr into the water, and he was drowned!"

"And did Laurie come to no harm about the matter?"
 "Ay! they tried him for it and found him guilty; but when they asked him what he had to say in his defence, he merely replied, 'When the carle sneered about Scotland, I did na suspect that he did na ken how to swim; and so the end of it was, they did naething to Laurie.'"
 "Cool that, certainly," said I.

"I prefer your friend with the mittens, I confess," said Maurice; "though I'm sure both were most agreeable companions. But come, doctor, could n't you give us—"

"Sit ye down, my heartie, and gie us a crack, let the wind tak' the care o' the world on his back."

"You maunna attempt English poetry, my friend Quill; for it must be confessed ye've a damnable accent of your ain."

"Milesian-Phœnician-Corkacian: nothing more, my boy; and a coaxing kind of recitative it is, after all. Do n't tell me of your soft Etruscan—your plethoric Hock Deutsch—your flattering French. To woo and win the girl of your heart, give me a rich brogue and the least taste in life of blarney!"

"There's naething like it, believe me—every inflexion of your voice suggesting some tender pressure of her soft hand or taper waist; every cadence falling upon her gentle heart like a sea breeze on a burning coast, or a soft sirocco over a rose tree; and then think, my boys, and it is a fine thought after all,—what a glorious gift that is, out of the reach of kings to give or to take, what neither depends upon the act of Union nor the Habeas Corpus. No! they may starve us—laugh at us—tax us—transport us. They may take our mountains, our valleys, and our bogs; but, bad luck to them, they can't steal our 'blarney'; that's the privilege one and indivisible with our identity; and while an Englishman raves of his liberty—a Scotchman of his oatmeal—blarney's our birthright, and a prettier portion I'd never ask to leave behind me to my sons. If I'd as large a family as the old gentleman, called Priam, we used to hear of at school, it's the only inheritance I'd give them; and one comfort there would be beside—the legacy duty would be only a trifle. Charley, my son, I see you're listening to me, and nothing satisfies me more than to instruct aspiring youth; so never forget the old song,

"If at your case, the girls ye'd please,
 And win them, like Kate Kearney,
 There's but one way, I've heard them say,
 Go kiss the 'Stone of Blarney.'"

"What do you say, Shaugh, if we drink it with all the honors?"

"But gently: do I hear a trumpet there?"

"Ah, there go the bugles. Can it be daybreak already?"

"How short the nights are at this season!" said Quill.

"What an infernal rumpus they're making! it's not possible the troops are to march so early."

"It would n't surprise me in the least," quoth Maurice; "there is no knowing what the Commander-in-Chief's not capable of: the reason's clear enough."

"And why, Maurice?"

"There's not a bit of blarney about him."

The réveille sang out from every brigade, and the drums beat to fall in, while Mike came galloping up at full speed to say that the bridge of boats was completed, and that the twelfth were already ordered to cross. Not a moment was therefore to be lost; one parting cup we drained to our next meeting, and amid a hundred "good-byes" we mounted our horses. Poor Hampden's brains sadly confused by the wine and the laughing, he knew little of what was going on around him, and passed the entire time of our homeward ride in a vain endeavor to adapt Mary Draper to the air of Rôte Britannia.

CHAPTER XXII....Fuentes d'Onoro.

From this period the French continued their retreat, closely followed by the allied armies, and on the 5th April, Massena once more crossed the frontier into Spain, leaving thirty thousand of his bravest troops behind him, fourteen thousand of whom had fallen, or been taken prisoners: reinforcements, however, came rapidly pouring in. Two divisions of the ninth corps had already arrived, and Drouet, with eleven thousand infantry and cavalry was preparing to march to his assistance. Thus strengthened, the French army marched toward the Portuguese frontier, and Lord Wellington, who had determined not to hazard much by his blockade of Ciudad Rodrigo, fell back upon the large table land between the Turones and the Dos Casas, with his left at Fort Concepcion, and his right: resting upon Fuentes d'Onoro. His position extended to about five miles; and here, although vastly inferior in numbers, yet relying upon the bravery of the troops and the moral ascendancy acquired by their pursuit of the enemy, he finally resolved upon giving them battle.

Being sent with despatches to Pack's brigade, which formed the blockading force at Almeida, I did not reach Fuentes d'Onoro until the evening of the third. The thundering of the guns which, even at the distance I was at, was plainly heard, announced that an attack had taken place, but it by no means prepared me for the scene which presented itself on my return.

The village of Fuentes d'Onoro, one of the most beautiful in Spain, is situated in a lovely valley, where all the charms of verdure so peculiar to the Peninsula seem to have been scattered with a lavish hand. The citron and the arbutus growing wild, sheltered every cottage door, and the olive and the laurel threw their shadows across the little rivulet which traversed the village. The houses, observing no uniform arrangement, stood wherever the caprice or the inclination of the builder suggested, surrounded with little gardens; the inequality of the ground imparting a picturesque feature to even the lowliest hut, while, upon a craggy eminence above the rest, an ancient convent and a ruined chapel looked down upon the little peaceful hamlet with an air of tender protection.

Hitherto this lovely spot had escaped all the ravages of war. The light division of our army had occupied it for months long; and every family was gratefully remembered by some one or other of our officers; and more than one of our wounded found in the kind and affectionate watching of these poor peasants the solace which sickness rarely meets with when far from home and country.

It was then with a broken heart I pressed my horse forward into the gallies as the night drew near. The artillery had been distinctly heard during the day, and, while I burned with eagerness to know the result, I felt scarcely less anxious for the fate of that little hamlet whose name many a kind story had implanted in my memory. The moon was shining brightly as I passed the outpost; and, leading my horse by the bridle, descended the steep and rugged causeway to the village beneath me. The lanterns were moving rapidly to and fro; the measured tread of infantry at night—that ominous sound, which falls upon the heart so sadly—told me that they were burying the dead. The air was still and breathless; not a sound was stirring save the step of the soldiery, and the harsh clash of the shovel as it struck the earth. I felt sad, and sick at heart, and leaned against a tree; a nightingale concealed in the leaves was pouring forth its plaintive notes to the night air, and in its low warble sounded like the dirge of the departed. Far beyond, in the plain, the French watch-fires were burning, and I could see from time to time the fatigue parties moving in search of their wounded. At this moment the clock of the convent struck eleven, and a merry chime rang out, and was taken up in echoes, till it melted away in the distance. Alas! where were those whose hearts were wont to be cheered at that happy peal, whose infancy it had gladdened, whose old age it had hallowed: the fallen walls, the broken roof trees, the ruin and desolation on every side told too plainly that they had passed away for ever! The smoking embers, the torn-up pathway denoted the hard-fought struggle; and, as I passed along, I could see that every garden, where the cherry and the apple blossom were even still perfuming the air, had now its sepulchre.

"Halt, there!" cried a hoarse voice in front. "You cannot pass this way; the Commander in Chief's quarters."

I looked up, and beheld a small but neat looking cottage which seemed to have suffered less than the others around. Lights were shining brightly from the windows, and I could even detect from time to time a figure muffled up in a cloak, passing to and fro across the window; while another, seated at a table, was occupied in writing. I turned into a narrow path which led into the little square of the village, and here, as I approached, the hum and murmur of voices announced a bivouac party. Stopping to ask what had been the result of the day, I learned that a tremendous attack had been made by the French in column, upon the village, which was at first successful; but that afterward the 71st and 79th, marching down from the heights, had repulsed the enemy, and driven them beyond the Dos Casas: five hundred had fallen in that fierce encounter, which was continued through every street and alley of the little hamlet. The gallant highlanders now occupied the battle-field; and, hearing that the cavalry brigade was some miles distant, I willingly accepted their offer to share their bivouac, and passed the remainder of the night among them.

When day broke, our troops were under arms, but the enemy showed no disposition to renew the attack. We could perceive, however, from the road to the southward, by the long columns of dust, that reinforcements were still arriving; and learned during the morning, from a deserter, that Massena himself had come up, and Bessières also, with twelve hundred cavalry, and a battery of the imperial guard.

From the movements observable in the enemy, it was soon evident that the battle, though deferred, was not abandoned; and the march of a strong force toward the left of their position induced our Commander-in-chief to despatch the seventh division, under Houston, to occupy the height of Naval d'Aver—our extreme right—in support of which our brigade of cavalry marched as a covering force. The British position was thus unavoidably extended to the enormous length of seven miles, occupying a succession of small eminences, from the division at Fort Concepcion to the height of Naval d'Aver—Fuentes d'Onoro forming nearly the centre of the line.

It was evident, from the thickening combinations of the French, that a more dreadful battle was still in reserve for us; and yet never did men look more anxiously for the morrow.

As for myself, I felt a species of exhilaration I had never before experienced; the events of the preceding day came dropping in upon me from every side, and at every new tale of gallantry or daring I felt my heart bounding with excited eagerness to win also my meed of honorable praise.

Crawford, too, had recognized me in the kindest manner; and, while saying that he did not wish to withdraw me from my regiment on a day of battle, added that he would make use of me for the present on his staff. Thus was I engaged, from early in the morning till late in the evening, bringing orders and despatches along the line: the troop-horse I rode—for I reserved my gray for the following day—was scarcely able to carry me along, as toward dark I journeyed along in the direction of Naval d'Aver. When I did reach our quarters, the fires were lighted, and around one of them I had the good fortune to find a party of the 14th occupied in discussing a very appetizing little supper: the clatter of plates and the popping of champagne corks were most agreeable sounds. Indeed, the latter appeared to me so much too flattering an illusion, that I hesitated giving credit to my senses in the matter, when Baker called out—

"Come, Charley, sit down; you're just in the nick. Tom Marsden is giving us a benefit: you know Tom—"

And here he presented me in due form to that best of commissaries and most hospitable of horse-dealers.

"I can't introduce you to my friend on my right," continued Baker, "for my Spanish is only a skeleton battalion; but he's a trump—that I'll vouch for; never finches his glass, and looks as though he enjoyed all our nonsense."

The Spaniard, who appeared to comprehend that he was alluded to, gravely saluted me with a low bow, and offered his glass to hobnob with me. I returned the courtesy with becoming ceremony; while Hampden whispered in my ear—

"A fine-looking fellow. You know who he is? Julian, the Guerilla chief."

I had heard much of both the strangers. Tom Marsden was a household word in every cavalry brigade, equally celebrated for his contracts and his claret. He knew every one, from Lord Wellington to the last joined cornet; and, while upon a march, there was no piece of better fortune than to be asked to dine with him. So, in the very thick of a battle, Tom's critical eye was scanning the squadrons engaged, with an accuracy as to the number of fresh horses that would be required upon the morrow that nothing but long practice and infinite coolness could have conferred.

Of the Guerilla I need not speak. The bold feats he accomplished, the aid he rendered to the cause of his country, have made his name historical. Yet still, with all this, fatigue, more powerful than my curiosity, prevailed, and I sank into a heavy sleep upon the grass; while my merry companions kept up their revels till near morning. The last piece of consciousness I am sensible of, was seeing Julian spreading his wide mantle over me as I lay, while I heard his deep voice whisper a kind wish for my repose.

CHAPTER XXIII....The Battle of Fuentes d'Onoro.

So soundly did I sleep, that the tumult and confusion of the morning never awoke me; and the guerilla, whose cavalry were stationed along the edge of the ravine near the heights of Echora, would not permit of my being roused before the last moment. Mike stood near me with my horse, and it was only when the squadrons were actually forming that I sprang to my feet and looked around me.

The day was just breaking; a thick mist lay upon the parched earth, and concealed every thing a hundred yards from where we stood. From this dense vapor the cavalry defiled along the base of the hill, followed by the horse artillery and the guards, disappearing again as they passed us, but proving, as the mass of troops now assembled, that our position was regarded as the probable point of attack.

While the troops continued to take up their position, the sun shone out, and a slight breeze blowing at the same moment, the heavy clouds moved past, and we beheld the magnificent panorama of the battle-field. Before us, at the distance of less than half a league, the French cavalry were drawn up in three strong columns: the cuirassiers of the guard, plainly distinguished by their steel cuirasses, flanked by the Polish lancers, and a strong hussar brigade; a powerful artillery train supported the left, and an infantry force occupied the entire space between the right and the rising ground opposite Poço Velho. Farther to their right, again, the column destined for the attack of Fuentes d'Onoro were forming, and we could see that, profiting by their past experience, they were bent upon attacking the village with an overwhelming force.

For above two hours the French continued to manoeuvre, more than one alteration having taken place in their disposition; fresh battalions were moved toward the front, and gradually the whole of their cavalry was assembled on the extreme left in front of our position. Our people were ordered to breakfast where we stood; and a little after seven o'clock a staff officer came riding down the line, followed in a few moments after by General Crawford, when no sooner was his well known brown cob recognized by the troops, than a hearty cheer greeted him along the whole division.

"Thank ye, boys; thank ye, boys, with all my heart. No man feels more sensibly what that cheer means than I do. Guards! Lord Wellington relies upon your maintaining this position, which is essential to the safety of the whole line. You will be supported by the light division. I need say no more. If such troops cannot keep their ground, none can. Fourteenth, there's your place; the artillery and the sixteenth are with you. They've the odds of us in numbers, lads; but it will tell all the better in the gazette. I see they're moving; so fall in, now; fall in, and, Merivale, move to the front. Ramsey, prepare to open your fire on the attacking squadrons."

As he spoke, the low murmuring sound of distant moving cavalry crept along the earth, growing louder and louder, till at length we could detect the heavy tramp of the squadron as they came on in a trot, our pace being merely a walk. While we thus advanced into the plain the artillery unlimbered behind us, and the Spanish cavalry breaking into skirmishers, dashed boldly to the post.

It was an exciting moment. The ground dipped between the two armies so as to conceal the head of the advancing column of the French, and, as the Spanish skirmishers disappeared down the ridge, our beating hearts and straining eyes followed their last horseman.

"Halt! halt!" was passed from squadron to squadron, and the same instant the sharp ring of the pistol shots and the clash of steel from the valley, told us the battle had begun. We could hear the guerilla war-cry mingle with the French shout, while the thickening crash of fire-arms implied a sharper conflict. Our fellows were already manifesting some impatience to press on, when a Spanish horseman appeared above the ridge—another followed, and another—and then pell-mell, broken and disordered, they fell back before the pursuing cavalry in flying masses; while the French, charging them hotly home, utterly routed and repulsed them.

The leading squadrons of the French now fell back upon their support; the column of attack thickened, and a thundering noise between their masses announced their brigade of light guns as they galloped to the front. It was then for the first time that I felt dispirited; far as my eye could stretch the dense mass of sabres extended, defiling from the distant hills and winding its slow length across the plain. I turned to look at our line, scarce one thousand strong, and could not help feeling that our hour was come: the feeling flashed vividly across my mind, but the next instant I felt my cheek reddened with shame as I gazed upon the sparkling eyes and bold looks around me—the lips compressed, the hands knitted to their sabres; all were motionless, but burning to advance.

The French had halted on the brow of the hill to form, when Merivale came cantering up to us.

"Fourteenth, are ye ready? Are ye ready, lads?"

"Ready, sir! ready!" re-echoed along the line.

"Then push them home and charge! Charge!" cried he, raising his voice to a shout at the last word.

Heavens! what a crash was there! Our horses, in top condition, no sooner felt the spur than they bounded madly onward. The pace—for the distance did not exceed four hundred yards—was like racing. To resist the impetus of our approach was impossible; and, without a shot fired, scarcely a sabre-cut exchanged, we actually rode down their advanced squadrons—hurling them headlong upon their supporting division, and rolling men and horses beneath us on every side. The French fell back on their artillery; but, before they could succeed in opening their fire upon us, we had wheeled, and, carrying off about seventy prisoners, galloped back to our position with the loss of but two men in the whole affair. The whole thing was so sudden, so bold, and so successful, that I remember well as we rode back a hearty burst of laughter was ringing through the squadron at the ludicrous display of horsemanship the French presented as they tumbled headlong down the hill; and I cannot help treasuring the recollection, for, from that moment, all thought of any thing short of victory completely quitted my mind, and many of my brother officers who had participated in my feelings at the commencement of the day, confessed to me afterward that it was then for the first time they felt assured of beating the enemy.

While we slowly fell back to our position, the French were seen advancing in great force from the village of Almeida, to the attack of Poço Velho; they came on at a rapid pace, their artillery upon their front and flank, large masses of cavalry hovering around them. The attack upon the village was now opened by the large guns; and, amid the booming of the artillery and the crashing volleys of small fire-arms, rose the shout of the assailants, and the wild cry of the guerilla cavalry, who had formed in front of the village. The French advanced firmly, driving back the pickets, and actually inundated the devoted village with a shower of grape; the blazing fires burst from the ignited roofs; and the black dense smoke rising on high, seemed to rest like a pall over the little hamlet.

The conflict was now a tremendous one: our seventh division held the village with the bayonet; but the French continuing to pour in mass upon mass, drove them back with loss, and, at the end of an hour's hard fighting, took possession of the place.

The wood upon the left flank was now seen to swarm with light infantry, and the advancement of their whole left proved that they meditated to turn our flank: the space between the village and the hill of Naval d'Aver became now the central position; and here the guerilla force, led on by Julian Sanchez, seemed to await the French with confidence. Soon, however, the cuirassiers came galloping to the spot, and, almost without exchanging a sabre cut, the guerillas fell back, and retired behind the Turones. This movement of Julian was more attributable to anger than to fear; for his favorite lieutenant, being mistaken for a French officer, was shot by a soldier of the guards a few minutes before.

Montbrun pursued the guerillas with some squadrons of horse, but they turned resolutely upon the French, and not ill overwhelmed by numbers did they show any disposition to retreat.

The French, however, now threw forward their whole cavalry, and, driving back the English horse, succeeded in turning the right of the seventh division. The battle by this time was general. The staff officers who came up from the left, informed us that Fuentes d'Onoro was attacked in force, Massena himself leading the assault in person; while thus far seven miles the fight was maintained hotly at intervals, it was evident that upon the maintenance of our position the fortune of the day depended. Hitherto, we had been repulsed from the village and the wood; and the dark masses of infantry which were assembled upon our right, seemed to threaten the hill of Naval d'Aver with as sad a catastrophe.

Crawford came now galloping up among us, his eye flashing fire, and his uniform splashed and covered with foam—

"Steady, sixteenth, steady! Don't blow your horses! Have your fellows advanced, Malcolm?" said he, turning to an officer who stood beside him: "ay, there they go," pointing with his finger to the wood where as he spoke, the short ringing of the British rifle proclaimed the advance of that brigade. "Let the cavalry prepare to charge! And now, Ramsey, let us give it them home!"

Scarcely were the words spoken, when the squadrons were formed, and, in an instant after, the French light infantry were seen retreating from the wood, and flying in disorderly masses across the plain. Our squadrons riding down among them, actually cut them to atoms, while the light artillery unlimbering, threw in a deadly discharge of grape-shot.

"To the right, fourteenth, to the right!" cried General Stewart. "Have at their hussars!"

Whirling by them, we advanced at a gallop, and dashed toward the enemy, who not less resolutely bent, came boldly forward to meet us: the shock was terrific; the leading squadrons on both sides went down almost to a man, and, all order being lost, the encounter became one of hand to hand.

The struggle was deadly; neither party would give way; and, while fortune now inclined hither and thither, Sir Charles Stewart singled out the French general Lamotte, and carried him off his prisoner. Meanwhile Montbrun's cavalry and the cuirassiers came riding up, and, the retreat now sounding through our ranks, we were obliged to fall back upon the infantry. The French pursued us hotly; and so rapid was their movement that, before Ramsey's brigade could lunge up and away, their squadrons had surrounded him and captured his guns.

"Where is Ramsey?" cried Crawford, as he galloped to the head of our division. "Cut off—cut off! Taken, by G—! There he goes!" said he, pointing with his finger as a dense cloud of mingled smoke and dust moved darkly across the plain. "Form into column once more!"

As he spoke, the dense mass before us seemed agitated by some mighty commotion; the flashing of blades and the rattling of small arms, mingled with shouts of triumph or defiance, burst forth, and the ominous cloud lowering more darkly, seemed peopled by those in deadly strife. An English cheer pealed high above all other sounds; a second followed; the mass was rent asunder, and, like the forked lightning from a thunder cloud, Ramsey rode forth at the head of his battery, his horses bounding madly, while the guns sprang behind them, like things of no weight; the gunners leaped to their places, and, fighting hand to hand with the French cavalry, they flew across the plain.

"Nobly done, gallant Ramsey!" said a voice behind me. I turned at the sound; it was Lord Wellington who spoke. My eye fixed upon his stern features, I forgot all else, when he suddenly recalled me to my recollection by saying—

"Follow your brigade, sir. Charge!"

In an instant I was with my people, who, intervening between Ramsey and his pursuers, repulsed the enemy with loss and carried off several prisoners. The French, however, came up in greater strength; overwhelming masses of cavalry came sweeping upon us, and we were obliged to retire behind the light division, which rapidly formed into squares to resist the cavalry. The seventh division, which was more advanced, were however too late for this movement, and before they could effect their formation, the French were upon them. At this moment they owed their safety to the chasseurs Britanniques, who poured in a flanking fire, so close, and with so deadly aim, that their foes recoiled, beaten and bewildered.

Meanwhile, the French had become masters of Poço Velho; the formidable masses had nearly outflanked us on the right. The battle was lost, if we could not fall back upon our original position, and concentrate our forces upon Fuentes d'Onoro. To effect this was a work of great difficulty, but no time was to be lost. The seventh division were ordered to cross the Turones, while Crawford, forming the light division into squares, covered their retreat, and, supported by the cavalry, sustained the whole force of the enemy's attack.

Then was the moment to witness the cool and steady bravery of British infantry; the squares dotted across the enormous plain seemed as nothing amid that confused and flying multitude, composed of commissariat baggage camp followers, peasants, and, finally, broken pickets and videttes arriving from the wood. A cloud of cavalry hovered and darkened around them: the Polish lancers shook their long spears, impatient of delay, and the wild huzzas burst momentarily from their squadrons as they waited for the word to attack. But the British stood firm and undaunted; and, although the enemy rode round their squares, Montbrun himself at their head, they never dared to charge them. Meanwhile, the seventh fell back, as if on a parade, and, crossing the river, took up their ground at Frenada, pivoting upon the first division; the remainder of the line fell also back, and assumed a position at right angles with their former one, the cavalry forming in front, and holding the French in check during the movement. This was a splendid manoeuvre, and, when made in face of an over-numbering enemy, one unmatched during the whole war.

At sight of this new front the French stopped short, and opened a fire from their heavy guns. The British batteries replied with vigor, and silenced the enemy's cannon. The cavalry drew out of range, and the infantry gradually fell back to their former position. While this was going on, the attack upon Fuentes d'Onoro was continued with unabated vigor. The three British regiments in the lower town were pierced by the French tirailleurs, who poured upon them in overwhelming numbers; the seventy-ninth were broken, ten companies taken, and Cameron, their colonel, mortally wounded. Thus the lower village was in the hands of the enemy, while from the upper town the incessant roll of musketry proclaimed the obstinate resistance of the British.

At this period our reserves were called up from the right, in time to resist the additional troops which Dromet continued to bring on. The French, reinforced by the whole sixth corps, now came forward at a quick step. Dashing through the ruined streets of the lower town, they crossed the rivulet, fighting bravely, and charged against the height. Already their leading files had gained the crag beside the chapel. A French colonel, holding his cap upon his sword-point, waved on his men.

The grizzly features of the grenadiers soon appeared, and the dark column, half climbing, half running, were seen scaling the height. A rifle bullet sent the French leader tumbling from the precipice; and a cheer—mad and reckless as the war-cry of an Indian—rent the sky, as the seventy-first and seventy-ninth Highlanders sprang upon the enemy.

Our part was a short one: advancing in half squadrons we were concealed from the observation of the enemy by the thick vineyards which skirted the lower town; waiting, with impatience, the moment when our gallant infantry should succeed in turning the tide of battle. We were ordered to dismount, and stood with our bridles on our arms anxious and expectant. The charge of the French column was made close to where we were standing—the inspiring cheers of the officers, the loud roars of the men, were plainly heard by us as they rushed to the assault; but the space between us was intersected by walls and brushwood, which totally prevented the movements of cavalry.

Fearlessly their dark column moved up the heights, fixing the bayonets as they went. No tirailleurs preceded them, but the tall shako of the grenadier of the guard was seen in the first rank. Long before the end of the column had passed us the leading files were in action. A deafening peal of musketry—so loud—so dense—it seemed like artillery, burst forth. A volume of black smoke rolled heavily down from the heights and hid all from our view, except when the vivid lightning of the platoon firing rent the veil asunder, and showed us the troops almost in hand to hand conflict.

"It's Picton's division, I'm certain," cried Merivale, "I hear the bagpipes of the Highlanders."

"You are right, sir," said Hampden, "the 71st are in the same brigade, and I know their bugles well. There they go again."

"Fourteenth! fourteenth!" cried a voice from behind, and at the same moment a staff officer without his hat, and his horse bleeding from a recent sabre cut, came up. "You must move to the rear, Colonel Merivale; the French have gained the heights. Move round by the causeway—bring up your squadrons as quickly as you can and support the infantry."

In a moment we were in our saddles, but scarcely was the word "to fall in" given, when a loud cheer rent the very air; the musketry seemed suddenly to cease, and the mass which seemed to struggle up the heights wavered, broke, and turned.

"What can that be?" said Merivale. "What can it mean?"

"I can tell you, sir," said I proudly, while I felt my heart as though it would bound from my bosom.

"And what is it, boy? Speak!"

"There it goes again! That was an Irish shout!—the 88th are at them!"

"By Jove! here they come," said Hampden; "God help the Frenchmen now!"

The words were not well spoken, when the red coats of our gallant fellows were seen dashing through the vineyard.

"The steel, boys—nothing but the steel!" shouted a loud voice from the crag above our heads.

I looked up. It was the stern Picton himself who spoke. The 88th now led the pursuit, and sprang from rock to rock in all the mad impetuosity of battle; and like some mighty billow rolling before the gale, the French went down the heights.

"Gallant 88th! Gloriously done!" cried Picton, as he waived his hat.

"Ar'nt we Connaught robbers, now?" shouted a rich brogue, as its owner, breathless and bleeding, pressed forward in the charge.

A hearty burst of laughter mingled with the din of the battle.

"Now for it, boys! Now for our work!" said Merivale, drawing his sabre as he spoke, "Forward! and charge!"

We waited not a second bidding, but bursting from our concealment, galloped down in the broken column. It was no regular charge, but an indiscriminate rush. Scarcely offering resistance, the enemy fell beneath our sabres, or the still more deadly bayonets of the infantry, who were inextricably mingled up in the conflict.

The chase was followed up for above half a mile, when we fell back, fortunately, in good time; for the French had opened a heavy fire from their artillery, and regardless of their own retreating column, poured a shower of grape among our squadrons. As we retired, the straggling files of the Rangers joined us,—their faces and accoutrements blackened and begrimed with powder; many of them, themselves wounded, had captured prisoners; and one huge fellow of the grenadier company was seen driving before him a no less powerful Frenchman, and to whom, as he turned from time to time reluctantly and scowled upon his jailor, the other vociferated some Irish imprecation, whose harsh intentions were made most palpably evident by a flourish of a drawn bayonet.

"Who is he?" said Mike; "who is he a bagur?"

"Sorrow o' me knows," said the other; "but it's the chap that shot Lieutenant Mahony, and I never took my eye off him after; and if the lieutenant's not dead, sure it'll be a satisfaction to him that I cotched him." *

The lower town was now evacuated by the French, who retired beyond the range of our artillery; the upper continued in the occupation of our troops; and, worn out and exhausted, surrounded by dead and dying, both parties abandoned the contest,—and the battle was over.

Both sides laid claim to the victory: the French, because, having taken the village of Poço Vello, they had pierced the British line, and compelled them to fall back and assume a new position; the British, because the attack upon Fuentes d'Onoro had been successfully resisted, and the blockade of Almeida—the real object of the battle—maintained. The loss to each was tremendous: fifteen hundred men and officers, of whom three hundred were prisoners, were lost by the allies, and a far greater number fell among the forces of the enemy.

After the action, a brigade of the light division released the troops in the village, and the armies bivouaced once more in sight of each other.

JANE SINCLAIR; OR THE FAWN OF SPRING-VALE.

BY WILLIAM CARLETON,

AUTHOR OF "FARDOROUGH THE MIER," "TRAITS AND STORIES OF THE IRISH PEASANTRY," ETC.

The heart, however, as we said, will, after the repose which must follow excitement, necessarily move toward that object in which it seeks its ultimate enjoyment. A week had now elapsed, and Jane began to feel troubled by the absence of her lover. Her eye wished once more to feast upon his beauty, and her ear again to drink in the melody of his voice. It was true—it was surely true—and she put her long white fingers to her forehead while thinking of him—yes, yes—it was true that he loved her—but her heart called again for his presence, and longed to hear him once more repeat, in fervid accents of eloquence, the enthusiasm of his passion.

Acknowledged love, however, in pure and honorable minds, places the conduct under that refined sense of propriety, which is not only felt to be a restraint upon the freedom of virtuous principle itself, but is observed with that jealous circumspection which considers even suspicion as a stain upon its purity. No matter how intense affection in a virtuous bosom may be, yet no decorum of life is violated by it, no outwork even of the minor morals surrendered, nor is any act or expression suffered to appear that might take away from the exquisite feeling of what is morally essential to female modesty. For this reason, therefore, it was that our heroine, though anxious to meet Osborne again, could not bring herself to walk toward her accustomed haunts, lest he might suspect that she thus indelicately sought him out. He had frequently been there, and wondered that she never came; but however deep his disappointment at her absence, or it might be neglect, yet in consequence of their last interview he could not summon courage to pay a visit, as he had sometimes before done, to her family.

Nearly a fortnight had now elapsed, when Jane, walking one day in a small shrubbery that skirted the little lawn before her father's door, received a note by a messenger whom she recognised as a servant of Mr. Osborne's.

The man, after putting it into her hands, added:

"It was desired, if possible, to bring back an answer."

She blushed deeply on receiving it, and shook so much that the tremor of her small white hands gave evident proof of the agitation which it produced in her bosom. She read as follows:—

"Oh, why is it that I cannot see you? or what has become of you? This absence is painful to me beyond the power of endurance. Alas! if you loved with the deep and burning devotion that I do, you would not thus avoid me. Do you not know, and feel, that our hearts have poured into each other the secret of our mutual passion? Oh, surely, surely, you cannot forget that moment—a moment for which I could willingly endure a century of pain. That moment has thrown a charm into my existence that will render my whole future life sweet. All that I may suffer will be, and already is, softened in the consciousness that you love me. Oh, let me see you—I cannot rest, I cannot live without you. I beseech you, I implore you, as you would not bring me down to despair and sorrow—as you would not wring my heart with the agony of disappointment—to meet me this evening at the same place, and the same hour as before.

Yours—yours for ever, C. O."

"N. B.—The bearer is trustworthy, and already acquainted with the secret of our attachment, so that you need not hesitate to send me a reply by him—and let it be a written one."

After perusing this, she paused for a moment, and felt so much embarrassed by the fact of their love being known to a third person, that she could not look upon the messenger while addressing him without shamefacedness and confusion.

"Wait a little," she said at length, "I will return presently"—and with a singular conflict between joy, shame, and terror, she passed with downcast looks out of the shrubbery, sought her own room, and having placed writing materials before her, attempted to write. It was not, however, till after some minutes that she could collect herself sufficiently to use them. As she took the pen in her hand, something like guilt seemed to press upon her heart—the blood feroaked her cheeks, and her strength absolutely left her.

"Is not this wrong?" she thought. "I have already been guilty of dissimulation, if not of direct falsehood to my father, and now I am about to enter into a correspondence without his knowledge."

The acuteness of her moral sense occasioned her, in fact, to feel much distress, and the impression of religious sanction early inculcated upon a mind naturally so gentle and innocent as hers, cast by its solemn influence a deep gloom over the brief history of their loves. She laid the pen down, and covering her face with both hands, burst into a flood of tears.

"Why is it," she said to herself, "that a conviction as of guilt mingles itself with my affection for him; and that snatches of pain and melancholy darken my mind, when I join in our morning and evening worship? I fear, I fear, that God's grace and protection have been withdrawn from me ever since I deceived my father. But these errors," she proceeded, "are my own and not Charles's—and why should he suffer pain and distress because I have been uncandid to others?"

Upon this slender argument she proceeded to write the following reply, but still with an undercurrent of something like remorse stealing through a mind that felt with incredible delicacy the slightest deviation from what was right, yet possessed not the necessary firmness to resist what was wrong.

"I know that it is indelicate, and very improper—yes, and sinful in me to write to you—and I would not do so, but that I cannot bear to think that you should suffer pain. Why should you be distressed when you know that my affection for you will never change?—will, alas! I should add, can never change. Dear Charles, is it not sufficient for our happiness that our love is mutual? It ought at least to be so; and it would be so, provided we kept its character unstained by any deviation from moral feeling or duty in the sight of God. You must not continue to write to me, for I shall not and I cannot persist in a course of deliberate insincerity to those who love me with so much affection. I will, however, see you this day two hours earlier than the time appointed in this note. I could not absent myself from the family then, without again risking an indirect breach of truth, and this I am resolved never to do. I hope you will not think less of me for writing to you, although it be very wrong on my part. I have already wept for it, and my eyes are even now filled with tears; but you surely will not be a harsh judge upon the conduct of your own

"JANE SINCLAIR."

Having sealed this letter, she hid it in her bosom, and after delaying a short time to compose her features, again proceeded to the shrubbery, where she found the servant waiting. Simple as was the act of handing him the note, yet so inexpressibly delicate was the whole tenor of her mind, that the slightest step irreconcilable with her standard of female propriety, left behind it a distinct and painful trace that disturbed the equilibrium of a character so finely balanced. With an abashed face and burning brow, she summoned courage, however, to give it, and was instantly proceeding home, when the messenger observed that she had given him the wrong letter. She then took the right one from her bosom, and placing it in his hands would again have hurried into the house.

"You do not mean, I suppose, to send him back his own note," said the man, handing her Osborne's as he spoke.

"No, no," she replied, "give it to me; I knew not—in fact it was a mistake." She then received Osborne's letter, and hastily withdrew.

The reader may have observed, that so long as Jane merely contemplated the affection that subsisted between Osborne and herself, as a matter unconnected with any relative association, and one on which the heart will dwell with delight while nothing intrudes to disturb its serenity, so long was the contemplation one of perfect happiness. But the moment she approached her family, or found herself on the eve of taking another step in its progress, such was her almost morbid candor, and her timid shrinking from any violation of truth, that her affection for this very reason became darkened, as she herself said, by snatches of melancholy and pain.

It is, indeed, difficult to say whether such a tender perception of good and evil as characterised all her emotions, may not have predisposed her mind to the unhappy malady which eventually overcame it; or whether, on the other hand, the latent existence of the malady in her temperament may not have rendered such perceptions too delicate for the healthy discharge of human duties.

Be this as it may, our innocent and beautiful girl is equally to be pitied; and we trust that in either case the sneers of the coarse and heartless will be spared against a character which they cannot understand. At all events, it is we think slightly, and but slightly evident, that even at the present stage of her affection, something prophetic of her calamity, in a faintly perceptible degree may, to an observing mind, be recognised in the vivid but impulsive power with which that affection has operated upon her. If any thing could prove this, it is the fervency with which, previous to the hour of appointment, she bent in worship before God, to beseech his pardon for the secret interview she was about to give her lover. And in any other case, such an impression, full of religious feeling as it was, would have prevented the subject of it from acting contrary to its tendency; but here was the refined dread of error, lively even to acuteness, absolutely incapable of drawing back the mind from the transgression of moral duty which filled it with feeling nearly akin to remorse.

Jane that day met the family at dinner, merely as a matter of course, for she could eat nothing. There was, independently of this, a timidity in her manner which they noticed, but could not understand.

"Why," said her father, "you never were a great eater, Jane, but latterly you live, like the chameleon, on air. Surely your health cannot be good with such a poor appetite!—your own Ariel eats more."

"I feel my health to be very good, papa; but—" she hesitated a little, attempted to speak, and paused again: "although my health is good," she at last proceeded, "I am not, papa—I mean my spirits are sometimes better than they ever were, and sometimes more depressed."

"They are depressed now, Jane," said her mother. "I don't know that, mamma. Indeed I could not describe my present state of feeling; but I think—indeed I know I am not so good as I ought to be. I am not so good, mamma, and may be one day you will all have to forgive me more than you think."

Her father laid his knife and fork down, and fixing his eyes affectionately upon her, said:

"My child, there is something wrong with you." Jane herself, who sat beside her mother, made no reply; but putting her arms about her neck, she laid her cheek against hers, and wept for many minutes. She then rose in a paroxysm of increasing sorrow, and throwing her arms about her father's neck also, sobbed out as upon the occasion already mentioned:

"Oh, papa, pity and forgive me;—your poor Jane, pity her and forgive her."

The old man struggled with his grief, for he saw that the tears of the family rendered it a duty upon him to be firm: nay, he smiled after a manner, and said in a voice of forced good humor:

"You are a foolish slut, Jane, and play upon us, because you know we pet and love you too much. If you cannot eat your dinner go play, and get an appetite for to-morrow."

She kissed him, and as was her habit of compliance with his slightest wish, left the room as he had desired her.

"Henry," said his wife, "there is something wrong with her."

For a time he could not speak; but after a deep silence he wiped away a few straggling tears, and replied:

"Yes! yes! do you not see that there is a mystery upon my child!—a mystery which weighs down my heart with affliction."

"Dear papa," said Agnes, "don't forbode evil for her."

"It's a more nervous affection," said William. "She ought to take more exercise. Of late she has been too much within."

Maria and Agnes exchanged looks; and for the first time, a suspicion of the probable cause flashed simultaneously across their minds. They sat beside each other at dinner, and Maria said in a whisper:

"Agnes, you and I are thinking of the same thing."

"I am thinking of Jane," said her candid and affectionate sister.

"My opinion is," rejoined Maria, "that she is attached to Charles Osborne."

"I suspect it is so," whispered Agnes. "Indeed from many things that occur to me I am now certain of it."

"I don't see any particular harm in that," replied Maria.

"It may be a very unhappy attachment for Jane, though," said Agnes. "Only think, Maria, if Osborne should not return her affection: I knew Jane—she would sink under it."

"Not return her affection!" replied her sister. "Where would he find another so beautiful, and every way so worthy of him?"

"Very true, Maria; and I trust in heaven he may think so. But how, if he should never know or suspect her love for him?"

"I cannot answer that," said the other; "but we will talk more about it by-and-by."

Whilst this dialogue went on in a low tone, the other members of the family sat in silence and concern, each evidently anxious to develop the mystery of Jane's recent excitement at dinner. At length the old man's eye fell upon his two other daughters, and he said:—

"What is this, children—what is this whispering all about? Perhaps some of you can explain the conduct of that poor child."

"But, papa," said Agnes, "you are not to know all our secrets."

"Am I not, indeed, Aggy? That's pretty evident from the cautious tone in which you and Mary speak."

"Well, but Agnes is right, Henry," said her mother: "to know the daughters' secrets is my privilege—and yours to know William's—if he has any."

"Upon my word, mother, mine are easily carried, I assure you."

"Suppose, papa," observed Agnes, good-humoredly, "that I was to fall in love, now—it is not —"

"Impossible that you may, you baggage," replied her father, smiling, whilst he completed the sentence: "well, and you would not tell me if you did?"

"No indeed, sir; I should not. Perhaps I ought,—but I could not, certainly, bring myself to do it. For instance, would it be either modest or delicate in me, to go and say to your face, 'Papa, I'm in love.' In that case the next step, I suppose, would be to make you the messenger between us. Now would you not expect as much, papa, if I told you?" said the arch and lively girl.

"Aggy, you are a presuming gipsy," replied the old man, joining in the laugh which she had caused—"me your messenger!"

"Yes, and a steady one you would make, sir. I am sure you would not, at all events, overstep your instructions."

"That will be one quality essentially necessary to any messenger of yours, Agnes," replied her father, in the same spirit.

"Papa," said she, suddenly changing her manner, and laying aside her gayety, "what I said in jest of myself, may be seriously true of another in this very family. Suppose Jane —"

"Jane!" exclaimed the old man;—"impossible! She is but a girl!—a child!"

"Agnes, this is foolish of you," said her sister. "It is possible, after all, that you are doing poor Jane injustice. Papa, Agnes only speaks from suspicion. We are not certain of anything. It was I mentioned it first, but merely from suspicion."

"If Jane's affections are engaged," said her father, "I tremble to think of the consequences should she experience the slightest disappointment. But it cannot be, Maria,—the girl has too much sense, and her principles are too well established."

"What is it you mean, girls?" inquired their mother, in a tone of surprise and alarm.

"Indeed, Agnes," said Maria, reprovingly, "it is neither fair nor friendly to poor Jane, to bring out a story founded only on a mere surmise. Agnes insists, mamma, that Jane is attached to Charles Osborne."

"It certainly occurred to us only a few moments ago, I allow," replied Agnes; "but if I am mistaken in this, I will give up my judgment in every thing else. And I mentioned it solely to prevent our own distress, particularly papa's, with respect to the change that is of late so visible in her conduct and manner."

Strange to say, however, that Mr. Sinclair and his wife both repudiated the idea of her attachment to Osborne, and insisted that Agnes' suspicion was rash and groundless.

It was impossible, they said, that such an attachment could exist: Jane and Osborne had seen too little of each other, and were both of a disposition too shy and diffident to rush so precipitately into a passion that is usually the result of more frequent intercourse or of far riper years than either of them had yet reached.

Mr. Sinclair admitted that Jane was a girl full of affection, and likely to be extremely susceptible, yet it was absurd, he added, to suppose for a moment, that she would suffer them to be engaged, or her peace of mind disturbed, by a foolish regard for a smooth-faced boy, and she herself not much beyond sixteen.

CHAPTER VI.

There is scarcely to be found in the whole range of human life and character any observation more true, and at the same time more difficult to be understood, than the singular infatuation of parents who have survived their own passions, whenever the prudence of their children happens to be called in question.

We know not whether such a fact be necessary to the economy of life, and the free breathings of youthful liberty, but this at least is clear to any one capable of noting down its ordinary occurrences, that no matter how acutely and vividly parents themselves may have felt the passion of love when young, they appear as ignorant of the symptoms that mark its stages in the lives of their children, as if all memory of its existence had been obliterated out of their being.

Jane, as she bent her way to the place of appointment, felt like one gradually emerging out of darkness into light. The scene at dinner had quickened her moral sense, which, as the reader already knows, was previously to that perhaps morbidly acute. Every step, however, toward the idol of her young devotion, removed the memory of what had occurred at home, and collected around her heart all the joys and terrors that in maidenly diffidence characterize the interview she was about to give her lover. Oh how little do we know of these rapid lights and shadows which shift and tremble across the spirits of the gentler sex, when approaching to hold this tender communion with those whom they love. Nothing that we remember resembles the busy working of the soul on such occasions, so much as those lucid streamers which flit in sweeps of delicate light along the northern sky, filling it at once with beauty and terror, and emitting at the same time a far and almost inaudible undertone of unbroken music.

Trembling and fluttering like a newly caught bird, Jane approached the place of meeting and found Osborne there awaiting her.

"My dear, dear Jane," exclaimed he, taking her hand, and placing her beside him, "I neither knew my own heart nor the extent of its affection for you until this meeting. In what terms shall I express—but I will not attempt it—I cannot—but my soul burns—it burns with love for you, such as was never felt by mortal."

"It is my trust and confidence in your love that brings me here," she replied; and indeed, Charles, it is more than that—I know your health is, at the best, easily affected, and your spirits naturally prone to despondency; and I feared," said the artless girl, "that—that—indeed I feared you might suffer pain, and that pain might bring on ill-health again."

"And am I so dear to you, Jane?"

Jane replied by a smile, and a look inexpressibly tender.

"I am, I am!" he exclaimed with rapture; "and now the world—life—nothing—nothing can add to the fullness of my happiness. And your note my beloved—the conclusion of it, your own Jane Sinclair! But you must be more my own yet—legally and for ever mine! Mine! Shall I be able to bear it!—shall I, Jane?" said he, his enthusiastic temperament kindling as he spoke—"Oh, what, my dearest, my own dearest, if this should not last, will it not consume me? Will it not destroy me? this overwhelming excess of rapture!"

"But you must restrain it, Charles; surely the suspense arising from the doubt of our being beloved, is more painful than the certainty that we are so."

"Yes; but the exulting sense, my dear Jane, is to me almost oppressive—but I rave, I rave; it is a delight—all happiness! Yes, it will prolong life—for we know what we live for."

"We do," said Jane, in a low, sweet voice, whilst her eye turned on him with delight. "Do I not live for you, Charles?"

His lip was near her cheek as she spoke; he then gently drew her to him, and in a voice lower, and if possible, more melodious than her own, said, "Oh, Jane, is there not something inexpressibly affectionate—some wild and melting charm in the word we?"

"That is a feeling," she replied, evidently softened by the tender spirit of his words, "of which you are a better judge than I can be."

"Oh, say, my dearest, let me hear you say with your own lips, that you will be my wife."

"I will," she whispered—and as she spoke, he inhaled the fragrance of her breath.

"My wife!"

"Your wife!"

Sweet, and long, and rapturous was the kiss which sealed this sacred and entrancing promise. The pathetic sentiment that pervaded their attachment kept their passion so pure, and seldom have two lovers so beautiful, sat cheek to cheek together, in an embrace guileless and innocent as theirs.

Jane, however, withdrew herself from his arms, and, for a few moments, felt not even conscious, so far was her heart removed from evil, that an embrace under such circumstances was questionable, much less improper. Following so naturally from the tenderness of their dialogue, it seemed to be rather the necessary action arising from the eloquence of their feeling, than an act which might incur censure or reproach. Her fine sense of propriety, however, could scarcely be said to have slumbered, for with a burning cheek and a sobbing voice, she exclaimed,

"Charles, these secret meetings must cease. They have involved me in a course of dissimulation and falsehood toward my family which I cannot bear. You say you love me, and I know you do; but surely you could not esteem, nor place full confidence in a girl, who, to gratify either her own affection or yours, would deceive her parents."

"But, my dearest girl, you reason too severely. Surely almost all who love must, in the earliest stages of their affection, practise, to a certain extent, a harmless deception upon their friends, until at least their love is sanctioned. Marriages founded upon mutual attachment, would be otherwise impracticable."

"No deception, dear Charles, can be harmless. I cannot forget the precepts of truth, and virtue, and obedience to a higher law even than his own will which my dear papa taught me, and I will never violate them, even for you."

"You are too pure, too full of truth, my beloved girl, for this world. Social life is carried on by so much dissimulation, hypocrisy, and falsehood, that you will be actually unfit to live in it."

"Then let me die in it sooner than be guilty of any one of them. No, dear Charles, I am not too full of truth. On the contrary, I cannot understand why it is that my love for you has plunged me into deceit. Nay more, Charles," she exclaimed, rising up, and placing her hand on her heart, "I am wrong here—why is it, will you tell me, that our attachment has crossed and disturbed my devotions to God? I cannot worship God as I would, and as I used to do. What if his grace be withdrawn from me? Could you love me then? Could you love a castaway? No, Charles, you love truth too well, to cherish affection for a being, reprobate perhaps, and full of treachery and falsehood. I hope I am not such, but I fear sometimes that I am."

Her youthful lover gazed upon her as she stood with her sparkling eyes fixed upon vacancy. Never did she appear so beautiful; her features were kindled into an expression which was new to him—but an expression so full of high moral feeling beaming like the very divinity of truth from her countenance, yet overshadowed by an unsettled gloom which gave to her whole appearance the power of creating both awe and admiration in the spectator.

The boy was deeply affected, and in a voice scarcely firm, said, in soothing and endearing accents, whilst he took her hand in his—

"Jane, my best beloved and dearest—say, oh say, in what manner I can compose your mind, or relieve you from the necessity of practising the deceit which troubles you so much."

"Oh," said she, bending her eye on him, "but it is sweet to be beloved by those who are dear to us. Your sympathy thrills through my whole frame with a soothing sensation, inexpressibly delightful. It is sweet to me—for you, Charles, are my only confidant. Dear, dear Charles, how I longed to see you, and to hear your voice!"

As she made this simple but touching admission of the power of her love, she laid her head on his bosom and wept. Charles pressed her to his heart, and strove to speak, but could not—she felt his tears raining fast upon her face.

At length he said, pressing his beautiful one more to his beating bosom—"the moment, the moment that I cease to love you, may it, O God, be my last." She rose, and quietly wiping her eyes, said—"I will go—we will meet no more—no more in secret."

"Oh, Jane," said her lover, "how shall I make myself worthy of you; but why," he added, "should our love be a secret? Surely it will be sanctioned by our friends. You shall not be distressed by the necessity of insincerity, although it would be wrong to call the simple concealment of your love for me by so harsh a name."

"But my papa," she said, "he is so good to me; they are all so affectionate, they love me too much; but my dear papa, I cannot stand with a stain on my conscience in his presence. Not that I fear him; but it would be treacherous and ungrateful; I would tell him all, but I cannot."

"My sweet girl, let not that distress you. Your father shall be made acquainted with it from other lips. I will disclose the secret to my father, and, with a proud heart, tell him of our affection."

It never once occurred to a creature so utterly unacquainted with the ways of the world as Jane was, that Mr. Osborne might disapprove of their attachment, and prevent a boy so youthful, from following the bent of his own inclinations.

"Dear Charles," said she, smiling, "what a lead their approval will take off my heart. I can then have papa's pardon for my past duplicity toward him; and my mind will be so much soothed and composed. We can also meet each other with their sanction."

"My wife! my wife!" said Osborne, looking on her with a rapturous gaze of love and admiration, and carrying her allusion to the consent of their families up to the period when he might legitimately give her that title—"My wife," he exclaimed, "my young, my beautiful, my pure and un-spotted wife! Heavens! and is—the day surely to come when I am to call you so?"

The beautiful girl hung her head a moment as if at a hed, then said, "Farewell, dear Charles, until we can see each other without a consciousness that we are doing wrong." Saying which, she extended her hand to him, and in a moment was on her way home.

Oh! how deeply beloved was our heroine by her family, when her moods of mind and state of spirits fixed the tone of their domestic enjoyments, and almost influenced the happiness of their lives. Oh, gentle and pure spirit, what heart cannot love thee, when those who knew thee best gathered their affections so lovingly around thee, the star of their hearth—the idol of their inner shrine—the beautiful, the meek, the affectionate, and even then, in consequence of thy transcendent charms, the far-famed Fawn of Springvale!

In the early part of that evening, Jane's spirits, equable and calm, hushed in a great measure the little domestic debate which had been held at dinner concerning the state of her affections. The whole family partook of her cheerfulness; and her parents, in particular, cast several looks of triumphant sagacity at Maria and Agnes, especially at the latter.

"Jane," said her father, in the triumph of his heart, "you are not aware that Agnes is in love."

"Agnes in love! Well, papa, and surely that is not unnatural."

"Thank you, Jane," replied Agnes. "Papa, that's a rebuff worth something; and, Jane," she proceeded, anxious still to vindicate her own sagacity with respect to her sister, "suppose I should be in love, surely I may carry on an innocent intercourse with my lover, without consulting papa."

"No, Agnes, you should not," replied her sister, vehemently; "no intercourse—no intercourse without papa's knowledge, can be innocent. There is deceit and dissimulation in it—there is treachery in it. It is impossible to say how gloomily such an intercourse may end. Only think, my dear Agnes," she proceeded, in a low, but vehement and condensed voice—"only think, dear Agnes, what the consequences might be to you if such an attachment, and such a clandestine mode of conducting it, should in consequence of your duplicity to papa, cause the Almighty God to withdraw his grace from you, and that you should thereby become a castaway—a castaway! I shudder to think of it! I shudder to think of it!"

"Jane, sit beside me," said Mr. Sinclair; "you are rather too hard upon poor Agnes—but, still come, and sit beside me. You are my own sweet child—my own dutiful and candid girl."

"I cannot, I cannot, papa; I dare not," she exclaimed, and without uttering another word she arose, and rushed out of the room. In less than a minute, however, she returned again, and approaching him said—"Papa, forgive me, I will, I trust, soon be a better girl than I am; bless me, and bid me good night. Mamma, bless me you too—I am your poor Jane, and I know you all love me more than you ought. Do not think that I am unhappy—do not think it. I have not been for some time so happy as I am to-night."

She then passed out of the room and retired to her own apartment.

When she was gone, Agnes, who sat beside her father, turned to him, and leaning her head upon his breast, burst into bitter tears.

"Papa," she exclaimed, "I believe you will now admit that I have gained the victory. My sister's peace of mind or happiness is gone for ever. Unless Osborne either now is, or becomes in time attached to her, I know not what the consequences may be."

"It will be well for Osborne, at all events, if he has not practised upon her affections," said William; "that is, granting that the suspicion be just.—But the truth is, I don't think Osborne has anything to do with her feelings. It is merely some imaginary trifle that she has got into her foolish little head, poor girl. Don't distress yourself, father—you know she was always over-scrupulous. Even the most harmless fib that ever was told, is a crime in her eyes. I wish, for my part, she had a little wholesome wickedness about—don't mean that, sir, in a very unfavorable light," he said in reply to a look of severity from his father; "but I wish she had some leaning to error about her. She would, in one sense at least, be the better for it."

"We shall see," said his father, who evidently spoke in deep distress of mind. "We shall consider in the course of the evening what ought to be done."

"Better to take her gently," observed her mother, wiping away a tear, "gentleness and love will make her tell anything—and that there is something on her mind no one can doubt."

"I won't have her distressed, my dear," replied her father. "It cannot be of much importance, I think, after all; but whatever it may be, her own candid mind will give it forth spontaneously. I know my child, and will answer for her."

"Why, then, papa, are you so much distressed, if you think it of no importance?" asked Maria.

"If her finger ached, it would distress me, child, and you know it."

"Why, she and Osborne have had no opportunity of being together, out of the eyes of the family," observed William.

"That's more than you know, William," said Agnes; "she has often walked out."

"But she always did so," replied her mother.

"She would never meet him privately," said her father firmly—"of that I am certain as my life."

"That, papa," returned Agnes, "I am afraid is precisely what she has done, and what now distresses her. And I am sure that whatever is wrong with her, no explanation will be had from herself. Though kind and affectionate as ever, she has been very shy with me and Maria of late—and, indeed, has made a point to keep aloof from us. Three or four times I spoke to her in a tone of confidence, as if I was about to introduce some secret of my own; but she always under some pretence or other, left me. I had not thought of Osborne at the time, nor could I guess what troubled her—but something I saw did." Her father sighed deeply, and, clasping his hands, uttered a silent ejaculation to heaven on her behalf. "That is true," said he, "it is the hour of evening worship; let us kneel and remember her trouble, the poor child, whatever it may be."

"Had I not better call her down, papa?" said Agnes.

"Not this evening," he replied, "not this evening—she is too much disturbed, and will probably prefer praying alone."

The old man then knelt down, after the usual form of evening worship, uttered a solemn and affecting appeal upon her behalf, to Him, who can pour balm upon wounded spirit, and say unto the weary and heavy laden, "Come unto me, and I will give you rest." But when he went on in words more particularly describing her state of mind, to mention, and plead for "their youngest," and "their dearest," and "their best beloved," his voice became tremulous, and for a moment he paused, but the pause was filled up by the sobbings of those who loved her, and especially by the voice of that affectionate sister who loved her most—for of them all Agnes sister went aloud. At length the prayer was concluded, and on rising up with wet eyes, they perceived that the beloved object of their supplications had glided into the room, and joined their worship unperceived.

"Dear Jane," said her father, "we did not know you were with us."

She made no immediate reply, but, after a moment's apparent struggle, went over, and laying her head upon his bosom, sobbed out—"Papa, your love has overcome me. I will tell you all."

"Soul of truth and candor," exclaimed the old man, clasping her to his bosom, "heroic child! I knew she would do it, and I said so. Go out now, and leave us to ourselves. Darling, don't be distressed. If you feel difficulty I will not ask to hear it. Or perhaps you would rather mention it to your mamma."

"No—to you, papa—to you—and you will not be harsh upon me—I am a weak girl, and have done very wrong."

It was indeed a beautiful thing to see this fair and guiltless penitent leaning against her indulgent father's bosom, in which her blushing face was hid, and disclosing the history of an attachment as pure and innocent as ever warmed the heart of youth and beauty. Oh, no wonder, thou sweetest and most artless of human beings, that when the heavy blight of reason came upon thee, and thou disappearedst from his eyes, that the old man's spirit's became desolate, and his heart broken—that he said after thy dissolution to every word of comfort uttered to him—"It is vain, it is vain—I cannot stay. I hear her voice calling me—she calls me, my beautiful—my pride—my child—my child—she calls me, and I cannot stay." Nor did he long.

To none else did her father that night reveal the purport of this singular disclosure, except to Mrs. Sinclair herself; but the next morning, before breakfast, the secret had been made known to the rest. All trouble and difficulty as to the conduct they should pursue, were removed in consequence of Osborne's intention to ask his father to sanction their attachment; and until the consequence of that step should be known, nothing further on their part could be attempted. On this point, however, they were not in suspense, for ere two o'clock that day Mr. Osborne had, in the name of his son, proposed for the hand of our fair girl, which proposal we need scarcely say was instantly and joyfully accepted. It is true, their immediate union was not contemplated. Both were much too youthful and inexperienced to undertake the serious duties of married life; but it was arranged that Osborne, whose health, beside, was not sufficiently firm, should travel, see the world, and strengthen his constitution by the genial air of a warmer and more salubrious climate. —The following sketch and pathetic stanzas are taken from Laman Blanchard's Life and Literary Remains of L. E. L. a copy of which, as elegantly published by Colbourn, we have received from our London Correspondent. The sketch is one of a series from the Female Portrait Gallery; which, as well as the little poem that follows, are now for the first time brought before the American public. We shall draw more entertainment from this work next week.

THE BLACK DWARF—ISABEL VERE.

AFTER all, though beauty be deceitful, and favor be vain, yet beauty is the most exquisite gift ever lavished by fairies around an infant cradle. Its charm is nameless; it wins us, we know not why—and lingers on our memory, we know not wherefore. Whether in the animate or the inanimate world, it is the cause of our most delicious sensations; it belongs to the imagination, for it calls up within us whatever of poetry may be lurking in the "hidden mines of thought." It is the attribute of all that is most glorious in existence—it is on the azure sky—it clothes the earth as with a garment—it rides triumphant over the purple bosom of the sea. Look within our hearts, it has originated all that is ideal in our nature. Beauty is the shadow flung from heaven on earth—it is the type of a lovelier and more spiritual existence, and the broken and transitory lights that it flings on this our sad and heavy pilgrimage, do but indicate another and a better sphere, where the beautiful will also be the everlasting. The homage involuntarily paid to its mysterious influence is but an unconscious acknowledgment of its divine origin, and its eternal future. Here we see it, but through a glass darkly.

The presence of beauty has been perpetual in our fictions, but Scott was the first novelist who made its absence the ground-work for the character of a hero. His example has been followed in more than one illustrious instance, though whether it gave the hint for Byron's "Deformed Transformed," admits of a question. Full of animation, breaking new ground, and dramatic in action, if not in construction, it is to be regretted that it should only be a fragment: I doubt whether it could ever have been finished, it came too home. A sensitive person feels, and an imaginative one exaggerates any defects—and Lord Byron was both. His lameness originating, as it did, in an unsightly malformation, was a perpetual source of bitterness to him. What was its effect on Scott it would be more difficult to discover; naturally reserved and cautious, his own feelings are rarely allowed to peep out in the course of his narratives; but it is remarkable that in two instances he has made the personal deficiencies of his heroes lead to the formation of their characters, each character exercising a paramount influence on the conduct of the story.

In Rashleigh Osbaldistone the effect has been evil; in the ill-fated Black Dwarf, the kind warm heart remains the same—under the pang of disappointment, and the disguise of misanthropy. The woman that he loved is gone down to her early grave, and her death breaks the only tie that binds him to his kind; but "we have all of us one human heart," and the lonely and forgotten misanthrope still feels that he is accessible to emotion. Isabel Vere is the daughter of the beloved one—her whose happiness he bought at the price of his own; her sorrow has yet power on a heart that strives to harden itself in vain. The Black Dwarf is not among my favorites; the pity felt for the poor recluse is too painful—too painful, because hopeless. There is a mark upon him which parts him from his kind; and we never feel that more than when he is in the very act of serving them. Take the interview between him and Isabel Vere, which is among Scott's most dramatic situations. In spite of his assumed harshness, his heart is beating with warm and human emotions; the remembrance of his ill-fated, but long-enduring attachment, pity, and the resolve to assist, are all struggling together; yet what is the involuntary effect on his visitor? fear, distrust, and aversion. Every kindness conferred by the Dwarf must have brought with it the "late remorse of love."

Owing independence, security, and domestic happiness to her strange protector, it must have been a perpetual regret to Isabel Vere that her gratitude could not cheer his gloom, nor her care soothe his declining years. Sheridan Knowles has here the truer and nobler insight into human nature. It makes his "Hunchback" sensitive and suspicious; but even in his case the mental predominates over the physical; the generous loving heart, the high acquirement, the kind and gentle manner have their rightful ascendancy; he has been happy in the love of his wife, and he is happy in the love of his child, won for him by care and affection, ere she knew aught of his parental claim. We follow the recluse to the gloomy cell of La Trappe with not only pity, but resentment against a fate so unjust; but it is a satisfaction to bring before the mind's eye the happy and honored old age of Master Walter.

STANLEY THORN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX."

CHAPTER XLII.—The Countess of Clarendale receives another lesson.

THE Earl did not return to the Countess that night; but on the following day, about noon, he went to the door of the "European," at which he thundered as well as he could—the knocker being off, and the bell-wire broken—until he became so enraged, that he sent his stick clean through the drawing-room window.

The Countess and her mamma were in the drawing-room at the time, and were dreadfully alarmed by the crash; but they knew the Earl's stick in an instant; and while Mrs. Gills rushed in a fright to the window, the Countess mechanically flew to the door.

"You have kept me here long enough, I hope," said the Earl, glancing fiercely at the Countess as he passed her. "Are you deaf?"

The Countess, being too much alarmed then to speak, tremblingly followed her noble lord in silence.

"Well," said he, on entering the drawing-room, and throwing himself carelessly upon a couch, "a pretty mess you have got me into! do n't you think you have?"

"I'm sorry we've offended you, my lord," replied the Countess.

"For my part," observed her mamma, who had by this time recovered all her faculties, "I don't see much to be sorry about! Other Countesses has jollifications, and why should n't you?"

"Jollifications!" echoed the noble Earl, sarcastically. "I'll have no jollifications. Look at the position in which you have placed me by making fools of all those people!"

"Well, you know, my lord, you know that was all your own fault, and nobody else's! Why disappoint the company? Why did n't you let 'em come in? I'm sure there was every thing nice provided. It wasn't as though we'd only a leg of mutton and trimmings!"

"Do n't talk to me about legs of mutton and trimmings! Leave the room, both of you. I want to be here alone."

"Please do n't be angry, my lord," said the Countess. "Indeed we'll not do so again."

"No, I do n't expect you will. I'll take care you do not."

"Upon my word and honor, my lord, I did n't know that we were doing any harm."

"Did I not tell you I wished to be alone? Do n't stand there chattering—be off!"

The Countess as she left the room wept; but her mamma, whose bosom swelled with indignation, looked at him as she followed, with an expression of contempt the most supreme, and, in order to convey to him an additional idea of what she felt, she slammed the door after her as if she meant to split it.

"He's a brute!—an exorbitant monster!" she exclaimed, on entering the chamber to which the Countess had retired. "But it serves you justly right for not having more spirit. I do n't know who you take after, that's the real truth. You do n't take after me! Do you imagine if he was a husband of mine I'd put up with it? No; I'd see him blessed first! I wouldn't take it from the best man that ever stepped in shoe-leather. I told you how it would be. I told you from the first how he'd serve you, if you did n't stand up for your rights. I've no patience with you; I have n't. You provoke me to such a degree, I do n't know how to contain myself!"

"What am I to do, ma? what can I do?"

"What can you do? Why, up and tell him at once what you mean. Fly into a passion. The ideal! I only just wish he was a husband of mine, I'd let him know what's what, I'll warrant. Do you think that I'd fret, and stew, and go on so? No! nor you do n't ought to do it."

"But how can I help it, ma?"

"How can you help it? Do n't tell me! Presume a proper dignity and spirit. He'll tread upon you as if you was dirt, as they all will, if you let 'em; but you do n't ought to suffer him to do it. And then the ideal!—did you ever in your born days hear tell of such a thing as a husband being out all the whole blessed night, without even so much as mentioning on it! A pretty thing, indeed!—as if you had no right to know where he'd been!—as if you did n't ought to insist upon knowing where he'd been! Do you think I'd let him have a minute's peace till he told me? How do you know where he was! And not a word of exclamation!—the ideal! But I see how it is: he don't think we are good enough for him; but I'd have him to know that you're as good as him any hour in the day, if he comes to that. Aint you a Countess? In course: and you're consequently bound to act as Countesses does. What does he mean? A very pretty thing! There! if I was you, I'll tell you what I'd go and do at once. I'd go to him, and I'd say, 'Now, I tell you what it is—I'm not going to stand it, and so you need n't think it, and that's all about it. I'm 'solved to stand up for my dignity as a Countess; and if I can't live peaceable with you, I'll have a separate maintenance, and do what I like.' That's the way to bring him to his senses, my precious! Whenever a woman talks about a separate maintenance, a man thinks she's in earnest, and draws in his horns. It's the only way, to up and tell 'em what you mean at once. Now, you take my advice; you go down and look fierce, and tell him bold you won't have it."

"What, now, ma?"

"Yes, now. Make hay while the sun shines—strike while the iron is hot."

"I'm a good mind, but"—

"Do it! Men is cowards when a woman's blood's up. If you cringe to 'em, they trample upon you; but if you presume a proper dignity, they'll come down to you. Therefore do it, and make no bones about the matter."

"But I'm afeared, ma."

"Afeared! Do n't tell me about being afeared. What have you to be afeared of? Give it him at once. Make believe to be in a tremendous passion. Speak loud, my precious; there's nothing like that: they're sure to get over them as does n't speak loud. When you speak loud, men is quite safe to speak soft; in fact, they seems then to be almost afeared to speak at all. Throughout life, my love, there's nothing like giving it to 'em loud."

"But what am I to say, ma?" whined the Countess.

"What are you to say!" echoed her anxious mamma in despair. "Why, aint I told you what to say! Give it to him well. Tell him you won't have it at no price, and so he need n't think it. As true as I'm alive, there ain't a bit of the Countess in you."

"Well, ma, I can't help it."

"Can't help it? Rubbish! I've no patience with such ways. Do n't tell me you can't help it—it's enough to make one sick to see so much affectation. Go to him at once, and tell him flat that you're 'solved to stick up for your rights."

"Well, ma, I will go," said the Countess. "I'm determined I will. I'll tell him it's unbearable, I will; and he need n't think I'm going to put up with it."

"Do, my precious. Be a woman of spirit. It's the only way in the world to get over the men. And do n't forget the separate maintenance."

"I won't, ma. I'll tell him plump; see if I do n't."

"That's right, my darling—give it him home! And do n't forget to give him an 'int about stopping out all the blessed night neither. Hit him hard upon that pint; and if you do n't frighten him out of his wits, it'll be very strange to me. Therefore do n't forget that."

"I won't, ma. I'll tell him he treats me very cruel, and that I do n't care a single bit about him."

"And very proper neither. I shall make a woman of dignity on you yet."

Thus encouraged, the Countess boldly descended; but on entering the drawing-room in which the Earl sat, she was seized with so violent a palpitation of the heart, that she was perfectly unable to give utterance to a word.

"Well," said the Earl, frowning ferociously at her, "what do you want here?"

The Countess tried to say that she felt that she was treated very cruelly; but as she could n't, she burst into tears and left the room.

"Why, what's the matter now?" cried her mamma, on her return. "Has the monster been at it again? What does he say for himself?"

"He asked me what I wanted there," replied the Countess, sobbing bitterly—"what I wanted there!"

"Well, I never! And did n't you up and tell him?"

"I—could n't—speak;—he looked—as if—he'd—eat me!"

"And what if he did? Why did n't you look as if you'd eat him, and then go ding dong at him with dignity? But I'll soon settle this—I'll soon let him see a piece of my mind, I'll warrant. He do n't quite so easily get over me!"

"Oh! pray, ma, do n't go: he looks, oh! so fierce!"

"Fierce!—the ideal! Do you think I'm afeared of a man! The ridiculousness of it provokes me!"

Whereupon she bounced out of the chamber, and the next moment stood before the Earl.

"Now I tell you what it is now, plump, my lord," she observed, with a dignified air: "If this here's the way you're a-going to treat the Countess, my daughter, it won't do, my lord, I can tell you: we ain't a-going to stand it."

"Am I to be under the necessity of turning you out of the house, Mrs. Gills?" said the Earl, with perfect calmness.

"Turn me out of the house! Well, I'm sure!"

"You will compel me to do so, if you do not conduct yourself with greater propriety."

"I'd have you to know that I'm not to be 'timidated, my lord. Where the Countess my daughter is, there will I be."

"You had better be silent. I believe that I contracted no marriage with you."

"No; I only just wish that you had!"

"Heaven forbid!" exclaimed the Earl.

"You'd have had a very different person to deal with, I can tell you."

"I know it. I do not require to be told."

"I would n't have put up with one twentieth part of the treatment that she has put up with, poor thing."

"It is of no importance to me, Mrs. Gills, what proportion you would have put up with."

"But is it proper treatment? Let me ask you that."

"Will you do me the favor to leave the room, Mrs. Gills?"

"If she ain't treated better, she shall sue for a separate maintenance."

"Leave the room, madam!" cried the Earl, starting up, and pointing fiercely to the door. "If I hear another word, I'll have you instantly turned out of the house!"

At this particular moment it struck Mrs. Gills with great force that, as she was not the absolute mistress of that house, he had the power to carry that threat into execution; and as she felt it to be therefore inexpedient to provoke the tyrannical exercise of that power, she most reluctantly held her peace, and left the room, as she subsequently expressed it, "fit to bust."

"Well, ma," cried the Countess, who was naturally anxious to know the result, "how did you get on? What on earth did he say?"

"He's a brute! I'm putrified, my precious! I never in all my days heard of such a monster! Would you believe it?—why, he threatened to turn me out of the house, he did!—actually neck and crop out of the house!"

"Lor, ma, you do n't say so!"

"It's a fact! But I'd have him to know that I'm as good as him, if he comes to that, and ain't a-going to tolerate such ways with impunity."

"But how did it come about, ma?"

"I'll tell you—but I feel so wild, I scarce know how to contain myself. Turn me out of the house, indeed!—a very fine ideal! 'In the first place,' says I, 'my lord, this is all about it: the Countess, my daughter,' says I, 'ain't a-going to stand any more of your nonsense, and ed,' says I, 'you need n't try it on.'"

"Lor, ma! really you should n't have said that."

"Oh! there's nothing like giving 'em as good as they send. I ain't lived all these years without knowing what I'm about. However, says he, 'What do you mean?' says he. 'What do I mean?' says I, 'I'll tell you what I mean: I mean what I say,' says I, 'neither better nor worse.' 'Am I to kick you head first out of the house?' says he. 'Kick me out of the house!' says I. 'How many on you? I should only like to see you,' says I,

"Kicking me out of the house. I'd cure you of kicking for the rest of your days," says I."

"Lor! you did n't ought to have gone on so."

"Oh! don't tell me. It showed him, at any rate, I was n't afraid. 'Kick me out,' says I, 'will you? You're a nice man, I don't think, to talk about kicking.' 'I'll do it,' says he, 'if you don't hold your noise.' 'You will,' says I, 'will you? Do it—at your peril!' 'I didn't marry you,' says he. 'No,' says I, 'I only just wish,' says I, 'for your sake, you had. I'll warrant,' says I, 'I'd let you a-knowled the difference!' So with that we went right at it, hammer and tongs. But I soon cowed him down—I soon gave him to know that I warn't to be frightened."

"Oh dear! I'm very sorry you said anything to him."

"Oh! rubbish about being sorry. There's nothing like telling 'em plump what you mean. Is he to treat you in this here scandalous way without having a syllable said to him? His lawful wife too, and a Countess! You ought to go in. I don't ought to do it. You ought to up and tell him right flat you won't have it, and let him talk about turning you out, if he dare. A pretty thing, indeed! Why, what did you marry him for?"

"I wish I never married him at all, ma, that I do. I'm very unhappy."

"And likely to remain unhappy, too, unless you show a proper spirit. Do you think, if I was a Countess, I would n't act different? I'd give him to know I'd do just what I liked, and give just what jollifications I liked. Does he suppose that you're to have no company, no parties, no frolics? Why, had you married a common tradesman, you'd been better off. Stick up for your rights, my precious, and don't be imposed upon by nobody. That's the only way. It's out of all character that you should be muddled up here, and have no sort of pleasure, no sort of society, nor nothing of that. It's enough to drive any woman stark staring mad! What's the use of being a Countess, if you don't do as Countesses does? What's the good of having a title, if you don't keep up your dignity? That's my sentiments. It astonishes my intellects to see you treated like the common scum of the earth. It's incredible to me that you should suffer yourself to be put upon like that. Why, if I was you, I'd turn the house out of the windows. I'd see who was misses, I'll warrant. And depend upon it, that's the only way. You have n't half enough of spirit; you don't ought to let him keep you thus under his thumb. If you do it now, what'll it be by and by? That's the point: that's what you ought to consider. I never, in all my days, heard of such a thing as a Countess being treated like you. Where's your pride? You don't seem to have got a mite in you. I don't understand it. It gets over me altogether. I've no patience with you: I have n't, as true as I'm alive!"

While the Countess was being thus lectured by her mamma, who was earnestly anxious to inspire her soul with due dignity, the Earl and Captain Filcher—of whose arrival the ladies knew nothing—were dividing the profits of their late speculation, and arranging the preliminaries of a certain transfer, the character of which will be duly explained anon.

CHAPTER XLIII.—Stanley's pecuniary embarrassments commence.

The two thousand pounds for which Stanley had mortgaged his estate being lost, his actual income was reduced to something less than two hundred a-year; and as he continued to live at the rate of a thousand, he soon, of course, found himself involved.

Still the tradesmen whom he patronised, did not, for some time, annoy him: they believed him to be rich, and were therefore, with infinite pleasure, prepared to give him credit to any amount, notwithstanding their regular bills were unpaid.

This did not, however, last long. In less than two months they began to be importunate. One had a very heavy bill to take up on a certain day; another happened at the time to be dreadfully pressed; a third remembered, by a miracle, that his commodities bore only a ready-money profit; a fourth became suddenly so circumstanced, that he every day expected a man to be put in possession; while a fifth had decidedly a couple of executions in his house at that particular crisis; and thus they went on inventing fresh falsehoods daily, and making it appear that they were then in such terrible trouble, that their commercial salvation depended upon Stanley, inasmuch as that, unless these identical "little bills" were immediately settled, the Gazette would be the inevitable portion of them all.

To Stanley these annoyances were galling in the extreme. He felt deeply humiliated. His inability to pay sums so paltry mortified him more than if the total had been twenty times doubled in one amount. The thing was altogether new to him. He knew not how to act. Had he been, as many thousands are, accustomed to these petty perplexities, the necessity for either bearing up against them, or exerting himself with the view of getting rid of them at once, would have appeared to be absolute; but as he had never been in any way pressed before, his spirit seemed broken, and he became irresolute and inactive.

Poor Amelia—from whom the widow's embarrassments had been so effectually concealed, that she only knew that the carriage had been dispensed with—could not understand this altered state of things at all. At that period she had had no money from Stanley for a month; but having taken care of a small sum she possessed at the time of her marriage, she had been able to pay for those articles for which immediate payment was required, while perceiving how much the importunities of those tradesmen who had given them credit annoyed him, she endeavored as much as possible to withhold from him all knowledge of the abrupt and threatening manner in which they made their demands. When, however, the whole of her money had been expended, and the creditors, who had previously displayed the most cringing servility, had become not only clamorous but insolent, she felt it to be her duty to mention the subject to him, that she might know the real cause of their not being paid.

"Stanley," she observed, taking advantage of a moment in which he appeared to be somewhat more tranquil than usual, "those persons are beginning to get very impatient."

"What persons?" demanded Stanley.

"Those tradesmen, dear, who have sent in their bills. They called again this morning."

"Let them call. They must wait."

"But they say that they will not wait, my love!"

"But I say they must! What do they mean? Are they afraid of losing their money?"

"Why, it would seem that they were, for the tone they have assumed of late is really very harsh and insulting."

"Insulting!" echoed Stanley. "I'll kick them to the devil!"

"Do not be rash, dear Stanley. They are, perhaps, very poor. But why do you not pay them at once?"

"They shall wait now for their insolence."

"But were it not better, dear, to settle their accounts, and then to show them that you are displeased with their want of confidence in you by dealing with them no more?"

"I shall do so when I find it quite convenient, but certainly not until then."

"But the fact of its being at present inconvenient is a matter of the slightest possible importance! I can easily get sufficient money to pay them!"

"Of whom?"

"Oh! I can get it of mamma!"

"Have you ever," demanded Stanley, regarding her with sternness—"have you ever named the subject to her?"

"Never, Stanley! No, dear, never!" replied Amelia;

"I would not do so for the world, my love, without your permission."

"Very well. In that quarter never let it be named."

"But what possible objection can you have, dear? I really can see none myself."

"I have an objection—a very great objection; one which is perfectly insurmountable."

"Of course, my love, you are the best judge; but do you know, my impression is that you are far too delicate Stanley!"

"I would not have it known that I am short, down at Richmond, for ten thousand pounds!"

"Oh! you proud creature!" exclaimed Amelia, with a smile. "And yet are you proud, Stanley? Let me bring you to the test, that we may see if that really be pride which looks so very much like it. Stanley!" she continued with much earnestness, "the servants—our servants! It cannot be kept from them."

"I'll discharge the first that dares to hold the slightest communication with these people."

"It cannot be prevented, my love. They will talk; they will canvass matters of this description; they will form their own conjectures; they will swell the lightest word into an affair of vast importance. Believe me, I tremble whenever I hear a single knock at the door—I do, indeed, my dear, and would answer all such knocks myself, were it not for very shame."

"I wish to heaven you would not trouble yourself about such things at all."

"I cannot help it: indeed I cannot help it. Did you but know what I suffer when I hear those persons in the hall asking the servants the most impertinent questions, and leaving messages of the most insolent and menacing character, you would pity me."

"Why did you not tell me of all this before?"

"Because I well knew, my love, that it would vex you; and, as I fully expected that you would very soon be able to meet their demands, I have concealed it from you, hoping that the annoyance would cease without causing you any additional mortification. But, be assured, dear Stanley, that I do not speak thus for myself. Although it afflicts me deeply to hear you spoken of by those persons in terms so unwarrantable and harsh, I am not anxious for the immediate discharge of these debts merely as a matter of comfort as far as I am concerned: my chief object in bringing the subject forward, is to put it to you whether it would not be in every point of view far better to allow me to get—say to borrow—a certain sum of money of mamma, than to promote the circulation of those rumors which absolutely strike at the purity of your motives?"

"Oh, let them circulate what rumors they please! they cannot injure me."

"But, Stanley dear, would it not be better to allow me to do at once that which I propose, than to suffer your importance to be diminished not only in the estimation of those tradesmen, but also in the eyes of our servants? Consider, my love. What if mamma should know that you are at present somewhat pressed? Nay, if even my father were informed of the fact, of what possible consequence could it be? But he need not know anything about it."

"It shall not be known to either."

"Well, then," continued Amelia, "let me suggest another course. But you will not be angry with me? Promise that you will not be angry if I offer another suggestion?"

"Well, I do promise: what is it?"

"Have you not heard, dear, of persons—persons, too, moving in high society, who, whenever they need temporary loans, can obtain them by depositing articles of value as security for repayment?"

"I have," replied Stanley.

"Well, dear, then why cannot we do the same? Those jewels of mine (you know I very seldom wear them;) I have no idea how much they cost, but I should say that they are worth five times the sum we require to pay all these tiresome people. Why not deposit them?"

"You are a good girl," said Stanley; "but there will be no necessity for anything of the kind."

"Take them, dear Stanley!" continued Amelia. "Do let me prevail upon you to take them; or tell me where to go, and I will take them myself. I should not be ashamed, dear; indeed I should not be ashamed!" But, as she spoke, the tears trickled down her beautiful cheeks; which, however she tried to conceal.

"Oh, that will not be required," replied Stanley.

"But Lady Dashwell always went herself. She took hers to a goldsmith in Oxford street, I have heard. Come, dear, let me take mine, and then all these annoyances will be at an end."

"Why, Amelia, I am not a beggar! I'll go and get the money of my mother at once. I can do so; but the necessity for it never before appeared to be so pressing."

"Then you forgive me, dear Stanley?"

"Forgive you!"

He embraced her, and left her comparatively happy. She did not expect that he would have been so calm, although it was manifest even to her that his naturally impetuous spirit was being by some process gradually subdued.

On reaching the widow's residence, Stanley found her sitting in solitude at the drawing-room window, envying the owner of every carriage that passed, and conceiving it to be by far the greatest luxury under heaven. She had no carriage; and the thought of this formed her chief affliction. She felt that she could with fortitude have endured the loss of anything but that; which was certainly nothing but natural, seeing that the things which we have will appear very poor when compared with the things we have not.

"Mother," said Stanley, as he took a seat beside her, "have you any money at your banker's?"

This question amazed the widow much. The tone was so excessively novel. It had theretofore been invariably, "Mother! I want some money, and must have it; and if you have n't got it, you must get it!" Her amazement may hence be understood.

"Why, my love," she replied, on recovering herself somewhat, "I have a little."

"I wish you'd lend me some for a short time," said Stanley. "You shall have it again."

"Certainly, my dear. How much do you want?"

"How much can you spare?"

"Why, I scarcely know, my love. Will twenty or thirty pounds be enough?"

"I wish you could let me have a hundred."

"A hundred pounds, my dear, is a large sum to me now!"

"I know it, mother: I know it. You need not remind me of that. The question is, can you let me have it? I am pestered to death by a parcel of petty people, whom I am anxious to pay."

"Well—well, you shall have it. But be cautious, my Stanley—for Heaven's sake be cautious, there's a dear! I dare say, my love, that you do the best you can; and I know it to be very distressing to retrench; but the necessity for living within your income, limited as it is, dear, must not be overlooked."

"I know, mother—I know all about it. Just give me a cheque."

"I have been thinking, dear," continued the widow, as she very slowly opened her desk—"I have been thinking—and it's strange that it never struck me till this morning—that if we were to live together, dear, in one house, you know, so that we should have to support but one establishment, we should be able to live in better style, besides being—"

"Yes—yes," interposed Stanley, with impatience. "We'll talk about that another time. I'll see about it. Let me have the cheque."

The cheque was accordingly drawn, and when he had taken leave hastily, although with somewhat more affection than usual, he proceeded to the banker's without delay.

CHAPTER XLIV.—In which the venerable gentleman appears just on the verge.

As Amelia had conjectured, the constant applications of the tradesmen for the settlement of their accounts formed the principal topic of conversation among the servants. They felt perfectly sure that the establishment was about to be broken up; and as the gentle Joanna conceived it to be her duty to relate all the particulars to her venerable friend, the day was named for the consummation of their bliss exactly three hours after Stanley had made the heart of poor Amelia glad by placing the entire hundred pounds in her hand to be appropriated to the purposes for which it was obtained.

It may also be stated as a remarkable coincidence, that Bob—whose spirits were governed by Amelia as absolutely as the thermometer is governed by the air, was on that very evening unusually gay. He had been to the banker's with his master; he had seen his mistress on his return; he had seen her twice, and he well knew by the joyful expression of her countenance that a favorable change had taken place.

When, therefore, he entered the kitchen in which the blooming Joanna and her venerable friend were sitting tête-à-tête with very great affection, he exclaimed in the joy of his heart, "Now I do n't care a dump! It's all right! I know it is by missis! Bless if I mind standing a couple of pots of arf-and-arf!"

"Vot! ave you got yer vages?" inquired the venerable gentleman.

"No; but I shall get 'em safe. But that ain't what I look at. I warn't even thinking of them. I know it's all right now with master; that's all I care for. I know it by missis's looks. I'll bet ten to one on it, brandies and waters. She can't deceive me."

"Looks is werry deceptive," observed the venerable gentleman. "It's a werry old sayin', and a true un, that you must n't take people by their looks."

"Oh, but missis is one which can't be mistaken. Let me look in her face, and I know what's o'clock. I can tell in an instant. There ain't a ha'p'orth of any mistake about her."

"But ain't you got nothink else in this case to go by?"

"Yes; but that, and nothing else would be plenty for me. But there is something else. We went out about four o'clock in a hurry, and drove to old missis's house. Well, master went in with his tail very low—I never see a man much more downer in the mouth; but he had n't been there long, before he came out, and pelted right down to the banker's. Well, I knew there was something rayther extra in the wind, so I watched him; and when he came out, p'r'aps he war' n't a little altered! I never see such a change in a man in my life! Well, he got in, and cut back; and when he pulled up at the door missis was on the quay, as the French says, at the window; and the minit she sees him I knew how it was. I could tell, I'd oath it. And when I went up just now, the whole thing was as clear to me as a chrystal."

"Well, I only hope your words may come true," said Joanna.

"I knowed a young ooman," observed the venerable gentleman, assuming that profoundly philosophical expression which he invariably wore when about to illustrate any particular point by analogy—"I knowed a young ooman—and a werry nice young ooman she vos—vich vos in a decline. Werry well. For a matter of more than three 'ear she vos a goin', and a goin' gradual; but she never for all that believed she vos a goin', although she vos terrible thin, and looked as pale as any sheet of vite paper. She voodn't believe it, cos she always had an appetite, and vood always be a-eatin' from mornin' till night, in the most onestiefin' manner you ever 'eared tell on. Werry well. Now, ven her flesh vos wasted aigh hall off her bones, and she looked like a skeleton kivered with kid, and hevery soul as looked at her thought that ge she must, she all at vunce had the most beutifulllest color as ever vos seen upon a peach! She looked like an angel as she sit all in vite; and as her little tiny fingers vos a-playin' with her curls, she vos a-smilin' as sweetly as if her little sisters in heaven vos a-visperin' to her softly, 'Hope—still hope!' And I remember," continued the venerable gentleman, as he wiped away a tear, which the vivid recollection of this scene had called forth—"I remember one sanguine friend, vich loved her, exclaiming ven he seed this 'ere color in her cheeks, 'Now she's all right? vot a favorable change! Blessed be God, she'll get over it now!' But vot vos it? Natur' blushing to part so pure a soul from a body so fair; nothing else! In an hour after that exclamation vos uttered she died. Werry well. Now this seems to me a case werry similar; the pockets of your master is got the same complaint; havin' overrun the constable, his means has been long in a decline; and although he may jist now be suddenly flush and you may, in consequence, vishin him vell, feel yourself justified in offerin' to bet any hods it's all right, it strikes me forcible that this here flush is on'y a sign that the 'stablishment's jist on the p'int of goin' to pot. That's my sentiments. I hope I may be wrong; but that's jist vot strikes me. I shall be werry sorry, mind yer, to 'ear it, cos I do think your master's a trump; vile your missis, according to all accounts, is a werry good sort."

"She is a regular good 'un!" cried Bob. "A out-and-outer! I never see her feller yet; and nothing would hurt my sentiments so much as to see your blessed words come true; for I'm sure if anything rotten was to go for to occur, she'd break her heart."

"Vell I hope I may be wrong. But I 'spose you know Joanna's a-goin to give vorrin'?"

"Well, she may if she likes, in course; but I won't: I'd stop with 'em if it was on'y for my vittels."

"She is not," rejoined the venerable gentleman, "a-goin' to give vorrin' cos she don't git her vages, but in consequence of other circumstantialities."

"Oh, that there's the day o' the month, is it?" cried Bob, who saw Joanna blush at the moment, and look very archly, while the venerable gentleman chuckled, and drove his fingers into Bob's ribs, and rubbed his hands with great glee. "I see! Well, I wish you joy, with all my heart. In course I stand godfather to the first!"

"Robert," cried Joanna, with a most roguish look. "Lor! how can you go on so?"

"Oh! but I expect it; and if it's a heir, I'll make him a present of a new hat to begin life with. But when is it to be?"

"Vy, as a mutual friend to both," replied the venerable gentleman, "we don't mind telling of you, cos ve vont you to give away the bride—hif you'll do us the honor?"

"In course! Oh, yes! You do me proud! Well!"

"Well, then, Joanna gives vorrin' to-morrow; ve shall be arskt for the first time in church next Sunday; and as she vill leave on the ninth of next month, the job's to be jobbed on the tenth."

"Bravo!" cried Bob. "The time's drawin' very near! How do you mean to pass the day?"

"Vy, ve don't think its vut'n vile to make much fuss: ve think that, under all circumstantialities, may be dispensed with; but ve mean to enjoy ourselves, you know. Ve mean to be jolly. No expense shall be spared. Ve'll 'ave everythink comfortable and reg'lar, you know."

"Well, all I can say is, I hope you'll be happy."

"Safe!" replied the venerable gentleman with much ardor; when, turning to his betrothed, he added, "Can there be hany doubt about it?"

"Not the least, dear," replied Joanna, with a most winning smile. "I am sure we shall be happy."

"I should think so!" cried the venerable gentleman. Vot is there to perwent it? I do n't mean to say I'm so young as I vos p'raps twenty 'ear ago, but vot o' that? The constitution's the p'int! If that's sound and reg'lar, vy vot's the hods?"

"But you do n't look old in my eye, by no means," observed the affectionate Joanna.

"Do n't I?" returned the venerable gentleman, with one of his most fascinating smiles. "You're a rogue—I know you're a rogue, and there's no mistake of any sort about you. However," he added, "looks is n't the p'int: the great and grand thing is the glorious constitution; and, as mine's as sound as a apple, it makes no hods about the hage."

Joanna agreed with him perfectly, of course; and, as he shortly after took leave of his beloved, Bob accompanied him to the nearest public house, with a view of talking matters over in private.

Here Stanley's affairs were again freely canvassed; but, although Bob endeavored to make things appear as bright as possible, his venerable friend adhered still to the opinion he had expressed—an opinion, the perfect correctness of which was on the following morning, by an act of consummate villany, proved.

DESCRIPTION OF THE DEATH OF MARGARET MILLER DAVIDSON,

IN A LETTER BY HER MOTHER.

"SARATOGA SPRINGS.

"Yes, my dear Miss Sedgwick, she is an angel now; calmly and sweetly she sunk to her everlasting rest, as a babe gently slumbers on its mother's bosom. I thank my Father in heaven that I was permitted to watch over her, and I trust administer to her comfort during her illness. I know, my friend, you will not expect either a very minute or connected detail of the circumstances preceding her change, from me at this time, for I am indeed bowed down with sorrow. I feel that I am truly desolate, how desolate I will not attempt to describe. Yet in the depth of grief I have consolations of the purest, most soothing and exalted nature. I would not, indeed I could not murmur, but rather bless my God that he has in the plenitude of his goodness made me, even for a brief space on earth, the honored mother of such an angel. Oh, my dear Miss Sedgwick, I wish you could have seen her during the last two months of her brief sojourn with us. Her meekness and patience, and her ever cheerful bearing were unexampled. But when she was assured that all the tender and endearing ties which bound her to earth were about to be severed, when she that life and all its bright visions were fading from her eyes—that she was standing at the entrance of the dark valley which must be traversed in her way to the eternal world, the struggle was great, but brief—she caught the hem of her Saviour's robe and meekly bowed to the mandate of her God. Since the beginning of August, I have watched this tender blossom with intense anxiety, and marked her decline with a breaking heart; and although from that time until the period of her departure, I never spent a whole night in bed, my excitement was so strong that I was unconscious of the want of sleep. Oh, my dear madam, the whole course of her decline was so unlike any other death-bed scene I ever witnessed: there was nothing of the gloom of a sick chamber; a charm was in and around her; a holy light seemed to pervade everything belonging to her. There was a sacredness, if I may so express it, which seemed to tell the presence of the Divinity. Strangers felt it; all acknowledged it. Very few were admitted to her sick room, but those few left it with an elevation of heart new, solemn and delightful. She continued to ride out as long as the weather was mild, and even after she became too weak to walk she frequently desired to be taken into the parlor, and when there, with all her little implements of drawing and writing, her books, and even her little work-box and basket beside her, she seemed to think that by these little attempts at her usual employments, she could conceal from me—for she saw my heart was breaking—the ravages of disease and her consequent debility. The New Testament was her daily study, and a portion of every day was spent in private, in self-examination and prayer. My dear Miss Sedgwick, how I have felt my own littleness, my total unworthiness, when compared with this pure, this high-souled, intellectual, yet timid, humble child; bending at the altar of her God, and pleading for pardon and acceptance in his sight, and grace to assist her in preparing for eternity. As her strength wasted, she often desired me to share her hours of retirement and converse with her, and read to her, when unable to read herself. Oh! how sad, how delightful, how agonizing is the memory of the sweet and holy communion we then enjoyed. Forgive me, my friend, for thus mingling my own feelings with the circumstances you wished to know; and, oh! continue to pray that God will give me submission under this desolating stroke. She was my darling, my almost idolized child—truly, truly, you have said, the charm of my existence. Her symptoms were extremely distressing, although she suffered no pain. A week before her departure, she desired that the sacrament of the Lord's Supper might be administered to her. 'Mother,' said she, 'I do not desire it because I feel worthy to receive it; I feel myself a sinner; but I desire to manifest my faith in Christ by receiving an ordinance instituted by himself but a short time before his crucifixion.' The Holy Sacrament was administered by Mr. Babcock. The solemnity of the scene can be better felt than described. I cannot attempt it. After it was over, a holy calm seemed to pervade her mind, and she looked almost like a beautified spirit. The evening following she said to me, 'Mother, I have made a solemn surrender of myself to God. If it is his will, I would desire to live long enough to prove the sincerity of my profession, but his will be done; living or dying, I am henceforth devoted to God.' After this, some doubt seemed to intrude; her spirit was troubled. I asked her if there was any thing she desired to have done, any little arrangements to be made, any thing to say which she had left unsaid, and assured her that her wishes should be sacred to me. She turned her eyes upon me with an expression so sad, so mournfully sweet: 'Mother, "When I can read my title clear, to mansions in the skies," then I will think of other matters.' Her hair, which when a little child had been often cut to improve its growth, was now very beautiful; and she usually took much pains with it. During the whole course of her sickness I had taken care of it. One day, not long before her death, she said, evidently making a great effort to speak with composure, 'Mother, if you are willing, I will have my hair cut off; it is troublesome; I should like it better short.' I understood her at once: she did not like to have the idea of death associated with those beautiful tresses which I had loved to braid. She would have them taken off while living. I mournfully gave my consent, and she said, 'I will not ask you, my dear mother, to do it; my friend, Mrs. F——, will be with me to-night, and she will do it for me.' The dark rich locks were severed at midnight; never shall I forget the expression of her young faded face as I entered the room. 'Do not be agitated, dear mamma, I am more comfortable now. Lay it away, if you please, and to-morrow I will arrange and dispose of it. Do you know that I view my hair as something sacred? It is a part of myself, which will be re-united to my body at the resurrection.' She had sat in an easy chair or reclined upon a sofa for several weeks.

"On Friday, the 22d of November, at my urgent entreaty, she consented to be laid upon the bed. She found it a relief, and sunk into a deep sleep, from which she was only awake when I aroused her to take some refreshment. When she awoke, she looked and spoke like an angel, but soon dropped asleep as before. Oh! how my poor heart trembled, for I felt that it was but the precursor to her long last rest, although many of our friends thought she might yet linger some weeks. A total loss of appetite, and a difficulty in swallowing, prevented her from taking any nourishment throughout the day, and when we placed her in the easy chair, at night, in order to arrange her bed, I offered her some nice food, which I had prepared, and found she could not take it. My feelings amounted almost to agony. She said, 'Do not be distressed; I will take it by and bye.' I seated myself beside her, and she said, 'Surely, my dear mother, you have many consolations. You are gathering a little family in heaven to welcome you.' My heart was full. When I could speak, I said, 'Yes, my love, I feel that I am indeed gathering a little family in heaven to bid me welcome, but when they are all assembled there, how dreadful to doubt whether I may ever be permitted to join the circle.'—'Oh hush, dear mother, do not indulge such sad thoughts; the fact of your having trained this little band to inhabit that holy place, is sufficient evidence to me that you will not fail to join us there.' I was with her myself that night, and a friend in the neighborhood sat up also. On Saturday morning, after I had taken half an hour's sleep, I found her quiet as a sleeping infant. I prepared her some food, and when I awoke her to take it, she said, 'Dear mother, I will try, if it is only to please you.' I fed her, and I would have fed a babe. She smiled sweetly, and said, 'Mother, I am again an infant.' I asked if I should read to her; she said yes, she would like to have me read a part of the gospel of John. I did so, and then said, 'My dear Margaret, you look sweetly composed this morning. I trust all is peace within your heart.'—'Yes, mother, all is peace, sweet peace. I feel that I can do nothing for myself. I have cast my burden upon Christ.' I asked if she could rest her hopes there in perfect confidence. 'Yes,' she replied, 'Jesus will not fail me. I can trust him.' She then sank into a deep sleep, as on the preceding day. In the afternoon, Mr. and Mrs. H. came from Ballston. They were much affected by the change a few days had made in her appearance. I awoke her, fearing she might sleep too long, and said her friends had come. She extended her arms to them both, and kissed them, saying to Mr. H. that he found her a late riser, and then sank to sleep again. Mrs. H. remained with us that night. About sunset I spoke to her. She awoke and answered me cheerfully, but observing that I was unusually depressed, she said, 'Dear mother, I am wearing you out.' I replied, 'My child, my beloved child, it is not that: the thought of our separation fills me with anguish.' I never shall forget the expression of her sweet face, as she replied, 'Mother, my own dear mother, do not grieve. Our parting will not be long. In life we were inseparable, and I feel that you cannot live without me. You will soon join me, and we shall part no more.' I kissed her pale cheek, as I bent over her, and finding my agitation too strong to repress, I left the room. She soon after desired to get up. She said she must have a coughing fit, and she could bear it much better in the chair. When there she began to cough, and her distress was beyond description. Her strength was soon exhausted, and we again carried her to the bed. She coughed from six until half past ten. I then prevailed on her to take some nutritious drink, and she fell asleep. My husband and Mrs. H. were both of them anxious that I should retire and get some rest, but I did not feel the want of it, and impressed as I was with the idea that this was the last night she would pass on earth, I could not go to bed. But others saw not the change, and to satisfy them I went at twelve to my room, which opened into hers. There I sat listening to every sound. All seemed quiet. I twice opened the door, and Mrs. H. said she slept, and had taken her drink as often as directed, and again urged me to go to bed. A little after two I put on my night dress, and laid down. Between three and four Mrs. H. came in haste for ether. I pointed to the bottle, and sprang up. She said, 'I entreat my dear Mrs. Davidson, that you do not rise; there is no sensible change, only a turn of oppression.' She closed the door, and I hastened to rise, when Mrs. H. came again, and said Margaret had asked for her mother. I flew—she held the bottle of ether in her own hand, and pointed to her breast. I poured it on her head and chest. She revived. 'I am better, now,' said she. 'Mother, you tremble, you are cold; put on your clothes.' I stepped to the fire, and threw on a wrapper, when she stretched out both her arms, and exclaimed, 'Mother, take me in your arms.' I raised her, and seating myself on the bed, passed my arms around her waist; her head drooped upon my bosom, and her expressive eyes were raised to mine. That look I never shall forget: it said, 'Tell me, mother, is this death?' I answered the appeal as if she had spoken. I laid my hand upon her white brow; a cold dew had gathered there; I spoke: 'Yes, my beloved, it is almost finished; you will soon be with Jesus.' She gave one more look, two or three short fluttering breaths, and all was over—her spirit was with its God—not a struggle or groan preceded her departure. Her father just came in time to witness her last breath. For a long half hour I remained in the same position, with the precious form of my lifeless child upon my bosom. I closed those beautiful eyes with my own hand. I was calm. I felt that I had laid my angel from my own breast, upon the bosom of her God. Her father and myself were alone. Her Sabbath commenced in heaven. Ours was opened in deep, deep anguish. Our sons, who had been sent for, had not arrived, and four days and nights did Ellen (our young nurse, whom Margaret dearly loved,) and I watch over the sacred clay. I could not resign this mournful duty to strangers. Although no son or relative was with us in this sad and solemn hour, never did sorrowing strangers meet with more sympathy than we received in this hour of affliction from the respected inhabitants of Saratoga. We shall carry with us through life the grateful remembrance of their kindness. And now, my dear madam, let me thank you for your kind consoling letter; it has given me consolation. My Margaret, my now angel child, loved you tenderly. She recognized in yours, a kindred mind, and I feel that her pure spirit will behold with delight your efforts to console her bereaved mother."

She departed this life on the 25th of November, 1838, aged fifteen years and eight months. Her earthly remains repose in the grave-yard of the village of Saratoga.

"A few days after her departure," observes Mrs. Davidson in a memorandum, "I was searching the library in the hope of finding some further memento of my lost darling, when a packet folded in the form of a letter, met my eye. It was confined with a needle and thread, instead of a seal, and secured more firmly by white sewing silk, which was passed several times around it. The superscription was, 'For my Mother—Private.' Upon opening these papers, I found they contained the results of self-examination, from a very early period of her life, until within a few days of its close. These results were noted and composed at different periods. They are some of the most interesting relics she has left, but they are of too sacred a nature to meet the public eye. They display a degree of self-knowledge and humility, and a depth of contrition, which could only emanate from a heart chastened and subdued by the power of divine grace."

(3) By a statement in the Nantucket Enquirer, we see that during the month of May there arrived in the ports of the United States 34 whalers, bringing oil to the value of a million and a half of dollars. The imports have been 1,041,862 gallons sperm and 880,740 gallons "right whale" oil. The quantity of sperm being larger than whale is a very unusual circumstance. The whale ship Science arrived at Portland on the 4th inst. having on board 90,000 gallons whale oil, 10,000 gallons sperm, and 22,000 lbs. bale. She has been absent about two years and a half.

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 12, 1841.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

People must not write to us unless they pay the postage. So innumerable are the letters received at this office, that it would be folly in us not to make a general rule and adhere to it. Among the letters refused lately, are two directed to the Editor—one post-marked Columbia, Georgia, postage 25 cents, and one post-marked Utica, postage 18½ cents. If the writers of these have ordered our paper, or made any communication of importance, they must repeat their epistles and pay the postage.

N. B. If these letters contained what is called poetry—viz: lines beginning with capital letters, we beg that copies may not be transmitted to us.

The First Volume of Charles O'Malley is nearly ready. It is published in compliance with the wishes of numerous subscribers. All subscribers renewing their terms, and all new subscribers who shall send $3 (current money) in advance, will be supplied gratuitously. All others may obtain the first volume on payment of fifty cents.

DOINGS AT WASHINGTON.

The Heads of the several Departments have transmitted to the President of the United States (except the Secretary of the Treasury, whose Report was made directly to Congress,) communications setting forth the condition and prospects of their several branches of the Public Service committed to their charge respectively. They are all plain, brief, and well-written, but are necessarily less important than the several Exhibits which will be made at the opening of the Regular Session. Mr. Bell thinks the Florida War is not near its end, and calls for more money. Mr. Granger finds a deficit of $400,000 in his Department, and thinks Congress would do well to advance him the money till he can earn it. Mr. Badger wants no money, but he wants Reform in the Naval Service, which we trust Congress will aid him to effect. Mr. Webster, in addition to his admirable correspondence with Mr. Fox, has transmitted a noble paper on the Foreign Commerce of the Country, treating especially of points in which it is injuriously affected by the unjust and selfish policy of Foreign Powers.

Congress has done little yet beyond the appointment of the Committees in each House. The Whigs take nearly every thing in the Senate and all the best in the House, according to the bad example of the last few years. The Senate has passed to a third reading Mr. Clay's proposition for the Repeal of the Sub Treasury; Yeas 30; Nays 16—all the Whigs and Conservatives, with Mr. Buchanan of Pa. voting in the affirmative. The House has rescinded the famous Atherton Resolution rejecting all Anti-Slavery Petitions, known as the 'Gag Law.' Yeas 112; Nays 104. All the Northern and Western Whigs but two with four Southern Whigs voting in the affirmative; the Northern Opposition Members 31 for to 20 against the repeal; the Southern Whigs generally and all the Southern Opposition in the negative.

Each House has appointed a Select Committee of nine on a Bank or Fiscal Agent, for the Government; Mr. Clay of Ky. at the head of the Senate, and Mr. Sargeant of Pa. at the head of the House Committee. Mr. Clay's plan may be looked for forthwith.

AN ANECDOTE WORTH RELATING.—We have always entertained the most thorough respect for Dr. Anthon, the author of the Classical Dictionary; but an event has lately come to our knowledge which swells this sentiment to one of affectionate veneration.

The eldest son of a literary gentleman in this city—a man held in sincere regard by the public—is a boy of fine talents and amiable temper. He longed for the advantages of a liberal education; but, on account of the narrow circumstances of his parents, saw no prospect of gratifying so laudable a desire. At last, prompted by this ardent wish, he applied to Mr. T. W. White, editor of the Southern Literary Messenger. Mr. White was walking in Murray street, opposite to the grammar school under the charge of Professor Anthon, where he was accosted by the young lad, who had made his acquaintance at his father's house. He pointed to the school-house, and, of his own accord, signified how happy he should be if the circumstances of his friends could enable them to place him under the tuition of Dr. Anthon. Mr. White spoke to him encouragingly, and promised to see what could be done. In the evening of the same day, he called upon the learned Professor and related the occurrence of the morning. No sooner was Dr. Anthon made acquainted with the fact than he replied:

"Say no more, Mr. White, say no more. Send the lad to me with a note written by yourself to-morrow morning, and I will give him a good classical education and make no charge to his father. Let the second son, his brother, come also—he shall be instructed on the same terms."

As if this generous offer were not sufficient, Dr. Anthon furnished the Editor of the Messenger with a note to the Messrs. Harper, the publishers of his whole series of school books. The effect of the note was to procure from those liberal and enterprising gentlemen an immediate present of all the books necessary for the boy's education.

We have recorded this anecdote with feelings of unalloyed gratification. It is illustrative of the character of the distinguished scholar, who, being one of that rare class who "Do good by stealth and blush to find it fame," will probably disapprove of a publication, which we could not find it in our heart to withhold.

THE CASE OF WILLIS ALSTON.

TALLAHASSEE, May 26th, 1841.

Mr. Park Benjamin Editor of the "New World," New-York:
DEAR SIR—I write to request you to give me the name of the individual who wrote you, from Augusta, Georgia, an account of the killing of Gen. Read of this place, by my son Willis Alston. I am now an old man, and the father of a large family, whose respectability I shall say nothing about, more than to refer you to the statements accompanying this, of gentlemen with whose high standing I expect you are acquainted. From what I have heard of your character, I am satisfied you will not deny this act of justice. I know your sense of propriety will show you how important it is, that I should know the name of the man who has taken occasion, without any provocation that I know of, not only to assail the character of my son Willis, but of my whole family, male and female.

Allow me to refer you to a publication in the "Star" of this date, under the editorial head, as indicative of the feeling of this place, with regard to the publication in your paper of the 15th inst.

Let me beg of you, also, to publish in your next number, the statements with the names, which accompany this.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT W. ALSTON.

The undersigned hope that Mr. Benjamin will comply with the request contained in the annexed letter of Col. R. W. Alston, by communicating the name of the writer of a letter dated Augusta, Geo., May 7, 1841, signed W., and published in the newspaper called "The New World," on the 15th instant—which letter, with the exception of the facts that Gen. Read did kill Col. Augustus Alston in a duel—that there was a subsequent rencontre between Willis Alston and Gen. Read, in which the latter was wounded—and that Willis Alston has since killed Gen. Read in the street of Tallahassee, is a tissue of falsehoods.

For the killing of Gen. Read, Willis Alston is now in jail awaiting his trial, when he will no doubt be dealt with as law and justice may demand; and it would obviously be improper in us, or the public press of the country, to say anything in relation to the case which would excite prejudice for or against the prisoner. But we feel called upon to say that we have not in our country a family more respectable, and respected, than that of Col. Robert W. Alston. And we deem it an act of justice not only to them, but to the public, that you should publish the name of the man who, in so wanton, base and cowardly a manner, has assailed them.

JOHN PARKHILL.

From the "Star of Florida" of May 26th.

We have seen with deep regret that some of our brethren of the editorial corps have suffered themselves to be made the instrument of calumny, falsehood, misrepresentation and detraction, in regard to the matter of the controversy between Col. Willis Alston and Gen. Read. We have read with much pain, a communication published in the New World of the 15th inst. from a correspondent of that paper, who subscribes himself "W." and dates his letter at Augusta, Geo., on the 7th inst. We have every reason to believe that Mr. Benjamin, the editor of that paper, has been imposed on by his correspondent, for we cannot suppose he would, knowingly, admit into his paper anything so positively false and slanderous. His correspondent is a consummate liar and scoundrel, and we pronounce every sentence that he has written, concerning the difficulty between Col. Alston and Gen. Read, false, absolutely and entirely without any mitigation or qualification, whatever. We hope Mr. Benjamin will do Col. Alston and this community the justice to disabuse the public mind of the prejudices which the falsehood of his correspondent are calculated to produce, and also disclose to Col. Alston and the insulted people of Florida, the name of his black-hearted correspondent.

We trust that the publications, thus made, will effectually eradicate from the public mind any disagreeable impression which may have been excited in consequence of the statements of our correspondent. It has caused us the most sincere regret to know that the feelings of so respectable a gentleman as Mr. R. W. Alston, and of his family, have been wounded by any article appearing in the New World. An exposure of our correspondent's name would be of no avail; he is a young gentleman, formerly connected with the press of this city, wholly a stranger in Georgia, and doubtless he told the story as it was told to him, without any malicious or inimical intent. Confiding in the correctness of letter addressed to us by him from other parts of the country, we inserted that, to which the foregoing correspondence refers, without inspection. He will doubtless, on seeing this, make a counter statement, which will be deemed satisfactory.

Q. Thomas A. Cooper, "the distinguished tragedian," as he is now called, had a daughter, whom he brought before the public as an actress, and who obtained some celebrity in a theatrical tour. Is this the lady who is now the matron and (doubtless) the ornament of the White House? If so, why not say so at once, without flummery? The silence on this point would lead some to suppose that certain persons wish to keep mute on this point. Come, come gentlemen, be a little candid, or you will disparage where you mean to flatter. It is not the first time that beauty and talents have raised the possessor to eminence.—[Northern Badger, Wis. Ter.]

No one, we believe, ever attempted to conceal the fact that Mrs. Robert Tyler, formerly Miss Cooper, daughter of Cooper the tragedian, and daughter-in-law to the President, was once an actress. Why should a fact so honorable to the lady be concealed? Is there any one so demented with bigotry as to attach any discredit to a woman of a perfectly pure and unsullied character because she has been on the stage? On the contrary, if there be that corruption and crime in the theatre, which the super-moralists charge, such a woman should be more highly respected, more truly valued for having preserved unsullied the whiteness of her soul.

THE JUNE NUMBER OF CHARLES O'MALLEY.—This number, comprising eight new chapters, is issued entire in the present New World. We obtained it at considerable expense, from the publishers in Dublin, who have engaged to send us all the subsequent numbers as well as the new work, which is soon to be commenced by the same lively and charming author.

Our readers will please to take notice that the sheets of this work were received by us before their day of publication in Dublin.

The Musical World.

MUSIC—ITS USES AND EFFECTS.

No. 1.

"There's not an orb which thou beholdest,
But in its motion like an angel sings;
Still choiring to the young-eyed cherubim:
Such harmony is in immortal souls;
But whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it."

All this great universe is vocal, and to the attentive ear, sings a continual and most delightful song. Nature works all her changes accompanied by sounds peculiar and appropriate. The winter-wind howls through the leafless trees, or dashes the maddened waves over the topmost rocks; the mountain torrent, scorning its narrow course, sweeps with impetuous force wherever its fury listeth. The birds fly shrieking through the air, the beasts through all the night howl in the whitened wood, where the gaunt trees stand forth like spectral shapes.

The Spring treads closely in the footsteps of hoar Winter, and is there not, throughout her reign, music everywhere? The birds, that through the past, sad, dreary season, had been mute from very heart-depair, now chirp and carol on the boughs and in the air, making the woods vocal with their minstrelsy; the "murmurous din of busy insects giving a voice to day;" the brooks and rivulets leaping and rushing rapidly in the sunshine through fields clothed in the freshest verdure of the early year; the trees, the flowers and plants bursting into bloom and beauty, and the brisk winds freshening the face of things—together form a song that penetrates the inmost heart of man, and fills his soul with gratitude and thanksgiving to that Being, who is the Creator of the whole.

The Summer singeth the same song of Spring but in a more luxurious and honied cadence. The air, heavy laden and sick with the odors of ten thousand wild flowers, creeps through the trees, scarce waking them from their voluptuous slumber. The cattle lowing in the pasture, the wild bee humming on its heedful way, with all the thousand living things that sing their Summer song, give beauty to the quiet scene.

The Autumn comes at last, when all the lovely things that have adorned and blessed the youth and prime of the year, are fading into decay. The winds wail through the branches, rustling the sear leaves to the ground and seeming to sigh over the devastation they are committing. Like those fragile beings, who consume by slow degrees to death, the leaves die with blushes upon their cheeks. In every change there are peculiar and distinctive sounds, which, to the refined and observant ear, are as easily distinguishable as are the most tangible substances to the sight or touch.

Music is the most ancient of all the sciences, being mentioned in the earliest periods of the Mosiac history—we are told that it is the language of the heavens, and to quote from a beautiful Persian fable, "the trees in the garden of Paradise are hung with harmonious bells, which are set in motion by the wind which comes from the throne of God." Every fable of the ancients tends in some way, by positive or indirect allusion, to the 'mighty power of music—to its existence throughout nature and to its influence over the souls of men, in refining and softening the feelings in every state of society. The quotation from Shakspeare that heads this article, is based upon the most beautiful of these beautiful fables—it was the belief that the ten thousand stars of Heaven performed their appointed revolutions accompanied by the most ravishing harmony, springing out of their own eternal motion. They even went so far as to arrange a system based upon the harmony of the Spheres, in which those stars nearest the sun bore the melody while the intermediate orbs gave forth the minor parts and the vast distances of the far-off planets perfected the whole and formed the base to this celestial harmony. Surely this corroborates our remarks upon the harmony existing throughout nature. We would quote a thousand passages from poets and historians, which would illustrate the power and importance of music, as a means of moral culture in uniting more closely and happily the home circle, by drawing together the scattered members of society to join in its practice and receive from its influence great intellectual and refined enjoyment, but that we intend, in our next article, to prove our point in a more matter-of-fact and conclusive manner.

CONCERTS.—Mr. C. E. Horn gave his annual benefit Concert at the City Hotel, last week. He had a whole host of assistants—but numbers do not constitute excellence. There were one or two good things in the bill, but on the whole the selection was poor in the extreme. Mrs. Sutton contrived to make a few beauties appear through numberless gross faults of style and execution. Mr. A. Phillips has a nice voice for a small room, but one that is wholly unfitted for a Concert-room, both from its poorness in strength and quality. The room was very thinly attended. We view this as a sign of the times. The public will not be led by the nose any longer.

SOCIETY'S LIBRARY ROOM.—Mr. D. Johnson, of Peale's Museum celebrity, gave a dollar Concert at the above place on Monday evening. Mrs. Sutton sang as before. Miss Ellen Lewis has a pretty voice and tolerable style, but she requires much intense study, before she can introduce into benighted Brooklyn the pure Italian school of singing, especially as Caradori Allen has preceded her. We congratulate the public upon the acquisition of Mr. J. Schwartz Massett, to our Concert parties. He has a pure bass voice of good compass and fine quality. Indeed, with the exception of Guibelei or Seguin, there is no man in the country whose voice can compete with his in depth, richness and general beauty. As friends, we advise him to cultivate his voice assiduously and strive after a purer style: these will present but few difficulties to him, for though he has much to learn, he has but little to unlearn. Of the beneficiary himself, we can only say that his voice is miserably bad, and that his style is admirably suited to the taste of Museum visitors, who, attracted by the braying of the brass instruments outside, "walk up to see the show;" but it is totally unfit to be displayed before persons of refined and cultivated taste. While on the subject, we will expose the humbug to which the public are daily subjected by the system of universal Concert giving. A party, of which this gentleman was one, gave a Concert a short time since, the admittance to which was one dollar, while at that very time they could be heard at Peale's Museum, where the price of admission is twenty-five cents. But let not our readers suppose that the sum was charged to hear the "grand Concert!"—Oh no! taking each exhibition at a fair ratio charge, the Concert would reach the fair value of three cents; and Mrs. Morley and Messrs. Beames and Johnson had the assurance to charge one dollar a ticket for their Concert at Tammany Hall! This is one of many like cases, which we will expose in fitting time.

NEW MUSIC.—"Oh say not this heart is false," poetry by D. C. Driscoll, comes within that style denominated "pretty." The music by John Willis, is written in G. from which it never departs save for a half bar or so, when it tremblingly steps into the dominant, but, being frightened, hurries back as rapidly as possible. The ballad is easy, possessing as much merit as a thousand other of these ephemeral productions, which live in the morning, wither in the evening, and are quite forgotten at night. The compass is within the range of the most ordinary voice, being but nine notes from D below the staff, to E in the fourth space.

The Taglioni Gallopades, composed by C. S. Spahn, are mere trash. There is not a single original thought in them, nor does the treatment of either melody or harmony, induce the belief that the composer knows anything of his profession. Like Mr. Willis he has evidently mistaken his vocation.

The Salina Waltz, by D. N. Morange. The first strain is free and pleasing; the second rather cramped, but of some pretension, while the succeeding parts in the subdominant of the original key, are common-place and poor, but on the whole this Waltz is better than two thirds of the pieces of the same sort, which are sent forth by the press in tens of hundreds.

The Literary World.

That monthly periodical called ARCTURUS, to which we on a former occasion expressed our gratitude for an allusion to our humble journal, and which we commended for having discovered the rising talents of the Rev. Dr. Dewey, and kindly brought him forward—telling the public that he was a promising youth—that very Arcturus has, in its last number, covered with glory no less a personage than Dr. Charles Anthon, author of the Classical Dictionary. To be sure, the erudite Doctor is not praised exactly, and his style is said to be marked by "a Latinized verbosity of expression," and those who have puffed him are utterly annihilated in a single sentence—but, but—is it not "glory enough" for him to be noticed at all by Arcturus? How ravenous of notoriety must be that man, who could ask for more! Heretofore Dr. Anthon has been made known to the world, only in "the economical squeak of the penny press and the bivalve of the Quarterly"—but now, ye gods! his fame is rolled forth like an anthem, in the deep eternal bass of Arcturus! The farthest Ind will be familiar with the sound; it will be echoed back from the enormous sides of the Andes and reverberated from the icy caverns of Nova Zembla. In fine, such legions as, will be as familiar with his name as soldiers are with the shrill life and spirit-stirring drum, or the boys of New-York with the cry of "radishes." Had Arcturus been so merci- less as to praise the Doctor, we shudder to reflect upon what might have been the result. Instead of pursuing his present benevolent, profound and useful labors, he might have had his head turned and taken to the stage by way of exhibiting himself to the gaze of an admiring world. We rejoice, then, in this forbearance; and we take this occasion to profess our sincere hope that "Arcturus" will not undertake any retrospective task of bringing into notice the neglected authors of a former age. For if it should, we shall certainly see those old chaps bursting from their cements, and opening those ponderous and marble jaws in which they have so long been quietly inurned, and revisiting the glimpses of the moon. Fancy Dr. Johnson, for instance—Samuel Johnson, the respectable lexicographer—getting up in his shroud as unconcerned as if it were his night-shirt, and the illustrious Boz following after with a very grave aspect to record his primary observation!

"the populous North
Poured never from her frozen loins to cross
Rhene and the Danaw,"

Oh, Dr. Anthon, Dr. Anthon, what have you not escaped! Pause and reflect over the critical acumen of Arcturus, and consult the editors and their printer, Mr. W. E. Dean—who is likewise the publisher of an edition of Lemprière, puffed distendedly on another page—before you take it upon yourself to publish a second edition. Your book, you are told, is "a laborious specimen of scholarship," but it is not "a monument" nor "a considerable erection (!) of genius!" but it is "a huge mass of material," and you are "a scholar of a brazen cast of intellect"—a perfect beef-eater of languages. Moreover, the publication of your Dictionary has regaled the editors of Arcturus with "a varied and triumphant concerto of trumpets," and it has been accompanied and urged through the country, "like the famous elephant Tippee Saib on one of his tours by the brattling (!) of all sorts of wind-instruments" &c. as before quoted. We will now cite four whole sentences, reverentially, taking off our hats and making a grand oriental salam to the supremacy of genius and the modesty of real worth:

"Sitting in the privacy of his study, the learned Professor must have been actually astounded by this horrible out-break, and have felt mortified and abashed that any humble labors of his should have been greeted with such unseemly clamor. We sympathize with him and his worthy publishers. We know how painful such things are to truly sensitive minds. Their prayer must have been as ours would be in a similar case, that they might be instantly afflicted with deafness, and thus spared the unmannerly assault."

Now let it be known to the reader unfamiliar with Arcturus, if any such there be, that, in the very number in which this sympathizing spirit is manifested, and the pain that the Doctor must endure from puffery commiserated—nay, in all the foregoing numbers of Arcturus—there are a page and a half of stereotyped puffs of certain works emanating from the pen of one of the editors of Arcturus—puffs too from the very journals which so afflicted Dr. Anthon. Let the curious look at the passages which succeed the advertisement of "THE WORKS OF CORNELIUS MATTHEWS," (quem!) and see if the Editors of Arcturus are not furnished with "a similar case," without the necessity of making an hypothesis. If they are as good as their word, and the prayer they promise be answered, they will be so deaf that all the thunders of Olympus and the echo of their own fame even cannot awake them!

In conclusion we beg leave to deprecate the supposition that this article is written in an ironical spirit, and we wholly repudiate the idea of insinuating that, for reasons best known to themselves, the sagacious critics of Arcturus have frowned upon Dr. Anthon and smiled upon Mr. Dean's, their printer's edition of Lemprière. Youths of such signal ability and of so much veracity of character would scorn to shoot a paltry squib at a great author for the sake of currying favor with a small publisher.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE ON DISEASES OF CHILDREN, by James Stewart, M. D. New-York, Wiley & Putnam.

The long acknowledged want of a work on diseases of children from the pen of a local practitioner, has at last been supplied by Dr. Stewart. The reader has but to cast his eye over the preliminary observations to discover that the work before him is not a mass of hypotheses and crude suggestions—but a most philosophical and profound treatise on the diseases of which it treats. It is impossible to make extracts from medical works for the pages of a weekly journal; neither do we suppose it necessary, for the enlightened profession for whom it is written have doubtless discovered its value. Yet we must present the Doctor's first position; he grounds his practice upon it, and sure are we that our weekly returns of mortality would be much reduced, did parents as well as physicians recognise its force. "Thus it appears," says the Doctor, "that the excess of vitality dependent on development, is the source to which the great frequency of disease is to be traced, and from the same cause rendered far more dangerous by the sympathetic participation of other organs; their diseases are for the most part sudden, and the participation of other parts, especially the brain and its membranes, no less sudden and severe; the disordered affection soon passing through its course, and if its acute action continue, terminating in effusion and death. The practical deductions from the suggestions and facts here set forth, are first to meet the diseases of children in their invasion, with promptness and decision, whatever be the remedial means resolved on; and secondly, never, under the most discouraging circumstances, to consider any case as hopeless." How few of us who have not been called on to mourn the loss of those we loved best on earth for want of energy either in ourselves or our physicians; and how often has misplaced affection or inert practice, sealed the eyes in death where science and action might have restored the smile of gladness in the face of the loved one. We most cordially recommend the Doctor's book to our medical and other readers.

THE WORKS OF LORD BOLINGBROKE, with a Life prepared expressly for this Edition, containing additional information in relation to his Personal and Political Character, selected from the best authorities. 4 vol. royal 8vo. Carey & Hart, Philadelphia. Embellished by a fine engraving.

Americans will soon be able to form a valuable library out of the standard republications and original works which appear in their own country. But a few weeks have elapsed since we were presented by the Harpers with Anthon's Classical Dictionary—a noble monument of scholarship and laborious application which must be extolled even by the learned critics of foreign nations. And now we are called upon to announce the publication of works, long placed in the highest rank of English classical literature, and which were never before attainable by our public at a price within the means of a large class of readers. Such works have generally been read in libraries, and not with that homelike leisure that is essential to the full enjoyment and appreciation of noble ideas and profound reflections.

It is not the intention of the present notice to criticise the productions of Lord Bolingbroke, nor even to tell that portion of the community who are unacquainted with them wherein their extraordinary merit consists, but simply to announce the edition, and to express our obligations to the publishers for the tasteful and elegant manner in which it is brought out.

FAMILY SECRETS, OR HINTS TO THOSE WHO WOULD MAKE HOME HAPPY; by Mrs. Ellis, author of "Women in England," "Poets of Life," &c. New-York, D. Appleton & Co. 200 Broadway. 1 vol. 12mo. pp. 180.

This is the general title of a work which is to appear in quarterly volumes. Six will complete the series. In order to place it within the reach of all classes, in accordance with the suggestions of her friends and at the request of her publisher, Mrs. Ellis has brought her work before the public as one of the "Tales for the People and their children." The present tale is called the "Dangers of Dining out," and is divided into three chapters. To show its design we quote the opening observations of the preface.

"Home-duties are universally admitted to be among our most sacred responsibilities; and home-pleasures justly rank among our most highly prized enjoyments. Individual conduct at home is the surest index of real character; while the intercourse of home affords the most frequent occasion for the exercise of the purest affections, and the most exalted virtues. All who are solicitous for the well-being of society must rejoice in whatever tends to the increase of domestic comfort, either by removing what is destructive to its existence, or encouraging those habits and dispositions by which it is protected and sustained."

We should recommend any work—though indifferently executed—whose intent was so praiseworthy; but, it is with right cordial good-will that we exhort our subscribers to place Mrs. Ellis's sensible and heart-improving volume in the hands of their children. We wish that stories of Domestic Life were more commonly told; they furnish material for the higher tasks of literature, as well as food for useful instruction—indeed, we are convinced that tragedies, not built perhaps in lofty rhyme but set down in forcible prose, might be constructed out of the social events in which the affections and passions are largely exercised, that would give an elevation to the theatre such as it used to enjoy in its golden age.

THE MARTYRS OF SCIENCE, or the Lives of Galileo, Tycho Brahe, and Kepler. By Sir David Brewster. Vol. 130, Family Library: Harper & Brothers.

Nothing shows more strikingly the beneficent effects of knowledge, than the influence it has had in dispelling bigotry and prejudice, and in introducing more correct and liberal views in regard to the fearless investigation of truth. Less than three centuries ago, Galileo was summoned before the Inquisition on the charge of heresy, for teaching the true system of the universe, and made solemnly to confess what was as demonstrable as his own existence.

That which then subjected him to the most cruel persecution, has since crowned his name with imperishable glory. He was but one of the "martyrs of science." Others experienced in different ways but little better treatment; and among these none were more conspicuous than Tycho Brahe and Kepler. The lives of these distinguished men are full of interest; and we recommend this volume as being particularly interesting and instructive.

MASTERMAN READY, OF THE WRECK OF THE PACIFIC: Written for Young People, by Capt. Marryat. New-York, D. Appleton & Co. 1v. 12mo. pp. 184.

This is a volume of the interesting series, entitled "Tales for the People and their Children." We have long thought that Capt. Marryat could write an admirable book for the young, so far as his style and manner of narrative went. The former is very simple and the latter is so captivating, that it has done much more than the matter of his strange sea-tales, and won for him the high reputation which he enjoys. It requires little more than a rapid glance through this volume to convince us that it is replete with lively interest and that it will be greedily read wherever it may find its way. Though there is little danger of its rivaling Robinson Crusoe—that most delightful of all books—there is no doubt that the lovers of the one will eagerly seek for the other.

Apart, however, from the beautiful way in which this story is told, the youthful reader will not fail to derive instruction and a high moral lesson from its perusal. To those who entertain strong personal prejudices to Capt. Marryat, and who have not acquired an exalted idea of his morals from the descriptions in his romances and the license in which he often indulges his pen, it may seem strange that pure and lofty lessons may be derived from any work by the author of "Peter Simple." Nevertheless, such is the fact, and, that the most sceptical may be convinced of it, we quote an exemplifying passage:

"Who would have ever imagined, William," said Mr Seagrave, "that this island, and so many more which abound in the Pacific Ocean, could have been raised by the work of little insects not bigger than a pin's head."

"Insects, father!" replied William.

"Yes, insects. Give me that piece of dead coral, William. Do you see that on every branch there are a hundred little holes? Well, in every one of these little holes once lived a sea-insect; and, as these insects increase, so do the branches of the coral trees."

"Yes, I understand that; but how do you make out that this island was made by them? that's what I want to know."

"Nevertheless it is true, William, that almost all the islands in these seas have been made by the labor and increase of these small animals. The coral grows at first at the bottom of the sea, where it is not disturbed by the winds or waves; by degrees, as it increases, it advances higher and higher to the surface, till at last it comes near to the top of the water; then it is like those reefs which you see out there, William, and it is stopped very much in its growth by the force of the winds and the waves, which break it off, and of course it never grows above the surface of the water, for if it did the animals would die."

"Then how does it become an island?"

"By very slow degrees; the time, perhaps, much depending upon chance; for instance, a log of wood, floating about, and covered with barnacles, may ground upon the coral reefs; that would be a sufficient commencement, for it would then remain above water, and then shelter the coral to leeward of it, until a flat rock had formed, level with the edge of the water. The sea birds are always looking for a place to rest upon, and they would soon find it, and then their droppings would, in course of time, form a little patch above water, and other floating substances would be thrown on it; and land birds, who are blown out to sea, might rest themselves on it, and the seeds from their stomachs, when dropped, would grow into trees or bushes."

"I understand that."

"Well then, William, you observe there is an island commenced as it were, and, once commenced, it soon increases, for the coral would then be protected to leeward, and grow up fast. Do you observe how the coral reefs extend at this side of the island, where they are protected from the winds and waves; and how different it is on the weather side, which we have just left? Just so the little patch above water protects the coral to leeward, and there the island increases fast; for the birds not only settle on it, but they make their nests and rear their young, and so every year the soil increases; and then, perhaps, one coconut nut in its great outside shell (which appears as if it was made on purpose to be washed on shore in this way, for it is water tight and hard, and at the same time very light, so that it floats, and will remain for some months in the water without being injured) at last is thrown on these little patches—it takes root, and becomes a tree, every year shedding its large branches, which are turned into mould as soon as they decay, and then dropping its nuts, which again take root and grow in this mould; and thus they continue, season after season, and year after year, until the island becomes as large and thickly covered with trees as the one we are now standing upon. Is not this wonderful, my dear boy? Is not he a great and good God who can make such minute animals as these work his pleasure, and at the time he thinks fit produce such a beautiful island as this?"

"Indeed, indeed he is," exclaimed William.

"We only need use our eyes, William, and we shall love as well as adore. Look at that shell—is it not beautifully marked?—could the best painter in the world equal its coloring?"

"No, indeed,—I should think not."

"And yet there are thousands of them in sight, and perhaps millions more in the water. They have not been colored in this way to be admired, like the works of man; for this island has been till now probably without any one upon it, and no one has ever seen them. It makes no difference to Him, who has but to wish, and all is complete."

A PHILOSOPHICAL EMPEROR: A POLITICAL EXPERIMENT; OR, THE PROGRESS OF A FALSE POSITION. Dedicated to Whigs, Conservatives, Democrats and Loco Focos individually and collectively of the United States. Harper & Brothers: 18 mo. pp. 112.

At the present moment, when the creation of a new bank is the great topic of public interest, the subject seems not to need the aid of fiction to invite attention to it; but so seems not to have thought the author of the above work, who has contrived to involve into a romantic satire all that relates to not only the merits of such an institution, but the merits and demerits of the various causes which produced the extinction of the old bank, and the various actors in that catastrophe.

The book seems to court no particular class of politicians, but rather to satirise, good naturedly, all of them; and for this reason perhaps it has, as yet, found small favor with the daily press which is generally enlisted in defence of some particular party. As a reading book, it contains much to amuse and much to instruct, and though more excursive than seems to us necessary for the professed object of the writer, its digressions are usually of an entertaining character, and perhaps introduced simply for amusement.

JANE BROWN AND HER COW; A Story of Natural History, for children. Altered from the French by a Lady of New-York. M. W. Dodd, publisher.

This is the ne plus ultra of children's books, and should have a place in every family and every Sunday School Library. The story is remarkably complete, is highly interesting and instructive, and enforces with great clearness and cleverness the two moral axioms, "honesty is the best policy," and "Providence will aid those who first seek to help themselves."

The Lady by whom this work is introduced to the American public, has rendered to that public a signal service: and although the book itself is trifling in size, its excellence is of a character to reflect high honor on its translator.

THE SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER, for May and June—two numbers in one—is, in our hands, just as the New World is going to press. We have time, therefore, only to say that it is a number of more than ordinary value and interest. It is made up of fifteen original pre-articles and nine pieces of metre. The former are for the most part good; the latter for the most part poor. The long articles on Texas and its Revolution and the Navy, are marked by a knowledge and research, seldom shown in periodical papers.

FRANCE.

FETE DAY OF LOUIS PHILIPPE.—Saturday was the fête day of Louis Philippe, and one of the three days of rejoicing over the baptism of the grandson of the King, the heir apparent of the heir apparent. The royal infant, born August 24, 1838, was exactly two years, eight months, and ten days old. On Saturday the fêtes of May began, and the day passed quietly but heavily. "I overheard," says a correspondent, "very little violence of language, but much joking at the expense of the powers that be. In short, there was no aspect of loyalty, nor was there any indication of revolt; no respect evinced for authority, and yet no disposition shown to resist it." The Count d'Appony, in the name of the diplomatic body, presented the usual formal compliments at the Tuilleries. He entirely abstained from political allusions, made the congratulations quite personal to the King, and alluded to the baptism as a proof of divine favor. The King replied. The peers and deputies presented similar addresses. Baron Pasquier said the Genius of Conquest called his son King of Rome. The Napoleon of Peace chose for the title of his descendant the Count of Paris. The King said he had chosen the title to attach his son to the head and heart of France, and congratulated himself on having, for eleven years, maintained the blessings of peace.

CHRISTENING OF THE COUNT OF PARIS.—On Sunday the baptism took place in the Church of Notre Dame. The King and Queen of the French were the godfather and the godmother. The King and Queen of the Belgians, and all the royal family, were present, except the Duke of Nemours and the Duke d'Aumale, who are in Africa. The three cardinal archbishops, by their presence, gave for the first time the complete sanction of the church to the dynasty of Louis Philippe. The procession left the palace at eleven o'clock, the Duke and Duchess of Orleans, with the Count of Paris, proceeding in one carriage, and the royal family and court followed in thirteen others. They passed along the quays and Pont Neuf to the cathedral, where all the clergy were ready to receive them, and the archbishop addressed the King on the nature of the ceremony. The King declined the canopy prepared for him and sat in the reserved seats, to which the advance was marked by a brilliant march on the organ, accompanied with drums, &c. On the right of his Majesty where the King of the Belgians, the Duke of Orleans, the Prince de Joinville, Duke de Montpensier, and the Duke Alexander of Wurtemberg; and on his left were the Queen, the Queen of the Belgians, the Duchess of Orleans, Duchess of Nemours, Princess Clementine, Madame Adelaide, and the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg. The archbishop celebrated mass, assisted by his archdeacons and two canons, and the orchestra performed a Credo, a Sanctus, a Benedictus, and a Domine salvum fac regem, composed for the solemnity by M. Elwart. The music was exceedingly fine. The orchestra gave, in admirable style, the grand Te Deum of Leseur. The act of christening was then signed by the King and other members of the royal family, after which the archbishop, cardinals, and suffragan bishops, and all the clergy, in procession, conducted their Majesties to the grand entrance.

PRESENTATION OF THE SWORD.—The procession had hardly returned to the palace, when the authorities of Paris appeared to present the sword of the city to the young prince. The Count de Rambuteau, the Prefect, said—

"The ceremony at which we were present a few minutes since has left a profound impression in our hearts. What a grand spectacle in that cathedral! The King, the chief of a dynasty, who has saved this country from so many evils, and has done it so much good; the fine family, in which every virtue is taught and transmitted by example; the prince, on whose brow valor sits radiant over precocious sagacity; the young mother, whose noble, penetrating, and gracious looks reveal the destiny for which Providence has gifted her; the royal infant, bending his young head under celestial grace:—all this, Sire, was holy and beautiful!—This is the child who shall be the King of our children!—This city, whose name your Majesty has been pleased that he shall bear, is anxious that he should preserve a remembrance of the happiness caused by his birth and by the choice of this name. It offers him this sword, Sire; it is the city which gives it to him for the service of the country!"

The King replied—

"I accept for my grandson the sword, presented to him by the municipal body, in the name of the city of Paris.—May God grant that he may never have occasion to employ it; but if he should be forced to draw it from the scabbard, it will only be in a good cause—to defend the honor of France, and the independence of the nation. I have every reason to hope, and to this end I labor, that the reign of my grandson will not be disturbed by war, and that he will reap the more delightful glory of preserving the repose and prosperity of France."

His Majesty then took the Comte de Paris by the hand, and presenting him to the municipality, said—

"Give your hand to the Prefect, in token of your giving it to the whole city of Paris."

BARON VAN HALBERG'S WIFE.

The following account of the success of the Baron Van Halberg's matrimonial advertisement, which was published some time since, has appeared in the German journals:—

"It will, no doubt, be recollected, that, two months ago, this bold Baron Van Halberg de Broeck, Captain-Colonel of the Rhine and Meuse, applied through the European press for a wife, giving in lively terms a description of himself, and enumerating with great delicacy the graces and virtues with which she whom he sought must be endowed. This step of the rather eccentric Baron has led to the most happy results. He has, without a joke, met with a perfect woman. With his conscientious punctuality and delicacy, he is now preparing, with his mind at rest, a circular letter to those condescending young ladies who have offered to surrender to him their hands and hearts, and all their charms, amounting to no fewer than 749. The gallant gentleman, who is repairing his ancient castle to receive the Queen of the Tournay, deeply regrets that the terms of his own letter and his innate sense of delicacy, will not allow him to publish the 749 letters he has received. Some of them, he says are so beautifully composed, that if exposed to the light of day, they would in one week extinguish, by their brilliancy, the celebrated correspondence of Madame de Sevigne, and render it stale and unprofitable. The most spirituelle, he says, as might be expected, came from France. There are 27 from actresses, singers and dancers; 101 from grisettes, courtiers, enlumineuses, and modistes; 53 from duchesses, countesses, and marchionesses; 329 from Parisian literary ladies, whose names are always mentioned in a whisper. The honorable and discreet Baron, however, to prevent the possibility of his yielding to temptation, has announced through the press that he has burnt all these perfumed missives. The letter he is preparing will be his adieu to the press and the public. Henceforth, he declares, he no longer belongs to the world, but is devoted to the treasure of beauty which the wheel of fortune has brought to him."

The Old World.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN. NINE DAYS LATER.

The Steamship GREAT WESTERN, Capt. Heskin, arrived at this port about 8 o'clock Thursday evening, in 14 days from Bristol, whence she sailed on the 27th ult. By this arrival we have our regular files of London papers to the evening of the 26th.

The news by this arrival is not of much importance; the papers being principally taken up with the discussion of political matters connected with the defeat of Ministers, which took place on the 19th. The letter of our Correspondent, given below, will be found to contain all the items of interest:

From our Foreign Correspondent.

London, May 25, 1841.

The sugar part of the debate is over; and Ministers are defeated by a majority of 36!—So that the poor people of England are still to be taxed most enormously for the benefit of the rich owners of plantations of the blacks in the West Indies. Verily, John Bull is amazingly fond of humbugging himself!

Again were the Opposition on tiptoe for the immediate resignation of Ministers, and again were they disappointed. The spunky little Lord John, after "taking time to consider of it," announced that he should yet go on with the other measures proposed in the Budget, and that the Corn Law motion would be brought forward on the 4th of June. The Tories did not attempt to conceal their chagrin and "indignation;" and a few evenings after Sir Robert Peel gave notice that on Thursday, the 27th May, he should propose a vote that "Her Majesty's Ministers do not possess the confidence of the House," and that "their continuance in office under such circumstances, is at variance with the spirit of the Constitution." If this vote is carried the Corn Laws may yet remain as they are. Is it not marvelous that measures so palpably for the good of the people at large, should be opposed by so large a portion of the people themselves? Even in the Common Council of London it was with difficulty that a petition against the Corn Laws was carried; more than one-third voting in favor of the present system.

On the Queen's birth-day (the 21st) there was a "drawing-room"—the fullest this season—more than 2,000 being present in full court dress. The display of carriages and gold-laced-cocked-hat-footmen was very brilliant, and as usual attracted crowds of spectators. Before the drawing-room there was a review in St. James's Park by Prince Albert, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Hill, &c. More than 10,000 people were present. In the evening there were illuminations, chiefly at the club houses and by the "Royal Tradesmen."

A few days ago there was a meeting of 100,000 Repealers, near Clare in Ireland. They were addressed, says the Times, by several Popish priests, whose language was not very conciliatory toward the "English tyrants."

We have another ray of hope for the President. A Portuguese ship, the Conde de Palma, passed, on the 23d of April, in lat. 31 N. and long. 40 W., a large three-masted steamer steering N. N. E. under canvas, but not using her wheels—making about four miles per hour. The next morning saw her again, but she gradually fell off to leeward, &c. &c. The Portuguese captain was carefully questioned, and there certainly seems to be some good reason to hope that this steamer was the President. She was probably making for the Azores, but the next day the wind was ahead and she might not reach them for several days. The captain of the Conde de Palma, not knowing that the President was out and overdue, did not attempt to come near or speak her. It is supposed that Captain Roberts may have put his passengers on board some other ship, which would account for his not showing signals.

In the course of the debate on the Sugar Duties, Mr. Villiers read some statistics of pauperism, crime and suffering which give a frightful picture of the condition of thousands in England, particularly in the manufacturing districts. In Preston there are 1200 empty houses—and paupers had increased 127 per cent. since 1837—and crime 37 per cent. At least 10,000 persons in the neighborhood were without a blanket to cover them. In Bolton, Blackburn, Oldham, and many other towns the state of things was quite as bad. In Little Bolton 300 houses had been visited, containing in all 500 beds, and occupied as follows: 23 persons without beds; 42 persons slept 7 in a bed; 78 slept 6 in a bed; 185 slept 5 in a bed, &c. Their incomes were, 1,025 averaged below 1s 6d each per week! 359 more under 2s; 165 below 2s 6d, and the rest above 2s 6d per week. The rate of factory wages was decreasing. In Leicester, people were seen actually eating from the swill-tubs of the pigs! At Thirnam, a farmer's cow, which had died and been buried, was disinterred by some starving females, and served for food for 20 families who had not tasted meat before for months. At Manchester, no fewer than 4000 persons were subsisting upon 13½d per week. Similar details from Ireland are too horrible to be repeated. Human beings were there subsisting upon a diet (sowens) which in England would only be used as hogs wash. Even the swine elsewhere live luxuriously, and horses and dogs fare like princes, compared to these poor wretches. To the agricultural laborers of England even, beef or mutton, as articles of food are almost unknown; pork is the only kind of animal food they get—and generally but little of that—for the high price of bread takes up the whole of their miserable pittance for that necessary article alone. This class of persons amount to 800,000.

"Much had been said," added Mr. Villiers, "about our vast dependencies, and the magnitude of our foreign possessions; but of what use could they be to these unfortunate people? What was the worth of the East Indies or the West Indies to a starving population?"

"The people of this country were called upon to pay taxes for the maintenance of our colonies, while hundreds of thousands in a time of profound peace, and for no misconduct of their own, were reduced to absolute misery and destitution—and what a mockery it is to talk to them of the value of our colonies."—And comparing their condition with that of the slaves, for whom so much sympathy had been felt, he found that bare bones and rags were a sufficient mark of the real slave.

But you have had quantum sufficit of these sickening details—yet the whole of this speech is worth reading—because it shows the poorest native American that he is a rich man, compared to millions in this "great empire" of wealth and luxury and—starvation.

An action was brought last week against a clergyman of the church for refusing to bury a child because it had been baptized only by a dissenting clergyman! To the credit of common sense, this charitable individual was suspended for three months and had to pay the costs of suit.

The French Government have renewed their invitation for proposals for building two steamers to run between Havre and New York.

The Princess Isabella of Spain, who eloped from Paris with a Pole, named Gerowski, was overtaken at Brussels and sent back—but consent was finally given to the marriage, on condition that the pair should never show themselves either in France or Spain.

Madame Lafarge has again figured in the French Courts; she was tried for stealing the diamonds of a Madame Léotand. There was quite a dramatic scene in the Court between the opposing counsel and the "persecuted lady."

IGNORANCE OF CRIME.—The number of persons taken into custody by the Police in the Metropolis alone, in 1840, was 70,717, of whom 23,938 could neither read or write, and 37,551 could read only, or read and write very imperfectly.

In the Journal de Affaires of Paris are the following advertisements of Marriage Brokers, who have regular bureaux for matrimonial negotiations, "on commission," as described in Bulwer's "Night and Morning:"

"MARRIAGES."

- "1st. Fifty widows with 2 to 20,000 francs income.
- "2d. Fifty-one damsels with from 10,000 to 60,000 francs dowry.
- "3d. 400 young ladies and widows with but small fortunes, but remarkably well-looking. Apply to M. Poore, &c.

Another office advertises at disposal—

- "1st. Two young ladies between 15 and 19 years of age, with from 30,000 to 60,000 francs of portion.
- "2d. Two others between 30 and 36 years with 35,000 francs; and several demoiselles of all ages with between 400 and 600 francs income; with lots of widows of incomes of from 1,000 to 6,000 francs."

A third offers "an elegant young damsel with no fortune but a tortoise-shell cat." And a fourth, "the prettiest brunette in the world. Fortune, 6,000 francs—but" (ah! the buts!) "she has been slighted in love." A fair assortment to choose from!

Gas.—For lighting London and its suburbs there are 18 public gas-works; 12 public gas-work companies; 2,800,000l. capital employed in the business; 460,000l. yearly revenue derived; 180,000 tons of coal used annually for making gas; 1,400,000,000 cubic feet of gas made in the year, and 380 street lamplighters employed.

There are in England nearly 4000 persons who enjoy titles "by courtesy," as sons of peers, &c. Those whose titles are "by right," exceed 2000.

Mr. Barry is to receive the sum of £25,000 for designing and superintending the erection of the new Houses of Parliament. The walls are yet but four feet above ground.

There are 35,000 persons at Liverpool and 15,000 at Manchester living in cellars of the most unhealthy condition. In 1821 there were 114 executions in England and Wales; in 1828, there were 59; in 1836, 17; and in 1838 only 6.

The will of the late Jemmy Wood, the old miser of Gloucester, is yet in litigation, and the lawyers are fattening on the spoils. Already has £50,000 been spent in an Ecclesiastical Court, and the case is now (by appeal) before the Privy Council, where it will cost twice as much more. The Attorney General's fee "simple" in the appeal is 1,000 guineas, and a dozen fellow pleaders are paid in proportion. The amount of interest accrued on the property since Wood's death exceeds £200,000.

It is said that there are 20,000 copies of "the Times" printed daily. Occasionally there is a supplement, making altogether 96 columns. The columns of a single copy would reach 116 feet; and those of the whole edition would extend 440 miles. The paper for the whole would cover more than eleven acres. The double numbers are about the same size of the mammoth "New World," so that the same statistics will apply to those.

Dora, the only daughter of Wordsworth the Poet, was married last week at Bath to Mr. Edward Quillinan of Canterbury.

During the last week the returns from the twenty-nine railroads in England now open state the total amount of passengers conveyed during the week at 222,210. Total receipts (including passengers, parcels, carriages, horses, merchandise, &c.) 61,850l.

On Wednesday week the "Albert" steamer, Capt. H. D. Trotter, and the "Wilbarforce," commander W. Allen, sailed from Devonport on the expedition to the Niger. The ships of war in the sound manned their rigging, and saluted the steamers with three cheers, and with this salute and a fair wind they left the shores of England on their interesting mission.

THE PRESIDENT STEAMSHIP.

We copy the following account which gives a glimmer of hope for the President, though it has created but little confidence in England, as to her safety, the opinion prevailing that the vessel seen was not the President. However, it might have been her:

The captain of the Portuguese ship Conde de Palma, which arrived at Lisbon from Rio de Janeiro, on the 6th of May, saw a large steamer under canvas on the 23d and 24th April, but did not speak her. The following is a copy of the Log:—"On the 23d of April, 6 o'clock, P. M., in lat. 31 24 N., long. 40 43 W., saw a very large steamer, without showing her colors, under canvas; the next morning, at 6 o'clock, saw her again under topsail and latine. The following day the wind veered to the North and blew strong, which would prevent the steamer approaching the Islands. Neither smoke nor paddles were in motion."

On the 25th the wind veered to N. W., and blew strong, which would prevent the said steamer reaching the Western Isles.

The following questions were asked by Captain M'Leod of Captain Almeida, of the Conde de Palma, and his answers are annexed:

- What number of masts had the steamer? Three.
- How was she painted? All dark color.
- Did she appear to be under her own or jury masts? Her own.
- What color was her funnel? Not certain.
- Did you observe any water issuing from her scuppers, as if they were pumping? None observed.
- What was the nearest distance you were to her at any time? Four miles English.
- Did her bulwarks, or any part of her, appear to have suffered from bad weather? Did not appear to have suffered.
- Are you positive they did not show any colors, or make any signal indicative of wishing to speak with you? None whatever.
- How many knots an hour do you think they were going? Three or four knots (i. e. three or four miles).
- Did they appear to have a good wind or make a great deal of leeway? A great deal of leeway.
- Mention the sails she had set on the first day you saw her. Flying jib, jib, fore top mast, stay sail, square fore sail, top sail, top gaffail sail, and fore and aft fore sail.
- Mention what sails she had set the second day. Fore and aft main sail, square main top sail, and main ditto.
- Could you have communicated with the steamer on both days? Yes, we could.
- Had the steamer a figure-head? Could not distinguish.
- Did you observe any boats hoisted up on board of her? One quarter boat.
- How long did the north-west wind continue which sprung up on the 25th? Five days; afterward it was west and W. S. W.
- When did you make land, and did it agree with your reckoning? On the 5th of May, and it agreed exactly with the reckoning.
- How did the steamer bear off you when you first saw her? N. E. by N. four or five miles.
- How did she bear on the morning of the 24th, at 6 o'clock, and what distance? N. N. W. five or six miles.
- Did you view the steamer through a telescope? Yes.

THE PRESIDENT.—(Extract of a letter.)—The following is what I consider the most favorable in the new hopes opened to us by the steamer seen on the 22d, in lat. 29, lon. 40. The Times of this morning contains all that is known on the subject, except the certainty that the steamer then and there seen could not have been the Dee. On the same day the Dee spoke the Thompson from Palermo to N. Y., (New York, I presume,) in lat. 41, lon. 42, (compare this with the other, and there is no possibility of their identity.) This intelligence has been received from the agent of the Navigation Company at Liverpool, and will, I have not the least doubt, be confirmed by the log of the Dee, for which an application has been made to the Admiralty, as yet unanswered.

AFFAIRS OF THE EAST.—The Times of May 25th says: "We are informed, upon what we consider to be of the best authority, that the London Conference has proceeded to the formal signature of the protocols respecting the East, which had received only the initials of the five plenipotentiaries. This is consummated, in an official form, the return of France into the European Alliance and the end of the embarrassment which the treaty of the 15th of July had created. Although long foreseen, this step has not been considered without importance in the political circles."

INSURRECTION IN THE TURKISH EMPIRE.

From the German Papers.

The Augsburg Gazette publishes a letter dated from the frontiers of Turkey, the 10th instant, which states that the mail from Constantinople of the 26th ult. had been overdue several days, which was considered the more extraordinary, the Pasha of Nissa having so positively asserted that the roads should be kept free for couriers. One report stated that the Turks who were escorting the mail had surrendered to the insurgents, or that he had taken the road through Widdin.

In general the intelligence from Bulgaria is confined to details of the atrocities committed by the Turks on the Christians. The fugitives had related the particulars of the cruelties of which they had been the victims so circumstantially, that there could be no doubt of the truth of their statements. This conduct may therefore be assumed as the cause of the late insurrection in Bulgaria and the other Turkish provinces. The report that the revolt had extended to Macedonia is not confirmed. The latest letters from Blotliu and Solonica (to the 21st ult.) make no mention of such an occurrence. The number of fugitives taking refuge in the Servian territory continued to increase, but the armed men occupy the mountains. They have much want, however, of arms; scarcely one man in ten possesses a gun, the others having only hooks, sithes, and hayforks for their weapons. It is now evident that the population of Servia were concerned in the revolt, although the Government wishes to keep it secret. In Belgrade itself considerable excitement prevails, which has been increased by a remarkable appearance of the holy cross, said to have been observed by several of the inhabitants on one of the towers of the fortress.

The same journal publishes a letter, dated Vienna, 15th inst., which alludes also to the non-arrival of the Constantinople mail of the 28th ult., and states that the insurrection in Rumania had extended to the country between Adrianople and Nasseau. This letter adds that "the last accounts from Servia throw no light upon the state of the upper provinces of Turkey since the victory obtained by the Turks at Alexinissa, which the Pasha of Nissa appears to have made the centre of his operations, in order to prevent communication with the insurgents of the other provinces. It was expected at Vienna that the next Turkish mail, which it was supposed had taken the road through Bucharest, would put an end to the state of uncertainty with respect to recent events in the Turkish provinces, and which was becoming every day more alarming."

PASSENGERS

In the steamship Great Western, from Liverpool.—Miss Ann Ross, Miss Milligan, Mr. and Mrs. Tiffany and servants, Miss Tiffany, Mr. Geo. Tiffany, Miss Pickerville, Mr. and Mrs. Dixon, Miss E. ## Latest Intelligence.

Extra Session—XXXVth Congress.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 9.

REPEAL OF THE SUB-TREASURY.—The bill introduced to the Senate by Mr. Clay of Ky. providing for the repeal of the Sub-Treasury act of 1840, and for the more effectual punishment of Defaulters, passed its third reading in the Senate on Wednesday, by a strict party vote: Yeas 29; Nays 19: absent Messrs. Buchanan, Cuthbert, of Geo. Mounten of La. and Linn of Mo.—all opposition.

In the House, Rev. John W. French was elected Chaplain, M. McCormick Postmaster, J. Follansbee Doorkeeper, and John W. Hunter Assistant Doorkeeper—all but the first reappointments.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll moved to reconsider the vote by which the 21st Rule of the House (rejecting all petitions on the subject of Slavery) had been rescinded. On this motion, a violent and tumultuous debate arose, which had not concluded when the House adjourned.

NEW-YORK CANALS.—The tolls collected on our State Canals during the last week in May amounted to $97,556 55; do. last year, $81,280. The whole amount collected this year up to June 1st is $444,893 78; do. last year, (when the navigation opened six weeks earlier) $349,093 96, showing an increase thus far upon last year of $95,899 86.

FROM FLORIDA.—By date of the 15th inst., we learn that one half of the 1st regiment of U. S. infantry are sick of congestive fever, and that it frequently proves fatal in thirty-six hours after the attack.

A few nights previous, one of the Indians who had come in for emigration had attempted to escape, and was fired upon by the sentinel, wounding him in the arm. The wound was dressed, and the fellow still holding to his purpose, effectually made good his retreat before morning.

The General is still sanguine of his closing the war; and recommends to Mr. Secretary Bell that the 1st and 6th infantry, with the 3d artillery be ordered on other duty.

IMPORTANT.—Aleck Tustenuggee, it is said has gone in to one of the military posts of the West, and several of his warriors have accompanied him.

A Mr. Livingston was killed near the Ocilla, on the 21st inst., by the Indians.—[St. Augustine News, May 28.]

NEW-HAMPSHIRE.—The Legislature of this State assembled at Concord on Wednesday of last week, and the Senate was organized by the choice of Josiah Quincy, Esq. President; Isaac L. Folsom, Esq. Clerk, and B. Wiggin, Esq. Assistant Clerk.

In the House, John S. Wells, Esq. was chosen Speaker; Henry Hibbard, Esq. Clerk, and Albert G. Austin, Esq. Assistant Clerk.

Jeremiah D. Nettleton was elected a Senator to fill the vacancy in District No. 10.

MISSION TO ENGLAND.—We learn, says the National Gazette, that the mission to England has been tendered to the Hon. John Sergeant, in a manner warmly expressive of the sense entertained by the Administration of his eminent qualifications for the trust. Whether he will accept the appointment has not transpired.

UNIVERSAL EDUCATION.—The population of Connecticut is about 300,000, and of this population it was ascertained by the late census that there was but one man who could not read and write.

MURDER.—We learn from the Fort Wayne Sentinel, that there are three men in jail at Peru, Miami County (Ind.) waiting their trial for murder. The prisoners consist of a father and an intended son-in-law. The difficulty which caused the murder is said to have originated from an engagement of marriage between the daughter of the father and the person murdered; which had been broken up by the family. The daughter was subsequently engaged to be married to the person alluded to, which caused the difficulty and cost the original lover his life.

HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—Mr. Jackson Long, from Lewis County, Missouri, recently while on his way to Platte County, about three miles east of Richmond, was attacked by two foot-pads, first by taking his horse by the bridle and demanding his money, and on his refusal to give it up they shot him through the neck with a pistol, which dismounted him. The robbers only succeeded in getting a pocket-book with a small amount of money. Mr. Long escaped to a neighboring house and bids fair to recover. The robbers were pursued, taken, recognized by the wounded man, and sent to prison.

The schooner President arrived at Castine, Me., on the 4th inst. bringing three of the crew of the William Brown, news of whose disastrous wreck was brought by the Acadia. They were saved in the small boat with Captain Harris, the second mate, one lady passenger, and three other seamen. The men were badly frozen, and one of them will lose both his feet. While in the boat, they had but half a biscuit and half a wine glass of water for twenty-four hours. They were picked up by a French fisherman on the sixth day after the ship went down.

DEATH IN THE PULPIT.—Rev. Henry Clarke Hubbard died at South Kingston, R. I., on the 9th inst. in the 73d year of his age. He entered the pulpit as usual, and had just delivered his text, when he was seized with a fit, and fell on the pulpit floor, and soon after was a corpse!

The New York and Erie Railroad will be open for travel from Piermont Ramapo in about 12 days.

Orders have been received at Pottsville for cannon balls for the General Government, to be cast from anthracite manufactured iron.

U. S. MILITARY ACADEMY.—The annual examination of this highly important and valuable Institution, is now in progress. The Board of Visitors commenced at West Point on Monday, and organized by the election of Commodore Charles Stewart, President, and C. B. Haddock, Esq. of New-Hampshire, Secretary. The Board, as usual, is composed of distinguished citizens from every part of the United States.

Gideon Lee has subscribed $1000 and Hon. John Greig $500 for the endowment of the Hobart Professorship in Geneva College. It is said too, that the Protestant Episcopal Society, of this city, has offered the Institution $1500 if it will raise as much more, for the endowment of the Professorship. The State has given $15,000 to the Medical Department.

MAIL ROBBER DETECTED.—Owing to the activity of our Postmaster, W. H. H. Taylor, and his deputy E. P. Langdon, John Powers, a mail robber, has been caught. The proof against him was clear. The river-mail was robbed on the 24th inst. below Louisville, and on the 29th, Powers sold a half bill in this city which was taken from that mail. He said he had purchased it, at Memphis, but this was impossible, as it was lost on the 24th and sold here on the 29th. He has been committed, since which further proof has been discovered, that leaves no doubt as to his guilt.—[Cincinnati Republican.]

THE INDIANS.—We learn by the Indian Queen, which arrived in this place on Friday last, (says the Burlington (Iowa) Hawk-Eye,) that a party of Chippewas, who were hostile towards the Sioux, recently came near an encampment of the Sioux, not far from Fort Snelling, and fired into one of their lodges, killing a chief and his son. The Chippewas retreated, and had, by our last accounts, evaded the pursuit of the Sioux. The Chippewas made another attempt by firing into a Sioux encampment below, without doing any damage. There will probably be warm work between these two warlike tribes before the summer is out.—[Paris (Missouri) Sentinel.]

The Catholic Church in Monroe, Perry Co. Ohio, was recently set on fire by incendiaries and burned to the ground.

The U. S. Mail was robbed on the 24th ult. near Louisville, Ky. A man named Powers has been arrested and committed on charge of being the robber.

Four men were recently drowned in the St. Lawrence near Quebec, by the upsetting of a boat, loaded with grain.

The next session of the Legislature of Iowa, will be held at Iowa City, the new seat of Government.

NEW GRENADA.—A letter from Bogota, dated in March, states that Gen. Semple, U. S. Charge, has not been able to effect any thing in the way of a treaty or of settlement of claims against that government.

The trial of Madison for the murder of Baker at St. Louis, resulted, on the 24th ult. in a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree. The jury were absent but about five minutes.

Dr. Bradec, the great mail robber, who has been on trial at Pittsburg, has been convicted.

NAVAL.—The Navy Department officially states that intelligence has been received of the arrival of the U. S. sloop of war Yorktown, Commander Aulick, at Valparaiso, on the 20th March, in 43 days from Rio de Janeiro, all well. The Dale was expected to arrive at Valparaiso in a day or two, having parted company with the Yorktown on the 26th Feb. off Staten Island.

TO SUBSCRIBERS AND THE PUBLIC.

The First Volume of CHARLES O'MALLEY is now in rapid progress, two numbers, or 32 quarto pages, being reprinted. It will make four quarto numbers in all, and be furnished to subscribers and others as follows:

The first volume will be sent free to all present subscribers, who will remit to us THREE DOLLARS, (current money,) either in renewal of their subscription for one year, or so that their accounts may stand credited for a year after the expiration of their present term of subscription.

To all new subscribers who shall remit in current money $3 for one year, or $5 for two years, the first volume and the Extras of the second will be sent gratuitously.

The price of the first volume will be 50 cents per copy, or five copies for two dollars, to all who do not comply with the above propositions. To agents, $30 per hundred. The volume will be out of press and for sale or delivery on Saturday next, June 19th. As only a limited edition of this volume will be printed, the expense being one thousand dollars, those intending to subscribe, as well as others, are requested to forward their orders without delay.

Postmasters and agents throughout the country are solicited to send in lists of subscribers and renewals, and to make particular exertion to increase the number. The first volume of Charles O'Malley, in book form, contains 400 large octavo pages, and cannot be purchased at the book stores for less than THREE DOLLARS. We give it to all new subscribers who remit us that amount in current money, free of postage, for a year's subscription.

THE BOSTON NOTION AND THE NEW WORLD.—$5 sent in advance to George Roberts, Boston, or to J. Winchester, New-York, will procure a copy of each of these journals sent to any part of the country.

CHARLES O'MALLEY.

An EXTRA containing the previous parts of the second volume of this story, is for sale at the office and by all the agents of the NEW WORLD.

OUR NEW VOLUME.—The third volume of the Quarto edition of the New World will commence the first week in July. It is now the time for new subscribers to send in their names. Let it be remembered that $5 a year in advance will procure two copies for a year or one copy for two years; and that six dollars sent in advance will procure the same number of copies together with a beautiful copy of SEARS'S PICTORIAL BIBLE.

I WANDER THROUGH THE BOWERS.

A BALLAD: AS SUNG BY MRS. EDWARD J. LODER.

THE POETRY BY MRS. CORNWALL BARON WILSON—THE MUSIC BY EDWARD J. LODER.

ANDANTINO con ESPRESS.

I wander through the bow-ers, Where our steps so oft have trod, And cull the brok-en flow-ers, That are scatter'd in my road. I sit be-side the stream, And I rest beneath the tree, But Joy is now a dream, For thou art far from me: But Joy is now a dream, For thou art far from me, But Joy is now a dream, But Joy is now a dream, For thou art far from me, For thou art far from me.

SECOND VERSE.

A magic breathes around
Each spot where thou hast been,
A charm not elsewhere found
Still lingers on the scene,
As I wander by the stream,
Or rest beneath the tree;

But Joy is now a dream,
For thou art far from me,
But Joy is now a dream,
For thou art far from me,
But Joy is now a dream,
For thou art far from me.

THIRD VERSE.

I would not give the past,
With all its sighs and tears,
Nor the present from me cast
For future smiling years,
To lose the bliss I feel
By the stream and by the tree,

When the tears of mem'ry steal,
As my thoughts flow back to thee!
And Joy is now a dream,
For thou art far from me,
But Joy is now a dream,
For thou art far from me.

NEVER LOOK SAD.

Never look sad, nothing so bad,
As getting familiar with sorrow;
Treat him to day in a cavalier way,
And he'll seek other quarters to-morrow.
Long you'd not weep, could you but keep
At the bright side of every trial;
Fortune you'd find, is often most kind,
When chilling your hopes with denial.
Let the sad day carry away
Its own little burden of sorrow,
Or you may miss half of the bliss
That comes in the lap of to-morrow.

MUTILATION OF SHRUBBERY.—You might with as much propriety, enter the library of your neighbor, and tear the leaves from a favorite author, or pocket a curiosity from his cabinet as to strip his plants and shrubbery of their foliage and flowers.

Besides it is in principle as much an act of dishonesty, as it would be to steal his coat.

Many are deterred from ornamenting their grounds about their houses near the streets, lest they should be mutilated, and others who have planted shrubbery, are annoyed by having it stripped of its leaves when most beautiful. He who plants a tree or flower although it be enclosed within a fence, plants a production of nature, to be admired as such by all who pass it; as well as to gratify his own taste.

When you pass a shrub or flower in full leaf or blossom, admire its beauty, and if your companion offers to mutilate it, resent it as an insult to nature, and an outrage committed against justice and good taste. You have received enjoyment from it. Let others do the same, and if it delights you go back at another time and admire it again. This encourages its cultivation and promotes good taste. Surely no envious feeling can prompt to the destruction of a flower. To mutilate shrubbery indicates either great heedlessness, a want of good breeding, or a coarse and vulgar mind. A lady possessed of proper sensibilities would be incapable of such an act. Boys who spurn the idea of being governed by these motives should bear in mind that the penalties of the law are severe on those who destroy and injure such property.—[Cabotville Chronicle.]

Boston.—Great improvements are being made, says the Boston Traveller, in all parts of Boston. New houses are going up in all directions; and if Boston continues to grow in population, wealth and business, as it has for some time past, it will soon outstrip in greatness the anticipations of all its inhabitants and friends.

THE TRIUMPH OF LUCCA.
A TRAGEDY.

BY LETITIA ELIZABETH LONDON.

INTRODUCTION.

The scene is laid in Lucca, during the contests between the Guelphs and the Ghibellines; but my object has not been to bring forward old party distinctions, in which no one now takes any interest, but to represent the first rising against the feudal system, which has succeeded to such important results. Castruccio is the (attempted) ideal of the hero and the patriot. He has himself been exiled and oppressed; out of this early experience grows his sympathy with the wrongs of the city to whose cause he devotes himself, while the glory of Lucca is the poetry and passion of his life. Count Leoni is merely one of a faction, referring all things to small and individual interests. He is the representative of the few, while Castruccio is that of the many.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

MEN.

CASTRUCCIO CASTRUCANI—Leader of the popular party in Lucca.
COUNT GONSALVI—Envoy from Florence.
COUNT ARREZI—one of the secretly opposed Nobles.
COUNT LEONI—his Nephew, just returned from travel.
CESARIO—Secretary to Castruccio.
Nobles, Citizens, Soldiers, &c.

WOMEN.

BIANCA—Daughter of Count Arrezi, betrothed to Castruccio.
CLARICHA—an orphan dependant in the house of Arrezi.
Ladies, Attendants, &c.
SCENE LIES IN LUCCA.

ACT I.

SCENE I. . . . A Market-place. Citizens grouped together talking earnestly.

1ST CITIZEN. How was he taken? for he would have fought
A dozen single handed.
2D CIT. Last night, returning from Count the Arrezi,
To whose fair daughter he has been betrothed,
He was surrounded by those foreign bandits
That wear Count Ludolph's colors.
1ST CIT. Work fitting to their mercenary hands.
2D CIT. I saw the whole, for I was late at work.
Castruccio passed me as I hurried home;
Dark as it was, I knew his stately form!
He crossed the street, and out of ambush sprung
The secret enemy. I saw him fling
His cloak upon the ground—out flashed his blade—
But the dark night was lit with glittering steel,
And twenty swords were drawn to meet but one.
I heard the clash, then a fierce struggle—oaths—
And he was hurried past: the moon shone out,
And there lay on the ground a broken sword,
But red with blood.

Enter CESARIO.

1ST CIT. Here comes his young and trusted officer,
The Count Cesario; he will tell us more.
2D CIT. What of Castruccio's fate—what of our chief?
CESARIO. The treachery of the nobles has prevailed.
Castruccio lies within the city prison,
Thither conveyed by Ludolph's foreign band;
A thousand dangers circle him around,
The secret dagger, and the open scaffold.
2D CIT. Well, now we have no friend!
CES. He was your friend; the meanest citizen
Found in the shadow of Castruccio's name,
His best security.
2D CIT. He never wrung from us our hard-earned gains.
1ST CIT. Our lives were precious to him; must he die?
2D CIT. The nobles are too strong.
CES. 'Tis for your sake they are his enemies.
He might have shared their power, and kept ye slaves.
2D CIT. We have been much oppressed; until he came,
No one could sit in quiet at his door.
Money and blood were the perpetual cry
Of our small tyrants.

CES. So will it be again,
If your protector perish.

ALL. He shall not die!

CES. The nobles will not listen to your prayers.

1ST CIT. We will try threats.

CES. Threats are as vain as prayers: ye must try deeds.

2D CIT. What can we do? We are unarmed and weak.

CES. But strong in your good cause. Oh, ye are strong,
If ye would know your strength!

2D CIT. When he was free, we could defy the world.

CES. Then give him what ye owe him—liberty.

2D CIT. All Lucca will rise up!

1ST CIT. Before this, I have fought upon his side;

Up! let our watch-word be Castruccio's name.

CES. Let the high Heaven hear it! will ye stand

Meek, pitiful spectators of his death?

2D CIT. The nobles will not shed Castruccio's blood.

1ST CIT. When have they been so merciful to spare?

2D CIT. They will not spare from mercy, but from fear.

CES. Who should they fear?

2D CIT. The oppressed and desperate.

CES. Not if oppression find relief in words.

1ST CIT. There's not a street in Lucca but should run

Red with our blood before Castruccio die!

CES. 'Tis well, if ye dare act upon these words.

ALL. We dare.

CES. Let each one to his neighbors instantly;

Gather what force ye can; by two and threes

Return, and then we'll try the prison's strength.

2D CIT. Three of the nobles come this way.

CES. We must disperse until the hour arrive,

What time the nobles seek the Senate-house.

2D CIT. Where they will meet to doom Castruccio's death.

CES. Short space is ours; be silent, and away.

In one half hour seek ye the market-place;

Castruccio Castrucani is the word. [Exeunt.]

Enter NOBLES.

1ST NOBLE, [putting two of the Citizens aside.] Out of the way, ye loiterers.

2D NOB. What do ye here, wasting what ye call time,

And then complain of want?

1ST CIT. [aside.] Our time will come. [Exit.]

1ST NOB. What said the knave?

2D NOB. Good saints, I know as little as I care.

I do not share Castruccio's sympathy

For those who are the dust beneath my feet.

1ST NOB. 'Tis pity of him: for more gallant knight

Ne'er led the foremost, still himself the first.

I grudge the yielding to the Florentines

That now must follow.

2D NOB. Better submission to that distant power

Than that within our gates: the citizens,

Stirred by Castruccio, talk of their rights.

Time was, a creditor, grown troublesome,

Might hang, a useful warning, at our door;

But Castrucani has so changed the state,

That not a knave who walks the market-place

But holds his life as precious as our own.

Why, Lucca is as quiet as a bower.

1ST NOB. We have had stirring times outside our walls—

Victory on victory o'er the Florentines.

2D NOB. And this has dazzled ye: ye have not marked

How stronger, hour by hour, has grown his sway.

Among ourselves, if it were left to him,

We should not have a single privilege

Beyond the meanest citizen.

Enter the COUNT LEONI, as if from a journey, speaking to his Page as he enters.

See all your charges safe; then follow me,

Bringing the casket where my cousin's name

Is worked in pearls.

1ST NOB. Welcome again to Lucca, Count Leoni.

[All gather round him.]

LEONI. Kind greeting to you all: I am right glad

To see my friends and native walls again.

2D NOB. You're come upon us in a stirring time.

1ST NOB. Tell him at once Castruccio is our prisoner.

2D NOB. You're over hasty; for the Count may be

One of Castruccio's partisans.

1ST NOB. Arrezi always liked the strongest side,

And hence betrothed his daughter to Castruccio.

LEO. What, to my cousin—to the fair Bianca?

1ST NOB. You do not look as if you liked the news.

2D NOB. Will you go with us to the Senate-house?

Your uncle will be there.

LEO. As yet I am too new to join your councils.

2D NOB. We may not loiter, even now awaits

The envoy sent from Florence.

LEO. Make ye what terms ye can—secure yourselves:

The Florentines will gladly aid your cause.

They hate Castruccio—hate, because they fear.

2D NOB. We are too late: farewell, we meet anon.

[Exeunt.]

LEO. [Solus.] Well, fortune, thou hast stood my friend at last!

I came to struggle with mine enemy,

And, lo! he is subdued. Castruccio lies

A prisoner at the mercy of his foes.

For him there is only one ransom—death!

Soon will these hasty nobles want a head:

The power and wealth of our most ancient house

Point to Arrezi as the nobles' chief,

And he will be a cypher in my hands.

Now will my secret trafficking with Florence

Stand in good stead: my path is clear before me.

The odium of the Castrucani's death,

And the inglorious peace they now must make,

Rests with the nobles. Fortune, now thy tide

Is on the turn—I dare to ride thy waves.

Strange that Castruccio, who through life has been

My too successful rival, now should make

My first step in the ladder of ambition.

Now must I seek my cousin, fair Bianca,

So nearly lost; how will she greet me now?

Castruccio's sway has been right absolute,

Or never had Arrezi let his child

Link with our house's ancient enemy. [Exit.]

SCENE II.—The Senate-house.

COUNT GONSALVI, COUNT ARREZI, NOBLES, ATTENDANTS,

&c.

GONSALVI [taking a seat.] Henceforward Florence claims your fealty;

She will secure you in all ancient rights,

Immunity, and privilege; her sword

Will stand between ye and your enemies.

For this a yearly tribute must be paid

Of twenty thousand florins.

2D NOBLE. Our treasury's low, my lord.

GONS. And so is ours,

Exhausted by the late vexatious war.

2D NOB. Urged by the Count Castruccio, net ourselves.

GONS. It must be paid.

2D NOB. Well, well,

The goldsmiths round our market-place are rich.

The citizens, too, better being poor,

As more obedient, right that they should pay

The penalty of their rebellious spirit.

GONS. [rising.] I leave you till to-morrow, when I bring

The treaty ready for your signatures,

And will receive your homage and your oaths.—[Exit.]

1ST NOB. Homage and tribute—these are bitter words!

2D NOB. Less bitter than the Castrucani's sway.

1ST NOB. To-day must fix his fate. What is his doom?

SEVERAL NOBLES. Death!

ARR. Rather say exile.

2D NOB. Yes, and one week sees him again our chief!

ARR. He may be kept strict prisoner.

2D NOB. And keep perpetual terror o'er our heads.

SEVERAL NOBLES. A scaffold is our safety.

ARR. We dare not raise that scaffold.

SEVERAL NOBLES. Dare not!

ARR. The citizens would rise in his defence.

1ST NOB. Not with our swords to teach them what they are.

2D NOB. Why risk a tumult that we well may spare,

While Lucca has a dagger?

1ST NOB. He shall not perish by the assassin's hand.

2D NOB. So that he perish, little matters how.

ARR. The tumult would be fearful.

1ST NOB. Even now

The people gather fiercely in the streets.

2D NOB. Let them not see him, they will soon forget.

ARR. Hark to the shouts!

1ST NOB. I have a useful knave, who, give him gold,

Stabs and forgets; I'll send him to the prison.

2D NOB. The noise approaches, look ye to your swords.

1ST NOB. Delay is fatal—let Castruccio die!

[While he is speaking the doors are burst open, and CASTRUCIO enters, armed and attended.]

CAST. Not yet, nor by your hand! Thanks, gentlemen,

For an indifferent lodging. I have learnt

That prisons, tenanted with thoughts of death,

Is not a punishment to order lightly;

Therefore, ye shall not fill my vacant place.

2D NOB. The game is yours—I, for one, ask not mercy!

CAST. And, therefore, worthier to have unasked.

Ye do mistake me, signors: all my thoughts

To ye are grateful ones. But for your rash

And ill-advised attempt, I had not known

How true the love on which my power is built—

How strong the cause the people trust with me!

Re-enter COUNT GONSALVI.

GONS. I must demand some escort: for the streets

Are filled with people, and unwillingly

Would I shed blood. What! Castrucani here?

CAST. Ready to give the Count Gonsalvi audience,

And ask, what are the terms he brings from Florence?

GONS. With these, the representatives of Lucca,

I have arranged our treaty.

CAST. On what terms?

GONS. That ye submit yourselves, and pledge your faith

True vassals unto Florence: and each year

Remit your tribute—twenty thousand florins!

CAST. Tribute and homage! can they sink so low,

Men who have met ye bravely in the field?

Now hear me, Count Gonsalvi: Lucca rather

Would see her walls dismantled, than consent

To yield such base submission!

GONS. These are her chiefs—in their consent she yields.

CAST. You see that they are silent. By my voice

Does Lucca speak: she would be glad of peace,

An equal, sure, an honorable peace—

To terms like these she has but one reply—defiance.

GONS. Florence will teach you better in the field!

CAST. This to your conqueror: not three weeks have pass'd

Since, in the field, we met. I think you found

More service from your spurs than from your swords.

GONS. 'Twas an unlucky chance of war.

CAST. Not so, my lord; there was a higher cause—

The right against the wrong. Your army came,

A mercenary and a selfish band,

Some urged by false ambition, some for spoil.

No noble motive noble impulse gave:

Ye were aggressors, and ye fought like such.

I tell you, count, with not a third your numbers

I chased your flying hosts within your gates.

GONS. I came not for a boast but for an answer—

War or submission.

CAST. War or submission! sad such choice and stern:

Vast is the suffering—great the wrong of war!

But—and all Lucca speaketh in these words—

Rather we take the suffering; and the wrong
Rests on the oppressor's head, than we submit.
Not while one hand can strike on Lucca's side,
Not while one stone is left of Lucca's walls,
Not while one heart beats in our country's cause,
Will Lucca stoop beneath a foreign yoke.
Ye only fight for conquest or for spoil:
We for our homes, our rights, our ancient walls!
The sword is drawn—God be the judge between us!

GONS. Have ye no other answer?

CAST. None. Cesario is your escort to the gates.

GONS. I take your answer—war, then, to the death.—[Exit.]

2D NOS. Are ye not rash in this? how weak our state Compared with Florence.

CAST. Twice have we met them in the open field,
Each time they fled before us. Oh! my friends,
If I may call ye such, we are not weak
Who have our own good swords, and urge a war
Just in the sight of heaven. Our weakness lies
In our dissensions, in the small base aims
That disunite us from the common cause.
Lucca were strong, had Lucca but one heart!
Why should ye be mine enemies? I seek Yours in the general good. I stand between Ye and a people whom ye would oppress.
Know ye not, love has stronger rule than fear?
A country, fill'd with tyrants and with slaves,
What waits upon her history?—crime and shame!
But the free state, where every rank is knit
By general blessings, freedom shared by all,
There is prosperity—there those great names
Whose glory lingers though themselves be gone.
It is not ye I serve, it is your country!—[Applause.]

2D NOS. [Aside.] I see that we must yield, or seem to yield;
He's master now.

CAST. And for this base submission
To your hereditary enemies,
There is no yoke so galling as the yoke
Foreign invaders place upon your neck!
The heavy and the arbitrary sway
That ye would fix upon your countrymen,
Would soon be on yourselves. Lucca is free;
To keep her so is trusted to your swords!
I march to meet the Florentines to-morrow;
Will ye not follow me for Lucca's sake?

NOBLES. We will.

CAST. Now must I forth to thank the citizens.
[Sees ARREZI.] The Count Arrezi here!

ARR. I came here as your friend.

CAST. Then bear but hence my greeting to your daughter.

ARR. My lord, she is much honor'd! [Shouts without.]

CAST. The people are impatient, let us forth:
I am impatient, too, to thank their love.
We will go forth together, and with them
Make common cause. [Exeunt.]

END OF FIRST ACT.

ACT II.

SCENE I.... Apartment in the Arrezi Palace.

CLARICHA. [Seated at an embroidering-frame.]
The past it is my world: ah! but for that,
How could I bear the present? In the past
Is garnered all most precious to my soul.
It is not true that love decays or dies
With time or absence: years have passed away,
Yet still my dreams are faithful to one thought,
One voice makes secret music in my ear,
Distinct as when it breathed its earliest vow.
Long since hath hope grown faint, but weary never!
Fate may have said that we shall meet no more!
But rather would I live upon the love
Whose only food is memory, than forget,
And ask oblivion for its cold content.

Enter LEONI.

LEO. Nay, I must not disturb you: pray resume
Your graceful task.

CLAR. Pardon me, sir. [Going—he detains her.]

LEO. 'Tis long since I have seen so fair a face,
And cannot part with it so readily.

CLAR. I will announce your coming to my lady.

LEO. She knows it, sweet, and will be here anon.
The time will not seem long with those dark eyes
To count the minutes by.

CLAR. You must excuse my stay.
[Snatches her hand from him—exit.]

LEO. [Solus.] Women exaggerate all things—most of all
Our flatteries and their power. Foolish girl!
She might have passed my waiting pleasantly.
But soft! here comes my uncle.

Enter ARREZI.

ARR. Welcome, fair nephew, once again to Lucca.

LEO. Thanks, my kind kinsman; but, before I say
A word of greeting, tell me of your news.

ARR. This 'twixt ourselves—I bring the very worst.
Castruccio is again the lord of Lucca.

LEO. It cannot be.

ARR. The people rose and freed him from his prison,
Bore him in triumph to the senate-house,
And, once among us, all gave way before him.

LEO. What! did ye yield, so many as ye were?

ARR. What could we do? strong as the angry sea,
The people gathered fiercely at the gates,
And many of the younger nobles leaned
Toward his side, chafed at the thoughts of peace
Bought by submission to the Florentines.

LEO. [Aside.] Cowards and traitors to themselves. [Aloud.]
And now
What is the course ye mean to follow?

ARR. Our power is broken, and we must submit.

LEO. Is it the head of our most noble house
Who names submission to the Castrucani?

ARR. What can we do? he's brave and eloquent.
His sword subdues the Florentines, his tongue
Enchants the people!

LEO. What can ye do?—resist.

ARR. What has resulted from our late resistance
But a more firm assurance to his sway?

LEO. Fools, that could let a prison stand between Their enemy and death!

ARR. We must conciliate now.

LEO. He is to wed

The fair Bianca.

ARR. We shall share his power.

LEO. I like no sharing but the lion's share.
This was not once the temper of our house:
The Castrucani owed their banishment
To us and ours.

ARR. Ah! those were glorious days.
None questioned, then, our rightful sovereignty.

LEO. Which half the citizens now laugh to scorn.
As yet I have not been an hour in Lucca,
Yet I can see all things are changed.

ARR. Too true!

LEO. Your servants are your masters; where are gone
Your old respect and high authority?

ARR. I do not know the times in which I live,
So much of change lies heavy on each hour!
Castruccio comes to-night—now greet him fair.

LEO. What! when he comes a suitor to my cousin?

ARR. Such an alliance will secure us all.

LEO. I tell you, count, that it shall never be;
Think upon what you owe your ancient line:
Its feuds are bonds its honor must hold dear.
We hate the Castrucani!

ARR. I have small cause, if you knew all, to love them.

LEO. And yet you yield and tamper with Castruccio.

ARR. And once again, I say, what can we do?

LEO. [Aside.] He wavers—ancient hatred is too strong
For the new bond of interest and of fear,
But yet I dare not trust him with the scheme
That rises dark and vague upon my mind.
I must think more. [Aloud.]—Again, I say, resist!
But wisely, calmly; never should the sword
Flash till it strikes.

ARR. I'll tell you truly, kinsman,
I like not this alliance: it is forced
On us by evil days and evil fortunes.
Now, more than ever, do we need such aid,
For I misdoubt but that Castruccio knows
'T was not to serve him that I sought the council
When he was prisoner.

LEO. Bid him, as you said,
To a gay banquet here, and bid with him
All his chief followers; let us seem friends:
And, if we watch our hour, that hour will come.

ARR. I'll to the Castrucani palace straight,
And urge our welcome. [Exit.]

LEO. [Solus.] And he will come; danger escaped but makes
The brave more daring; and Castruccio's brave.
It is a desperate game that I must try,
And yet our only chance. There's little time,
But haste is the friend of enterprise:
I will not snatch a moment with Bianca,
Then to my task. [Exit.]

SCENE II.... Interior of a Church.

CLARICHA enters, and makes an Offering of Flowers at the Shrine of the Madonna.

CLAR. [Solus.] Lady divine, who yet art bound to earth
By the strong tie of sorrows shared, look down
And smile upon the offering which each day
I offer for his sake; if yet on earth,
Weary he wander, strengthen and support;
If thought of me add to his happiness
Keep it alive, and if it be regret,
Let me fade gently, like a pleasant dream—
Sweet, but too faint to rest on memory!
If—but, oh, no, not even in my prayers
Can I name death. [Sound of approaching steps.]
Some one approaches, and I cannot bear
My quiet moment broken. [She retires up the stage.]
Enter CASTRUCCIO muffled, and a FLORENTINE SPY.

CAST. I understand their plan;
Florence will aid the strongest.

FLOR. Such is her policy; her wishes take her
Upon the noble's side.

CAST. It matters not—
One victory more, and I can name my terms;
It is the secret statagem I seek;
For that I look to thee—henceforth we meet
Within this church; few ever come this way.

FLOR. To-morrow look for tidings from the camp.

CAST. I or Cesario will meet you here
At this same hour. Here is your promised gold.

FLOR. Thanks: I will be secret as the grave. [Exit.]

CAST. I loathe the tools that I perforce must use;
For sooner would I hang yon knave than pay him.
Crime takes no shape so base as treachery,
And yon slave betrays his city's council
For a few ducats; but the time will come,
When, strong in Lucca's cause, I shall not need
Such an unworthy means; the slave and spy Belong to tyranny, and freedom works
With nobler instruments.

Going out, CLARICHA returns, they meet face to face, and recognise each other.

CAST. My loved, my lost, my beautiful Claricha!
CLAR. Oh! wake me not Amio, if I dream.

CAST. Amio! how that name recalls my youth!
But whence art thou? when last I sought our home,
There was no vestige of the humble roof
That was the shelter of our early years.
I only found a heap of blackened ashes
O'er which the green weeds had begun to trail.

CLAR. You had not left us but a few sad months,
When, burnt and plunder'd by the Florentines,
Our village 'mid its vineyards lay in ruins;
The aid from Lucca sent, arrived too late
To save our homes; but to the chief Arrezi
I owe my life, and, placed by him, I dwelt
Long with a noble lady of his house,
Who loved me like the children she had lost.

CAST. The Count Arrezi! strange we never met.

CLAR. I have not been three days in Lucca—death
Left me once more alone in this cold world.
Again the Count Arrezi was my friend,
And placed me with his daughter, who is soon
To wed the Count Castruccio.

CAST. I am he.

CLAR. Amio!

CAST. Oh, breathe that name again—let it recall
All that my youth once dreamed of hope and love!

Or rather let me hear that name no more,
It is the death-knell of all happiness.

CLAR. Alas, I dare not question; yet, one word—
Have you forgotten me?

CAST. Forgotten what was dearest to my soul!

CLAR. Alas, how may that be, if Count Castruccio
And my Amio be the same?

CAST. Evil and bitter were my early years:
Exiled in childhood, sought for but to slay,
I only re-assumed our ancient name,
When, gathering all the remnants of our cause,
I raised the banner of our line, and came
A conqueror—who but only came to spare.

CLAR. I would that I had earlier known your name.

CAST. How bitterly I mock the pride that kept
My birth a secret; yet 'twas not all pride,
I planned a glad surprise for her I loved;
In the first dawn of my success, I sought
The well-remembered vineyards.

CLAR. Farewell, Count Castruccio! had I known
The name whose triumphs fill our Italy,
I had not hoped as I have done for years;
But I should still have loved: it does not need
That words should say, the nameless, friendless girl
Is nothing to the Lord of Lucca.

CAST. Weary and hard has been my path through life;
Its brief success by danger has been bought,
Yet knew I not its bitterness till now.

CLAR. Farewell, my lord.

CAST. Hear me, Claricha—be yourself my judge—
What Lucca was, let our first years recall:
Years past in war and exile—when the land
Had not one vineyard safe—one hearth secure—
How stands my country now?—at peace within,
The peasant, undisturbed beneath his vine,
The citizen in safety, high or low,
While our fair banners flout the gates of Florence.
Not for the palace only have I ruled,
But for the green fields and the market place:
Peace dwells beneath the shadow of my power.

CLAR. Ah, me! I know too well how much Castruccio
Has done for Lucca.

CAST. I have given youth,
And love, and hope, to be her sacrifice.
From the first hour that Lucca owned my sway,
I only look'd to her prosperity:
The heart went with her that now turns aside;
On one side dost thou stand and happiness,
But on the other, danger, toil, and care.

CLAR. And duty!

CAST. A heavy duty girdles me around;
Arrezi's daughter has my plighted honor:
For Lucca's sake was the alliance sought,
To bind her father's party to my side.
A darker power than mine impels me on—
For the first time I hesitate, and fain
I would recall my purpose.

CLAR. Not for me;
Look on yon heaven, Castruccio, and think
Of thine own glorious future.

CAST. Has life no service I could render thee?

CLAR. What is there I could ask of thee but love?

CAST. I cannot part with thee: I had forgotten
That there were sweet and gentle thoughts in life;
Let me do something for thy sake, my loved one.

CLAR. Oh, death, this is thy agony!

CAST. The council will have met—I must away;
Who could restrain my followers in their fear
If I were missing? but not yet farewell,
I have so much to say, so much to ask.
We meet again, Claricha; I must seek
At least to be thy friend; we meet again.

CLAR. Alas! why should we meet? it is in vain.

CAST. I cannot choose, my heart beats quick with joy:
Youth, hope, and tenderness return with thee.

CLAR. For thine own sake, Castruccio, fare-thee-well.

CAST. Stay yet one moment; if thou didst but know
How faithfully this heart has kept thy name,
Its sad and secret music; years have past
Since the green vineyards heard our youthful vow;
Hurried our parting word, and parting kiss,
But not less sacred. In my first career
Thou wert my hope, my star of enterprise—
When I looked forward, 'twas to look to thee.

CLAR. And now we meet, and know that we must part,
Unpitied fate! why met we not before?

CAST. My exile was repealed, but ere I sought
My native city, I did seek for thee;
Instead of sunny welcome in thine eyes,
I found but desolation and despair:
Dark night, and its eternal echoes, gave
The only answer when I called thy name.

CLAR. Oh! if we had but met.

CAST. Fate mocks at us; a few brief hours suffice
To stand between us and our happiness,
Thenceforth I had those gentle hopes no more,
That make the spirit gentle where they dwell.
Lucca was then my all—I had no hopes
But for the glory of my native city;
To see her free and prosperous, became
Life's sole great object.

CLAR. Not for my sake shall Lucca's hero pause
Upon his glorious path; not for my sake
Forget life's noblest duties.

CAST. Thou art more strong than I am—yet not so,
I see thy cheek is pale, thine eye is wet,
I cannot leave thee.

Enter CESARIO hastily.

CES. I pray your pardon, but the need is great;
The late attempt fills all your friends with fear,
Not mine to check their angry eagerness,
Which now is fain to seek thee, sword in hand.

CAST. To stay is madness now; my brief delay
May be atoned in blood. Love, now farewell.

CES. I pray you, lady, urge his speed.

CLAR. Farewell! farewell!

CAST. Meet me again, Claricha, meet me here;
Here, with high Heaven, and the dead around,
Fit for farewell like ours. Sternly I feel
The pressure of my duty to the land,
Whose people are entrusted to my keeping;

But I cannot part with thee, and know so little
Of thy uncalled-for future.

Good, my lord.

CLAR. Claricha, most beloved, I dare not stay,
With life on every moment, bid me go.

CLAR. Farewell.

We meet to-morrow; every gentle saint
Watch over thee. Farewell. [Exeunt.]

CLAR. [Stands looking after him, and then turns suddenly and kneels before the Madonna.]

At least I still may pray for him. [Scene closes.]
END OF THE SECOND ACT.

ACT III.

SCENE I.... A Banqueting Hall opening into a garden, and hung with pictures. Servants. COUNT ARREZI.

ARR. [Solus.] I have but little heart for this gay banquet:
Dangers and fears encompass me around;
I know the Castrucani doubt my faith,
I know Leoni loathes the coming marriage,
Which never will his fiery spirit see
Without a struggle; and with that must come
All that I thought to shun of strife and blood.
Ah! there are moments, when my thoughts have asked
The heart that beats with them—can this be life?
This gulf of troubled waters, where the soul,
Like a vexed bark, is tossed upon the waves
Of pain and pleasure, by the warring breath
Of passions, like the winds that drive it on,
And only to distraction.

[Sees CLARICHA coming from the garden.]

Ah! she comes;

The gentle orphan, whose sweet sight more soothes
My troubled soul, than aught in this wide world.
I love her, for I know she needs my love,
And something in her sadness suits with mine.

[Enter CLARICHA.]

Welcome, my child! but how is this—the tears
Are in thine eyes. Sweet one, why hast thou wept?

CLAR. My spirits are not good, my lord.

ARR. Thou art full young for sadness.

CLAR. Ah, my lord,
'T is not the old alone who know that life
Has but a weary way.

ARR. My gentle child—

For even as a child thou art to me—
Our life has many sorrows; and I think
Most bitterly is sorrow felt in youth.
Age comes and brings indifference: I grieve
Not as I used to grieve—I know the worst
Is but a painful dream that soon must pass.

CLAR. Would I could think so!

ARR. Believe me, maiden, could we read the past
In every heart, we should recoil to find
What weight of misery has been endured.

CLAR. Ah me! unequal are the lots in life.

ARR. More nearly are they balanced than we deem;
The outward life shows not the life within.
I am about to welcome in these walls
The Count Castruccio, and he is received
As the affianced lover of my daughter;
The crowd will only see the pomp and power,
And know not how the irrevocable past
Rises in all its darkness on my soul.
I hate the Castrucani's iron house.

CLAR. Hate them, my lord?

ARR. Is it the sadness in those gentle eyes
That suits my mood? but in thee, my fair child,
Is that which, winning on my confidence,
Soothes the old sorrow which it seems to share.
Since that first hour, when but a trembling girl
I met thee flying from the Florentines,
My heart warmed to thee as thou wert my own.
Perhaps it is that in thy face and voice
There is a touch that brings again the face,
The voice, that once made heaven on earth to me.
'T was but a dream of youth!

CLAR. Can such dreams pass?

ARR. Oh, never wholly can they be forgotten:
Good cause have I to hate the Castrucani!
I loved the loveliest lady of their line,
And wedded her in secret. Brief the space
That fate allow'd our moonlit happiness—
We were surprised together. From that hour
A settled darkness hangs upon her fate.
The drug or dagger did their fatal work
So secretly, that not a trace was left.
A dungeon was my share—for three long years
They held me captive, I escaped the third,
But never could I learn my lady's doom!

CLAR. Ah! such a parting well might break the heart.

ARR. Time brings strange chances, when a child of mine
Weds with the Castrucani—but in vain
Age seeks to struggle with its destiny;
I'm worn and weary—all I seem to wish
Is but a little rest before I die.

CLAR. Speak not so mournfully, my own kind friend,
Think how affection girdles you around,
How gratitude puts up its prayer to heaven,
When e'er the orphan names Arrezi's name.

ARR. My own sweet child, would thou wert truly mine!
I've sadden'd where at first we meant to cheer.
We'll talk of grief no more; I pray you cast
Your eye around, and see that all be set
In fair array. I must now seek Leoni—[going.]
I had forgotten what I meant to say—
You and Bianca must be brave to-night.
I bade my pages carry to your chamber
Some toys and gauds I trust will please your fancy.

CLAR. You are too kind.

ARR. Nay, I am only glad
To give so slight a pleasure. [Exit.]

CLAR. It is in vain—I cannot fix my thoughts
On aught but him. Alas, no, Castruccio!
How have I pray'd for years that we might meet—
We meet, and only meet to part for ever.
I know not what I look upon—all things
Repeat his likeness—I can hear his voice,
Or is it but the beating of my heart?
The Count Leoni here? Let me escape,
I could not bear his idle gallantry. [Looks round.]

This column will conceal me.

Enter the COUNT LEONI, followed by ARREZI.

ARR. It is too desperate!

LEO. So are our fortunes!

We are the ladders of Castruccio's greatness,
Used, then flung down.

ARR. Nay, we must rise with him.

LEO. One of our noble house should scorn such rise;
Ancestral is our hatred, dark with time!

And seal'd on either side with blood. To-day

Cannot undo the work of many years.

ARR. Where are the well-laid schemes of yesterday?

LEO. Lost by your own weak fears; he should have died.

Castruccio's only prison is the grave!

ARR. But still to slay him—coming as my guest
In my own halls—

LEO. The strong may choose their time,

The weak take opportunity to strike.

ARR. I cannot—dare not.

LEO. Dare not, is the word;

I'll dare for both. Now listen, uncle mine:

Bianca is my own betrothed bride!

Castruccio shall not wed her; that alone

Were cause enough to float these halls with blood:

He is our house's ancient enemy,

And, but for him, no citizen would dare

Raise hand against the nobles; he must die!

ARR. But yet some fitter time.

LEO. The hour for action is the present hour!

Defeat and danger wait upon delay.

Castruccio will be here to-night, unarmed 'd,

His surest friends beside him; they will fall,

None to avenge. Our friends are prepared;

A secret band of Florentines now lie

In ambush by the city's western gate,

Whose keeper I have gain'd. I haste to seek them

Bearing the orders of the Count Gonsalvi,

Who'll meet them at the gate and lead them on.

Castruccio slain—the people overawed,

Henceforth our triumph is secure.

ARR. It will be bought too dearly.

LEO. Danger will heighten our success.

ARR. 'T is not the danger, 't is the treachery.

LEO. I've heard the treachery of the Castrucani

Gave you three years of prison in your youth.

ARR. Do not recall that bitter time again.

LEO. I must recall its memory—let it cry

For vengeance at our hands. I will away:

Short time is mine to reach the Florentines,

And yet return to grace the festival:

My entrance at the banquet is the signal!

ARR. Castruccio may miss you from the halls

Whose heir should be the first to bid him welcome!

LEO. A little coloring gives truth to falsehood,

Tell him I'm jealous of Bianca's smile.

ARR. But—

LEO. Buts are the stumbling-blocks of enterprise,

We will not have them.

ARR. The risk is fearful—do not think Castruccio

Will yield without a struggle. How can I

Stand by and see him murder'd?

LEO. Out on such scruples! Hear me, Count Arrezi!

Go to Castruccio's feet, and tell him all;

Give up your kinsmen and your ancient friends,

And henceforth be his vassal. For ourselves,

We are prepared to die, though not prepared

To perish by your act.

ARR. You know no death could tempt me to betray you.

LEO. You have your choice—his life or ours!

ARR. Leoni, I am now a man in years,

Broken and wayworn, and I lack the force

To lead or stem the tide of your fierce spirits;

On either hand is death!

LEO. That of your friends and foes is at your choice.

ARR. I have no choice.

LEO. Then, neither can you be responsible.

But now I must away—time hurries on,

One parting word—be resolute. [Exit.]

CLARICHA [Coming forward.]

ARR. Hear me one moment more! [Follows him.]

Thank God, I have heard all! oh, give me strength

To fly and save him! [Exit.]

SCENE II.—A small chamber looking to the Street.

Enter CLARICHA, hastily.

CLAR. All egress is forbidden from the palace,
They will not let me forth, and he must die!

I must behold him murder'd in my sight!

Can I not watch, when first he comes, and speak

At once my words of warning in his ear?

Too late, the armed traitors will be nigh:

Can I not save him? I, who would lay down

My life to save him? Pitying heaven, look down

And aid me in this hopeless misery. [After a pause.]

These windows look upon the street—a scroll

Might save him yet—it is a desperate chance!

Still, if it reach his hand, he were in safety.

[She approaches the table, and writes.]

Be still, thou coward hand! thou shalt not tremble.

[She writes.]

'T is done—these few brief words suffice

To warn Castruccio of the coming danger.

[She folds the letter.]

Holy Madonna, have it in thy care!

[She attempts to throw it out, the wind blows it back again.]

'T is too light—'t will never reach the street;

[She looks anxiously round.]

It should be heavy—heavy as my heart!

Oh, nothing!—nothing, if I had but here

One of those daggers soon to drink his blood!

[Suddenly recollecting, she puts her hand to her throat.]

'T is here, the chain I have from childhood worn!

My only relic of the unknown past.

But let it go—it will weigh down the scroll—

[She makes up the packet.]

Now heaven speed it that it reach Castruccio!

[She flings it from the window.]

It falls—I see it lying in the street.

Now all depends on who may find it first.

Star of his glorious hour, send thou some friend!

Let but a noble pass, and he is lost!

A common citizen draws near the spot;

He sees the packet—takes it—reads the name,
And hurries to the Castrucani palace.

I know your street leads straight unto its gates;

Oh God, I thank thee!

[Sinks exhausted by the window; the scene closes.]

SCENE III.... A Hall in one of the Palaces.

LEONI, and several NOBLES.

1st NOB. I would you had been with us yesterday.

LEO. To-day will serve us better; for to-day

Has yesterday's experience.

1st NOB.

We were wrong

To trust the people and the light of day;

Now secret night is round our enterprise,

And we will be as secret.

LEO.

All now rests

Upon your own good swords and with yourselves.

2d NOB.

If that the matter rested with my sword

I were content—that were a soldier's part.

Midnight assassins are we now!

LEO.

Actions are ever judged by their success;

To-morrow sees us paramount in Lucca;

The doom to-night dealt on the Castrucani

Will then be rightful justice.

1st NOB.

We have no choice: it is his fall or ours,

And I, for one, care little if by sword

Or if my dagger end an enemy.

LEO.

We are degraded by the Castrucani;

Our order has not left one privilege

Beyond the meanest citizen.

2d NOB.

He talks, too, of dismissing our retainers.

LEO.

'T is the old fable of the lion's claws,

But we must re-assert our ancient rule;

Assert it now or never, for I know

The emperor's envoys are upon their way

To own the Castrucani Lord of Lucca,

But they must find us masters!

1st NOB.

Your entrance at the banquet is our signal!

LEO.

Yes, and I ask one favor; let my dagger

Be that which strikes Castruccio!

ALL.

Agreed!

LEO.

Our time is precious; to your care, Count Ludolph,

I will commend my uncle: he is old,

And weak, and fearful—see he falter not

You, Count Rinaldo, have our followers armed,

And meet me secret in the cypress-grove;

I'll wait there, coming from the Florentines.

Our forces and their band must join at once;

This fixed, we'll seek the banquet-room together.

My welcome to Castruccio is my dagger!

1st NOB.

One cup of wine, Leoni, ere you go.

LEO.

I have not time—yet stay—we'll drink one pledge.

[They pour out wine; each takes a goblet.]

Death to the Castrucani!

ALL.

Death to the Castrucani!

LEO.

And now away—away—for life and death

Is on the hour! [Exeunt.]

END OF THE THIRD ACT.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.... The same Hall as before, but now illuminated, hung with Pictures, &c.

COUNT ARREZI, BIANCA, CLARICHA, GUESTS, &c.

CLARICHA anxiously watching the groups as they enter.

ARR. Welcome, my friends!

[After two or three greetings.]

[Aside.] We cannot now recede, they come prepared.

CLAR. [Aside.] He comes not! [banquet.]

1st NOB. You've spared, good count, no cost upon your [Aside.] Wear not that moody brow, to-night is ours.

ARR. [Aside.] Alas! that this must be.—[Aloud.]—The count is late. [sure.]

1st NOB. We're used to wait the Count Castruccio's plea.

CLAR. [Aside.] Perhaps he may not come!

ARR. Fair ladies, will you dance? [A dance.] [come.]

CLAR. [Aside.] Each moment gives me hope he may not

ARR. You stand apart; will you not dance my child?

CLAR. I am not

"Tis now some fifty years—I know the face.
The public monument the public raised
In gratitude for a long life of service.
His statue looks upon the town he ruled,
An honor unto both. It is the past
Redeems the present, and that bids us look
To the dim future with a lofty hope.
Cold and unworthy were the actual hours,
If they looked only to themselves; but life
Is conscious of its immortality,
Urged by high duty—animate by power;
The present, in the shadow of the past,
Learns what it owes the future.
The sage, the hero, leave their great example
Heroic guides upon a glorious path;
They are the lights by which we shape our course,
Only by looking up can we see Heaven.

1st NOBLE. You're eloquent, my lord!

ARR. [Aside]. I'll try to save him, and must see Leoni.

[Aloud.] Our guests await your pleasure.

CAST. I pray their pardon: but who is yon knight
Clad in white armour?

ARR. Our house's chiefest honor; when the Moors
Made him a prisoner, on his plighted word,
So high they held the Count Vitelli's name,
They let him seek his native land to raise
The ransom which they set. He found his lands
Impoverish'd like the state, and could not raise
The heavy sum required. In vain 'twas urged
Small faith was needed with the infidel;
But he return'd, taking his chains again,
And died a captive.

CAST. And, in the presence of this noble knight,
Who looks in visible scorn upon ye now,
Your ancestor, Arrezi, have you plann'd
To violate all hospitable rites!

ARR. Count Castruccio!

CAST. A cowardly assassin; but in vain.

[He stamps; his Guard comes in.]

1st NOBLE. We sell our lives full dearly!
[Springs at CASTRUCIO, who strikes his sword from his hand.]

CAST. Take them to prison; ladies, by your leave,
This is no place for you. [Addressing one of them.
Madam, I give the Count Arrezi's daughter
To your kind charge and honorable keeping;
We never meet again!]

CLARICHA comes forward.

CAST. [Not knowing her.] Lady, I crave your absence.

CLAR. I only stay to ask my chain again.

CAST. [Recognising her.] Your chain! My own Claricha, have you been

Lucca's good angel—sweet preserver, mine!
Take back your chain, and, with it, take my heart
And its entire allegiance. Oh! sweet love,
This is no time to pour my heart in words,
Yet happiness must ask a moment's space.
Saved, and by thee!

CLAR. Ah! would I not lay down my life for thine!

CAST. Like a good angel's gift I hold the life
Which thou hast rescued; it must be for good:
Life's sweetest hopes return again with thee.
Mine once again—my own, long lost Claricha!
This very evening I reproached my fate;
To meet thee still the beautiful, the true,
And yet resign thee, was too hard a task!
I questioned with my honor, and I faltered
In the stern path of right: but I am now
So happy, my Claricha!

CLAR. Would I might ever make thy happiness! [Home!]

CAST. One word—where does my sweet one make her

CLAR. With Count Arrezi.

CAST. With mine enemy!

CLAR. No longer such; henceforward bound to thee
By a free pardon.

CAST. I cannot pardon him.

CLAR. Not pardon him, Castruccio, for my sake!

CAST. I cannot pardon him for Lucca's sake!

CLAR. One moment hear me: oh! Castruccio, think
How kind the Count has been; my one true friend!

An orphan—pity was my only claim;
It was enough with him—I owe him all
Of fond affection's care; but for that care
I were not here to kneel and ask for mercy.

CAST. Kneel not to me; ah! listen, dearest mine!

CLAR. Will you not pay my debt of gratitude?

CAST. Ask for my life, Claricha, it is thine!

But ask not for the lives which others trust
Safe to my charge; think not that I refuse
Arrezi's life because he sought for mine;
I have no anger for my private wrong;
But there are those in Lucca who need warning,
And they shall have it. With the traitor's head
A thousand plots fall harmless from the scaffold.

CLAR. Nothing disarms an enemy like pardon.

CAST. Not when they think the pardon wrung from fear.

Ancient oppression—present treachery—
Alike demand example. At our gates
Gather the foreign foe; they must not hope
For aid within our walls: I have long tried
A gentle rule of patience—'t is no more.

Plead not with those sad eyes, the Count must die!

CLAR. I do implore you by our ancient love!

CAST. Oh! do not think that when I take this hand
I link it to a calm and happy lot;
You will share with me sacrifice and pain.
For power, it is an awful thing, and stands
Girt by stern duties. Not to thy sweet tears
May I yield up one staid and solemn purpose;
Once have I pardoned: but, to pardon twice,
Were weakness, and not mercy. He must die!

CLAR. Castruccio!

CAST. Not where my heart has chosen must it find Unrest and womanish complaint; weep, love,
Kindly and natural tears; but still remember
Lucca has my first duty. Cesario, wait.
Farewell, love! within a few short hours
We'll meet again; when I shall ask from thee
More justice to mine act. [Exit.]

CLAR. It is my hand has slain him; he, my friend,
My kind—my only friend. Is there no hope?

I did not urge him earnestly enough—
I did not tell him he would lose my love
Unless he heard my desperate prayers for mercy.
Oh! never shall I know a quiet hour
Again in life, unless Arrezi live;
His memory will haunt me like a ghost,
Pale and perpetual at my side, with eyes
That never turn aside their sad reproach.
I'll after him, and wring a slow consent.

CES. Your pardon, lady; do not seek the Count,
Let his just anger cool; think you how false,
How vile has been Arrezi's part to-night!
With flattering words he prayed Castruccio's presence,
Made his own child the lure, yet, in his heart,
Lurked the assassin, and he planned to make
His home—his sacred home—the place for murder!

CLAR. It is too true—but he was urged by others.

CES. Lady, it does not justify our crime,
Saying that others prompted us to sin.

CLAR. Alas! alas! I cannot think of him
But as he was to me—a kind old man,
The only friend my orphan girlhood knew.
Oh! I must see him; I must kneel and weep
Before his feet—he cannot pardon me—
Yet let me ask forgiveness. Gentle youth,
Conduct me to the prison.

CES. 'T will need an order to allow your entrance.

CLAR. Seek ye Castruccio; he will not refuse,
And I, meanwhile, must weep and pray. Oh! Fate,
How thou dost mock us! I have met Castruccio,
The prayer of many years has been fulfilled;
We love with that true love we vowed at parting,
Yet my full heart sinks down with misery.
My kind—my only friend—oh! gentle youth,
Haste, for sweet pity's sake. [Exit.]

SCENE II.... Part of a Garden. LEONI pacing backward and forward.

LEO. There is no cloud upon the placid sky,
There is no motion in the drooping leaves;
I neither like this waiting nor this stillness.
Too much the rest of this still night contrasts
The unrest that is feverish in my soul!
The midnight, with its pale and mournful moon,
That wanders, like an orphan, through the heavens,
Companionless, with its dark boughs, that seem
Still as the heavy shadows which they fling,
This hour is not for enterprise. The heart
Mocks its own projects and its own designs,
So little, with eternal night around,
So worthless, gazing on those distant worlds.
Why, what vain fantasies are these to cross
My mind at such a time! but we are toys
E'en to ourselves. Where can Rinaldo stay?
The banquet hour is past—Ah! here he comes.

Enter 2d NOBLE hastily.

You come full late, my lord.

2d NOB. I come too soon;

Despair and danger are my comrades here!

LEO. What can you mean?

2d NOB. Mean? that Castruccio's friend
Has stood him in good stead; he came prepared,
Knowing the welcome that he was to meet.
Your uncle and his friends are now in prison,
Gondenn'd to death.

LEO. The Count Arrezi a prisoner!

2d NOB. Ay—and his shadow falls upon his grade,
He stands so near it. Just now I passed
Beside the market place; the midnight rang
With the loud hammer's blow, and with the saw Grating its sullen pathway through the wood
Which is to raise the scaffold for to-morrow.
Arrezi there will be the first to die.

LEO. Not if my life can ransom him. 'T was I
Who urged the old man on—with sneer and threat
I silenced his misgivings.

2d NOB. What can we do?

LEO. Rather than let that old man die, I'd kneel
Before the Castrucani, and give up
My head as fitting ransom.

2d NOB. You would but only add another victim.
We have no choice but flight.

LEO. I will not fly,

Though I but stay'd to share Arrezi's scaffold.

2d NOB. Live for revenge—a better hour may come.

LEO. Revenge is all too distant; I will save

Or perish!

2d NOB. I tell you all is known; what can avail

A single arm?

LEO. 'T is to that single arm that I must trust.

There yet remains one sole—one desperate chance—
The risk is mine. [Drawing his dagger.] This blade has stood, ere now,

My certain friend. [Sheathing it.] I'll trust to it again.

2d NOB. Castruccio's guards are gather'd round his palace;
And, if some cunning tale could win your entrance,
You'd perish, ev'n as you struck the blow.

A hundred swords would straight avenge his death.

LEO. I'd brave them all, Rinaldo, in such cause;

But mine's a far more subtle stratagem.

2d NOB. Your stratagems have not availed us much.

LEO. The chances of the game have turned against us,

And I will pay the forfeit with my head,

Unless I turn them yet again.

2d NOB. There's something in your courage raises mine;
I'll follow you.

LEO. That suits not with my scheme: take you this ring,

And hurry with it to the Florentines,
Who lay in ambush near the ruined tower;
Masten their march; I did not wish their aid
Until our party mustered in its strength:
But now, our life and death hangs on their speed.
Hence, good Rinaldo.

2d NOB. Not till I know your purpose for yourself.

Half of the danger is my proper share.

LEO. On my right hand alone I must rely.
You may remember, in our boyish days
My father held the Castrucani palace—
The Castrucani were themselves in exile;
I know each turn and winding—there was one,
A secret passage leading to the city,
And from the very room which now Castruccio

Makes his own private chamber—leave that way,
And, Fortune, I will worship thee again.
2d NOB. Methinks that Fortune owes us some amends
For past ill favor.
LEO. We must away; each moment that we lose
Brings my old kinsman nearer to the scaffold.
Off to the Florentines! Now life and death
Hang on an hour's chance. [Exit different ways.]
END OF THE FOURTH ACT.

ACT V.

SCENE I.... A Prison. ARREZI and the CONFESSOR.
ARREZI. Thou bring'st my youth again; thou who didst link

Her faith to mine—the lost and the beloved.
Fateful to me has been thy ministering;
It has been thine, oh! ancient priest, to bless
My marriage and my scaffold!

CON. Not on the past, my son, fix thou thy thoughts,
But on the solemn future!

ARR. I cannot choose: I sought thee out for years.
Give me to know her fate—my secret bride—
Soon lost, but long beloved—and I will turn
From thee to thy companion—death!

CON. When the proud Castrucani forced thy bride
To secret banishment, and made thee prisoner,
Chance brought me to the village, and I watched Above her and her child—

ARR. Her child!

CON. It was two years before the mother died;
With her last breath she gave her to my charge.

ARR. What of the orphan?

CON. For years I saw her grow in loveliness,
And deemed her happy in her lowly state;
For Lucca was distracted with the wars
Her nobles kept among themselves.

ARR. I dread—yet still must ask—does my child live?

CON. But that it breaks a link with this sad world
My heart would fail me—no, the girl is dead!
She had just sprung to blooming womanhood,
When heaven claimed its own. The Florentines
Burnt Arloa, the village where she dwelt;
Not one escaped to tell the tale of death!

ARR. Oh, subtle force of nature's secret love!

That child, although I knew her not for mine,
Has been my care; I have reproached myself
That more my heart drew to her than Bianca:
Our house almost enforced my second marriage.
I wedded with a lady cold and proud,
Who left her likeness to her child—Bianca
Ne'er sought, ne'er won affection like Claricha;
Would I might bless her ere I die.

CON. Alas! my son, think not on human ties.

Enter CLARICHA.

ARR. And hast thou sought me out, my own sweet child?
Come to your father's heart! 'T was Heaven and nature
That made me love thee, ere I knew thy right
To claim a parent's love. How hard it is
To only know thee in this last sad hour!
Shrink not away, my child—I am thy father!

CLAR. My father!

CON. She wears the very chain around her neck
Placed by her dying mother. Start not thus,
But kneel and ask a father's latest blessing.

CLAR. Mercy—mercy.

ARR. In evil times we meet; but still my child,

Come to my heart—Claricha, let me bless thee!

CLAR. Curse me—your blessing sinks me to the earth;

Curse me—and in me curse your murderer!

ARR. Cease these wild words, you know not what you say.

CLAR. I know too well; I gave the Count Castruccio
The tidings of his danger.

ARR. You told Castruccio!

CON. Unhappy girl!

CLAR. I told Castruccio—in our early youth
We met and loved; the burning of our village
Lost us each other's trace; again we met—
That very day I overheard your scheme,
And gave him warning.

ARR. I cannot blame thee.

CLAR. He loves me—oh! he cannot let me die—
Die with a parent's blood upon my soul!
He did not know of this—yes, there is hope.

ARR. Hope!

CLAR. My father—let me call thee by that name—

My father, bless me—bless thy wretched child!

Oh, try to say one word of comfort to me!

I come to seek thy pardon. [Kneels.]

ARR. I blame our evil destiny, and feel [reance;
'T is my own crime has brought down Heaven's ven-

I dare not say I pardon thee, Claricha,
But take thy father's blessing; my last prayer
Shall be for thee!

CLAR. Either I bring thy pardon, or I die;

I seek Castruccio: never will I rise

From kneeling at his feet, until I win

Forgiveness for my father. Once, again,

I pray thee bless me.

ARR. Come to my heart! [They embrace.]

CLAR. Now, pitying Heaven assist me. [Exit.]

CON. Let us now seek the inner cell, and pray.

ARR. She must succeed; I feel

My heart beat quick with hope. I follow thee.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.... CASTRUCIO alone in his Chamber, writing.

CAS. There is a heavy weight upon my heart.

That I would fling aside, yet cannot fling;

But that I hold all such presentments vain,
I should think there was evil on this hour.

Yet where should be the evil? yonder star
That brings the golden promise of the day,
Is, as my fortunes, rising to their noon.

Victory bears my crimson banner onward;
Love nestles in its shadow; and, subdued,
Mine enemies are prostrate at my feet.

Bear witness, Lucca! in this silent hour,
That my first thought is thine; I have not asked
A transitory name for thee or me;

My conquests have but sought to keep our gates
Steadfast against a foreign foe; within
Have I kept order and security.

The iron power, made selfish by the few,
Have I subdued, and tempered in its use.
The citizens have learnt to know their strength,
And in that strength lies freedom.

[The panel at the back begins to open, and LEONI appears. He advances toward CASTRUCCIO, who starts, but instantly composes himself, and appears occupied by the papers on the table.]

CAST. [Aside.] I hear the secret lock I thought none knew
Turn in the panel, and I hear a step;
It is too stealthy for a friendly one—
Let me be on my guard—it comes more near.
I see a shadow darken on the ground:
There is a dagger in the hand. I'll seem Busy among these letters while I watch.

[LEON attempts to stab him, but CASTRUCCIO springs up and snatches the dagger.]

CAST. The Count Leoni turned assassin?
[Throws down the dagger.]

LEO. Now curses on the worthless hand that fail'd
With life and honor trusted to its strength!

CAST. Honor! that is no word for lip of thine—
A coward murderer in the silent night.
Does not thy noble name cry shame upon thee?

LEO. It cries for vengeance!

CAST. What cause hast thou to be my enemy?

LEO. An hundred years our houses have been foes;

To that I add my individual hate.

There is no path of fortune where thy step
Has not cross'd mine; in war, ambition, love,
Still hast thou been my rival! call thy guards,
Tyrant! but, ere they come, I'll try my sword.

CAST. I'll call no other guard than my right hand.

[They fight—As he disarms LEONI, CESARIO and the Attendants rush in.]

CAST. Bear hence the traitor! your are just in time.

CES. He bleeds to death.

LEO. But yet with strength enough

For hatred and defiance; 'tis in vain—
Fate is against me—curse the hand and sword
That have betray'd me in my utmost need!

Yet hark, Castruccio! thou hast many foes—
Dagger and cup armed against thy life!

And with my dying breath I bid thee speed.

But I am dizzy—no—I dare not leave

Word for my kind old kinsman or Bianca:

Now can I neither save, nor yet revenge.

CES. Die with more christian words upon thy lips,
For the dear sake of thy immortal soul!

LEONI [springing up for a moment.]

I'll perill it on my last word—I hate him! [Dies.]

CAST. Bear him away, and instantly prepare

Arrezi's scaffold; I will make my power

Show itself fearful: they must learn my strength.

[Exeunt Attendants bearing the body.]

CES. Can you be hurt my lord? you look so pale.

CAST. I am more sad than is my wont, Cesario!

My hand has slain you traitor, but he once

Was my familiar friend—yet scarce my friend,
For friendship asks as much as love—of faith—
Of mingling qualities and confidence;
Friends, then, we were not, but such gay companions
As are remember'd pleasant in our age;
They wear the freshness of our youth about them,
And bring back hours untrammell'd by a care!

Many a midnight have we pass'd together
In glad carousal, when the purple cup
Gave its own gayety; we've fought together,
'Neath the same banner was our earliest field!

We've sat beside the watch-fire half the night,
Talking of friends and of our native city,
Yet yonder doth he lie, slain by my hand!

CES. Better ten thousand perish'd such as he,
Than perill life so dear as your's to Lucca.

CAST. Lucca—that is the watchword of my heart;

My native city! you are young, Cesario,
And do not know with how intense a love
The exile clingeth to his mother earth.

I was an exile once—and Lucca rose
Each night more beautiful among my dreams;
Each day a deeper longing seized my soul
To see her walls once more; at length I came,
And found disorder, tyranny and death!

It matters not to tell you of my youth;
Enough, it left me with no home-affection,
None of those gentler ties that fill the thoughts
Of other men—my country was my all!

My hopes, my fears, my future were for Lucca.

CES. And you have made our Lucca what she is,
Peace in her streets, and victory at her gates.

CAST. I know my power—alas! I also know
Power is a sad and solitary thing;
It cuts you off from old companionship,
It needeth iron heart and iron eye,
For its resolves are terrible, when life
Waits on your word, and when you know one breath—
One little breath—takes what it cannot give!

I yield the Count Arrezi to the axe,
But have no word that could recall the blow!

CES. His doom is just!

CAST. And needful; vain, indeed, my present mood—
Power must submit to its dark comrade—death!

Attendant enters.

A lady craves a moment's speech, my lord.

CAST. Let her approach: leave us, awhile, Cesario.

[Exeunt.]

I know the step.—[Enter CLARICHA]—my sweet lady

here,

What would she ask?

CLAR. What thou hast once denied,
A pardon for Arrezi.

CAST. Let me entreat thy silence—grieve me not
With useless prayers I may not—dare not grant;
Thy hand is cold—your lip is white—sweet love,
For my sake, wear not such wild wretchedness.

CLAR. You cannot dream what misery brings me to you;
Hear me: it is my father's life I seek—
My father's!

CAST. What does this mean?

CLAR. You could not leave a crime upon my soul
So terrible! Arrezi is my parent!

CAST. Your parent! How is this?

CLAR. Secret he wedded one of your proud line
Who parted them, and never till this hour
Knew he his wife's nor yet his orphan's fate.
I am that wretched child!

CAST. Can this be true?

CLAR. Oh! do not cruelly waste time in doubt,
But let my agony attest the truth;
His life—my life—now hang upon a word.
Be merciful, Castruccio! speak that word,
Or see me die before you!

CAST. There is no doubt!

CLAR. None—none! Now, by our love, I do implore you!
He was my benefactor and my friend—
He is my father!

CAST. I cannot let her hand—her innocent hand—
Redden for ever with a parent's blood!

Nature, thy ties are sacred, and I yield.
Haste with my signet; love, your father lives,
And you shall be his hostage.

CLAR. Let my haste thank you. Oh! my noble lord,
Long years of happiness reward this pardon! [Exit.]

Tumult without. CESARIO and others rush in.

CES. My lord, some treachery has been at work.
Through the west gate the Florentines have won
Their secret entrance, and the Count Gonsalvi
Raises his war-cry in our streets.

CAST. 'Tis well;

Long have I sought to meet him face to face,
And now a single blow may end the war.

SCENE III.... The Market-place. Citizens, &c. Sound of tumult, and a bell tolling in the distance.

1ST CIT. They fly before Castruccio; but a band,
With Count Gonsalvi, keep the western gate.

2D CIT. They will not keep it long: the Florentines Know our Castruccio.

1ST CIT. Did the prisoner pass

While I was gone?

2D CIT. The moment that you left;
I wait to see the body brought this way.

1ST CIT. Lo! where they come.

[The crowd press together; and, as the body, covered on a bier, is brought in on one side, CLARICHA enters at the other. The bearers set down the body.]

CLAR. I cannot urge my way—in heaven's name,
I pray you, let me pass.

1ST CIT. Rest you a little while, poor child, beside me:
You cannot pierce the crowd.

CLAR. I must go on; oh, for your parent's sake
Make but a little way!

1ST CIT. The crowd will soon disperse—they pause to gaze
On Count Arrezi.

CLAR. Help me—I am his child—I bring his pardon.
Now, in your children's—in your fathers' name—
Let me pass on.

1ST CIT. It is too late.

[CLARICHA springs forward with a shriek, the crowd give way, and she reaches the bier.]

CLAR. Who lies beneath that mantle?

OFFICER. The traitor, Count Arrezi.

[CLARICHA drops by the bier. Flourish of trumpets; acclamations.]

Enter CASTRUCCIO, GONSALVI, Florentine prisoners, Soldiers, &c.]

GON. [offering his sword to CASTRUCCIO.] Thus I yield up my sword as vanquished twice—
Once by your arm, more by your courtesy.

CAST. Keep it, my lord, and with it take your freedom:
We only ask of victory for peace.

Enter CESARIO.

CES. The envoys of the emperor await
Your leisure, to acknowledge you the lord
Of Lucca.

CAST. Then Lucca's freedom is assured. High Heaven,
I thank thee! [Addressing the crowd:] My friends,
Not on a day of victory and peace,
Shall justice sternly ask its penalty.
Freely ye will forgive your enemies.
Last night's conspirators I pardon here—
Be they set free.

OFF. That has been done by death!

There lies the Count Arrezi.

[The crowd opens, and CLARICHA is seen lying by the bier.]

CAST. Oh, miserable mockery of fate!

Look up, Claricha. [She starts at his voice.]

CLAR. His voice—ah! let it wake me from my dream.
I've had a fearful dream—Castruccio mine—
But I am safe, thus nestled in thine arms!

CAST. [attempting to bear her away.] Come with me, love this is no place for thee.

CLAR. [springing from him.] Why am I here, and wherefore is this crowd?

There's fear in every face—they look on me
With pity or with horror, and your eyes
Are not familiar—ah! you turn aside—
Speak to me—smile as you once did, Castruccio—
Still do you turn away—what have I done?
There are too many here—I cannot ask you—
A strange confusion mixes up my thoughts,
And at my heart there is a faint sick pain.

CAST. Lean on me, love.

CLAR. [looking toward the bier.] Who are those men—those dark and fearful men?

What do the black folds of yon mantle hide?
I seem as I had look'd on them before;
There is a weight upon my struggling soul—
'T is blood—my father's blood—
It is my father murder'd by his child!

[Sinks in CASTRUCCIO's arms.]

GON. Give way, the lady faints!

CAST. I tell you it is death—look up, my love!

Silence those trumpets; ah! she doth not hear.
Claricha—my Claricha—so long lost,
So lately found—youth—joy and hope are gone!
Gone, my pale beauty—we shall love no more!

CES. Oh, come, my lord, all Lucca sees your tears!

CAST. Lucca should be their witness; for her sake—
For my fair country's sake—I have kept down
Natural emotions, young and cheerful thoughts,
Yet were they warm and eager at my heart.
With her they perish! Fate has claimed the last,
Cruel and terrible the sacrifice!

All but my country shares Claricha's grave—

[Raising her in his arms—

This, Lucca, is my last offering!

END OF THE TRAGEDY.

JANE SINCLAIR; OR THE FAWN OF SPRING-VALE.

BY WILLIAM CARLETON,

AUTHOR OF "FARDOROUGH THE MISER," "TRAITS AND STORIES OF THE IRISH PEASANTRY," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

Time passed, and the preparations necessary for Osborne's journey were in fact nearly completed. One day, about a fortnight before his departure, he and Jane were sitting in a little ozier summer-house in Mr. Sinclair's garden, engaged in a conversation more tender than usual, for each felt their love deepen and their hearts sink as the hour of separation approached them. Jane's features exhibited such a singular union of placid confidence and melancholy, as gave something Madonna-like and divine to her beauty. Osborne sat, and for a long time gazed upon her with a silent intensity of rapture for which he could find no words. At length he exclaimed in a reverie—

"I will swear it—I may swear it."

"Swear what, Charles?"

"That the moment I see a girl more beautiful, I will cease to write to you—I will cease to love you."

The blood instantly forsook her cheeks, and she gazed at him with wonder and dismay.

"What, dear Charles, do you mean?"

"Oh, my pride and my treasure!" he exclaimed, wildly clasping her to his bosom, "there is none so fair—on earth so beautiful—that, my own ever dearest, is my meaning."

The confidence of her timid and loving heart was instantly restored—and she said smiling, yet with a tear struggling through her eyelids, "I believe I am—I think I am beautiful. I know they call me the Fawn of Spring-valle, because I am gentle."

"The angels are not so gentle, nor so pure, so innocent as you are, my own unwedded wife."

"I am glad I am," she replied; "and I am glad, too, that I am beautiful—but it is all on your account, and for your sake, dear Charles."

The fascination—the power of such innocence, and purity, and love, utterly overcame him, and he wept in transport upon her bosom.

The approach of her sisters, however, and the liveliness of Agnes, soon changed the character of their dialogue. For an hour they ran and chased each other, and played about, after which Charles took his leave of them for the evening. Jane, as usual, being the last he parted from, whispered to him, as he went—

"Charles, promise me, that in future you won't repeat—the words you used in the summer-house."

"What words, love?"

"You remember—about—about what you said you might swear—and that, in that case, you would cease to love me."

"Why, dearest, should I promise you this?"

"Because," she said, in a low sweet whisper, "they disturb me when I think of them—a slight thing makes my heart sink."

"You are a foolish, sweet girl—but I promise you, I shall never again use them."

She bestowed on him a look a smile that were more than a sufficient compensation for this; and after again bidding him farewell, she tripped lightly into the house.

From this onward, until the day of their separation, the spirits of our young lovers were more and more overcast, and the mirthful intercourse of confident love altogether gone. Their communion was now marked by despondency and by tears, for the most part shed during their confidential interviews with each other. In company they were silent and dejected, and ever as their eyes met in long and loving glances, they could scarcely repress their grief.

Sometimes, indeed, Jane on being spoken to, after a considerable silence would attempt in vain to reply, her quivering voice and tearful eyes affording unequivocal proof of the subject which engaged her heart. Their friends, of course, endeavored to console and sustain them on both sides; and frequently succeeded in soothing them into a childlike resignation to the necessity that occasioned the dreary period of absence that lay before them. These intervals of patience, however, did not last long; the spirits of our young lovers were, indeed, disquieted within them; and the heart of each drooped under the severest of all its calamities—the pain of loss for that object which is dearest to its affections.

It was arranged that, on the day previous to Charles's departure, Osborne's family should dine at Mr. Sinclair's; for they knew that the affliction caused by their separation would render it necessary that Jane, on that occasion, should be under her own roof, and near the attention and aid of her friends. Mr. Osborne almost regretted the resolution to which he had come of sending his son to travel, for he feared that the effect of absence from the fair girl to whom he was so deeply attached, might possibly counter-vail the benefits arising from a more favorable climate; but as he had already engaged the services of an able and experienced tutor, who on two or three previous occasions had been over the Continent, he expected, reasonably enough, that novelty, his tutor's good sense, and the natural elasticity of youth, would soon efface a sorrow in general so transient, and in due time restore him to his usual spirits. He consequently adhered to his resolution—the day of departure was fixed, and arrangements made for the lovers to separate, as we have already intimated.

Jane Sinclair, from the period when Osborne's attachment and her's was known and sanctioned by their friends, never slept a night from her beloved sister Agnes; nor had any other person living, not even Osborne himself, such an opportunity as Agnes had of registering in the records of a sisterly heart so faithful a transcript of her love.

On the night previous to their leave-taking, Agnes was astonished at the coldness of her limbs, and begged her to allow additional covering to be put upon the bed.

"No, dear Agnes, no; only grant me one favor—do not speak to me—leave my heart to its own sorrows—to its own misery—to its despair; for, Agnes, I feel a presentiment that I shall never see him again."

She pressed her lip against Agnes' cheek when she had concluded, and Agnes almost started, for that lip, hitherto so glowing and warm, felt hard and cold as marble.

Osborne, who for some time past had spent almost every day at Mr. Sinclair's, arrived the next morning ere the family had concluded breakfast. Jane immediately left the table, for she had tasted nothing but a cup of tea, and placing herself beside him on the sofa, looked mournfully into his face for more than a minute; she then caught his hand, and placing it between hers, gazed upon him again, and smiled. Osborne saw at once that the smile was a smile of misery, and that the agony of separation was likely to be too much for her to bear. The contrast at that moment between them both was remarkable. She pale, cold, and abstracted from the perception of her immediate grief; he glowing in the deep carmine of youth and apparent health—his eye as well as hers sparkling with a light which the mere beauty of early life never gives. Alas, poor things! little did they, or those to whom they were so very dear, imagine that, as they then gazed upon each other, each bore in the lineaments so beautiful the symptoms of the respective maladies that were to lay them low.

"I wish, Jane, you would try and get up your spirits, love, and see and be entertaining to poor Charles, as this is the last day he is to be with you."

She looked quickly at her mother—"The last, mamma?" "I mean for a while, dear, until his return from the Continent."

She seemed relieved by this. "Oh, no, not the last, Charles," she said—"yet I know not how it is—I know not; but sometimes, indeed I think it is—and if it were, if it were—"

A paleness more deadly spread over her face; and with a gaze of mute and undying devotion she clasped her hands, and repeated—"if it should be the last—the last!"

"I did not think you were so foolish or so weak a girl, Jane," said William, "as to be so cast down merely because Charles is taking a skip to the Continent to get a mouthful of fresh air, and back again. Why, I know them that go to the Continent four times a year to transact business—a young fellow, by the way, that has been paying his addresses to a lady for the last six or seven years. I wish you saw them part, as I did—merely a hearty shake of the hand—'Good by, Molly, take care of yourself till I see you again;' and, 'Farewell, Simon, don't forget the shawl;' and the whole thing's over, and no more about it."

There was evidently something in these words that jarred upon a spirit of such natural tenderness as Jane's. While William was repeating them, her features expressed a feeling as if of inward pain; and when he had concluded, she rose up, and seizing both his hands, said, in tone of meek and earnest supplication,—

"Oh! William dear, do not, do not—it is not consolation—it is distress."

"Dear Jane," said the good-natured brother, at once feeling his error, "pardon me, I was wrong: there is no resemblance in the cases—I only wanted to raise your spirits."

"True, William, true; I ought to thank you, and I do thank you."

Whilst this little incident took place, Mr. Sinclair came over and sat beside Charles.

"You see, my dear Charles," said he, "what a heavy task your separation from that poor girl is likely to prove. Let me beg that you will be as firm as possible, and sustain her by a cheerful play of spirits, if you can command them. Do violence to your own heart for this one day for her sake."

"I will be firm, sir," said Osborne, "if I can: but if I fail—if I—look at her," he proceeded, in a choking voice, "look at her, and then ask yourself why I—should be firm?"

Whilst he spoke, Jane came over, and seating herself between her father and him, said,—

"Papa, you will stay with me and Charles this day and support us. You know, papa, that I am but a weak, weak girl; but when I do a wrong thing, I feel very penitent—I cannot rest."

"You never did wrong, darling," said Osborne, pressing his lips to her cheek, "you never did wrong."

"Papa says I did not do much wrong; yet at one time I did not think so myself; but there is a thing presses upon me still. Papa," she added, turning abruptly to him, "are there not such things in this life as judgments from heaven?"

"Yes, my dear, upon the wicked who by deep crimes provoke the justice of the Almighty; but the ways of God are so mysterious, and the innocent so often suffer whilst the guilty escape, that we never almost hazard an opinion upon individual cases."

"But there are castaways?"

"Yes, darling; but here is Charles anxious to take you out to walk. With such a prospect of happiness and affection before you both, you ought surely to be in the best of spirits."

"Well, I can see why you evade my question," she replied; but she added abruptly, "bless us, papa, bless us." She knelt down, and pulled Charles gently upon his knees also, and joining both hands together, bent her head as if to receive the benediction. Oh, mournful and heart-breaking was her loveliness, as she knelt down before the streaming eyes of her family—a Magdalene in beauty without her guilt.

The old man, deeply moved by the distress of the interesting pair then bent before him, uttered a short prayer suitable to the occasion, after which he blessed them both, and again recommended them to the care of heaven, in terms of touching and beautiful simplicity. His daughter seemed relieved by this, for, after rising, she went to her mother and said,

"We are going to walk, mamma. I must endeavor to keep my spirits up this day, for poor Charles's sake."

"Yes, love, do," said her mother, "that's a good girl. Let me see how cheerful and sprightly you'll be; and think, dear, of the happy days that are before you and Charles yet, when you'll live in love and affection, surrounded and cherished by both your families."

"Yes, yes," said she, "I often think of that—I'll try, mamma—I'll try."

Saying which, she took Charles's arm, and the young persons all went out together.

Jane's place that evening was by Osborne's side, as it had been with something like a faint clinging of terror during the whole day. She spoke little, and might be said rather to respond to all he uttered, than to sustain a part in the dialogue. Her distress was assuredly deep; but they knew not then, nor by any means suspected how fearful was its character in the remote and hidden depths of her soul. She sat with Osborne's right hand between her's, and scarcely for a moment took her sparkling eyes off his countenance. Many times was she observed to mutter to herself, and her lips frequently moved as if she had been speaking, but no words were uttered, nor any sense of her distress expressed. Once only in the course of the evening, were they startled into a hush of terror and dismay, by a single short laugh, uttered so loud and wildly, that a pause followed it, and, as if with one consentaneous movement, they all assembled around her. Their appearance, however, seemed to bring her to herself, for with her left hand she waved them away, saying, "Leave us—leave us—this is a day of sorrow to us—the day will end, but when, when, alas, will the sorrow? Papa, some of us will need your prayers now—the sunshine of Jane's life is over—I am the Fawn of Spring-vale no more—my time with the holy and affectionate flock of whom I was and am an unworthy one, will be short—I may be with you a day, as it were, the next day is come, and Jane is gone for ever."

"Father," said Osborne, "I shall not go;" and as he spoke he pressed her to his bosom—"I will never leave her."

His tears fell rapidly upon her pale cheeks, and on feeling them, she looked up and smiled.

The sobbings of the family were loud, and bitter were the tears which the tender position of the young and beautiful pair wrung from the eyes that looked upon them.

"Your health, my dear son," said his father, "renders it necessary that you should go. It is but for a time, Jane dear, my daughter, my boy's beloved, it is only for a time—let him leave you for a little, and he will return confirmed in health and knowledge, and worthy, my dear girl, to be yours for ever."

"My daughter," said Mr. Sinclair, "was once good and obedient, and she will now do whatever is her own papa's wish."

"Name it, papa, name it," said she, still smiling.

"Suffer Charles to go, my darling—and do not—oh! do not take his departure so much at heart."

"Charles, you must go," said she. "It is the wish of your father and of mine—but above all, it is the wish of your own—you cannot, you must not gainsay him. What love can prosper which is founded on disobedience or deceit? You know the words you once loved so well to repeat—I will repeat them now—you must, you will not surely refuse the request of your own Jane Sinclair."

Osborne seemed for some time irresolute, but at length he clasped her in his arms, and again said in a vehement burst of tenderness,

"No, father, my heart is resolved, I will never leave her. It will kill me, it will lay me in an early grave, and you will have no son to look upon."

"But you will see the heroic example that Jane will set you," said Mr. Sinclair, "she will shame you into firmness, for she will now take leave of you at once; and see, then, if you love her as you say you do, whether you will not respect her so far as to follow her example. Jane, bid Charles farewell."

This was, perhaps, pressing her strength too far; at all events, the injunction came so unexpectedly, that a pause followed it, and they waited with painful expectation to see what she would do. For upward of a minute she sat silent, and her lips moved as if she were communing with herself. At length she rose up, and stooping down kissed her lover's cheek, then taking his hand as before between hers, she said in a voice astonishingly calm,

"Charles, farewell—remember that I am your Jane Sinclair. Alas!" she added, "I am weak and feeble—help me out of the room."

Both her parents assisted her to leave it, but on reaching the door she drew back involuntarily, on hearing Osborne's struggles to detain her.

"Papa," she said, with a look inexpressibly woe-begone and suppliant—"Mamma!"

"Sweet child, what is it?" said both.

"Let me take one last look of him—it will be the last—but not—I trust, the last act of my duty to you both."

She turned round and gazed upon him for some time—her features, as she looked, shaded into an expression of deep despair.

"He is gone!" she exclaimed, "he is gone, and I feel that it is for ever. I feel something whispering here," and she laid her hand on her heart as she spoke, "I feel a voice in my heart that bids a long, a last farewell—a farewell for ever!"

"Do not say so, darling," replied her parents—"he will return with renewed health and increased affection, and you will both lead a life of happiness together."

"No," said she, "we shall never meet again—I feel it."

Such was their leave-taking—thus did they separate.

CHAPTER VIII.

In the history of the affections we know that circumstances sometimes occur, where duty and inclination maintain a conflict so nicely balanced as to render it judicious not to exact a fulfilment of the former, lest by deranging the structure of our moral feelings, we render the mind either insensible to their existence, or incapable of regulating them. This observation applies only to those subordinate positions of life which involve no great principle of conduct, and violate no cardinal point of human duty. We ought neither to do evil nor suffer evil to be done, where our authority can prevent it, in order that good may follow. But in matters where our own will creates the offence, it is in some peculiar cases not only prudent but necessary to avoid straining a mind naturally delicate beyond the powers which we know it to possess. We think, for instance, that it was wrong in Mr. Sinclair, at a moment when the act of separating from Osborne might have touched the feelings of his daughter into that softness which lightens and relieves the heart, abruptly to suppress emotions so natural, by exacting a proof of obedience too severe and oppressive to the heart of one who loved as Jane did. She knew it was her duty to obey him the moment he expressed his wish; but he was bound by no duty to demand such an unnecessary proof of her obedience. The immediate consequences, however, made him sufficiently sensible of his error, and taught him that a knowledge of the human heart is the most difficult task which a parent has to learn.

Jane, conducted by her parents, having reached another apartment, sat down—her father taking a chair on one side, and her mother on the other.

"My darling," said Mr. Sinclair, "I will never forget this proof of your obedience to me, on so trying an occasion. I knew I might rely upon my daughter."

Jane, in the meantime, had undergone a most singular change. The despair and sorrow which had sat upon her countenance suddenly disappeared, and, instead of replying to her father, she sat apparently wrapped up in an ecstasy of calm and unbroken delight. The smile of happiness with which she contemplated them, contrasted so strongly with the agony which they knew she must have felt, that her parents, each from an apprehension of alarming the other, feared openly to allude to it, although they felt their hearts sink in dismay and terror.

"Jane, why do you not speak to your papa and me?" said her mother; "speak to us, love, speak to us—if it was only one word."

She appeared not to hear this, nor to be at all affected by her mother's voice or words. After the latter spoke she smiled again, and immediately putting up her long white fingers through the ringlets that shaded her cheek, she pulled them down as one would do who felt anxious to take out the curls—pressing them with slight convulsive energy as they passed through her fingers.

"Henry dear, what—what is the matter with her?" inquired her mother, whose face became pale with alarm. "Oh! what is wrong with my child!—she does not know us!—Gracious heaven, what is this?"

"Jane, my love, won't you speak to your papa?" said Mr. Sinclair. "Speak to me, my darling—it is I—it is your own papa that asks you."

She looked up, and seemed for a moment struggling to recover a consciousness of her situation; but it passed away, and the scarcely perceptible meaning which began almost to become visible in her eye, was again succeeded by that smile which they now so much dreaded to see.

The old man shook his head, and looked with a brow darkened by sorrow, first upon his daughter, and afterward upon his wife.

"My heart's delight," he exclaimed, addressing the former, "I fear I have demanded more from your obedience than you could perform without danger to yourself. I wish I had allowed her grief to flow, and not required such an abrupt and unseasonable proof of her duty. It was too severe an injunction to a creature so mild and affectionate—and would to God that I had not sought it!"

"Would to heaven that you had not, my dear Henry. Let us try, however, and move her heart—if tears could come she would be relieved."

"Bring Agnes in," said her father, "bring in Agnes—she may succeed better with her than we can—and if Charles be not already gone, there is no use in distressing him by all alluding to her situation. She is only overpowered, I trust, and will soon recover."

The mother, on her way to bring Agnes to her sister, met the rest of the family returning to the house after having taken leave of Osborne. The two girls weeping, for they looked upon him as already a brother; while William, in a good-humored tone, bantered them for their want of firmness.

"I think, mother," said he, "they are all in love with him, if they would admit it. Why, here's Maria and Agnes, and I dare say they're making as great a rout about him as Jane herself!—But, bless me! what's the matter, mother, that you look so pale and full of alarm?"

"It's Jane—it's Jane," said Agnes. "Mother, there's something wrong!" and as she spoke she stopped, with uplifted hands, apparently fastened to the earth.

"My poor child!" exclaimed her mother—"for heaven's sake come in, Agnes. Oh heaven grant that it may soon pass away. Agnes, dear girl, you know her best—come in quick; her papa wants you to try what you can do with her."

In a moment this loving family, with pale faces and beating hearts, stood in a circle about their affectionate and beautiful sister. Jane sat with her passive hand tenderly pressed between her father's—smiling; but whether in unconscious happiness or unconscious misery, who, alas! can say?

"You see she knows none of us," said her mother. "Neither her papa nor me. Speak to her each of you, in turn. Perhaps you may be more successful. Agnes!"

"She will know me," replied Agnes; "I am certain she will know me;" and the delightful girl spoke with an energy that was based upon the confidence of that love which subsisted between them. Maria and her brother both burst into tears; but Agnes's affection rose above the mood of ordinary grief. The confidence that her beloved sister's tenderness for her would enable her to touch a chord in a heart so utterly her own as Jane's was, assumed upon this occasion the character of a wild but mournful enthusiasm, that was much more expressive of her attachment than could the loudest and most vehement sorrow.

"If she could but shed tears," said her mother, wringing her hands.

"She will," returned Agnes, "she will. Jane," she exclaimed, "Jane, do n't you know your own Agnes? your own Agnes, Jane?"

The family waited in silence for half a minute, but their beloved one smiled on, and gave not the slightest token of recognizing either Agnes's person or her voice. Sometimes her lips moved, and she appeared to be repeating certain words to herself, but in a voice so low and indistinct that no one could catch them.

Agnes's enthusiasm abandoned her on seeing that that voice to which her own dearest sister ever sweetly and lovingly responded, fell upon her ear as an idle and unmeaning sound. Her face became deadly pale, and her lip quivered as she addressed the unconscious girl. Once more she took her hand in her's, and placing herself before her, put her fingers to her cheek in order to arrest her attention. "Jane, look upon me: look upon me; that's a sweet child—look upon me. Sure I am Agnes—your own Agnes" who will break her heart if my sweet sister does n't speak to her."

The stricken one raised her head, and looked into her face; but it was, alas! too apparent that she saw her not; for the eye, though smiling, was still vacant. Again her lips moved, and she spoke so as to be understood; turning her eyes at the same time toward the door through which she had entered.

"Yes," she exclaimed, in the same low, placid voice, "yes, he is gone for ever—gone for ever."

"Jane," said Maria, taking her hand from Agnes's, "Jane, speak to Maria, dear. Am not I, too, your own Maria? that loves you not less than—my darling, darling child—who do not live that love you better than your Maria; in pity, darling, in pity speak to me!"

The only reply was a smile, that rose into the murmuring music of a low laugh; but this soon ceased, her countenance became troubled, and her finely pencilled brows knit, as if with an inward sense of physical pain. William, her father, her mother, each successively addressed her, but to no purpose. Though a slight change had taken place, they could not succeed in awakening her reason to a perception of the circumstances in which she was placed. They only saw that the unity of her thought, or of the image whose beauty veiled the faculties of her mind, was broken, and that some other memory, painful in its nature, had come in to disturb the serenity of her unreal happiness; but this, which ought to have given them hope, only alarmed them the more. The father, while these tender and affecting experiments were tried, sat beside her, his eyes laboring under a weight of deep and indescribable calamity, and turning from her face to the faces of those who attempted to recall her reason, with a mute expression of sorrow which called up from the depths of their sister's misery a feeling of compassion for the old man whom she had so devotedly loved.

"My father's heart is breaking," said William, in a voice of deep distress. "Father, your face frightens me more than Jane's; do n't father, do n't. She is young—it will pass away—and, father dear, where is your reliance upon higher—upon higher aid!"

"Dear Henry," said his wife, "you should be our support. It is the business of your life to comfort and sustain the afflicted."

"Papa," said Agnes, "come with me for a few minutes, until you recover the shock which—which—"

She stopped, and dropping her head upon the knees of her smiling and apparently happy sister, and wept aloud.

"Agnes—Agnes," said William, (they were all tears except her father and himself.) "Agnes, I am ashamed of you—ashamed of you"—yet his own voice faltered. "Father, come with me for a little. You will, when alone for a few minutes, bethink you of your duty—for it is your duty to bear this not only as becomes a Christian man but a Christian minister, who is bound to give us example as well as precept."

"I know it, William, I know it; and you shall witness my fortitude, my patience, my resignation under this—I will retire. But is she not—alas! I should say, was she not my youngest and my dearest? You admit yourselves she was the best."

"Father, come," said William.

"Dear father—dear papa, go with him," said Agnes.

"My father," said Maria, "as he said to her, will be himself."

"I will go," said the old man; "I know how to be firm; I will reflect; I will pray; I will—weep. I must, I must—"

He pressed the beautiful creature to his bosom, kissed her lips, and as he hung over her, his tears fell in torrents upon her cheeks.

Oh! what a charm must be in sympathy, and in the tears which it sheds over the afflicted, when those of the gray-haired father could soothe his daughter's soul into that sorrow which is so often a relief to the miserable and disconsolate! When Jane first felt his tears upon her cheeks, she started slightly, and the smile departed from her countenance. As he pressed her to his heart, she struggled a little, and putting her arms out, she turned up her eyes upon his face, and after a long struggle between memory and insanity, at length whispered out "papa!"

"You are with me, darling," he exclaimed; "and I am with you, too; and here we are all about you—your mother, and Agnes, and all."

"Yes, yes," she replied; "but, papa—and where is my mamma?"

"I am here, my own love; here I am, Jane; collect yourself, my treasure. You are overcome with sorrow. The parting with Charles Osborne has been too much for you."

"Perhaps it was wrong to mention his name," whispered William. "May it not occasion a relapse, mother?"

"No," she replied. "I want to touch her heart, and get her to weep, if possible."

Her daughter's fingers were again involved in the tangles of her beautiful ringlets, and once more was the sweet but vacant smile returning to her lips.

"May God relieve her and us," said Maria; "the darling child is relapsing!"

Agnes felt so utterly overcome, that she stooped, and throwing her arms around her neck wept aloud, with her cheek laid to Jane's.

Again the warmth of her tears upon the afflicted one's face seemed to soothe or awaken her. She looked up, and with a troubled face exclaimed,

"I hope I am not! Agnes, you are good, and never practised deceit—am I? am I?"

"Are you what, love? are you what, Jane, darling?"

"Am I a castaway? I thought I was; I believe I am. Agnes?"

"Well, dear girl!"

"I am afraid of my papa."

"Why, Jane, should you be afraid of papa? Sure you know how he loves you—doats upon you!"

"Because I practised deceit upon him. I dissembled to him. I sinned, sinned deeply—blackly, blackly. I shudder to think of it"—and she shuddered while speaking.

"Well, but, Jane dear," said her mother, soothingly, "can you not weep for your fault? Tears of repentance can wipe out any crime. Weep, my child, weep, and it will relieve your heart."

"I would like to see my papa," she replied. "I should be glad to hear that he forgives me. How glad! how glad! That's all that troubles your poor Jane—all in the world that troubles her poor heart—I think."

These words were uttered in a tone of such deep and inexpressible misery, and with such an innocent and child-like unconsciousness of the calamity which weighed her down, that no heart possessing common humanity could avoid being overcome.

"Look on me, love," exclaimed her father. "Your papa is here, ready to pity and forgive you."

"William," said Agnes, "a thought strikes me: the air that Charles played when they first met has been her favorite ever since—you know it; go get your flute and play it with as much feeling as you can."

Jane made no reply to her father's words. She sat musing, and once or twice put up her hand to her side-locks, but immediately withdrew it, and again fell into a reverie. Sometimes her face brightened into the fatal smile, and again became overshadowed with a gloom that seemed to proceed from a feeling of natural grief. Indeed the play of meaning and insanity, as they chased each other over a countenance so beautiful, was an awful sight, even to an indifferent beholder, much less to those who then stood about her.

William in about a minute returned with his flute, and placing himself behind her, commenced the air in a spirit more mournful, probably, than any in which it had ever before been played. For a long time she noticed it not—that is to say, she betrayed no external marks of attention to it. They could perceive, however, that although she neither moved nor looked around her, yet the awful play of her features ceased, and their expression became more intelligent and natural. At length she sighed deeply several times, though without appearing to hear the music; and at length, without uttering a word to any one of them, she laid her head upon her father's bosom, and the tears fell in placid torrents down her cheeks. By a signal from his hand Mr. Sinclair intimated, that for the present they should be silent; and by another addressed to William, that he should play on. He did so, and she wept copiously under the influence of that charmed melody for more than twenty minutes.

"It would be well for me," she at length said, "that I had never heard that air, or seen him who first sent its melancholy music to my heart. He is gone; but when—when will he return? Oh! never—never!"

"Do not take his departure so heavily, dear child," said her father. "If you were acquainted with life and the world, you would know that a journey to the Continent is nothing. Two years to one so young as you will soon pass."

"It would, papa, if I loved him less. But my love for him—my love for him—that now is my misery. I must, however, rely upon other strength than my own. Papa, kneel down and pray for me—and you, mamma, and all of you; for I fear I am myself incapable of praying as I used to do, with an undivided heart."

Her father knelt down, but knowing her weak state of mind, he made his supplication as short and simple as might be consistent with the discharge of a duty so solemn.

"Now," said she, when it was concluded, "will you, mamma, and Agnes, help me to bed? I am very much exhausted, and my heart is sunk, as if it were never to beat lightly again. It may yet: I would hope it—hope it if I could."

They allowed her her own way, and without any allusion whatsoever to Charles, or his departure, more than she had made herself, they embraced her; and in a few minutes she was in bed, and as was soon evident to Agnes, who watched her, in a sound sleep.

When the family understood from Agnes that Jane had fallen into a slumber, they stole up quietly, and standing about her, each looked upon her with a long gaze of satisfaction; for they knew that sleep would repair the injury which the trial of that day had wrought upon a mind so delicately framed as hers. We question not but where there is beauty it is still more beautiful in sleep. The passions are then at rest, and the still harmony of the countenance unbroken by the jarring discords and vexations of waking life; every feature then falls into its natural place, and renders the symmetry of the face chaster, while its general expression breathes more of that tender and pensive character which constitutes the highest order of beauty.

Jane's countenance, in itself so exquisitely lovely, was now an object of deep and melancholy interest. Upon it might be observed those faint traces of contending emotions whose struggle had been on that day so nearly fatal to her mind for ever. The smile left behind it a faint and dying light, like the dim radiance of a spring evening when melting into dusk; while the secret dread of becoming a castaway, and the still abiding consciousness of having deceived her father, blended into the languid serenity of her face a slight expression of the pain they had occasioned her while awake.

The next morning all arose earlier than usual, in order to watch the mood in which she might awake; and when Agnes, who had been her bed-fellow, came down stairs, every eye was turned upon her with an anxiety proportioned to the disastrous consequences that might result from any unfavorable turn in her state of feeling.

"Agnes," said her father, "how is she?—in what state? in what frame of mind?"

"She appears much distressed, papa—feels conscious that Charles is gone—but as yet made no allusion to their parting yesterday. Indeed I do not think she remembers it. She is already up, and begged this moment of me to leave her to herself a little."

"I want strength, Agnes," said she, "and I know there is but one source from which I can obtain it. Advice, consolation, sympathy, I may and will receive here; but strength—strength is what I most stand in need of, and that only can proceed from Him who gives rest to the weary heart."

"You feel too deeply, Jane," I replied; "you should try to be firm."

"I do try, Agnes; but tell me, have I not been unwell, very unwell?"

"Your feelings, dear Jane, overcame you yesterday, as it was natural they should; but now that you are calm, of course you will not yield to despondency or melancholy. Your dejection, though at present deep, will soon pass away, and ere many days you will be as cheerful as ever."

"I hope so; but Charles is gone, is he not?"

"But you know it was necessary that he should travel for his health; besides, have you not formed a plan of correspondence with each other?"

"Then," proceeded Agnes, "she pulled out the locket which contained his hair, and after looking on it for about a minute, she kissed it, pressed it to her heart, and while in the act of doing so, a few tears ran down her cheeks."

"I am glad of that," observed her mother; "it is a sign that this heavy grief will not long abide upon her."

"She then desired me," continued Agnes, "to leave her, and expressed a sense of her own weakness, and the necessity of spiritual support, as I have already told you. I am sure the worst is over."

"Blessed be God, I trust it is," said her father; "but while I live, I will never demand of her such a proof of her obedience as that I imposed on her yesterday. She will soon be down to breakfast, and we must treat the dear girl kindly, and gently, and affectionately; tenderly, tenderly must she be treated; and, children, much depends upon you—keep her mind engaged. You have music—play more than you do—read more—walk more—sing more. If this engages and relieves her mind, it will answer an important purpose; but at all events it will be time well spent, and that is something."

When Jane appeared at breakfast she was paler than usual; but then the expression of her countenance, though pensive, was natural. Mr. Sinclair placed her between himself and her mother, and each kissed her in silence ere she sat down.

"I have been very unwell yesterday, papa: I know I must have been; but I have made my mind up to bear his absence with fortitude—not that it is his mere absence which I feel so severely, but an impression that we are never to see each other again."

"Impressions of that kind, my dear child, are the result of low spirits, and a nervous habit. You should not suffer your mind to be disturbed by them; for, when it is weakened by suffering, they gather strength, and sometimes become formidable."

"There is no bearing my calamity, papa, as it ought to be borne, without the grace of God, and you know we must pray to be made worthy of that. I dare say if I am resigned and submissive that my usual cheerfulness will gradually return. I have confidence in heaven, papa, but none in my own strength, or I should rather say in my own weakness. My attachment to Charles resembles a disease more than a healthy and rational passion. I know it is excessive, and indeed I think its excess is a disease. Yet it is singular I do not fear my heart, papa, but I do my head; here is where the danger lies—here—here;" and as she spoke, she applied her hand to her forehead, and gave a faint smile of melancholy apprehension.

"Wait, Jane," said her brother; "just wait for a week or ten days, and if you do n't scold yourself for being now so childish, why never call me brother again. Sure I understand these things like a philosopher. I have been three times in love myself."

Jane looked at him, and a faint sparkle of her usual good nature lit up her countenance.

"Did n't I tell you," he proceeded, addressing them—"look; why I'll soon have her as merry as a kid."

"But who were you in love with, William?" said Agnes.

"I was smitten first with Kate Sharpe, the applewoman, in consideration of her charming method of giving me credit for fruit when I was a schoolboy, and had no money. I thought her a very interesting woman, I assure you, and preferred my suit to her with signal success. I say signal, because you know she was then, as she is now, very hard of hearing, and I was forced to pay my court to her by signs."

"Dear William," said she, "I see your motive, and love you for it; but it is too soon—my spirits are not yet in tone for mirth or pleasantry—but they will be—they will be. I know it is too bad to permit an affliction that is merely sentimental to bear me down in this manner; but I cannot help it, and you must all only look on me as a weak foolish girl, and forgive me, and pity me. Mamma, I will lie down again, for I feel I am not well; and oh, papa, if you ever prayed with fervor and sincerity, pray for strength to your own Jane, and happiness to her own stricken heart."

She then retired, and for the remainder of that day confined herself partly to her bed, and altogether to her chamber: and it was observed, that from the innocent caprices of a sickly spirit, she called Agnes, and her mother, and Maria—sometimes one, and sometimes another—and had them always about her, each to hear a particular observation that occurred to her, or to ask some simple question of no importance to any person, except to one whose mind had become too sensitive upon the subject which altogether engrossed it. Toward evening she had a long fit of weeping, after which she appeared more calm and resigned. She made her mother read her a chapter in the Bible, and expressed a resolution to bear every thing, she said, as became one she hoped not yet beyond the reach of divine grace and Christian consolation.

After a second night's sleep she arose considerably relieved from the gloomy grief had nearly wrought such a dreadful change in her intellect. Her father's plan of imperceptibly engaging her attention by instruction and amusement, was carried into effect by him and her sisters with such singular success, that ere the lapse of a month she was almost restored to her wonted spirits. We say almost, because it was observed that, notwithstanding her apparent serenity, she never afterward reached the same degree of cheerfulness, nor so richly exhibited in her complexion that purple glow the hue of which lies like a visible charm upon the cheek of youthful beauty.

Time, however, is the best philosopher, and our heroine found that ere many weeks she could, with the exception of slight intervals, look back upon the day of separation from Osborne, and forward to the expectation of his return, with a calmness of spirit by no means unpleasing to one who had placed such unlimited confidence in his affection. His first letter soothed, relieved, transported her. Indeed, so completely was she overcome on receiving it, that the moment it was placed in her hands, her eyes seemed to have been changed into light, her limbs trembled with the agitation of a happiness so intense, and she at length sank into an ecstasy of joy, which was only relieved by a copious flood of tears.

For two years after this their correspondence was as regular as the uncertain motions of a tourist could permit it. Jane appeared to be happy, and she was so within the limits of an enjoyment, narrowed in its character by the contingency arising from time and distance, and the other probabilities of disappointment which a timid heart and a pensive fancy will too often shape into certainty. Fits of musing and melancholy she often had without any apparent cause, and when gently taken to task, or remonstrated with concerning them, she has only replied by weeping, or admitted that she could by no means account for her depression, except by saying that she believed it to be a defect in the habit and temper of her mind.

His tutor's letters, both to Charles' father and hers, were nearly as welcome to Jane as his own. He, in fact, could say that for his pupil, which his pupil's modesty would not permit him to say for himself. Oh! how her heart glowed and conscious pride sparkled in her eye, when that worthy man described the character of manly beauty which time and travel had gradually given to his person! And when his progress in knowledge and accomplishments, and the development of his taste and judgment became the theme of his tutor's panegyric, she could not listen without betraying the vehement enthusiasm of a passion, which absence and time had only strengthened in her bosom.

These letters induced a series of sensations at once novel and delightful, and such as were calculated to give zest to an attachment thus left to support itself, not from the presence of its object, but from the memory of tenderness that had already gone by. She knew Charles Osborne only as a boy—a beautiful boy it is true—and he knew her only as a graceful creature, whose extremely youthful appearance made it difficult whether to consider her merely as an advanced girl, or as a young female who had just passed into the first stage of womanhood. But now her fancy and affection had both room to indulge in that vivacious play which delights to paint a lover absent under such circumstances in the richest hues of imaginary beauty.

"How will he look," she would say to her sister Agnes, "when he returns a young man, settled into the fulness of his growth? Taller he will be, and much more manly in his deportment. But is there no danger, Agnes, of his losing in grace, in delicacy of complexion, in short, of losing in beauty what he may gain otherwise?"

"No, my dear, not in the least; you will be ten times prouder of him after his return than you ever were. There is something much more noble and dignified in the love of a man than in that of a boy, and you will feel this on seeing him."

"In that case, Agnes, I shall have to fall in love with him over again, and to fall in love with the same individual twice, will certainly be rather a novel case—a double passion, at least, you will grant, Agnes."

"But he will experience sensations quite as singular on seeing you, when he returns. You are as much changed—improved I mean—in your person, as he can be for his life. If he is now a fine, full grown young man, you are a tall, elegant—I don't want to flatter you, Jane—I need not say graceful, for that you always were, but I may add with truth, a majestic young woman. Why, you will scarcely know each other."

"You do flatter me, Agnes; but am I so much improved?"

"Indeed you are quite a different girl, from what you were when he saw you."

"I am glad of it; but as I told him once, it is on his account that I am so glad; do you know, Agnes, I never was vain of my beauty until I saw Charles?"

"Did you ever feel proud in being beautiful in the eyes of another, Jane?"

"No, I never did—why should I?"

"Well, that is not vanity—it is only love visible in a different aspect, and not the least amiable either, my dear."

"Well, I should be much more melancholy than I am, were not my fancy so often engaged in picturing to myself the change which may be on him when he returns. The feeling it occasions is novel and agreeable, sometimes, indeed, delightful, and so far sustains me when I am inclined to be gloomy. But believe me, Agnes, I could love Charles Osborne even if he were not handsome. I could love him for his mind, his principles, and especially for his faithful and constant heart."

"And for all these would he deserve your love; but you remember what you told me once: it seems he has not yet seen a girl that he thinks more handsome than you are. Did you not mention to me that he said when he did, he would cease to write to you, and cease to love you? You see he is constant."

"Yes; but did I not tell you the sense in which he meant it?"

"Yes; and now you throw a glance at yourself in the glass! Oh, Jane, Jane, the best of us and the freest from imperfection is not without a little pride and vanity; but do not be too confident, my saucy beauty; consider that you complained to William yesterday, about the unusual length of time since you had received his last letter, and yet he could write to his father—What, what, dear girl, what's the matter? you are as pale as death."

"Because, Agnes, I never think of that but my heart and spirits sink. It has been one of the secret causes of my occasional depression ever since he went. I cannot tell why, but from the moment the words were spoken, I have not been without a presentiment of evil."

"Even upon your own showing, Jane, that is an idle and groundless impression, and unworthy the affection which you know, and which we all know he bears you; dismiss it, dear Jane, dismiss it, and do not give yourself the habit of creating imaginary evils."

"I know I am prone to such a habit, and am probably too much of a visionary for my own happiness; but setting that gloomy presentiment aside, have you not, Agnes, been struck with several hints in his letters, both to me and his father, unfavorable to the state of his health?"

"That, you will allow, could not be very ill, when he was able to continue his travels."

"True, but according to his own admission his arrangements were frequently broken up, by the fact of his being 'unwell,' and 'not in condition to travel,' and so did not reach the places in time to which he had requested me to direct many of my letters. I fear, Agnes, that his health has not been so much improved by the air of the Continent as we hoped it would."

"I have only to say this, Jane, that if he does not appreciate your affection as he ought to do, then God forgive him. He will be guilty of a crime against the purest attachment of the best of hearts, as well as against truth and honor. I hope he may be worthy of you, and I am sure he will. He is now in Bath, however, and will soon be with us."

"I am divided, Agnes, by two principles—if they may be called such—or if you will, by two moods of mind, or states of feeling; one of them is faith and trust in his affection—how can I doubt it?—the other is my malady, I believe, a gloom, an occasional despondency for which I cannot account, and which I am not able to shake off. My faith and trust, however, will last, and his return will dispel the other."

This, in fact, was a true state of the faithful girl's heart. From the moment Osborne went to travel, her affection, though full of the tenderest enthusiasm, lay under the deep shadow of that gloom which was occasioned by the first, and we may say the only act of insincerity she was ever guilty of toward her father. The reader knows that even this act was not a deliberate one, but merely the hurried evasion of a young and bashful girl, who, had her sense of moral delicacy been less acute, might have never bestowed a moment's subsequent consideration upon it. Let our fair young readers, however, be warned even by this very slight deviation from truth, and let them also remember that one act of dissimulation may, in the little world of their own moral sentiments and affections, lay the foundation for calamities under which their hopes and their happiness in consequence of that act may absolutely perish. Still we are bound to say that Jane's deportment during the period stipulated upon for Osborne's absence was absolutely decorous, and replete with moral beauty. Her moments of enjoyment derived from his letters were fraught with an innocent simplicity of delight, in fine keeping with a heart so full of youthful fervor and attachment. And when her imagination became occasionally darkened by that gloom which she termed her malady, nothing could be more impressive than the tone of deep and touching piety which mingled with and elevated her melancholy into a cheerful solemnity of spirit, that swayed by its pensive dignity the habits and affections of her whole family.

'Tis true she was one of a class rarely to be found among even the highest of her own sex, and her attachment was consequently that of a heart utterly incapable of loving twice. Her first affection was too steadfast and decisive ever to be changed, and at the same time too full and unreserved to maintain the materials for a second passion. The impression she received was too deep ever to be erased. She might weep—she might mourn—she might sink—her soul might be bowed down to the dust—her heart might break—she might die—but she never, never could love again. That heart was his palace, where the monarch of her affections reigned—but remove his throne and it became the sepulchre of her own hopes—the ruin, haunted by the moping brood of her own sorrows. Often, indeed, did her family wonder at the freshness of memory manifested in the character of her love for Osborne. There was nothing transient, nothing forgotten, nothing perishable in her devotion to him. In truth, it had something of divinity in it. Every thing past, and much also of the future, was present to her. Osborne breathed and lived at the expiration of two years, just as he had done the day before he set out on his travels. In her heart he existed as an undying principle, and the duration of her love for him seemed likely to be limited only by those laws of nature, which, in the course of time, carry the heart beyond the memory of all human affections.

CHAPTER IX.

It would, indeed, be almost impossible to see a creature so lovely and angelic, as was our heroine, about the period when Osborne was expected to return. Retaining all the graceful elasticity of motion that characterized her when first introduced to our readers, she was now taller and more majestic in her person, rounder and with more symmetry in her figure, and also more conspicuous for the singular ease and harmony of her general deportment. Her hair, too, now grown to greater luxuriance, had become several shades deeper, and of course was much more rich than when Charles saw it last. But if there was any thing that more than another gave an expression of tenderness to her beauty, it was the under-tone of color—the slightly perceptible paleness which marked her complexion as that of a person whose heart though young had already been made acquainted with some early sorrow.

Had her lover then seen her, and witnessed the growth of charms that had taken place during his absence, he and she might both, alas, have experienced another and kinder destiny.

The time at length arrived when Charles, as had been settled upon by both their parents, was expected to return. During the three months previous he had been at Bath, accompanied of course by his friend and tutor. Up to a short time previous to his arrival there, his communications to his parents and to Jane were not only punctual and regular, but remarkable for the earnest spirit of dutiful affection and fervid attachment which they breathed to both. It is true that his father had during the whole period of his absence been cognizant of that which the vigilance of Jane's love for him only suspected—I allude to the state of his health, which it seems occasionally betrayed symptoms of his hereditary complaint.

This gave Mr. Osborne deep concern, for he had hoped that so long a residence in more genial climates would have gradually removed from his son's constitution that tendency to decline which was so much dreaded by them all. Still he was gratified to hear, that with the exception of those slight recurrences, the boy grew fast, and otherwise with a healthy energy, into manhood. The principles he had set out with were unimpaired by the influence of continental profligacy. His mind was enlarged, his knowledge greatly extended, and his taste and manners polished to a degree so unusual, that he soon became the ornament of every circle in which he moved. His talents, now ripe and cultivated, were not only of a high, but also of a striking and brilliant character—much too commanding and powerful, as every one said, to be permitted to sink into the obscurity of private life.

This language was not without its due impression upon young Osborne's mind; for his tutor could observe that soon after his return to England he began to have fits of musing, and was often abstracted, if not absolutely gloomy. He could also perceive a disinclination to write home, for which he felt it impossible to account. At first he attributed this to ill health, or to those natural depressions which frequently precede or accompany it; but at length on seeing his habitual absences increase, he inquired in a tone of friendly sympathy, too sincere to be doubted, why it was that a change so unusual had become so remarkably visible in his spirits.

"I knew not," replied Osborne, "that it was so; I myself have not observed what you speak of."

"Your manner, indeed, is much changed," said his friend; "you appear to me, and I dare say to others, very like a man whose mind is engaged upon the consideration of some subject that is deeply painful to him, and of which he knows not how to dispose. If it be so, my dear Osborne, command my advice, my sympathy, my friendship."

"I assure you, my dear friend, I was perfectly unconscious of this. But that I have for some time past been thinking more seriously than usual of the position in society which I ought to select, I grant you. You are pleased to flatter me with the possession of talents that you say might enable any man to reach a commanding station in public life. Now, for what purpose are talents given? or am I justified in slinking away into obscurity, when I might create my own fortune, perhaps my own rank, by rendering some of the noblest services to my country? The wish to leave behind one a name that cannot die, is indeed a splendid ambition!"

"I thought," replied the other, "that you had already embraced views of a different character, entered into by your father to promote your own happiness."

Osborne started, blushed, and for more than half a minute returned no answer. "True," said he at last, "true, I had forgotten that."

His tutor immediately perceived that an ambition not unnatural, indeed, to a young man possessing such fine talents, had strongly seized upon his heart, and knowing as he did his attachment to Jane, he would have advised his immediate return home, had it not been already determined on, in consequence of medical advice, that he himself should visit Bath for the benefit of his health, and his pupil could by no arguments be dissuaded from accompanying him.

This brief view of Osborne's intentions, at the close of the period agreed on for his return, was necessary to explain an observation made by Agnes in the last dialogue which we have given between herself and her younger sister. We allude to the complaint which she playfully charged Jane with having made to her brother concerning the length of time which had elapsed since she last heard from her lover. The truth is, that with the exception of Jane herself, both families were even then deeply troubled in consequence of a letter addressed by Charles's tutor to Mr. Osborne. That letter was the last which the amiable gentleman ever wrote, for he had not been in Bath above a week when he sank suddenly under a disease of the heart, to which he had for some years been subject. His death, which distressed young Osborne very much, enabled him, however, to plead the necessity of attending his friend's obsequies, in reply to his father's call on him to return to his family. The next letter stated that he would not lose a moment in complying with his wishes, as no motive existed to detain him from home, and the third expressed the uncommon benefit which he had, during his brief residence there, experienced from the use of the waters. Against this last argument the father had nothing to urge. His son's health was to him a consideration paramount to every other, and he wrote to Charles that if he found himself improved either by the air or by the waters of Bath, he should not hurry his return as he had intended. "Only write to your friends," said he, "they are as anxious for the perfect establishment of your health as I am."

This latter correspondence between Mr. Osborne and his son was submitted to Mr. Sinclair, that it might be mentioned to serve as an apology for Charles's delay in replying to Jane's last letter. This step was suggested by Mr. Sinclair himself, who dreaded the consequences which any appearance of neglect might have upon a heart so liable to droop as that of his gentle daughter. Jane, who was easily depressed, but not suspicious, smiled at the simplicity of her papa, as she said, in deeming it necessary to make any apology for Charles Osborne's not writing to her by return of post.

"It will be time enough," she added, "when his letters get cool, and come but seldom, to make excuses for him. Surely, my dear papa, if any one blamed him, I myself would be, and ought to be the first to defend him."

"Yet," observed William, "you could complain to me about his letting a letter of yours stand over a fortnight, before he answered it. Jane—Jane—there's no knowing you girls; particularly when you're in love; but indeed, then you do not know yourselves, so how should we?"

"But, papa," she added, looking earnestly upon him; "it is rather strange that you are so anxious to apologize for Charles. I cannot question my papa, and I shall not; but yet, upon second thought, it is very strange."

"No, my love, but I would not have you a day uneasy."

"Well," she replied, musing—but with a keen eye bent alternately upon him and William; "it is a simple case, I myself have a very ready solution for his want of punctuality, if it can be called such, or if it continue such."

"And pray what is it, Jane?" asked William.

"Excuse me, dear William—if I told you it might reach him, and then he might shape his conduct to meet it—I may mention it some day, though; but I hope there will never be occasion. Papa, don't you ask me, because if you do, I shall feel it my duty to tell you; and I would rather not, sir, except you press me. But why after all, should I make a secret of it? It is, papa, the test of all things, as well as of Charles's punctuality—for, of his affection I never doubt. It is time—time; but indeed I wish you had not spoken to me about it; I was not uneasy."

The poor girl judged Osborne through a misapprehension, and had she known more of life, or even closely reflected upon his neglect in writing to her, would have probably caused her to contemplate his conduct in a different light. She thought because his letters were nearly as frequent since his return to England, as they had been during his tour on the Continent, that the test of his respect and attachment was sustained. In fact, she was ignorant that he had written several letters of late to his own family, without having addressed to her a single line; or even mentioned her name, and this circumstance was known to them all, with the exception of herself, as was the tutor's previous letter, of which she had never heard.

It was no wonder, therefore, that her father, who was acquainted with this, and entertained such serious apprehensions for his daughter's state of mind, should feel anxious, that until Osborne's conduct were better understood, no doubt of his sincerity should reach the confiding girl's heart. The old man, however, unconsciously acted upon his own impressions rather than on Jane's knowledge of what had occurred. In truth, he forgot that the actual state of the matter was unknown to her, and the consequence was, that in attempting to efface an impression which did not exist, he alarmed her suspicion by his mysterious earnestness of manner, and thereby created the very uneasiness which he wished to remove.

From this day forward, Jane's eye became studiously vigilant of the looks and motions of the family. Her melancholy returned, but it was softer and sorer than it had ever been before; so did the mild but pensive spirit of devotion which had uniformly accompanied it. The sweetness of her manner was irresistible, if not affecting, for there breathed through the composure of her beautiful countenance an air of mingled sorrow and patience, so finely blended, that it was difficult to determine, on looking at her, whether she secretly rejoiced or mourned.

A few days more brought another letter from Osborne to his father, which contained a proposal for which the latter, in consequence of the tutor's letter, was not altogether unprepared. It was a case put to the father for the purpose of ascertaining whether, if he, Charles, were offered an opportunity of appearing in public life, he would recommend him to accept it. He did not say that such an opening had actually presented itself, but he strongly urged his father's permission to embrace it if it should.

This communication was immediately laid before Mr. Sinclair, who advised his friend, ere he took any other step, or hazarded an opinion upon it, to require from Charles an explicit statement of the motives which induced him to solicit such a sanction. "Until we know what he means," said he, "it is impossible for us to know how to advise him. That he has some ambitious project in view, is certain. Mr. Harvey's (his tutor) letter and this both prove it."

"But in the meantime, Mr. Sinclair, we must endeavor to put such silly projects out of his head, my dear friend. I am more troubled about that sweet girl, than about anything else. I cannot understand his neglect of her."

"Few, indeed, are worthy of that angel," replied he father, sighing; "I hope he may be. If Charles, after what has passed, sports with her happiness, he will one day have a fearful reckoning of it, unless he permits his conscience to become altogether seared."

"It cannot happen," replied the other; "I know my boy, his heart is noble; no, no, he is incapable of dishonor, much less of perfidy so black as that would be. In my next letter, however, I shall call upon him to explain himself upon that subject, as well as the other, and if he replies by an evasion, I shall instantly command him home."

They then separated, with a feeling of deep but fatherly concern, one anxious for the honor of his son, and the other trembling for the happiness of his daughter.

Mr. Sinclair was a man in whose countenance could be read all the various emotions that either exalted or disturbed his heart. If he felt joy, his eye became irradiated with a benignant lustre, that spoke at once of happiness; and, when depressed by care or sorrow, it was easy to see by the serious composure of his face, that something troubled or disturbed him. Indeed, this candor of countenance is peculiar to those only who have not schooled their faces into hypocrisy. After his return from the last interview with Mr. Osborne, his family perceived at a glance that something more than usually painful lay upon his mind; and such was the affectionate sympathy by which they caught each others feelings, that every countenance, save one, became partially overshadowed. Jane, although her eye was the first and quickest to notice this anxiety of her father, exhibited no visible proof of a penetration so acute and lively. The serene light that beamed so mournfully from her placid but melancholy brow, was not darkened by what she saw; on the contrary, that brow became, if possible, more serene; for in truth, the gentle enthusiast had already formed a settled plan of exalted resignation that was designed to sustain her under an apprehension far different from that which Osborne's ambitious speculations in life would have occasioned her to feel had she known them.

"I see," said she with a smile, "that my papa has no good news to tell. A letter has come to his father, but none to me; but you need not fear for my firmness, papa. I know from whence to expect support; indeed, from the beginning, I knew that I would require it. You often affectionately chide me for entertaining apprehensions too gloomy; but now they are not gloomy, because, if what I surmise be true, Charles and I will not be so long separated as you imagine. The hope of this, papa, is my consolation."

"Why, what do you surmise, my love?" asked her father.

"That Charles is gone, perhaps irretrievably gone in decline; you know it is the hereditary complaint of his family. What else could, or would—yet, papa, or ought to keep him so long from home—from his friends—from me? Yes, indeed," she added with a smile, "from me, papa, from his own Jane Sinclair, and he so near us, in England, and the time determined on for his return expired."

"But you know, Jane," said her father, gratified to find that her suspicion took a wrong direction, "the air of Bath, he writes, is agreeing with him."

"I hope it may, papa; I hope it may; but you may rest assured, that whatever happens, the lessons you have taught me will, aided by divine support, sustain my soul, so long as the frail tenement in which it is lodged may last. That will not be long."

"True religion, my love, is always cheerful, and loves to contemplate the brighter side of every human event. I do not like to see my child so calm, nor her countenance shaded by melancholy so fixed as that I have witnessed on it of late."

"Eternity, papa—a happy eternity, what is it, but the brighter side of human life—here we see only as in a glass darkly; there, in our final destiny, we reach the fullness of our happiness. I am not melancholy, but resigned; and resignation has a peace peculiar to itself; a repose which draws us gently, for a little time, out of the memory of our sorrows; but without refreshing the heart—without refreshing the heart. No, papa, I am not melancholy—I am not melancholy; I could bear Charles's death, and look up to my God for strength and support under it; but," she added, shaking her head, with a smile marked by something of a wild meaning, "if he could forget me for another—no, I will not say for another—but if he could only forget me, and his vows of undying affection, then indeed—then—then—papa—ha!—no—no—he could not—could not."

GRAY HAIRS.

Old man, upon whose thoughtful brow
The hairs are gray and scattered now:
Who sadly, and with many tears,
Hast mourned the loved of other years,
Whom thou, in Childhood's sunny bloom,
Saw'st laid to slumber in the tomb—
Old man, I deem it well for thee,
That thou hast hairs like these I see!

I deem it well, for thou at last
The snares of life hast safely pass'd;
If thou hast heard its sad winds blow,
If thou hast seen its hopes laid low,
If thou hast won with care and pain
That which in turn thou'st lost again—
It matters not:—yet by those hairs,
Be warned to penitence and prayers!

Be warned; for soon the churchyard mould
Shall dew thy limbs with grave-damp cold;
Soon o'er thy head the wintry sleet,
And early rains of Spring shall beat,
And Summer-flowers in graceful bloom
Shall kiss the sweet air round thy tomb;
For this, 'tis meet thou should'st prepare,
Thou on whose head I see gray hair!

Full many a bright and pleasant day
O'er thee has beamed and passed away;
Full many a warm kiss thou hast shed
On lips now sealed, and cold, and dead:
But by thine eye, old man, I know
That soon 't will be thy turn to go,
Nor vainly by these scattered hairs,
Should'st thou be warned to faith and prayers!

BARNABY RUDGE.

BY CHARLES DICKENS, ESQ.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Mr. Haredale stood in the widow's parlor with the doorway in his hand, gazing by turns at Mr. Chester and at Gabriel Varden, and occasionally glancing downward at the key as in the hope that of its own accord it would unlock the mystery; until Mr. Chester, putting on his hat and gloves, and sweetly inquiring whether they were walking in the same direction, recalled him to himself.

"No," he said. "Our roads diverge—widely, as you know. For the present, I shall remain here."

"You will be hipped, Haredale; you will be miserable, melancholy, utterly wretched," returned the other. "It is a place of the very last description for a man of your temper. I know it will make you very miserable."

"Let it," said Mr. Haredale, sitting down; "and thrive upon the thought. Good night!"

Feigning to be wholly unconscious of the abrupt wave of the hand which rendered this farewell tantamount to a dismissal, Mr. Chester retorted with a bland and heartfelt benediction, and inquired of Gabriel in what direction he was going.

"Yours, sir, would be too much honor for the like of me," replied the locksmith, hesitating.

"I wish you to remain here a little while, Varden," said Mr. Haredale without looking toward them. "I have a word to say to you."

"I will not intrude upon your conference another moment," said Mr. Chester with inconceivable politeness. "May it be satisfactory to you both? God bless you!" So saying, and bestowing upon the locksmith a most reluctant smile, he left them.

"A deplorably constituted creature, that rugged person," he said, as he walked along the street; "he is an atrocity that carries its own punishment along with it—a bear that gnaws himself. And here is one of the inestimable advantages of having a perfect command over one's inclinations. I have been tempted in these two short interviews, to draw upon that fellow fifty times. Five men in six would have yielded to the impulse. By suppressing mine, I wound him deeper and more keenly than if I were the best swordsman in all Europe, and he the worst. You are the wise man's very last resource," he said, tapping the hilt of his weapon; "we can but appeal to you when all else is said and done. To come to you before, and thereby spare our adversaries so much, is a barbarian mode of warfare, quite unworthy any man with the remotest pretensions to delicacy of feeling, or refinement."

He smiled so very pleasantly as he communed with himself after this manner, that a beggar was emboldened to follow him for alms, and to dog his footsteps for some distance. He was gratified by the circumstance, feeling it complimentary to his power of feature, and as a reward suffered the man to follow him until he called a chair, when he graciously dismissed him with a fervent blessing.

"Which is as easy as cursing," he wisely added, as he took his seat, "and more becoming to the face. To Clerkenwell, my good creatures, if you please!" The chairmen were rendered quite vivacious by having such a courteous burden, and to Clerkenwell they went at a fair round trot.

Lighting at a certain point he had indicated to them upon the road, and paying them something less than they had expected from a fare of such gentle speech, he turned into the street in which the locksmith dwelt, and presently stood beneath the shadow of the Golden Key. Mr. Tappertit, who was hard at work by lamp-light, in a corner of the workshop, remained unconscious of his presence until a hand upon his shoulder made him start and turn his head.

"Industry," said Mr. Chester, "is the soul of business, and the key-stone of prosperity. Mr. Tappertit, I shall expect you to invite me to dinner when you are Lord Mayor of London."

"Sir," returned the 'prentice, laying down his hammer, and rubbing his nose on the back of a very sooty hand, "I scorn the Lord Mayor and everything that belongs to him. We must have another state of society, sir, before you catch me being Lord Mayor. How do you do, sir?"

"The better, Mr. Tappertit, for looking into your ingenious face once more. I hope you are well."

"I am as well, sir," said Sim, standing up to get nearer to his ear, and whispering hoarsely, "as any man can be under the aggravations to which I am exposed. My life's a burden to me. If it was n't for vengeance, I'd play at pitch and toss with it on the losing hazard."

"Is Mrs. Varden at home?" said Mr. Chester.

"Sir," returned Sim, eyeing him over with a look of concentrated expression—"she is. Did you wish to see her?" Mr. Chester nodded.

"Then come this way, sir," said Sim, wiping his face upon his apron. "Follow me, sir. Would you permit me to whisper in your ear one half a second?"

"By all means."

Mr. Tappertit raised himself on tiptoe, applied his lips to Mr. Chester's ear, drew back his head without saying anything, looked hard at him, applied them to his ear again, again drew back, and finally whispered—"The name is Joseph Willet. Hush! I say no more."

Having said that much, he beckoned the visiter with a mysterious aspect to follow him to the parlor door, where he announced him in the voice of a gentleman-usher.

"Mr. Chester."

"And not Mr. Ed'dard, mind," said Sim, looking into the door again and adding this by way of postscript in his own person; "it's his father."

"But do not let his father," said Mr. Chester, advancing hat in hand, as he observed the effect of this last explanatory announcement, "do not let his father be any check or restraint on your domestic occupations, Miss Varden."

"Oh! Now! There! Ain't I always a saying it!" exclaimed Miggs, clapping her hands. "If he ain't been and took Miss for her own daughter. Well, she do look like it, that she do. Oay think of that, mim!"

"Is it possible?" said Mr. Chester in his softest tones, "that this is Mrs. Varden? I am amazed. That is not your daughter, Mrs. Varden? No, no. Your sister."

"My daughter, indeed sir," returned Mrs. V., blushing with great juvenility.

"Ay, Mrs. Varden!" cried the visiter. "Ah, ma'am—humanity is indeed a happy lot, when we can repeat ourselves in others, and still be young as they. You must allow me to salute you—the custom of the country, my dear madam—your daughter, too."

Dolly showed some reluctance to perform this ceremony, but was sharply reproved by Mrs. Varden, who insisted on her undergoing it that minute. For pride, she said with great severity, was one of the seven deadly sins, and humility and lowliness of heart were virtues. Wherefore she desired that Dolly would be kissed immediately, on pain of her just displeasure; at the same time giving her to understand that whatever she saw her mother do, she might safely do herself, without being at the trouble of any reasoning or reflection on the subject—which, indeed, was offensive and undutiful, and in direct contravention of the church catechism.

Thus admonished, Dolly complied, though by no means willingly; for there was a broad, bold look of admiration in Mr. Chester's face, refined and polished though it sought to be, which distressed her very much. As she stood with downcast eyes, not liking to look up and meet his, he gazed upon her with an approving air, and then turned to her mother.

"My friend Gabriel (whose acquaintance I only made this very evening) should be a happy man, Mrs. Varden."

"Ah!" sighed Mrs. V., shaking her head.

"Ah!" echoed Miggs.

"Is that the case?" said Mr. Chester, compassionately.

"Dear me!"

"Master has no intentions, sir," murmured Miggs as she sidled up to him, "but to be as grateful as his natur will let him, for everything he owns which it is in his powers to appreciate. But we never, sir"—said Miggs, looking sideways at Mrs. Varden, and interlarding her discourse with a sigh—"we never know the full value of some wines and fig-trees till we lose 'em. So much the worse, sir, for them as has the slighting of 'em on their consciences when they're gone to be in full blow elsewhere." And Miss Miggs cast up her eyes to signify where that might be.

As Mrs. Varden distinctly heard, and was intended to hear, all that Miggs said, and as these words appeared to convey in metaphorical terms a presage or foreboding that she would at some early period droop beneath her trials and take an easy flight toward the stars, she immediately began to languish, and taking a volume of the Manual from a neighboring table, leaned her arm upon it as though she were Hope and that her Anchor. Mr. Chester perceiving this, and seeing how the volume was lettered on the back, took it gently from her hand, and turned the fluttering leaves.

"My favorite book, dear madam. How often, how very often in his early life—before he can remember"—(this clause was strictly true)—"have I deduced little easy moral lessons from its pages, for my dear son Ned! You know Ned?"

Mrs. Varden had that honor, and a fine affable young gentleman he was.

"You're a mother, Mrs. Varden," said Mr. Chester, taking a pinch of snuff, "and you know what I, as a father, feel, when he is praised. He gives me some uneasiness—much uneasiness—he's of a roving nature, ma'am—from flower to flower—from sweet to sweet—but his is the butterfly time of life, and we must not be hard upon such trifling."

He glanced at Dolly. She was attending evidently to what he said. Just what he desired!

"The only thing I object to in this little trait of Ned's, is," said Mr. Chester, "—and the mention of his name reminds me, by the way, that I am about to beg the favor of a minute's talk with you alone—the only thing I object to in it, is, that it does partake of insincerity. Now, however I may attempt to disguise the fact from myself in my affection for Ned, still I always revert to this—that if we are not sincere, we are nothing. Nothing upon earth. Let us be sincere, my dear madam—"

"—and Protestant," murmured Mrs. Varden.

"—and Protestant above all things. Let us be sincere and Protestant, strictly moral, strictly just (though always with a leaning toward mercy,) strictly honest, and strictly true, and we gain—it is a slight point, certainly, but still it is something tangible; we throw up a groundwork and foundation, so to speak, of goodness, on which we may afterward erect some worthy superstructure."

Now, to be sure, Mrs. Varden thought, here is a perfect character. Here is a meek, righteous, thorough-going Christian, who, having mastered all these qualities, so difficult of attainment; who, having dropped a pinch of salt on the tails of all the cardinal virtues, and caught them every one; makes light of their possession, and pants for more morality. For the good woman never doubted (as many good men and women never do,) that this slighting kind of profession, this setting so little store by great matters, this seeming to say "I am not proud, I am what you hear, but I consider myself no better than other people; let us change the subject, pray"—was perfectly genuine and true. He so contrived it, and said it in that way that it appeared to have been forced from him, and its effect was marvellous.

Aware of the impression he had made—few men were quicker than he at such discoveries—Mr. Chester followed up the blow by propounding certain virtuous maxims, somewhat vague and general in their nature, doubtless, and occasionally partaking of the character of truisms, worn a little out at elbow, but delivered in so charming a voice and with such uncommon serenity and peace of mind, that they answered as well as the best. Nor is this to be wondered at; for, as hollow vessels produce a far more musical sound in falling than those which are substantial, so it will oftentimes be found that sentiments which have nothing in them make the loudest ringing in the world, and are the most relished.

Mr. Chester, with the volume gently extended in one hand, and with the other planted lightly on his breast, talked to them in the most delicious manner possible; and quite enchanted all his hearers, notwithstanding their conflicting interests and thoughts. Even Dolly, who, between his keen regards and her eyeing over by Mr. Tappertit, was put quite out of countenance, could not help owning within herself that he was the sweetest-spoken gentleman she had ever seen. Even Miss Miggs, who was divided between admiration of Mr. Chester and a mortal jealousy of her young mistress, had sufficient leisure to be propitiated. Even Mr. Tappertit, though occupied as we have seen in gazing at his heart's delight, could not wholly divert his thoughts from the voice of the other charmer. Mrs. Varden, to her own private thinking, had never been so improved in all her life; and when Mr. Chester, rising and craving permission to speak with her apart, took her by the hand and led her at arm's length up stairs to the best sitting-room, she almost deemed him something more than human.

"Dear madam," he said, pressing her hand delicately to his lips; "be seated."

Mrs. Varden called up quite a courtly air, and became seated.

"You guess my object?" said Mr. Chester, drawing a chair toward her. "You divine my purpose? I am an affectionate parent, my dear Mrs. Varden."

"That I am sure you are," said Mrs. V.

"Thank you," returned Mr. Chester, tapping his snuff-box lid. "Heavy moral responsibilities rest with parents, Mrs. Varden."

Mrs. Varden slightly raised her hands, shook her head, and looked at the ground as though she saw strait through the globe, out at the other end, and into the immensity of space beyond.

"I may confide in you," said Mr. Chester, "without reserve. I love my son, ma'am, dearly; and loving him as I do, I would save him from working certain misery. You know his attachment to Miss Haredeale. You have abetted him in it, and very kind of you it was to do so. I am deeply obliged to you—most deeply obliged to you—for your interest in his behalf; but my dear ma'am, it is a mistaken one, I do assure you."

Mrs. Varden stammered that she was sorry—

"Sorry, my dear ma'am," he interposed. "Never be sorry for what is so very amiable, so very good in intention, so perfectly like yourself. But there are grave and weighty reasons, pressing family considerations, and apart even from these, points of religious difference, which interpose themselves, and render their union impossible; utterly impossible. I should have mentioned these circumstances to your husband; but he has—you will excuse my saying this so freely—he has not your quickness of apprehension or depth of moral sense. What an extremely airy house this is, and how beautifully kept! For one like myself—a widower so long—these tokens of female care and superintendence have inexpressible charms."

Mrs. Varden began to think (she scarcely knew why) that the young Mr. Chester must be in the wrong and the old Mr. Chester must be in the right.

"My son Ned," resumed her tempter with his most winning air, "has had, I am told, your lovely daughter's aid, and your open-hearted husband's."

"—Much more than mine sir," said Mrs. Varden; "a great deal more. I have often had my doubts. It's a—"

"A bad example," suggested Mr. Chester. "It is. No doubt it is. Your daughter is at that age when to set before her an encouragement for young persons to rebel against their parents on this most important point, is particularly injudicious. You are quite right. I ought to have thought of that myself, but it escaped me, I confess—so far superior are your sex to ours, dear madam, in point of penetration and sagacity."

Mrs. Varden looked as wise as if she had really said something to deserve this compliment—firmly believing she had, in short—and her faith in her own shrewdness increased considerably.

"My dear ma'am," said Mr. Chester, "you embolden me to be plain with you. My son and I are at variance on this point. The young lady and her natural guardian differ upon it, also. And the closing point is, that my son is bound by his duty to me, by his honor, by every solemn tie and obligation, to marry some one else."

"Engaged to marry another lady!" quoth Mrs. Varden, holding up her hands.

"My dear madam, brought up, educated, and trained, expressly for that purpose. Expressly for that purpose. Miss Haredeale, I am told, is a very charming creature."

"I am her foster-mother, and should know—the best young lady in the world," said Mrs. Varden.

"I have not the smallest doubt of it. I am sure she is. And you, who have stood in that tender relation toward her, are bound to consult her happiness. Now, can I—as I have said to Haredeale, who quite agrees—can I possibly stand by, and suffer her to throw herself away (although she is of a Catholic family,) upon a young fellow who, as yet, has no heart at all? It is no imputation upon him to say he has not, because young men who have plunged deeply into the frivolities and conventionalities of society, very seldom have. Their hearts never grow, my dear ma'am, till after thirty. I do not believe, no, I do not believe, that I had any heart myself when I was Ned's age."

"Oh, sir," said Mrs. Varden, "I think you must have had. It's impossible that you, who have so much now, can ever have been without any."

"I hope," he answered, shrugging his shoulders meekly, "I have a little; I hope, a very little—Heaven knows! But to return to Ned; I have no doubt you thought, and therefore interfered benevolently in his behalf, that I objected to Miss Haredeale. How very natural! My dear madam, I object to him—to him—emphatically to Ned himself."

Mrs. Varden was perfectly aghast at the disclosure.

"He has, if he honorably fulfils this solemn obligation of which I have told you—and he must be honorable, dear Mrs. Varden, or he is no son of mine—a fortune within his reach. He is of most expensive, ruinously expensive habits; and if, in a moment of caprice and wilfulness, he were to marry this young lady, and so deprive himself of the means of gratifying the tastes to which he has been so long accustomed, he would—my dear madam—he would break the gentle creature's heart. Mrs. Varden, my good lady, my dear soul, I put it to you—is such a sacrifice to be endured? Is the female heart a thing to be trifled with in this way? Ask your own, my dear madam. Ask your own, I beseech you."

"Truly," thought Mrs. Varden, "this gentleman is a saint. But," she added aloud, and not unnaturally, "if you take Miss Emma's lover away, sir, what becomes of the poor thing's heart, then?"

"The very point," said Mr. Chester, not at all abashed, "to which I wished to lead you. A marriage with my son, whom I should be compelled to disown, would be followed by years of misery; they would be separated, my dear madam, in a twelvemonth. To break off this attachment, which is more fancied than real, as you and I know very well, will cost the dear girl but a few tears, and she is happy again. Take the case of your own daughter, the lady down stairs, who is your breathing image"—Mrs. Varden coughed and simpered—"there is a young man, (I am sorry to say, a dissolute fellow, of very inordinate character,) of whom I have heard Ned speak—Bullet was it—Pullet—Mullet—"

"There is a young man of the name of Joseph Willet, sir," said Mrs. Varden, folding her hands loftily.

"That's he," cried Mr. Chester. "Suppose this Joseph Willet now, were to aspire to the affections of your charming daughter, and were to engage them."

"It would be like his impudence," interposed Mrs. Varden, bridling, "to dare to think of such a thing!"

"My dear madam, that's the whole case. I know it would be like his impudence. It is like Ned's impudence to do as he has done; but you would not on that account, or because of a few tears from your beautiful daughter, refrain from checking their inclinations at their birth. I meant to have reasoned thus with your husband when I saw him at Mrs. Rudge's this evening—"

"My husband," said Mrs. Varden, interposing with emotion, "would be a great deal better at home than going to Mrs. Rudge's so often. I do not know what he does there. I do not see what occasion he has to busy himself in her affairs at all, sir."

"If I do not appear to express my concurrence in those last sentiments of yours," returned Mr. Chester, "quite so strongly as you might desire, it is because his being there, my dear madam, and not proving conversational, led me hither, and procured the happiness of this interview with one, in whom the whole management, conduct, and prosperity of her family are centered, I perceive."

With that he took Mrs. Varden's hand again, and having pressed it to his lips with the high-flown gallantry of the day—a little burlesqued to render it the more striking in the good lady's unaccustomed eyes—proceeded in the same strain of mingled sophistry, cajolery, and flattery, to entreat her that her utmost influence might be exerted to restrain her husband and daughter from any further promotion of Edward's suit to Miss Haredeale, or from aiding or abetting either party in any way. Mrs. Varden was but a woman, and had her share of vanity, obstinacy, and love of power. She entered into a secret treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with her insinuating visitor; and really did believe, as many others would have done who saw and heard him, that in so doing she furthered the ends of truth, justice and morality, in no very uncommon degree.

Overjoyed by the success of his negotiation, and mightily amused within himself, Mr. Chester conducted her down stairs in the same state as before; and having repeated the previous ceremony of salutation, which also as before comprehended Dolly, took his leave; first completing the conquest of Miss Miggs's heart, by inquiring if "this young lady" would light him to the door.

"Oh, mim," said Miggs, returning with the candle. "Oh gracious me, mim, there's a gentleman! Was there ever such an angel to talk as he is—and such a sweet-looking man! So upright and noble, that he seems to say 'but I will take notice on it too.' And to think of his taking you for Miss Dolly, and Miss Dolly for your sister—Oh, my goodness me, if I was master would n't I be jealous of him!"

Mrs. Varden reproved her handmaid for this vain-speaking; but very gently and mildly—quite smilingly indeed—remarking that she was a foolish, giddy, light-headed girl, whose spirits carried her beyond all bounds, and who did not mean half she said, or she would be quite angry with her. "For my part," said Dolly, in a thoughtful manner, "I half believe Mr. Chester is something like Miggs in that respect. For all his politeness and pleasant speaking he was making game of us, more than once."

"If you venture to say such a thing again, and to speak ill of people behind their backs in my presence, Miss," said Mrs. Varden, "I shall insist upon your taking a candle and going to bed directly. How dare you, Dolly? I'm astonished at you. The rudeness of your whole behavior this evening has been disgraceful. Did anybody ever hear," cried the enraged matron, bursting into tears, "of a daughter telling her own mother she has been made game of?"

What a very uncertain temper Mrs. Varden's was!

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Repairing to a noted coffee-house in Covent Garden when he left the locksmith's, Mr. Chester sat long over a late dinner, entertaining himself exceedingly with the whimsical recollection of his recent proceedings, and congratulating himself very much on his great cleverness. Influenced by these thoughts, his face wore an expression so benign and tranquil, that the waiter in immediate attendance upon him felt he could almost have died in his defence, and settled in his own mind (until the receipt of the bill, and a very small fee for very great trouble disabused it of the idea) that such an apostolic customer was worth half-a-dozen of the ordinary run of visitors, at least.

A visit to the gaming-table—not as a heated, anxious venturer, but one whom it was quite a treat to see staking his two or three pieces in deference to the follies of society, and smiling with equal benevolence on winners and losers—made it late before he reached home. It was his custom to bid his servant go to bed at his own time unless he had orders to the contrary, and to leave a candle on the common stair. There was a lamp on the landing by which he could always light it when he came home late, and having a key of the door about him he could enter and go to bed at his pleasure.

He opened the glass of the dull lamp, whose wick, burnt up and swollen like a drunkard's nose, came flying off in little carbuncles at the candle's touch, and scattering hot sparks about, rendered it matter of some difficulty to kindle the lazy taper; when a noise, as of a man snoring deeply some steps higher up, caused him to pause and listen. It was the heavy breathing of a sleeper, close at hand. Some fellow had lain down on the open staircase, and was slumbering soundly. Having lighted the candle at length and opened his own door, he softly ascended, holding the taper high above his head, and peering cautiously about; curious to see what kind of man had chosen so comfortable a shelter for his lodging.

With his head upon the landing and his great limbs flung over half a dozen stairs, as carelessly as though he were a dead man whom drunken bearers had thrown down by chance, there lay Hugh, face uppermost, his long hair drooping like some wild weed upon his wooden pillow, and his huge chest heaving with the sounds which so unwontedly disturbed the place and hour.

He who came upon him so unexpectedly was about to break his rest by thrusting him with his foot, when, glancing at his upturned face, he arrested himself in the very action, and stooping down and shading the candle with his hand, examined his features closely. Close as his first inspection was, it did not suffice, for he passed the light, still carefully shaded as before, across and across his face, and yet observed him with a searching eye.

While he was thus engaged, the sleeper, without any starting or turning round, awoke. There was a kind of fascination in meeting his steady gaze so suddenly, which took from the other the presence of mind to withdraw his eyes, and forced him, as it were, to meet his look. So they remained staring at each other, until Mr. Chester at last broke silence, and asked him in a low voice, why he lay sleeping there.

"I thought," said Hugh, struggling in a sitting posture and gazing at him intently, still, "that you were a part of my dream. It was a curious one. I hope it may never come true, master."

"What makes you shiver?"

"The—the cold, I suppose," he growled, as he shook himself, and rose. "I hardly know where I am yet."

"Do you know me?" said Mr. Chester.

"Ay. I know you," he answered. "I was dreaming of you—we're not where I thought we were. That's a comfort."

He looked round him as he spoke, and in particular looked above his head, as though he half expected to be standing under some object which had had existence in his dream. Then he rubbed his eyes and shook himself again, and followed his conductor into his own rooms.

Mr. Chester lighted the candles which stood upon his dressing-table, and wheeling an easy chair toward the fire, which was yet burning, stirred up a cheerful blaze, sat down before it, and bade his uncouth visitor "Come here," and draw his boots off.

"You have been drinking again, my fine fellow," he said, as Hugh went down on one knee, and did as he was told.

"As I'm alive, master, I've walked the twelve long miles, and waited here I don't know how long, and had no drink between my lips since dinner-time at noon."

"And can you do nothing better, my pleasant friend, than fall asleep, and shake the very building with your snores?" said Mr. Chester. "Can't you dream in your straw at home, dull dog as you are, that you need come here to do it!—Reach me those slippers, and tread softly.”

Hugh obeyed in silence.

“And barkee, my dear young gentleman,” said Mr. Chester, as he put them on, “the next time you dream, don’t let it be of me, but of some dog or horse with whom you are better acquainted. Fill the glass once—you’ll find it and the bottle in the same place—and empty it to keep yourself awake.”

Hugh obeyed again—even more zealously—and having done so, presented himself before his patron.

“Now,” said Mr. Chester, “what do you want with me?”

“There was news to-day,” returned Hugh. “Your son was at our house—came down on horseback. He tried to see the young woman, but couldn’t get sight of her. He left some letter or some message which our Joe had charge of, but he and the old one quarreled about it when your son had gone, and the old one would n’t let it be delivered. He says (that’s the old one does) that none of his people shall interfere and get him into trouble. He’s a landlord he says, and lives on everybody’s custom.”

“He is a jewel,” smiled Mr. Chester, “and the better for being a dull one. Well?”

“Varden’s daughter—that’s the girl I kissed—”

“And stole the bracelet from upon the king’s highway,” said Mr. Chester, composedly. “Yes; what of her?”

“She wrote a note at our house to the young man, saying she lost the letter I brought to you, and you burnt. Our Joe was to carry it, but the old one kept him at home all next day, on purpose that he should n’t. Next morning he gave it to me to take; and here it is.”

“You did n’t deliver it then, my good friend?” said Mr. Chester, twirling Dolly’s nose between his finger and thumb, and feigning to be surprised.

“I supposed you’d want to have it,” retorted Hugh.

“My devil-may-care acquaintance,” said Mr. Chester—“really if you do not draw some nicer distinctions, your career will be cut short with most surprising suddenness. Do n’t you know that the letter you brought to me, was directed to my son who resides in this place? And can you decry no difference between his letters and those addressed to other people?”

“If you do n’t want it,” said Hugh, disconcerted by this reproof, for he had expected high praise, “give it me back, and I’ll deliver it. I do n’t know how to please you, master.”

“I shall deliver it,” returned his patron, putting it away for a moment’s consideration, “myself. Does the young lady walk out on fine mornings?”

“Mostly—about noon is her usual time.”

“Alone?”

“Yes, alone.”

“Where?”

“In the grounds before the house. Them that the foot-path crosses.”

“If the weather should be fine, I may throw myself in her way to-morrow, perhaps,” said Mr. Chester, as coolly as if she were one of his ordinary acquaintance. “Mr. Hugh, if I should ride up to the Maypole door, you will do me the favor only to have seen me once. You must suppress your gratitude, and endeavor to forget my forbearance in the matter of the bracelet. It is natural it should break out, and it does you honor; but when other folks are by, you must, for your own sake and safety, be as like your usual self as though you owed me no obligation whatever, and had never stood within these walls. You comprehend me?”

Hugh understood him perfectly. After a pause he muttered that he hoped his patron would involve him in no trouble about this last letter; for he had kept it back solely with the view of pleasing him. He was continuing in this strain, when Mr. Chester with a most beneficent and patronising air cut him short by saying:

“My good fellow, you have my promise, my word, my sealed bond (for a verbal pledge with me is quite as good,) that I will always protect you so long as you deserve it. Now, do set your mind at rest. Keep it at ease, I beg of you. When a man puts himself in my power so thoroughly as you have done, I really feel as though he had a kind of claim upon me. I am more disposed to mercy and forbearance under such circumstances than I can tell you, Hugh. Do look upon me as your protector, and rest assured, I entreat you, that on the subject of that indiscretion, you may preserve, as long as you and I are friends, the lightest heart that ever beat within a human breast. Fill that glass once more to cheer you on your road homeward—I am really quite ashamed to think how far you have to go—and then God bless you for the night.”

“They think,” said Hugh, when he had tossed the liquor down, “that I am sleeping soundly in the stable. Ha, ha, ha! The stable door is shut, but the steed’s gone, master.”

“You are a most convivial fellow,” returned his friend, “and I love your humor of all things. Good night! Take the greatest possible care of yourself, for my sake!”

It was remarkable that during the whole interview, each had endeavored to catch stolen glances of the other’s face, and had never looked full at it. They interchanged one brief and hasty glance as Hugh went out, and averted their eyes directly, and so separated. Hugh closed the double doors behind him, carefully and without noise; and Mr. Chester remained on his easy chair, with his gaze intently fixed upon the fire.

“Well!” he said, after meditating for a long time—and said with a sigh and an easy shifting of his attitude, as though he dismissed some other subject from his thoughts, and returned to that which had held possession of them all the day—the plot thickens; I have thrown the shell; it will explode, I think, in eight-and-forty hours, and should scatter these good folks amazingly. We shall see!”

He went to bed and fell asleep, but had not slept long when he started up and thought that Hugh was at the outer door, calling in a strange voice, very different from his own, to be admitted. The delusion was so strong upon him, and was so full of that vague terror of the night in which such visions have their being, that he rose and taking his sheathed sword in his hand, opened the door, and looked out upon the staircase, and toward the spot where Hugh had lain asleep; and even spoke to him by name. But all was dark and quiet, and creeping back to bed again, he fell, after an hour’s uneasy watching, into a second sleep, and woke no more till morning.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The thoughts of worldly men are for ever regulated by a moral law of gravitation, which, like a physical one, holds them down to earth. The bright glory of day, and the silent wonders of a starlight night, appeal to their minds in vain. There are no signs in the sun, or in the moon, or in the stars for their reading. They are like some wise men, who, learning to know each planet by its Latin name, have quite forgotten such small heavenly constellations as Chariot, Forbearance, Universal Love, and Mercy, although they shine by night and day so brightly that the blind may see them; and, looking upward at the spangled sky, see nothing more but the reflection of their own great wisdom and book-learning.

It is curious to imagine these people of the world, busy in thought, turning their eyes toward the countless spheres that shine above us, and making them reflect the only images their minds contain. The man who lives but in the breath of princes has nothing in his sight but stars for courtier’s breasts. The envious man beholds his neighbors’ honors even in the sky; to the money-hoarder, and the mass of worldly folk, the whole great universe above glitters with sterling coin—fresh from the mint—stamped with the sovereign’s hand—coming always between them and heaven, turn where they may. So do the shadows of our own desires stand between us and our better angels, and thus their brightness is eclipsed.

Everything was fresh and gay, as though the world were but that morning made, when Mr. Chester rode at a tranquil pace along the forest road. Though early in the season, it was warm and gentle weather; the trees were budding into life, the hedges and the grass were green, the air was musical with songs of birds, and high above them all the lark poured out her richest melody. In shady places, the morning dew sparkled on each young leaf and blade of grass; and where the sun was shining, some diamond drops yet glittered brightly, as in unwillingness to leave so fair a world, and have such brief existence. Even the light wind, whose rustling was as gentle to the ear as softly-falling water, had its hope and promise, and leaving a pleasant fragrance in its track as it went fluttering by, whispered of its intercourse with summer, and of his happy coming.

The solitary rider went glancing on among the trees, from sunlight into shade and back again, at the same even pace—looking about him, certainly, from time to time, but with no greater thought of the day or the scene through which he moved than that he was fortunate (being chieftly dressed) to have such favorable weather. He smiled very complacently at such times, but rather as if he were satisfied with himself than with anything else; and so went riding on, upon his chestnut cob, as pleasant to look upon as his own horse, and probably far less sensitive to the many cheerful influences by which he was surrounded.

In course of time the Maypole’s massive chimneys rose upon his view; but he quickened not his pace one jot, and with the same cool gravity rode up to the tavern porch. John Willet, who was toasting his red face before a great fire in the bar, and who with surpassing foresight and quickness of apprehension, had been thinking, as he looked at the blue sky, that if that state of things lasted much longer, it might ultimately become necessary to leave off fires and throw the windows open, issued forth to hold his stirrup, calling lustily for Hugh.

“Oh, you’re here, are you, sir?” said John, rather surprised by the quickness with which he appeared. “Take this here valuable animal into the stable, and have more than particular care of him if you want to keep your place. A mortal lazy fellow, sir; he needs a deal of looking after.”

“But you have a son,” returned Mr. Chester, giving his bridle to Hugh as he dismounted, and acknowledging his salute by a careless motion of his hand towards his hat.

“Why do n’t you make him useful?”

“Why, the truth is, sir,” replied John, with great importance, “that my son—what, you’re listening, are you, villain!”

“Who’s listening?” returned Hugh, angrily. “A treat, indeed, to hear you speak! Would you have me take him in ‘till he’s cool?”

“Walk him up and down further off, then, sir,” cried old John; “and when you see me and a noble gentleman entertaining ourselves with talk, keep your distance. If you do n’t know your distance, sir,” added Mr. Willet, after an enormously long pause, during which he fixed his great dull eyes on Hugh, and waited with exemplary patience for any little property in the way of ideas that might be coming to him, “we’ll find a way to teach you pretty soon.”

Hugh shrugged his shoulders scornfully, and in his reckless, swaggering way, crossed to the other side of the little green, and there, with the bridle slung loosely over his shoulder, led the horse to and fro, glancing at his master every now and then, from under his bushy eyebrows, with as sinister an aspect as one would desire to see.

Mr. Chester, who, without appearing to do so, had eyed him attentively during his brief dispute, stepped into the porch, and turning abruptly to Mr. Willet, said—

“You keep strange servants, John.”

“Strange enough to look at, sir, certainly,” answered the host; “but out of doors, for horses, dogs, and the like of that, there ain’t a better man in England, than is that Maypole Hugh, yonder. He ain’t fit for in doors,” added Mr. Willet, with the confidential air of a man who felt his own superior nature. “I do that; but if that chap had only a little imagination, sir—”

“He’s an active fellow now, I dare swear,” said Mr. Chester, in a musing tone, which seemed to suggest that he would have said the same had there been nobody to hear him.

“Active, sir!” retorted John, with quite an expression in his face; “that chap! Hallo, there! You, sir! Bring that horse here, and go and hang my wig on the weather-cock, to show this gentleman whether you are one of the lively sort or not.”

Hugh made no answer, but throwing the bridle to his master, and snatching his wig from his head, in a manner so unceremonious and hasty that the action discomposed Mr. Willet not a little, though performed at his own special desire, climbed nimbly to the very summit of the maypole before the house, and hanging the wig upon the weather-cock, sent it twirling round like a roasting jack. Having achieved this performance he cast it on the ground, and sliding down the pole with inconceivable rapidity, alighted on his feet almost as soon as it had touched the earth.

“There, sir,” said John, relapsing into his usual, stolid state, “you won’t see that at many houses, besides the Maypole, where there’s good accommodation for man and beast—nor that neither, though that without him is nothing.”

The last remark bore reference to his vaulting on horseback, as upon Mr. Chester’s first visit, and quickly disappearing by the stable gate.

“That with him is nothing,” repeated Mr. Willet brushing his wig with his wrist, and invariably resolving to distribute a small charge for dust and damage to that article of dress, through the various items of his guest’s bill; “he’ll get out of a’most any winder in the house. There never was such a chap for flinging himself about and never hurting his bones. It’s my opinion, sir, that it’s pretty nearly all owing to his not having any imagination; and that if imagination could be (which it can’t) knocked into him, he’d never be able to do it any more. But we was a talking, sir, about my son.”

“True, Willet, true,” said his visiter, turning again towards the landlord with his accustomed serenity of face. “My good friend, what about him?”

It has been reported that Mr. Willet, previous to making answer, winked. As he never was known to be guilty of such lightness of conduct either before or afterward, this may be looked upon as a malicious invention of his enemies—founded, perhaps, upon the undisputed circumstance of his taking his guest by the third breast button of his coat, counting downwards from the chia, and pouring his reply into his ear:

“Sir,” whispered John, with dignity, “I know my duty. We want no love-making here, sir, unbeknown to parents. I respect a certain young gentleman, taking him in the light of a young gentleman; I respect a certain young lady, taking her in the light of a young lady; but of the two as a couple, I have no knowledge, sir, none whatever. My son, sir, is upon his patrol.”

“I thought I saw him looking through the corner window but this moment,” said Mr. Chester, who naturally thought that being on patrol, implied walking about somewhere.

“No doubt you did, sir,” returned John. “He is upon his patrol of honor, sir, not to leave the premises. Me and some friends of mine that use the Maypole of an evening, sir, considered what was best to be done with him, to prevent his doing anything unpleasant in opposing your desires; and we’ve put him on his patrol. And what’s more, sir, he won’t be off his patrol for a pretty long time to come, I can tell you that.”

When he had communicated this bright idea, which had had its origin in the perusal by the village cronies of a newspaper, containing, among other matters, an account of how some officer pending the sentence of some court-martial had been enlarged on parole, Mr. Willet drew back from his guest’s ear, and without any visible alteration of feature, chuckled thrice, audibly. The nearest approach to a laugh in which he ever indulged, (and that but seldom and only on extreme occasions,) never even curled his lip, or effected the smallest change in, no, not so much as a slight wagging of, his great, fat, double chin, which at these times, as at all others, remained a perfect desert in the broad map of his face; one changeless, dull, tremendous blank.

Lest it should be matter of surprise to any, that Mr. Willet adopted this bold course in opposition to one whom he had often entertained, and who had always paid his way at the Maypole gallantly, it may be remarked, that it was his very penetration and sagacity in this respect which occasioned him to indulge in those unusual demonstrations of jocularity, just now recorded. For Mr. Willet, after carefully balancing father and son in his mental scales, had arrived at the distinct conclusion that the old gentleman was a better sort of customer than the young one. Throwing his landlord into the same scale, which was already turned by this consideration, and heaping upon him, again, his strong desires to run counter to the unfortunate Joe, and his opposition as a general principle to all matters of love and matrimony, it went down to the very ground straightway, and sent the light cause of the younger gentleman flying upward to the ceiling. Mr. Chester was not the kind of a man to be by any means dim-sighted to Mr. Willet’s motives, but he thanked him as graciously as if he had been one of the most disinterested martyrs that ever shone on earth; and leaving him, with many complimentary reliances of his great taste and judgment, to prepare whatever dinner he might deem most fitting the occasion, bent his steps toward the Warren.

Dressed with more than his usual elegance; assuming a gracefulness of manner, which, though it was the result of long study, sat easily upon him and became him well; composing his features into their most serene and prepossessing expression; and settling in short that guard upon himself, at every point, which denoted that he attached no slight importance to the impression he was about to make, he entered the bounds of Miss Haredale’s usual walk. He had not gone far, or looked about him long, when he descried coming toward him, a female figure. A glimpse of the form and dress, as she crossed a little wooden bridge which lay between them, satisfied him that he had found her whom he desired to see. He threw himself in her way, and a very few paces brought them close together.

He raised his hat from his head, and, yielding the path, suffered her to pass him. Then, as if the idea had but that moment occurred to him, he turned hastily back and said in an agitated voice:

“I beg pardon—do I address Miss Haredale?”

She stopped in some confusion at being so unexpectedly accosted by a stranger; and answered, “Yes.”

“Something told me,” he said, looking a compliment to her beauty, “that it could be no other. Miss Haredale, I bear a name which is not unknown to you—which it is a pride, and yet a pain to me to know, sounds pleasantly in your ears. I am a man advanced in life, as you see. I am the father of him whom you honor and distinguish above all other men. May I, for weighty reasons which fill me with distress, beg but a minute’s conversation with you here?”

Who that was inexperienced in deceit, and had a frank and youthful heart, could doubt the speaker’s truth—could doubt it too, when the voice that spoke, was like the faint echo of one she knew so well, and so much loved to hear? She inclined her head, and stopping, cast her eyes upon the ground.

"A little more apart—among these trees. It is an old man's hand, Miss Haredale: an honest one, believe me." She put her's in it, as he said these words, and suffered him to lead her to a neighboring seat.

"You alarm me, sir," she said, in a low voice. "You are not the bearer of any ill news, I hope?"

"Of none that you anticipate," he answered, sitting down beside her. "Edward is well—quite well. It is of him I wish to speak, certainly; but I have no misfortune to communicate."

She bowed her head again, and made as though she would have begged him to proceed; but said nothing.

"I am sensible that I speak to you at a disadvantage, dear Miss Haredale. Believe me that I am not so forgetful of the feelings of my younger days, as not to know that you are little disposed to view me with favor. You have heard me described as cold-hearted, calculating, selfish—"

"I have never, sir," she interposed with an altered manner and a firmer voice; I have never heard you spoken of in harsh or disrespectful terms. You do a great wrong to Edward's nature, if you believe him capable of any mean or base proceeding."

"Pardon me, my sweet young lady, but your uncle—"

"Nor is it my uncle's nature, either," she replied with a heightened color in her cheek. "It is not his nature to stab in the dark, nor is it mine to love such deeds. Your suspicions are quite unfounded."

She rose as she spoke, and would have left him, but he detained her with a gentle hand, and besought her in such persuasive accents to hear him but another minute, that she was easily prevailed upon to comply, and to sit down again.

"And it is," said Mr. Chester, looking upward and apostrophizing the air; "it is this frank, ingenuous noble nature, Ned, that you can wound so lightly. Shame—shame upon you, boy."

She turned toward him quickly, and with a scornful look and flashing eyes. There were tears in Mr. Chester's, but he dashed them hurriedly away, as though unwilling that his weakness should be known, and regarded her with mingled admiration and compassion. "I never, until now," he said, "believed, that the frivolous actions of a young man could move me like those of my own son. I never knew till now, the worth of a woman's heart, which boys so lightly win, and lightly fling away. Trust me, dear young lady, that I never until now did know your worth; and though an abhorrence of deceit and falsehood has impelled me to seek you out, and would have done so had you been the poorest and least gifted of your sex, I should have lacked the fortitude to sustain this interview could I have pictured you to my imagination as you really are."

Oh! if Mrs. Varden could have seen the virtuous gentleman as he said these words with indignation sparkling from his eyes—if she could have heard his broken, quivering voice—if she could have beheld him as he stood bare-headed in the sunlight, and with unwonted energy poured forth his eloquence!

With a haughty face, but pale and trembling too, Emma regarded him in silence. She neither spoke nor moved, but gazed upon him, as though she would look into his heart.

"I throw off," said Mr. Chester, "the restraint which natural affection would impose on some men, and reject all bonds but those of truth and duty. Miss Haredale, you are deceived by your unworthy lover, and my unworthy son."

Still she looked at him steadily, and still said not one word.

"I have ever opposed his professions of love for you; you will do me the justice, dear Miss Haredale, to remember that. Your uncle and myself were enemies in early life, and if I had sought retaliation, I might have found it here. But as we grow older, we grow wiser—better, I would fain hope—and from the first, I have opposed him in this attempt. I foresaw the end, and would have spared you, if I could."

"Speak plainly, sir," she faltered. "You deceive me, or are deceived yourself—I do not believe you—I cannot—I will not."

"First," said Mr. Chester, soothingly,—"for there may be in your mind some latent angry feeling to which I would not appeal—pray take this letter. It reached my hands by chance, and by mistake, and should have accounted to you (as I am told) for my son's not answering some other note of yours. God forbid, Miss Haredale," said the good gentleman, with great emotion, "that there should be in your gentle breast one causeless ground of quarrel with him.—You should know, and you will see, that he was in no fault here."

There appeared something so very candid, so scrupulously honorable—so very truthful and just in this course—something which rendered the upright person who resorted to it worthy of belief—that Emma's heart, for the first time, sunk within her. She turned away, and burst into tears.

"I would," said Mr. Chester, leaning over her, and speaking in mild and quite venerable accents; "I would, dear girl, it were my task to banish, not increase, those tokens of your grief. My son, my erring son—I will not call him deliberately criminal in this—for men so young, who have been inconstant twice or thrice before, act without reflection, almost without a knowledge of the wrong they do—will break his plighted faith to you; has broken it even now—shall I stop here, and having giving you this warning, leave it to be fulfilled; or shall I go on?"

"You will go on, sir," she answered: "and speak more plainly yet, in justice both to him and me."

"My dear girl," said Mr. Chester, bending over her more affectionately still, "whom I would call my daughter, but the fates forbid, Edward seeks to break with you upon a false and most unwarrantable pretence. I have it on his own showing—in his own hand. Forgive me, if I have had a watch upon his conduct: I am his father; I had a regard for your peace and his honor, and no better resource was left me. There lies on his desk at this moment, ready for forwarding to you, a letter, in which he tells you that our poverty—our poverty, his and mine, Miss Haredale—forbids him to pursue his claim to your hand; in which he offers, voluntarily proposes, to free you from your pledge, and talks magnanimously (men do so, very commonly, in such cases,) of being in time more worthy of your regard, and so forth. A letter, to be plain, in which he not only jilts you—pardon the word: I would summon to your aid your pride and dignity—not only jilts you, I fear, in favor of the object whose slighting treatment first inspired his brief passion for yourself, and gave it birth in wounded vanity, but affects to make a merit and a virtue of the act."

She glanced proudly at him once more, as by an involuntary impulse, and with a swelling breast rejoined: "If what you say be true, he takes much needless trouble, sir, to compass his design. He is very tender of your peace of mind. I quite thank him."

"The truth of what I tell you, dear young lady," he replied, "you will test by the receipt or non-receipt of the letter of which I speak.—Haredale, my dear fellow, I am delighted to see you, although we meet under singular circumstances, and upon a melancholy occasion. I hope you are very well."

At these words the young lady raised her eyes, which were filled with tears; and seeing that her uncle indeed stood before them, and being quite unequal to the trial of hearing or of speaking one word more, hurriedly withdrew and left them. They stood looking at each other, and at her retreating figure, and for a long time neither of them spoke.

"What does this mean? Explain it," said Mr. Haredale, at length. "Why are you here, and why with her?"

"My dear friend," rejoined the other, resuming his accustomed manner with infinite readiness, and throwing himself upon the bench with a weary air, "you told me not very long ago, at that delightful old tavern of which you are the esteemed proprietor, (and a most charming establishment it is for persons of rural pursuits and in robust health who are not liable to take cold,) that I had the head and heart of an evil spirit in all matters of deception. I thought at that time, I really did think, you flattered me. But now I begin to wonder at your discernment, and, vanity apart, do honestly believe you spoke the truth. Did you ever counterfeited extreme ingenuousness and honest indignation? My dear fellow, you have no conception, if you never did, how faint the effort makes one."

Mr. Haredale surveyed him with a look of cold contempt. "You may evade an explanation for a time," he said, folding his arms. "I must have it, I can wait."

"Not at all. Not all, my good fellow. You shall not wait a moment," returned his friend, as he lazily crossed his legs. "The simplest thing in the world. It lies in a nutshell; Ned has written her a letter—a boyish, honest, sentimental composition, which remains as yet in his desk, because he has not had the heart to send it. I have taken a liberty, for which my parental affection and anxiety are a sufficient excuse, and possessed myself of the contents. I have described them to your niece (a most enchanting person, Haredale; quite an angelic creature) with a little coloring and description adapted to our purpose. It's done. You may be quite easy. It's all over. Deprived of their adherents and mediators, and her pride and jealousy roused to the utmost; with nobody to deceive her, and you to confirm me; you will find that their intercourse will close with her answer. If she receives Ned's letter by to-morrow noon, you may date their parting from to-morrow night. No thanks I beg; you owe me none. I have acted for myself, and if I have forwarded our compact with all the ardor even you could have desired, I have done so, selfishly, indeed."

"I curse the compact, as you call it, with my whole heart and soul," returned the other fiercely. "I have found my self to a lie; I have leagued myself with you; and though I did so with a righteous motive, and though it cost me such an effort as haply few men know, I hate and despise myself for the deed."

"You are very warm," said Mr. Chester, with a languid smile.

"I am warm, I am maddened by your coldness. Death! Chester, if your blood ran warmer in your veins, and there were no restraints upon me, such as those that hold and drag me back—well; it is done; you tell me so, and on such a point I may believe you. When I am most remorseful for this treachery, I will think of you and your marriage, and try to justify myself in such remembrances for having torn asunder Emma and your son, at any cost. Our bond is canceled, and we may part."

Mr. Chester kissed his hand gracefully; and with the same tranquil face he had preserved throughout—even when he had seen his companion so tortured and transported by his passion that his whole frame was shaken—lay in his lounging posture on the seat and watched him as he walked away.

"My scape-goat and my drudge at school," he said raising his head to look after him; "my friend of later days, who could not keep his mistress when he had won her, and threw me in her way to carry off the prize, I triumph in the present and the past. Bark on, ill-favored, ill-conditioned cur; fortune has ever been with me—I like to hear you."

The spot where they had met was in an avenue of trees. Mr. Haredale not passing out on either hand, had walked straight on. He chanced to turn his head when at some considerable distance, and seeing that his late companion had by that time risen and was looking after him, stood still as though he half-expected him to follow, and waited for his coming up.

"It may come to that one day, but not yet," said Mr. Chester, as he waved his hand, as though they were best of friends, and turned away. "Not yet, Haredale," he muttered to himself, "Life is pleasant enough to me; dull and full of heaviness to you. No. To cross swords with such a man—to indulge his humor unless upon extremity—would be weak indeed."

For all that he drew his sword as he walked along, and in an absent humor ran his eye from hilt to point full twenty times. But thoughtfulness begets wrinkles; remembering this, he soon put it up, smoothed his contracted brow, hummed a gay tune with greater gayety of manner, and was his unruffled self again.

CHAPTER XXX.

A homely proverb recognizes the existence of a troublesome class of persons, who, having an inch conceded them, will take an ell. Not to quote the illustrious examples of these heroic scourges of mankind whose amiable path in life has been, from birth to death, through blood, and fire, and ruin, and who would seem to have existed for no better purpose than to teach mankind that as the absence of pain is pleasure, so the earth, purged of their presence, may be deemed a blessed peace—not to quote such mighty instances, it will be sufficient to refer to old John Willet.

Old John having encroached a good standard inch, full measure, on the liberty of Joe, and having snipped off a Flemish ell in the matter of the patrol, grew so despotic and so great, that his thirst for conquest knew no bounds. The more young Joe submitted, the more absolute old John became. The ell soon faded into nothing. Yards, furlongs, miles, arose; trimming off an exuberance in this place, shearing away some liberty of speech or action in that, and conducting himself in his small way with as much high mightness and majesty, as the most glorious tyrant that ever had his statue reared in public ways, in ancient or modern times.

As great men are urged on to the abuse of power, (when they need urging, which is not often) by their flatterers and dependents, so old John was impelled to these exercises of authority by the applause and admiration of his Maypole cronies, who, in the intervals of their nightly pipes and pots, would shake their heads and say that Mr. Willet was a father of the good old English sort—that there was no new-fangled notions or modern ways in him—that he put them in mind of what their fathers were when they were boys—that there was no mistake about him—that it would be well for the country if there were more like him, and more was the pity that there were not—with many other original remarks of that nature. Then they would condescendingly give Joe to understand that it was all for his good, and he would be thankful for it one day; and in particular, Mr. Cobb would acquaint him, that when he was of his age, his father thought no more of giving him a paternal kick, or a box on the ears, or a cuff on the head, or some little admonition of that sort, than he did of any other ordinary duty of life; and he would further remark, with looks of great significance, that but for this judicious bringing up, he might never have been the man he was at that present speaking—which was probable enough, as he was, beyond all question, the dullest dog of the party. In short, between old John and old John's friends, there never was an unfortunate young fellow so bullied, badgered, worried, fretted, so constantly beset, or made so tired of life, as poor Joe Willet.

This had come to be the recognised and established state of things; but as John was very anxious to flourish his supremacy before the eyes of Mr. Chester, he did that day exceed himself, and did so goad and chafe his son and heir, that but for Joe's having made a solemn vow to keep his hands in his pockets when they were not otherwise engaged, it is impossible to say what he might have done with them. But the longest day has an end, and at length Mr. Chester came down stairs to mount his horse, which was ready at the door.

As old John was not in the way at the moment, Joe, who was sitting in the bar ruminating on his dismal fate and the manifold perfections of Dolly Varden, ran out to hold the guest's stirrup and assist him to mount. Mr. Chester was scarcely in the saddle, and Joe was in the act of making him a graceful bow, when old John came diving out of the porch, and collared him.

"None of that, sir," said John, "none of that, sir. No breaking of patrols. How dare you come out of the door, sir, without leave? You're trying to get away, sir, are you, and to make a traitor of yourself again? What do you mean, sir?"

"Let me go, father," said Joe, imploringly, as he marked the smile upon their visitor's face, and observed the pleasure his disgrace afforded him. "This is too bad. Who wants to get away?"

"Who wants to get away?" cried John, shaking him. "Why you do, sir, you do. You're the boy, sir," added John, collaring him with one hand, and aiding the effect of a farewell bow to the visitor with the other, "that wants to sneak into houses, and stir up difficulties between noble gentlemen and their sons, are you, eh? Hold your tongue, sir."

Joe made no effort to reply. It was the crowning circumstance of his degradation. He extricated himself from his father's grasp, darting an angry look at the departing guest, and returned into the house.

"But for her," thought Joe, as he threw his arms upon a table in the common room, and laid his head upon them, "but for Dolly, who I could not bear should think me the rascal they would make me out to be if I ran away, this house and I should part to-night."

It being evening by this time, Solomon Daisy, Tom Cobb, and Long-Parkes, were all in the common room too, and had from the window been witnesses of what had just occurred. Mr. Willet joining them soon afterwards, received the compliments of the company with great composure, and lighting his pipe, sat down among them.

"We'll see, gentlemen," said John, after a long pause, "who's the master of this house, and who is not. We'll see whether boys are to govern men, or men are to govern boys."

And quite right too," asserted Solomon Daisy, with some approving nods; "quite right, Johnny. Very good, Johnny, well said, Mr. Willet. Bravo, sir."

John slowly brought his eyes to bear upon him, looked at him for a long time, and finally made answer, to the great consternation of his hearers, "When I want encouragement from you, sir, I'll ask you for it. You let me alone, sir. I can get on without you, I hope. Do n't you tackle me, sir, if you please."

"Do n't take it ill, Johnny! I did n't mean any harm," pleaded the little man.

"Very good, sir," said John, more than usually obstinate after his late success. "Never mind, sir. I can stand pretty firm of myself, sir, without being shored up by you." And having given utterance to this retort, Mr. Willet fixed his eyes upon the boiler, and fell into a kind of tobacco-trance.

The spirit of the company being somewhat damped by this embarrassing line of conduct on the part of their host, nothing more was said for a long time; but at length Mr. Cobb took upon himself to remark, as he rose to knock the ashes out of his pipe, that he hoped Joe would henceforth learn to obey his father in all things; that he had found that day he was not one of the sort of men to be trifled with; and that he would recommend him, poetically speaking, to mind his eye for the future.

"I'd recommend you, in return," said Joe, looking up with a flushed face, "not to talk to me."

"Hold your tongue, sir," cried Mr. Willet, suddenly rousing himself, and turning round.

"I won't, father," cried Joe, smiting the table with his first, so that the jugs and glasses rung again; "these things are hard enough to bear from you; from any body else I never will endure them any more. Therefore I say, Mr. Cobb, do n't talk to me."

"Why, who are you," said Mr. Cobb, sneeringly, "that you're not to be talked to, eh, Joe?"

To which Joe returned no answer, but with a very ominous shake of the head, resumed his old position, which he would have peacefully preserved until the house shut up at night, but that Mr. Cobb, stimulated by the wonder of the company at the young man's presumption, retorted with sundry taunts, which proved too much for flesh and blood to bear. Crowding into one moment the vexation and the wrath of years, Joe started up, overturned the table, fell upon his long enemy, pummeled him with all his might and main, and finished by driving him with surprising swiftness against a heap of spittoons in one corner; plunging into which, head foremost, with a tremendous crash, he lay at full length among the ruins, stunned and motionless. Then, without waiting to receive the compliments of the bystanders on the victory he had won, he retreated to his own bed-chamber, and considering himself in a state of siege, piled all the portable furniture against the door, by way of barricade.

"I have done it now," said Joe, as he sat down upon his bedstead and wiped his heated face. "I knew it would come at last. The Maypole and I must part company—I'm a roving vagabond—She hates me for ever—it's all over!"

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 19, 1841.

THE FISCAL AGENCY BANK.

§3- Mr. EWING'S PLAN FOR A U. S. BANK does not seem to meet the approbation of that class of men who arrogate to themselves unerring wisdom, and who claim for themselves omnipotent influence, on all questions of public interest—the editors, namely, of party newspapers. It certainly was not to be supposed that any finite being could have submitted a plan palatable to both political parties—inasmuch as, during the present political millenium, each party man makes it a point of honor and conscience to oppose any measure—even a proposal to provide for the family of a deceased President—which originates with his political antagonist: but we think a reasonable expectation might have been formed, that a plan submitted by the leaders of the Administration would receive the support of the Administration party and the Administration editors, because, if for no better reason, the Opposition—leaders, editors, and all—would be certain to oppose it.

Unfortunately, such an expectation, however generally or reasonably entertained, has been disappointed. The Secretary of the Treasury has been as unhappy in his plan as the President was in his message—he has pleased nobody; at least, this would seem to be the fact, if the editors aforesaid are to be relied on as the organs of public opinion. In our judgment, however, they are not so to be relied on: they are, most emphatically, their own organs, and, what with bellows-blowing and fingering, they make a horrible din of it.

To our minds—and we beg to be understood as averring that although we have heard in private many coincident opinions, we still speak for ourselves alone—Mr. Ewing's proposition (allowing for such trifling modifications, &c. as would naturally occur in its passage through Congress,) comes about as near meeting public (not editorial) expectation, and the real wants of the people, as anything that the wit of man could well have devised. And we say this more confidently, not so much from our own impressions to that effect on reading the Bill, as from the fact that the elaborate strictures we have thus far read upon it are so purposeless, flippant and illogical.

One paper, for instance, assumes that the plan proposed would not meet the wants of the merchants—to which it might be answered, that the assumption is very likely to be false; and, if true, the wants of the merchants, as such, are not paramount to the wants of the Government. Another goes into heroics because the Secretary designates the District of Columbia as the proper location for the contemplated Bank—as if it were possible (with the consent of a majority of the Representatives in Congress,) to place it anywhere else; and, as if the branches in our large cities would not do the great portion of the business, and be, to all intents and purposes, the Bank.

The Bill itself, which is drawn with great labor and equal ability, occupies five columns of the Madisonian and of course we cannot copy it: beside, Mr. Ewing's communication to Congress, with which he introduces the Bill, is a perfect synopsis of the Bill itself, and from this we make the following extract:

"It is proposed that the affairs of the Bank be managed by seven directors, two of them to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and five to be elected by the stockholders at their annual meeting. A President to be chosen by the directors out of their own body.

That the branches be managed by not more than seven, nor less than five directors, two of them to be appointed by the States in which the branches may be situated, if such State be a stockholder, and the rest to be appointed by the directors of the Bank.

It is proposed that the Bank be the fiscal agent of the Government. That the public moneys be deposited in it; and when there, that they may be deemed and taken to be in the Treasury of the United States, and that the deposits be not removed except by law, and that the notes of the said bank be receivable in the payment of public dues, and that payments made by the Treasurer of the United States may be by checks on said Bank.

That the said Bank receive the funds of the United States; that it transmit them from one part of the Union to another, and distribute them for the payment of public creditors, and perform the duty of pension agent free of charge.

The ordinary powers and privileges of banking institutions being conferred upon it, and the ordinary liabilities and duties imposed in order to prevent over-banking, excessive issues, fluctuations in the price of stocks, and consequent speculations therein, and to secure the bill-holders and other creditors of the Bank from danger of loss, it is proposed—

To limit the dividend to six per cent. per annum, but if they fall short in any year, the deficiency, with interest thereon, to be afterward made good; and when a surplus accumulates exceeding one million, the excess to be passed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States.

That the amount of debts which it may at any time owe shall not exceed twenty millions over and above its deposits. That the debts at any time due to the Bank shall not exceed the amount of its capital and seventy-five per cent. thereon; and that when the amount of its bills in circulation shall exceed three times the amount of specie in its vaults, no new loan shall be made.

That it shall not deal in any thing except coin, bullion, promissory notes, and inland bills of exchange.

That it shall take no more than six per cent. upon loans. That it shall discount no promissory note, and purchase no bill of exchange which has more than one hundred and eighty days to run, nor make any loan for a longer time.

That no debt shall be renewed.

That it shall not at any time loan the United States more than three millions of dollars, nor any state more than one hundred thousand dollars, nor either for a longer term than a hundred and eighty days, unless authorised by law.

That it shall contract no debt for a longer term than one year.

That it shall issue no notes of a less denomination than ten dollars.

That the officers of the institution shall not be permitted to borrow money from, or contract any debt therein, in any manner whatever; a note or bill of which such officer, as maker, drawer, endorser, or acceptor, is forbidden to be discounted. The directors of the branches not to be considered officers within the meaning of this provision.

To prevent or expose any fraud or indirection in the management of the institution; to prevent, also, large and improper loans to individuals, to the injury of the stockholders and the public, and to prevent, likewise, false imputations when such irregularities do not exist, it is proposed that the books of the institution, including the accounts of all individuals therein, be at all times open to the inspection of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States; to a committee of either House of Congress; to each of the directors of the bank, and to a committee of the stockholders, with power to make public whatever they think fit."

The bill is divided into twenty-three sections, and the eleventh section contains twenty-four "rules, restrictions, limitations and provisions"—among which it is provided that the directors of the mother bank shall receive a reasonable compensation for their services; and also that "the total amount of debts which the said corporation shall at any time owe, whether by bond, bill, note, or other contract, over and above the debt or debts due for money deposited in the bank, shall not exceed the sum of twenty-five millions of dollars, unless the contracting of any greater debt shall have been previously authorised by law. In case of excess, the directors under whose administration it shall happen shall be liable for the same in their natural and private capacities; and an action of debt may, in such case, be brought against them, or any of them, their, or any of their heirs, executors, or administrators, in any court of record of the United States, by any creditor or creditors of the said corporation, and may be prosecuted to judgment and execution, any condition, covenant, or agreement, to the contrary notwithstanding; but this provision shall not be construed to exempt the said corporation, or the lands, tenements, goods, or chattels of the same, being also liable for, and chargeable with, the said excess," provided, however, that such director or directors as happened to be absent at the time such excess of debt was contracted—or protested (in a minority) against its creation—shall be exempted from the penalty."

Now, upon all this we have to remark that the powers here delegated and the restrictions here imposed are as near to what a bank should be—and what, to answer the emergency, it must be—as we can readily conceive. How far it will receive the sanction of the Representatives of the people, remains to be seen: and, of course, how far the plan itself, if carried out, will realise the expectations of those by whom it is proposed, experience, alone, can determine. We hope, at least, that the abolition storm may soon subside—that this and other measures of paramount importance may receive that consideration for which the present session was specially convened.

§3- Some of the Boston papers are quite certain that their city is the proper place for the location of a National Bank, should such an institution be established.

GENERAL BANKRUPT LAW.

§3- The prospects for the passage of the GENERAL BANKRUPT BILL were never so bright as at present. It has already passed through two readings in the Senate, and been referred to the appropriate Committee; and, although its introduction was at first opposed by Mr. Clay on the ground that it had not been included in the special objects of the session, and because he apprehended that it could not be passed in the short time to which the session was limited, that high-minded and honest Senator withdrew his opposition, and consented to the introduction of the bill, at the same time expressing himself decidedly in favor of it. Now, if the friends of the bill are energetic and push it forward, it will be made a law by a majority of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress. It is so difficult to get the House of Representatives to attend to any business, or to do anything but make fools of themselves, that we have our fears for the fate of the bill in that body; still they may be blessed with some symptoms of sanity, and pass the bill without knowing exactly what they are about. Mr. C. J. Ingersoll will doubtless move a reconsideration; but, with all their neglect of the national interests and personal quarrels, the representatives will hardly dare openly to defy and insult their constituents—the great majority of whom will rejoice in the passage of this bill.

The Providence Journal and some other Whig papers, who would never kick in the traces of party though pricked by red-hot spurs, and who seem to believe implicitly in the doctrine that "the President can do no wrong," visited us with their displeasure on account of the "clamor" which we made in consequence of Mr. Tyler's neglect to refer to the subject of this bill even by an allusion. This "clamor" has, it seems, been productive of pretty good effects. Mr. Walker, in speaking earnestly in behalf of the bill, after it had been introduced by Mr. Henderson, of Mississippi, said that it was looked to by the country as one of the most important objects of the session. It was his opinion that the bill had been so frequently and so fully discussed that it would take little time to pass it through all its stages. "The late Administration," he said, "owed its defeat, in no small degree, to their neglect of the public wish and interests in regard to this measure." This is precisely the substance of the "clamor" in the New World; we fully illustrated and established this fact. We proved that the country was carried for Harrison and Tyler by the votes of the Bankrupts—and that, without these votes, they never could have been chosen, great as their majority was. This was "pehaved at" by certain sapient Whigs; but "pshaw!" is no argument, though uttered by a politician. What we insisted upon is now acknowledged by an eminent Senator; it is declared to the country, and the country will respond to the truth of the declaration.

Mr. Van Buren never showed himself so little worthy of the reputation for shrewdness and foresight he had acquired as in his silent opposition to this bill. Never, without his consent, would it have been stifled in the House as it was by Mr. Pickens. The people knew this; his political friends knew it, and their indignation broke out at the ballot-boxes. The party-press, which had most warmly sustained his administration, were strong advocates for the bill: and yet, with a perversity that made us say of him "Whom God resolves to destroy he first makes mad," he caused the bill to be butchered by the warlike Pickens. The fact is, the President thrown himself so completely into the arms of the South, that he was smothered. Fearing to lose a single Southern partisan, he alienated the regard of all the Northern and Eastern States.

But it is unnecessary to dwell longer on this question. It was unfortunate that the bill ever was suffered to assume a partisan aspect; and, though it was a chief element in the triumph of the Whigs, we heartily trust that it will not pass by a party-vote—but that the Members of both Houses, who rightly consider the interest and wishes of their constituents, will vote for the bill, and do all in their power to accelerate its progress. It will be hailed as a second declaration of Independence.

THE DOINGS OF CONGRESS.—We have had it in mind to make a synopsis of the proceedings of Congress. We accordingly proceed to tell our readers what the Senate have done. On the ninth instant, Mr. Clay's bill, repealing the Sub-Treasury was passed by a strict party vote—Yeas 29, Nays 18. On the tenth, numerous memorials were presented in behalf of a General Bankrupt Law; also, of duties on Wines and Silks, and of a distribution of the proceeds of Public Lands. Mr. Clay introduced his bill for the distribution, and it received its first reading.

Mr. Henderson introduced a bill to establish a uniform system of Bankruptcy, which was read twice, referred to the Judiciary Committee, and ordered to be printed, after a debate of some length as to the propriety of action on this subject at the present session.

Mr. Rives introduced a resolution, previously noticed, to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs the parts of the President's Message relative to that subject. Here a very interesting debate took place in relation to the McLeod case, in which Messrs. Buchanan and Rives participated.

On the 11th the Senate spent the day in debating about the McLeod case. On the 14th the debate was continued. On the 15th the debate was continued, and Thomas Allen was, on the third ballot chosen Printer to the Senate by 27 Whig votes—the opposition Senators having withdrawn.

In the House of Representatives, Gales & Seaton have been elected printers. This House has been a fortnight in session and has literally done nothing at all. We shall not lend our paper to record their brawling and bragadocio speeches, or their contemptible quarrels. If Mr. John Quincy Adams and Mr. Henry A. Wise were turned out of the House there might be a chance to do something. They have been fighting in wordy warfare about the North and the South, slavery and abolition, since the commencement of the session. The whole time of the House has been spent in wrangling about the rules of the House and the vote by which all the rules of the former House were adopted as the rules of this, excepting the 21st, which laid all abolition petitions upon the table—has been reconsidered. The House now refuse to adopt those rules with or without the 21st—and they stand exactly where they stood at the commencement of the session, having literally effected nothing.

KILLING BY A CAB-DRIVER.—On Monday last an Irish laborer by name James Welsh, while scraping the street in Broadway, between Maiden Lane and Cortlandt street, was run over by a Cab and instantly killed. The driver of the cab, James F. Johnson, was arrested and committed to prison for examination. The daily papers elegantly observe that this driver was "under the influence of liquor." This means that he was beastly drunk. It is to be wished, for the sake of the warning, that the fellow may be brought in guilty of manslaughter in the first degree. His crime is one which deserves a punishment only short of that, which is awarded to one, adjudged guilty of murder. He knew perfectly well, if he was not too drunk to know any thing, that his furious driving through a thronged thoroughfare was exceedingly dangerous. It may be said in extenuation that he did only that which all of his class are doing with impunity every hour in the day. We refuse the excuse and confess the fact; and this is the point to which we wished to arrive.

There is no large city in the world, in which the street police is so miserably lax and inefficient, as in New York. One would think that a considerable portion of Broadway belonged in fee-simple to the drivers of omnibuses. They take their stand above and below Wall street, and, in one place, absolutely stop in succession and water their horses. Being huge, heavy vehicles, they are knocked against light carriages of all descriptions, sometimes carelessly, sometimes maliciously, to the imminent danger of all persons riding. Foot-passengers are regarded no more than the hogs, which run in droves about the streets; and we have often felt a cold thrill of horror at observing the deadly peril of ladies and children. The practice of racing is continued incessantly; and there is not a day in which we go from our office homeward, that we do not encounter a furious race between two or three omnibuses. The lash is plied to the poor jaded horses with the fury of demons; the lady-passengers and pedestrians are frightened nearly out of their wits, and the drunken vagabonds on the tops of the omnibuses shout and laugh and curse and riot in the impunity with which they can jeopard lives and set the laws at defiance.

The cabs are less given to racing with one another; but they also are driven with haste and fury. The drivers never seem to pay the slightest regard to people on the crossings, but pass the streets and turn the corners as if an open course were before them. It is a marvel that we do not hear of accidents, like the above, every day in the week.

It is high time that something should be done. A city like New York should never be without Police-offices continually patrolling the principal streets. A cordon of Constables should be placed from the Battery to Union Place: they are quite as requisite for the security of the citizens and the enforcement of the laws, as night watchmen.

DEATH OF WILLIS GAYLORD CLARK.—This event, for many months past anticipated by the friends of Mr. Clark, occurred on Saturday evening last. He died of consumption, and was thirty-two years of age. He has been, during the last five years of his life, editor and proprietor of the Philadelphia Gazette, an evening paper. Long before this period he was known extensively, and highly esteemed, as a poet. His verses have been printed with approbation in foreign periodicals as well as in our own. They are distinguished for their correctness of rhythm and the easy and elegant flow of the language. Mr. Clark had an active love of the beautiful in Art and Nature, and a keen appreciation of the humorous. His prose-writings exhibit the recreations of a versatile mind—which went, as it pleased, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe."

Mr. Clark contributed much to the entertainment of the readers of the Knickerbocker Magazine—under the able and efficient direction of his twin-brother—and there are few lovers of genuine pathos and fun who have not sorrowed and smiled over the now sombre, now cheerful pictures of OLLAROD. It is stated that the Messrs. Harper have in the press a volume of his remains—prose and poetry: we hope they will be accompanied by an appropriate memoir.

The press unite in cordial testimony to the worth of the deceased. His friend, the editor of the United States Gazette, thus concludes a touching memorial-paragraph:

Clark will be missed from our editorial ranks: his brilliant paragraphs, his peculiar style, his hearty commendation, and his literary worth, which made him admired, will not soon meet and combine in one. And then his love of his art, his strong attachments to the duties and services of an editor—to the last moment they were evident and operative; and when, only two days before his death, with all the strong impression that death was close at hand, as we concluded our last converse of things of time, he seemed for a moment to hang back from the consideration of higher subjects, that he might linger upon the pleasures of his beloved occupation; and he breathed, with failing voice, into our ear, something of earth that might connect him with the living, even when he should have passed away. And then he turned to the considerations that make for a glorious immortality beyond the grave. Of these latter it is not meet that we here speak; and yet it may be right to state as a result, that with a newness of spirit, and a hope in faithful promises, CLARK died a believing, a devout, a cheerful, hoping Christian.

THE REMAINS OF L. E. L.—From Mr. Laman Blanchard's new work, just published in England, and lately received by us, we this week present "The Triumph of Lucca," a tragedy. It abounds with beautiful poetry, and deep, genuine feeling. The story is thrillingly interesting, and it will richly reward perusal.

CREDIT OF CITIES.—The Connecticut House of Representatives, at its recent session, refused to pass the bill authorizing the City of Hartford to contract a loan for the benefit of the Hartford and Springfield Railroad Company. This refusal was caused by the opinions given by the Chief Justice of the State and another gentleman of high legal reputation, that the measure would be a violation of the Constitution of the State, which provides that the property of individuals shall not be taken for public purposes without an adequate remuneration. Contracting a city debt, the learned jurists contended, was taking the property of private citizens without compensation, and that the majority of the city could have no power thus to tax and take away any portion of the property of the minority. Upon these opinions some of the citizens of other cities which have contracted loans, intend to resist the payment of the taxes imposed in consequence.

The Musical World.

AS THE MUSICAL SEASON is drawing to a close, we will make a few remarks upon the success of the various artists who have, during its reign, put forth their claim to the patronage of the public. Mr. and Mrs. Wood, with Messrs. Leffler and Brough, were tolerably successful in their concerts, but their theatrical engagement must be considered as a positive failure. They came in fear and doubt, and left in anger and disgust. There were many and sufficient reasons for their failure: the current of public opinion was strong against them; cliques were formed to oppose them, and though the generosity of feeling so often exhibited by large masses toward individuals who seem to be oppressed by party, triumphed for a time, the old ill-feeling was not forgotten, and burst out with increased vigor on the first opportunity.

The veteran Braham has been equally unsuccessful in his theatrical speculation. Expectation was raised to an absurd height: the public thought to find in the old man of seventy the juvenility of appearance, and the strength and vigor of youth. They were disappointed, and but very few persons wish to hear him again, believing themselves to have been deceived by a false and inflated account of Mr. Braham's powers. His failure in the theatre was deserved, for he could not do what he professed. But in sacred music, had his success been equal to his merits, he would have filled the concert rooms night after night—for in that style he has stood alone for years, and even now there is no rival near his throne.

Mrs. Edward Loder, who made her debut at the same time with Mr. Braham, has won for herself the favorable opinion of the public. Her style and execution though formed on the best model and diligently cultivated, wants that dash or false glitter which attracts the marvel-seekers and misleads the judgment. But she will keep her ground and improve in public estimation, as her style becomes understood.

Mr. Herwig, a man of great talent—as a violinist certainly unequalled in the Union—has given several concerts with very indifferent success. The weather was uniformly against him, and talent not introduced by preparatory puffs, meet with but few friends. We hear that he intends to remain among us, and trust that his next endeavors will be crowned with success.

The Seguias, Miss Poole, Manvers and Giubilei, though forming together the best company that has visited New-York for many years, were decidedly unfortunate in their engagements. Cliques were formed against them by interested parties, and papers employed to write them down. The chief cause of their failure was their negligence in not producing novelty fast enough; and producing what they did in a careless and ineffective manner.

Mrs. Sutton, who was announced so loudly, did not meet with the triumph she expected. The public expected too much and was proportionately disappointed on hearing her. But Mrs. Sutton has merit, and has made a certain way with the public, and if she would turn a deaf ear to her flatterers, and appreciate herself more rightly, she would eventually hold a good position in her profession.

Summing up the whole, we find that the past season has been highly unsuccessful to the parties catering for the public entertainment. With regard to the music, the selection has been, with but few exceptions, little calculated to raise the standard of public taste, but we trust that the profession will join together next season, and give a series of concerts on such a scale as will be likely to forward this most desirable end.

The Literary World.

A SUMMER JOURNEY IN THE WEST: by Mrs. E. Cole, Author of Heroines of Sacred History: New York, John S. Taylor & Co. 1841.

The above work is such as might be expected from the author of that charming production, "Heroines of Sacred History." It will richly repay the expense and trouble of procuring and reading it. We commend it to all who love to contemplate our extensive and fertile country. To the tourist especially it will prove an invaluable companion.

For the following interesting Literary Intelligence, we are indebted to that excellently-edited paper, the Boston Times:

We are pleased to learn that Mr. Richard H. Dana, of this city, is preparing for the press a new and enlarged edition of his poems and miscellaneous writings, which will be published in the ensuing autumn, in two octavo volumes. Mr. Dana's writings have been for several years out of print, and their republication will gratify every one who can appreciate poetry and prose of the highest excellence.

A very important historical work has just been published in this city, entitled "The Chronicles of the Pilgrim Fathers of the Colony of Plymouth, from 1602 to 1625; now first collected from original records and contemporaneous printed documents, and illustrated with notes; by the Rev. Alexander Young." The value and interest of this work is greatly enhanced by the fact that it contains an authentic narrative of the origin and settlement of the colony, written at the time, by the first planters themselves. Mr. Young has recovered the most important part of Gov. Bradford's lost history of the Plymouth people, and has other documents written by Bradford and Winslow, some of which have never been printed, and others are wholly unknown in this country. The volume is embellished by an engraving, on steel, of Governor Edward Winslow, from an original portrait painted in 1651, by maps of Plymouth Harbor and Cape Cod, and by other illustrations.

Another work of similar character has appeared within a few days at Concord, N. H. It is entitled "The Early History of New-England," and was written by Rev. Henry White. The design of the author appears to have been to embody the interesting incidents relating to the settlement and early history of New-England—the causes which led to the emigration of our fathers, their privations in their voyage across the Atlantic, and their sufferings after their arrival—in a popular style, and in this he is said to have succeeded well. His book is particularly rich in anecdote and personal adventure.

Among the new London publications we notice "The Dramatic Works of Sir E. L. Bulwer," including "The Duchesse de la Valliere," "The Lady of Lyons," "Richelieu," and "Money;" to which are added three odes—one on the Death of Elizabeth, another on Cromwell, and the third on the Demise of Nelson. A long introduction is written to prove that where Sir Edward is not poetical in his plays, or where he is excessively dull, the author had some reason for it—that reason being, to render them fitter as acting plays. The author has omitted his play of "The Sea Captain," which he threatens to reconstruct.

Lea & Blanchard, of Philadelphia, have published a very entertaining and valuable work, entitled "Lives of the Queens of England, from the Norman Conquest; by Agnes Strickland"—in two duodecimo volumes. The well-known authoress has evinced great diligence in her researches into the early history of the Courts of England, and has interwoven with the dry details of mere narrative many incidents and sketches of character which give to her work much of the interest of Romance.

WILLIAM CROSBY & Co., of Boston, have published a second edition of "The Young Maiden, by A. B. Muzzey, author of the Young Man's Guide, Sunday School Friend, &c." 1 vol. duo., pp. 264.

JAMES LORING, of Boston, has published "The Lady of Refinement in Manners, Morals and Religion, by Mrs. Sandford, author of Woman in her Social and Domestic Character"—revised from the second London edition. 1 vol. duo., pp. 304.

DEAN AND TREVELL, NEW-YORK, have published an original work, illustrated with maps, entitled "The Science of Government, founded on Natural Law, by Clinton Rosevelt." 1 vol. duo., pp. 113.

VOICES OF THE NIGHT.—Professor Longfellow's poems have reached their fifth edition. They are wonderfully popular. We acknowledge, with pleasure, our receipt of this volume; it is exquisitely printed—quite equal to the best English editions. Such books are "a sight for sore een."

We wish that the author would get out a new volume, supplying it with the "Voices of the Night" only, and the pieces which he has since composed in the same vein. His "Earlier Poems" are wholly unworthy of his present powers, and his translations are, for the most part, in the same category. Mr. Longfellow could make a volume that would not only be popular, but excellent from first to last. (Published by John Owen, Cambridge, for sale by Appleton & Co. New York.)

CAREY AND HART, of Philadelphia, have issued a very neat and elegant edition of Campbell's Life of Petrarch, complete in one octavo volume of 444 pages. We read the work, several weeks since, in the English copy, forwarded to us by our London correspondent. It is vividly interesting—written in a lively, playful and polished style. We intend to make some pleasant extracts from it very soon and to give such a view of the work as cannot fail to recommend it to the libraries of literary people. Meantime the announcement of a new work by the author of Gertrude of Wyoming, and the Pleasures of Hope, is sufficient.

The Old World.

New-York, Friday morning, 7 o'clock.

EIGHT DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

BY THE COLUMBIA AT BOSTON.

Late and Important from China—Hostilities with the English recommenced—Political Agitation in England—Commercial Depression—News from all Nations.

The steamship Columbia, Capt. C. H. Judkins, arrived at Boston on Wednesday evening 16th at ½ past eight o'clock, or in 12 days and seven hours from Liverpool, of which she was detained five hours at Halifax, making her whole running time but two hours over twelve days.

H. A. Wells, Esq., comes out as bearer of despatches from our Minister in London to the Federal Government.

GREAT BRITAIN is convulsed with political and Corn-Law agitation. The debate on Sir Robert Peel's resolution of a want of confidence in Ministers had been continued through three sittings but not yet brought to a decision. Sir Robert led the attack, and was answered by such men as Macauley and Sir John Cam Hobhouse. The Tories did not seem eager to press the division; and indeed it is now quite apparent that Peel blundered in proposing a direct vote of want of confidence so soon. Even success will prove disastrous to him.

Lord Stanley has withdrawn his famous Registration bill. The Irish are wide awake for Repeal and Reform. Meetings of 10,000 to 100,000 are held almost daily. They will be out in their might at the coming Election.

The Anti-Corn-Law agitation and excitement increases daily throughout England. Immense meetings in favor of "Cheap Bread" are every where held. Their tone is energetic and confident.

The Chartists are as active as ever. The presentation of petitions in Parliament by Mr. T. Duncombe, from one million and three hundred thousand persons, was but the opening of the summer campaign.

The General Steam Navigation Co., intend establishing immediately a regular communication between London and New-York. A vessel is to start every fortnight from both cities, to carry the mails, light goods and passengers. Six first class steamships, of 1,200 tons each, are stated to be now in readiness.

FAVOR is tranquil. The ministry is negotiating an enormous loan to pay the expenses of their War frolic last year. The trial of Durnes and his confederates by the Peers had been concluded. Consider was acquitted, Duolos handed over to the tribunals, and Darnes sentenced to death. He refused to petition for mercy, and was executed on the 1st.

IMPORTANT FROM CHINA.

The overland Mail from India had reached London with intelligence that the Emperor had refused to ratify the Treaty made by Commissioner Keshen with Plenipotentiary Elliot. He further ordered Keshen to be sent in irons to Peking to answer for his truckling to the 'outer barbarians.' He will grant them no terms save on their abject submission, after having evacuated all their conquests! Upon this announcement, the British immediately took possession of the Bogue forts and the factory at Canton.

On the 22nd of April, Sir Gordon Bremer arrived at Calcutta from Canton, and, after a conference with the Governor General, reinforcements were forthwith ordered to proceed to China. So the affair at length assumes a serious aspect; and the next Mail will probably bring tidings of the capture or destruction of Canton. The war has now fairly begun.

Letters from Russia state, that with the beginning of the spring the hostility of the Circassians recommenced with increased violence. In one of their late attacks Major General Backuin, a much esteemed Russian officer was killed by a musket shot.

From our own Correspondent.

LONDON, Tuesday morning, June 3.

The Britannia steamer of the 15th May from Boston has not yet arrived, and is now four days over due. It is supposed she was detained for the result of the McLeod business on the 16th. The Roscoe, packet of 18th, and Montreal 10th, are in.

The No-Confidence-in-Ministers Debate was resumed last night, after the usual "Whitsuntide" recess—and was again adjourned—but no one doubts that a dissolution will be the result. Serjeant Talfourd opened the debate last night with an eloquent speech in favor of the Ministers.

IN CHINA hostilities have recommenced. On the 25th February the British troops took possession of the forts of Bogue, and of the Factory of Canton. The Emperor however had expressed his determination not to submit. Keshen had been disgraced and sent in irons to Peking. Reinforcements of troops were sent from India.

Admiral Parker has sailed in the Great Liverpool to take the command at Canton in the place of Elliott.

THE PRESIDENT—ONCE MORE.—The Lapwing, West India steam-packet, has arrived, with dates from 5th to 26th April, from the different islands, but no news of the President; so that the last hope from that quarter is cut off. The British Consul at Lisbon was so confident that the steamer seen by the Conde de Palma, was the President, that he has sent out two vessels in search of her.

P. S. June 3.—The Fortitude at Liverpool from Buenos Ayres, reports seeing on the 27th May a large steamer disabled and without funnel, in lat. 47 N., and long. 29, 30 W., steering N. E.; paddle boxes dark color; had square topsail and top gallant sail set; distant 10 miles. This made quite a sensation at Liverpool, and conjectures were divided—some thinking she was the President—others that she might be the Acadia which left Liverpool on the 19th, and was returning to port to refit. In either case it is supposed the Britannia might afterward have fallen in with the disabled ship and is detained in towing her to port.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The great "Charity-Children Anniversary" took place to-day at St. Paul's. The boys and girls of all the "parochial" schools, in their "parochial" uniform, exactly the same as it was two hundred years ago, headed by the parochial beadles, in laced coats and cocked hats, armed with brief authority and silver maces, were marched up to the great "meeting-house," and into a gigantic amphitheatre erected in the body of the house, under the great dome, where they listened to a sermon and sang several pieces of sacred music. The number of children was at least 8,000, and it was really an imposing and interesting scene. The concourse of spectators was immense.

You are aware that several Saints and Holy Days are observed in England which in "our" country are never heard of. Whitsuntide (the feast of the Pentecost) has just been celebrated, not exactly in the original manner, but by excursions of thousands and tens of thousands of holiday people—chiefly the "lower classes"—to the various cockney resorts—Richmond, Hampton Court, Greenwich, &c. The steamers on the Thames have been crowded with live stock, as thickly stowed as bales of cotton. Several were treated with a bath, gratis, and three or four, at least, were drowned. On Whitmonday it is said that there were 50,000 Londoners at Greenwich; and the same day more than 250 large open vans passed along Hyde Park, filled with men, women, boys and girls—black spirits and white, red spirits and gray—on their way to Hampton Court—on temperance principles.

There were also processions of the Roman Catholic teetotalers—armed with banners, green scarfs, and poles with a gilt cross—making quite a display. In the evening a meeting of the British Foreign Temperance Society—5,000,000 persons had signed Father Mathew's pledge in Ireland—although the movement there was opposed by the Church, because it had a Papal origin. Distilleries and breweries were in a decline, and Life Insurance Companies had lowered their premiums on tee-total applicants. If father Mathew could conquer John Bull's propensities for porter, ale, and "alf and 'alf"—to say nothing of wine—he would certainly achieve a reputation.

You've read Miss Edgeworth's Juveniles in days of yore, and know what the Eton Mortem is—one of those absurd and elaborate pieces of mummery which have been kept up by "annual custom" for nobody knows how many hundred years—the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Eton College, near Windsor, is a very ancient higher-class of school, preparatory for Oxford and Cambridge. A good many of the pupils are noblemen's sons, but there are many others; and some "on the foundation"—i. e. educated by a fund provided by some worthy person in olden time; and altogether it is a very aristocratic and respectable institution at which such men as Wellington and Peel are proud to have mastered the rudiments. Well, this "Mortem" is a parade got up every three years—on "White-Tuesday," and I had a chance to see the show yesterday. The boys, about 400 in number, were all handsomely dressed in military or fancy costumes—some in red coats, as the army—some in blue, as the navy—and then Greeks, Highlanders, Circassians, etc.; with specimens of old costume temps Elizabeth, Charles II, &c. These dresses were of velvet and satin, richly laced, and many of them were really splendid. The Mortem consists in the marching of these costumes (with the boys in them) from the College to a bit of a mound, called "Salt Hill," about two miles off, where the "Captain" gets on the top and waives a flag, with prodigious energy, for about a quarter of an hour—this was all the fun that was to be seen; but the most important part of the operation was the levying of black mail on the spectators—the "salt-duty," as they choose to call it.

Ten or a dozen of the Etonians, in all their finery, cruise about the grounds, and the town, and the railroad station, politely offering a little green ticket in Latin, for which they expect you to deposit coins in a bag which they carry for that purpose—sovereigns or shillings, as you please—but something you must. These tickets must then be displayed as badges on your hat, or you will be again waylaid. Every body who comes within five miles of Windsor during the day must pay toll—and there could not have been less than 15,000 persons there yesterday. One train from London carried 1900. The queen, Prince Albert, Lord Melbourne and a string of carriages a mile long were on the ground—and it would all have been very nice if they had had any thing to see—but it was as pretty a specimen of much ado about nothing as I have ever fell in with. Even the Queen looked cross. A very free display might have been made in the great Park—but that would not be following the "custom." How many absurdities are cloaked under this dogged respect of John Bull for what his father has done before him.

The levy on this occasion is variously reported at from £1800 to £3000, and this sum, after paying for a supper, goes to the "Captain," or first prize boy, to send him through Cambridge.

The Epsom Races last week were apparently of the utmost importance to all the world. A stranger would naturally suppose that the fate of the nation was at stake, with such eager and solemn interest did every body talk of the "Derby Day," and "The Oaks."

At the newspaper offices a large bulletin announces something important "By Special Express"—and you rush eagerly for a paper, supposing that at least the Dutch have taken Holland, or that the President has arrived—when lo! you are greeted with large capitals, indicating to the admiring world, which is trembling on the tip-toe of expectation, "The Results of the Derby!" Horse-racing may be very nice sport—especially when the snug sum of £3,500 is pocketed for a "single heat," won by a yard's length—but the universal gravity of interest which is taken in such matters—in England, is to me absolutely ludicrous. There is scarcely a grocer's counter-jumper in London that would n't run from Mile End to Piccadilly without his dinner, to get the first news of "the Oaks," and whether the winner was Col. Bulkley's Corsair, or my Lord Westminster's Van Amburgh.

A crowd assembled on Tuesday afternoon at the entrance to the House of Commons, to witness the arrival of the huge Chartist petition with 1,300,000 signatures, which was borne by the working men in procession. Shortly after four o'clock the procession appeared, headed by some well-known Chartist leaders. The petition was carried on the shoulders of eight sturdy men, in fustian jackets. Arrived at the iron gate, a message was sent to Mr. Thomas Duncombe, who had agreed to present it. An answer was sent down analogous to the formula within doors, "Please to bring it up." The lobbies were crowded, several Members running to see the monstrous document. Finally it was received by Mr. Duncombe and Mr. O'Connell: who managed, with some difficulty, to roll it into the awful presence of the speaker.

The copyright of Waverley expires next year, and that of the other novels of Scott will "run out" gradually in the order they were written. The Trustees of the estate have already anticipated competition, by issuing cheap editions of Waverley, Guy Mannering and the Lives of the Novelists. The number of rival editions of the Poems—now nearly all public property, is almost incredible—some for ten-pence a copy.

Clare, the Northampton Poet, is confined in a Lunatic Asylum. A subscription has been made for his family—a wife and five children, whose extreme poverty was the probable cause of the Poet's aberration of mind.

A couple of curious relics were sold recently at auction: first; the deed of the house in Blackfriars, purchased by Shakspeare March 10, 1612, containing Shakspeare's autograph—one of the five which are known to exist. This deed sold for £65—which is nearly as much as Shakspeare paid for the property. It was knocked down to a bookseller, and is now advertised for sale at £200. The other was a goblet made of Shakspeare's mulberry tree.

A petition for the release of the Chartist prisoners, signed by 1,348,000 persons, was presented in the Commons by T. S. Duncombe. The vote on the question proved a tie—48 to 48—and was decided by the Speaker against the petitioners.

THE TEXAS LOAN was received with such distrust in Paris that Lafitte was compelled to withdraw it.

The Prince de Joinville has sailed in the Belle-Poule, for the two-fold purpose of protecting the French whalers on the Banks of Newfoundland, and of prosecuting "his suit with the Princess Sophia of Holland, aged 17."

The Duchess of Kent has gone on a visit to Germany with her sister and niece, the Princess of Leiningen. The Queen and Prince Albert went down to Woolwich to "see them off."

Lord John Russell is to be nominated as candidate for M. P. for London, in case of a dissolution of Parliament.

The French Government have advertised for a loan of 450,000,000 of francs.

26,073 tons of beet-root sugar, were produced last year in France, on which the duty was £110,000.

The Paris and Reuen Railway is going on rapidly and a large number of English workmen are upon it.

There are 71 lines of railway in Great Britain and Ireland, forming a total length of 2,191 miles. Of these, 53 are opened, 18 partially, and 10 not yet opened.

The Berlin and Dresden railroad is nearly finished, and the distance may now be traversed in 12 hours.

On the "Mortem" day I came from Slough to Paddington, 18 miles, in 25 minutes—or at the rate of 40 miles an hour—on the Great Western Railway.

The 70th birth-day of Robert Owen, "the philanthropist" and infidel, was celebrated by a dinner, tea and ball, at Highbury. 1200 Socialists were present, and Socialism and its progress was the theme of the speeches.

DARNES, the French would-be regicide, after a trial at the Chamber of Peers, was guillotined on the 31st. There was no previous notice of the time of execution and very few present. The event made no sensation in Paris.

POSTSCRIPT.

THURSDAY, JUNE 3—6 P. M.

The report of the Fortitude of a disabled steamer is the chief topic in the city to-day—and the impression gains ground that it is the President.

Money is rather in good demand at the rate of 5 per cent. Stocks are steady. Consols for Money 89½ to 90—and for Account 90½ to 90¾.

The overland mail from India, brings accounts of the renewal of all the troubles in China. Elliott had been completely bamboozled and was at last "setting to work" again against the Celestials. An American gentleman just from China, says that Canton is doomed to flames, for there are 200,000 Chinese there starving for the want of employment, who will certainly burn the city if the English do not.

No other news to-day. Nothing of the Britannia.

Yours,

X. Y. Z.

Latest Intelligence.

ACCIDENT ON THE NORWICH RAILROAD.—On Friday evening the 11th inst., as the train for New York was passing over the Norwich road, when about 25 miles from that place, the axle-tree of the Engine broke, and for some moments the engineer and firemen found it impossible to stop the train. After proceeding some distance, the engine ran off the track, plunged down a precipice of some 15 feet, carrying with it the tender and baggage cars; the ladies' car was also thrown off, but with slight injury. The engineman was the only person injured, and he was not very seriously so; the passengers all escaped unhurt.

A correspondent, who was in the cars at the time speaks in the highest terms of the coolness of the engineer and superintendent, to whose exertions is the safety of the passengers solely to be attributed. Great credit is also due to Mr. Rowe, (of Adams's Express,) and to various others connected with the road, for the measures they took to remove the cars from the track, and to forward the passengers, by an extra train, to Norwich.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT.—We learn from the Barnstable Patriot, that an interesting child of Mr. Isaac S. Gross of Truro, was scalded to death in a most shocking manner about five weeks since. A tub containing boiling hot water was left standing upon the floor by a person who was engaged in washing, who had left the room for the purpose of obtaining more water from a well near by. The child was playing with another little girl near the tub, and in her heedlessness fell backward into the tub, and became immersed up to her neck in the boiling hot water. Her mother, who was not far off, attracted by the screams of the little sufferer, ran and immediately took the child out of the water. Assistance was procured, but no relief could be afforded, she lingered about six hours in the most excruciating agony when she expired.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT.—Mr. George Simson, 5th Engineer of the Steamship Acadia, fell overboard at about 1 o'clock on Sunday morning last, from Cunard's wharf, Boston, and was drowned. His cap was seen floating in the dock on Sunday afternoon, at 5 P. M., which was the first intimation to those on board of his being missing. Grappling irons were immediately used, and his body found under the paddle wheel, with his arms around a post of the wharf. An inquest was held by the Coroner, and the verdict was accidental drowning. Mr. Simson was a native of Edinburgh, Scotland, and only 24 years of age.

PROBABLE PIRACY.—By a letter received by Messrs. Cobb & Warner of this city, dated Mobile 7th June, we learn that the ship Charles Gorham of Bath, which cleared from New Orleans for Bordeaux, on the 31st May, with twenty-three passengers, was found abandoned, with all sails set, about fifteen miles off the Balize. Blood was discovered in her cabin and on deck. The sailors' chests were missing. She carried three boats, two of which were gone and the other was picked up ten miles astern also having marks of blood. The news came from New Orleans by the mail boat. The ship is reported to have had specie on board. This would appear to be a confirmation of the reports that there are pirates afloat in the neighborhood of the mouth of the Mississippi.

ATROCIOUS MURDER.—The Columbus (Ohio) Statesman gives an account of a diabolical murder committed in one of the workshops of the Ohio Penitentiary, on the morning of the 9th inst. Mr. Cyrus Sells, a young man employed in the prison as a guard, while combing his hair, was struck on the head from behind with a small hand axe by a convict named James Clark, and instantly killed.

The first blow deprived him of life, but the wretched miscreant repeated until his head was nearly severed from his body. Another convict, who attempted to interfere, had a most miraculous escape, as the fiend Clarke aimed a blow at him with the axe. This murder had apparently been deliberately planned, and was perpetrated for the sake of revenging himself for some castigation he had received at the hands of Sells.

SHOCKING MURDER.—The Philadelphia Inquirer contains an account of a most brutal murder perpetrated in Reading, Pa., on the 8th inst. It seems that an old gentleman had lived for some time in a house alone, keeping by him some $500 which he had amassed. He was found dead on the floor of his house, his forehead and skull broken in, evidently by means of an iron hook taken from the chimney. A gun belonging to him was taken and sold some three miles from the house. The murderers are supposed to be two Germans, for whose apprehension a reward has been offered.

A singular case is being tried at New-Orleans. It seems that the wife of one St. Martin had for some time been greatly alarmed by noises at the door of her house. Two men, Miel, a Frenchman, and McCoy, an American, were flat-boatmen, and rapped at St. Martin's door to get some fire; the wife was terrified and cried "murder;" her husband, who had just gone out, returned, seized his gun and shot both the men. The question how far he is responsible for this act is now before the Court.

STEAMBOAT DISASTER.—The Charleston Courier of the 19th, says that a letter was received at that city on the 9th, from Hamburg, dated 8th inst, which states that the steamer Duncan McKee, on her way up, was blown up four miles below Johnson's Landing, on the Savannah river, and sunk in 12 feet water, ten minutes after the accident. Two firemen were sadly injured—they will not live. The cargo, except a little flour, is said to be a total loss. The letter contains no other particulars.

TERRIBLE FIRE.—On the 3d inst. a the dwelling house of Mr. Archibald Turner. The building with its furniture and entire contents was burned to the ground, and his eldest son, a fine lad about ten years old, perished in the flames. His aged mother was also badly injured that she expired the next day.

THE ST. LOUIS MURDERERS.—Madison, Brown, Seward, and Warrick—were to be executed on the 9th of July.

FROM JAMAICA.—By the schr. Cyrus, Capt. Howard, we have Jamaica papers to the 27th ult.

After a long drought, the earth had been refreshed with rain, which had much revived the hopes of the husbandman.

There was a general complaint of hard times, but whether the cause was to be found in the act of emancipation, or was attributable to some other influence, could not be so readily determined.

The ship Hector arrived at Kingston on the 26th ult., 30 days from Sierra Leone, Africa, with 267 colored emigrants, 179 of whom were liberated Africans, 64 Maroons. The ship Elizabeth, with 182 emigrants, left Sierra Leone on the 11th of April, for the Island of Trinidad. When the Hector left, the Governor of Sierra Leone, Sir John Jeremie, was dangerously ill. Accounts had reached that settlement from Dr. Madden, stating that since his arrival on the African coast he had suffered severely from sickness, in consequence of which he contemplated an immediate return to England. The Hector left at Sierra Leone the ship Superior, sent out from London to take what emigrants might offer, for Demerara.

FROM THE WEST INDIES.—Advices from Jamaica to the 28th ult. represent the agricultural prospects in Barbadoes as highly flattering. A bill had passed the Legislature of Dominica laying a duty of one per cent. on all imports and exports to make roads, and another to raise £10,000 for paying off the Government loan. The Governor General refused his assent to both these bills. A member of the House was attacked by the Court of Common Pleas for non-attendance as a juror. That body tried to punish the marshal for a breach of privilege, but finally voted that it could not interfere with the doings of a Court. Two vessels had arrived at Jamaica with 267 immigrants from Sierra Leone. Dr. Madden had suffered severely from sickness, and was about to leave the African coast for England.

Dr. Eldridge was released on Saturday by entering into a recognizance of $1,000 in his own name. He at first refused compliance with this requisition of the Court and only assented at the desire of his friends. The Counsel for the prosecution state that it is their intention again to put him upon trial. It is our belief that the Court will not consent to this in any event.

Those who are now subscribers will be entitled to the work by remitting the same amount, to be credited on their present subscription.

THE NEW WORLD.

A New Enlarged Quarto Volume.
COMMENCING THE FIRST WEEK IN JULY.

The Third Volume of the QUARTO form of the NEW WORLD will commence on the 3d of July, when it will be much enlarged, and four columns given on each page, instead of three, making sixty-four columns of choice reading, without any increase in the price. New Volumes will always begin on the 1st of July and 1st of January, making two in each year, of 416 pages each, to which a handsome Title-Page and a copious Index will be given.

The NEW WORLD studiously avoids all party politics, and is conducted on the principles of the strictest morality. No profane or improper jest, no vulgar allusion, no irreligious sentiment, is allowed to soil its pages. Reverence of God and respect to Man govern it always. The rule of the Editor is never to publish a line which he would hesitate to read aloud in the hearing of virtuous and intelligent females. Thus the NEW WORLD is made an unexceptionable Family Newspaper, and is earnestly recommended to the regard of every friend of a pure literature, as well as of correct morals and the public good.

CHARLES O'MALLEY was commenced in an Extra on the 22d of May, and will hereafter appear first in the columns of this paper. It also publishes 'Barabaz Rudge' and 'Ten Thousand A-Year.'

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Three Dollars a year—Two copies one year, or one copy two years, for Five Dollars—payment always in advance. All remittances must be in current funds, and either post-paid or free.

A copy of Sears' Pictorial Illustrations of the Bible will be given to every person who pays $6 for two years in advance, or shall obtain for the NEW WORLD two new subscribers.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The Publisher of the THE NEW WORLD announces that he has made an arrangement with the Publisher of the BOSTON NOTION, by which, all those who wish to subscribe for the Boston Notion and The New World together, can have both Journals for one year on paying or remitting, postage-free, $5 in advance. As the two papers do not publish the same stories in continuation, and, as they will endeavor to avoid issuing the same matter, it is thought that this arrangement will be acceptable to those who would like to take in two periodicals whose ample dimensions enable them to contain all the good floating popular literature of the day.

Remittances to be made in current bills to GEORGE ROBERTS, State street, Boston—or to J. WINCHESTER, 30 Ann street, New-York.

Stephens's New Work.

CENTRAL AMERICA.*

No American author, in modern days, has been more successful than Mr. John L. Stephens. His "Incidents of Travel" in the Old World were received with sudden and universal favor. They still command the popularity which they so readily won. They have gone through edition after edition, and are at this moment eagerly demanded by the booksellers all over the Union.

When it was announced that Mr. Stephens had been appointed to a special confidential mission by President Van Buren, and that his destination was Central America, the announcement was received with satisfaction by men of both political parties. His personal popularity is deservedly great, and his books had produced a favorable public impression. The general reader anticipated much pleasure from the records of his exploration of regions which had just begun to excite interest and marvel; and men of learning looked with anxiety toward the valuable contributions which the researches of so accomplished a student would not fail to add to the treasury of science. Both classes are at length to be gratified in the production of the work before us. It is much more extensive and particular than we had a right to expect from the time of the author's absence; and we cannot but exclaim in admiration of the amount of labor accomplished by him and his fellow-traveller, Mr. Catherwood. They were gone but a little more than ten months from New-York—and yet, in this time they not only went through incredible fatigues in travelling, but faithfully explored the ruins of several ancient cities. Mr. Catherwood, an artist highly esteemed and of wide reputation in the United States, was engaged by Mr. Stephens to accompany him on his expedition, and to take drawings of those objects of art which might be judged worthy. That he faithfully executed his task, these volumes bear abundant evidence. The drawings are numerous and beautiful, and exhibit marks of the nicest care and accuracy. Some are engraved on steel; some engraved on stone, and some on wood. Their execution reflects great credit upon the artists engaged, and gives to the book a value, which is only inferior to that imparted by the happy pen of the author.

The two volumes are printed elegantly on fair, white paper in two royal octavos of some 450 pages each. In England such books, with embellishments so costly, would be sold at a price that would amount to a prohibition for people in moderate circumstances. Here they are afforded for a sum which can be expended for the purposes of entertainment and instruction, by the great majority of intelligent people, without inconvenience.

Mr. Stephens, accompanied by Mr. Catherwood, embarked in New-York for the Bay of Honduras on the 3d day of October, 1839. It is by no means our intention to follow him closely in his travels. This would be impossible without stretching this article to an unconscionable length; but we have stated the above fact by way of furnishing the reader with a point of time and a place of departure. All that can be expected of us is to give the reader such intimations of our traveller's whereabouts as to make him fully comprehend the extracts we are about to offer, and to enjoy some substantial foretastes of the rich feast, which is now spread before him. The book was published yesterday; and we earnestly advise all our readers not to let many days pass away without providing themselves with so copious a fund of delightful recreation. We have seldom sat down to a richer intellectual banquet, and have never risen up more perfectly satisfied with our repast. Intellectual epicures that are disposed to skepticism, had better taste the tit-bits we are about to cut for them before offering any decided opinion. The chief value of the book doubtless consists in the results of Mr. Stephens's antiquarian researches—but, as these are matters to be pondered—not to be taken up lightly for the moment—we shall offer but few specimens; preferring rather to gratify the general reader by scraps of adventure that are quite as delicious as if, instead of being real, they were pure inventions of our agreeable traveller.

In thirty days Mr. Stephens was at Balize. Hence, after being treated with great attention during a brief sojourn, he departed in search of the Government of Central America, which was then—to use an expressive Yankee word—in a very unlocated condition. It might have been called a government in transitu—it was passing from Federalism to Anarchy. There were flags hoisted and guns fired on Mr. Stephens's departure from Balize. He was in a steamboat that had been placed by the authorities under his direction; and his only travelling companions were Mr. Catherwood, a Roman Catholic Priest on his way to Guatemala, and his servant, a French Spaniard, by the name of Augustin. Their course lay nearly South, directly along the coast of Honduras.

A BAPTISM.

"In his last voyage Columbus discovered this part of the Continent of America, but its verdant beauties could not win him to the shore. Without landing, he continued on to the Isthmus of Darien, in search of that passage to India which was the aim of all his hopes, but which it was destined he should never see.

"Steamboats have destroyed some of the most pleasing illusions of my life. I was hurried up the Hellespont, past Sestos and Abydos, and the Plain of Troy, under the clatter of a steam-engine; and it struck at the root of all the romance connected with the adventures of Columbus to follow in his track, accompanied by the clamor of the same panting monster. Nevertheless, it was very pleasant. We sat down under an awning; the sun was intensely hot, but we were sheltered, and had a refreshing breeze. The coast assumed an appearance of grandeur and beauty that realized my ideas of tropical regions. There was a dense forest to the water's edge. Beyond were lofty mountains, covered to their tops with perpetual green, some isolated, and others running off in ranges, higher and higher, till they were lost in the clouds.

"At eleven o'clock we came in sight of Puente Gorda, a settlement of Carib Indians, about a hundred and fifty miles down the coast, and the first place at which I had directed the captain to stop. As we approached we saw an opening on the water's edge, with a range of low houses, reminding me of a clearing in our forests at home. It was but a speck on the great line of coast; on both sides were primeval trees. Behind towered an extraordinary mountain, apparently broken into two, like the back of a two-humped camel. As the steamboat turned in, where steamboat had never been before, the whole village was in commotion: women and children were running on the bank, and four men descended to the water and came off in a canoe to meet us.

Our fellow-passenger, the padre, during his residence at Balize, had become acquainted with many of the Caribs, and, upon one occasion, by invitation from its chief, had visited a settlement for the purpose of marrying and baptizing the inhabitants. He asked whether we had any objection to his taking advantage of the opportunity to do the same here; and, as we had none, at the moment of disembarking he appeared on deck with a large wash-hand basin in one hand, and a well-filled pocket-handkerchief in the other, containing his priestly vestments.

"We anchored a short distance from the beach, and went ashore in the small boat. We landed at the foot of a bank about twenty feet high, and, ascending to the top, came at once, under a burning sun, into all the richness of tropical vegetation. Beside cotton and rice, the cahoon, banana, coconut, pineapple, orange, lemon, and plantain, with many other fruits which we did not know even by name, were growing with such luxuriance that at first their very fragrance was oppressive. Under the shade of these trees most of the inhabitants were gathered, and the padre immediately gave notice, in a wholesale way, that he had come to marry and baptize them. After a short consultation, a house was selected for the performance of the ceremonies, and Mr. Catherwood and I, under the guidance of a Carib, who had picked up a little English in his canoe expeditions to Balize, walked through the settlement.

"It consisted of about five hundred inhabitants. Their native place was on the seacoast, below Truxillo, within the government of Central America; and having taken an active part against Morazan, when his party became dominant they fled to this place, being within the limits of the British authority. Though living apart, as a tribe of Caribs, not mingling their blood with that of their conquerors, they were completely civilized; retaining, however, the Indian passion for beads and ornaments. The houses or huts were built of poles about an inch thick, set upright in the ground, tied together with bark strings, and thatched with coroon leaves. Some had partitions and bedsteads made of the same materials; in every house were a grass hammock and a figure of the Virgin or of some tutelary saint; and we were exceedingly struck with the great progress made in civilization by these descendants of cannibals, the fiercest of all the Indian tribes whom the Spaniards encountered.

The houses extended along the bank, at some distance apart; and the heat was so oppressive that, before reaching the last, we were about to turn back; but our guide urged us to go on and see "one old woman," his grandmother. We followed and saw her. She was very old; no one knew her age, but it was considerably over a hundred; and, what gave her more interest in our eyes than the circumstance of her being the grandmother of our guide, she came from the island of St. Vincent, the residence of the most indomitable portion of her race; and she had never been baptized. She received us with an idiotic laugh; her figure was shrunken; her face shrivelled, weakened, and wrinkled; and she looked as though, in her youth, she had gloried in dancing at a feast of human flesh.

We returned, and found our friend, the padre, dressed in the contents of his pocket-handkerchief, quite a respectable looking priest. By his side was our steamboat washbowl, filled with holy water, and in his hand a prayer-book. Augustine stood up, holding the stump of a tallow candle.

The Caribs, like most of the other Indians of Central America, have received the doctrines of Christianity as presented to them by the priests and monks of Spain, and are, in all things, strict observers of the forms prescribed. In this settlement, the visit of a padre was a rare but welcome occurrence. At first they seemed to have a suspicion that our friend was not orthodox, because he did not speak Spanish; but when they saw him in his gown and surplice, with the burning incense, all distrust vanished.

There was little to be done in the way of marrying, there being a scarcity of men for that purpose, as most of them were away fishing or at work; but a long file of women presented themselves, each with a child in her arms, for baptism. They were arranged around the wall in a circle, and the padre began. Of the first he asked a question which I believe is not to be found in the book, and which, in some places, it would be considered impertinent to put to a mother who offered her child for initiation into the Church, viz., whether she was married. She hesitated, smiled, laughed, and answered no. The padre told her that this was very wrong and unbecoming a good Christian woman, and advised her to take advantage of the present opportunity to marry the child's father. She answered that she would like to do so, but that he was away cutting mahogany; and here, as his questions and her answers had to pass through an interpreter, the affair began to be complicated; indeed, so many of the women interposed, all speaking at once, that the padre became aware he had touched upon delicate ground, and so passed on to the next.

In fact, even with the regular business our friend had enough to do. He understood but little Spanish; his book was in Latin; and not being able to translate as readily as the occasion required, he had employed the interval of our absence in copying on a slip of paper, from a Spanish Protestant prayer-book, the formal part of the baptismal service. In the confusion this was lost, and the padre was thrown back upon his Latin, to be translated into Spanish as required. After laboring a while, he turned to Augustine, and gave him in English the questions to put to the women. Augustine was a good Catholic, and listened to him with as much respect as if he had been the pope, but did not understand a word he said. I explained to Augustine in French, who explained to one of the men in Spanish, who explained to the women. This, of course, led to confusion; but all were so devout and respectful, that, in spite of these tribulations, the ceremony was solemn. When he came to the Agua Santa, our friend rattled it off as fast as if fresh from the Propaganda at Rome, and the Caribs were not much behindhand.

The padre had told us of the passion of the Caribs for a multiplicity of names; and one of the women, after giving her child three or four, pointed to me, and told him to add mine. I am not very strict, but I did not care to assume wantonly the obligations of a god-father; and, stopping the ceremony, begged the padre to get me released with the best grace he could. He promised to do so; but it was an excessively hot day; the room was crowded, the doors choked up, and by this time the padre, with his Latin, and English, and French, and Spanish, was in a profuse perspiration, and somewhat confused. I thought myself clear, till, a few moments afterward, a child was passed along for me to take in my arms; but I was relieved on one point: I thought that it was the lady who had become a mother without being a wife, that wished her child to bear my name, but it was another; still I most ungallantly avoided receiving the baby. On going away, however, the woman intercepted me, and, thrusting forward the child, called me compadre; so that, without knowing it, I became godfather to a Carib child. Fortunately, its mother was an honest woman, and the father stood by at the time. In all probability I shall never have much to do with its training; and I can only hope that in due season it will multiply the name and make it respectable among the Caribs.

After quitting the steamboat, the travellers proceeded with mules. In consequence of an accidental separation from the luggage, they were unable to change their dresses; and, as these were covered with mud baked hard by the heat, they suffered great inconvenience. On reaching the Montagua river, they were enabled to indulge in the superlative luxury of a bath. Of this and the primitive costumes of the inhabitants, male and female, in the vicinity, we are entertained with a glowing description.

BATHING AND COSTUMES.

There was an enjoyment in this bath greater even than that of cooling our heated bodies. It was the moment of a golden sunset. We stood up to our necks in water clear as crystal, and calm as that of some diminutive lake, at the margin of a channel along which the stream was rushing with arrowy speed. On each side were mountains several thousand feet high, with their tops illuminated by the setting sun; on a point above us was a palm-leaved hut, and before it a naked Indian sat looking at us; while flocks of parrots, with brilliant plumage, almost in thousands, were flying over our heads, catching up our words, and filling the air with their noisy mockings. It was one of those beautiful scenes that so rarely occur in human life, almost realizing dreams. Old as we were, we might have become poetic, but that Augustin came down to the opposite bank, and, with a cry that rose above the chattering of parrots and the loud murmur of the river, called us to supper.

We had one moment of agony when we returned to our clothes. They lay extended upon the bank, emblems of men who had seen better days. The setting sun, which shed over all a soft and mellow lustre, laid bare the seams of mud and dirt, and made them hideous. We had but one alternative, and that was to go without them. But, as this seemed to be trenching upon the proprieties of life, we picked them up and put them on reluctantly. I am not sure, however, but that we made an unnecessary sacrifice of personal comfort. The proprieties of life are matters of conventional usage. Our host was a don; and when we presented our letter he received us with great dignity in a single garment, loose, white, and very laconic, not quite reaching his knees. The dress of his wife was no less easy; somewhat in the style of the old-fashioned shortgown and petticoat, only the shortgown and whatever else is usually worn under it were wanting, and their place supplied by a string of beads, with a large cross at the end. A dozen men and half-grown boys, naked except the small covering formed by rolling the trousers up and down in the manner I have mentioned, were lounging about the house; and women and girls in such extremes of undress, that a string of beads seemed quite a covering for modesty.

Mr. C. and I were in rather an awkward predicament for the night. The general reception-room contained three beds, made of strips of cowhide interlaced. The don occupied one; he had not much undressing to do, but what little he had, he did by pulling off his shirt. Another bed was at the foot of my hammock. I was dozing, when I opened my eyes, and saw a girl about seventeen sitting sideways upon it, smoking a cigar. She had a piece of striped cotton cloth tied around her waist, and falling below her knees; the rest of her dress was the same which Nature bestows alike upon the belle of fashionable life and the poorest girl; in other words, it was the same as that of the don's wife, with the exception of the string of beads. At first I thought it was something I had conjured up in a dream; and as I waked up perhaps I raised my head, for she gave a few quick pulls of her cigar, drew a cotton sheet over her head and shoulders, and lay down to sleep. I endeavored to do the same. I called to mind the proverb, that "travelling makes strange bed-fellows." I had slept pell-mell with Greeks, Turks, and Arabs. I was beginning a journey in a new country; it was my duty to conform to the customs of the people; to be prepared for the worst, and submit with resignation to whatever might befall me.

As guests it was pleasant to feel that the family made no strangers of us. The wife of the don retired with the same ceremonies. Several times during the night we were waked by the clicking of flint and steel, and saw one of our neighbors lighting a cigar. At daylight the wife of the don was enjoying her morning slumber. While I was dressing she bade me good-morning, removed the cotton covering from her shoulders, and arose dressed for the day.

We started early, and for some distance our road lay along the banks of the Montagua, almost as beautiful by morning as by evening light. In an hour we commenced ascending the spur of a mountain; and, reaching the top, followed the ridge. It was high and narrow, commanding on both sides an almost boundless view, and seemed selected for picturesque effect. The scenery was grand, but the land wild and uncultivated, without fences, enclosures, or habitations. A few cattle were wandering wild over the great expanse, but without imparting that domestic aspect which in other countries attends the presence of cattle. We met a few Indians, with their machetes, going to their morning's work, and a man riding a mule, with a woman before him, his arm encircling her waist.

I was riding ahead of my companions, and on the summit of the ridge, a little aside from the road, saw a little white girl, perfectly naked, playing before a rancho. As most of the people we met were Indians or Ladinos, I was attracted by her appearance, and rode up to the rancho. The proprietor, in the easy costume of our host of Encuentros, was swinging in a hammock under the portico, and smoking a cigar. At a little distance was a shed thatched with stalks and leaves of Indian corn, and called the cucina, or kitchen. As usual, while the don was lolling in his hammock, the women were at work.

I rode on to the cucina and dismounted. The party consisted of the mother and a pretty daughter-in-law of about nineteen, and two daughters of about fifteen and seventeen. The reader is perhaps curious about costumes; but having given him an insight into those of this country, he will not require any farther descriptions. In honor of my visit, the mother snatched up the little girl who had attracted me to the rancho, carried her inside, and slapped over her head a garment which, I believe, is generally worn by little girls; but in a few minutes my young friend disencumbered herself of her finery, and was toddling about with it under her arm.

The whole family was engaged in making tortillas. This is the bread of Central and of all Spanish America, and the only species to be found except in the principal towns. At one end of the cucina was an elevation, on which stood a comal or griddle, resting on three stones, with a fire blazing under it. The daughter-in-law had before her an earthen vessel containing Indian corn soaked in lime-water to remove the husk; and, placing a handful on an oblong stone curving inward, mashed it with a stone roller into a thick paste. The girls took it as it was mashed, and patting it with their hands into flat cakes, laid them on the griddle to bake. This is repeated for every meal, and a great part of the business of the women consists in making tortillas.

When Mr. Catherwood arrived the tortillas were smoking, and we stopped to breakfast. They gave us the only luxury they had, coffee, made of parched corn, which, in compliment to their kindness, we drank. Like me, Mr. C. was struck with the personal beauty of this family group. With the advantages of dress and education, they might be ornaments in cultivated society; but it is decreed otherwise, and these young girls will go through life making tortillas.

The travellers, on resuming their tour, soon reached the village of Gualan. While there, the inhabitants were favored with the visit of a saint of remarkable powers, who had been borne on a tour through the country. That night the saint received the prayers of good Christians.

A VALUABLE SAINT.

The Santa Lucia enjoyed a peculiar popularity from her miraculous power over the affections of the young; for any young man who prayed to her for a wife, or any young woman who prayed for a husband, was sure to receive the object of such prayer; and if the person praying indicated to the saint the individual wished for, the prayer would be granted, provided such individual was not already married. It was not surprising that a saint of such extraordinary powers, touching so directly the tenderest sensibilities, created a sensation in a place where the feelings, or, rather, the passions, are particularly turned to love.

Donna Bartola invited us to accompany her, and, setting out, we called upon a friend of hers. During the whole visit, a servant girl sat with her lap full of tobacco, making straw cigars for immediate use. It was the first time we had smoked with ladies, and, at first, it was rather awkward to ask one for a light; but we were so thoroughly broken in that night that we never had any delicacy afterward. The conversation turned upon the saint and her miraculous powers; and when we avowed ourselves somewhat sceptical, the servant girl, with that familiarity, though not want of respect, which exists throughout Central America, said that it was wicked to doubt; that she had prayed to the saint herself, and two months afterward she was married, and to the very man she prayed for, though at the time he had no idea of her, and, in fact, wanted another girl.

With this encouragement, locking the house, and accompanied by children and servants, we set out to pay our homage to the saint. The sound of a violin and the firing of rockets indicated the direction of her temporary domicile. She had taken up her residence in the hut of a poor Indian in the suburbs; and, for some time before reaching it, we encountered crowds of both sexes, and all ages and colors, and in every degree of dress and undress, smoking and talking, and sitting or lying on the ground in every variety of attitude. Room was made for our party, and we entered the hut.

It was about twenty feet square, thatched on the top and sides with leaves of Indian corn, and filled with a dense mass of kneeling men and women. On one side was an altar, about four feet high, covered with a clean white cotton cloth. On the top of the altar was a frame, with three elevations, like a flower-stand, and on the top of that a case, containing a large wax doll, dressed in blue silk, and ornamented with gold leaf, spangles, and artificial flowers. This was the Saint Lucia. Over her head was a canopy of red cotton cloth, on which was emblazoned a cross in gold. On the right was a sedan chair, trimmed with red cotton and gold leaf, being the travelling equipage of the saint; and near it were Indians in half-sacerdotal dress, on whose shoulders she travelled; festoons of oranges hung from the roof, and the rough posts were unwrapped with leaves of the sugar-cane. At the foot of the altar was a mat, on which girls and boys were playing; and a little fellow about six years old, habited in the picturesque costume of a straw hat, and that only was coolly surveying the crowd.

The ceremony of praying had already begun, and the music of a drum, a violin, and a flageolet, under the direction of the Indian master of ceremonies, drowned the noise of voices. Donna Bartola, who was a widow, and the other ladies of our party, fell on their knees; and, recommending myself to their prayers, I looked on without doing any thing for myself, but I studied attentively the faces of those around me. There were some of both sexes who could not strictly be called young; but they did not, on that account, pray less earnestly. In some places people would repel the imputation of being desirous to procure husband or wife; not so in Gualan: they prayed publicly for what they considered a blessing. Some of the men were so much in earnest that perspiration stood in large drops upon their faces; and none thought that praying for a husband need tinge the cheek of a modest maiden. I watched the countenance of a young Indian girl, beaming with enthusiasm and hope; and, while her eyes rested upon the image of the saint and her lips moved in prayer, I could not but imagine that her heart was full of some truant, and perhaps unworthy lover.

Outside the hut was an entirely different scene. Near by were rows of kneeling men and women, but beyond were wild groups of half-naked men and boys, setting off rockets and fire-works. As I moved through, a flash rose from under my feet, and a petard exploded so near that the powder singed me; and, turning round, I saw hurrying away my rascally muleteer. Beyond were parties of young men and women dancing by the light of blazing pine sticks. In a hut at some little distance were two haggard old women, with large caldrons over blazing fires, stirring up and serving out the contents with large wooden ladles, and looking like witches dealing out poison instead of love-potions.

At ten o'clock the prayers to the saint died away, and the crowd separated into groups and couples, and many fell into what in English would be called flirtations. A mat was spread for our party outside the hut, and we all lighted cigars and sat down upon it. Cups made of small gourds, and filled from the caldrons with a preparation of boiled Indian corn sweetened with various dolces, were passed from mouth to mouth, each one sipping and passing it on to the next; and this continued, without any interruption, for more than an hour. We remained on the ground till after midnight, and then were among the first to leave. On the whole, we concluded that praying to the Saint Lucia must lead to matrimony; and I could not but remark that, in the way of getting husbands and wives, most seemed disposed to do something for themselves, and not leave all to the grace of the saint.

Arrived at Lucapa, Mr. Stephens became convinced that, so far as regarded the purposes of his mission, it was unnecessary for him to proceed immediately to Guatemala—so he determined to turn aside and visit Copan. On his way hither he was overtaken by the following adventures:

A STRIKING ADVENTURE.

At six o'clock we rose upon a beautiful table of land, on which stood another gigantic church. It was the seventh we had seen that day, and, coming upon them in a region of desolation, and by mountain paths which human hands had never attempted to improve, their colossal grandeur and costliness were startling, and gave evidence of a retrograding and expiring people. This stood in a more desolate place than any we had yet seen. The grass was green, the sod unbroken even by a mule path, not a human being was in sight, and even the gratings of the prison had no one looking through them. It was, in fact, a picture of a deserted village. We rode up to the cabildo, the door of which was fastened and the shed barricaded, probably to prevent the entrance of straggling cattle. We tore away the fastenings, broke open the door, and, unloading the mules, sent Augustin on a foraging expedition. In half an hour he returned with one egg, being all that he was able to procure; but he had waked up the village, and the alcalde, an Indian with a silver-headed cane, and several alguazils with long thin rods or wands of office, came down to examine us. We showed them our passport, and told them where we were going, at which, with their characteristic indifference of manner, they expressed no surprise. They could not read the passport, but they examined the seal and returned it. We asked them for eggs, fowls, milk, &c., to all of which they answered, what afterward became but too familiar, "no hay," "there is none," and in a few minutes they retired and left us to ourselves.

The cabildo was about forty feet long and twenty broad, with plastered walls; its furniture consisted of a large table and two benches with high backs, and the alcalde sent us a jar of water. We abused the muleteer for stopping at a place where we could get nothing to eat, and made our dinner and supper upon bread and chocolate, taking care not to give him any. There were pins in the walls for swinging hammocks, and in the evening we prepared for sleep. Mr. C. was in his hammock, and I was half undressed, when the door was suddenly burst open, and twenty-five or thirty men rushed in, the alcalde, alguazils, soldiers, Indians, and Mestizoes, ragged and ferocious-looking fellows, and armed with staves of office, swords, clubs, muskets, and machetes, and carrying blazing pine sticks. At the head of them was a young officer of about twenty-eight or thirty, with a glazed hat and sword, and a knowing and wicked expression, whom we afterward understood to be a captain of one of Carrera's companies. The alcalde was evidently intoxicated, and said that he wished to see my passport again. I delivered it to him, and he handed it over to the young officer, who examined it, and said that it was not valid. In the mean time, Mr. Catherwood and I dressed ourselves. I was not very familiar with the Spanish language, and, through Augustin, explained my official character, and directed him particularly to the endorsements of Commandant Penol and General Cascara. He paid no regard to my explanations; the alcalde said that he had seen a passport once before, and that it was printed, and on a small piece of paper not bigger than his hand; whereas mine was the one given by government on a quarto sheet. Beside this, they said that the seal of General Cascara was only that of the department of Chiquimula, and it ought to be that of the state of Guatemala. I did all in my power to show the insufficiency of these objections; but, after a warm altercation, the young man said that we should not proceed on our journey, but must remain at Comotan until information could be sent to Chiquimula, and orders received from that place. We had no disposition to remain in such hands; threatened them with the consequences of throwing any obstructions in our way; and I at length said that, rather than be detained there and lose time, I would abandon my journey to Copan altogether, and return by the road on which I came; but both the officer and the alcalde said peremptorily that we should not leave Comotan.

The young man then told me to give up my passport. I answered that the passport was given me by my own government; that it was the evidence of my official character, necessary for my personal security, and I would not give it up. Mr. Catherwood made a learned exposition of the law of nations, the right of an ambassador, and the danger bringing down upon them the vengeance of the government del Norte, which I sustained with some warmth, but it was of no use. At length I told him again that I would not give up the passport, but offered to go with it myself, under a guard of soldiers, to Chiquimula, or wherever else they chose to send it; he answered insultingly that we should not go to Chiquimula or anywhere else; neither forward nor backward; that we must stay where we were, and must give up the passport. Finding arguments and remonstrances of no use, I placed the paper inside my vest, buttoned up my coat tight across my breast, and told him he must get it by force; and the officer, with a gleam of satisfaction crossing his villainous face, responded that he would. I added that, whatever might be the immediate result, it would ultimately be fatal to them; to which he answered, with a sneer, that they would run the risk. During the whole time, the band of cowardly ruffians stood with their hands on their swords and machetes, and two assassin-looking scoundrels sat on a bench with muskets against their shoulders, and the muzzles pointed within three feet of my breast. If we had been longer in the country we should have been more alarmed; but as yet we did not know the sanguinary character of the people, and the whole proceeding was so outrageous and insulting that it roused our indignation more than our fears. Augustin, who, from having had a cut across the head with a machete, which did not kill him, was always bellicose, begged me in French to give the order to fire, and said that one round would scatter them all. We have eleven charges, all sure; we were excited, and, if the young man himself had laid his hands upon me, I think I should have knocked him down at least; but, most fortunately, before he had time to give his order to fall upon us, a man, who entered after the rest, of a better class, wearing a glazed hat and round-about jacket, stepped forward and asked to see the passport. I was determined not to trust it out of my hands, and held it up before a blazing pine stick, while he read it, and, at Mr. Catherwood's request, aloud.

I have since doubted whether even the officer had read it, or, if so, whether he had communicated its contents, for it produced an effect upon the alcalde and his alguazils; and, after some moments of anxious suspense to us, they forbore to execute their threat, but said that we must remain in custody. I demanded a courier, to carry a letter immediately to General Cascara, which they refused; but, on my offering to pay the expense of the courier, the alcalde promised to send it. Knowing General Cascara to be an Italian, and afraid to trust my Spanish, I wrote a note, which Mr. C. translated into Italian, informing him of our arrest and imprisonment; that we had exhibited to the alcalde and soldiers who had arrested us, my especial passport from my own government, with the endorsements of Commandant Penol and himself, certifying my official character, which were not deemed sufficient; demanding to be set at liberty immediately, and allowed to proceed on our journey without farther molestation; and adding that we should, of course, represent to the government at Guatemala, and also to my own, the manner in which we had been treated. Not to mince matters, Mr. Catherwood signed the note as Secretary; and, having no official seal with me, we sealed it, unobserved by anybody, with a new American half dollar, and gave it to the alcalde. The eagle spread his wings, and the stars glittered in the torchlight. All gathered round to examine it, and retired, locking us up in the cabildo, stationing twelve men at the door with swords, muskets, and machetes; and, at parting, the officer told the alcalde that, if we escaped during the night, his head should answer for it.

The excitement over, Mr. C. and I were exhausted. We had made a beautiful beginning of our travels; but a month from home, and in the hands of men who would have been turned out of any decent state prison lest they should contaminate the boarders. A peep at our beautiful keepers did not reassure us. They were sitting under the shed, directly before the door, around a fire, their arms in reach, and smoking cigars. Their whole stock of wearing apparel was not worth a pair of old boots; and with their rags, their arms, their dark faces reddened by the firelight, their appearance was ferocious; and, doubtless, if we had attempted to escape, they would have been glad of an excuse for murder. We opened a basket of wine with which Col. McDonald had provided us, and drank his health. We were relieved from immediate apprehensions, but our prospects were not pleasant; and, fastening the door as well as we could inside, we again betook ourselves to our hammocks.

During the night the door was again burst open, and the whole ruffianly band entered, as before, with swords, muskets, matchetes, and blazing pine sticks. In an instant we were on our feet, and my hurried impression was, that they had come to take the passport; but, to our surprise, the alcalde handed me back the letter with the big seal, said there was no use in sending it, and that we were at liberty to proceed on our journey when we chose.

We were too well pleased to ask any questions, and to this day do not know why we were arrested. My belief is, that if we had quailed at all, and had not kept up a high, threatening tone to the last, we should not have been set free; and I have no doubt that the big seal did much in our behalf. Our indignation, however, was not the less strong that we considered ourselves safe in pouring it out. We insisted that the matter should not end here, and that the letter should go to General Cascara. The alcalde objected; but we told him that, if not sent, it would be the worse for him; and, after some delay, he thrust it into the hands of an Indian, and beat him out of doors with his staff; and in a few minutes the guard was withdrawn, and they all left us.

It was now nearly daylight, and we did not know what to do; to continue was to expose ourselves to a repetition of the same treatment, and perhaps as we advanced farther into the interior, with a worse result. Undetermined, for the third time we turned into our hammocks. At broad daylight we were again roused by the alcalde and his alguazils, but this time they came to pay us a visit of ceremony.

The soldiers, who had accidentally passed through the village, and had made all the disturbance, had left. After some deliberation we determined to ~~continue~~ and, changing the alcalde again about the letter to General Cascara, turned our backs upon him and his alguazils. In a few minutes they all withdrew. We took a cup of chocolate, loaded our mules, and, when we left, the place was as desolate as when we entered. Not a person had been there to welcome us, and there was not one to bid us farewell.

For an account of the interesting explorations made by Mr. Stephens among the ruins of the ancient city of Copan—which famous old place, by the way, he purchased in fee-simple for the sum of fifty dollars—we must refer the reader to the book itself. We do not by any means intend to supply its place, but simply to amuse our readers and to point out to them the value of these explanations. This we now do and shall hereafter do most effectually by giving very accurate and beautiful wood-engravings, executed at great cost in London after drawings on the spot by Catherwood. The engravings in the book are on steel; those of course could not be made use of in a newspaper.

The illustration at the head of this article is of an idol, discovered among the ruins of Copan. We give the front view. Next week we shall give the front and back views of another idol, discovered at the same time, that are even more remarkable than this. The statue, above pictured, "is eleven feet eight inches high, three feet and four inches on each side, and stands with its front to the east on a pedestal six feet square, the whole resting on a circular stone foundation sixteen feet in diameter. Before it, at a distance of eight feet ten inches, is an altar, partly buried, three feet three inches above the ground, seven feet square, and standing diagonally to the idol. It is in high relief, boldly sculptured, and in a good state of preservation. From the absence of beard and dress, it is supposed that the figure is that of a woman, and the countenance presents traits of individuality, leading to the supposition that it is a portrait."

Next week we shall resume our extracts, speak more at length of Copan and of our author's researches in that "buried city of the past," and accompany him further in his (to the reader, though not always to himself) delightful travels and explorations.

TEN THOUSAND A YEAR.

The sudden and unexpected rebuff encountered by Mr. Gammon, in the Vulture Insurance Company's refusal to pay the policy on the late Lady Stratton's life, was calculated seriously to embarrass his complicated movements. He foresaw the protracted and harassing course of litigation into which he should be driven, before he could compel them to liquidate so heavy a claim; and a glimpse of which, by way of anticipation, was afforded to the reader in the last part of this history; but, with all his longheadedness—his habitual contemplation of the probable and possible effects and consequences of whatever event happened to him—this refusal of the directors to pay the policy was attended with results which defied his calculations—results of such a description, and of such signal importance, as will, perhaps, surprise the reader, and serve to illustrate, in a striking manner, the controlling agency which is at work in the conduct of human affairs—an agency to which the principles of Mr. Gammon denied an existence. Nor was this the only trouble—the only reverse—that about this period occurred to him; and not a little perplexed was he to account for such a sudden confluence of adverse circumstances as he by-and-by experienced, when he found the truth of Shakspeare's observation—

"When sorrows come—they come not single spies,
But in battalions."

On applying at Doctor's Commons, in the ordinary way, for a grant to Mr. Tamouse of Letters of Administration to Lady Stratton, Mr. Gammon discovered the existence of a little document, for which he certainly was not entirely unprepared, but which, nevertheless, somewhat disconcerted him; principally on account of the additional plea it would afford the Vulture Company for resisting payment of the policy. How, indeed, could they be expected to pay a sum of such magnitude, to a person whose title to receive it was disputed by another claimant? The document alluded to was a CAVEAT, and ran thus:

"Let nothing be done in the goods of Dame Mary Stratton, late of Warkleigh, in the parish of Warkleigh, in the county of York, deceased, unknown to Obadiah Pounce, proctor for John Thomas, having interest."

Now, the reader will observe that this "John Thomas" is, like the "John Doe" of the common lawyers, a mere man of straw; so that this peremptory, but mysterious mandate, would afford an enquirer no information as to either the name of the party intending to resist the grant of administration, or the grounds of such resistance. Mr. Gammon, however, very naturally concluded that the move was made on the behalf of Mr. Aubrey, and that the ground of his opposition was the alleged will of Lady Stratton. To be prepared for such an encounter, when the time arrived, he noted down very carefully the important admissions which had been made to him by Mr. Parkinson; and having, for a while, disposed of this affair, he betook himself to the great conspiracy case, which I have already mentioned; and, in bringing which to a successful issue, he unquestionably exhibited great ability, and deserved the compliments paid him on the occasion by the counsel, whose labors he had, by his lucid arrangement, materially abbreviated and lightened.

This matter also over, and fairly off his mind, he addressed himself to an affair then pending, of great importance to himself personally, viz. a certain cause of Wigley v. Gammon; which, together with the three other special jury causes in which the same person was plaintiff, was to come on for trial at York early in the second week of the assizes, which were to commence in a few days' time. As already intimated, Mr. Subtle had been retained for the plaintiff in all the actions, together with Mr. Stirling and Mr. Crystal; and, as Mr. Quicksilver had become Lord Blossom and Box, Mr. Gammon was sorely perplexed for a leader—his junior, of course, being Mr. Lynx. He had retained a Mr. Wilmington to lead for the other three defendants—a man of unquestionable ability, experienced, astute, dexterous, witty, and eloquent, and exceedingly well qualified to conduct such a case as Mr. Gammon's: but that gentleman got exceedingly nervous about the matter as the day of battle drew near—and, at length, resolved on taking down special the Attorney-General. Touching the same practice of taking down counsel special, by the way, note one or two matters. To say nothing of the enormous expense of such a procedure, the rule of may be adverted to; namely, the jury and the judge are apt to imagine, that the party taking this extraordinary step is conscious of having some very great difficulty to contend with in his case. They are apt—at least, the jury—to conceive a prejudice and suspicion against the formidable stranger, who, they may imagine, is coming down to mislead and overpower them—to pervert and distort facts by the mere force of professional skill and mental power, which he will be sure adequately to exert on behalf of his enterprising client. A notion of this sort is calculated to put every man of the jury on his guard against this very special stranger. Then, it may be also easily imagined, that they may entertain a little prejudice in favor of the leaders of the circuit thus neglected and undervalued—men with whose names, characters, and persons, they have been long familiar; and who have acquired that sort of knowledge of the jury, which enables them to catch their tone—to hit their humor. Unless, therefore, the case be one palpably and notoriously of extraordinary difficulty—of great public interest and importance—or the stake of great magnitude; and, in addition to these, or any one of them, there be plainly a deficiency of counsel fit to conduct the case, unengaged—do not be in a hurry to take down counsel special, who every one will believe, is come to exert himself desperately in a desperate case. Now, I do not see why Mr. Gammon, for instance, should have thought it necessary in his own case to go to the enormous expense, of bringing down the Attorney-General—but, however, down went that eminent personage. Their consultation was gloomy; the Attorney-General acknowledging that he felt great apprehension as to the result, from the witnesses that were likely to be produced on the other side.

Nec deus interit, nisi dignus vindice nodus,

"It's a pity we have n't the Yatton election committee to deal with, Mr. Gammon!" said the Attorney-General, with a sly sarcastic smile. "We've rather a different tribunal to go before now—eh?"

Mr. Gammon smiled, shook his head, and shrugged his shoulders. "We manage these matters rather differently in a court of law!" continued the Attorney-General.

When the important morning of the trial arrived, there was a special jury sworn, three-fourths of whom were given credit—how truly I know not—for a strong political bias against what were called "liberal principles." Mr. Subtle opened a shockingly clear and strong case, to be sure; and what was worse, he proved it, and so as to carry conviction to the minds of all in court. The Attorney-General felt his opponent's case to be impregnable; and, in spite of several brilliant cross-examinations, and a masterly speech, the stern and upright judge who tried the case, summed up dead against the defendant, with many severe remarks on the profligate and systematic manner in which the offences had been committed. After a brief consultation, the jury returned into court with a verdict for the plaintiff, in the sum of £2500; that is, for five penalties of £500! A similar result ensued in the two following cause of Wigley v. Mudflint, and Wigley v. Bloodsuck; both of whom seemed completely stupefied at a result so totally different to what they had been led to expect from the very different view of things taken by the election committee. As for Mudflint, from what quarter under heaven he was to get the means of satisfying that monstrous verdict, he could not conjecture; and his face became several shades sallow as soon as he had heard his doom pronounced; but Bloodsuck, who had turned quite white, whispered in his ear, that of course Mr. Titmouse would see them harmless.

"Oh Lord!" however, muttered Mudflint, in a cold perspiration—"I should like to hear Mr. Gammon recommending him to do so, under circumstances!"

Poor Woodlouse was more fortunate—somehow or another he contrived to creep and wriggle out of the danger! Whether from his utter significance, or from the destructive verdicts against Gammon, Mudflint, and Bloodsuck having satiated the avenger, I know not; but the case was not pressed very strongly against him, and the jury took a most merciful view of the evidence. But, alas! what a shock this gave to the Liberal cause in Yatton! How were the mighty fallen! As soon after this melancholy result as Messrs. Mudflint and Bloodsuck had recovered their presence of mind sufficiently to discuss the matter together, they were clearly of opinion—were those brethren in distress—that Mr. Titmouse was bound, both in law and honor, to indemnify them against the consequences of acts done solely on his behalf, and at his implied request. They made the thing very clear, indeed to Mr. Gammon, who listened to them with marked interest and attention, and undertook "to endeavor to satisfy" Mr. Titmouse of the justice of their claims; secretly resolving, also, not to lose sight of his own: nay, in fact, he made sure of satisfying Mr. Titmouse on that score. But the personal liability which, in the first instance, he had thus incurred, to an extent of upwards of £3000, supposing him, by any accident to fail in recouping himself out of the assets of Mr. Titmouse, was not the only unfortunate consequence of this serious miscarriage.

Such a verdict as had passed against Mr. Gammon, places a man in a very awkward and nasty position before the public, and renders it rather difficult for him to set himself right again. 'Tis really a serious thing to stand convicted of the offence of bribery; it makes a man look very sheepish, indeed, ever after, especially in political life. 'Tis such a beam in a man's own eye, to be pulled out before he can see the mote in his neighbor's!—and Mr. Gammon felt this. Then, again, he had received a pledge from a very eminent member of the Government, to be performed in the event of his being able to secure the seat for Yatton on a general election, (which was considered not unlikely to happen within a few months;) but this accursed verdict was likely to prove a most serious obstacle in the way of his advancement, and his chagrin and vexation may be easily imagined. He conceived a wonderful hatred of the supposed instigator of these unprincipled and vindictive proceedings, Lord de la Zouch—who seemed to have put them up like four birds to be shot at, and brought down, one by one, as his lordship chose! As soon as these four melancholy causes above mentioned were over—Gammon considering himself bound, on the score of bare decency, to remain till his fellow-sufferers had been disposed of—he went off to Yatton, to see how matters were going on there.

Alas! what a state of things existed there! Good old Yatton and all about it seemed wofully changed for the worse, since the departure of the excellent Aubreys and the accession of Mr. Titmouse. The local superintendence of his interests had been entrusted by Gammon to the Messrs. Bloodsuck, who had found their business, in consequence, so much increasing, as to require the establishment of Mr. Barnabas Bloodsuck at Yatton, while his father remained at Griston; their partnership, however, continuing. He had, accordingly, run up a thin slip of a place at the end of the village furthest from the park gates, and within a few yards of the house in which old Blind Beas had ended her days. He was the first attorney that had ever lived in Yatton. There was a particularly impudent and priggish air about his residence.

The door was painted a staring mahogany color, and bore a bright brassplate, with the words—"Messrs. BLOODSUCK & SON, ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS"—words that shot terror into the heart of many a passer-by, especially the tenants of Mr. Titmouse. At the moment, for instance, of Mr. Gammon's arrival at Yatton, on the present occasion, actions for rent, and other matters, were actually pending against fourteen of the poorer tenants!! 'Twas all up with them as soon as the Messrs. Bloodsuck were fairly fastened upon them. Let them be a day or two in arrears with their rent, a cognovit or warrant of attorney—for the sake of the costs it produced—was instantly proposed; and, if the expensive security were demurred to by the poor souls, by that night's post went up instructions to town for writs to be sent down by return! If some of the more resolute questioned the propriety of a distress made upon them with cruel precipitancy, they found themselves immediately involved in a replevin suit, from whose expensive intricacies they were at length glad to escape terrified, on any terms. Then actions of trespass, and so forth, were commenced upon the most frivolous pretexts. Old and convenient rights of way were suddenly disputed, and made the subjects of expensive lawsuits. Many of the former quiet inhabitants of the village had been forced out of it, their places being supplied by persons of a very different description; and a bad state of feeling, chiefly arising out of political rancor, had, for instance, just given rise to three actions—two of assault and one of slander—from that once peaceful little village, and which had been tried at those very assizes! Poor Miss Aubrey's village school, alas! had been transmogrified into a chapel for Mr. Mudflint, where he rallied round him every Sunday an excited throng of ignorant and unaffected people, and regaled them with seditious and blasphemous harangues. 'T would have made your hair stand on end to hear the language in which he spoke of the sacred mysteries of the Christian religion—it would have filled you with disgust and indignation to hear his attacks upon the Church of England and its ministers, and in particular upon dear little exemplary unoffending old Dr. Tatham, whom he described as "fattening upon cant, hypocrisy, and extortion." Strange and melancholy to relate, this mode of procedure on the part of Mr. Mudflint for a while succeeded. In vain did the white-haired little vicar preach his very best sermons, and in his very best manner—he beheld his church thinning, while the chapel of Mr. Mudflint was filled. And, while he was about the village in the zealous and vigilant, and affectionate discharge of his pastoral duties, he perceived symptoms, now and then, of a grievously altered manner toward him, on the part of those who had once hailed his approach and his ministrations with a kind of joyful reverence and cordiality. Mudflint had also, in furtherance of his purpose of bitter hostility, in concert with his worthy coadjutors the Bloodsucks, stirred up two or three persons in the parish to resist the Doctor's claim to tithes, and to offer harassing obstructions to the collecting of it. In justice to the Church, and to his successors, he could not permit his rights to be thus questioned and denied with impunity—and thus, to his sore grief, the worthy old vicar found himself, for the first time in his life, involved in a couple of lawsuits, which he feared, even if he won them, would ruin him. It may be imagined that Mudflint's discomfiture at the assizes was calculated to send him, like a scotched snake, writhing, hissing, and snapping, through the village, at all that came in his way. It is possible that Mr. Gammon was not so fully apprised of all these doings, as is now the reader: yet he saw and heard enough to lead him to suspect that things were going a little too far. He took, however, no steps toward effecting an abatement or discontinuance of them. Just at present, moreover, he was peculiarly reluctant to interfere with any of the proceedings of the Messrs. Bloodsuck, and confined himself to receiving their report as to some arrangements which he had desired them to carry into effect. In the first place, he did not disclose the existence of his heavy and newly created rent-charge, but gave them to understand that Mr. Titmouse's circumstances were such as to make it requisite to extract as much from the property as could possibly be obtained, by raising the rents—by effecting a further mortgage upon the property, and by a sale of all the timber that was fit for felling. It was found necessary to look out for new tenants to one or two of the largest farms on the estate, as the old tenants declared themselves unable to sustain the exorbitant rents they were called upon to pay: so, orders were given to advertise for tenants in the county and other newspapers. Then Mr. Gammon went all over the estate, to view the condition of the timber, attended by the sullen and reluctant wood-bailiff, who, though he retained his situation on the estate, mortally hated his new master, and all connected with him. Very little timber was, according to his account, fit for felling! Having looked into these various matters, Mr. Gammon took his departure for town, glad to escape, though for never so brief an interval, the importunities of Messrs. Mudflint and Bloodsuck, on the subject of the late verdicts against them, and which he pledged himself to represent in a proper way to Mr. Titmouse. On arriving in town, he lost no time in waiting upon the great man to whom he looked for the political advancement after which his soul pined. He was received with manifest coolness, evidently occasioned by the position in which he had been placed by the verdict in the action for the bribery penalties. What the great man objected to, was not Mr. Gammon's having bribed, but having done it in such a way as to admit of detection: but on solemnly assuring his patron that the verdict was entirely against evidence, and that the Attorney-General was, in the next term, going to move for a rule to set aside the verdict on that ground, and also on several other grounds, and that, by such means, the cause could be, at the very least, "hung up" for heaven only knew how long to come—till, in short, people had forgotten all about it—the clouds slowly disappeared from the great man's brow, especially on his being assured that Gammon's return for Yatton on the next vacancy, was a matter of absolute certainty. Then he gave Mr. Gammon certain assurances which flushed his cheek with delight and triumph—delight and triumph inspired by a conviction that his deeply-laid schemes, his comprehensive plans, were, despite a few minor and temporary checks and reverses, being crowned with success. It was true that his advances toward Miss Aubrey appeared to have been hopelessly repelled; but he resolved to wait till the time should have arrived for bringing other reserved forces into the field—by the aid of which, he yet hoped to make an equally unexpected and decisive demonstration.

The more immediate object of his anxieties, was to conceal as far as possible his connexion with the various joint-stock speculations into which he had entered with a wild and feverish anxiety to realize a rapid fortune. He had already withdrawn from one or two with which he had been only for a brief time, and secretly, connected—but not until he had realized no inconsiderable sum by his judicious but somewhat unscrupulous operations. He was also anxious, if practicable, to extricate Lord Dreddlington, at the proper conjuncture, with as little damage as possible to his lordship's fortune or character: for his lordship's countenance and good offices were becoming of greater consequence to Mr. Gammon, than ever. It was true that he possessed information—I mean that concerning Titmouse's birth and true position—which he considered would, whenever he thought fit to avail himself of it, give him an absolute mastery over the unhappy peer for the rest of his life; but he felt that it would be a critical and dreadful experiment, and not to be attempted but in the very last resort. He would sometimes gaze at the unconscious Earl, and speculate in a sort of reverie upon the possible effects attending the dreadful disclosure, till he would give a sort of inward start as he realized the fearful and irretrievable extent to which he had committed himself. He shuddered also to think that he was, moreover, in a measure, at the mercy of Titmouse himself—who, in some mad moment of drunkenness or desperation, or pique or revenge, might disclose the fatal secret, and precipitate upon him, when least prepared for them, all its long-dreaded consequences. The slender faculties of Lord Dreddlington had been for months in a state of novel and grateful excitement, through the occupation afforded them by his connexion with the fashionable modes of commercial enterprise—joint-stock companies, the fortunate members of which got rich they scarcely knew how.

It seems as though certain persons had but to acquire a nominal connexion with some great enterprise of this description, to find it pouring wealth into their coffers as if by magic; and it was thus that Lord Dreddlington, among others, found himself quietly realizing very considerable sums of money, without apparent risk or exertion—his movements being skilfully guided by Gammon, and one or two others, who, while they treated him as a mere instrument to aid in effecting their own purposes in eluding the public, yet contrived to impress him with the flattering notion that he was most ably guiding their movements, and richly entitled to their deference and gratitude. 'Twas, indeed, ecstasy to poor old Lord Dreddlington to behold his name, from time to time, glittering in the van—himself figuring away as a chief patron—a prime mover—in some vast and lucrative undertaking, which almost, from the first moment of its projection, attracted the notice and confidence of the moneyed classes, and became productive to its originators! Many attempts were made by his brother peers, and those who once had considerable influence over him, to open his eyes to the very questionable nature of the concerns to which he was so freely lending the sanction of his name and personal interference; but his pride and obstinacy caused him to turn a deaf ear to their suggestions; and the skilful and delicious flatteries of Mr. Gammon and others, seconded by the substantial fruits of his various speculations, urged him on from step to step, till he became one of the most active and constant in his interference with the concern of one or two great speculations, such as have been mentioned in a former part of this history, and from which he looked forward to realizing, at no very distant day, the most resplendent results. Never had one man obtained over another a more complete mastery, than had Mr. Gammon over the Earl of Dreddlington, at whose exclusive table he was a frequent guest, and thereby obtained opportunities of acquiring the good-will of one or two other persons of the Earl's status and calibre.

REMEDY FOR A LIGHTNING SHOCK.—As this is the season when all are more or less liable to experience a shock from Nature's battery, the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser suggests that any person struck down by lightning, no matter if apparently dead, ought to be laid immediately extended on the damp ground; and if it do not rain upon him, water should be thrown on freely, which in most cases will conduct off the electric fluid without serious injury. Many a one has lost his life when a knowledge of these facts on the part of friends or bystanders, would have preserved it.

JANE SINCLAIR; OR THE FAWN OF SPRING-VALE.

BY WILLIAM CARLETON.

AUTHOR OF "FARDOROUGH THE MISER," "TRAITS AND STORIES OF THE IRISH PEASANTRY," ETC.

(Concluded.)

This conversation, when repeated to the family, deeply distressed them, involved in doubt and uncertainty as they were with respect to Osborne's ultimate intentions. Until a reply, however, should be received to his father's letter, which was written expressly to demand an explanation on that point, they could only soothe the unhappy girl in the patient sorrow which they saw gathering in her heart. That, however, which alarmed them most, was her insuperable disinclination to say thing in the shape of consolation or sympathy. This, to them, was indeed a new trait in the character of one who had heretofore been so anxious to re- pose the weight of her sufferings upon the bosoms of those who loved her. Her chief companion now was Ariel, her dove, to which she was seen to address herself with a calm, smiling aspect, not dissimilar to the languid cheerfulness of an invalid, who might be supposed as yet incapable from physical weakness to indulge in a greater display of animal spirits. Her walks, too, were now all solitary, with the exception of her mute companion, and it was observed that she never, in a single instance, was known to traverse any spot over which she and Osborne had not walked together. Here she would linger, and pause, and muse, for hours, forgetting all her usual domestic engagements, sunk in a rever- y of which she was utterly unconscious. One day she remained out beyond the time appointed for her return, and as she hastened home with a palpitating heart, unhappily arrived only in time to find the family rising from prayer.

As she stood and looked upon them, she smiled, but a sudden paleness at the same instant overspread her face, which gave to her smile an expression we are utterly in- competent to describe.

"I am late," she exclaimed, "and have neglected a solemn and necessary duty. To me, to me, papa, how necessary is that duty."

"It is equally so to us all, my child," replied her father; "but," he added, in order to reconcile her to an omission which had occasioned her to suffer so much pain; "we did not forget to pray for you, Jane. With respect to your absence, we know it is unintentional. Your mind is troubled, my love, and do not, let me beg of you, dwell upon minor points of that kind, so as to interrupt the singleness of heart with which you ought to address God. You know, darling, you can pray in your own room."

She mused for some minutes, and at length said, "I would be glad to preserve that singleness of heart, but I fear I will not be able to do so long."

"If you would stay more with us, darling," observed her mamma, "and talk and chat more with Maria and Agnes, as you used to do, you would find your spirits improved. You are not so cheerful as we would wish to see you."

"Perhaps I ought to do that, mamma, indeed I know I ought, because you wish it."

"We all wish it," said Agnes. "Jane dear, why keep aloof from us? Who in this world loves you as we do? and why would you not, as you used to do, allow us to cheer you, to support you, or to mourn and weep with you? Anything—anything," said the admirable girl, "rather than keep your heart from ours;" and as she spoke, the tears fell fast down her cheeks.

"Dear Agnes," said Jane, putting her arm about her sister's neck, and looking up mournfully into her face, "I cannot weep for myself—I cannot weep even with you; you know I love you—how I love you—oh how I love you all; but I cannot tell why it is—society, even the society of them I love best, disturbs me, and you know not the pleasure that comes to me from solitude. To me—to me there is a charm in it ten times more soothing to my heart than all the power of human consolation."

"But why so melancholy at all, Jane?" said Maria; "surely there is no just cause for it?"

She smiled as she replied, "Why am I melancholy, Maria?—why? why should I not? Do I not read the approaching death of Charles Osborne in the gloom of every countenance about me? Why do you whisper to each other that which you will not let me hear? Why is there a secret, and an anxious, and a mysterious intercourse between this family and his, of the purport of which I am kept ignorant—and I alone?"

"But suppose Charles Osborne is not sick," said William; "suppose he was never in better health than he is at this moment"—he saw his father's hand raised, and paused, then added, carelessly, "for supposition sake I say merely."

"But you must not suppose that, William," she replied, starting, "unless you wish to blight your sister. On what an alternative, then, would you force a breaking heart! If not sick, if not dying where he is? I require him—I demand him. My heart," she proceeded, rising up and speak- ing with vehemence—"my heart calls for him—calls for him. He is, he is sick; the malady of his family is upon him; he is ill—he is dying; it must be so; ay, and it shall be so; I can bear that, I can bear him to die, but never to become faithless to a heart like mine. But I am foolish," she added, after a pause occasioned by exhaustion. "Oh, my dear William, why, by idle talk, thus tamper with your poor sister's happiness. I know you meant no harm, but oh, William, William, do it no more."

"I only put it, dear Jane, I only put it as a mere case"—the young man was evidently cut to the heart, and could not for some moments speak.

She saw his distress, and going over to him, took his hand, and said, "Do not, William, do not; it is nothing but merely one of your good-humored attempts to make your sister cheerful. There," she added, kissing his cheek; "there is a kiss for you; the kiss of peace let it be, and forgiveness; but I have nothing to forgive you for, except too much affection for an unhappy sister, who, I believe, is likely to be troublesome enough to you all; but, perhaps not long—not long."

There were few dry eyes in the room, as she uttered the last words.

"I do not like to see you weep," she added, "when I could have wept myself, and partaken of your tears, it was rather a relief to me than otherwise. It seems, however, that my weeping days are past; do not, oh do not—you trouble me, and I want to compose my mind for a performance of the solemn act which I have this evening neglected. Mamma, kiss me, and pray for me; I love you well and tenderly, mamma; I am sure you know I do."

The sorrowing mother caught her to her bosom, and, after kissing her passive lips, burst out into a sobbing fit of grief.

"Oh, my daughter, my daughter," she exclaimed, still clasping her to her heart, "and is it come to this! Oh that we had never seen him!"

"This, my dear," said Mr. Sinclair to his wife, "is wrong; indeed, it is weakness; you know she wants to compose her mind for prayer."

"I do, papa; they must be more firm; I need to pray. I know my frailties, you know them too, sir; I concealed them from you as long as I could, but their burthen was too heavy for my heart; bless me now, before I go; I will kneel."

The sweet girl knelt beside him, and he placed his hand upon her stooping head, and blessed her. She then raised herself, and looking up to him with a singular expression of wild sweetness beaming in her eyes, she said, leaning her head again upon his breast—

"There are two bosoms, on which I trust I and my frailties can repose with hope; I know I shall soon pass from the one to the other—

'The bosom of my father and my God.'

Will not that be sweet papa?"

She spoke this with a smile of such unutterable sweet- ness, her beautiful eyes gazing innocently up into her father's countenance, that the heart of the old man was shaken through every fibre. He saw, however, what must be encountered, and was resolved to act a part worthy of the religion he professed. He arose, and taking her hand in his, said, "you wish to pray, dearest love—that is right; your head has been upon my bosom, and I blessed you; go now, and with a fervent heart, address yourself to the throne of grace; in doing this, my sweet child, piously and earnestly, you will pass from my bosom to the bosom of your God. Cast yourself upon his, my love; above all things, cast yourself with humble hope and earnest supplication upon his. This, my child, is sweet; and you will find it so; come, darling, come."

He led her out of the room, and after a few words more of affectionate advice, left her to that solitude for which he hoped the frame of mind in which she then appeared was suitable.

"Her sense of religion," said he, after returning to the family, "is not only delicate but deep; her piety is fervent and profound. I do not, therefore, despair but religion will carry her through whatever disappointment Charles's flighty enthusiasm may occasion her."

"I wish, papa," said Agnes, "I could think so. As she herself said, she might bear his death, for that would involve no act of treachery, or of falsehood on his part; but to find that he is capable of forgetting their betrothed vows, sanc- tioned as they were by the parents of both—indeed, papa, if such a thing happen—"

"I should think not," observed her mother; "Charles has, as you have just said, enthusiasm; now, will not that give an impulse to his love, as well as to his ambition?"

"But if ambition, my dear, has become the predominant principle in his character, it will draw to its own support all that nourished his other passions. Love is never strong, where ambition exists—not ambition where there is love."

"I cannot entertain the thought of Charles Osborne being false to her," said Maria; "his passion for her was more like idolatry than love."

"He is neglecting her, though," said William; "and did she not suppose that that is caused by illness, I fear she would not bear it even as she does."

"I agree with you, William," observed Agnes; "but after all, it is better to have patience until Mr. Osborne hears from him. All may end better than we think."

Until this reply should arrive, however, they were com- pelled to remain in that state of suspense which is frequently more painful than the certainty of evil itself. Jane's mind and health were teaded with all the care and affection which her disinclination to society would permit them to show. They forced themselves to be cheerful in order that she might unconsciously partake of a spirit less gloomy than that which every day darkened more deeply about her path. Since their last dialogue, however, it was evident from her manner that some fresh source of pain had been on that occasion opened in her heart. For nearly a week after- ward her eye was fixed from time to time upon her brother William, with a long gaze of hesitation and inquiry—not unmingled with a character of suspicion that appeared still further to sink her spirits by a superadded weight of misery.

CHAPTER X.

Nearly a fortnight had now elapsed since Charles Osborne ought to have received his father's letter, and yet no communication had reached either of the families. Indeed, the gradual falling off of his correspondence with Jane, and the common-place character of his few last letters, left little room to hope that his affection for her had stood the severe test of time and absence. One morning about this period she brought William into the garden, and after a turn or two, laid her hand gently upon his arm, saying,

"William, I have a secret to entrust you with."

"A secret, Jane—well, I shall keep it honorably—what is it, dear?"

"I am very unhappy."

"Surely that's no secret to me, my poor girl?"

She shook her head.

"No, no; that's not it; but this is—I strongly suspect that you all know more about Charles than I do."

She fixed her eyes with an earnest penetration on him as she spoke.

"He is expected home soon, Jane."

"He is not ill, William; and you have all permitted me to deceive myself into a belief that he is; because you felt that I would rather ten thousand times that he were dead than false—than false."

"He could not, he dare not be false to you, my dear, after having been solemnly betrothed to you, I may say, with the consent of your father and his."

"Dare not—ha—there is meaning in that, William: your complexion is heightened, too; and so I have found out your secret, my brother. Sunk as is my heart, you see I have greater penetration than you dreamed of. So he is not sick, but false; and his love for me is gone like a dream.—Well, well; but yet I have laid down my own plan of re- signation. You would not guess what it is? Come, guess: I will hear nothing further till you guess."

He thought it was better to humor her, and replied in ac- cordance with the hope of his father—

"Religion, my dear Jane, and reliance on God."

"That was my first plan; that was the plan in case the malady I suspected had taken him from me—but what is my plan for his falsehood?"

"I cannot guess, dear Jane."

"Death, William. What consoler like death? what peace so calm as that of the grave? Let the storms of life howl ever so loudly, go but six inches beneath the clay of the church-yard, and how still is all there!"

"Indeed, Jane, you distress yourself without cause; never trust me again if Charles will not soon come home, and you and he be happy. Why, my dear Jane, I thought you had more fortitude than to sink under a calamity that has not yet reached you. Surely it will be time enough when you find that Charles is false to take it so much to heart as you do."

"That is a good and excellent advice, my dear William; but listen, and I will give a far better one: never deceive your father; never prevaricate with papa; and then you may rest satisfied that your heart will not be crushed by such a calamity as that which has fallen upon me. I de- ceived papa; and I am now the poor hopeless castaway that you see me. Remember that advice, William—keep it, and God will bless you."

William would have remonstrated with her at greater length, but he saw that she was resolved to have no further conversation on the subject. When it was closed she walked slowly and composedly out of the garden, and im- mediately took her away to those favorite places among which she was latterly in the habit of wandering. One of her expressions, however, sunk upon his affectionate heart too deeply to permit him to rest under the fearful apprehen- sion which it generated. After musing for a little he fol- lowed her with a pale face and a tearful eye, resolved to draw from her, with as much tenderness as possible, the exact meaning which, in her allusion to Osborne's false- hood, she had applied to death.

He found her sitting upon that bank of the river which we have already described, and exactly opposite to the pre- cise spot in the stream from which Osborne had rescued her dove. The bird sat on her shoulder, and he saw by her gesture that she was engaged in an earnest address to it.—He came on gently behind her, actuated by that kind curi- osity which knows that in such unguarded moments a key may possibly be obtained to the abrupt and capricious im- pulses by which persons laboring under impressions so va- riable may be managed.

"Ariel," said she, "have I not often pointed you out the spot which would have been fatal to you, were it not for him—for him! There it is! do you not see it? No, as I live, your eye is turned up sideways toward me, instead of looking at it, as if you asked why, dear mistress, do you scold me so? And indeed I do not know, Ariel. I scarce- ly know—but I am here—so are you—but where is he?"

She was then silent for a considerable time, and sat with her head on her hand. William could perceive that she sighed deeply.

He advanced; and on hearing his foot she started, looked about, and on seeing him, smiled.

"I am amusing myself, William," said she.

"How, my dear Jane—how?"

"Why, by the remembrance of my former misery. You know that the recollection of all past happiness is misery to the miserable—is it not? but of that you are no judge, William—you were never miserable."

"Nor shall you be so, Jane, longer than until Charles re- turns; but touching your second plan of resignation, love, I do not understand how death could be resignation."

"Do you not? then I will tell you. Should Charles prove false to me—that would break my heart. I should die, and then—then—do you not see—comes Death, the consoler."

"I see, dear sister; but there will be no necessity for that. Charles will be, and is, faithful and true to you. Will you come home with me, dear Jane?"

"At present I cannot, William; I have places to see and things to think of that are pleasant to me. I may al- most say so; because, as I told you, they amuse me. Let misery have its mirth, William; the remembrance of past happiness is mine."

"Jane, if you love me, come home with me now."

"If I do. Ah, William, that's ungenerous. You are well aware that I do, and so you use an argument which you know I won't resist. Come," addressing the dove, "we must go; we are put upon our generosity; for of course we do love poor William. Yes, we will go, William; it is better, I believe."

She then took his arm, and both walked home without speaking another word; Jane having relapsed into a pettish silence which her brother felt it impossible to break with- out creating unnecessary excitement in a mind already too much disturbed.

From this day forward Jane's mind, fragile as it naturally was, appeared to bend at once under the double burthen of Osborne's approaching death, and his apprehended treachery; for wherever the heart is forced to choose between two contingent evils, it is also by the very constitution of our nature compelled to bear the penalty of both until its gloomy choice is made. At present Jane was not certain whether Osborne's absence and neglect were occasioned by ill health or faithlessness; and until she knew this, the double dread fell, as we said, with proportionate misery upon her spirit.

Bitterly indeed did William regret the words in which he desired her "to suppose that Charles Osborne was not sick." Mr. Sinclair himself saw the error, but unhappily too late to prevent the suspicion from entering into an im- agination already over wrought and disordered.

Hitherto, however, it was difficult, if not impossible, out of her own family, to notice in her manner or conversation the workings of a mind partially unsettled by a passion which her constitutional melancholy darkened by its own gloomy creations. To strangers she talked rationally, and with her usual grace and perspicuity, but every one observed that her cheerfulness was gone, and the current report went, by whatever means it got abroad—that Charles Osborne had proved faithless—and that the beautiful Fawn of Spring-vale was subject to occasional derangement.

In the mean time Osborne was silent both to his father and to her, and as time advanced, the mood of her mind became too seriously unhappy and alarming to justify any further patience on the part either of his family or Mr. Sinclair's. It was consequently settled that Osborne should set out for Bath, and compel his son's return, under the hope that a timely interview might restore the deserted girl to a better state of mind, and reproduce in his heart that affection which appeared to have either numbered or died. With a brow of care the excellent man departed, for in addition to the concern which he felt for the calamity of Jane Sinclair and Charles's honor, he also experienced all the anxiety natural to an affectionate father, ignorant of the situation in which he might find an only son, who up to that period had been, and justly so, inexpressibly dear to him.

His absence, however, was soon discovered by Jane, who now began to give many proofs of that address with which unsettled persons can manage to gain a point or extract a secret, when either in their own opinion is considered essential to their gratification. Every member of her own family now became subjected to her vigilance; every word they spoke was heard with suspicion, and received as if it possessed a double meaning. On more than one occasion she was caught in the attitude of a listener, and frequently placed herself in such a position when sitting with her relations at home, as enabled her to watch their motions in the glass, when they supposed her engaged in some melancholy abstraction.

Yet bitter, bitter as all this must have been to their hearts, it was singular to mark, that as the light of her reason receded, a new and solemn feeling of reverence was added to all of love, and sorrow, and pity, that they had hitherto experienced toward her. Now, too, was her sway over them more commanding, though exercised only in the woful meekness of a broken heart; for, indeed, there is in the darkness of unmerited affliction, a spirit which elevates its object, and makes unsuffering nature humble in its presence. Who is there that has a heart—and few, alas, have—that does not feel himself constrained to bend his head with reverence before those who move in the majesty of undeserved sorrow?

Mr. Osborne had not been many days gone, when Jane one morning after breakfast desired the family not to separate far about an hour, or if they did, to certainly re-assemble within that period. "And in the mean time," she said, addressing Agnes, "I want you, my dear Agnes, to assist me at my toilette, as they say. I am about to dress in my very best, and it cannot, you know, be from vanity, for I have no one now to gratify but yourselves—come."

Mr. Sinclair beckoned with his hand to Agnes to attend her, and they accordingly left the room together.

"What is the reason, Agnes," she said, "that there is so much mystery in this family? I do not like these nods, and beckonings, and gestures, all so full of meaning. It grieves me to see my papa, who is the very soul of truth and candor, have recourse to them. But, alas, should I blame any of you, when I know that it is from an excess of indulgence to poor Jane, and to avoid giving her pain that you do it?"

"Well, we will not do it any more, love, if it pains or is disagreeable to you."

"It confounds me, Agnes, it injures my head, and sometimes makes me scarcely know where I am, or who are about me. I begin to think that there is some dreadful secret among you; and I think of coffins, and deaths, or of marriages, and wedding favors, and all that. Now, I can't bear to think of marriages, but death has something consoling in it; give me death the consoler: yet," she added, musing, "we shall not die, but we shall be all changed."

"Jane, love, may I ask you, why you are dressing with such care?"

"When we go down stairs I shall tell you. It's wonderful, wonderful!"

"What is, dear?"

"My fortune. But those words were prophetic. I remember well what I felt when I heard them; to be sure he placed them in a different light from what I at first understood them in; but I am handsomer now, I think. You will be a witness for me below, Agnes; will you not?"

"To be sure, darling."

"Agnes, where are my tears gone of late? I think I ought to be able to shed them; I ought—I ought."

Agnes could bear no more. "Jane," she exclaimed, clasping her in her arms, and kissing her smiling lips, for she smiled while uttering the last words, "oh, Jane, don't, do n't, my darling, or you'll break my heart, your own Agnes's heart whom you loved so well, and whose happiness or misery is bound up in yours."

"I am unhappy Jane Sinclair!" she continued. "No, I won't distress you, dear Agnes; here, I will kiss you, love, and dry your tears, and then when I am dressed you shall know all."

She took up her own handkerchief as she spoke, and after having again kissed her sister, wiped her cheeks and dried her eyes with childlike tenderness and affection. She then looked sorrowfully upon Agnes, and said—"Oh, Agnes, Agnes, but my heart is heavy!—heavy!"

Agnes's tears were again beginning to flow, but Jane once more kissed her, and hastily wiping her eyes, exclaimed in that sweet, low voice with which we address children, "Hush, hush, Agnes, do not cry, I will not make you sorry any more."

She then went on to dress herself, but uttered not another word until she and Agnes met the family below stairs.

"I am now come, papa, and mamma, and William, and my darling Maria—but, Maria, listen, I won't have a tear—and you, Agnes—I am come now to tell you a secret."

"And, dearest life," said her mother, "what is it?"

"What made them call me the Fawn of Spring-vale?"

"For your gentleness, love," said Mr. Sinclair.

"And for your beauty, darling," added her mother.

"Papa has it," she replied quickly; "for my gentleness, for my gentleness—my beauty, mamma, I am not beautiful."

While uttering these words, she approached the looking-glass, and surveyed herself with a smile of irony that seemed to disclaim her own assertion. But it was easy to perceive that the irony was directed to some one not then present, and that it was also associated with the memory of something painful to her in an extreme degree.

Not beautiful: Never did mortal form gifted with beauty approaching nearer to our conception of the divine or angelic, stand smiling in the consciousness of its own charms before a mirror.

"Now," she proceeded, "I am going to make everything quite plain. I never told you this before, but it is time I should now. Listen—Charles Osborne bound himself by a curse, that if he met during his absence a girl more beautiful than I am—or than I was then, I should say—he would cease to write to me—he would cease to love me. Now, here's my secret—he has found a girl more beautiful than I am—than I was then, I mean—for he has ceased to write to me—and of course he has ceased to love me. So, mamma, I am not beautiful, and the Fawn of Spring-vale—his own Jane Sinclair is forgotten."

She sat down and hung her head for some minutes, and the family, thinking that she either wept or was about to weep, did not think it right to address her. She rose up, however, and said:

"Agnes is my witness. Did not you, Agnes, say that I am now much handsomer than when Charles saw me last?"

"I did, darling, and I do."

"Very well, mamma—perhaps you will find me beautiful yet. Now the case is this, and I will be guided by my papa. Let me see—Charles may have seen a girl more beautiful than I was then—but how does he know whether she is more beautiful than I am now?"

It was—it was woful to see a creature of such unparalleled grace and loveliness working out the calculations of insanity, in order to sustain a broken heart.

"But then," she added, still smiling in conscious beauty, "why does he not come to see me now? Why does he not come?"

After musing again for some time, she dropped on her knees in one of those rapid transitions of feeling peculiar to persons of her unhappy class; and joining her hands, looked up to Agnes with a countenance utterly and indescribably mournful, exclaiming as she did it, in the same words as before:

"Oh Agnes, Agnes, but my heart is heavy!"

She then laid down her head on her sister's knees, and for a long time mused and murmured to herself, as if her mind was busily engaged on some topic full of grief and misery. This was evident by the depth of her sighs, which shook her whole frame, and heaved with convulsive quiverings through her bosom. Having remained in this posture about ten minutes, she arose, and without speaking, or noticing any one of the family, went out and sauntered with slow and melancholy steps about the places where she loved to walk.

Mr. Sinclair's family at this period, and indeed for a considerable time past, were placed, with reference to their unhappy daughter, in circumstances of peculiar distress. Their utter ignorance of Osborne's designs put it out of their power to adopt any particular mode of treatment in Jane's case. They could neither give her hope, nor prepare her mind for disappointment; but were forced to look passively on, though with hearts wrung into agony, while her miserable malady every day gained new strength in its progress of desolation. The crisis was near at hand, however, that was to terminate their suspense. A letter from Mr. Osborne arrived, in which he informed them that Charles had left Bath for London, in company with a family of rank, a few days before he had reached it. He mentioned the name of the baronet, whose beautiful daughter, possessing an ample fortune at her own disposal, fame reported to have been smitten with his son's singular beauty and accomplishments. It was also said, he added, that the lady had prevailed on her father to sanction young Osborne's addresses to her, and that the baronet, who was a strong political partisan, calculating on his pre-eminent talents, intended to bring him into parliament, in order to strengthen his party. He added, that he himself was then starting for London, to pursue his son, and rescue him from an act which would stamp his name with utter baseness and dishonor.

This communication, so terrible in its import to a family of such worth and virtue, was read to them by Mr. Sinclair during one of those solitary rambles which Jane was in the habit of taking every day.

"Now, my children," said the white-haired father, summoning all the fortitude of a Christian man to his aid—"now we must show ourselves not ignorant of those resources which the religion of Christ opens to all who are for his wise purposes grievously and heavily afflicted. Let us act as becomes the dignity of our faith. Another letter from Mr. Osborne will decide all, and until then we must suffer in silent reliance upon the mercy of God. Oh, may God of his mercy sustain our child, and bear her in his own right hand through this heavy woe!"

This admonition did not fall on them in vain—for until the receipt of Mr. Osborne's letter from London, not even Jane, with all her vigilance, was able to detect in their looks or manner any change or expression beyond what she usually noticed. That letter at length arrived, and, as they had expected, filled up the measure of Osborne's dishonor and their affliction. The contents were brief but fearful. Mr. Osborne stated that he arrived in London on the second day after his son's marriage, and found, to his unutterable distress, that he and his fashionable wife had departed for the continent on the very day the ceremony took place.

"I could not," proceeded his father, "wrench my heart so suddenly out of the strong affection it felt for the hope of my past life, as to curse him; but from this day forward I disown him as my son. You know not, my friend, what I feel, and what I suffer; for he who was the pride of my declining years has, by this act of unprincipled ambition, set his seal to the unhappiness of his father. I am told, indeed, that the lady is very beautiful—and amiable as she is beautiful—and that their passion for each other amounts to idolatry; but neither her beauty nor her wealth, nor her goodness, could justify my son in an act of such cruel and abandoned perfidy to a creature who seems to be more nearly related to the angelic nature than the human."

"You see, my children," observed Mr. Sinclair, "that the worst, as far as relates to Osborne, is before us. I have nothing new to add to what I have already said on the receipt of the letter from Bath. You know your duty, and with God's assistance I trust you will act up to it. At present it might be fatal to our child were she to know what has happened; nor, indeed, are we qualified to break the matter to her, without the advice of some medical man, eminent in cases similar to that which afflicts her."

These observations were scarcely concluded when Jane entered the room, and, as usual, cast a calm but searching glance around her. She saw that they had been in tears, and that they tried in vain to force their faces into a hurried composure, that seemed strangely at variance with what they felt.

After a slight pause she sat down, and putting her hand to her temple, mused for some minutes. They observed that a sorrow more deep and settled than usual, was expressed on her countenance. Her eyes were filled, although tears did not come, and the muscles of her lips quivered excessively; yet she did not speak; and such was the solemnity of the moment to them, who knew all, that none of them could find voice sufficiently firm to address her.

"Papa," said she, at length, "this has been a day of busy thought with me. I think I see, and I am sure I feel my own situation. The only danger is, that I may feel it too much. I fear I have felt it—(she put her hand to her forehead as she spoke)—I fear I have felt it too deeply already. Pauses—lapses, or perhaps want of memory for a certain space, occasioned by—by—" she hesitated. "Bear with me, papa, and mamma; bear with me; for this is a great effort; let me recollect myself and do not speak to me or question me until I—. It is, it is woful to see me reduced to this; but nothing is seriously wrong with me yet—nothing. Let me see; yes, yes; papa, here it is. Let us not be reduced to the miserable necessity of watching each other, as we have been. Let me know the worst. You have nearly broken me down by suspense. Let me know the purport of the letter you received to-day."

"To-day, love!" exclaimed her mother.

"Yes, mamma, to-day. I made John show it to me on his way from the post-office. The superscription was Mr. Osborne's hand. Let me, oh, let me," she exclaimed, dropping down upon her knees, "as you value my happiness here and hereafter, let me at once know the worst—the very worst. Am I not the daughter of a pious minister of the Gospel, and do you think I shall or can forget the instructions I received from his lips? Treat me as a rational being, if you wish me to remain rational. But oh, as you love my happiness here, and my soul's salvation, do not, papa, do not, mamma, do not, Maria, do not, Agnes, William,—do not one or all of you keep your unhappy sister hanging in the agony of suspense! It will kill me!—it will kill me!"

Suppressed sobs there were, which no firmness could restrain. But in a few moments those precepts of the Christian pastor, which we have before mentioned, came forth among this sorrowing family, in the same elevated spirit which dictated them. When Jane had concluded this appeal to her father, there was a dead silence in the room, and every eye glanced from him to her, full of uncertainty as to what course of conduct he would pursue. He turned his eyes upward for a few moments, and said:

"Can truth, my children, under any circumstances, be injurious to—"

"Oh, no, no, papa," exclaimed Jane; "I know—I feel the penalty paid for even the indirect violation of it."

"In the name of God, then," exclaimed the well-meaning man, "we will rely upon the good sense and religious principle of our dear Jane, and tell her the whole truth."

"Henry dear!" said Mrs. Sinclair, in a tone of expostulation.

"Oh, papa," said Agnes, "remember your own words!"

"The truth, my papa, the truth!" said Jane. "You are its accredited messenger."

"Jane," said he, "is your trust strong in the support of the Almighty?"

"I have no other dependence, papa."

"Then," said he, "this is the truth: Charles Osborne has been false to you. He has broken his vows: he is married to another woman. And now, my child, may the God of truth, and peace, and mercy, sustain and console you!"

"And he will, too, my papa!—he will!" she exclaimed, rising up;—"he will! he will! I—I think I know something. I violated truth, and now truth is my punishment. I violated it to my papa, and now my papa is the medium of that punishment. Well, then, there's a Providence proved. But in the meantime, mamma, what has become of my beauty? It is gone—it is gone—and now for humility and repentance—now for sack cloth and ashes. I am now no longer beautiful!—so off, off go the trappings of vanity."

She put her hands up to her bosom, and began to tear down her dress with a violence so powerful, that it took William and Maria's strength to prevent her. She became furious. "Let me go," she exclaimed, "let me go; I am bound to a curse; but, Charles, Charles—do n't you see he will be poisoned? he will kiss her and be poisoned; poisoned lips for Charles, and I to see it!—and mine here with balm upon them, and peace and love! He is lost, and I am lost, and the world has destroyed us."

She wrought with incredible strength, and attempted still, while speaking, to tear her garments off; but finding herself overpowered, she at length sat down and passed from this state of violence into a mood so helplessly calm, that the family, now in an agony of grief, with the exception of her father, who appeared cool, felt their very hearts shiver at the vacant serenity of her countenance.

Her mother went over, and, seizing her husband firmly by the arms, pulled him toward her, and with an ashy face and parched lips, exclaimed, "There, Henry—all is over—our child is an idiot!"

"Oh do not blame me," said the broken-hearted father; "I did it for the best. Had I thought—had I thought—but I will speak to her, for I think my voice will reach her heart—you know how she loved me."

"Jane," said he, approaching her, "Jane, my dearest life, will you not speak to your papa?"

She became uneasy again, and much to their relief, broke silence.

"I am not," said she calmly; "it is gone; I was once though—and it was said so; I was called the Fawn of—of—but it seems beauty passes like the flower of the field."

"Darling, speak to me, to your papa."

"I believe I am old now; an old woman, I suppose. My hair is gray, and I am wrinkled; that's the reason why they scorn me; well I was once both young and beautiful; but that is past. Charles," said she, catching her father's hand and looking into it, "you are old, too, I believe. Why—why—why, how is this? Your hair is long and white. Oh, what a change since I knew you last. White hair! long, white, venerable, hair—that's old age—"

"Pity old age within whose silver hairs Honor and reverence evermore do lie."

CHAPTER XI.

"Thank God, dear Henry" said her mother, "she is not at all events an idiot. Children," said she, "I trust you will remember your father's advice, and bear this—this—"

But here the heart and strength of the mother herself were overcome, and she was sinking down when her son caught her ere she fell, and carried her out in his arms, accompanied by Maria and Agnes.

It would be difficult for any pen to paint the distraction of her father, thus placed in a state of divided apprehension between his daughter and his wife.

"Oh, my child, my child," he exclaimed, "perhaps in the midst of this misery, your mother may be dying! May the God of all consolation support you and her! What, oh, what will become of us!"

"Well, well," his daughter went on; "life's a fearful thing that can work such changes; but why may we not as well pass at once from youth to old age as from happiness to misery? Here we are both old; ay, and if we are gray it is less with age than affliction—that's one comfort—I am young enough to be beautiful yet; but age, when it comes prematurely on the youthful, as it often does—thanks to treachery and disappointment, ay, and a thousand causes which we all know but do not wish to think of; age, I say, when it comes prematurely on the youthful, is just like a new and unfinished house that is suffered to fall into ruin—desolation, naked, and fresh, and glaring—without the reverence and grandeur of antiquity. Yes—yes—yes; but there is another cause; and that must be whispered only to the uttermost depths of silence—of silence; for silence is the voice of God. That word—that word! Oh, how I shudder to think of it! And who will pity me when I acknowledge it—there is one—one only—who will mourn for my despair and the fate, foreordained and predestinated, of one whom he loved—that is my papa—my papa only—my papa only; for he knows that I am a castaway—A CASTAWAY!"

These words were uttered with an energy of manner and a fluency of utterance which medical men know to be strongly characteristic of insanity, unless indeed where the malady is silent and moping. The afflicted old man now discovered that his daughter's mind had, in addition to her disappointment, sunk under the frightful and merciless dogma which we trust will soon cease to darken and distort the beneficent character of God. Indeed it might have been evident to him before that in looking upon herself as a castaway, Jane's sensitive spirit was gradually lapsing into the gloomy horrors of predestination. But this blindness of the father to such a tendency was very natural in a man to whose eye familiarity with the doctrine had removed its deformity. The old man looked upon her countenance with an expression of mute affliction almost verging on despair; for a moment he forgot the situation of his wife and everything but the consequences of a discovery so full of terror and dismay.

"Alas, my unhappy child," he exclaimed, "and is this, too, to be added to your misery and ours! Now, indeed, is the cup of your affliction full even to overflowing. Enable us, O God, to acquiesce under this mysterious manifestation of thy will, and to receive from thy hand with patience and resignation whatsoever of affliction it pleaseth thee to lay upon us. And touching this stricken one—if it were thy blessed will to—to—but no—oh no—not our will, oh Lord, but thine be done!"

It was indeed a beautiful thing to see the sorrow-bound father bowing down his gray locks with humility before the footstool of his God, and forbearing even to murmur under a dispensation so fearfully calamitous to him and his.

When Mr. Sinclair arose, his countenance, through all the traces of sorrow which were upon it, beamed with a light which no principle merely human could communicate to it. A dim but gentle and holy radiance suffused his whole face, and his heart, for a moment, received the assurance it wanted so much.

In a few minutes after he had concluded his short but earnest prayer, Agnes returned to let him know that her mamma was better and would presently come in to sit with Jane, whom she could not permit, she said, to remain out of her sight. Jane had been silent for some time, but the extreme brilliancy of her eyes and the energy of her excitement were too obvious to permit any expectation of immediate improvement.

When her mother and Maria returned, accompanied also by William, she took no notice whatsoever of them, nor indeed did she appear to have an eye for any thing external to her own deep but unsettled misery. Time after time, they spoke to her as before, each earnestly hoping that some favorite expression or familiar tone of voice might impinge, however slightly, upon her reason, or touch some chord of her affections. These tender devices of their love, however, all failed; no corresponding emotion was awakened, and they resolved, without loss of time, to see what course of treatment medical advice would recommend them to pursue on her behalf. Accordingly, William proceeded with a heavy heart to call in the aid of a gentleman who can bear full testimony to the accuracy of our narrative—we allude to that able and eminent practitioner, Doctor McCormick of Belfast, whose powers of philosophical analysis and patient investigation are surpassed only by the success of the masterly skill with which he applies them. The moment he left the room for this purpose, Jane spoke.

"It will be heard," she said, "and I need not conceal it, for my very thought has a voice at the footstool of the Almighty; the intelligences of other worlds know it; all the invisible spirits of the universe know it; those that are evil rejoice, and the good would murmur if the fulness of their own happiness permitted them. No—no—I need not conceal it—hearken—hearken—Jane Sinclair—is predestinated to eternal misery. She is a castaway. I may therefore speak and raise my voice to warn; who shall dare," she added, "who shall dare ever to depart from the truth? Those—those only who have been foredoomed—like me. Oh misery, misery, is there no hope? Alas! alas! Death to me now is no consoler!"

She clasped her beautiful hands together as she spoke, and looked with a countenance so full of unutterable woe that no heart could avoid participating in her misery.

"Jane, oh darling of all our hearts," said her weeping mother, "will you not come over and sit beside your mamma, my treasure, who feels that she cannot long live to witness what you suffer?"

"The Fawn of Spring-vale," she proceeded, "the gentle Fawn of Spring-vale, for it was on account of my gentleness I was so called, is stricken—the arrow is here—in her poor broken heart; and what did she do? what did the gentle creature do to suffer or to deserve all this misery?"

"True, my sister—too true, too true," said Maria, bursting into an agony of bitter sorrow; "what strange mystery is in the gentle one's affliction? Surely, if there was ever a spotless or a sinless creature on earth, she was and is that creature."

"Beware of murmuring, Maria, said her father; 'the purpose, though at present concealed, may yet become sufficiently apparent for us to recognise in it the benign dispensation of a merciful God. Our duty, my dear child, is now to bear, and be resigned. The issues of this sad calamity are with the Almighty, and with him let us patiently leave them.'"

"Had I never disclosed my love," proceeded Jane, "I might have stolen quietly away from them all, and laid my cheek on that hardest pillow which giveth the soundest sleep; but would not concealment," she added, starting; "would not that too have been dissimulation? Oh God help me!—it is, it is clear that in any event I was foredoomed!"

Agnes, who had watched her sister with an interest too profound to suffer even the grief necessary on such an occasion to take place, now went over, and taking her hand in one of hers placed the fingers of the other upon her sister's cheek, thus attempting to fix Jane's eyes upon her own countenance—

"Do you not know who it is," said she, "that is now speaking to you?—Look upon me, and tell me do you forget me so soon?"

"Who can tell yet," she proceeded, "who can tell yet—time may retrieve all, and he may return; but the yew tree—I fear—I fear—why, it is an emblem of death; and perhaps death may unite us—yes, and I say he will—he will—he will. Does he not feel pity? Oh yes, in a thousand, thousand cases he is the friend of the miserable. Death the Consoler! Oh from how many an aching brow does he take away the pain for ever? How many sorrows does he soothe into rest that is never broken!—from how many hearts like mine, does he pluck the arrows that fester in them, and bids them feel pain no more! In this house, that house appointed for all living—what calmness and peace is there! How sweet and tranquil is the bed which he smooths down for the unhappy; there the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest. Then give me Death the Consoler!—Death the Consoler!"

A sense of relief and wild exultation beamed from her countenance, on uttering the last words, and she rose up and walked about the room wringing her hands, yet smiling at the idea of being relieved by Death the Consoler! It is not indeed unusual to witness in deranged persons, an unconscious impression of pain and misery, accompanied at the same time by a vague sense of unreal happiness—that is, a happiness which, while it balances the latent conviction of their misery, does not, however, ultimately remove it. This probably constitutes that pleasure in madness, which, it is said, none but mad persons know.

At length she stood, and, for a long time seemed musing upon various and apparently contrasted topics, for she sometimes smiled like a girl at play, and sometimes relapsed into darkness of mood and pain, and incoherency. But after passing through these rapid changes for many minutes, she suddenly exclaimed in a low but earnest voice, "where is he?"

"Where is who, love?" said her mother.

"Where is he?—why does he not come?—something more than usual must prevent him, or he would not stay away so long from 'his own Jane Sinclair.' But I forgot; bless me, how feeble my memory is growing! Why this is the hour of our appointment, and I will be late unless I hurry—for who could give so gentle and affectionate a being as Charles pain?"

She immediately put on her bonnet, and was about to go abroad; when her father, gently laying his hand upon her arm, said, in a kind but admonitory voice, in which was blended a slightly perceptible degree of parental authority—

"My daughter, surely you will not go out—you are unwell."

She started slightly, paused, and looked as if trying to remember something that she had forgotten. The struggle, however, was vain—her recollection proved too weak for the task it had undertaken. After a moment's effort, she smiled sweetly in her father's face, and said—

"You would not have me break my appointment, nor give poor Charles pain, and his health, moreover, so delicate. You know he would die rather than give me a moment's anxiety. Die!—see that again—I know not what puts death into my head so often."

"Henry," said her mother, "it is probably better to let her have her own way for the present—at least until Dr. McCormick arrives. You and Agnes can accompany her, perhaps she may be the better for it."

"I cannot refuse her," said the old man; "at all events, I agree with you; there can, I think, be no possible harm in allowing her to go. Come, Agnes, we must, alas! take care of her."

She then went out, they walking a few paces behind her, and proceeded down the valley which we have already described in the opening of this story, until she came to the spot at the river where she first met Osborne. Here she involuntarily stood a moment, and putting her hand to her right shoulder, seemed to miss some object that was obviously restored to her recollection by an association connected with the place. She shook her head, and sighed several times, and then exclaimed:

"Ungrateful bird, does it neglect me too?"

Her father pressed Agnes's arm with a sensation of joy, but spoke not, lest his voice might disturb her, or break the apparent continuity of her reviving memory. She seemed to think, however, that she delayed here too long; for without taking further notice of any thing, she hurried on to the spot where the first disclosure of their loves had taken place. On reaching it she looked anxiously and earnestly around the copse or dell in which the yew tree, with its turf seat, stood.

"How is this? how is this?" she murmured to herself; "he is not here!"

Both her father and Agnes observed that during the whole course of the unhappy but faithful girl's love, they never had witnessed such a concentrated expression of utter woe and sorrow as now impressed themselves upon her features.

"He has not come," said she; "but I can wait—I can wait; it will teach my heart to be patient."

She then clasped her hands, and sitting down under the shade of the yew tree, mused and murmured to herself alternately, but in such an evident spirit of desolation and despair, as made her father fear that her heart would literally break down under the heavy burthen of her misery. When she had sat here nearly an hour, he approached her, and gently taking her hand, which felt as cold as marble, said:

"Will you not come home, darling? Your mamma is anxious you should return to her. Come"—and he attempted gently to draw her with him.

"I can wait, I can wait," she replied; "if he should come and find me gone, he would break his heart—I can wait."

"Oh, do not droop, my sweet sister; do not droop so much; all will yet be well," said Agnes, weeping.

"I care for none but him. To me there is only one being in life; all else is a blank. But he will not come—and is it not too much to try the patience of a heart so fond and faithful as mine?"

"It is not likely he will come to-day," replied Agnes; "something has prevented him; but to-morrow—"

"I will seek him elsewhere," said Jane, rising suddenly.

"But is it not singular, indeed, to what strange passions things may come? A young lady seeking her lover!—not over-modest, certainly—nay, positively indelicate. Fie upon me! Why should I thus expose myself? It is unworthy of my father's daughter, and Jane Sinclair will not do it."

She then walked a few paces homeward, but again stopped and earnestly looked in every direction, as if expecting to see the object of her love. Long, indeed, did she linger about a spot so dear to her; and often did she sit down again, and rise to go—sometimes wringing her hands in the muteness of sorrow, and sometimes exhibiting a sense of her neglect in terms of pettish and indirect censure against Osborne for his delay. It was in one of those capricious moments that she bent her steps homeward; and as she had again to pass that part of the river where the accident occurred to the dove, Agnes and her father observed that she instinctively put her hand to her shoulder, and appeared as if disappointed. On this occasion, however, she made no observation whatever, but, much to their satisfaction, mechanically proceeded toward Spring-Vale House, which she reached without uttering another word.

Until a short time before the arrival of Dr. McCormick, this silence remained unbroken. She sat nearly in the same attitude, evidently pondering on something that excited great pain, as was observable by her frequent startings, and a disposition to look wildly about her, as if with an intention of suddenly speaking. These, however, passed quickly away, and she generally relapsed into her wild and unsettled reveries.

When the doctor arrived, he sat with her in silence for a considerable time—listening to her incoherencies from an anxiety to ascertain, as far as possible, by what she might utter, whether her insanity was likely to be transient or otherwise. The cause of it he had already heard from report generally, and a more exact and circumstantial account on that day from her brother William.

"It is difficult," he at length said, "to form any thing like an exact opinion upon the first attack of insanity, arising from a disappointment of the heart. Much depends upon the firmness of the general character, and the natural force of common sense. If I were to judge, not only by what I have heard from this most beautiful and interesting creature, as well as from the history of her heart, which her brother gave me so fully, I would say that I think this attack will not be a long one. I am of opinion that her mind is in a state of transition, not from reason but to it; and that this transition will not be completed without much physical suffering. The state of her pulse assures me of this, as does the coldness of her hands. I should not be surprised if, in the course of this very night she were attacked with strong fits. These, if they take place, will either restore her to reason or confirm her insanity. Poor girl," said the amiable man, looking on her while his eyes filled with tears; "he must have been a heartless wretch to abandon such a creature. My dear Jane," he added, addressing her, for he had been, and still is familiar with the family, "I am sorry to find that you are so unwell, but you will soon be better. Do you not know me?"

"It was sworn," said the unhappy mourner, "it was sworn, and I felt this here—here"—and she placed her hand upon her heart; "I felt this little tenant of my poor bosom sink—sink, and my blood going from my cheeks when the words were uttered. More beautiful! more beautiful! why, and what is love if it is borne away merely by beauty? I loved him not for his beauty alone—I loved him because he—he—because he loved me—but at first I did love him for his beauty; well he has found another more beautiful; and his own Jane Sinclair, his Fawn of Spring-vale, as he used to call me, is forgotten. But mark me—let none dare to blame him—he only fulfilled his destined part—the thing was foredoomed, and I knew that by my suppression of the truth to my papa, the seal of reprobation was set to my soul. Then—then it was that I felt myself a castaway! And indeed," she added, rising up and laying the fore finger of her right hand on the palm of her left, "I would at any time sacrifice myself for his happiness; I would; yet alas," she added, sitting down and hanging her head in sorrow; "why—why is it that I am so miserable, when he is happy? Why is that, Miss Jane Sinclair—why is that?"—she then sighed deeply, and added, in a tone of pathos almost irresistible—"Oh that I had the wings of a dove, that I might flee away and be at rest."

She had scarcely spoken, when, by a beautiful and affecting coincidence, Ariel entered the room, and immediately flew into her bosom. She put her hand up and patted it for some time rather unconsciously than otherwise.

"Ah, you foolish bird," she at length said; "have you no better place of refuge; no calmer spot to repose upon, than a troubled and a broken heart?"

This incident of the dove, together with the mournful truth of this melancholy observation, filled every eye with tears, except those of her father, who now exhibited a spirit of calm obedience to what he considered an affliction that called upon him to act as one whose faith was not the mere theory of a Christian.

"But," added Jane, "there is, I know, one that loves me, and one that pities me. My papa knows that I am foredoomed, and cannot but pity me; but where is he? and why does he delay so long? Hush I will sing—

The dawning of morn, the daylight's sinking,
The night long hours still find me thinking
Of thee, thee—only thee!

She poured a spirit into these words so full of the wild sorrow of insanity, as to produce an effect that was thrilling and fearful upon those who were forced to listen to her. Nay, her voice seemed, in some degree, to awaken her emotions, or to revive her memory to a confused perception of her situation. And in mercy it would appear that Providence unveiled only half her misery to reason; for from the effect which even that passing glimpse had upon her, it is not wrong to infer that had she seen it in its full extent, she would have immediately sunk under it.

After singing the words of Moore with all the unregulated pathos of a maniac, she wrung her hands, and was for a considerable time silent. During this interval she sighed deeply, and after a pause of half an hour arose suddenly, and seizing her father by the breast of the coat, brought him over, and placed him on the sofa beside her. She then looked earnestly into his face, and was about to speak, but her thoughts were too weak for the task, and after putting her hand to her forehead, as if to assist her recollection, she let it fall passively beside her, and hung her head in a mood, partaking at once of childish pique and deep dejection.

The doctor, who watched her closely, observed, that in his opinion the consequences of the unhappy intelligence that day communicated to her, had not yet fully developed themselves. "The storm has not yet burst," he added, but it is quite evident that the elements for it are fast gathering. She will certainly have a glimpse of reason before the paroxysms appear, because, in point of fact, that is what will induce them."

"How soon, doctor," asked her mother, "do you think she will have to encounter this fresh and woful trial?"

"I should be disposed to think within the lapse of twenty-four hours; certainly within forty-eight."

The amiable doctor's opinion, however, was much more quickly verified than he imagined; for Jane, whose heart yearned towards her father with the beautiful instinct of an affection which scarcely insanity itself could overcome, once more looked earnestly into his face, with an eye in which meaning and madness seemed to struggle with each other for the mastery. She gazed at him for a long time, put her hands upon his white hair, into which she twined her long white fingers; once or twice she smiled, and said something in a voice too low to be heard; but at length she gave a convulsive start, clasped her hands wofully, and throwing herself on his bosom, exclaimed—

"Oh, papa—your child is lost: pray for me—pray for me."

Her sobs became too thick and violent for further utterance: she panted and wrought strongly, until at length she lay with locked teeth and clenched hands struggling in a fit which eventually, by leaving her, terminated in a state of lethargic insensibility.

For upward of three days she suffered more than any person acquainted with her delicacy of constitution could deem her capable of enduring. And, indeed, were it not that the aid rendered by Dr. McCormick was so prompt and skillful, it is possible that the sorrows of the faithful Jane Sinclair might have here closed. On the fourth day, however, she experienced a change; but, alas, such a change as left the loving and beloved group who had hung over her couch with anxious hopes of her restoration to reason, now utterly hopeless and miserable. She arose from her paroxysms a beautiful, happy, and smiling maniac, from whose soul in mercy had been removed that susceptibility of mental pain which constitutes the burthen and bitterness of ordinary calamity.

The first person who discovered this was her mother, who, on the fourth morning of her illness, had stolen to her bedside to see how her beloved one felt. Agnes, who would permit no other person to nurse her darling sister, lay asleep with her head reclined upon the foot of the bed, having been overcome by her grief and the fatigue of incessant watching. As her mother stooped down to look into the sufferer's face, her heart bounded with delight on seeing Jane's eyes smiling upon her with all the symptoms of recognition.

"Jane, my heart's dearest," she said, in a soothing, low inquiry, "do not you know me?"

"Yes, very, well," she replied; "you are my mamma, and this is Agnes sleeping on the foot of the bed. Why does she sleep there?"

The happy mother scarcely heard her child's question, for ere the words were well uttered she laid her head down upon the mourner's bosom, in a burst of melancholy joy, and wept so loudly that her voice awakened Agnes, who starting up, exclaimed—

"Oh, mother, mother—what is this? Is—is our darling gone at last! Jane gone," she said. "No, no—she must not—she would not leave her Agnes. Oh mother—mother, is it so?"

"No, no, Agnes love; no—but may the mercy of God be exalted for ever, Jane knows her mamma this morning, and she knows you too, Agnes."

That ever faithful sister no sooner heard the words, than a smile of indescribable happiness overspread her face, which, however, became instantly pale, and the next moment she sank down, and in a long swoon forgot both the love and sorrow of her favorite sister. In little more than a minute the family were assembled in the sick-room, and heard from Mrs. Sinclair's lips the history, as she thought, of their beloved one's recovery. Agnes was soon restored, and indeed it would be impossible to witness a scene of such unexpected delight, as that presented by the rejoicing group which surrounded the bed of the happy—alas, too happy, Jane Sinclair.

"Is it possible, my dear," said the father, "that our darling is restored to her sense and recollection?"

"Try her, Henry," said the proud mother.

"Jane, my love, do you know me?" he asked.

"To be sure, papa; to be sure," she replied, smiling.

"And you know all of us, my heart's treasure?"

"Help me up a little," she replied; "now I will show you: you are my papa—there is my mamma—that is William—and Maria there will kiss me."

Maria, from whose eyes gushed tears of delight, flew to the sweet girl's bosom.

"But," added Jane, "there is another—another that must come to my bosom and stay there—Agnes!"

"I am here, my own darling," replied Agnes, stooping and folding her arms about the beautiful creature's snow-white neck, while she kissed her lips with a fervor of affection equal to the delight experienced at her supposed recovery.

"There now, Agnes, you are to sleep with me to-night: but I want my papa. Papa I want you."

Her father stood forward, his mild eyes beaming with an expression of delight and happiness.

"I am here, my sweet child."

"You ought to be a proud man, papa—a proud man: although I say it, that ought not to say it, you are father to the most beautiful girl in Europe. Charles Osborne has travelled Europe, and can find none at all so beautiful as the Fawn of Spring-vale, and so he is coming home one of these days to marry me, because you know, because he could find none else so beautiful. If he had—if he had—you know—I, you may be assured, would not be the girl of his choice. Yet I would marry him still, if it were not for one thing; and that is—that I am foredoomed: a reprobate and a castaway; predestined—predestined—and so I would not wish to drag him to hell along with me; I shall therefore act the heroic part, and refuse him. Still it is something—oh, it is much—and I am proud of it, not on my own account, but on his, to be the most beautiful girl in Europe! I am proud of it because he would not marry me if I were not."

Oh unhappy, but affectionate mourners, what—what was all you had yet suffered, when contrasted with the sudden and unexpected misery of this bitter moment. Your hearts had gathered in joy and happiness around the bed of that sweet girl, the gleams of whose insanity you had mistaken for the light of reason; and now has hope disappeared, and the darkness of utter despair fallen upon you all for ever.

"I wish to rise," she proceeded, "and to join in morning prayer; until then I shall only dress in my wrapper: after that I shall dress as becomes me. I know I have nothing to hope either in this world or the next, consequently pride in me is not a sin; the measure of my misery has been filled up; and the only interval of happiness left me, is that between this and death. Dress me, Agnes."

The pause arising from the revulsion of feeling, occasioned by the discovery of her settled insanity, was indeed an exemplification of that grief which lies too deep for tears. None of them could weep, but they looked upon her and each other, with a silent agony, which far transcended the power of clamorous sorrow.

"Children," said her father, whose fortitude, considering the nature of this great affliction, was worthy of better days; "let us neither look upon our beloved one, nor upon each other. There," said he, pointing upward; "let us look there. You all know how I loved—how I love her. You all know how she loved me; but I cast—or I strove to cast the burden of my affliction upon Him who has borne ALL for our salvation, and you see I am fearless. Dress the dear child, Agnes, and as she desires it, let her join us at prayer, and may the Lord who has afflicted us, hearken to our supplications!"

Tenderly and with trembling hands did Agnes dress the beloved girl, and when the fair creature, supported by her two sisters, entered the parlor, never was a more divine picture of beauty seen to shine out of that cloud, with which the mysterious hand of God had enveloped her.

At prayer she knelt as meekly, and with as much apparent devotion as she had ever done in the days of her most rational and earnest piety. But it was woful to see the blighted girl go through all the forms of worship, when it was known that the very habit which actuated her resulted from those virtues which even insanity could not altogether repress.

When they had arisen from their knees, she again addressed Agnes in a tone of cheerful sweetness, such as she had exhibited in her happier days.

"Agnes, now for our task; and indeed you must perform it with care. Remember that you are about to dress the most beautiful girl in Europe. What a fair castaway am I, Agnes?"

"I hope not a castaway, Jane; but I shall dress you with care and tenderness, notwithstanding."

"Every day I must dress in my best, because when Charles returns, you know it will be necessary that I should justify his choice, by appearing as beautiful as possible."

"Give the innocent her own way," said her father; "give her, in all that may gratify the child, her own way, where it is not directly wrong to do so."

Agnes and she then went up to her room, that she might indulge in that harmless happiness, which the fiction of hope had, under the mercy of God, extracted from the reality of despair.

When the ceremony of the toilet was over, she and her sister returned to the parlor, and they could notice a slight tinge of color added to her pale cheek, by the proud consciousness of her beauty. The exertion, however, she had undergone, considering her extremely weak and exhausted state of health, was more than she could bear long. But a few minutes had elapsed after her re-appearance in the parlor, when she said—

"Mamma, I am unwell. I want to be undressed, and to go to bed: I am very faint, help me to bed, mamma—and if you come and stay with me, I shall tell you everything about my prospects in life—yes, and in death too; because I have prospects in death—but ah," she added, shuddering, "they are dark—dark!"

Seldom, indeed, was a family tried like this family; and never was the endurance of domestic love, and its triumph over the chilling habit of affliction, more signally manifested than in the undying tenderness of their hearts and hands, in all that was necessary to her comfort, or demanded by the childish caprices of her malady.

On going up stairs, she kissed them all as usual, but they then discovered, for the first time, in all its bitterness, what a dark and melancholy enjoyment it is to kiss the lips of a maniac, who has loved us, and whom we still must love.

"Jane," said William, struggling to be firm, "kiss me, too, before you go."

"Come to me, William," said she, "for I am not able to go to you. Oh, my brother, if I did not love you, I would be very wicked."

The affectionate young man kissed her, and, as he did, the big tears rolled down his cheeks. He wept aloud.

"I never, never gave her up till now," he exclaimed; "but"—and his face darkened into deep indignation as he spoke, "we shall see about it yet, Jane dear. I shall allow a month or two—she may recover; but if I suffer this to go unaverted," he paused; "I meant nothing," he added, "except that I will not despair of her yet."

About ten days restored her to something like health, but it was obvious that her constitution had sustained a shock which it could not long survive. Of this Dr. McCormick assured them.

"In so delicate a subject as she is," he added, "we usually find that when reason goes, the physical powers soon follow it. But if my opinion be correct, I think you will have the consolation of seeing her mind clear before she dies. There comes often in such cases what the common people properly, and indeed beautifully, term a light before death, and I think she will have it. As you are unanimous against putting her into a private asylum, you must only watch the sweet girl quietly, and without any appearance of vigilance, allowing her in all that is harmless and indifferent to have her own way. Religious feeling you perceive constitutes a strong feature in her case, the rest is obviously the result of the faithless conduct of Osborne. Poor girl, here she comes apparently quite happy."

Jane entered as he spoke, after having been dressed as usual for the day, in her best apparel. She glanced for a moment at the glass, and re-adjusted her hair, which had, she thought, got a little out of order; after which she said smiling,—

"Why should I fear comparisons? He may come as soon as he pleases. I am ready to receive him, but do you know I think that my papa and mamma are not at all so fond of me as they ought to be. Is it not an honor to have for their daughter a girl whose beauty is unsurpassed in Europe? I am not proud of it for my own sake but for his."

"Jane, do you know this gentleman, dear?" said her mother.

"Oh yes; that is Dr. McCormick."

"I am glad to see that your health is so much improved, my dear," said the doctor.

"Oh yes," she replied, "I am quite well so far as this world is concerned; but for all so happy as I look, you would never guess that I am a reprobate. Now could you tell me, doctor, why it is that I look so happy, knowing as I do that I am foredoomed to misery?"

"No," he replied, "but you will tell us yourself."

"Why it is because I do know it. Knowing the worst is often a great consolation, I assure you. I, at least, have felt it so."

"Oh what a noble mind is lost in that sweet girl!" exclaimed the worthy physician.

"But it seems, mamma," she proceeded, "there is a report gone abroad that I am mad. I met yesterday—was it not yesterday, Agnes? I met a young woman down on the river side, and she asked me if it were true that I was crazed with love, and how do you think I replied mamma? I said to her, 'if you would avoid misery—misery, mark—never violate truth even indirectly.' I said that solemnly, and would have said more but that Agnes rebuked her for speaking, and then wept. Did you not weep, Agnes?"

"Oh no wonder I should," replied her sister deeply moved; "the interview she alludes to, doctor, was one that occurred the day before yesterday between her and another poor girl in the neighborhood who is also unsettled owing to a desertion of a still baser kind. It was becoming too affecting to listen to, and I chid the poor thing off."

"Yes, indeed she chid her off, and the poor thing, as she told me, about to be a bride to-morrow. She said she was in quest of William, that they might be married, and asked me if I had seen him. If you do, she added, tell him that Fanny is waiting for him, and that as everything is ready she expects he'll come and marry her to-morrow, as he promised. Now, mamma, Agnes said that although she chid her, she wept for her, but why should you weep, Agnes, for a girl who is about to become a bride to-morrow? Surely you did not weep because she was going to be made happy? Did you?"

"All who are going to become brides are not about to experience happiness, my dear," replied her sister.

"Oh, I should think so certainly, Agnes," replied Jane. "Fie, fie, dear sister Agnes, do not lay down such doctrine. Did you not see the happy girl we met yesterday—was it yesterday? But no matter, Agnes, we shall not quarrel about it. Come and walk. Good-bye, my mamma; doctor, I wish you good morning," and with a grace that was inimitable, she made him a distant, but most respectful courtesy.

"Oh!" said she, turning back, "if any stranger should arrive during my absence, mamma, send for me immediately; or stay—no, do not—let him meet me at the place appointed; I will be there."

She then took Agnes' arm, for Agnes it was who attended her in all her ramblings, and both proceeded on their everyday saunter through the adjoining fields.

CHAPTER XII.

A little time, indeed, proved how very accurate had been the opinion of Dr. McCormick; for although Jane was affected by no particular bodily complaint, yet it appeared by every day's observation that she was gradually sinking. In the mean time three or four months elapsed without bringing about any symptom whatever of improvement. Her derangement flashed out into no extraordinary paroxysm, but on the contrary assumed a wild and graceful character, sometimes light and unsettled as the glancing of sunbeams on a disturbed current, and occasionally pensive and beautiful as the beams of an autumnal moon. In all the habits of the family she was most exact. Her devotional composure at prayer appeared to be fraught with the humblest piety; her attendance at meeting was remarkably punctual, and her deportment edifying to an extreme degree. The history, too, of her insanity and its cause had gone far and wide as did the sympathy which it excited. In all her innocent ramblings with Agnes around her father's house, and through the adjoining fields, no rude observation or unmannered gaze ever offended the gentle creature; but, on the contrary, the delicate-minded peasant of the North would often turn aside from an apprehension of disturbing her, as well, perhaps, as out of reverence for the calamity of a creature so very young and beautiful.

Indeed many affecting observations were made, which, could her friends have heard them, would have fallen like balm upon their broken spirits. Full of compassion they were for her sore misfortune, and of profound sympathy for the sorrows of her family.

"Alas the day, my bonnie lady! my heart is sair to see sae lovely a thing gliding about sae unhappy. Black be his gate that had the heart to leave you, for rank and wealth, my winsome lassie. Weary on him, and little good may his wealth and rank do him! Oh, who would hae thoct that the peerless young blossom would have been withered sae soon, or that the Fawn o' Spring-Vale wad hae ever come to the like o' this! Alas! the day, too, for the friends that aurst you, my bonnie bairn!" and then the kind-hearted matron would wipe her eyes on seeing the far-loved Fawn of Spring-Vale passing by, unconscious that the fatal arrow which had first struck her was still quivering in her side.

The fourth month had now elapsed, and Jane's malady neither exhibited any change nor the slightest symptom of improvement. William, who had watched her closely all along, saw that no hope of any such consummation existed. He remarked, too, with a bitter sense of the unprincipled injury inflicted on the confiding girl, that every week drew her perceptibly nearer and nearer to the grave. His blood had in fact been long boiling in his veins with an indignation which he could scarcely stifle. He entertained, however, a strong reverence for religion, and had Jane, after a reasonable period, recovered, he intended to leave Osborne to be punished only by his own remorse. There was no prospect, however, of her being restored to reason, and now his determination was finally taken. Nay, so deeply resolved had he been on this as an ultimate step in the event of her not recovering, that soon after Mr. Osborne's return from London, he waited on that gentleman, and declared his indignation at the treachery of his son to be so deep and implacable that he requested of him as a personal favor to suspend all communication with the unhappy girl's family, lest he might be tempted even by the sight of any person connected with so base a man, to go and pistol him on whatever spot he might be able to find him. This, which was rather harsh to the amiable gentleman, excited in his breast more sorrow than resentment. But it happened, fortunately enough for both parties, that a day or two before this angry communication, Dr. McCormick had waited upon the latter, and gave it as his opinion that any intercourse between the two families would be highly dangerous to Jane's state of mind, by exciting associations that might bring back to her memory the conduct of his son. The consequence was, that they saw each other only by accident, although Mr. Osborne often sent to inquire privately after Jane's health.

William having now understood that Osborne and his wife resided in Paris, engaged a friend to accompany him thither, for the purpose of demanding satisfaction for the injuries inflicted on his sister. All the necessary arrangements were accordingly made; the very day for their departure was appointed, and a letter addressed to Agnes actually written, to relieve the family from the alarm occasioned by his disappearance, when a communication from Osborne to his father, at once satisfied the indignant young man that his enemy was no longer an object for human resentment.

This requires but brief explanation. Osborne, possessing as he did, ambition, talent, and enthusiasm in a high degree, was yet deficient in that firmness of purpose which is essential to distinction either in public or in private life. His wife was undoubtedly both beautiful and accomplished, and it is undeniable that his marriage with her opened to him brilliant prospects as a public man. Notwithstanding her beauty, however, their union took place not to gratify his love but his ambition. Jane Sinclair, in point of fact, had never been displaced from his affection, for as she was in his eye the most beautiful, so was she in the moments of self-examination, the best beloved. This, however, availed the unhappy girl but little, with a man in whose character ambition was the predominant impulse. To find himself beloved by a young and beautiful woman of wealth and fashion, was too much for one who possessed but little firmness and an insatiable thirst after distinction. To jostle men of rank and property out of his path, and to jostle them successfully, when approaching the heart of an heiress, was too much for the vanity of an obscure young man, with only a handsome person and good talents to recommend him. The glare of fashionable life, and the unexpected success of his addresses made him giddy, and despite an ineffaceable conviction of dishonor and treachery, he found himself husband to a rich heiress, and son-in-law to a baronet. And now was he launched in full career upon the current of fashionable dissipation, otherwise called high life. This he might have borne as well as the other votaries of polished profligacy, were it not for one simple consideration—he had neither health nor constitution, nor, to do the early love of Jane Sinclair justice, heart for the modes and habits of that society, through the vortices of which he now found himself compelled to whirl. He was not in fact able to keep pace with the rapid motions of his fashionable wife, and the result in a very short time was, that their hearts were discovered to be anything but congenial—in fact, anything but united. The absence of domestic happiness joined to that remorse which his conduct toward the unassuming but beautiful object of his first affection entailed upon a heart that, notwithstanding its errors, was incapable of foregoing its own convictions, soon broke down the remaining stamina of his constitution, and before the expiration of three months, he found himself hopelessly smitten by the same disease which had been so fatal to his family. His physicians told him that if there were any chance of his recovery, it must be in the efficacy of his native air; and his wife with a fashionable apathy, expressed the same opinion, and hoped that he might, after a proper sojourn at home, be enabled to join her in the following season at Naples. Up to this period he had heard nothing of the mournful consequences which his perfidy had produced upon the intellect of our unhappy Jane. His father, who in fact still entertained hopes of her ultimate sanity, now that his son was married, deemed it unnecessary to imburter his peace by a detail of the evils he had occasioned her. But when, like her brother William, he despaired of her recovery, he considered it only an act of justice toward her and her family to lay before Charles the hideousness of his guilt together with its woful consequences. This melancholy communication was received the day after his physicians had given him over, for in fact the prescription of his native air was only a polite method of telling him that there was no hope. His conscience, which recent circumstances had already awakened, was not prepared for intelligence so dreadful. Remorse, or rather repentance seized him, and he wrote to beg that his father would suffer a penitent son to come home and die.

This letter, the brief contents of which we have given, his father submitted to Mr. Sinclair, whose reply was indeed characteristic of the exalted Christian, who can forget his own injuries in the distresses of his enemy.

"Let him come," said the old man; "our resentments have long since passed away, and why should not yours? He has now a higher interest to look to than any arising from either love or ambition. His immortal soul is at stake, and if we can reconcile him to heaven, the great object of existence will after all be secured. God forbid that our injuries should stand in the way of his salvation. Allow me," he added, "to bring this letter home, that I may read it to my family, with one exception, of course. Alas! it contains an instructive lesson."

This was at once acceded to by the other, and they separated.

When William heard the particulars of Osborne's melancholy position, he of course gave up the hostility of his purpose, and laid before his friend a history of the circumstances connected with his brief and unhappy career.

"He is aew a dying man," said William, "to whom this life, its idle forms and unmeaning usages are as nothing, or worse than nothing. A higher tribunal than the guilty spirit of this world's honor will demand satisfaction from him for his baseness toward unhappy Jane. To that tribunal I leave him; but whether he live or die, I will never look upon my insane sister, without thinking of him as a villain, and detesting his very name and memory."

If these sentiments be considered ungenerous, let it be remembered that they manifested less his resentment to Osborne, than the deep and elevated affection which he bore his sister, for whose injuries he felt much more indignity than he would have done for his own.

Jane, however, from this period forth began gradually to break down, and her derangement, though still inoffensive and harmless, assumed a more anxious and melancholy expression. This might arise, to be sure, from the depression of spirits occasioned by the decline of health. But from whatever cause it proceeded, one thing was evident, that an air of deep dejection settled upon her countenance and whole deportment. She would not for instance, permit Agnes in their desultory rambles to walk by her side, but besought her to attend at a distance behind her.

"I wish to be alone, dear Agnes," she said, "but notwithstanding that, I do not wish to be without you. I might have been some time ago the Queen of Beauty, but now, Agnes, I am the Queen of Sorrow."

"You have had your share of sorrows, my poor stricken creature," replied Agnes, heavily.

"But there is, Agnes, a melancholy beauty in sorrow—it is so sweet to be sad. Did you ever see a single star in the sky, Agnes?"

"Yes, love, often."

"Well that is like sorrow, or rather that is like me. Does it not always seem to mourn, and to mourn alone, but the moment that another star arises then the spell is broken, and it seems no more to mourn in the solitude of heaven."

Agnes looked at her with a sad but earnest admiration, and exclaimed in a quivering voice as she pressed her to her bosom—

"Oh, Jane, Jane, how my heart loves you! The day is coming, my sister—our sweetest, our youngest, our dearest—the day is coming when we will see you no more—when your sorrows and your joys, whether real or imaginary—when all the unsettled evidences of goodness, which nothing could destroy, will be gone; and you with all you've suffered—with all your hopes and fears, will be no longer present for our hearts to gather about. Oh, my sister, my sister! how will the old man live! He will not—he will not! We see already what he suffers, and what it costs him to be silent. His gait is feeble, and his form already bent since the hand of affliction has come upon you. Yet, Jane, Jane, we could bear all, provided you were permitted to remain with us! Your voice—your voice—and is the day so soon to come when we will not hear it! When our eyes will no more rest upon you? And"—added the affectionate girl, now overcome by her feelings, laying her calm sister's head at the same time upon her bosom, "and when those locks so brown and rich that your Agnes' hands have so often dressed, will be mouldering in the grave, and that face—oh, the seal of death is upon your pale, pale cheek, my sister!—my sister!" She could say no more, but kissing Jane's lips, and pressing her to her heart, she wept in a long fit of irrepressible grief.

Jane looked up with a pensive gaze into Agnes' face, and as she calmly dried her sister's tears, said:

"Is it not strange, Agnes, that I who am the Queen of Sorrow, cannot weep. I resemble some generous princess, who though rich, gives away her wealth to the needy in such abundance that she is always poor herself. I who weep not, supply you all with tears, and cannot find one for myself when I want it. Indeed so it seems, my sister."

"It is true, indeed, Jane—too true, too true, my darling." "Agnes, I could tell you a secret. It is not without reason that I am the Queen of Sorrow."

"Alas! it is not, my sweet innocent."

"I have the secret here," said she, putting her hand to her bosom, "and no one suspects that I have. The cause why I am the Queen of Sorrow is indeed here—here. But come, I do not much like this arbor somehow. There is, I think, a reason for it, but I forget it. Let us walk elsewhere."

This was the arbor of osiers in which Osborne, in the enthusiasm of his passion, said, "that if during his travels he found a girl more beautiful, he would cease to love Jane, and to write to her"—an expression which, as the reader knows, exercised afterward a melancholy power upon her intellect.

Agnes and she proceeded as she desired, to saunter abroad, which they did for the most part in silence, except when she wished to stop and make an observation of her own free will. Her step was slow, her face pale, and her gait, alas! quite feeble, and evidently that of a worn frame and a broken heart.

For some time past, she seemed to have forgotten that she was a foredoomed creature, and a castaway, at least her allusions to this were less frequent than before—a circumstance which Dr. McCormick said he looked upon as the most favorable symptom he had yet seen in her case.

Upon this day, however, she sauntered about in silence, and passed from place to place, followed by Agnes; like the waning moon, accompanied by her faithful and attendant star.

After having passed a green field, she came upon the road with an intention of crossing it, and going down by the river to the yew tree, which during all her walks she never failed to visit. Here it was that, for the second time, she met poor Fanny Morgan, the unsettled victim of treachery more criminal still than that which had been practised upon herself.

"You are the bonnie Fawn of Spring-vale that's gone mad with love," said the unhappy creature.

"No, no," replied Jane, "you are mistaken. I am the Queen of Sorrow."

"I am to be married to-morrow," said the other. "Every thing's ready, but I cannot find William. Did you see him? But may be you may, and if you do—oh speak a word for me; but one word, and tell him that all's ready, and that Fanny's waiting, and that he must not break his promise."

"You are very happy to be married to-morrow."

"Yes," replied the other smiling—"I am happy enough now; but when we are married—when William makes me his wife, people won't look down on me any longer. I wish I could find him, for oh my heart is sick, and will be sick until I see him. If he knew how I was treated, he would not suffer it. If you see him, will you promise to tell him that all's ready, and that I am waiting for him?—Will you, my bonnie lady?"

"I could tell you a secret," said Jane—"they don't know at home that I got the letter at all—but I did, and have read it—he is coming home—coming home to die—that's what makes me the Queen of Sorrow. Do you ever weep?"

"No, but they took the baby from me, and beat me—my brother John did; but William was not near to take my part. I cried then."

"Who will you have at the wedding?"

"I have no bridemaid yet—but maybe you would be that for me, my bonnie lady. John said I disgraced them; but surely I only loved William. I wish to-morrow was past, and that he would remove my shame—I could then be proud, but now I cannot?"

"And what are you ashamed of? It is no shame to love him."

"No, no, and all that would be well enough, but that they beat me and took away the baby—my brother John did."

"But did William ever swear to you, that if he met a girl more beautiful, he would cease to love you, and to write to you?"

"No, he promised to marry me."

"And do you know why he does not?"

"If I could find him he would. Oh, if you see him, will you tell him that I'm waiting, and that all's ready."

"You," said Jane, "have been guilty of a great sin."

"So they said, and that I brought myself to shame too. But William will take away that, if I could find him."

"You told an indirect falsehood to your father—you concealed the truth—and now the hand of God is upon you. There is nothing for you now but death."

"I don't like death—it took away my baby—if they would give me back my baby I would not care—except John—I would hide from him."

"William's married to another and dying, so that you may become a queen of sorrow too—would you like that—sorrow is a sweet thing."

"How could he marry another, and be promised to me?"

"Is your heart cold?" inquired Jane.

"No," replied the other smiling; "indeed I am to be married to-morrow?"

"Let me see you early in the morning," said Jane, "if you do, perhaps I may give you this," showing the letter. "Your heart cannot be cold if you keep it—I carry it here," said she, putting her hand to her bosom—"but I need not, for mine will be warm enough soon."

"Mine's warm enough too," said the other.

"If William comes you will find poison on his lips," said Jane, "and that will kill you: the poison of polluted lips would kill a thousand faithful hearts—it would—and there's nothing for treachery but sorrow. Be sorrowful, be sorrowful—it is the only thing to ease a deserted heart; it eases mine."

"But then they say you're crazed with love."

"No, no—with sorrow. But listen: never violate truth—never be guilty of falsehood; if you do, you will become unhappy; and if you do not, the light of God's countenance will shine upon you."

"Indeed it is no lie, for, as sure as you stand there, to-morrow is the day."

"I think I love you," said the gentle and affectionate Jane. "Will you kiss me? My sister Agnes does, when I ask her."

"Why should n't I, my bonnie, bonnie lady? Why should n't I? Oh! indeed, but you are bonnie—and yet to be crazed with love! Well, well, he will never comb a gray head that deserted the bonnie Fawn of Spring-Vale." Jane, who was much the taller, stooped, and with a smile of melancholy but unconscious sympathy, kissed the forlorn creature's lips, and after beckoning Agnes to follow her, passed on.

That embrace! who could describe its character? Oh! man, man, and woman, woman, think of this!

Agnes, after Jane and she had returned home, found that a search had been instituted during their absence, for the letter which Charles had written to his father. Mr. Sinclair, anxious to return it, had missed it from among his papers, and felt seriously concerned at its disappearance.

"I only got it to read to the family," said he, "and what am I to say, or what can I say, when Mr. Osborne asks me, as he will, to return it? Agnes, do you know any thing of it?"

Agnes, who, from the interview between Jane and the unsettled Fanny Morgan, saw at once that it had got, by some means unknown to the family, into her sister's hands, knew not exactly in what terms to reply. She saw, too, that Jane looked upon the possession of the letter as a secret, and in her presence she felt that considering her sister's view of the matter, and her state of mind, she could not, without pressing too severely on the gentle creature's sorrows, openly inform her father of the truth.

"Papa," said the admirable and considerate girl, "the letter, I have no doubt will be found. I beg of you, papa, I beg of you not to be uneasy about it; it will be found."

This she said in a tone as significant as possible, with a hope that her father might infer from her manner that Jane had the letter in question.

The old man looked at Agnes, and appeared as if striving to collect the meaning of what she said, but he was not long permitted to remain in any doubt upon the subject.

Jane approached him slowly, and putting her hand to her bosom, took out the letter and placed it upon the table before him.

"It came from him," said she, "and that was the reason why I put it next my heart. You know, papa, he is dying, and this letter is the message of death. I thought that such a message was more proper from him to me than to any one else. I have carried it next my heart, and you may take it now, papa. The message has been delivered, and I feel that death is here—for that is all that he and I have left me. I am the star of sorrow—pale and mournful in the lonely sky; yet," she added as she did on another occasion, "we shall not all die, but we shall be changed."

"My sweet child," said Mr. Sinclair, "I am not angry with you about the letter; I only wish you to keep your spirits up, and not to be depressed as much as you are." She appeared quite exhausted, and replied not for some time. At length she said:

"Papa, mamma, have I done any thing wrong? If I have, tell me. Oh, Agnes, Agnes, but my heart is heavy!"

"As sure as heaven is above us, Heary," whispered her mother to Mr. Sinclair, "she is upon the point of being restored to her senses."

"Alas, my dear," he replied, "who can tell? It may happen as you say. Oh how I shall bless God if it does! But still, what, what will it be but, as Dr. McCormick said, the light before death? The child is dying, and she will be taken from us for ever—for ever!"

Jane, while they spoke, looked earnestly and with a struggling eye into the countenances of those who were about her; but again she smiled pensively, and said:

"I am—I am the star of sorrow, pale and mournful in the lonely sky. Jane Sinclair is no more—the Fawn of Spring-vale is no more—I am now nothing but sorrow. I was the queen, but now I am the star of sorrow. Oh! how I long to set in heaven?"

She was then removed to bed, where with her mother and her two sisters beside her, she lay quiet as a child, repeating to herself—"I am the star of sorrow, pale and mournful in the lonely sky; but now I know I will soon set in heaven. Jane Sinclair is no more—the Fawn of Spring-vale is no more. No—I am now the star of sorrow." The melancholy beauty of the sentiment seemed to soothe her, for she continued to repeat these words, sometimes aloud and sometimes in a low sweet voice, until she fell gently asleep.

"She is asleep," said Agnes, looking upon her still beautiful but mournful features, now, indeed, composed into an expression of rooted sorrow. They all stood over the bed, and looked upon her for many minutes. At length Agnes clasped her hands with a suffocating voice, as if her heart would break, exclaimed, "Oh, mother, mother!" and rushed from the room that she might weep aloud without awaking the afflicted one who slept.

Another week made a rapid change upon her for the worse, and it was considered necessary to send for Dr. McCormick, as from her feebleness and depression they feared that her dissolution was by no means distant, especially as she had for the last three days been confined to her bed. The moment he saw her, his opinion confirmed their suspicions.

"Deal gently with her now," said he; "a fit or a paroxysm of any kind would be fatal to her. The dear girl's unhappy race is run—her sands are all but numbered. This moment her thread of life is not stronger than a gossamer." Ere his departure on that occasion, he brought Mr. Sinclair aside and thus addressed him:

"Are you aware, sir, that Mr. Osborne's son has returned?"

"Not that he has actually returned," replied Mr. Sinclair; "but I know that he is daily expected."

"He reached his father's house," continued the doctor, "late yesterday; and such a pitiable instance of remorse as he is I have never seen, and I hope never shall. His cry is to see your daughter, that he may hear his forgiveness from her own lips. He says he cannot die in hope or in happiness, unless she pardons him. This, however, must not be—I mean an interview between them—for it would most assuredly prove fatal to himself; and should she see him only for a moment, that moment were her last."

"I will visit the unhappy young man myself," said her father; "for an interview, it cannot be thought of—even if they could bear it. Charles forgets that he is now the husband of another woman, and that, consequently, Jane is nothing to him—and that such a meeting would be highly, grossly improper."

"Your motives, though perfectly just, are different from mine," said the doctor; "I speak merely as a medical man. He wants not this to hurry him into the grave—he will be there soon enough."

"Let him feel repentance toward God," said the old man heavily—"toward my child it is now unavailing. It is my duty, as it shall be my endeavor, to fix this principle in his heart."

The doctor then departed, after having promised to see Jane on the next day but one. This gentleman's opinion, however, with respect to his beautiful patient, was not literally correct; still, although she lingered longer than could naturally be anticipated from her excessive weakness, yet he was right in saying that her thread of life resembled that of the gossamer.

In the course of the same evening, she gave the first symptom of a lucid interval, still in point of fact her mind was never wholly restored to sanity. She had slept long and soundly, and after awaking rang the bell for some one to come to her. This was unusual, and in a moment she was attended by Agnes and her mother.

"I am very weak, my dear mamma," said she "and although I cannot say that I feel any particular complaint—I speak of a bodily one—yet I feel that you will not be troubled with your poor Jane much longer."

"Do not think so, dear love, do not think so," replied her mother; "bear up, my darling, bear up, and all may yet be well."

"Agnes," said she, "come to me. I know not—perhaps—dear Agnes—"

She could utter no more. Agnes flew to her, and they wept in each other's arms for many minutes.

"I would be glad to see my papa," she said, "and my dear Maria and William. Oh, mamma, mamma, I suspect that I have occasioned you all much sorrow."

"No, no, no—but more joy now, my heart's own treasure, a thousand times more joy than you ever occasioned us of sorrow. Do not think it, oh, do not think it."

Her father, who had just returned from visiting Charles Osborne, now entered her bedroom, accompanied by William and his two daughters—for Agnes had flown to inform them of the happy turn which had taken place in Jane's malady. When he entered, she put her white but wasted hand out, and raised her head to kiss him.

"My dear papa," said she, "it is so long, I think, since I have seen you; and Maria, too. Oh, dear Maria, come to me—but you must not weep, dear sister. Alas, Maria—for the poor girl wept bitterly—"Oh, my sister, but your heart is good and loving. William"—she kissed him, and looking tenderly into his face, said,—

"Why, oh, why are you all in tears? Imitate my papa, dear William. I am so glad to see you! papa, I have been—I fear I have been—but, indeed, I remember when I dreaded as much. My heart, my heart is heavy when I think of all the grief and affliction I must have occasioned you; but you will all forgive your poor Jane, for you know she would not do so if she could avoid it. Papa, how pale and care-worn you look! as, indeed, you all do. Oh, God help me! I see, I see—I read on your sorrowful faces the history of all you have suffered on my account."

They all cherished, and petted, and soothed the sweet creature; and, indeed, rejoiced over her as if she had been restored to them from the dead.

"Papa, would you get me the Bible?" she continued; "I wish if possible to console you and the rest; and mamma, you will think when I am gone of that which I am about to show you, for indeed an early death is sometimes a great blessing to those who are taken away. Alas! who can say when it is not?"

They assisted her to sit up in the bed, and after turning over the leaves of the Bible, she read in a voice of low impressive melody the first verse of the fifty-seventh chapter of Isaiah.

"The righteous perisheth, and no man taketh it to heart; and merciful men are taken away, none considering that the righteous is taken away from the evil to come. HE SHALL ENTER INTO REST."

"Oh! many a death," she continued, "is wept for and lamented by friends and relatives, who consider not that those for whom they weep may be taken away from the evil to come. I feel that I am unable to speak much, but it is your Jane's request, that the consolation to be found, not only in this passage, but in this book, may be applied to your hearts when I am gone."

This effort, slight as it was, enfeebled her much, and she lay silent for some time; and such was their anxiety neither to excite or disturb her, that although their hearts were overflowing they restrained themselves, so far as to permit no startling symptoms of grief to be either seen or heard. After a little time, however, she spoke again:

"My poor bird," said she, "I fear I have neglected it. Dear Agnes, would you let me see it? I long to see it." Agnes in a few minutes returned and placed the bird in her bosom. She caressed it for a short time, and then looking at it earnestly said—

"Is it possible, that you too, my Ariel, are drooping?"

This indeed was true. The bird had been for some time past as feeble and delicate as if its fate were bound up with that of its unhappy mistress—whether it was that the sight of it revived some recollection that disturbed her, or whether this brief interval of reason was as much as exhausted nature could afford on one occasion, it is difficult to say; but the fact is, that after looking on it for some time, she put her hand to her bosom and asked, "where, where is the letter?"

"What letter, my darling?" said her father.

"Is not Charles unhappy and dying?" she said.

"He is ill, my love," said her father, "but not dying, we trust."

"It is not here," she said, searching her bosom. "It is not here—but it matters nothing now—it was a message of death, and the message has been delivered. Sorrow—sorrow—oh, sorrow like mine is the gradual but tearless grief that wastes gently—that disappoints death, for we die not, but only cease to be. I am the star of sorrow, pale and mournful in the lonely sky—well, that is one consolation—when I set, I shall set in heaven."

They knew by experience that any attempt at comfort would then produce more evil than good. For nearly two hours she uttered to herself in a low voice words which they could not understand, after which she sank as before into a profound slumber.

Her intervals of reason as death approached were peculiarly extended. While they lasted, nothing could surpass the noble standard of Christian duty by which her feelings and moral sentiments were regulated. For a fortnight after this she sank with such a certain but imperceptible approximation toward death, that the eyes of affection could scarcely notice the gradations of its approach.

During this melancholy period, her father was summoned upon an occasion which was strongly calculated to try the sincerity of his Christian profession. Not a day passed that he did not forget his own sorrows—and the reader knows how heavily they pressed upon him—in order to prepare the mind of his daughter's destroyer for the awful change which death was about to open upon his soul. He reasoned—he prayed—he wept—he triumphed, yes, he triumphed, nor did he ever leave the death-bed of Charles Osborne, until he had succeeded in fixing his heart upon that God "who willeth not the death of a sinner."

A far heavier trial upon the Christian's fortitude, however, was soon to come upon him. Jane, as the reader knows, was now at the very portal of heaven. For hours in the day she was perfectly rational; but again she would wander into her chant of sorrow, as much from weakness as from the original cause of her malady: for upon this it is difficult if not impossible to determine.

On the last evening, however, that her father ever attended Charles Osborne, he came home as usual, and was about to inquire how Jane felt, when Maria came to him with eyes which weeping had made red, and said—

"Oh, papa—I fear—we all fear, that—I cannot utter it—I cannot, I cannot—oh, papa, at last the hour we fear is come."

"Remember, my child, that you are speaking," said this heroic Christian, "remember that you are speaking to a Christian father, who will not set up his affections, nor his weaknesses, nor his passions, against the will of God."

"Oh, but papa—Jane, Jane"—she burst into bitter tears for more than a minute, and then added—"Jane, papa, is dying—leaving us at last!"

"Maria," said he, calmly, "leave me for some minutes. You know not, dear child, what my struggles have been. Leave me now—this is the trial I fear—and now must I, and so must you all—but now must I—Oh, leave me, leave me."

He knelt and prayed; but in less than three minutes, Agnes, armed with affection—commanding and absolute it was from that loving sister—came to him.

She laid her hand upon his arm, and pressed it. "Papa!"

"I know it," said he, "she is going; but, Agnes, we must be Christians."

"We must be sisters, papa; and ah, papa, surely, surely this is a moment in which the father may forget the Christian. Jesus wept for a stranger; what would he not have done for a brother or sister?"

"Agnes, Agnes," said he, in a tone of sorrow, inexpressibly deep, "is this taxing me with want of affection for—"

She flung herself upon his breast. "Oh, papa forgive me, forgive me—I am not capable of appreciating the high and holy principles upon which you act. Forgive me; and surely if you ever forgave me on any occasion, you will on this."

"Dear Agnes," said he, "you scarcely ever required my forgiveness, and less now than ever—even if you had. Come—I will go; and may the Lord support and strengthen us all! Your mother—your poor mother!"

On entering the room of the dying girl, they found her pale cheek laid against that of her other parent, whose arms were about her, as if she would hold them in love and tenderness for ever. When she saw them approach, she raised her head feebly, and said—

"Is that my papa—my beloved papa?"

The old man raised his eyes once more to heaven for support—but for upward of half a minute the muscles of his face worked with power that evinced the full force of what he suffered—

"I am here, I am here," he at length said with difficulty.

"And is that Agnes?" she inquired. "Agnes, come near me; and do not be angry, dear Agnes, that I die on mamma's bosom and not on yours."

Agnes could only seize her pale hand and bathe it with her tears. "Angry with you—you living angel—oh, who ever was, or could be, my sister?"

"You all love me too much," she said. "Maria, it grieves me to see your grief so excessive—and, oh William, oh why, why will you weep so? Is it because I am about to leave the pains and sorrows of this unhappy life, and to enter into peace, that you all grieve thus bitterly? Believe me—and I know this will relieve my dear papa's heart, and all your hearts—will it not yours, my mamma?—it is this: your Jane, your own Jane is NOT AFRAID TO DIE."

Her hopes are fixed upon the Rock of ages—the Rock of her salvation. I know, indeed, that my brief existence has been marked at its close with care and sorrow; but these cares and sorrows have brought me the sooner to that place where all tears shall be wiped from my eyes. Let my fate, too, be a warning to young creatures like myself, never to suffer their affection for any object to overmaster their sense and their reason. I cherished the passion of my heart too much, when I ought to have checked and restrained it—and now, what is the consequence? Why, that I go down in the very flower of my youth to an early grave."

Agnes caught the dear girl's hands when she had concluded, and looking with a breaking heart into her face, said—

"And oh, my sister, my sister, are you leaving us? are you leaving us for ever, my sister? Life will be nothing to me, my Jane, without you—how, how will your Agnes live?"

"I doubt, we are only disturbing our cherished one," said her father. "Let our child's last moments be calm—and her last—oh, let it not be drawn back from its hopes, to this earth and its affections."

"Pray for me, and they will join with you—pray for your poor Jane while it is yet time—the prayer of the righteous availeth much."

Earnest, indeed, and melancholy, was that last prayer offered up on behalf of the departing girl. When it was concluded there was a short silence, as if they wished not to break in upon what they considered the aspirations of the dying sufferer. At length the mother thought she felt her child's cheek press against her own with a passive weight that alarmed her.

"Jane, my love," said she, "do you not feel your soul refreshed by your father's prayer?"

No answer was returned to this, and on looking more closely at her countenance of sorrow, they found that her gentle spirit had risen on the incense of her father's prayers to heaven. The mother clasped her hands, while the head of her departed daughter still lay upon her bosom.

"Oh, God! oh, God!" said she, "our idol is gone—is gone!"

"Gone!" exclaimed the old man: "now, O Lord, surely—the father's grief may be allowed," and he burst, as he spoke, into a paroxysm of uncontrollable sorrow.

"And what am I to do—who am—oh wo, wo—who was her mother?"

To the scene that ensued, what pen could do justice—we cannot, and consequently leave it to the imagination of our readers, whose indulgence we crave for our many failures and errors in the conduct of this melancholy story.

Thus passed the latter days of the unhappy Jane Sinclair, of whose life nothing more appropriate need be said, than that which she herself uttered immediately before her death:

"Let my fate be a warning to young creatures like myself, never to suffer their affection for any object to overmaster their sense and reason. I cherished the passion of my heart too much, when I ought to have checked and restrained it—and now, what is the consequence? Why, that I go down in the very flower of my youth to an early grave."

On the day after her dissolution, an accident occurred, which threw the whole family into renewed sorrow: Early that morning, Ariel, her dove, was found dead upon her bosom, as she lay out in the composure of death.

"Remove it not," said her father; "it shall be buried with her;" and it was accordingly placed upon her bosom in the coffin.

Seldom was a larger funeral train seen, than that which attended her remains to the grave-yard; and rarely was sorrow so deeply felt for any being so young and so unhappy, as that which moved all hearts for the fate of the beautiful but unfortunate Jane Sinclair—the far-famed Fawn of Spring-vale.

Two other facts we have to record. Jane's funeral had arrived but a few minutes at the grave, when another funeral train appeared slowly approaching the place of death. It was that of Charles Osborne!

The last our readers may have anticipated. From the day of Jane's death the heart of the old man gradually declined. He looked about him in vain for his beloved one. Night and day her name was never out of his mouth. It is true he prayed, he read, he availed himself of all that the pious exercises of a Christian man could contribute to the alleviation of his sorrow. But it was in vain. In vain did his wife, son, and daughters strive to soothe and console him. The old man's heart was broken. His beloved one was gone, and he felt that he could not remain behind her. A gradual decay of bodily strength, and an utter breaking down of his spirits, brought about the consummation which they all dreaded. At the expiration of four months and a half, the old man was laid in the same grave that contained his beloved one—and he was happy.

DEPARTURE OF THE FRIGATE.

BY GEORGE LUNT.

Her pennant at the mainmast head,
Her ensign on the flowing breeze,
Her snowy sails, like pinions spread,
To waft her o'er the rolling seas;
And gently bending to the tide,
That folds her in its swift embrace,
And smiles around her as a bride
Smiles welcome in her lover's face.
In gallant trim, as staunch and true
As ever dared the seaman's grave,
She bears her bold and hardy crew
In triumph o'er the ocean wave.
So, like a thing of life and light,
That fades along the sleeper's brain,
She bounds upon the trance sight,
To seek the broad and gloomy main.
And hark! what warlike strains awake,
'Mid volumed smoke and fiery gleam,
And peals, whose ringing echoes break
The busy city's worldly dream!
The gay salute—the jovial cheer—
The stern command—the prompt reply—
Their pride to share her swift career,
Or on her blood-stained deck to die!
And oh! what thoughts across the deep
Commend her to the favoring airs!
What freighted hopes her bulwarks keep—
What treasures of uncounted prayers!
From mount and valley far away,
By sweet green field and flowery lea—
While she, amid the tossing spray,
Careers along the heaving sea.
And dearer still, her country's fame
Is with her on the mountain wave;
And honor's bright and holy name,
To nerve the weak and cheer the brave.
That stainless flag, whose starry fold
Still pierced the lurid battle through—
And o'er the tide of war unrolled,
On every sea triumphant flew!
And fair and happy be her way
O'er Ocean's broad unfathomed bed,
And prosperous all the winds that play
Where'er her swelling sails are spread!
God save her from the deadly rock,
And cliffs that crown the wild lee-shore;
God keep her in the tempest shock,
And bring her to her home once more!

Master Humphrey's Clock.

BARNABY RUDGE.

BY CHARLES DICKENS, ESQ.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Pondering on his unhappy lot, Joe sat and listened for a long time, expecting every moment to hear their creaking footsteps on the stairs, or to be greeted by his worthy father with a summons to capitulate unconditionally, and deliver himself up straightway. But neither voice nor footstep came; and though some distant echoes, as of closing doors and people hurrying in and out of rooms, resounding from time to time through the great passages, and penetrating to his remote seclusion, gave note of unusual commotion down stairs, no nearer sound disturbed his place of retreat, which seemed the quieter for these far-off noises, and was as dull and full of gloom as any hermit's cell.

It came on darker and darker. The old-fashioned furniture of the chamber, which was a kind of hospital for all the invalided movables in the house, grew indistinct and shadowy in its many shapes; chairs and tables, which by day were as honest cripples as need be, assumed a doubtful and mysterious character; and one old leoprous screen of faded India leather and gold binding, which had kept out many a cold breath of air in days of yore and shut in many a jolly face, frowned on him with a spectral aspect, and stood at full height in its allotted corner, like some gaunt ghost who waited to be questioned. A portrait opposite the window—a queer, old gray-eyed general, in an oval frame—seemed to wink and doze as the light decayed, and at length when the last faint glimmering speck of day went out, to shut its eyes in good earnest, and fall sound asleep. There was such a hush and mystery about everything that Joe could not help following its example; and so went off into a slumber likewise, and dreamed of Dolly, till the clock of Chigwell church struck two.

Still nobody came. The distant noises in the house ceased, and out of doors all was quiet; save for the occasional barking of some deep-mouthed dog, and the shaking of the branches by the night wind. He gazed mournfully out of the window at each well-known object as it lay sleeping in the dim light of the moon; and creeping back to his former seat, thought about the late uproar, until, with long thinking of, it seemed to have occurred a month ago. Thus, between dozing, and thinking, and walking to the window and looking out, the night wore away; the grim old screen, and the kindred chairs and tables, began slowly to reveal themselves in their accustomed forms; the gray-eyed general seemed to wink and yawn and rouse himself; and at last he was broad awake again, and very uncomfortable and cold and haggard he looked, in the dull gray light of morning.

The sun had begun to peep above the forest trees, and already flung across the curling mist bright bars of gold, when Joe dropped from his window on the ground below, a little bundle and his trusty stick, and prepared to descend himself.

It was not a very difficult task; for there were so many projections and gable ends in the way, that they formed a series of clumsy steps, with no greater obstacle than a jump of some few feet at least. Joe, with his stick and bundle on his shoulder, quickly stood on the firm earth, and looked up at the old Maypole, it might be for the last time.

He didn't apostrophise it, for he was no great scholar. He didn't curse it, for he had little ill-will to give to anything on earth. He felt more affectionate and kind to it than ever he had done in all his life before, so said with all his heart, "God bless you!" as a parting wish, and turned away.

He walked along at a brisk pace, big with the great thoughts of going for a soldier and dying in some foreign country where it was very hot and sandy, and leaving God knows what unheard-of wealth in prize-money to Dolly, who would be very much affected when she came to know of it; and full of such youthful visions, which were sometimes sanguine and sometimes melancholy, but always had her for their main point and centre, pushed on vigorously until the noise of London sounded in his ears, and the Black Lion hove in sight.

It was only eight o'clock then, and very much astonished the Black Lion was, to see him come walking in with dust upon his feet at that early hour, with no gray mare to bear him company. But as he ordered breakfast to be got ready with all speed, and on its being set before him gave him indisputable tokens of a hearty appetite, the Lion received him, as usual, with a hospitable welcome; and treated him with those marks of distinction, which, as a regular customer, and one within the freemasonry of the trade, he had a right to claim.

This Lion or landlord—for he was called both man and beast, by reason of his having instructed the artist who painted his sign, to convey into the features of the lordly brute whose effigy it bore, as near a counterpart of his own face as his skill could compass and devise—was a gentleman almost as quick of apprehension, and of almost as subtle a wit, as the mighty John himself. But the difference between them lay in this, that whereas Mr. Willet's extreme sagacity and acuteness were the efforts of unassisted nature, the Lion stood indebted, in no small amount, to beer, of which he swigged such copious draughts, that most of his faculties were utterly drowned and washed away, except the one great faculty of sleep, which he retained in surprising perfection. The creaking Lion over the house-door was, therefore, to say the truth, rather a drowsy, tame, and feeble lion; and as these social representatives of a savage class are usually of a conventional character, (being depicted, for the most part, in impossible attitudes and unearthly colors,) he was frequently supposed by the more ignorant and uninformed among the neighbors, to be the veritable portrait of the host as he appeared on the occasion of some great funeral ceremony or public mourning.

"What noisy fellow is that in the next room?" said Joe, when he had disposed of his breakfast, and had washed and brushed himself.

"A recruiting sergeant," replied the Lion.

Joe started involuntarily. Here was the very thing he had been dreaming of, all the way along.

"And I wish," said the Lion, "he was any where else but here. The party make noise enough, but they do not call for much. There's great cry there, Mr. Willet, but very little wool. Your father would n't like 'em, I know."

Perhaps not much under any circumstances. Perhaps if he could have known what was passing at that moment in Joe's mind, he would have liked them still less.

"Is he recruiting for a—for a fine regiment?" said Joe, glancing at a little round mirror that hung in the bar.

"I believe he is," replied the host. "It's much the same thing, whatever regiment he's recruiting for. I'm told there a'n't a deal of difference between a fine man and another one, when they're shot through and through."

"They're not all shot," said Joe.

"No," the Lion answered, "not all. Those that are—supposing it's done easy—are the best off in my opinion."

"Ah!" retorted Joe, "but you do n't care for glory."

"For what?" said the Lion.

"Glory."

"No," returned the Lion, with supreme indifference. "I do n't. You're right in that, Mr. Willet. When Glory comes here, and calls for anything to drink and changes a guinea to pay for it, I'll give it to him for nothing. It's my belief, sir, that the Glory's arms would n't do a very strong business."

These remarks were not at all comforting. Joe walked out, stopped at the door of the next room, and listened. The sergeant was describing a military life. It was all drinking, he said, except that there were frequent intervals of eating and love making. A battle was the finest thing in the world—when your side won it—and Englishmen always did that. "Supposing you should be killed, sir?" said a timid voice in one corner. "Well, sir, supposing you should be," said the sergeant, "what then? Your country loves you, sir; his Majesty King George the Third loves you; your memory is honored, revered, respected; everybody's fond of you, and grateful to you; your name's wrote down at full length in a book in the War-office. Damme, gentlemen, we must all die some time, or another, eh?"

The voice coughed, and said no more.

Joe walked into the room. A group of half-a-dozen fellows had gathered together in the tap-room, and were listening with greedy ears. One of them, a carter in a smock-frock, seemed wavering and disposed to enlist. The rest, who were by no means disposed, strongly urged him to do so (according to the custom of mankind,) backed the sergeant's arguments, and grinned among themselves. "I say nothing, boys," said the sergeant, who sat a little apart, drinking his liquor. "For lads of spirit"—here he cast an eye on Joe—"this is the time. I don't want to inveigle you. The king's not come to that, I hope. Brisk young blood is what we want; not milk and water. We won't take five men out of six. We want top-sawyers, we do. I'm not a going to tell tales out of school, but, damme, if every gentleman's son that carries arms in our corps, through being under a cloud and having little differences with his relations, was counted up"—here his eye fell on Joe again, and so good-naturedly, that Joe beckoned him out. He came directly.

"You're a gentleman, by G—!" was his first remark, as he slapped him on the back. "You're a gentleman in disguise. So am I. Let's swear a friendship."

Joe did n't exactly do that, but he shook hands with him, and thanked him for his good opinion.

"You want to serve," said his new friend. "You shall. You were made for it. You're one of us by nature. What'll you take to drink?"

"Nothing just now," replied Joe, smiling faintly. "Have n't quite made up my mind."

"A mettlesome fellow like you, and not made up his mind!" cried the sergeant. "Here—let me give the bell a pull, and you'll make up your mind in half a minute, I know."

"You're right so far"—answered Joe, "for if you pull the bell here, where I'm known, there'll be an end of my soldiering inclinations in notime. Look in my face. You see me, do you?"

"I do," replied the sergeant with an oath, "and a finer young fellow or one better qualified to serve his king and country, I never set me—" he used an adjective in this place—"eyes on."

"Thank you," said Joe, "I did n't ask you for want of a compliment, but thank you all the same. Do I look like a sneaking fellow or a liar?"

The sergeant rejoined with many choice asseverations that he did n't; and that if his (the sergeant's) own father were to say he did, he would run the old gentleman through the body cheerfully, and consider it a meritorious action.

Joe expressed his obligation, and continued, "You can trust me then, and credit what I say. I believe I shall enlist in your regiment to-night. The reason I do n't do so now is, because I do n't want, until to-night, to do what I can't recall. Where shall I find you this evening?"

His friend replied with some unwillingness, and after much ineffectual entreaty having for its object the immediate settlement of the business, that his quarters would be at the Crooked Billet in Tower street; where he would be found waking until midnight, and sleeping until breakfast-time to-morrow.

"And if I do come—which it's a million to one I shall—when will you take me out of London?" demanded Joe.

"To-morrow morning, at half-past eight o'clock," replied the sergeant. "You'll go abroad—a country where it's all sunshine and plunder—the finest climate in the world."

"To go abroad," said Joe, shaking hands with him, "is the very thing I want. You may expect me."

"You're the kind of lad for us," cried the sergeant, holding Joe's hand in his in the excess of his admiration. "You're the boy to push your fortune. I do n't say it because I owe you any envy, or would take away from the credit of the rise you'll make, but if I had been bred and taught like you, I'd have been a colonel by this time."

"Tush man!" said Joe, "I'm not so young as that. Needs must when the devil drives; and the devil that drives me is an empty pocket and an unhappy home. For the present, good bye."

"For king and country!" cried the sergeant, flourishing his cap.

"For bread and meat!" cried Joe, snapping his fingers. And so they parted.

He had very little money in his pocket; so little indeed, that, after paying for his breakfast (which he was too honest and perhaps too proud to score up to his father's charge) he had but a penny left. He had courage, notwithstanding, to resist all the affectionate importunities of the sergeant, who waylaid him at the door with many protestations of eternal friendship, and did in particular request that he would do him the favor to accept of only one shilling as a temporary accommodation. Rejecting his offers both of cash and credit, Joe walked away with stick and bundle as before, bent upon getting through the day as he best could, and going down to the locksmith's in the dusk of the evening; for it should go hard, he had resolved, but he would have a parting word with charming Dolly Varden.

He went out by Islington and so on to Highgate, and sat on many stones and gates, but there were no voices in the bells to bid him turn. Since the time of noble Whittington, fair flower of merchants, bells have come to have less sympathy with humankind. They only ring for money and on state occasions. Wanderers have increased in number; ships leave the Thames for distant regions, carrying from stem to stern no other cargo; the bells are silent; they ring out no entreaties or regrets; they are used to it and have grown worldly.

Joe bought a roll, and reduced his purse to the condition (with a difference) of that celebrated purse of Fortunatus, which, whatever were its favored owner's necessities, had one unvarying amount in it. In these real times, when all the Fairies are dead and buried, there are still a great many purses which possess that quality. The sum-total they contain is expressed in arithmetic by a circle, and whether it be added to or multiplied by its own amount, the result of the problem is more easily stated than any known in figures.

Evening drew on at last. With the desolate and solitary feeling of one who had no home or shelter, and was alone utterly in the world for the first time, he bent his steps towards the locksmith's house. He had delayed till now, knowing that Mrs Varden sometimes went out alone, or with Miggs for her sole attendant, to lectures in the evening; and devoutly hoping that this might be one of her nights of moral culture.

He had walked up and down before the house, on the opposite side of the way, two or three times, when he returned to it again, he caught a glimpse of a fluttering skirt at the door. It was Dolly's—to whom else could it belong? no dress but hers had such a flow as that. He plucked up his spirits, and followed it into the workshop of the Golden Key.

His darkening the door caused her to look round. Oh that face! "If it had n't been for that," thought Joe, "I should never have walked into poor Tom Cobb. She's twenty times handsomer than ever. She might marry a Lord!"

He did n't say this. He only thought it—perhaps looked it also. Dolly was glad to see him, and was so sorry her father and mother were away from home. Joe begged she would n't mention it on any account.

Dolly hesitated to lead the way into the parlor, for there it was nearly dark; at the same time she hesitated to stand talking in the workshop, which was yet light and open to the street. They had got by some means, too, before the little forge; and Joe having her hand in his (which he had no right to have, for Dolly only gave it him to shake,) it was so like standing before some homely altar being married, that it was the most embarrassing state of things in the world.

"I have come," said Joe, "to say good-bye—to say good-bye, for I do n't know how many years; perhaps for ever. I am going abroad."

Now this was exactly what he should not have said. Here he was, talking like a gentleman at large who was free to come and go and roam about the world at his pleasure, when that gallant coachmaker had vowed but the night before that Miss Varden held him bound in adamant chains; and had positively stated in so many words that she was killing him by inches, and that in a fortnight more or thereabouts he expected to make a decent end and leave the business to his mother.

Dolly released her hand and said "Indeed!" She remarked in the same breath that it was a fine night, and in short, betrayed no more emotion than the forge itself.

"I could n't go," said Joe, "without coming to see you. I had n't the heart to."

Dolly was more sorry than she could tell, that he should have taken so much trouble. It was such a long way, and he must have had such a deal to do. And how was Mr. Willett—that dear old gentleman—

"Is this all you say?" cried Joe.

All! Good gracious, what did the man expect? She was obliged to take her apron in her hand and run her eyes along the hem from corner to corner, to keep herself from laughing in his face;—not because his gaze confused her—not at all.

Joe had small experience in love affairs, and had no notion how different young ladies are at different times: he had expected to take Dolly up again at the very point where he had left her after that delicious evening ride, and was no more prepared for such an alteration than to see the sun and moon change places. He had buoyed himself up all day with an indistinct idea that she would certainly say "Don't go," or "Do n't leave us," or "Why do you go?" or "Why do you leave us?" or would give him some little encouragement of that sort; he had even entertained the possibility of her bursting into tears, of her throwing herself into his arms, of her falling down in a fainting-fit without previous word or sign, but any approach to such a line of conduct as this, had been so far from his thoughts that he could only look at her in silent wonder.

Dolly in the meanwhile, turned to the corners of her apron and measured the sides, and smoothed out the wrinkles, and was as silent as he. At last after a long pause, Joe said good-bye. "Good-bye!" said Dolly—with as pleasant a smile as if he were going into the next street, and were coming back to supper; "good-bye."

"Come," said Joe, putting out both his hands, "Dolly, dear Dolly, do n't let us part like this. I love you dearly, with all my heart and soul; with as much truth and earnestness as ever man loved woman in this world, I do believe. I am a poor fellow, as you know—poorer now than ever, for I have fled from home, not being able to bear it any longer, and must fight my own way without help. You are beautiful, admired, are loved by everybody, are well off and happy; and may you ever be so! Heaven forbid I should ever make you otherwise; but give me a word of comfort. Say something kind to me. I have no right to expect it of you, I know, but I ask it because I love you, and shall treasure the slightest word from you all through my life. Dolly, dearest, have you nothing to say to me?"

No. Nothing. Dolly was a coquette by nature, and a spoilt child. She had no notion of being carried by storm in this way. The coachmaker would have been dissolved in tears, and would have knelt down, and called himself names, and clasped his hands, and beat his breast, and tugged wildly at his cravat, and done all kinds of poetry. Joe had no business to be going abroad. He had no right to be able to do it. If he was in adamant chains, he could n't.

"I have said good-bye," said Dolly, "twice. Take your arm away directly, Mr. Joseph, or I'll call Miggs."

"I'll not reproach you," answered Joe, "it's my fault, no doubt. I have thought sometimes that you did n't quite despise me, but I was a fool to think so. Every one must, who has seen the life I have led—you most of all. God bless you!"

He was gone, actually gone. Dolly waited a little while, thinking he would return, peeped out at the door, looked up the street and down as well as the increasing darkness would allow, came in again, waited a little longer, went up stairs humming a tune, bolted herself in, laid her head down on her bed, and cried as if her heart would break. And yet such natures are made up of so many contradictions, that if Joe Willett had come back that night, next day, next week, next month, the odds are a hundred to one she would have treated him in the very same manner, and have wept for it afterward with the very same distress.

She had no sooner left the workshop than there cautiously peered out from behind the chimney of the forge, a face which had already emerged from the same concealment twice or thrice, unseen, and which, after satisfying itself that it was now alone, was followed by a leg, a shoulder, and so on by degrees, until the form of Mr. Tappertit stood confessed, with a brown-paper cap stuck negligently on one side of his head, and its arms very much a-kinabo.

"Have my ears deceived me," said the 'Prentice, "or do I dream! am I to thank thee, Fortune, or to curse thee—which?"

He gravely descended from his elevation, took down his piece of looking-glass, planted it against the wall upon the usual bench, twisted his head round, and looked closely at his legs.

"If they're a dream," said Sim, "let sculptures have such visions, and chisel 'em out when they wake. This is reality. Sleep has no such limbs as them. Tremble, Willet, and despair. She's mine! She's mine!"

With these triumphant expressions, he seized a hammer and dealt a heavy blow at a vice, which in his mind's eye represented the scone or head of Joseph Willett. That done, he burst into a peal of laughter which startled Miss Miggs even in her distant kitchen, and dipping his head into a bowl of water, had recourse to a jack-towel inside the closet door, which served the double purpose of smothering his feelings and drying his face.

Joe, disconsolate and down-hearted, but full of courage too, on leaving the locksmith's house made the best of his way to the Crooked Billet, and there inquired for his friend, the sergeant, who, expecting no man less, received him with open arms. In the course of five minutes after his arrival at that house of entertainment, he was enrolled among the gallant defenders of his native land; and within half an hour, was regaled with a steaming supper of boiled tripe and onions, prepared, as his friend assured him more than once, at the express command of his most Sacred Majesty the King. To this meal, which tasted very savory after his long fasting, he did ample justice—and when he had followed it up, or down, with a variety of loyal and patriotic toasts, he was conducted to a straw mattress in a loft over the stable, and locked in there for the night.

The next morning, he found that the obliging care of his martial friend had decorated his hat with sundry parti-colored streamers, which made a very lively appearance; and in company with that officer, and three other military gentlemen newly enrolled, who were under a cloud so dense that it only left three shoes, a boot, and a coat and a half visible among them, repaired to the river-side. Here they were joined by a corporal and four more heroes, of whom two were drunk and daring, and two sober and penitent, but each of whom, like Joe, had his dusty stick and bundle. The party embarked in a passage-boat bound for Gravesend, whence they were to proceed on foot to Chatham; the wind was in their favor, and they soon left London behind them, a mere dark mist—a giant phantom in the air.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Misfortunes, saith the adage, never come singly. There is little doubt that troubles are exceedingly gregarious in their nature, and flying in flocks, are apt to peck capriciously; crowding on the heads of some poor wights until there is not an inch of room left on their unlucky crowns, and taking no more notice of others who offer as good resting-places for the soles of their feet than if they had no existence. It may have happened that a flight of troubles brooding over London, and looking out for Joseph Willett, whom they could n't find, darted down hap-hazard on the first young man that caught their fancy, and settled on him instead. However this may be, certain it is that on the very day of Joe's departure they swarmed about the ears of Edward Chester, and did so buzz and flap their wings, and persecute him, that he was most profoundly wretched.

It was evening, and just eight o'clock, when he and his father, having wine and dessert set before them, were left to themselves for the first time that day. They had dined together, but a third person had been present during the meal, and until they met at table they had not seen each other since the previous night.

Edward was reserved and silent. Mr. Chester was more than usually gay; but not caring, as it seemed, to open a conversation with one whose humor was so different, he vented the lightness of his spirit in smiles and sparkling looks, and made no effort to awaken his attention. So they remained for some time: the father lying on a sofa with his accustomed air of graceful negligence; the son seated opposite to him with downcast eyes, busied, it was plain, with painful and uneasy thoughts.

"My dear Edward," said Mr. Chester at length, with a most engaging laugh, "do not extend your drowsy influence to the decanter. Suffer that to circulate, let your spirits be never so stagnant."

Edward begged his pardon, passed it, and relapsed into his former state.

"You do wrong not to fill your glass," said Mr. Chester, holding up his own before the light. "Wine in moderation—not in excess, for that makes men ugly—has a thousand pleasant influences. It brightens the eyes, improves the voice, imparts a new vivacity to one's thoughts and conversation: you should try it, Ned."

"Ah father!" cried his son.

"My good fellow," interposed the parent hastily, as he set down his glass, and raised his eyebrows with a startled and horrified expression, "for heaven's sake do n't call me by that obsolete and ancient name. Have some regard for delicacy. Am I gray, or wrinkled, do I go on crutches, have I lost my teeth, that you adopt such a mode of address? Good God, how very coarse!"

"I was about to speak to you from my heart, sir," returned Edward, "in the confidence which should subsist between us; and you check me in the outset."

"Now do, Ned, do not," said Mr. Chester, raising his delicate hand imploringly, "talk in that monstrous manner. About to speak from your heart! Do n't you know that the heart is an ingenious part of our formation—the centre of the blood-vessels and all that sort of thing—which has no more to do with what you say or think, than your knees have? How can you be so very vulgar and absurd! These anatomical allusions should be left to gentlemen of the medical profession. They are really not agreeable in society. You quite surprise me, Ned."

"Well! there are no such things to wound, or heal, or have regard for. I know your creed, sir, and will say no more," returned his son.

"There again," said Mr. Chester, sipping his wine, "you are wrong. I distinctly say there are such things. We know there are. The hearts of animals—of bullocks, sheep, and so forth—are cooked and devoured, as I am told, by the lower classes, with a vast deal of relish. Men are sometimes stabbed to the heart, shot to the heart; but as to speaking from the heart, or to the heart, or being warm-hearted, or cold-hearted, or broken-hearted, or being all heart, or having no heart—bah! these things are nonsense, Ned."

"No doubt, sir," returned his son, seeing that he paused for him to speak. "No doubt."

"There's Haredale's niece, your late flame," said Mr. Chester, as a careless illustration of his meaning. "No doubt in your mind she was all heart once. Now she has none at all. Yet she is the same person, Ned, exactly."

"She is a changed person, sir," cried Edward, reddening; "and changed by vile means, I believe."

"You have had a cool dismissal, have you?" said his father. "Poor Ned! I told you last night what would happen. May I ask you for the nut-crackers?"

"She has been tampered with, and most treacherously deceived," cried Edward, rising from his seat. "I never will believe that the knowledge of my real position, given her by myself, has worked this change. I know she is beset and tortured. But though our contract is at an end, and broken past all redemption; though I charge upon her want of firmness and want of truth, both to herself and me; I do not now, and never will believe, that any sordid motive or her own unbiassed will, has led her to this course—never!"

"You make me blush," returned his father gayly, "for the folly of your nature, in which—but we never know ourselves—I devoutly hope there is no reflection of my own. With regard to the young lady herself, she has done what is very natural and proper, my dear fellow; what you yourself proposed, as I learn from Haredale; and what I predicted—with no great exercise of sagacity—she would do. She supposed you to be rich, or at least quite rich enough; and found you poor. Marriage is a civil contract; people marry to better their worldly condition and improve appearances: it is an affair of house and furniture, of liveries, servants, equipage, and so forth. The lady being poor, and you poor also, there is an end of the matter. You cannot enter upon these considerations, and have no manner of business with the ceremony. I drink her health in this glass, and respect and honor her for her extreme good sense. It is a lesson to you. Fill yours, Ned."

"It is a lesson," returned his son, "by which I hope I may never profit, and if years and their experience impress it on—"

"Don't say on the heart," interposed his father.

"On men whom the world and its hypocrisy have spoiled," said Edward warmly, "Heaven keep me from its knowledge."

"Come, sir," returned his father, raising himself a little on the sofa, and looking straight toward him; "we have had enough of this. Remember, if you please, your interest, your duty, your moral obligations, your filial affections, and all that sort of thing, which is so very delightful and charming to reflect upon; or you will repent it."

"I shall never repent the preservation of my self-respect, sir," said Edward. "Respect me if I say that I will not sacrifice it at your bidding, and that I will not pursue the track which you would have me take, and to which the secret share you have had in this late separation, tends."

His father rose a little higher still, and looking at him as though curious to know if he were quite resolved and earnest, dropped gandy down again, and said in the calmest voice—eating his pat meanwhile,

"Edward, my father had a son, who being a fool like you, and like you, entertaining low and disobedient sentiments, he disinherited and cursed one morning after breakfast. The circumstance occurs to me with a singular clearness of recollection this evening. I remember eating muffins at the time, with marmalade. He led a miserable life (that is, I mean) and died early; it was a happy release from accounts; he degraded the family very much. It is a sad circumstance, Edward, when a father finds it necessary to resort to such strong measures."

"It is," replied Edward, "and it is sad when a son, profiting him his love and duty in their best and truest sense, finds himself repelled at every turn, and forced to disobey. Dear father," he added, more earnestly, though in a gentler tone, "I have reflected many times on what occurred between us when we first discussed this subject. Let there be a confidence between us; not in terms, but truth. Hear what I have to say."

"As I anticipate what it is, and cannot fail to do so, Edward," returned the father coldly, "I decline. I could not possibly. I am sure it would put me out of temper, which is a state of mind I can't endure. If you intend to war my plans for your establishment in life, and the preservation of that gentility and becoming pride, which our family have so long sustained—if, in short, you are resolved to take your own course, you must take it, and my curse with it. I am very sorry, but there's really no alternative."

"The curse may pass your lips," said Edward, "but it will be but empty breath. I do not believe that any man on earth has greater power to call one down upon his fellow—least of all, upon his own child—than he has to make one drop of rain or flake of snow fall from the clouds above us, at his impious bidding. Beware, sir, what you do."

"You are so very irreligious, so exceedingly undutiful, so horribly profane," rejoined his father, turning his face lazily toward him, and cracking another nut, "that I positively must interrupt you here. It is quite impossible we can continue to go on upon such terms as these. If you will do me the favor to ring the bell, the servant will show you to the door. Return to this roof no more, I beg you. Go, sir, since you have no moral sense remaining; and go to the devil, at my express desire. Good day."

Edward left the room without another word or look, and turned his back upon the house for ever.

The father's face was slightly flushed and heated, but his manner was quite unchanged, as he rung the bell again, and addressed his servant on his entrance.

"Peak, if that gentleman who has just gone out—"

"I beg your pardon, sir—Mr. Edward?"

"Were there more than one, dolt, that you ask the question? If that gentleman should send here for his wardrobe, let him have it—do you hear? If he should call himself at any time, I'm not at home. You'll tell him so—and shut the door."

So, it soon got whispered about, that Mr. Chester was very unfortunate in his son, who had occasioned him grief and sorrow. And the good people who heard this and told it again, marvelled the more at his equanimity and even temper, and said, "What an amiable nature that man must have, who, having undergone so much, could be so placid and so calm." And when Edward's name was spoken, Society shook its head and laid its finger on its lip, and sighed, and looked very grave; and those who had sons about his age, waxed wrathful and indignant, and hoped, for Virtue's sake, that he was dead. And the world went on turning round, as usual, for five years, concerning which this narrative is silent.

THE NEW WORLD.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 26, 1841.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The individual who addresses an indignant letter to us, inquiring why we do not continue Washington Irving's story, "The Adventures of Ralph Ringwood," is informed that we have one reason, and one only. It is NOT WRITTEN. We have published it as far as Mr. Irving has seen fit to continue it; and when he thinks proper to resume it in the Knickerbocker, we shall follow suit. Perhaps our correspondent may be able to bully Mr. Irving with this business—but if he cannot, we shall be obliged, if put in bodily fear by any more letters from him, to sit down some warm afternoon and finish it ourselves.

"JUSTITIA" is informed that the matter of which he complains has been carefully considered, and that the enlargement of the QUARTO edition after the present number was determined upon to obviate this very objection. After the enlargement, the QUARTO will contain ALL the articles of the FOLIO, and a piece of popular music as often as every other week.

TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

The next-issued number of this (the Quarto) edition of the New World will commence its third volume. It will appear enlarged and otherwise materially improved. There will be four columns on each page instead of three, and the whole aspect of the paper will be more elegant and pleasing. It will resemble "The Britannia," the handsomest weekly print, published in England. When it is considered that there are sixteen pages—sixty-four columns—in each number, with no scant typography, it may be inferred that a goodly quantity of reading matter will be presented.

Objections have been sometimes made to the number of continued stories which appear in the New World. These will be obviated in future to a considerable extent. More short articles will be given; more single pieces begun and ended in each number, and the charm of variety more largely diffused.

We are happy to acknowledge the constant increase of our country circulation. Subscribers are coming in freely; and our sole apprehension is that the first numbers of the new volume may be insufficient for the demand; although we shall print as many beyond our regular edition as prudence would seem to allow.

Beautiful wood-engravings will appear in the New World oftener than heretofore; and rare and elegant pieces of music will more frequently adorn its pages.

PROGRESS OF THE EXTRA SESSION.

We are glad to see that there is at length a prospect of the acceleration of business in Congress. Upon the leading measures proposed by the new Administration we have had discussion enough. The arguments upon both sides have been exhausted. They have been placed before the people time and again in every possible aspect—turned inside out, and turned again until they are threadbare. And yet will members waste the precious time of the people in the long-winded harangues, criminations and recriminations—putting forth old truisms with a ridiculous air of novelty, and talking, drivelling on,

"In one weak, wacky, everlasting flood."

It was understood that the present was to be a session of action not of talk. The people have sent in their verdict, and demanded its immediate execution. All that can be said has been said upon the measures proposed. Why then, now that the Whigs have been commissioned by the people to act, do they presume to hesitate, reconsider and turn pale at the spectral "abstractions" of the Virginia school? Is it pusillanimity or infidelity to their trust, which induces their delay?

There is one trait in the character and history of Henry Clay, which even his enemies must admit—his consistency, promptitude and boldness. To his energy and industry mainly we may attribute the rapid action of the Senate. Already has he submitted to that body and to the nation his report upon Mr. Ewing's project for a National Bank. Of that project we have already expressed our approbation. It would be immeasurably superior to our present oppressive fiscal system—it would restore stability, uniformity and order to our dislocated currency, and relieve us from the tyranny and extortion of small banks and brokers. Mr. Clay proposes a few amendments; and should they be incorporated in the bill as it eventually goes from Congress, we cannot suppose for an instant but that they will be acquiesced in by President Tyler. The amendments consist briefly in raising the maximum of dividend to 7 per cent., in allowing the bank to deal in foreign exchanges, and in giving it power to establish branches in the states. The proposition to fix the location of the mother bank at Washington is acquiesced in, and this we apprehend will not be sensibly opposed.

From the temper of both houses of Congress it is obvious that a bank project of the kind proposed by Mr. Clay will be adopted before they rise. Some doubt seems to be entertained whether the President will sanction some of its features. He will have to assume a vast amount of responsibility, however, in vetoing it; and, inasmuch as the will of the people has been very clearly expressed upon this subject, we hardly think he will avail himself of the accident of his position to crush their hopes and defeat one of the great objects, for which they have been laboring.

We trust, above all things, that the party in power in Congress will not permit any political jealousies or Presidential aspirations to interfere with the settlement of those great questions, to which their attention is now directed, viz: The establishment of a National Bank, and the passage of a General Bankrupt Law. These two measures alone will do more to restore the prosperity of the country than all others put together; and we care not how soon Congress adjourns after accomplishing these important measures.

That dissatisfaction exists among the great party who carried the present administration into power—resulting from the tardy action of the government in relation to measures and men—it is useless to disguise. Whether this dissatisfaction will be allayed by speedy and definite action remains to be seen. The following remarks from a letter in the National Intelligencer, a paper which is generally extremely wary in its expressions, will indicate the temper of the great body of the Whigs at the present moment, and what they expect from the administration:

"All accounts represent President Tyler as a most amiable and excellent man. He must not, however, forget that the late contest was not waged for the benefit of our opponents; that the People expect a radical change of men and measures; that on no other principle can the party be kept together; and that, if he falters in his course, he abandons his friends and his country to an unscrupulous party whom no moderation can tame, and no reverses subdue. It was precisely this feeling which destroyed the administration of Mr. Adams. That administration expected too much from the magnanimity of those it spared. Mr. Tyler has no idea of the persecution we have endured for twelve years from these men. Many of us have suffered to an irreparable degree from this hostility, and we cannot, on any consideration, consent that the power to do mischief shall remain in their hands. The President must act with decision and courage, and he will receive the applause of a vast majority of the People. 'To hesitate is to be lost.'"

IMMIGRATION.—During the present month, up to the 21st inst. inclusive, it is ascertained that 7,722 emigrants from other countries, beyond the Atlantic, have arrived as steerage passengers at this port, and been landed upon our shores, as their abiding place and their future home. On Saturday and Sunday 1,398 arrived here, and since then they have averaged over 1,000 a day. On Wednesday morning 1,206 were reported as having arrived on the preceding day.

FREDONIA ACADEMY.—This institution, situated in one of the most pleasant and healthy villages of Western New York, enjoys an enviable reputation as a seminary of learning. It is supplied with the best of instructors, a large library, a fine philosophical and chemical apparatus, a cabinet of minerals, &c., &c. It has recently received a donation of $300 from the State for the purpose of establishing a Department for educating young men for Teachers of Common Schools. Parents in the city who wish to send their children to the country to be educated, could not select a better seminary for that purpose than the Fredonia Academy.

PLAIT YOUR HAIR, LADIES.—The Galvestonian says that a lady, while bathing in the Gulf of Mexico, suddenly found that she had lost her foothold, and that she was floating on the waves. Her garments buoyed her up, and the under tow was drawing her out pretty rapidly. She immediately cried out, and a gentleman who was bathing with her swam to her rescue. On reaching her she clutched him by the throat, and it was with some difficulty that he disengaged himself. Luckily the lady had plaited her hair previous to going into the water, and the gentleman seeing this, caught it, placed it between his teeth, and thus managed to tow the fair one ashore. We'll bet six radishes to a sweet potato that he marries her.

—We are obliged to omit many articles in this edition to make room for the Title Page and Index. The necessity for this will not occur again.

Correspondence of the New World.

WASHINGTON, June 22, 1841.

The principal question that occupies all minds here, in and out of Congress, is as to the powers and faculties of the Fiscal Bank of the United States now proposed to be established. Before noticing the proceedings of Congress on the subject, it may be interesting to your readers to hear something of the preliminary private history of the project submitted to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The question of a National Bank has been the subject of frequent, long, deliberate, and most anxious discussions in the Cabinet. The President met the Heads of Departments on this, as he does on every question, in the most liberal, consulting, and conciliatory spirit. He stated his views frankly both of what he deemed expedient and of the powers which could be conferred on such an institution under the Constitution. He finally submitted an outline of what he deemed a proper proposition for a Fiscal Bank; but intimated that if the great principle of requiring the assent of the States to the establishment of branches within them should be preserved, he would be disposed to submit the details of the plan to the wisdom of Congress.

The Cabinet went into consideration of the subject with a sincere desire of producing such a scheme as would present a common ground on which all the real friends of a National Institution might stand. The Secretary presented the project which has been submitted to the Senate, and, after mature deliberation, it received the approval of the President, and the whole Cabinet. There is no doubt that every one of the Heads of Departments believes that Congress possesses the power to authorize the Bank to establish branches without the assent of the States. There is no doubt, on the other hand, that the President believes Congress has no such power. The question then arose in the minds of the Cabinet—"Is it indispensable to assert and exercise this power?" They came to the conclusion that it was not indispensable; and resolved to forbear exercising it, and to require the assent of the States to the establishment of branches within their limits. They saw no other method of overcoming the difficulty presented in the conscientious scruples of the President, and they agreed therefore, on the plan, requiring the assent of the States, and individually and collectively pledged themselves to its support.

After the project was submitted to the Senate, the Whigs of that body immediately held an informal meeting, which was followed by two other meetings of the same character. As might have been expected, the Whig Senators, almost to a man, declared their opinion in favor of the existence of the power. Mr. Rives and Mr. Archer, the two Virginia Senators, alone were opposed to this view of the question. During the whole of the last week the greatest anxiety was manifested to know the decision of the Committee, and to ascertain the course which the different Whig Senators would take. Mr. Clay of Kentucky brought in the Report of the Committee yesterday, and it solved all doubts. The distinguished Senator read this production himself, and dwelt with peculiar emphasis on those parts in which the branching power of the Bank, independently of the assent of the States, is asserted and maintained. It most certainly makes a direct issue with the Secretary's project on that point, which is the only one of difficulty.

There are sets of politicians—or rather of political adventurers—here who are doing their best and their worst, to excite animosity and increase difficulties, and exasperate differences of opinion into violent personal and party opposition. Among the friends of the Administration some have eagerly seized hold of this report, and, on the showing of it, have attempted to present Mr. Clay in antagonism to the President, and as insisting on the operation and exercise of the power to embarrass the President. Others have attempted to show up the President as persisting unnecessarily in certain obstinate notions, to the serious annoyance and embarrassment of the Whig party who brought him into power. One set of these precious creatures are mainly anxious to cut off Mr. Clay—the other set are chiefly solicitous to cut off President Tyler—from the sympathies and support of the Whig party. Both sets have been exerting all their influences to prevent that union and compromise without which nothing can be expected from the present extraordinary session to benefit the people. Your readers will be glad to hear that these mischief-makers are likely to be disappointed.

In the principles and reasonings of Mr. Clay's Report, it is well understood that twenty-seven of the Whig Senators concur. But the practical question is, will they run a tilt against President Tyler, and a Cabinet selected by General Harrison and retained by his successor, on this point, and thus hazard the total breaking up of the great party which triumphed in 1840? I have no hesitation in saying, they will not. There is a ground of compromise which they may occupy. It is this: let the assent of the States be required in the bill; but let there be a distinct recognition of the right to exercise the branching power independently of the assent of the States, at any future time, should it become necessary and proper. The greatest sticklers for the existence of the power cannot say this is a surrender; and the President can have no objection to the insertion of such a clause; for should a bill asserting the power be presented to him at any future time, he will be left free then to judge of and determine on its necessity and propriety.

This ground of compromise will probably be presented by Mr. Senator Preston; and, I doubt not, will be adopted.

The Select Committee on the Currency, in the House, of which Mr. SERGEANT is chairman, will have the Fiscal Agent, also, under consideration. The Senate's Bill for the repeal of the SUB-TREASURY was referred to that Committee, to-day, after a long debate. From present appearances, it will not be reported until the character of the Fiscal Bank shall be decided upon.

There has been some improvement in the proceedings of the House, during the last few days. They have gone to work. They meet at ten, and adjourn at three regularly.

To-morrow, the great business of the National Bank opens in the Senate. Mr. Clay is expected to speak on the bill reported by the Select Committee, of which he is chairman.

The President continues to win all hearts by the affability of his manners, and the good nature of his social conduct.

The ladies of his family make the WHITE HOUSE peculiarly agreeable to all who visit it. Never was it half so attractive during the last twenty years.

Four of the Members of the Cabinet have their families with them. Mr. Bell has taken the handsome house lately occupied by the Spanish Minister. His highly talented lady, and her spirited and accomplished daughter, are well known to all who have visited Washington during the last few years.

They have contributed greatly to make the place agreeable to strangers; and their house is still the centre of the refined and intelligent. Mr. Badger has taken the house formerly occupied by Mr. Woodbury; Mr. Crittenden that formerly occupied by Mrs. Madison, who, it is understood, intends to spend the next winter in Washington.

XXVth Congress—Extra Session.

In SENATE, on Thursday, June 17, Mr. Buchanan, of Pa. submitted to the Senate a resolution calling on the President for an account of all removals and appointments made by the Executive authority, either chief or subordinate, since March 4th, last—with the reasons for such changes. This resolution was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

A motion to print 1,500 copies of Mr. Ewing's Report on the Finances came up in order, and Mr. Evans of Maine, spoke at length in defense of the Secretary's statements, and in reply to a labored attack upon them by Mr. Woodbury. The Senate then went into Executive Session.

The House adopted a resolution offered by Mr. Sergeant, and modified by Mr. Fillmore, changing the daily hour of meeting to 10 o'clock A. M., and prescribing that for one week the speaker should adjourn the House at 3 P. M. unless otherwise ordered.

Mr. Waterson, of Tenn. offered a long and bitter preamble and resolutions, condemning the removals made by the Whig Administration. It was rejected as abusive of members of other branches of the Government, and insulting to the House. For suspending the Rules in its favor 57; Nays 130.

On motion of Mr. Gilmer, of Va. it was Resolved, That a Committee of five members be appointed to examine as to the number of officers employed, the expenditures and modes of transacting the public business, in the various branches of the public service, at the seat of Government, and such other places as may be deemed necessary, or be designated by the House; and to report at next Session of Congress, whether it is proper to make any reduction of expenditures in the civil list, or in the number of persons thus employed; or whether the patronage of the Executive branch of the Government may not be diminished, or regulated, as to those appointments for which there is an indispensable necessity.

On motion of Mr. J. C. Clark, a resolution was adopted, as modified by Mr. Smith of Ct. providing that hereafter all articles of stationery, &c. usually furnished by the Clerk, should be purchased by contract, from the lowest bidder—proposals to be published in Washington, New York and Philadelphia, and that a Select Committee of Five Members be appointed to inquire into the contingent expenditures of the House; and whether any corrupt, illegal or improper practices exist in this public service, and to ascertain whether the expenditures be not wasteful and extravagant and cannot be reduced; and whether there are no more clerks employed in and about the capitol than the public good requires, and whether their salaries should not be reduced.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill for the relief of Mrs. Harrison. Mr. A. moved to fill the blank in the bill with $25,000, or one year's salary. Mr. GORDON, of N. Y., (Delaware Co.) moved $5,250. Mr. SNYDER moved $1,000 down and $500 per annum. The House, without taking a vote, adjourned at 5 o'clock.

In SENATE, on Friday, Messrs. Wright and Woodbury spoke at length in reply to Mr. Evans. Mr. Woodbury had not concluded when the Senate adjourned.

In the House, Mr. Adams was excused from serving on the Indian Committee at his request. The 127th rule was so amended as to cut off motions to suspend the rules until the morning business shall have been disposed of. Then came a general discussion in committee on the bill to pay the widow of President Harrison a year's salary. The sum of $25,000 was sustained: yeas 119; nays 70. The previous question was enforced and the bill passed: yeas 122; nays 66.

The House then adjourned.

On Saturday the SENATE was not in session. In the HOUSE, Mr. Adams presented a lot of miscellaneous petitions on which an abolition rose was raised which consumed a great portion of the day. Finally, the question of reception was laid on the table.

Mr. Barnard, of N. J., presented a plan for a National Bank. Ordered to be printed. Adjourned.

On Monday, in SENATE, Mr. Clay, of Ky., made a report from the Select Committee on the Finances and Currency in favor of a BANK OF THE UNITED STATES. This report will be found in another column. The report and accompanying bill were ordered to be printed and made the special order for Wednesday.

The debate on the motion to print 1,500 extra copies of Mr. Ewing's report was then continued by Messrs. Woodbury, Calhoun, Buchanan and others. At the close the motion was agreed to.

The Senate agreed to meet at 10 A. M. after Wednesday.

In the HOUSE, the bill to repeal the Sub-Treasury was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Several resolutions of inquiry were considered and agreed to; one in relation to the seizure of American vessels suspected of being slavers by the British; one in relation to Americans now British prisoners at Van Dieman's Land for Canadian Patriot operations; one in relation to N. P. Trist's performances as Consul at Havana.

Mr. Barnard's plan of a National Bank was referred to the select Committee on the Currency and Finances.

The bill making appropriations for the expenses of the present session of Congress was considered and passed. The total amount is $397,666. Adjourned.

AUBURN AND ROCHESTER RAILROAD.—We learn that this section of the great road which is to connect Buffalo with Boston, will be completed and put in operation on or about the 4th of July next, with the exception of 15 miles of the eastern extremity. The cars will run from Seneca Falls to Rochester (60 miles) during the first week in July. Three of the most perfect engines ever made in the United States have recently been constructed for this road at Philadelphia, which, with the locomotives now in use, will make six. The whole road will be completed and put in operation by the first of October next. This company have availed themselves of the present depressed prices to purchase their iron, which will cost them not exceeding $43 per ton. The whole road will be permanently constructed, with a remarkably strong superstructure, for about $14,000 per mile.

RAILROADS.—There are wanting only two or three links to complete the long line of railroad from Maine to North Carolina—24 miles of which are between Hartford, Conn. and Springfield, Mass., and 50 miles from New-Haven to the State line of N. Y., making one entire line from Buffalo on the west, and Portland on the east, to the city of Washington—in length of over 1000 miles! When this is completed, we shall have an iron line from the east to the west, north to the south and south-west, of continued lines, (with the exception of about 50 miles from Washington to Fredericksburgh, Va.) of nearly 2800 miles.

FIRE AT FISHKILL.—The extensive establishment known as the Rocky Glen Cotton Mills, took fire on Monday 21st inst. supposed by the superintendent to have originated from the overheated gudgeons and was entirely destroyed. It was first discovered in the upper part of the mill in a small out-building covering the boards of the water-wheel. The mill was built about two years since at a cost of $140,000, including $60,000 worth of machinery, all which was destroyed. It was considered the most splendid factory in the Union, and was owned by a wealthy company, of whom Astor, Hone and others of this city were members. About 300 operatives will be thrown out of employ by this disaster, of whom seven-eighths are females. The property was insured for $85,000.

WYOMING.—This new County (formed from Genesee) has elected an entire Whig ticket of County Officers by a majority of 300.

THE MALEK ADHEL.—The case of this vessel which has been before the U. S. District Court in Baltimore, for acts of piracy, was brought to a close on Saturday, the 19th inst. The Judge condemned the vessel for acts committed in reference to two brigs fallen in with by her,—the Br. Brig Albert, and a Portuguese Brig, but acquitted the owners of all censure. The cargo was not deemed to be liable under the circumstances of the case, and was therefore acquitted. An appeal to the Circuit Court was entered by the counsel for the claimants.

FLORIDA.—St. Augustine accounts of the 13th instant state that Major Childs had captured the notorious Indian, Coacoochee, alias Wild Cat, with fifteen warriors and three negroes, in all nineteen, and after two days confinement, they were shipped to New Orleans, in the schr. Walter. He was as bold and impudent as ever, and boasted of his having committed the horrid murders near that city, some time since.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT.

Absalom Fowler, to be Attorney of the United States for the District of Arkansas.

Oliver Davis, to be Deputy Post Master at Newburgh, in the State of New-York.

MORTALITY OF THE WEEK.—The City Inspector, Dr. Walters, reports 107 deaths during the past week—viz., 24 men, 19 women, 36 boys and 28 girls.

NEW-YORK CANALS.—The receipts of Tolls on the New York Canals during the second week in June, 1840, were $48,322 42; do. in 1841, $61,437 13; increase from last year, $13,114 81, or about 20 per cent.

A new line of Stages has been started to run through from Chicago to Galena, between 7 A. M. and 8 P. M. of the next day. Fare $10.

FIRST VOLUME OF CHARLES O'MALLEY.

The first volume of this capital and humorous story of military life, is now published and ready for delivery. Price 50 cents single, or five copies for Two Dollars. To Agents, $30 per hundred.

Persons subscribing for the NEW WORLD and remitting $3 for one year, or $5 for two years, will receive this volume gratis. Those present subscribers who remit this amount immediately, to be credited on their subscriptions, as a further payment in advance, will also receive a copy. As the edition published is only 6,000 copies, which are going off with singular rapidity, those wishing to obtain it, must not delay his order—one thousand have been called for within the past week.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

The Quarto edition of the New World, after its enlargement, will be the most splendid sheet published in America, and will give the greatest amount of new and choice matter, embellishments and music, for the trifling sum of $3 a year. Notwithstanding its present large subscription list, we should like to have added thereto about ten thousand names during the next or enlarged volume. And to do this it is only necessary for our subscribers to exert their influence among their friends, and aid us in obtaining good, efficient and responsible Agents in every town and village in the country.

We would therefore esteem it an especial favor to have all who know of a suitable person who is willing to act for us, to communicate his name to us at the earliest moment. There is not a village in the country, where our list could not be doubled or quadrupled by the exertions of a competent and zealous Agent. Friends, see what you can do to increase our borders.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents are respectfully requested to send in without delay the names of all persons who wish to commence with the enlarged July volume. Many of them have done nothing for us for some time past, and as we wish only those who are of the working sort, we hope they will report their progress soon, and let us know what they are about.

Agents are wanted to sell the NEW WORLD at Saratoga Springs, Whitehall, Ogdensburg, Sackett's Harbor, Oswego, Syracuse, Auburn, Geneva, Canandaigua, Ithaca, Lockport, Palmyra, all in this state. Also at Burlington, and Vergennes, and other large towns in Vermont. Those willing to go into the business will receive all requisite information by addressing the Publisher.

A WORD OF EXPLANATION.

KIND PUBLIC.—Having so lately taken my leave of the stage, in a farewell benefit, it is but fitting that I should explain the circumstances which once more bring me before you—that I may not appear intrusive, where I have met with but too much indulgence.

A blushing debutant—entre nous, the most impudent Irishman that ever swaggered down Sackville street—has requested me to present him to your acquaintance. He has every ambition to be a favorite with you; but says—God forgive him—he is too bashful for the foot-lights.

He has remarked—as, doubtless, many others have done—upon what very slight grounds, and with what slender pretensions, my Confessions have met with favor at the hands of the press and the public; and the idea has occurred to him, to indite his own. Had his determination ended here, I should have nothing to object to; but, unfortunately, he expects me to become his Editor, and in some sort responsible for the faults of his production. I have wasted much eloquence and more breath, in assuring him that I was no tried favorite of the public, who dared take liberties with them—that the small rag of reputation I enjoyed was a very scanty covering for my own nakedness; that the plank which swam with one would most inevitably sink with two; and, lastly, that the indulgence so often bestowed upon a first effort is as frequently converted into censure on the older offender. My arguments have, however, totally failed, and he remains obdurate and unmoved. Under these circumstances I have yielded; and, as, happily for me, the short and pithy direction to the river Thames, in the Critic, "to keep between its banks," has been imitated by my friend, I find all that is required of me is to write my name upon the title—and go in peace. Such, he informs me, is modern editorship.

In conclusion, I would beg, that if the debt he now incurs at your hands remains unpaid, you will kindly bear in mind, that your remedy lies against the drawer of the bill, and not against its more humble endorser.

Brussels, March, 1840.

CHAPTER I....Daly's Club House.

THE rain was dashing in torrents against the window panes, and the wind sweeping in heavy and fitful gusts along the dreary and deserted streets, as a party of three persons sat over their wine, in that stately old pile which once formed the resort of the Irish Members, in College Green, Dublin, and went by the name of Daly's Club House. The clatter of falling tiles and chimney-pots—the jarring of the window-frames and howling of the storm without, seemed little to affect the spirits of those within, as they drew closer to a blazing fire, before which stood a small table covered with the débris of a desert, and an abundant supply of bottles, whose characteristic length of neck indicated the rarest wines of France and Germany; while the portly magnum of claret—the wine, par excellence, of every Irish gentleman of the day—passed rapidly from hand to hand, the conversation did not languish, and many a deep and hearty laugh followed the stories which every now and then were told, as some reminiscence of early days was recalled, or some trait of a former companion remembered.

One of the party, however, was apparently engrossed by other thoughts than those of the mirth and merriment around; for, in the midst of all, he would turn suddenly from the others, and devote himself to a number of scattered sheets of paper, upon which he had written some lines, but whose crossed and blotted sentences attested how little success had waited upon his literary labors. This individual was a short, plethoric-looking, white-haired man, of about fifty, with a deep, round voice, and a chuckling, smothering laugh, which, whenever he indulged, not only shook his own ample person, but generally created a petty earthquake on every side of him. For the present, I shall not stop to particularize him more closely; but, when I add, that the person in question was a well-known Member of the Irish House of Commons, whose acute understanding and practical good sense were veiled under an affected and well-dissembled habit of blundering, that did far more for his party than the most violent and pointed attacks of his more accurate associates, some of my readers may anticipate me in pronouncing him to be Sir Harry Boyle. Upon his left sat a figure the most unlike him possible; he was a tall, thin, bony man, with a bolt-upright air, and a most saturnine expression; his eyes were covered by a deep green shade, which fell far over his face, but failed to conceal a blue scar, that, crossing his cheek, ended in the angle of his mouth, and imparted to that feature, when he spoke, an apparently abortive attempt to extend toward his eye brow; his upper lip was covered with a grizzled and ill-trimmed moustache, which added much to the ferocity of his look, while a thin and pointed beard on his chin gave an apparent length to the whole face that completed its rueful character; His dress was a single-breasted tightly-buttoned frock, in one button-hole of which a red ribbon was fastened, the decoration of a foreign service, which conferred upon its wearer the title of Count; and though Billy Considine, as he was familiarly called by his friends, was a thorough Irishman in all his feelings and affections, yet he had no objection to the designation he had gained in the Austrian army. The Count was certainly no beauty, but, somehow, very few men of his day had a fancy for telling him so; a deadlier hand and a steadier eye never covered his man in the Phoenix; and though he never had a seat in the House, he was always regarded as one of the government party, who more than once had damped the ardor of an opposition member, by the very significant threat of "setting Billy at him." The third figure of the group was a large, powerfully-built, and handsome man, older than either of the others, but not betraying in his voice and carriage any touch of time. He was attired in the green coat and buff vest which formed the livery of the Club; and in his tall, ample forehead, clear, well-set eye, and still handsome mouth, bore evidence that no great flattery was necessary at the time which called Godfrey O'Malley the handsomest man in Ireland.

"Upon my conscience," said Sir Harry, throwing down his pen with an air of ill-temper, "I can make nothing of it; I have got into such an infernal habit of making bulls, that I can't write sense when I want it."

"Come, come," said O'Malley, "try again my dear fellow. If you can't succeed, I'm sure Billy and I have no chance."

"What have you written? Let us see," said Considine, drawing the paper toward him, and holding it to the light, "why, what the devil is all this? you have made him 'drop down dead after dinner, of a lingering illness, brought on by the debate of yesterday.'"

"Oh, impossible!"

"Well, read it yourself; there it is, and, as if to make the thing less creditable, you talk of his 'bill for the better recovery of small debts.' I'm sure, O'Malley, your last moments were not employed in that manner."

"Come, now," said Sir Harry, "I'll set all to rights with a postscript: 'Any one who questions the above statement, is politely requested to call on Mr. Considine, 16 Kildare street, who will feel happy to afford him every satisfaction upon Mr. O'Malley's decease, or upon miscellaneous matters.'"

"Worse and worse," said O'Malley. "Killing another man will never persuade the world that I am dead."

"But we'll wake you, and have a glorious funeral."

"And if any man doubts the statement, I'll call him out," said the Count.

"Or, better still," said Sir Harry, "O'Malley has his action at law for defamation."

"I see I'll never get down to Galway at this rate," said O'Malley; "and as the new election takes place on Tuesday week, time presses. There are more writs flying after me this instant than for all the government boroughs."

"And there will be fewer returns, I fear," said Sir Harry.

"Who is the chief creditor?" asked the Count.

"Old Stapleton the attorney, in Fleet street, has most of the mortgages."

"Nothing to be done with him in this way," said Considine, balancing the cork-screw like a hair-trigger.

"No chance of it."

"May be," said Sir Harry, "he might come to terms, if I were to call and say—you are anxious to close accounts, as your death has just taken place. You know what I mean."

"I fear so should he, were you to say so. No, no, Boyle, just try a plain, straight-forward paragraph about my death. We'll have it in Falkner's paper to-morrow; on Friday the funeral can take place, and, with the blessing of God, I'll come to life on Saturday at Athlone, in time to canvass the market."

"I think it would n't be bad, if your ghost were to appear to old Timins, the tanner, in Naas, on your way down; you know he arrested you once before."

"I prefer a night's sleep," said O'Malley; "but come, finish the squib for the paper."

"Stay a little," said Sir Harry, musing; "it just strikes me that if ever the matter gets out, I may be in some confounded scrape. Who knows if it is not a breach of privilege to report the death of a member, and to tell you the truth, I dread the sergeant and speaker's warrant with a very lively fear."

"Why, when did you make his acquaintance?" said the Count.

"Is it possible you never heard of Boyle's committal?" said O'Malley; "you surely must have been abroad at the time; but it's not too late to tell it yet."

"Well, it's about two years since old Townsend brought in his enlistment bill, and the whole country was scoured for all our voters, who were scattered here and there, never anticipating another call of the House, and supposing that the session was just over. Among others, up came our friend Harry, here, and the night he arrived they made him a 'monk of the screw,' and very soon made him forget his senatorial dignities."

"On the evening after his reaching town, the bill was brought in, and, at two in the morning, the division took place—a vote was of too much consequence, not to look after it closely—and a castle messenger was in waiting in Exchequer street, who, when the debate was closing, put Harry, with three others, into a coach, and brought them down to the House. Unfortunately, however, they mistook their friends, voted against the bill; and, amid the loudest cheering of the opposition the Government party were defeated. The rage of the ministers knew no bounds, and looks of defiance and even threats were exchanged between the ministers and the deserters. Amid all this, poor Harry fell fast asleep, and dreamed that he was once more in Exchequer street, presiding among the monks, and mixing another tumbler. At length he awoke and looked about him—the clerk was just at the instant reading out, in his usual routine manner, a clause of the new bill, and the remainder of the house was in dead silence. Harry looked again around on every side, wondering where was the hot water, and what had become of the whisky-bottle, and, above all, why the company were so extremely dull and ungenial. At length, with a half shake, he roused up a little, and giving a look of unequivocal contempt on every side, called out, 'upon my soul you're pleasant companions—but I'll give you a chaunt to enliven you.' So saying, he cleared his throat with a couple of short coughs, and struck up, with the voice of a Stentor, the following verse of a popular ballad:

"And they nibbled away, both night and day,
Like mice in a round of Glopster;
Great rogues they were all, both great and small;
From Flood to Leslie Foster.
"Great rogues all."

"Chorus, boys."

"If he was not joined by the voices of his friends in the song, it was probably because such a roar of laughing never was heard since the walls were roofed over. The whole house rose in a mass, and my friend Harry was hurried over the benches by the sergeant-at-arms, and left for three weeks in Newgate, to practise his melody."

"All true," said Sir Harry, "and worse luck to them, for not liking music; but come, now, will this do?" "It is our melancholy duty to announce the death of Godfrey O'Malley, Esq., late member for the county of Galway, which took place on Friday evening, at Daly's club house. This esteemed gentleman's family—one of the oldest in Ireland, and among whom it was hereditary not to have any children—"

Here a burst of laughter from Considine and O'Malley interrupted the reader, who with the greatest difficulty could be persuaded that he was again bulling it—"The devil fly away with it," said he, "I'll never succeed."

"Never mind," said O'Malley; "the first part will do admirably; and let us now turn our attention to other matters."

A fresh magnum was called for, and over its inspiring contents, all the details of the funeral were planned; and, as the clock struck four, the party separated for the night, well satisfied with the result of their labors.

CHAPTER II....The Escape.

When the dissolution of Parliament was announced the following morning in Dublin, its interest in certain circles was manifestly increased by the fact, that Godfrey O'Malley was at last open to arrest—for, as in olden times, certain gifted individuals possessed some happy immunity against death by fire or sword, so the worthy O'Malley seemed to enjoy a no less valuable privilege, and for many a year had passed, among the myrmidons of the law, as writ-proof. Now, however, the charm seemed to have yielded, and pretty much with the same feeling as a storming party may be supposed to experience on the day that a breach is reported as practicable, did the honest attorneys retained in the various suits against him, rally round each other that morning in the Four Courts.

Bonds, mortgages, pest obits, promissory notes, in fact every imaginable species of invention for raising the O'Malley exchequer, for the preceding thirty years, were handed about on all sides; suggesting to the mind of an uninterested observer, the notion that, had the aforesaid O'Malley been an independent and absolute monarch, instead of merely being the member for Galway, the kingdom over whose destinies he had been called to preside would have suffered not a little from a depreciated currency and an extravagant issue of paper money. Be that as it might, one thing was clear, the whole estates of the family could not pay one-fourth of the debt; and the only question was one which occasionally arises at a scanty dinner on a mail-coach road—who was to be the lucky individual to carve the joint, where so many were sure to go off hungry.

It was now a trial of address between these various and highly-gifted gentlemen, who should first pounce upon the victim, and when the skill of their caste is taken into consideration, who will doubt that every feasible expedient for securing him was resorted to! While writs were struck against him in Dublin, emissaries were despatched to the various surrounding counties, to procure others in the event of his escape. Ne exeat were sworn, and water bailiffs engaged to follow him on the high seas; and as the great Nassau balloon did not exist in those days, no imaginable mode of escape appeared possible, and bets were offered at long odds, that within twenty-four hours, the late member would be enjoying his otium cum dignitate in his Majesty's jail of Newgate.

Expectation was at the highest—confidence hourly increasing—success all but certain—when, in the midst of all this high bounding hope, the dreadful rumor spread, that O'Malley was no more. One had seen it just five minutes before, in the evening edition of Falkner's paper—another heard it in the courts—a third overheard the Chief Justice stating it to the Master of the Rolls—and, lastly, a breathless witness arrived from College-green, with the news that Daly's Club House was shut up, and the shutters closed. To describe the consternation the intelligence caused on every side, is impossible; nothing in history equals it, except, perhaps the entrance of the French army into Moscow, deserted and forsaken by its former inhabitants. While terror and dismay, therefore, spread amid that wide and respectable body who formed O'Malley's creditors, the preparations for his funeral were going on with every rapidity—relays of horses were ordered at every stage of the journey, and it was announced that, in testimony of his worth, a large party of his friends were to accompany his remains to Portunna Abbey—a test much more indicative of resistance in the event of any attempt to arrest the body, than of any thing like reverence for their departed friend.

Such was the state of matters in Dublin, when a letter reached me one morning at O'Malley Castle, whose contents will at once explain the writer's intention, and also serve to introduce my unworthy self to my reader. It ran thus:—

"DEAR CHARLEY—Your uncle Godfrey, whose debts [God pardon him] are more numerous than the hairs of his wig, was obliged to die here last night. We did the thing for him completely; and all doubts as to the reality of the event, are silenced by the circumstantial detail of the newspaper, 'that he was confined six weeks to his bed, from a cold he caught ten days ago while on guard.' Repeat this, for it's better we had all the same story, till he comes to life again, which may be will not take place before Tuesday or Wednesday. At the same time, canvass the county for him, and say he'll be with his friends next week, and up in Woodford, and the Scariff barony: say he died a true Catholic; it will serve him on the hustings. Meet us in Athlone on Saturday, and bring your uncle's mare with you—he says he'd rather ride home; and tell Father Mac Shane to have a bit of dinner ready about four o'clock, for the corpse can get nothing after he leaves Mountmelick.—No more now, from yours, ever.

"HARRY BOYLE.

"Daly's, about eight in the evening.

"To Charles O'Malley, Esq.
"O'Malley-Castle, Galway."

When this not over clear document reached me, I was the sole inhabitant of O'Malley Castle, a very ruinous pile of incongruous masonry, that stood in a wild and dreary part of the County of Galway, bordering on the Shannon; on every side stretched the property of my uncle, or at least what had once been so; and indeed so numerous were its present claimants that he would have been a subtle lawyer who could have pronounced upon the rightful owner. The demesne around the castle contained some well-grown and handsome timber, and, as the soil was undulating and fertile, presented many features of beauty; beyond, it was all sterile, bleak and barren. Long tracts of brown heath-clad mountain, or not less unprofitable valleys of tall and waving fern were all that the eye could discern, except where the broad Shannon, expanding into a tranquil and glassy lake, lay still and motionless beneath the dark mountains; a few islands, with ruined churches and a round tower, alone breaking the dreary waste of water.

Here it was that I had passed my infancy and my youth, and here I now stood at the age of seventeen, quite unconscious that the world contained aught fairer and brighter than that gloomy valley, with its rugged frame of mountains.

When a mere child, I was left an orphan to the care of my worthy uncle. My father, whose extravagance had well sustained the family reputation, had squandered a large and handsome property in contesting elections for his native county, and in keeping up that system of unlimited hospitality for which Ireland in general, and Galway more especially, was renowned. The result was, as might be expected, ruin and beggary: he died, leaving every one of his estates encumbered with heavy debts, and the only legacy he left to his brother was a boy of four years of age, entreating him, with his last breath—"Be anything you like to him, Godfrey, but a father, or at least such a one as I have proved."

Godfrey O'Malley, some short time previous, had lost his wife, and when this new trust was committed to him, he esolved never to re-marry, but to rear me up as his own child, and the inheritor of his estates. How weighty and onerous an obligation this latter might prove the reader can form some idea; the intention was, however, a kind one; and, to do my uncle justice, he loved me with all the affection of a warm and open heart.

From my earliest years his whole anxiety was to fit me for the part of a country gentleman, as he regarded that character—viz.: I rode boldly with fox-hounds; I was about the best shot within twenty miles of us; I could swim the Shannon at Holy Island; I drove four-in-hand better than the coachman himself; and from finding a hare to hooking a salmon, my equal could not be found, from Killaloe to Banagher. These were the staple of my endowments; besides which, the parish priest had taught me a little Latin, a little French, and a little geometry, and a great deal of the life and opinions of St. Jago, who presided over a holy well in the neighborhood, and was held in very great repute.

When I add to this portraiture of my accomplishments that I was nearly six feet high, with more than a common share of activity and strength for my years, and no inconsiderable portion of good looks, I have finished my sketch, and stand before my reader.

It is now time I should return to Sir Harry's letter, which so completely bewildered me that, but for the assistance of Father Roach, I should have been totally unable to make out the writer's intentions. By his advice, I immediately set out for Athlone, where, when I arrived, I found my uncle addressing the mob from the top of the hearse, and recounting his miraculous escapes as a new claim upon their gratitude.

"There was nothing else for it, boys; the Dublin people insisted on my being their member, and besieged the clubhouse. I refused—they threatened—I grew obstinate—they furious. 'I'll die first,' said I, 'Galway or nothing!' 'Hurrah!' from the mob; 'O'Malley for ever!' 'And ye see I keep my word, boys—I did die; I died that evening at a quarter past eight. There, read it for yourselves; there's the paper; was waked, and carried out, and here I am after all, ready to die in earnest for you—but never to desert you.'"

The cheers here were deafening; and my uncle was carried through the market, down to the mayor's house, who, being a friend of the opposition party, was complimented with three groans; then up the Mall to the chapel, beside which Father Mac Shane resided; he was then suffered to touch the earth once more, when, having shaken hands with all his constituency within reach, he entered within the house, to partake of the kindest welcome and best reception the good priest could afford him.

My uncle's progress homeward was a triumph; the real secret of his escape had somehow come out, and his popularity rose to a white heat. "An it's a little O'Malley cares for the law—bad luck to it; it's himself can laugh at judge and jury. Arrest him!—na bocklish—catch a weasel asleep," &c. Such were the encomiums that greeted him as he passed on toward home; while shouts of joy and blazing bonfires attested that his success was regarded as a national triumph.

The west has certainly its strong features of identity. Had my uncle possessed the claims of the immortal Howard—had he united in his person all the attributes which confer a lasting and an ennobling fame upon humanity—he might have passed on unnoticed and unobserved; but for the man that had duped a judge and escaped a sheriff, nothing was sufficiently flattering to mark their approbation. The success of the exploit was two-fold; the news spread far and near, and the very story canvassed the county better than Billy Davern himself, the Athlone attorney.

This was the prospect now before us; and, however little my readers may sympathise with my taste, I must honestly avow that I looked forward to it with a most delightful feeling. O'Malley Castle was to be the centre of operations, and filled with my uncle's supporters; while I, a mere stripling, and usually treated as a boy, was to be intrusted with an important mission, and sent off to canvass a distant relation, with whom my uncle was not upon terms, who might possibly be approached by a younger branch of the family, with whom he had never any collision.

CHAPTER III.—Mr. Blake.

Nothing but the exigency of the case could ever have persuaded my uncle to stoop to the humiliation of canvassing the individual to whom I was now about to proceed as envoy extraordinary, with full powers to make any or every amende, provided only his interest, and that of his followers, should be thereby secured to the O'Malley cause. The evening before I set out was devoted to giving me all the necessary instructions how I was to proceed, and what difficulties I was to avoid.

"Say your uncle's in high feather with the government party," said Sir Harry, "and that he only votes against them as a ruse de guerre, as the French call it."

"Insist upon it, that I am sure of the election without him; but that for family reasons he should not stand aloof from me; that people are talking of it in the country."

"And drop a hint," said Considine, "that O'Malley is greatly improved in his shooting."

"And do n't get drunk too early in the evening, for Phil. Blake has beautiful claret," said another.

"And be sure you do n't make love to the red-headed girls," added a third; "he has four of them, each more sinfully ugly than the other."

"You'll be playing whist too," said Boyle; "and never mind losing a few pounds. Mrs. B., long life to her, has a playful way of turning the king."

"Charley will do it all well," said my uncle; "leave him alone; and now let us have in the supper."

It was only on the following morning, as the tandem came round to the door, that I began to feel the importance of my mission, and certain misgivings came over me as to my ability to fulfil it. Mr. Blake and his family, though estranged from my uncle for several years past, had been always most kind and good-natured to me; and, although I could not, with propriety, have cultivated any close intimacy with them, I had every reason to suppose, that they entertained toward me nothing but sentiments of good will. The head of the family was a Galway squire of the oldest and most genuine stock; a great sportsman, a negligent farmer, and most careless father; he looked upon a fox as an infinitely more precious part of the creation than a French governess; and thought that riding well with hounds was a far better gift than all the learning of a Porson. His daughters were after his own heart—the best-tempered, least-educated, most high-spirited, gay, dashing, ugly girls in the country—ready to ride over a four-foot paling without a saddle, and to dance the "Wind that shakes the barley," for four consecutive hours, against all the officers that their hard fate, and the Horse-guards, ever condemned to Galway.

The mamma was only remarkable for her liking for whist, and her invariable good fortune thereat; a circumstance, the world were agreed in ascribing less to the blind goddess than her own natural endowments.

Lastly, the heir of the house was a stripling of about my own age, whose accomplishments were limited to selling spavined and broken-winded horses to the infantry officers, playing a safe game at billiards, and acting as jackal-general to his sisters at balls, providing them with a sufficiency of partners, and making a strong fight for a place at the supper-table for his mother. These paternal and filial traits, more honored at home than abroad, had made Mr. Matthew Blake a rather well-known individual in the neighborhood where he lived.

Though Mr. Blake's property was ample, and, strange to say for his county, unencumbered, the whole air and appearance of his house and grounds betrayed anything rather than a sufficiency of means. The gate lodge was a miserable mud hovel, with a thatched and falling roof; the gate itself, a wooden contrivance, one half of which was boarded, and the other railed; the avenue was covered with weeds, and deep with ruts, and the clumps of young plantation which had been planted and fenced with care, were now open to the cattle, and either totally uprooted or denuded of their bark, and dying. The lawn, a handsome one of some forty acres, had been devoted to an exercise ground for training horses, and was cut up by their feet, beyond all semblance of its original destination; and the house itself, a large and venerable structure of above a century old, displayed every variety of contrivance, as well as the usual one of glass, to exclude the weather from the windows. The hall door hung by a single hinge, and required three persons each morning and evening, to open and shut it; the remainder of the day it lay pensively open; the steps which led to it were broken and falling; and the whole aspect of things without was ruinous in the extreme. Within, matters were somewhat better, for, though the furniture was old, and none of it clean, yet an appearance of comfort was evident; and the large grate, blazing with its pile of red-hot turf, the deep cushioned chairs, the old black mahogany dinner-table, and the soft carpet, albeit deep with dust, were not to be despised on a winter's evening, after a hard day's run with the "Blazers." Here it was, however, that Mr. Philip Blake had dispensed his hospitalities for above fifty years, and his father before him; and here, with a retinue of servants as gauche and ill-ordered as all about them, was he accustomed to invite all that the country possessed of rank and wealth, among which the officers quartered in his neighborhood, were never neglected, the Misses Blake having as decided a taste for the army as any young ladies of the west of Ireland; and, while the Galway squire, with his cords and tops, was detailing the last news from Ballinasloe in one corner, the dandy from St. James's-street might be seen displaying more arts of seductive flattery in another, than his most accurate insouciance would permit him to practice in the elegant saloons of London or Paris: and the same man who would have "cut his brother," for a solecism of dress or equipage, in Bond-street, was now to be seen quietly domesticated, eating family dinners, rolling silk for the young ladies, going down the middle in a country dance, and even descending to the indignity of long whist, at "tenpenny" points, with only the miserable consolation, that the company were not honest.

It was upon a clear frosty morning, when a bright blue sky and a sharp but bracing air seem to exercise upon the feeling a sense no less pleasurable than the balmy breeze and warmest sun summer, that I whipped my leader short round, and entered the precincts of "Gurt-na-Morra." As I proceeded along the avenue, I was struck by the slight trace of repairs here and there evident; a gate or two that formerly had been parallel to the horizon, had been raised to the perpendicular; some ineffectual efforts at paint were also perceptible upon the palings, and in short, everything seemed to have undergone a kind of attempt at improvement.

When I reached the door, instead of being surrounded, as of old, by a tribe of menials frieze-coated, bare-headed, and bare-legged, my presence was announced by a tremendous ringing of bells, from the hands of an old functionary, in a very formidable livery, who peeped at me through the hall window, and whom, with the greatest difficulty, I recognized as my quondam acquaintance, the butler. His wig alone would have graced a king's counsel, and the high collar of his coat, and the stiff pillory of his cravat, denoted an eternal adieu to so humble a vocation as drawing a cork. Before I had time for any conjecture as to the altered circumstances about, the activity of my friend at the bell had surrounded me with "four others worse than himself," at least they were exactly similarly attired; and, probably, from the novelty of their costume, and the restraints of so unusual a thing as dress were as perfectly unable to assist themselves or others, as the Court of Aldermen would be were they to rig out in plate armour of the fourteenth century. How much longer I might have gone on conjecturing the reasons for the masquerade around, I cannot say; but my servant, an Irish disciple of my uncle's, whispered in my ear—"It's a red breeches day, Master Charles—they'll have a hoith of company in the house." From the phrase, it needed little explanation to inform me, that it was one of those occasions, on which Mr. Blake attired all the hangers-on of his house in livery, and that great preparations were in progress for a more than usually splendid reception.

In the next moment I was ushered into the breakfast-room, where a party of a dozen persons were most gayly enjoying all the good cheer for which the house had a well-deserved repute. After the usual shaking of hands, and hearty greetings were over, I was introduced in all form to Sir George Dashwood, a tall, and singularly handsome man of about fifty, with an undress military frock and ribbon. His reception of me was somewhat strange, for as they mentioned my relationship to Godfrey O'Malley, he smiled slightly and whispered something to Mr. Blake, who replied—"Oh! no, no, not the least, a mere boy—and besides,"—what he added I lost, for at that moment Nora Blake was presenting me to Miss Dashwood.

If the sweetest blue eyes that ever beamed beneath a forehead of snowy whiteness, over which dark brown and waving hair fell, less in curls than masses of locky richness, could only have known what wild work they were making of my poor heart, Miss Dashwood, I trust, would have looked at her tea-cup, or her muffin, rather than at me, as she actually did on that fatal morning. If I were to judge from her costume, she had only just arrived, and the morning air had left upon her cheek a bloom, that contributed greatly to the effect of her lovely countenance. Although very young, her form had all the roundness of womanhood; while her gay and sprightly manner indicated all the je ne sais quoi, which only very young girls possess, and which, when tempered with perfect good taste and accompanied by beauty and no small share of talent, form an irresistible power of attraction.

Beside her sat a tall handsome man of about five-and-forty or perhaps forty years of age, with a most soldierly air, who, as I was presented to him, scarcely turned his head, and gave me a half-nod of very unequivocal coldness. There are moments in life, in which the heart is, as it were, laid bare to any chance or casual impression, with a wondrous sensibility of pleasure, or its opposite. This to me was one of those; and, as I turned from the lovely girl, who had received me with a marked courtesy, to the cold air and repelling hauteur of the dark-browed Captain, the blood rushed throbbing to my forehead; and, as I walked to my place at the table, I eagerly sought his eye, to return him a look of defiance and disdain, proud and contemptuous as his own. Captain Hammersly, however, never took further notice of me, but continued to recount, for the amusement of those about, several excellent stories of his military career, which, I confess, were heard with every test of delight by all, save me. One thing galled me particularly—and how easy it is, when you have begun by disliking a person, to supply food for you antipathy—all his allusions to military life were coupled with half-hinted and ill-concealed sneers at civilians of every kind as though every man not a soldier were absolutely unfit for common intercourse with the world—still more, for any favorable reception in ladies' society.

The young ladies of the family were a well-chosen auditory, for their admiration of the army extended from the Life Guards to the Veteran Battalion, the Sappers and Miners included; and, as Miss Dashwood was the daughter of a soldier, she, of course, coincided in many, if not all his opinions. I turned toward my neighbor, a Clare gentleman, and tried to engage him in conversation, but he was breathlessly attending to the Captain. On my left sat Matthew Blake, whose eyes were firmly riveted upon the same person, and heard his marvels with an interest scarcely inferior to that of his sisters. Annoyed, and in ill-temper, I eat my breakfast in silence, and resolved that, the first moment I could obtain a hearing from Mr. Blake, I should open my negotiation, and take my leave at once of "Gurt-na-Morra."

We all assembled in a large room, called, by courtesy, the library, when breakfast was over; and then it was that Mr. Blake, taking me aside, whispered, "Charley, it's right I should inform you that Sir George Dashwood there is the Commander of the Forces, and is come down here at this moment to —" What for, or how it should concern me, I was not to learn; for at that critical instant, my informant's attention was called off, by Captain Hammersly asking if the hounds were to hunt that day.

"My friend Charley, here, is the best authority upon that matter," said Mr. Blake, turning toward me.

"They are to try the Priest's meadows," said I, with an air of some importance; "but, if your guests desire a day's sport, I'll send word over to Brackely to bring the dogs over here, and we are sure to find a fox in your cover."

"Oh, then, by all means," said the Captain, turning toward Mr. Blake, and addressing himself to him—"by all means, and Miss Dashwood, I'm sure, would like to see the hounds throw off."

Whatever chagrin the first part of his speech caused me, the latter set my heart a throbbing; and I hastened from the room to despatch a messenger to the huntsman, to come over to Gurt-na-Morra, and also, another to O'Malley Castle, to bring my best horse and my riding equipments, as quickly as possible.

"Matthew, who is this Captain?" said I, as young Blake met me in the hall.

"Oh! he is the aide-de-camp of General Dashwood. A nice fellow, isn't he?"

"I don't know what you may think," said I, "but I take him for the most impertinent, impudent, supercilious —"

The rest of my civil speech was cut short by the appearance of the very individual in question, who, with his hands in his pockets, and a cigar in his mouth, sauntered forth down the steps, taking no more notice of Matthew Blake and myself than of the two fox terriers that followed at his heels.

However anxious I might be to open negotiations on the subject of my mission, for the present the thing was impossible; for I found that Sir George Dashwood was closeted closely with Mr. Blake, and resolved to wait till evening, when chance might afford me the opportunity I desired.

As the ladies had entered to dress for the hunt, and, as I felt no peculiar desire to ally myself with the unsocial Captain, I accompanied Matthew to the stable to look after the cattle and make preparations for the coming sport.

"There's Captain Hammersly's horse," said Matthew, as he pointed out a highly bred but powerful English hunter: "she came last night, for, as he expected some sport, he sent his horses from Dublin on purpose. The other will be here to-day."

"What is his regiment?" said I, with an appearance of carelessness, but in reality feeling curious to know if the Captain was a cavalry or infantry officer.

"The —th Light Dragoons," said Matthew.

"You never saw him ride?" said I.

"Never; but his groom, there, says he leads the way in his own county."

"And where may that be?"

"In Leicestershire, no less," said Matthew.

"Does he know Galway?"

"Never was in it before; it's only this minute he asked Mosey Daly if the ox-fences were high here."

"Ox-fences! then he does not know what a wall is."

"Devil a bit; but we'll teach him."

"That we will," said I, with as bitter a resolution to impart the instruction, as ever schoolmaster did to whip Latin grammar into one of the great unbred."

"But I had better send the horses down to the Mill," said Matthew; "we'll draw that cover first."

So saying, he turned toward the stable, while I sauntered alone toward the road, by which I expected the huntsman. I had not walked half-a-mile before I heard the yelping of the dogs, and, a little farther on, I saw old Brackely coming along at a brisk trot, cutting the hounds on each side, and calling after the stragglers.

"Did you see my horse on the road, Brackely?" said I.

"I did, Misther Charles, and troth I'm sorry to see him; sure yerself knows better than to take out the Badger, the best steeple-chaser in Ireland, in such a country as this; n'othing but awkward stone-fence, and not a foot of sure ground in the whole of it."

"I know it well, Brackely; but I have my reasons for it."

"Well, maybe you have; what cover will yer honor try first?"

"They talk of the Mill," said I, "but I'd much rather try 'Morran-a-Gowl.'"

"Morran-a-Gowl! do you want to break your neck entirely?"

"No, Brackely, not mine."

"Whose then, alannah?"

"An English Captain's, the devil fly away with him; he's come down here to-day, and from all I can see is a most impudent fellow; so Brackely —"

"I understand; well, leave it to me, and, though I don't like the old deer-park wall on the hill, we'll try it this morning with the blessing; I'll take him down by Woodford, over the 'Devil's Mouth,'—it's eighteen feet wide this minute with the late rains; into the four callows, then over the stone walls, down to Dangan; then take a short cast up the hill, blow him a bit, and give him the park wall at the top. You must come in then fresh, and give him the whole run home over Sleibhmich—the Badger knows it all—and takes the road always in a fly; a mighty distressing thing for the horse that follows, more particularly if he does not understand a stone country. Well, if he lives through this, give him the sunk fence and the stone wall at Mr. Blake's clover-field, for the hounds will run into the fox about there; and though we never ride that leap since Mr. Malone broke his neck at it, last October, yet, upon an occasion like this, and for the honor of Galway —"

"To be sure, Brackely, and here's a guinea for you; and now trot on toward the house, they must not see us together, or they might suspect something. But, Brackely," said I, calling out after him, "if he rides at all fair, what's to be done?"

"Troth, then, myself does n't know; there's nothing so bad west of Athlone; have ye a great spite agin him?"

"I have," said I, fiercely.

"Could ye coax a fight out of him?"

"That's true," said I, "and now ride on as fast as you can."

Brackely's last words imparted a lightness to my heart and my step, and I strode along a very different man from what I had left the horse half an hour previously.

CHAPTER IV.—The Hunt.

Although we had not the advantages of a "southerly wind and a cloudy sky," the day, toward noon, became strongly overcast, and promised to afford us good scenting weather, and as we assembled at the meet, mutual congratulations were exchanged upon the improved appearance of the day. Young Blake had provided Miss Dashwood with a quiet and well-trained horse, and his sisters were all mounted, as usual, upon their own animals, giving to our turn-out quite a gay and lively aspect. I myself came to cover upon a hackney, having sent Badger with a groom, and longed ardently for the moment when, casting the skin of my great-coat and overalls, I should appear before the world in my well-appointed "cords and tops." Captain Hammersly had not as yet made his appearance, and many conjectures were afloat as to whether "he might have missed the road, or changed his mind," or forgot all about it, as Miss Dashwood hinted.

"Who, pray, pitched upon this cover?" said Caroline Blake, as she looked with a practised eye over the country, on either side.

"There is no chance of a fox, late in the day, at the mills," said the huntsman, inventing a lie for the occasion.

"Then of course you never intend us to see much of the sport, for after you break cover, you are entirely lost to us."

"I thought you always followed the hounds," said Miss Dashwood, timidly.

"Oh, to be sure we do, in any common country; but here it is out of the question—the fences are too large for any one, and, if I am not mistaken, these gentlemen will not ride far over this; there, look yonder, where the river is rushing down the hill—that stream widening as it advances, crosses the cover nearly mid-way; well, they must clear that, and then you may see these walls of large loose stones, nearly five feet in height; that is the usual course the fox takes, unless he heads toward the hills, and goes toward Dangan, and then there's an end of it; for the deer park wall is usually a pull up to every one, except, perhaps, to our friend Charley there, who has tried his fortune against drowning more than once there."

"Look, here he comes," said Matthew Blake, "and looking splendidly too—a little too much in flesh, perhaps, if any thing."

"Captain Hammersly," said the four Miss Blakes in a breath, "where is he?"

"No, it's the Badger I'm speaking of," said Matthew, laughing, and pointing with his finger toward a corner of the field where my servant was leisurely throwing down a wall about two feet high to let him pass.

"Oh, how handsome—what a charger for a dragoon," said Miss Dashwood.

Any other mode of praising my steed, would have been much more acceptable. The word dragoon was a thorn in my tenderest part, that rankled and lacerated at every stir. In a moment I was in the saddle, and scarcely seated when at once all the mauvaise honte of boyhood left me, and I felt every inch a man. I kept looking back to that moment of my life, and, comparing it with many similar ones, cannot help acknowledging how purely is the self-possession which so often wins success, the result of some slight and trivial association. My confidence in my horsemanship suggested moral courage of a very different kind, and I felt that Charles O'Malley curvetting upon a thorough bred and the same man ambling upon a shelly were two and very dissimilar individuals.

"No chance of the Captain," said Matthew, who had returned from a reconnaissance upon the road, "and after all it's a pity, for the day is getting quite favorable."

While the young ladies formed picquets to look out for the gallant militaire, I seized the opportunity of prosecuting my acquaintance with Miss Dashwood; and, even in the few and passing observations that fell from her, learned how very different an order of being she was from all I had hitherto seen of country belles. A mixture of courtesy with naïveté—a wish to please, with a certain feminine gentleness, that always flatters a man, and still more a boy that vain would be one—gained momentarily more and more upon me, and put me also on my mettle to prove to my fair companion that I was not altogether a mere uncultivated and unthinking creature like the remainder of those about me.

"Here he is, at last," said Helen Blake, as she cantered across a field, waving her handkerchief as a signal to the Captain, who was now seen approaching at a brisk trot.

As he came along, a small fence intervened; he pressed his horse a little, and, as he kissed hands to the fair Helen, cleared it in a bound, and was in an instant in the midst of us.

"He sits his horse like a man, Misther Charles," said the old huntsman; "troth we must give him the worst bit of it."

Captain Hammersly was, despite all the critical acumen with which I canvassed him, the very beau idéal of a gentleman rider, indeed, although a very heavy man, his powerful English thorough-bred, showing not less bone than blood, took away all semblance of over-weight; his saddle, well fitting and well placed; his large and broad-reigned snaffle; his own costume of black coat, leathers, and tops, was in perfect keeping, and even to his heavy handled hunting-whip, I could find nothing to cavil at. As he rode up he paid his respects to the ladies, in his usual free and easy manner, expressed some surprise, but no regret, at hearing that he was late, and never designing any notice of Matthew or myself, took his place beside Miss Dashwood, with whom he conversed in a low and under tone.

"There they go," said Matthew, as five or six dogs, with their heads up, ran yelping along a furrow, then stopped, howled again, and once more set off together. In an instant all was commotion in the little valley below us. The huntsman, with his hand to his mouth, was calling off the stragglers, and the whipper-in following up the leading dogs with the rest of the pack. "They're found!—they're away!" said Matthew; and, as he spoke, a great yell burst from the valley, and in an instant the whole pack were off at speed. Rather more intent that moment upon showing off my horsemanship than any thing else, I dashed spurs into Badger's sides, and turned him towards a rasping ditch before me; over we went, hurling down the rotten bank of clay and small stones, shewing how little safety there had been in topping instead of clearing it at a bound. Before I was well seated again, the Captain was beside me. "Now, for it, then," said I, and away we went. What might be the nature of his feelings I cannot pretend to state, but my own were a strange mélange of wild boyish enthusiasm, revenge, and recklessness. For my own neck I cared little—nothing; and as I led the way by half a length, I muttered to myself, "Let him follow me fairly this day, and I ask no more."

The dogs had got somewhat the start of us, and, as they were in full cry, and going fast, we were a little behind. A thought therefore struck me that, by appearing to take a short cut upon the hounds, I should come down upon the river where its breadth was greatest, and thus at one coup might try my friend's mettle and his horse's performance at the same time. On we went, our speed increasing, till the roar of the river we were now approaching was plainly audible. I looked half round, and now perceived that the Captain was standing in his stirrups, as if to obtain a view of what was before him; otherwise his countenance was perfectly calm and unmoved, and not a muscle betrayed that he was not cantering on a parade. I fixed myself firmly in my seat, shook my horse a little together, and, with a shout whose import every Galway hunter well knows, rushed him at the river. I saw the water dashing among the large stones, I heard its splash, I felt a bound like the ricochet of a shot, and we were over, but so narrowly, that the bank had yielded beneath his hind legs, and it needed a bold effort of the noble animal to regain his footing. Scarcely was he once more firm, when Hammersly flew by me, taking the lead, and sitting quietly in his saddle, as if racing. I know of nothing in all my after life like the agony of that moment; for, although I was far, very far, from wishing real ill to him, yet I would gladly have broken my leg or my arm if he could not have been able to follow me. And now there he was, actually a length and a half in advance; and, worse than all, Miss Dashwood must have witnessed the whole, and doubtless his leap over the river was better and bolder than mine. One consolation yet remained, and while I whispered it to myself I felt comforted again. "His is an English mare—they understand these leaps—but what can he make of a Galway?" The question was soon to be solved. Before us, about three fields were the hounds still in cry; a large stone wall lay between, and to it we both directed our course together. Ha! thought I, he is floored at last, as I perceived that the Captain held his horse rather more in hand, and suffered me to lead. "Now, then, for it!" so saying I rode at the largest part I could find, well knowing that Badger's powers were here in their element. One spring, one plunge, and away we were, galloping along at the other side. Not so the Captain; his horse had refused the fence, and he was now taking a circuit of the field for another trial of it.

"Pounded, by Jove," said I, as I turned round in my saddle to observe him. Once more she came at it, and once more balked, rearing up at the same time, almost to fall backward.

My triumph was complete, and I again was about to follow the hounds; when, throwing a look back, I saw Hammersly clearing the wall in a most splendid manner, and taking a stretch of at least thirteen feet beyond it. Once more he was on my flanks, and the contest renewed. Whatever might be the sentiments of the riders, (mine I confess to,) between the horses it now became a tremendous struggle. The English mare, though evidently superior in stride and strength, was still overweighted, and had not beside that cat-like activity an Irish horse possesses; so that the advantages and disadvantages on either side were about equalized. For about an half an hour now the pace was awful. We rode side by side, taking our leaps exactly at the same instant, and not four feet apart. The hounds were still considerably in advance, and were heading toward the Shannon, when suddenly the fox doubled, took the hill side, and made for Dangan. Now, then, comes the trial of strength, I said half aloud, as I threw my eye up a steep and rugged mountain, covered with wild furze and tall heath, around the crest of which ran, in a zig-zag direction, a broken and dilapidated wall, once the enclosure of a deer-park. This wall, which varied from four to six feet in height, was of solid masonry, and would, in the most favorable ground, have been a bold leap. Here, at the summit of a mountain, with not a yard of footing, it was absolutely desperation.

By the time that we reached the foot of the hill, the fox, followed closely by the hounds, had passed through a breach in the wall, while Matthew Blake, with the huntsman and whipper-in, were riding along in search of a gap to lead the horses through. Before I put spurs to Badger, to face the hill, I turned one look toward Hammersly. There was a slight curl, half-smile, half-sneer, upon his lip, that actually maddened me, and had a precipice yawned beneath my feet, I should have dashed at it after that. The ascent was so steep that I was obliged to take the hill in a slanting direction, and even thus, the loose footing rendered it dangerous in the extreme. At length I reached the crest, where the wall, more than five feet in height, stood frowning above and seemed to defy me. I turned my horse full round, so that his very chest almost touched the stones, and, with a bold cut of the whip and a loud halloo, the gallant animal rose, as if rearing, pawed for an instant to regain his balance, and then with a frightful struggle fell backward, and rolled from top to bottom of the hill, carrying me along with him; the last object that crossed my sight, as I lay bruised and motionless, being the Captain as he took the wall in a flying leap, and disappeared at the other side. After a few scrambling efforts to rise, Badger regained his legs, and stood beside me; but such was the shock and concussion of my fall, that all the objects around me seemed wavering and floating before me, while showers of bright sparks fell in myriads before my eyes. I tried to rise, but fell back helpless. Cold perspiration broke over my forehead, and I fainted. From that moment I can remember nothing, till I felt myself galloping along at full speed upon a level table land, with the hounds about three fields in advance, Hammersly riding foremost, and taking all his leaps coolly as ever. As I swayed to either side upon my saddle, from weakness, I was lost to all thought or recollection, save a flickering memory of some plan of vengeance which still urged me forward. The chase had now lasted above an hour, and both hounds and horses began to feel the pace they were going. As for me, I rode mechanically; I neither knew nor cared for the dangers before me. My eye rested on but one object; my whole being was concentrated upon one vague and undetermined sense of revenge. At this instant the huntsman came along side of me.

"Are you hurt, Mister Charles? did you fall?—your cheek is all blood, and your coat is torn in two; and, Mother o' God, his boot is ground to powder; he does not hear me. Oh, pull up—pull, for the love of the Virgin; there's the clover field, and the sunk fence before you, and you'll be killed on the spot."

"Where?" cried I, with the cry of a madman, "where's the clover field?—where's the sunk fence? Ha! I see it—I see it now."

So saying, I dashed the rowels into my horse's flanks, and in an instant was beyond the reach of the poor fellow's remonstrances. Another moment, I was beside the Captain. He turned round as I came up: the same smile was upon his mouth—I could have struck him. About three hundred yards before us lay the sunk fence; its breadth was about twenty feet, and a wall of close brickwork formed its face. Over this the hounds were now clambering; some succeeded in crossing, but by far the greater number fell back howling into the ditch.

I turned toward Hammersly. He was standing high in his stirrups, and, as he looked toward the yawning fence, down which the dogs were tumbling in masses, I thought (perhaps it was but a thought) that his cheek was paler. I looked again; he was pulling at his horse: ha! it was true, then, he would not face it. I turned round in my saddle—looked him full in the face, and, as I pointed with my whip to the leap, called out with a voice hoarse with passion, "come on." I saw no more. All objects were lost to me from that moment. When next my senses cleared I was standing amid the dogs, where they had just killed. Badger stood blown and trembling beside me, his head drooping, and his flanks gored with spur marks. I looked about, but all consciousness of the past had fled; the concussion of my fall had shaken my intellect, and I was like one but half awake. One glimpse, short and fleeting, of what was taking place, shot through my brain, as old Brackley whispered to me, "By my soul ye did for the Captain there." I turned a vague look upon him, and my eyes fell upon the figure of a man that lay stretched and bleeding upon a door before me. His pale face was crossed with a purple stream of blood, that trickled from a wound beside his eye-brow; his arms lay motionless and heavily at either side. I knew him not. A loud report of a pistol aroused me from my stupor; I looked back. I saw a crowd that broke suddenly asunder and fled right and left. I heard a heavy crash on the ground, I pointed with my finger, for I could not utter a word.

"It is the English mare, yer honor; she was a beauty this morning, but she's broke her collar bone, and both her legs, and it was best to put her out of pain."

CHAPTER V.—The Drawing-Room.

On the fourth day following the adventure detailed in the last chapter, I made my appearance in the drawing-room; my cheek well blanched by copious bleeding, and my steps tottering and uncertain. On entering the room I looked about in vain for some one who might give me an insight into the occurrences of the four preceding days, but no one was to be met with. The ladies, I learned, were out riding; Matthew was buying a new setter; Mr. Blake was canvassing; and Captain Hammersly was in bed. Where was Miss Dashwood?—in her room; and Sir George? he was with Mr. Blake.

"What! canvassing too?"
"Troth that same was possible," was the intelligent reply of the old butler, at which I could not help smiling. I sat down therefore in the easiest chair I could find, and unfolding the country paper, resolved upon learning how matters were going on in the political world. But, somehow, whether the editor was not brilliant, or the fire was hot, or that my own dreams were pleasanter to indulge in than his fancies, I fell sound asleep.

How differently is the mind attuned to the active busy world of thought and action, when awakened from sleep by any sudden and rude summons to arise and be stirring, and when called into existence by the sweet and silvery notes of softest music, stealing over the senses, and while they impart awakening thoughts of bliss and beauty scarcely dissipating the dreary influence of slumber; such was my first thought as, with closed lids, the thrilling cords of a harp broke upon my sleep, and aroused me to a feeling of unutterable pleasure. I turned gently round in my chair, and beheld Miss Dashwood. She was seated in a recess of an old-fashioned window; the pale yellow glow of a wintery sun at evening fell upon her beautiful hair, and tinged it with such a light as I have often since then seen in Rembrandt's pictures; her head leaned upon the harp, and as she struck its cords at random, I saw that her mind was far from all around her; as I looked, she suddenly started from her leaning attitude, and, parting back her curls from her brow, she preluded a few chords, and then sighed forth, rather than sang, that most beautiful of Moore's Melodies—

"She is far from the land where her young hero sleeps."

Never before had such pathos, such deep utterance of feeling, met my astonished sense; I listened breathlessly as the tears fell one by one down my cheek; my bosom heaved and fell; and, when she ceased, I hid my head between my hands and sobbed aloud. In an instant she was beside me, and placing her hand upon my shoulder, said,

"Poor dear boy, I never suspected you of being there, or I should not have sung that mournful air."

I started and looked up, and, from what I know not, but she suddenly crimsoned to her very forehead, while she added in a less assured tone,

"I hope, Mr. O'Malley, that you are much better, and I trust there is no imprudence in your being here."

"For the latter I shall not answer," said I, with a sickly smile; "but already I feel your music has done me service."

"Then, pray let me sing more for you."

"If I am to have a choice, I should say, sit down and let me hear you talk to me; my illness and the doctor together have made wild work of my poor brain; but if you will, talk to me."

"Well then, what shall it be about?—Shall I tell you a fairy tale?"

"I need it not: I feel I am in one this instant."

"Well, then, what say you to a legend, for I am rich in my stores of them?"

"The O'Malleys have their chronicles, wild and barbarous enough, without the aid of Thor and Woden."

"Then shall we chat of every-day matters?—Should you like to hear how the election and the canvass goes on?"

"Yes; of all things."

"Well, then, most favorably. Two baronies, with most unspeakable names, have declared for us, and confidence is rapidly increasing among our party. This I learned by chance yesterday—for Papa never permits us to know anything of these matters; not even the names of the candidates."

"Well, that was the very point I was coming to, for the government were about to send down some one, just as I left home; and I am most anxious to learn who it is."

"Then am I utterly valueless; for I really can't say what party the government espouses, and only know of our own."

"Quite enough for me, that you wish it success," said I, gallantly, "perhaps, you can tell me if my uncle has heard of my accident?"

"Oh yes; but somehow, he has not been here himself; but sent a friend, a Mr. Considine, I think; a very strange person he seemed. He demanded to see Papa, and, it seems, asked him if your misfortune had been a thing of his contrivance, and whether he was ready to explain his conduct about it; and in fact, I believe he is mad."

"Heaven confound him," I muttered between my teeth.

"And then he wished to have an interview with Captain Hammersly, but he is too ill; but as the doctor hoped that he might be down stairs in a week, Mr. Considine kindly hinted that he should wait."

"Oh, then, do tell me how is the Captain?"

"Very much bruised, very much disfigured, they say," said she, half smiling; "but not so much hurt in body as in mind."

"As how, may I ask?" said I, with an appearance of innocence.

"I do n't exactly understand it; but it would appear that there was something like rivalry among you gentlemen chasers on that luckless morning, and that, while you paid the penalty of a broken head, he was destined to lose his horse, and break his arm."

"I certainly am sorry—most sincerely sorry, for any share I might have had in the catastrophe; and my greatest regret, I confess, arises from the fact, that I should cause you unhappiness."

"Me—pray explain?"

"Why, as Captain Hammersly—"

"Mr. O'Malley, you are too young now, to make me suspect that you have an intention to offend; but I caution you, never repeat this."

I saw that I had transgressed, but how, I most honestly confess, I could not guess; for though I certainly was the senior of my fair companion in years, I was most lamentably her junior in tact and discretion.

The gray dusk of evening had long fallen as we continued to chat together beside the blazing wood embers—she evidently amusing herself with the original notions of an untutored, unlettered boy; and I drinking deep these draughts of love that nerved my heart through many a breach and battle field.

Our colloquy was at length interrupted by the entrance of Sir George, who shook me most cordially by the hand, and made the kindest inquiries about my health.

"They tell me you are to be a lawyer, Mr. O'Malley," said he; "and if so, I must advise you taking better care of your head-piece."

"A lawyer, papa; oh, dear me! I should never have thought of his being anything so stupid."

"Why, silly girl, what would you have a man be?"

"A dragon, to be sure, papa," said the fond girl, as she pressed her arm around his manly figure, and looked up in his face, with an expression of mingled pride and affection.

That word sealed my destiny.

CHAPTER VI.—The Dinner.

When I retired to my room to dress for dinner, I found my servant waiting with a note from my uncle, to which, he informed me, the messenger expected an answer.

I broke the seal and read:

"DEAR CHARLEY—"

"Do not lose a moment in securing old Blake—if you have not already done so, as information has just reached me that the government party has promised a cornetcy to young Matthew, if he can bring over his father. And these are the people I have been voting with—a few private cases excepted—for thirty odd years!"

"I am very sorry for your accident. Considine informs me that it will need explanation at a later period. He has been in Athlone since Tuesday, in hopes to catch the new candidate on his way down, and get him into a little private quarrel before the day; if he succeed, it will save the country much expense, and conduce greatly to the peace and happiness of all parties. But, 'these things,' as Father Roach says, 'are in the hands of Providence.' You must also persuade old Blake to write a few lines to Simon Mallock, about the Coolnamuck mortgage. We can give him no satisfaction at present, at least such as he looks for, and do n't be philandering any longer where you are, when your health permits a change of quarters."

"Your affectionate uncle,

"GODFREY O'MALLEY."

"P. S.—I have just heard from Considine; he was out this morning and shot a fellow in the knee, but finds that after all he was not the candidate, but a tourist that was writing a book about Connemara."

"P. S. No. 2.—Bear the mortgage in mind, for old Mallock is a spiteful fellow, and has a grudge against me, since I horsewhipped his son in Banagher. Oh, the world, the world!—G. O'M."

Until I had read this very clear epistle to the end, I had no very precise conception how completely I had forgotten all my uncle's interests, and neglected all his injunctions. Already five days had elapsed, and I had not as much as mooted the question to Mr. Blake, and probably all this time my uncle was calculating on the thing as concluded; but, with one hole in my head, and some half-dozen in my heart, my memory was none of the best.

Snatching up the letter, therefore, I resolved to lose no more time; and proceeded at once to Mr. Blake's room, expecting that I should, as the event proved, find him engaged in the very laborious duty of making his toilette.

"Come in, Charley," said he, as I tapped gently at the door; "it's only Charley, my darling; Mrs. B. won't mind you."

"Not the least in life," responded Mrs. B., disposing, at the same time a pair of her husband's corduroys, tippet fashion, across her ample shoulders, which before were displayed in the plentitude and breadth of coloring we find in a Rubens. "Sit down, Charley, and tell us what's the matter."

As, until this moment, I was in perfect ignorance of the Adam and Eve-like simplicity in which the private economy of Mr. Blake's household was conducted, I would have gladly retired from what I found to be a mutual territory of dressings-room, had not Mr. Blake's injunctions been issued somewhat like an order to remain.

"It's only a letter, sir," said I, stuttering, "from my uncle, about the election. He says that, as his majority is now certain, he should feel better pleased in going to the poll with all the family, you know, sir, along with him. He wishes me just to sound your intentions—to make out how you feel disposed toward him; and—and, as I am but a poor diplomatist, I thought the best way to come straight to the point and tell you so."

"I perceive," said Mr. Blake, giving his chin at the moment, an awful gash with the razor, "I perceive, go on."

"Well, sir, I have little more to say; my uncle knows what influence you have in Scariff, and expects you'll do what you can there."

"Anything more?" said Blake, with a very dry and quizzical expression, I did n't half like, "anything more?"

"Oh, yes, you are to write a line to old Mallock."

"I understand, about Coolnamuck, is n't it?"

"Exactly; I believe that's all."

"Well now, Charley, you may go down stairs, and we'll talk it over after dinner."

"Yes, Charley, dear, go down, for I'm going to draw on my stockings," said the fair Mrs. Blake, with a look of very modest consciousness.

When I had left the room I could n't help muttering a "thank God," for the success of a mission I more than once feared for, and hastened to despatch a note to my uncle, assuring him of the Blake interest, and adding that, for propriety sake, I should defer my departure for a day or two longer.

This done, with a heart lightened of its load, and in high spirits at my cleverness, I descended to the drawing-room. Here a very large party were already assembled, and, at every opening of the door, a new relay of Blakes, Burkes, and Bodkins, was introduced. In the absence of the host, Sir George Dashwood was "making the agreeable" to the guests, and shook hands with every new arrival, with all the warmth and cordiality of old friendship. While thus he inquired for various absent individuals, and asked, most affectionately, for sundry aunts, and uncles, not forthcoming, a slight incident occurred, which, by its ludicrous turn, served to shorten the long half hour before dinner. An individual of the party, a Mr. Blake, had, from certain peculiarities of face, obtained, in his boyhood, the soubriquet of "shave the wind." This hatchet-like conformation had grown with his growth, and perpetuated upon him a nickname, by which alone was he ever spoken of among his friends and acquaintances; the only difference being that, as he came to man's estate, brevity, that soul of wit, had curtailed the epithet to mere "shave." Now, Sir George had been hearing frequent references made to him, always by this name, heard him ever so addressed, and perceived him to reply to it; so that when he was himself asked by some one, what sport he had found that day among the woodcocks, he answered at once, with a bow of very grateful acknowledgment, "Excellent, indeed; but entirely owing to where I was placed in the coope; had it not been for Mr. Shave, there?"

I need not say that the remainder of his speech, being heard on all sides, became one universal shout of laughter, in which, to do him justice, the excellent Shave himself heartily joined. Scarcely were the sounds of mirth lulled into an apparent calm, when the door opened, and the host and hostess appeared. Mrs. Blake advanced in all the plenitude of her charms, arrayed in crimson satin, sorely injured in its freshness by a patch of grease upon the front, about the same size and shape as the Continent of Europe, in Arrowsmith's Atlas; a swansdown tippet covered her shoulders; massive bracelets ornamented her wrists; while from her ears descended two Irish diamond ear-rings, rivaling in magnitude and value the glass pendants of a lustre. Her reception of her guests made ample amends, in warmth and cordiality, for any deficiency of elegance; and, as she disposed her ample proportions upon the sofa, and looked around upon the company, she appeared the very impersonation of hospitality.

After several openings and shuttings of the drawing-room door, accompanied by the appearance of old Simon the butler, who counted the party at least five times before he was certain that the score was correct; dinner was at length announced. Now came a moment of difficulty; and one which, as testing Mr. Blake's tact, he would gladly have seen devolve upon some other shoulders: for he well knew that the marshalling a room full of mandarins, blue, green, and yellow, was "cakes and gingerbread" to ushering a Galway party in to dinner.

First then was Mr. Miles Bodkin, whose grandfather would have been a lord if Cromwell had not hanged him one fine morning. Then Mrs. Mosey Blake's first husband was promised the title of Kilmacud if it was ever restored, whereas Mrs. French of Knockturnor's mother was then at law for a title; and lastly, Mrs. Joe Burke was fourth cousin to Lord Clanricarde, as is or will be every Burke from this to the day of judgment. Now, luckily for her prospects, the lord was alive; and Mr. Blake, remembering a very sage adage, about "dead lions," &c., solved the difficulty at once, by gracefully tucking the lady under his arm, and leading the way: the others soon followed; the priest of Portumna and my unworthy self bringing up the rear.

When, many a year afterward, the hard ground of a mountain bivouac, with its pitiful portion of pickled cork-tree, yclept mess-beef, and that pyroigneous aquafortis they call corn brandy, have been my hard fare, I often look back to that day's dinner, with a most heart-yearning sensation—a turbot as big as the Waterloo shield; a sirloin that seemed cut from the sides of a rhinoceros; a sauce-boat that contained an oyster bed. There was a turkey which singly would have formed the main army of a French dinner, doing mere outpost duty—flanked by a picquet of ham, and a detached squadron of chickens carefully ambushed in a forest of greens: potatoes not disguised à la maître d'hôtel and tortured to resemble bad macaroni, but piled like shot in an ordnance yard, were posted at different quarters; while massive decanters of port and sherry stood proudly up like standard bearers amid the goodly array. This was none of your austere "great dinners," where a cold and chilling plateau of artificial nonsense cuts off one-half of the table from intercourse with the other; when whispered sentences constitute the conversation, and all the friendly recognition of wise-drinking, which renews acquaintance and cements an intimacy, is replaced by the ceremonious filling of your glass by a lacquey—where smiles go current in lieu of kind speeches, and epigram and smartness form the substitute for the broad jest and merry story. Far from it; here the company eat, drank, talked laughed, did all but sing, and certainly enjoyed themselves heartily. As for me, I was little more than a listener, and such was the crash of plates, the jingle of glasses, and the clatter of voices, that fragments only of what was passing around reached me; giving to the conversation of the party a character occasionally somewhat incongruous. Thus such sentences as the following ran foul of each other every instant:

"No better land in Galway"—"where could you find such facilities?"—"for shooting Mr. Jones on his way home?"—"the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth"—"kiss"—"Miss Blake, she's the girl with a foot and ankle"—"Daly has never had wool on his sheep"—"how could he?"—"what does he pay for the mountain?"—"four and ten pence a yard"—"not a penny less"—"all the cabbage stalks and potato skins, with some bog stuff through it"—"that's the thing to"—"make soup, with a red herring in it, instead of salt"—"and when he proposed for my niece, ma'am, says he"—"mix a strong tumbler, and I'll make a shake down for you on the floor"—"and may the Lord have mercy on your soul"—"and now, down the middle and up again"—"Captain Magan, my dear, he is the man"—"to shave a pig properly"—"it's not money I'm looking for, says he, the girl of my heart"—"if she had not a wind gall and two spavins"—"I'd have given her the rights of the church, of course," said Father Roach, bringing up the rear of this ill-assorted jargon.

Such were the scattered links of conversation I was condemned to listen to, till a general rise on the part of the ladies left us alone to discuss our wine, and enter in good earnest upon the more serious duties of the evening.

Scarcely was the door closed, when one of the company, seizing the bell-rope, said, "with your leave, Blake, we'll have the 'dew' now."

"Good claret—no better," said another; "but it sits mighty cold on the stomach."

"There's nothing like the groceries, after all—eh, Sir George?" said an old Galway squire to the English general, who acceded to the fact, which he understood in a very different sense.

"Oh, punch, you are my darlin'," hummed another, as a large square half-gallon decanter of whiskey was placed on the table—the various decanters of wine being now ignominiously sent down to the end of the board, without any evidence of regret on any face, save Sir George Dashwood's, who mixed his tumbler with a very rebellious conscience.

Whatever were the noise and clamor of the company before, they were nothing to what now ensued. As one party was discussing the approaching contest, another was planning a steeple-chase; while two individuals, unhappily removed from each other the entire length of the table, were what is called "challenging each other's effects," in a very remarkable manner, the process so styled being an exchange of property, when each party setting an imaginary value upon some article, barters it for another, the amount of boot paid and received being determined by a third person who is the umpire. Thus a gold breast-pin was swapped, as the phrase is, against a horse; then a pair of boots, then a Kerry bull, &c., every imaginable species of property, coming into the market. Sometimes as matters of very dubious value turned up; great laughter was the result. In this very national pastime a Mr. Miles Bodkin, a noted fire-eater of the west, was a great proficient, and, it is said, once so completely succeeded in dispoiling an uninitiated hand, that after winning in succession his horse, gig, harness, &c., he proceeded seriatim to his watch, ring, clothes, and portmanteau, and actually concluded by winning all he possessed, and kindly lent him a card cloth to cover him on his way to the hotel. His success on the present occasion was considerable, and his spirits proportionate. The decanter had thrice been replenished, and the flushed faces and thickened utterance of the guests evinced that from the cold properties of the claret there was little to dread. As for Mr. Bodkin, his manner was incapable of any higher flight, when under the influence of whiskey; from what is evinced on common occasions; and, as he sat at the end of the table, fronting Mr. Blake, he assumed all the dignity of the ruler of the feast, with an energy no one seemed disposed to question. In answer to some observations of Sir George, he was led into something like an oration upon the peculiar excellencies of his native county, which ended in a declaration that there was nothing like Galway.

"Why do n't you give a song, Miles? and may be the General would learn more from it than all your speech-making."

"To be sure," cried out several voices, together; to be sure: let us hear the 'Man of Galway.'"

Sir George having joined most warmly in the request, Mr. Bodkin filled up his glass to the brim, bespoke a chorus to his chant, and, clearing his voice with a deep hem, began the following ditty, to the air which Moore has since rendered immortal, by the beautiful song "Wreath the bowl," &c. And although the words are well known in the west, for the information of less favoured regions, I here transcribe

"THE MAN FOR GALWAY."

"To drink a toast,
A proctor roast,
Or bailiff, as the case is;
To kiss your wife,
Or take your life
At ten or fifteen paces;
To keep game cocks—to hunt the fox,
To drink in punch the Solway,
With debts galore, but fun far more;
Oh, that's 'the man for Galway.'"
Chorus—With debts, &c.

"The king of Oude
Is mighty proud,
And so were onst the Caysars—(Cæsars);
But old Giles Eyre
Would make them stare,
Av he had them with the Blazers.
To the devil I fling—ould Rungeet Sing,
He's only a Prince in a small way,
And knows nothing at all of a six foot wall;
Oh, he'd never 'do for Galway.'"

"Ye think the Blakes
Are no 'great shakes';
They're all his blood relations,
And the Bodkins sneeze
At the grim Chinese.
For they come from the Phenacyans;
So fill to the brim, and here's to him
Who'd drink in punch the Solway;
With debts galore, but fun far more;
Oh, that's 'the man for Galway.'"
Chorus—With debts, &c.

I much fear that the reception of this very classic ode would not be as favorable in general companies as it was on the occasion I first heard it; for certainly the applause was almost deafening; and even Sir George, the defects of whose English education left some of the allusions out of his reach, was highly amused and laughed heartily.

The conversation once more reverted to the election, and although I was too far from those who seemed best informed on the matter to hear much, I could catch enough to discover that the feeling was a confident one. This was gratifying to me, as I had some scruples about my so long neglecting my good uncle's cause.

"We have Scariff to a man," said Bodkin.
"And Mosey's tenantry," said another; "I swear that though there's not a freehold registered on the estate, that they'll vote, every mother's son of them, or a devil a stone of the court house they'll leave standing on another."

"And may the Lord look to the Returning Officer," said a third, throwing up his eyes.

"Mosey's tenantry are droll boys, and, like their landlord, more by token—they never pay any rent."

"And what for should n't they vote?" said a dry looking little old fellow in a red waistcoat: "when I was the dead agent—"

"The dead agent," interrupted Sir George, with a start.

"Just so," said the old fellow, pulling down his spectacles from his forehead, and casting a half-angry look at Sir George, for what he had suspected to be a doubt of his veracity.

"The General does not know, maybe, what that is," said some one.

"You have just anticipated me," said Sir George; "I really am in most profound ignorance."

"It is the dead agent," says Mr. Blake, "who also provides substitutes for any voters that may have died since the last election. A very important fact in statistics may thus be gathered from the poll books of this county, which proves it to be the healthiest part of Europe—a freeholder has not died in it for the last fifty years."

"The 'Kiltopher boys' won't come this time—they say there's no use trying to vote, when so many were transported last assizes for perjury."

"They're poor-spirited creatures," said another.

"Not they—they are as decent boys as any we have—they're willing to wreck the town for fifty shillings worth of spirits; besides, if they do n't vote for the county, they will for the borough."

This declaration seemed to restore these interesting individuals to favor, and now all attention was turned toward Bodkin, who was detailing the plan of a grand attack upon the polling booths, to be headed by himself. By this time all the prudence and guardedness of the party had given way—whiskey was in the ascendant, and every bold stroke of election policy, every cunning artifice, every ingenious device, was detailed and applauded, in a manner which proved that self-respect was not the inevitable gift of 'mountain dew.'

The mirth and fun grew momentarily more boisterous, and Miles Bodkin, who had twice before been prevented proposing some toast, by a telegraphic signal from the other end of the table, now swore that nothing should prevent him any longer, and rising with a smoking tumbler in his hand, delivered himself as follows:

"No, no, Phil. Blake, ye need n't be winkin' at me that way—it's little I care for the spawn of the ould serpent." [Here great cheers greeted the speaker, in which, without well knowing why, I heartily joined.] "I'm going to give you a toast, boys—a real good toast—none of your sentimental things about wall-flowers, or the vernal equinox, or that kind of thing, but a sensible, patriotic, manly, intrepid toast; a toast you must drink in the most universal, laborious, and awful manner—do ye see now?"—[Loud cheers.] "If any man of you here present does n't drain this toast to the bottom—[here the speaker looked fixedly at me, as did the rest of the company,]—then, by the great gun of Athlone, I'll make him eat the decanter, glass, stopper, and all, for the good of his digestion—d'ye see now?"

The cheering at this mild determination prevented my hearing what followed; but the peroration consisted in a very glowing eulogy upon some person unknown, and a speedy return to him as member for Galway. Amid all the noise and tumult at this critical moment, nearly every eye at the table was turned upon me, and, as I concluded that they had been drinking my uncle's health, I thundered away at the mahogany with all my energy. At length, the hip, hipping, ever, and comparative quiet restored, I rose from my seat to return thanks—but, strange enough, Sir George Dashwood did so likewise, and there we both stood amid an uproar that might well have shaken the courage of more practised orators; while from every side came cries of "hear, hear"—"go on, Sir George"—"speak out, General"—"sit down, Charley"—"confound the boy"—"knock the legs from under him," &c. Not understanding why Sir George should interfere with what I regarded as my peculiar duty, I resolved not to give way, and avowed this determination in no very equivocal terms. "In that case," said the General, "I am to suppose that the young gentleman moves an amendment to your proposition, and, as the etiquette is in his favor, I yield."—Here he resumed his place, amid a most terrific scene of noise and tumult, while several humane proposals, as to my treatment, were made around me, and a kind suggestion thrown out to break my neck, by a near neighbor. Mr. Blake at length prevailed upon the party to hear what I had to say—for he was certain I should not detain them above a minute. The commotion having in some measure subsided, I began—"Gentlemen, as the adopted son of the worthy man whose health you have just drunk"—Heaven knows how I should have continued—but here my eloquence was met by such a roar of laughing as I never before listened to; from one end of the board to the other it was one continued shout, and went on too as if all the spare lungs of the party had been kept in reserve for the occasion. I turned from one to the other—I tried to smile, and seemed to participate in the joke, but failed—I frowned—I looked savagely about where I could see enough to turn my wrath thitherward; and, as it chanced, not in vain; for Mr. Miles Bodkin, with an intuitive perception of my wishes, most suddenly ceased his mirth, and, assuming a look of frowning defiance that had done him good service upon many former occasions, rose and said—

"Well, Sir, I hope you're proud of yourself—you've made a nice beginning of it, and a pretty story you'll have for your uncle. But if you'd like to break the news by a letter, the General will have great pleasure in franking it for you; for by the rock of Cashel, we'll carry him in against all the O'Malleys that ever cheated the sheriff."

Scarcely were the words uttered, when I seized my wine glass, and hurled it with all my force at his head; so sudden was the act, and so true the aim, that Mr. Bodkin measured his length upon the floor ere his friends could appreciate his late eloquent effusion. The scene now became terrific; for, though the redoubted Miles was hors de combat, his friends made a tremendous rush at, and would infallibly have succeeded in capturing me, had not Blake and four or five others interposed. Amid a desperate struggle which lasted for some minutes, I was torn from the spot, carried bodily up stairs, and pitched headlong into my own room, where having doubly locked the door on the outside, they left me to my own cool and not over-agreeable reflections.

CHAPTER VII.—The Flight from Gurtamorra.

It was by one of those sudden and inexplicable revolutions which occasionally restore to sense and intellect the maniac of years' standing, that I was no sooner left alone in my chamber, than I became perfectly sober. The fumes of the wine—and I had drunk deeply—were dissipated at once; my head, which but a moment before was half wild with excitement, was now cool, calm, and collected; and, stranger than all, I, who had only an hour since entered the dining-room with all the unsuspecting freshness of boyhood, became, by a mighty bound, a man—a man in all my feelings of responsibility, a man who, repelling an insult by an outrage, had resolved to stake his life upon the chance. In an instant a new era in life had opened before me—the light-headed gayety which fearlessness and youth impart, was replaced by one absorbing thought—one all-engrossing, all-pervading impression, that if I did not follow up my quarrel with Bodkin, I was dishonored and disgraced; my little knowledge of such matters not being sufficient to assure me that I was now the aggressor, and that any further steps in the affair should come from his side.

So thoroughly did my own griefs occupy me, that I had no thought for the disappointment my poor uncle was destined to meet with in hearing that the Blake interest was lost to him, and the former breach between the families irreparably widened by the events of the evening. Escape was my first thought; but how accomplish it?

the door, a solid one of Irish oak, doubly locked and bolted, defied all my efforts to break it open—the window was at least five-and-twenty feet from the ground, and not a tree near to swing into. I shouted, I called aloud, I opened the sash, and tried if any one outside were within hearing, but in vain. Weary and exhausted, I sat down upon my bed and ruminated over my misfortunes. Vengeance, quick, entire, decisive vengeance I thirsted and panted for; and every moment I lived under the insult inflicted on me, seemed an age of torturing and maddening agony. I rose with a leap, a thought had just occurred to me. I drew the bed toward the window, and fastening the sheet to one of the posts with a firm knot, I twisted it into a rope, and let myself down to within about twelve feet of the ground, when I let go my hold, and dropped upon the grass beneath, safe and uninjured; a thin misty rain was falling, and I now perceived for the first time, that in my haste I had forgotten my hat: this thought, however, gave me little uneasiness, and I took my way toward the stable, resolving, if I could, to saddle the horse, and get off before any intimation of my escape reached the family.

When I gained the yard, all was quiet and deserted: the servants were doubtless enjoying themselves below stairs; and I met no one in the way. I entered the stable, threw the saddle upon "Badger," and, before five minutes from my descent from the window, was galloping toward O'Malley Castle at a pace that defied pursuit, had any one thought of it.

It was about five o'clock on a dark wintry morning, as I led my horse through the well-known defiles of out-houses and stables which formed the long line of offices to my uncle's house. As yet no one was stirring, and as I wished to have my arrival a secret from the family, after providing for the wants of my gallant grey, I lifted the latch of the kitchen door, no other fastening being ever thought necessary, even at night, and gently groped my way toward the stairs: all was perfectly still, and the silence now recalled me to reflection as to what course I should pursue. It was all-important that my uncle should know nothing of my quarrel, otherwise he would inevitably make it his own, and, by treating me like a boy in the matter, give the whole affair the very turn I most dreaded. Then, as to Sir Harry Boyle, he would most certainly turn the whole thing into ridicule, make a good story, perhaps a song out of it, and laugh at my notions of demanding satisfaction. Considine, I knew, was my man; but, then, he was at Athlone—at least so my uncle's letter mentioned: perhaps he might have returned; if not, to Athlone I should set off at once. So resolving, I stole noiselessly up stairs and reached the door of the Count's chamber: I opened it gently, and entered, and, though my step was almost imperceptible to myself, it was quite sufficient to alarm the watchful occupant of the room, who springing up in his bed, demanded gruffly, "who's there?"

"Charles, sir," said I, shutting the door carefully and approaching his bed-side. "Charles O'Malley, sir: I'm come to have a bit of your advice: and, as the affair won't keep, I have been obliged to disturb you."

"Never mind, Charley," said the Count: "sit down, there's a chair somewhere near the bed—have you found it? There—well now, what is it? What news of Blake?"

"Very bad, no worse; but it is not exactly that I came about; I've got into a scrape, sir."

"Run off with one of the daughters," said Considine. "By jingo, I knew what those affable devils would be after."

"Not so bad as that," said I, laughing: "it's just a row, a kind of squabble, something that must come—"

"Ay, ay," said the Count, brightening up, "say you so, Charley. Egad, the young ones will beat us all out of the field. Who is it with—not old Blake himself—how was it? Tell me all."

I immediately detailed the whole events of the preceding chapter, as well as his frequent interruptions would permit, and concluded by asking what further step was now to be taken, as I was resolved the matter should be concluded before it came to my uncle's ears.

"There you are all right, quite correct, my boy; but there are many points I should have wished otherwise in the conduct of the affair hitherto."

Conceiving that he was displeased at my petulance and boldness, I was about to commence a kind of defence, when he added—

"Because you see," said he, assuming an oracular tone of voice, "throwing a wine glass, with or without wine, in a man's face, is merely, as you may observe, a mark of denial and displeasure at some observation he may have made, not in any wise intended to injure him, further than in the wound to his honor at being so insulted, for which, of course, he must subsequently call you out. Whereas, Charley, in the present case—the view I take is different; the expression of Mr. Bodkin, as regards your uncle was insulting to a degree—gratuitously offensive, and warranting a blow. Therefore, my boy, you should, under such circumstances, have preferred aiming at him with a decanter—a cut glass decanter, well aimed, and low, I have seen do effective service. However, as you remark, it was your first thing of the kind, I am pleased with you—very much pleased with you. Now then, for the next step; so saying he arose from his bed, and, striking a light with a tinder-box, proceeded to dress himself as leisurely as if for a dinner party—talking all the while.

"I will just take Godfrey's tax-cart and the roan mare on to Meelish; put them up at the little inn—it is not above a mile from Bodkin's—and I'll go over and settle the thing for you: you must stay quiet till I come back, and not leave the house on any account. I've got a case of old broad barrels there that will answer you beautifully; if you were anything of a shot, I'd give you my own cross handles, but they'd only spoil your shooting."

"I can hit a wine-glass in the stem at fifteen paces," said I, rather nettled at the disparaging tone in which he spoke of my performance.

"I do n't care sixpence for that; the wine-glass has no pistol in his hand. Take the old German, then; see now, hold your pistol thus: no finger on the guard there, those two on the trigger. They are not hair triggers; drop the muzzle a bit; bend your elbow a trifle more; sight your man outside your arm; outside, mind, and take him in the hip, and, if any higher, no matter."

By this time the Count had completed his toilette, and, taking the small mahogany box, which contained his peace-makers, under his arm, led the way toward the stables. When he reached the yard, the only person stirring there was a kind of half-witted boy, who, being about the house, was employed to run of messages for the servants, walk a stranger's horse, or to do any of the many petty services that regular domestics contrive always to devolve upon some adopted subordinate. He was seated upon a stone step, formerly used for mounting, and, though the day was scarcely breaking, and the weather severe and piercing, the poor fellow was singing an Irish song, in a low monotonous tone, as he chafed a curb chain between his hands, with some sand. As we came near he started up, and, as he pulled off his cap to salute us, gave a sharp and piercing glance at the Count, then at me; then once more upon my companion, from whom his eyes were turned to the brass-bound box beneath his arm; when, as if seized by a sudden impulse, he started on his feet, and set off toward the house with the speed of a greyhound, not, however, before Considine's practised eye had anticipated his plan; for, throwing down the pistol cases, he dashed after him, and in an instant had seized him by the collar.

"It won't do, Patsey," said the Count, "you can't double on me."

"Oh Count, darlin', mister Considine avick, do n't do it, do n't now," said the poor fellow, falling on his knees, and blubbering like an infant.

"Hold your tongue, you villian, or I'll cut it out of your head," said Considine.

"And so I will; but do n't do it, do n't for the love of"—

"Do n't do what, you whimpering scoundrel? What does he think I'll do?"

"Do n't I know very well what you're after, what you're always after too? oh wirra, wirra!" Here he wrung his hands, and swayed himself backward and forward, a true picture of Irish grief.

"I'll stop his blubbering," said Considine, opening the box, and taking out a pistol, which he cocked leisurely, and pointed at the poor fellow's head: "another syllable now, and I'll scatter your brains upon the pavement."

"And do, and divel thank you; sure it's your trade."

The coolness of the reply threw us both off our guard so completely, that we burst out into a hearty fit of laughing.

"Come, come," said the Count at last; "this will never do, if he goes on this way, we'll have the whole house about us. Come, then, harness the roan mare, and here's half-a-crown for you."

"I would n't touch the best piece in your purse," said the poor boy; "sure it's blood money, no less."

The words were scarcely spoken, when Considine seized him by the collar with one hand, and by the wrist with the other, and carried him over the yard to the stable, where, kicking open the door, he threw him on a heap of stones, adding, "If you stir now I'll break every bone in your body;" a threat which, it seemed, certainly considerably increased in its terrors, from the rough gripe he had already experienced, for the lad rolled himself up like a ball, and sobbed as if his heart were breaking.

Very few minutes sufficed us now to harness the mare in the tax-cart, and, when all was ready, Considine seized the whip, and, locking the stable door upon Patsey, was about to get up, when a sudden thought struck him. "Charley," said he, "that fellow will find some means to give the alarm; we must take him with us." So saying, he opened the door, and, taking the poor fellow by the collar, flung him at my feet in the tax-cart.

We had already lost some time, and the roan mare was put to her fastest speed to make up for it. Our pace became, accordingly, a sharp one, and, as the road was bad, and the tax-cart "no patent inaudible," neither of us spoke. To me this was a great relief: the events of the last few days had given them the semblance of years, and all the reflection I could muster was little enough to make anything out of the chaotic mass—love, mischief, and misfortune—in which I had been involved since my leaving O'Malley Castle.

"Here we are, Charley," said Considine, drawing up short at the door of a little country ale-house, or, in Irish parlance, shebeen, which stood at the meeting of four bleak roads, in a wild and barren mountain tract, beside the Shannon. "Here we are, my boy! jump out and let us be stirring."

"Here, Patsey, my man," said the Count, unravelling the prostrate and double-knotted figure at our feet; "lead a hand, Patsey." Much to my astonishment, he obeyed the summons with alacrity, and proceeded to unharness the mare, with the greatest despatch. My attention was, however, soon turned from him to my own more immediate concerns, and I followed my companion into the house.

"Joe," said the Count, to the host, "is Mr. Bodkin up at the house this morning?"

"He's just passed this way, sir, with Mr. Malowney of Tillnamuck, in the gig, on their way from Mr. Blake's. They stopped here to order horses to go over to O'Malley Castle, and the goosoon is gone to look for a pair."

"All right," said Considine, and added in a whisper, "we've done it well, Charley, to be beforehand, or the Governor would have found it all out, and taken the affair into his own hands. Now, all you've to do is, to stay quietly here till I come back, which will not be above an hour at farthest. Joe, send me the pony—keep an eye on Patsey, that he doesn't play us a trick—the short way to Mr. Bodkin's is through Scariff—ah, I know it well, good bye, Charley—by the Lord, we'll pepper him."

These were the last words of the worthy Count as he closed the door behind him, and left me to my own not over agreeable reflections. Independently of my youth and perfect ignorance of the world, which left me unable to form any correct judgment on my conduct, I knew that I had taken a great deal of wine, and was highly excited when my unhappy collision with Mr. Bodkin occurred. Whether, then, I had been betrayed into any thing which could fairly have provoked his insulting retort or not, I could not remember; and now my most afflicting thought was, what opinion might be entertained of me by those at Blake's table; and, above all, what Miss Dashwood herself would have, and what narrative of the occurrence would reach her. The great effort of my last few days had been to stand well in her estimation, to appear something better in feeling, something higher in principle, than the rude and unpolished squirearchy about me; and now here was the end of it! What would she, what could she think, but that I was the same punch-drinking, rowing, quarrelling bumpkin as those whom I had so lately been carefully endeavoring to separate myself from. How I hated myself for the excess to which passion had betrayed me, and how I detested my opponent as the cause of all my present misery. How very differently thought I, her friend, the Captain, would have conducted himself. His quiet and gentlemanly manner would have done fully as much to wipe out any insult on his honor as I could do, and, after all, would neither have disturbed the harmony of a dinner-table, nor made himself, as I shudder to think I had, a subject of rebuke, if not of ridicule. These harassing, torturing reflections continued to press on me, and I paced the room with my hands clasped and the perspiration upon my brow. One thing is certain—I can never see Aer again, thought I; this disgraceful business must, in some shape or other, become known to her, and all I have been saying these last three days, rise up in judgment against this one act, and stamp me an impostor; I that decied, nay decied, our false notion of honor. Would that Considine were come. What can keep him now? I walked to the door: a boy belonging to the house was walking the roan before the door. What had then become of Pat, I inquired; but no one could tell—he had disappeared shortly after our arrival, and had not been seen afterward. My own thoughts were, however, too engrossing to permit me to think more of this circumstance, and I turned again to enter the house, when I saw Considine advancing up the road at the full speed of his pony.

"Out with the mare, Charley—be alive, my boy—all's settled." So saying, he sprang from the pony, and proceeded to harness the roan with the greatest haste, informing me in broken sentences, as he went on with all the arrangements.

"We are to cross the bridge of Portumna. They won the ground, and it seems Bodkin likes the spot: he shot Payton there three years ago. Worse luck now, Charley, you know: by all the rules of chance, he can't expect the same thing twice—never fear by honors in two deals—did n't say that though—a sweet meadow, I know it well; small hillocks like mole hills all over it—caught him at breakfast; I do n't think he expected the message to come from us, but said that it was a very polite attention, and so it was, you know."

So he continued to ramble on, as we once more took our seats in the tax-cart, and set out for the ground.

"What are you thinking of, Charley?" said the Count, as I kept silent for some minutes.

"I'm thinking, sir, if I were to kill him, what I must do after."

"Right, my boy; nothing like that, but I'll settle all for you. Upon my conscience, if it was n't for the chance of his getting into another quarrel and spoiling the election, I'd go back for Godfrey; he'd like to see you break ground so prettily. And you say you're no shot?"

"Never could do anything with a pistol to speak of, sir," said I, remembering his rebuke of the morning.

"I do n't mind that; you've a good eye; never take it off him after you're on the ground—follow him everywhere: poor Callaghan, that's gone, shot his man always that way: he had a way of looking without winking that was very fatal, at a short distance: a very good thing to learn, Charley, when you have a little spare time."

Half-an-hour's sharp driving brought us to the river side, where a boat had been provided by Considine to ferry us over. It was now about eight o'clock, and a heavy gloomy morning, much rain had fallen over night: and the dark and lowering atmosphere seemed charged with more. The mountains looked twice their real size, and all the shadows were increased to an enormous extent. A very killing kind of light it was, as the Count remarked.

CHAPTER VIII....The Duel.

As the boatman pulled in towards the shore, we perceived, a few hundred yards off, a group of persons standing, whom we soon recognised as our opponents. "Charley," said the Count, grasping my arm lightly, as I stood up to spring on the land, "Charley, although you are only a boy as I may say, I have no fear for your courage; but, still, more than that is needful here. This Bodkin is a noted duelist, and will try to shake your nerve. Now, mind that you take every thing that happens, quite with an air of indifference—do n't let him think that he has any advantage over you, and you'll see how the tables will be turned in your favor."

"Trust to me, Count," said I, "I'll not disgrace you."

He pressed my hand tightly, and I thought that I discerned something like a slight twitch about the corners of his grim mouth, as if some sudden and painful thought had shot across his mind, but in a moment he was calm and stern-looking as ever.

"Twenty minutes late, Mr. Considine," said a short red-faced little man, with a military frock and foraging cap, as he held out his watch in evidence.

"I can only say, Captain Malowney, that we lost no time since we parted; we had some difficulty in finding a boat: but, in any case, we are here now, and that I opine is the important part of the matter."

"Quite right, very just indeed. Will you present me to your young friend—very proud to make your acquaintance, sir; your uncle and I met more than once in this kind of way. I was out with him in '92—was it 1 no, I think it was '93—when he shot Harry Burgoyne, who, by-the-by, was called the crack shot of our mead; but, begged your uncle knocked his pistol hand to shivers, saying, in his dry way, 'he must try the left hand this morning.' Count, a little this side, if you please." While Considine and the Captain walked a few paces apart from where I stood, I had leisure to observe my antagonist, who stood among a group of his friends, talking and laughing away in great spirits. As the tone they spoke in was not of the lowest, I could catch much of their conversation at the distance I was from them. They were discussing the last occasion that Bodkin had visited this spot, and talking of the fatal event which happened then.

"Poor devil," said Bodkin, "it was n't his fault; but you see some of the —th had been showing white feathers before that, and he was obliged to go out. In fact, the Colonel himself said, 'Fight or leave the corps.' Well, out he came: it was a cold morning in February, with a frost the night before going off in a thin rain; well, it seems that he had the consumption or something of that sort, with a great cough and spitting of blood, and this weather made him worse, and he was very weak when he came to the ground. Now, the moment I got a glimpse of him, I said to myself, he's pluck enough, but as nervous as a lady, for his eye wandered all about, and his mouth was constantly twitching. "Take off your great coat, Ned," said one of his people, when they were going to take him up; "take it off, man." He seemed to hesitate for an instant, when Michael Blake remarked, "Arrah, let him alone; it's his mother makes him wear it, for the cold he has." They all began to laugh at this, but I kept my eye upon him, and I saw that his cheek grew quite livid, and a kind of grey color, and his eyes filled up; "I have you now," said I to myself, and I shot him through the lungs.

"And this poor fellow," thought I, "was the only son of a widowed mother." I walked from the spot to avoid hearing further, and felt as I did so, something like a spirit of vengeance rising within me, for the fate of one so untimely cut off.

"Here we are, already," said Malowney, springing over a small fence into the adjoining field—"take your ground, gentlemen."

Considine took my arm and walked forward. "Charley," said he, "I am to give the signal—I'll drop my glove when you are to fire, but don't look at me at all, I'll manage to catch Bodkin's eye, and do you watch him steadily, and fire when he does."

"I think that the ground we are leaving behind us is rather better," said some one.

"So it is," said Bodkin, "but it was troublesome to carry the young gentleman down that way—here all is fair and easy."

The next instant we were placed, and I well remember the first thought that struck me was, that there could be no chance of either of us escaping.

"Now, then," said the Count, "I'll walk twelve paces, turn and drop this glove, at which signal you fire—and together mind. The man who reserves his shot, falls by my hand." This very summary denunciation seemed to meet general approbation, and the Count strutted forth. Notwithstanding the advice of my friend, I could not help turning my eyes from Bodkin to watch the retiring figure of the Count. At length he stopped—a second or two elapsed—he wheeled rapidly round, and let fall the glove. My eye glanced toward my opponent, I raised my pistol and fired. My hat turned half round upon my head, and Bodkin fell motionless to the earth. I saw the people around me, rush forward; I caught two or three glances thrown at me with an expression of revengeful passion: I felt some one grasp me round the waist, and hurry me from the spot, and it was at least ten minutes after, as we were skimming the surface of the broad Shannon, before I could well collect my scattered faculties to remember all that was passing, as Considine pointed to the two bullet holes in my hat, remarked, "Sharp practice, Charley, it was the overcharge saved you."

"Is he killed, sir?" I asked.

"Not quite, I believe, but as good; you took him just above the hip."

"Can he recover?" said I, with a voice trembling with agitation, which I vainly endeavored to conceal from my companion.

"Not if the doctor can help it," said Considine; "for the fool keeps poking about for the ball; but now let's think of the next step—you'll have to leave this, and at once too."

Little more passed between us. As we rowed toward the shore, Considine was following up his reflections, and I had mine, alas! too many and too bitter to escape from.

As we neared the land a strange spectacle caught our eye: for a considerable distance along the coast crowds of country people were assembled, who, forming in groups, and breaking into parties of two and three were evidently watching with great anxiety what was taking place at the opposite side. Now, the distance was at least three miles, and therefore any part of the transaction which had been enacted there, must have been quite beyond their view. While I was wondering at this, Considine cried out suddenly, "Too infamous, by Jove; we're murdered men."

"What do you mean?" said I.

"Don't you see that?" said he, pointing to something black which floated from a pole at the opposite side of the river.

"Yes; what is it?"

"It's his coat they've put upon an oar to show the people he's killed, that's all. Every man here's his tenant, and look—there!—they're not giving us much doubt as to their intention." Here a tremendous yell burst forth from the mass of people along the shore, which, rising to a terrific cry, sunk gradually down to a low wailing, then rose and fell again several times, as the Irish death-cry filled the air and rose to heaven, as if imploring vengeance on a murderer.

The appalling influence of the keen, as it is called, had been familiar to me from my infancy, but it needed the awful situation I was placed in to consummate its horrors. It was at once my accusation and my doom. I knew well, none better, the vengeful character of the Irish peasant of the west, and that my death was certain I had no doubt.—The very crime that sat upon my heart quailed its courage and unnerved my arm. As the boatmen looked from us toward the shore, and again at our faces, they, as if instinctively, lay upon their oars, and waited for our decision as to what course to pursue.

"Rig the sprit sail, my boys," said Considine, "and let her head lie up the river, and be alive, for I see they're bailing a boat below the little reef there, and will be after us in no time."

The poor fellows, who, although strangers to us, sympathizing in what they perceived to be our imminent danger, stepped the light spar which acted as mast, and shook out their scanty rag of canvass in a minute. Considine, meanwhile, went aft, and steadying her head with an oar, held the small craft up to the wind, till she lay completely over, and, as she rushed through the water, ran dipping her gunnel through the white foam.

"Where can we make, without tacking, boys?" inquired the Count.

"If it blows on as fresh, sir, we'll run you ashore within half a mile of the castle."

"Put out an oar to the leeward," said Considine, "and keep her up more to the wind, and I promise you, my lads, you will not go home fresh and fasting, if you land us where you say."

"Here they come," said the other boatman, as he pointed back with his finger toward a large yawl which shot suddenly from the shore, with six sturdy fellows pulling at their oars, while three or four others were endeavoring to get up their rigging, which appeared tangled and confused at the bottom of the boat. The white splash of water which fell at each moment beside her, showing that the process of bailing was still continued.

"Ah, then, may I never—ay it is n't the ould Dolphin they have launched for the cruise," said one of our fellows.

"What's the Dolphin then?"

"An ould boat of the Lord's (Lord Clanricarde's) that did n't see water, except when it rained, these four years, and is sun cracked from stem to stern."

"She can sail, however," said Considine, who watched, with a painful anxiety, the rapidity of her course through the water.

"Nabocklish, she was a smuggler's jolly-boat, and well used to it. Look how they're pulling. God pardon them; but they're in no blessed humor this morning."

"Lay out upon your oars, boys; the wind's failing us," cried the Count, as the sail flapped lazily against the mast.

"It's no use, your honor," said the elder; "we'll be only breaking our hearts to no purpose, they're sure to catch us."

"Do as I bade you at all events. What's that ahead of us there?"

The oat rock, sir; a vessel with grain struck there and went down with all aboard, four years last winter. There's no channel between it and the shore—all sunk rocks every inch of it. There's the breeze; the canvass fell over as he spoke, and the little craft lay down to it till the foaming water bubbled over her lee bow—"keep her head up, sir, higher, higher still;"—but Considine little heeded the direction, steering straight to the narrow channel the man alluded to;—"tear and ages, but you're going right for the cloch na quirkra."

"Arrah, an' the devil a taste I'll be drowned for your diversion," said the other, springing up.

"Sit down there, and be still," roared Considine, as he drew a pistol from the case at his feet, "if you do n't want some leaden ballast to keep you so. Here, Charley, take this, and if that fellow stirs hand or foot, you understand me." The two men sat sulkily in the bottom of the boat, which now was actually flying through the water.

Considine's object was a clear one, he saw that, in so sailing, we were greatly overmatched, and that our only chance lay in reaching the narrow and dangerous channel between the oat rock and the shore, by which we should distance the pursuit; the long reef of rocks that ran out beyond, requiring a wide berth to escape from. Nothing but the danger behind us could warrant so rash a daring; the whole channel was dotted with patches of white and breaking foam, the sure evidence of the mischief beneath, while here and there a dash of spouting spray flew up from the dark water, where some cleft rock lay hid below the flood. Escape seemed impossible; but who would not have preferred even so slender a chance with so frightful an alternative behind them! As if to add terror to the scene, Considine had scarcely turned the boat ahead of the channel when a tremendous blackness spread over all around—the thunder pealed forth, and, amid the crashing of the hail and the bright glare of lightning, a squall struck us, and laid us nearly keel uppermost for several minutes. I well remember we rushed through the dark and blackening water: our little craft more than half filled, the oars floating off to leeward, and we ourselves kneeling on the bottom planks for safety. Roll after roll of loud thunder broke, as it were, just above our heads; while, in the swift dashing rain that seemed to hiss around us, every object was hidden, and even the other boat was lost to our view. The two poor fellows! I shall never forget their expression; one, a devout Catholic, had placed a little leaden image of a saint before him in the bow, and implored its intercession with a torturing agony of suspense that wrung my very heart: the other apparently less alive to such consolations as his church afforded, remained with his hands clasped, his mouth compressed, his brows knitted, and his dark eyes bent upon me, with the fierce hatred of a deadly enemy; his eyes were sunken and bloodshot, and all told of some dreadful conflict within; the wild ferocity of his look fascinated my gaze, and amid all the terrors of the scene I could not look from him. As I gazed, a second and more awful squall struck the boat, the mast bent over, and, with a loud report like a pistol shot, smashed at the thwart, and fell over, trailing the sail along the milky sea behind us; meanwhile the water rushed clean over us, and the boat seemed settling. At this dreadful moment the sailor's eye was bent upon me, his lips parted, and he muttered, as if to himself, "This it is to go to sea with a murderer." Oh God! the agony of that moment—the heart-felt and accusing conscience, that I was judged and doomed, that the brand of Cain was upon my brow, that my fellow-men had ceased for ever to regard me as a brother, that I was an outcast and a wanderer for ever. I bent forward till my forehead fell upon my knees, and I wept. Meanwhile, the boat flew through the water, and Considine, who alone among us seemed not to lose his presence of mind, unshipped the mast, and sent it overboard. The storm now began to abate, and, as the black mass of clouds broke from around us, we beheld the other boat also dismasted, far behind us, while all on board of her were employed in bailing out the water with which she seemed almost sinking. The curtain of mist that had hidden us from each other no sooner broke, than they ceased their labors for a moment, and, looking toward us, burst forth into a yell, so wild, so savage, and so dreadful, my very heart quailed as its cadence fell upon my ear.

"Safe, my boys," said Considine, clapping me on the shoulder, as he steered forth the boat from its narrow path of danger, and once more reached the broad Shannon; "safe, Charley; though we've had a brush for it." In a minute more we reached the land, and, drawing our gallant little craft on shore, set out for O'Malley Castle.

CHAPTER IX....The Return.

O'Malley Castle lay about four miles from the spot we landed at, and thither accordingly we bent our steps without loss of time. We had not, however, proceeded far, when, before us on the road, we perceived a mixed assemblage of horse and foot, hurrying along at a tremendous rate. The mob, which consisted of some hundred country people, were armed with sticks, scythes and pitchforks, and, although not preserving any very military aspect in their order of march, were still a force quite formidable enough to make us call a halt, and deliberate upon what we were to do.

"They've out-flanked us, Charley," said Considine; "however, all is not yet lost; but see, they've got sight of us—here they come."

At these words, the vast mass before us came pouring along, splashing the mud on every side, and huzzing like so many Indians. In the front ran a bare-legged boy, waving his cap to encourage the rest, who followed him at about fifty yards behind.

"Leave that fellow for me," said the Count, coolly examining the lock of his pistol: "I'll pick him out, and load again in time for his friend's arrival. Charley, is that a gentleman I see far back in the crowd?—yes, to be sure it is; he's on a large horse—now he's pressing forward, so let—no—oh—ay—it's Godfrey O'Malley himself, and these are our own people." Scarcely were the words out when a tremendous cheer arose from the multitude, who recognizing us at the same instant, sprung from their horses and ran forward to welcome us. Among the foremost was the scarecrow leader, whom I at once perceived to be poor Patsey, who, escaping in the morning, had returned at full speed to O'Malley Castle, and raised the whole country to my rescue. Before I could address one word to my faithful followers I was in my uncle's arms.

"Safe, my boy, quite safe?"

"Quite safe, sir."

"No scratch anywhere?"

"Nothing but a hat the worse, sir," said I, showing the two bullet holes in my head-piece.

His lip quivered as he turned and whispered something into Considine's ear which I heard not; but the Count's reply was, "Devil a bit, as cool as you see him this minute."

"And Bodkin, what of him?"

"This day's work's his last," said Considine; "the ball entered here; but come along, Godfrey; Charley's new at this kind of thing, and we had better discuss matters in the house."

Half-an-hour's trot—for we were soon supplied with horses—brought us back to the castle, much to the disappointment of our cortege, who had been promised a scrimmage, and went back in very ill humour at the breach of contract.

The breakfast-room, as we entered, was filled with my uncle's supporters, all busily engaged over poll-books and booth-tallies, in preparation of the eventful day of battle.—These, however, were immediately thrown aside to hasten around me, and inquire all the details of my duel. Considine, happily for me, however, assumed all the dignity of an historian, and recounted the events of the morning, so much to my honour and glory, that I, who only a little before felt crushed and bowed down by the misery of my late duel, began, amid the warm congratulations and eulogiums about me, to think that I was no small hero; and, in fact, something very much resembling "the Man for Galway." To this feeling, a circumstance that followed assisted in contributing: while we were eagerly discussing the various results likely to arise from the meeting, a horse galloped rapidly to the door, and a loud voice called out, "I can't get off, but tell him to come here." We rushed out and beheld Captain Malowney, Mr. Bodkin's second, covered with mud from head to foot, and his horse rearing with foam and sweat. "I am hurrying on to Athlone for another doctor; but I've called to tell you that the wound is not supposed to be mortal—he may recover yet." Without waiting for another word, he dashed spurs into his nag and rattled down the avenue at full gallop. Mr. Bodkin's dearest friend on earth could not have received the intelligence with more delight, and I now began to listen to the congratulations of my friends with a more tranquil spirit. My uncle, too, seemed much relieved by the information, and heard with great good temper my narrative of the few days at Gurt-na-morra. "So then," said he, as I concluded, "my opponent is at least a gentleman; that is a comfort."

"Sir George Dashwood," said I, "from all I have seen, is a remarkably nice person, and I am sure you will meet with only the fair and legitimate opposition of an opposing candidate in him—no mean or unmanly subterfuge."

"All right, Charley; well, now, your affair of this morning must keep you quiet here for a few days, come what will; by Monday next, when the election takes place, Bodkin's fate will be pretty clear, one way or the other, and, if matters go well, you can come into town; otherwise, I have arranged with Considine to take you over to the Continent for a year or so; but we'll discuss all this in the evening. Now, I must start on a canvass. Boyle expects to meet you at dinner to-day; he is coming from Athlone on purpose. Now, good-bye!"

When my uncle had gone I sank into a chair and fell into a musing fit over all the changes a few hours had wrought in me. From a mere boy, whose most serious employment was stocking the house with game, or inspecting the kennel, I had sprung at once into man's estate, was complimented for my coolness, praised for my prowess, lauded for my discretion, by those who were my seniors by nearly half a century; talked to in a tone of confidential intimacy by my uncle, and, in a word, treated in all respects as an equal—and such was all the work of a few hours. But so it is, the eras in life are separated by a narrow boundary: some trifling accident, some casual rencontre impels us across the Rubicon, and we pass from infancy to youth—from youth to manhood—from manhood to age—less by the slow and imperceptible step of time than by some one decisive act or passion, which, occurring at a critical moment, elicits a long latent feeling, and impresses our existence with a colour that tinges it for many a long year. As for me, I had cut the tie which bound me to the careless gaiety of boyhood, with a rude gash. In three short days I had fallen deeply, desperately in love, and had wounded, if not killed, an antagonist in a duel. As I meditated on these things, I was aroused by the noise of horses' feet in the yard beneath. I opened the window, and beheld no less a person than Captain Hammersly. He was handing a card to a servant, which he was accompanying with a verbal message; the impression of something like hostility on the part of the Captain, had never left my mind; and I hastened down stairs just in time to catch him as he turned from the door.

"Ah, Mr. O'Malley!" said he, in a most courteous tone, "they told me you were not at home."

I apologized for the blunder, and begged of him to alight and come in.

"I thank you very much; but, in fact, my hours are now numbered here, I have just received an order to join my regiment: we have been ordered for service, and Sir George has kindly permitted my giving up my staff appointment. I could not, however, leave the country without shaking hands with you. I owe you a lesson in horsemanship, and I'm sorry that we are not to have another day together."

"Then, you are going out to the Peninsula?" said I.

"Why, we hope so; the commander-in-chief, they say, is in great want of cavalry, and we scarcely less in want of something to do. I'm sorry you are not coming with us."

"Would to heaven I were," said I, with an earnestness that almost made my brain start.

"Then, why not?"

"Unfortunately, I am peculiarly situated. My worthy uncle, who is all to me in this world, would be quite alone if I were to leave him; and, although he has never said so, I know he dreads the possibility of my suggesting such a thing to him: so that, between his fears and mine, the matter is never broached by either party, nor do I think it ever can be."

"Devilish hard—but I believe you are right; something, however, may turn up yet to alter his mind, and, if so, and if you do take the dragooning, do not forget, George Hammersly will be always most delighted to meet you, and so good bye, O'Malley, good bye."

He turned his horse's head and was already some paces off, when he returned to my side, and added in a lower tone of voice—

"I ought to have mentioned to you that there has been much discussion on your affair at Blake's table, and only one opinion on the matter among all parties—that you acted perfectly right. Sir George Dashwood—no mean judge of such things—quite approves of your conduct, and I believe wishes you to know as much, and now, once more good bye."

CHAPTER X.—The Election.

The important morning at length arrived, and, as I looked from my bedroom window at daybreak, the crowd of carriages of all sorts and shapes decorated with banners and placards; the incessant bustle; the hurrying hither and thither; the cheering as each new detachment of voters came up, mounted on jaunting cars or on horses, whose whole caparison consisted in a straw rope for a bridle, and a saddle of the same frail material; all informed me that the election day was come. I lost no further time, but proceeded to dress with all possible despatch. When I appeared in the breakfast-room, it was already filled with some seventy or eighty persons of all ranks and ages, mingled confusedly together, and enjoying the hospitable fare of my uncle's house, while they discussed all the details and prospects of the election. In the hall—the library—the large drawing-room too, similar parties were also assembled, and, as new comers arrived, the servants were busy in preparing tables before the door and up the large terrace that ran the entire length of the building. Nothing could be more amusing than the incongruous mixture of the guests, who, with every variety of eatable that chance or inclination provided, were thus thrown into close contact, having only this in common, the success of the cause they were engaged in. Here was the old Galway squire, with an ancestry that reached Noah, sitting side by side with the poor cottier, whose whole earthly possession was what, in Irish phrase, is called a "potato garden," meaning the exactly smallest possible patch of ground out of which a very Indian-rubber conscience could presume to vote. Here sat the old simple-minded, farmer-like man, in close conversation with a little white-foreheaded, keen-eyed personage, in a black coat and eye-glass—a flash attorney from Dublin, learned in flaws of the registry, and deep in the subtleties of the election law. There was an Athlone horse-dealer, whose habitual daily practices in imposing the halt, the lame, and the blind upon the unsuspecting, for beasts of blood and mettle, well qualified him for the trickery of a county contest. Then there were scores of squireen gentry, easily recognised on common occasions by a green coat with brass buttons, dirty cords, and dirtier top-boots, a lash-whip, and a half-bred fox-hound; but now, fresh washed for the day, they presented something of the appearance of a swell mob, adjusted to the meridian of Galway. A mass of frieze-coated, brown-faced, bullet-headed peasantry filling up the large spaces, dotted here and there with a sleek, roguish-eyed priest, or some low electioneering agent, detailing, for the amusement of the country, some of those cunning practices of former times, which, if known to the proper authorities, would, in all likelihood, cause the talented narrator to be improving the soil of Sidney, or fishing on the banks of the Swan River, while, at the head and foot of each table, sat some personal friend of my uncle, whose ready tongue, and still readier pistol, made him a personage of some consequence not more to his own people, than to the enemy. While of such matériel were the company, the fare before them was no less varied: here some rubicund squire was deep in amalgamating the contents of a venison pasty with some of Sneyd's oldest claret; his neighbor, less ambitious and less erudite in such matters, was devouring rashers of bacon with liberal potations of poteen; some pale-checked scion of the law, with all the dust of the Four Courts in his throat, was sipping his humble beverage of black tea, beside four sturdy cattle-dealers, from Rallinsaloe, who were discussing hot whisky punch and spoliation (boiled beef) at the very primitive hour of eight in the morning. Amid the clank of decanters, the crash of knives and plates, the jingling of glasses, the laughter and voices of the guests were audibly increasing, and the various modes of "running a buck," (anglice, substituting a vote,) or hunting a badger, were talked over on all sides, while the price of a veal (a calf) or a voter was disputed with all the energy of debate.

Refusing many an offered place, I went through the different rooms, in search of Considine, to whom circumstances of late had somehow greatly attached me.

"Here, Charley," cried a voice I was very familiar with; "here 's a place I've been keeping for you."

"Ah, Sir Harry, how do you do? Any of that grouse-pie to spare?"

"Abundance, my boy; but I'm afraid I can't say as much for the liquor: I have been shouting for claret this half hour in vain—do get us some nutriment down here, and the Lord will reward you. What a pity it is," he added in a lower tone to his neighbor; "what a pity a quart bottle won't hold a quart; but I'll bring it before the House one of these days." That he kept his word in this respect, a motion on the books of the Honorable House will bear me witness.

"Is this it?" said he, turning toward a farmer-like old man, who had put some question to him across the table; "is it the apple-pie you'll have?"

"Many thanks to your honor—I'd like it, as it was wholesome."

"And why should n't it be wholesome?" said Sir Harry.

"Troth then myself does not know; but my father, I heard tell, died of an apple-plexy, and I'm afeared of it."

I at length found Considine, and learned that, as a very good account of Bodkin had arrived, there was no reason why I should not proceed to the hustings; but I was secretly charged not to take any prominent part in the day's proceedings. My uncle I only saw for an instant;—he begged me to be careful, avoid all scrapes, and not to quit Considine. It was past ten o'clock when our formidable procession got under way, and headed toward the town of Galway. The road was, for miles, crowded with our followers; banners flying and music playing, we presented something of the spectacle of a very ragged army on its march. At every cross-road a mountain-path reinforcement awaited us, and, as we wended along, our numbers were momentarily increasing; here and there along the line, some energetic and not over sober-adherent was regaling his auditory with a speech in laudation of the O'Malley's since the days of Moses, and more than one priest was heard threatening the terrors of his church in aid of a cause to whose success he was pledged and bound. I rode beside the Count, who, surrounded by a group of choice spirits, recounted the various happy inventions by which he had on divers occasions substituted a personal quarrel for a contest. Boyle also contributed his share of election anecdote, and one incident he related, which, I remember, amused me much at the time.

"Do you remember Billy Calvert that came down to contest Kilkenny?" inquired Sir Harry.

"What! ever forget him!" said Considine, "with his well-powdered wig, and his hessians. There never was his equal for lace ruffles nor rings."

"You never heard, may be, how he lost the election?"

"He resigned, I believe, or something of that sort."

"No, no," said another; "he never came forward at all: there 's some secret in it, for Tom Butler was elected without a contest."

"Jack, I'll tell you how it happened. I was on my way up from Cork, having finished my own business, and just carried the day, not without a push for it. When we reached—Lady Mary was with me—when we reached Kilkenny, the night before the election, I was not ten minutes in town till Butler heard of it, and sent off express to see me; I was at my dinner when the messenger came, and promised to go over when I'd done; but, faith, Tom did 'nt wait, but came rushing up stairs himself, and dashed into the room in the greatest hurry."

"Harry," says he, 'I'm done for; the corporation of free smiths, that were always above bribery, having voted for myself and my father before, for four pounds ten a man, won't come forward under six guineas and whiskey. Calvert has the money: they know it—The devil a farthing we have; and we've been paying all our fellows that can't read in Henneay's note and you know the bank's broke these three weeks.'

"On he went, giving me a most disastrous picture of his cause, and concluded by asking if I could suggest any thing under the circumstances."

"You could 'nt get a decent mob and clear the poll?"

"I am afraid not," said he, despondingly.

"Then I don't see what 's to be done: if you can't pick a fight with himself—will he go out?"

"Lord knows; they say he 's so afraid of that, that it has prevented him coming down till the very day: but he is arrived now: he came in the evening, and is stopping at Walsh's, in Patrick-street."

"Then I'll see what can be done," said I.

"Is that Calvert, the little man that blushes when the Lady Lieutenant speaks to him?" said Lady Mary.

"The very man."

"Would it be of any use to you if he could not come on to the hustings to-morrow?" said she again.

"'Twould gain us the day; half the voters do 'nt believe he 's here at all, and his chief agent cheated all the people on the last election, and if Calvert did 'nt appear, he would n't have ten voters to register. But why do you ask?"

"Why, that, if you like, I'll bet you a pair of diamond ear-rings he sha'n't show."

"Done," said Butler, "and I promise a necklace into the bargain, if you win: but I'm afraid you're only quizzing me."

"Here 's my hand on it," said she: "and now let 's talk of something else."

"As Lady Boyle never asked my assistance, and, as I knew she was very well able to perform whatever she undertook, you may be sure I gave myself very little trouble about the whole affair, and, when they came, I went off to breakfast with Tom's committee, not knowing any thing that was to be done."

"Calvert had given orders that he was to be called at eight o'clock, and so a few minutes before that time a gentle knock came to the door. 'Come in, said he,' thinking it was the waiter, and covering himself up in the clothes, for he was the most bashful creature that ever was seen; 'Come in'."

"The door opened, and what was his horror to find that a lady entered in her dressing gown, her hair on her shoulders very much tossed and dishevelled! The moment she came in she closed the door and locked it, and then sat leisurely down upon a chair.

"Billy's teeth chattered, and his limbs trembled, for this was an adventure of a very novel kind for him. At last, he took courage to speak. 'I am afraid, madam,' said he, 'that you are under some unhappy mistake, and that you supposed that this chamber is—'

"Mr. Calvert's," said the lady, with a solemn voice, 'is it not?'

"Yes, madam, I am that person."

"Thank God," said the lady, with a very impressive tone, 'here I am safe.'

"Billy grew very much puzzled at these words; but hoping that, by his silence, the lady would proceed to some explanation, he said no more. She, however, seemed to think that nothing further was necessary, and sat still and motionless, with her hands before her, and her eyes fixed on Billy."

"You seem to forget me, sir?" said she with a faint smile.

"I do, indeed, madam; the half light, the novelty of your costume, and the strangeness of the circumstance altogether must plead for me—if I appear rude enough."

"I am Lady Mary Boyle," said she.

"I do remember you, madam; but may I ask—?"

"Yes, yes, I know what you would ask: you would say, why are you here, how comes it that you have so far outstepped the propriety of which your whole life is an example, that, alone at such a time you appear in the chamber of a man whose character for gallantry—"

"Oh, indeed—indeed, my lady, nothing of the kind."

"Ah, alas! how poor defenceless women learn too late; how constantly associated is the retiring modesty which denies, with the pleasing powers which ensure success—' Here she sobbed, Billy blushed, and the clock struck nine."

"May I then beg, madam—?"

"Yes, yes, you shall hear it all; but my poor scattered faculties will not be the clearer by your hurrying me. You know perhaps," continued she, 'that my maiden name was Rogers?' He of the blankets bowed, and she resumed. 'It is now eighteen years since that a young, unsuspecting, fond creature, reared in all the care and fondness of doting parents, tempted her first step in life, and trusted her fate to another's keeping. I am that unhappy person: the other, that monster in human guise that smiled but to betray, that won but to ruin and destroy, is he whom you know as Sir Harry Boyle.' Here she sobbed for some minutes, wiped her eyes, and resumed her narrative, beginning at the period of her marriage, detailed a number of circumstances, in which poor Calvert, in all his anxiety to come au fond at matters, could never perceive bore upon the question in any way; but, as she recounted them all with great force and precision, entreating him to bear in mind certain circumstances to which she should recur by-and-by, his attention was kept on the stretch, and it was only when the clock struck ten that he was fully aware how his morning was passing, and what surmises his absence might originate."

"May I interrupt you for a moment, dear madam; was it nine or ten o'clock which struck last?"

"How should I know?" said she, frantically; 'what are hours and minutes to her who has passed long years of misery?'

"Very true, very true," replied he, timidly, and rather fearing for the intellects of his fair companion.

"She continued."

"The narrative, however, so far from becoming clearer, grew gradually more confused and intricate, and as frequent references were made by the lady to some previous statement, Calvert was more than once rebuked for forgetfulness and inattention, where, in reality, nothing less than short-hand could have borne him through."

"Was it in ninety-three, I said, that Sir Harry left me at Tuam?"

"Upon my life, madam, I am afraid to aver, but it strikes me—"

"Gracious powers! and this is he whom I fondly trusted to make the depository of my woes—cruel, cruel man." Here she sobbed considerably for several minutes, and spoke not.

"A loud cheer of 'Butler for ever,' from the mob without, now burst upon their hearing, and recalled poor Calvert to the thought that the hours were speeding fast, and no prospect of the everlasting tale coming to an end."

"I am deeply, most deeply grieved, my dear madam," said the little man, sitting up in a pyramid of blankets, 'but hours, minutes, are most precious to me this morning. I am about to be proposed as member for Kilkenny.'

"At these words, the lady straightened her figure out, threw her arms at either side, and burst into a fit of laughter, which poor Calvert knew at once to be hysterics. Here was a pretty situation: the bell rope lay against the opposite wall, even if it did not, would be exactly warranted in pulling it!"

"May the devil and all his angels take Sir Harry Boyle and his whole connection to the fifth generation," was his sincere prayer, as he sat like a Chinese juggler under his canopy."

"At length the violence of the paroxysm seemed to subside, the sobs became less frequent, the kicking less forcible, and the lady's eyes closed, and she appeared to have fallen asleep. 'Now is the moment,' said Billy; 'if I could only get as far as my dressing-gown.' So saying, he worked himself down noiselessly to the foot of his bed, looked fixedly at the fallen lids of the sleeping lady, and essayed one leg from the blankets. 'Now or never,' said he, pushing aside the curtain, and preparing for a spring—one more look he cast at his companion, and then leaped forth; but just as he lit upon the floor, she again aroused herself, screaming with horror. Billy fell upon the bed, and, rolling himself in the bedclothes, vowed never to rise again till she was out of the visible horizon. 'What is all this; what do you mean, sir?' said the lady, reddening with indignation."

"Nothing, upon my soul, madam: it was only my dressing gown!"

"Your dressing gown!" said she, with an emphasis worthy of Siddons; 'a likely story for Sir Harry to believe, sir; fie, fie, sir.'

"This last allusion seemed a settler; for the luckless Calvert heaved a profound sigh, and sunk down as if all hope had left him. 'Butler for ever,' roared the mob; 'Calvert for ever,' cried a boy's voice from without; 'Three groans for the runaway,' answered this announcement; and a very tender inquiry of 'Where is he?' was raised by some hundred mouths.

"Madam," said the almost frantic listener, "madam, I must get up; I must dress; I beg of you to permit me."

"I have nothing to refuse, sir: alas! disdain has long been my only portion. Get up if you will."

"But," said the astonished man, who was nigh well deranged at the coolness of the reply, "but how am I to do so, if you sit there?"

"Sorry for any inconvenience I may cause you; but, in the crowded state of the hotel, I hope you see the propriety of my walking about the passages in this costume?"

"And, great God! madam, why did you come out in it?"

"A cheer from the mob prevented her reply being audible. One o'clock tolled out from the great bell of the cathedral."

"There's one o'clock, as I live."

"I heard it," said the lady.

"The shouts are increasing. What is that I hear? Butler is in. Gracious mercy! is the election over?"

"The lady stepped to the window, drew aside the curtain, and said, 'Indeed, it would appear so; the mob are chairing Mr. Butler. [A deafening shout burst from the street.] 'Perhaps you'd like to see the fun, so I'll not detain you any longer. So good-bye, Mr. Calvert; and, as your breakfast will be cold, in all likelihood, come down to No. 4, for Sir Harry's a late man, and will be glad to see you.'"

CHAPTER XI....An Adventure.

As thus we lightened the road with chatting, the increasing concourse of people, and the greater throng of carriages that filled the road, announced that we had nearly reached our destination.

"Considine," said my uncle, riding up to where we were, "I have just got a few lines from Davern. It seems Bodkin's people are afraid to come in: they know what they must expect, and if so, more than half of that barony is lost to our opponent."

"Then he has no chance whatever."

"He never had, in my opinion," said Sir Harry.

"We'll see soon," said my uncle, cheerfully, and rode to the post.

The remainder of the way was occupied in discussing the various possibilities of the election, into which I was rejoiced to find that defeat never entered.

In the goodly days I speak of, a county contest was a very different thing indeed from the tame and insipid farce that now passes under that name: where a briefless barrister, bullied by both sides, sits as assessor—a few drunken voters—a radical O'Connellite grocer—a demagogue priest—a deputy grand juror, something from the Trinity College lodge, with some half dozen followers, shouting to the "devil with Peel, or down with the Deas," from the whole corps de ballet. No, no; in the times I refer to the voters were some thousands in number, and the adverse parties took the field, far less dependent for success upon previous pledge or promise made them, than upon the actual stratagem of the day. Each went forth, like a general to battle, surrounded by a numerous and well-chosen staff; one party of friends acting as commissariat, attended to the victualling of the voters, that they obtained a due, or rather undue allowance of liquor, and came properly drunk to the poll; others again broke into skirmishing parties, and scattered over the country, cut off the enemy's supplies, breaking down their post-chaises, upsetting their jaunting cars, stealing their poll books, and kidnapping their agents. Then there were secret service people, bribing the enemy and enticing them to desert; and lastly, there was a species of sapper-and-miner force, who invented false documents, denied the identity of the opposite party's people, and, when hard pushed, provided persons who took bribes from the enemy, and gave evidence afterward on a petition. Amid all these encounters of wit and ingenuity, the personal friends of the candidate formed a species of rifle brigade, picking out the enemy's officers, and doing some damage to their tactics, by shooting a proposer or wounding a second— a considerable portion of every leading agent's fee being intended as compensation for the duels he might, could, would, should, or ought to fight during the election. Such, in brief, was a contest in the olden time; and, when it is taken into consideration, that it usually lasted a fortnight or three weeks, that a considerable military force was always engaged, (for our Irish law permits this,) and which, when nothing pressing was doing, was regularly assailed by both parties—that far more dependence was placed in a bludgeon than a pistol—and that the man who registered a vote without a cracked pate, was regarded as a kind of natural phenomenon, some faint idea may be formed how much such a scene must have contributed to the peace of the county and the happiness and welfare of all concerned in it.

As we rode along, a loud cheer from a road that ran parallel to the one we were pursuing attracted our attention, and we perceived that the cortege of the opposite party was hastening on to the hustings. I could distinguish the Blake's girls on horseback, among a crowd of officers in undress, and saw something like a bonnet in the carriage and four which headed the procession, and which I judged to be that of Sir George Dashwood. My heart beat strongly as I strained my eyes to see if Miss Dashwood were there, but I could not discern her, and it was with a sense of relief that I reflected on the possibility of our not meeting under circumstances wherein our feelings and interests were so completely opposed. While I was engaged in making this survey, I had accidentally dropped my companions; my eyes were firmly fixed upon that carriage, and, in the faint hope that it contained the object of all my wishes, I forgot every thing else. At length the cortege entered the town, and passing beneath a heavy stone gateway, was lost to my view. I was still lost in reverie, when an under-agent of my uncle's rode up. "Oh! Master Charles," said he, "what's to be done? they've forgotten Mr. Holmes at Woodford, and we have n't a carriage, chaise, or even a car left, to send for him."

"Have you told Mr. Considine?" inquired I.

"And sure you know yourself how little Mr. Considine thinks of a lawyer. It's small comfort he'd give me if I went to tell him: if it was a case of pistols or a bullet mould, he'd ride back the whole way himself for them."

"Try Sir Harry Boyle then."

"He's making a speech this minute before the court-house."

This had sufficed to show me how far behind my companions I had been loitering, when a cheer from the distant road again turned my eyes in that direction: it was the Dashwood carriage returning, after leaving Sir George at the hustings. The head of the britska, before thrown open, was now closed, and I could not make out if any one were inside."

"Devil a doubt of it," said the agent, in answer to some question of a farmer who rode beside him; "will you stand to me?"

"Troth, to be sure I will."

"Here goes then," said he, gathering up his reins and turning his horse at the fence at the road side; "follow me now, boys."

The order was well obeyed, for, when he had cleared the ditch, a dozen stout country fellows, well-mounted, were beside him. Away they went at a hunting pace, taking every leap before them, and heading toward the road before us.

Without thinking further of the matter, I was laughing at the droll effect of the line of frieze coats presented as they rode, side by side, over the stone walls, when an observation near me aroused my attention.

"Ah, then, as they know any thing of Jim Finucane, they'll give it up peaceably: it's little he'd think of taking the coach from under the judge himself."

"What are they about, boys?" said I.

"Goin' to take the chaise and four forinist ye, yer honor," said the man.

I waited not to hear more, but darting spurs into my horse's sides, cleared the fence at one bound. My horse, a strong knit, half-breed, was as fast as a racer for a short distance; so that when the agent and his party had come up with the carriage, I was only a few hundred yards behind. I shouted out with all my might, but they either heard not, or heeded not; for scarcely was the first man over the fence into the road, when the postilion on the leader was felled to the ground, and his place supplied by his slayer. The boy on the wheeler shared the same fate; and, in an instant, so well managed was the attack, the carriage was in possession of the assailants. Four stout fellows had climbed into the box and the rumble, and six others were climbing into the interior, regardless of the aid of steps. By this time the Dashwood party had got the alarm, and returned in full force—not, however, before the other had laid whip to the horses, and set out in full gallop; and now commenced the most terrific race I ever witnessed.

The four carriage horses, which were the property of Sir George, were English thoroughbreds of great value, and totally unaccustomed to the treatment they experienced, dashed forward at a pace that threatened annihilation to the carriage at every bound. The pursuers, though well mounted, were speedily distanced, but followed at a pace that, in the end, was certain to overtake the carriage. As for myself, I rode on beside the road, at the full speed of my horse, shouting, cursing, imploring, execrating, and beseeching at turns, but all in vain—the yells and shouts of the pursuers and pursued drowned all other sounds, except when the thundering crash of the horse's feet rose above all. The road, like most Irish western roads, until the present century, lay straight as an arrow for miles, regardless of every opposing barrier, and, in the instance in question, crossed a mountain at its very highest point. Toward this pinnacle the pace had been tremendous; but, owing to the higher breeding of the cattle, the carriage party had still the advance, and, when they reached the top, they proclaimed the victory with a cheer of triumph and derision. The carriage disappeared beneath the crest of the mountain, and the pursuers halted, as if disposed to relinquish the chase.

"Come on, boys. Never give up," cried I, springing over into the road and heading the party, to which by every right I was opposed.

It was no time for deliberation, and they followed me with a hearty cheer that convinced me I was unknown. The next instant we were on the mountain top, and beheld the carriage, half way down beneath us, still galloping at full stretch.

"We have them now," said a voice behind me; "they'll never turn Lurra bridge, if we only press on."

The speaker was right: the road at the mountain foot turned at a perfect right angle, and then crossed a lofty one-arched bridge over a mountain-torrent, that ran deep and boisterously beneath. On we went, gaining at every stride; for the fellows who rode postilion well knew what was before them, and slackened their pace to secure a safe turning. A yell of victory arose from the pursuers, but was answered by the others with a cheer of defiance. The space was now scarcely two hundred yards between us, when the head of the britska was flung down, and a figure that I at once recognized as the redoubted Tim Finucane, one of the boldest and most reckless fellows in the country, was seen standing on the seat, holding—gracious heavens! it was true—holding in his arms the apparently lifeless figure of Miss Dashwood.

"Hold in!" shouted the ruffian, with a voice that rose high above all the other sounds. "Hold in! or, by the Eternal, I'll throw her, body and bones, into the Lurra ash," for such was the torrent called, that boiled and foamed a few yards before us.

He had by this time got firmly planted on the hind seat, and held the drooping form on one arm, with all the ease of a giant's grasp.

"For the love of God," said I, "pull up. I know him well: he'll do it to a certainty, if you press on."

"And we know you too," said a ruffianly fellow, with a dark whisker meeting beneath his chin, "and have some scores to settle ere we part."

But I heard no more. With one tremendous effort I dashed my horse forward. The carriage turned the angle of the road—for an instant was out of sight—another moment I was behind it.

"Stop!" I shouted, with a last effort, but in vain. The horses, maddened and infuriated, sprang forward, and, heedless of all efforts to turn them, the leaders sprang over the low parapet of the bridge, and, hanging for a second by the traces, fell with a crash into the swollen torrent beneath. By this time I was beside the carriage. Finucane had now clambered to the box, and, regardless of the death and ruin around, bent upon his murderous object, he lifted the light and girlish form above his head, bent backward, as if to give greater impulse to his effort, when, twining my lash around my wrist, I levelled my heavy and loaded hunting whip at his head; the weighted ball of lead struck him exactly beneath his hat: he staggered, his hands relaxed, and he fell lifeless to the ground: the same instant I was felled to the earth by a blow from behind, and saw no more.

CHAPTER XII....Mickey Free.

NEARLY three weeks followed the event I have just narrated ere I again was restored to consciousness. The blow by which I was felled, from what hand coming was never after discovered, had brought on concussion of the brain, and for several days my life was despaired of. As by slow steps I advanced toward recovery, I learned from Considine that Miss Dashwood, whose life was saved by my interference, had testified, in the warmest manner, her gratitude, and that Sir George had, up to the period of his leaving the country, never omitted a single day to ride over and inquire for me.

"You know, of course," said the Count, supposing such news was the most likely to interest me, "you know we beat them."

"No. Pray tell me all. They've not let me hear any thing hitherto."

"One day finished the whole affair; we polled man for man till past two o'clock, when our fellows lost all patience, and beat their tallies out of the town; the police came up, but they beat the police; then they got soldiers, but begged they were too strong for them too. Sir George witnessed it all, and, knowing besides how little chance he had of success, deemed it best to give in; so that a little before five o'clock he resigned. I must say no man could behave better. He came across the hustings and shook hands with Godfrey, and, as the news of the scrimmage with his daughter had just arrived, said that he was sorry his prospect of success had not been greater, that, in resigning, he might testify how deeply he felt the debt the O'Malleys had laid him under."

"And my uncle, how did he receive his advances?"

"Like his own honest self, grasped his hand firmly, and upon my soul I think he was half sorry that he gained the day. Do you know he took a mighty fancy to that blue-eyed daughter of the old General's—faith, Charley, if he was some twenty years younger I would not say but—Come, come, I did n't mean to hurt your feelings; but I have been staying here too long: I'll send up Mickey to sit with you; mind and don't be talking too much to him."

So saying, the worthy Count left the room, fully impressed that, in hinting at the possibility of my uncle's marrying again, he had said something to ruffle my temper.

For the next two or three weeks, my life was one of the most tiresome monotony. Strict injunctions had been given by the doctors to avoid exciting me, and, consequently, every one that came in walked on tiptoe, spoke in whispers, and left me in five minutes. Reading was absolutely forbidden, and, with a sombre half light to sit in, and chicken broth to support nature, I dragged out as dreary an existence as any gentleman west of Athlone.

Whenever my uncle or Considine were not in the room, my companion was my own servant, Michael, or, as he was better known, "Mickey Free." Now, had Mickey been left to his own free and unrestricted devices, the time would not have hung so heavily; for, among Mike's manifold gifts, he was possessed of a very great flow of gossiping conversation; he knew all that was doing in the country, and never was barren in his information wherever his imagination could come into play. Mickey was the best hurler in the barony, no mean performer on the violin, could dance the national bolero of "Tatter Jack Walsh" in a way that charmed more than one soft heart beneath a red wolsey boddace, and had, withal, the peculiar free-and-easy devil-may-care kind of off-hand way that never deserted him in the midst of his wildest and most subtle mornen's, giving to a very deep and cunning fellow all the apparent frankness and openness of a country lad.

He had attached himself to me as a kind of sporting companion; and, growing more and more useful, he had been gradually admitted to the honors of the kitchen and the prerogatives of off cast clothes; without ever having been actually engaged as a servant, and while thus no warrant officer, as in fact, he discharged all his duties well and punctually, was rated among the ship's company; though no one ever could say at what precise period he changed his caterpillar existence and became the gay butterfly, with cords and tops, and striped vest, and a most knowing jerry hat, who stalked about the stable yard, and bullied the helpers. Such was Mike; he had made his fortune, such as it was, and had a most becoming pride in the fact that he made himself indispensable to an establishment which, before he entered it, never knew the want of him. As for me, he was everything to me: Mike informed me what horse was wrong, why the chestnut mare could n't go out, and why the black horse could. He knew the arrival of a new covey of partridges quicker than the Morning Post does of a noble family from the Continent, and could tell their whereabouts twice as accurately; but his talents took a wider range than field sports afford, and he was the faithful chronicler of every wake, station, wedding, or christening for miles round, and, as I took no small pleasure in those very national pastimes, the information was of great value to me. To conclude this brief sketch, Mike was a devout Catholic, in the same sense that he was enthusiastic about anything, that is, he believed and obeyed exactly as far as suited his own peculiar notions of comfort and happiness; beyond that his skepticism stepped in and saved him from inconvenience, and, though he might have been somewhat puzzled to reduce his faith to a rubric, still it answered his purpose, and that was all he wanted. Such, in short, was my valet, Mickey Free, and who, had not heavy injunctions been laid on him, as to silence and discretion, would have lightened my weary hours.

"Ah! then, Mither Charles," said he, with a half-suppressed yawn at the long period of probation his tongue had been undergoing in silence, "ah! then, but you were mighty near it."

"Near what?" said I.

"Faith then, myself does n't well know; some say it's purgatory; but it's hard to tell."

"I thought you were too good a Catholic, Mickey, to show any doubts on the matter?"

"Maybe I am—maybe I ain't," was the cautious reply.
 "Would n't Father Roach explain any of your difficulties for you, if you went over to him?"

"Faix it's little I'd mind his explainings."

"And why not?"

"Easy enough. If you ax ould Miles there without, what does he be doing with all the powther and shot, wouldn't he tell you he's shooting the rooks, and the magpies, and some other varmint; but myself knows he sells it to Widow Casey, at two and four pence a pound: so be-lukes Father Roach may be shooting away at the poor souls in purgatory, that all this time are enjoying the hoith of fine living in Heaven, ye understand."

"And you think that's the way of it, Mickey?"

"Troth it's likely. Any how, I know it's not the place they make it out."

"Why, how do you mean?"

"Well, then, I'll tell you, Mister Charles; but you must not be saying any thing about it afther; for I do 'nt like to talk about these kind of things."

Having pledged myself to the requiaite silence and secrecy, Mickey began:

"Maybe you heard tell of the way my father, rest his soul wharever he is, came to this end. Well, I need 'nt mind particulars, but, in short, he was murdered in Ballinaloe one night, when he was baitin the whole town with a blackthorn stick he had, more betoken, a piece of a scythe was stuck at the end of it; a nate weapon, and one he was mighty partial to: but these murdering thieves, the cattle dealers, that never cared for diversion of any kind, fell on him and broke his skull."

"Well, we had a very agreeable wake, and plenty of the best of every thing, and to spare, and I thought it was all over; but, somehow, though I paid Father Roach fifteen shillings, and made him mighty drunk, he always gave me a black look whenever I met him, and when I took off my hat, he'd turn away his head displeased like."

"Murder and ages," says I, 'what's this for?' but as I've a ligh heart, I bore up, and did n't think more about it. One day, however, I was coming home from Athlone market, by myself on the road, when Father Roach overtook me. 'Devil a one a me 'll take any notice of you now,' says I, 'and we 'll see what 'll come out of it.' So the priest rid up, and looked me straight in the face."

"Mickey," says he, 'Mickey.'

"Father," says I.

"Is it that the way you salute your clargy," says he, 'with your caubeen on your head?'

"Faix," says I, 'it's little ye mind whether it's an or aff, for you never take the trouble to say by your leave, or damn your soul, or any other politeless, when we meet.'

"You're an ungrateful creature," says he 'and if you only knew, you'd be trembling in your skin before me, this minute.'

"Devil a tremble," says I, 'after walking six miles this way.'

"You're an obstinate hard-hearted sinner," says he, 'and it's no use in telling you.'

"Telling me what?" says I, for I was getting curious to make out what he meant.

"Mickey," said he, changing his voice, and putting his head down close to me, 'Mickey, I saw your father last night.'

"The saints be merciful to us," said I, 'did ye?'

"I did," said he.

"Tear-an-ages," says I, 'did he tell you what he did with the new corduroys he bought in the fair?'

"Oh! then, you are a cold-hearted creature," says he, 'and I 'll not lose time with you.' With that he was going to ride away, when I took hold of the bridle."

"Father, darling," says I, 'God pardon me, but them breeches is goin' between me an' my night's rest; but tell me about my father.'

"Oh! then, he's in a melancholy state!"

"Whereabouts is he?" says I.

"In purgatory," says he, 'but he won't be there long.'

"Well," says I, 'that's a comfort anyhow.'

"I am glad you think so," says he; 'but there's more of the other opinion.'

"What's that?" says I.

"That hell's worse."

"Oh! meila-murder," says I, 'is that it?'

"Ay, that's it."

"Well, I was so terrified and frightened, I said nothing for some time, but trotted along beside the priest's horse."

"Father," says I, 'how long will it be before they send him where you know?'

"It will not be long now," says he, 'for they're tired entirely with him: they've no peace night nor day,' says he, 'Mickey, your father is a mighty bad man.'

"True for you, Father Roach," says I to myself: 'av he had only the ould stick with the scythe in it, I wish them joy of his company.'

"Mickey," says he, 'I see you're grieved, any I do n't wonder: sure, it's a great disgrace to a decent family.'

"Troth it is," says I, 'but my father always liked low company. Could nothing be done for him now, Father Roach?' says I, looking up in the priest's face."

"I'm greatly afraid, Mickey, he was a bad man, a very bad man."

"And ye think he 'll go there?" says I.

"Indeed, Mickey, I have my fears."

"Upon my conscience," says I, 'I believe you're right, he was always a restless crature.'

"But it does n't depind on him," says the priest crossly."

"And then, who then?" says I.

"Upon yourself, Mickey Free," says he; 'God pardon you for it too.'

"Upon me?" says I.

"Troth no less," says he; 'how many masses was said for your father's soul?—how many aves?—how many paters?—answer me.'

"Devil a one of me knows!—maybe twenty."

"Twenty, twenty—no, nor one."

"And why not?" says I, 'what for, would n't you be helping a poor crature out of trouble, when it would n't cost you more nor a handful of prayers.'

"Mickey, I see," says he, in a solemn tone, 'you're worse nor a haythen: but ye could n't be other, ye never come to yer duties.'

"Well, Father," says I, looking very penitent, 'how many masses would get him out?'

"Now you talk like a sensible man," says he; 'now, Mickey, I've hopes for you—let me see—here he went countin' up his fingers, and numberin' to himself for five minutes—Mickey,' says he, 'I've a batch coming out on Tuesday week, and, if you were to make great exertions, perhaps your father could come with them; that is, av they made no objections.'

"And what for would they?" says I; 'he was always the hoith of company, and av singing's allowed in them parts—'

"God forgive you, Mickey, but yer in a benighted state," says he, sighing."

"Well," says I, 'how 'll we get him out Tuesday week? for that's bringing things to a focus.'

"Two masses in the morning, fastin'," says Father Roach, half loud, 'is two, and two in the afternoon is four, and two at vespers is six,' says he; 'six masses a day for nine days is close by sixty masses—say sixty,' says he, 'and they 'll cost you—mind, Mickey, and do n't be telling it again—for it's only to yourself I'd make them so cheap—a matter of three pounds.'

"Three pounds," says I, 'be-gorra you might as well ax me to give you the rock of Cashel.'

"I'm sorry for ye, Mickey," says he, gathering up the reins to ride off, 'I'm sorry for you; and the day will come when the neglect of your poor father will be a sore stroke agin yourself.'

"Wait a bit, your Reverence," says I, 'wait a bit: would forty shillings get him out?'

"Av coorse it would n't," says he.

"Maybe," says I, coaxing, 'maybe, av you say that his son was a poor boy that lived by his industry, and the times was bad?'

"Not the least use," says he.

"Arrah, but it's hard-hearted they are," thinks I; 'well, see now, I'll give you the money—but I can't afford it all at onst—but I'll pay you five shillings a week—will that do?'

"I'll do my endayvors," says Father Roach; 'and I'll speak to them to trate him peaceably, in the mean time.'

"Long life to your Reverence and do. Well, here now, here's five hogs to begin with; and, masha, but I never thought I'd be spending my loose change that a way."

Father Roach put the six tinpinnies in the pocket of his black leather breeches, said something in Latin, bid me good morning, and rode off."

"Well, to make my story short, I worked late and early to pay the five shillings a week, and I did do it for three weeks regular; then I brought four and fourpence—then it came down to one and tenpence halfpenny—then ninepence—and, at last, I had nothing at all to bring."

"Mickey Free," says the priest, 'ye must stir yourself—your father is mighty displeased at the way you've been doing of late; and av ye kept yer word, he'd been near out by this time.'

"Troth," says I, 'it's a very expensive place.'

"By coorse it is," says he, 'sure all the quality of the land's there. But, Mickey, my man, with a little exertion, your father's business is done. What are you jingling in your pocket there?'

"It's ten shillings, your Reverence, I have to buy seed potatoes."

"Hand it here, my son. Is n't it better your father be enjoying himself in Paradise, then ye were to have all the potatoes in Ireland?'

"And how do ye know," says I, 'he's so near out?'

"How do I know—how do I know—is it?—did n't I see him?'

"See him! tear-an-ages, was you down there again?'

"I was," says he, 'I was down there for three quarters of an hour yesterday evening, getting out Luke Kennedy's mother—decent people the Kennedys—never spared expense.'

"And ye seen my father?" says I.

"I did," says he; 'he had an ould flannel waistcoat on, and a pipe sticking out of the pocket av it.'

"That's him," said I; 'had he a hairy cap?'

"I didn't mind the cap," says he, 'but av coorse he would n't have it on his head in that place.'

"There's for you," says I, 'did he speak to you?'

"He did," says Father Roach; 'he spoke very hard about the way he was treated down there, that they were always jibin' and jeerin' him about drink; and fightin', and the courses he led up here, and that it was a queer thing, for the matter of ten shillings, he was to be kept there so long.'

"Well," says I, taking out the ten shillings and counting it with one hand, 'we must do our best, anyhow—and ye think this 'll get him out surely?'

"I know it will," says he; 'for when Luke's mother was leaving the place, yer father saw the door open, he made a rush at it, and, be-gorra, before it was shut he got his head and one shoulder outside av it, so that ye see, a trifle more 'll do it.'

"Faix, and yer Reverence," says I, you've lightened my heart this morning, and I put the money back again into my pocket."

"Why, what do you mean?" says he, growing very red, for he was angry."

"Just this," says I, 'that I've saved my money: for av it was my father you seen, and that he got his head and one shoulder outside the door, oh, then, by the powers,' says I, 'the devil a jail or jailer from hell to Connaught idould him; so, Father Roach, I wish you the top of the morning,' and I went away laughing; and from that day to this I never heard more of purgatory; and ye see, Mister Charles, I think I was right."

Scarcely had Mike concluded when my door was suddenly burst open, and Sir Harry Boyle, without assuming any of his usual precautions respecting silence and quiet, rushed into the room. A broad grin upon his honest features, and his eyes twinkling in a way that evidently showed me something had occurred to amuse him."

"By Jove, Charley, I musn't keep it from you; it's too good a thing not to tell you: do you remember that very essence young gentleman who accompanied Sir George Dashwood from Dublin, as a kind of electioneering friend?'

"Do you mean Mr. Prettyman?'

"The very man; he was, you are aware, an under secretary in some government department. Well, it seems that he had come down among us, poor savages, as much from motives of learned research and scientific inquiry, as though we had been South Sea islanders; report had gifted us, humble Galwegians, with some very peculiar traits, and this gifted individual resolved to record them. Whether the election week might have sufficed his appetite for wonders, I know not; but he was peaceably taking his departure from the West on Saturday last, when Phil Macnamara met him, and pressed him to dine that day with a few friends at his house.—You know Phil; so that when I tell you, Sam Burke, of Greenmount, and Roger Doolan were of the party, I need not say that the English traveller was not left to his own unassisted imagination for his facts; such anecdotes of our habits and customs as they crammed him with, it would appear never were heard before—nothing was too hot or too heavy for the luckless cockney, who, when not sipping his claret, was faithfully recording in his tablet the mems. for a very brilliant and very original work on Ireland."

"Fine country—splendid country—glorious people—gifted—brave—intelligent—but not happy—alas! Mr. Macnamara, not happy. But we don't know you, gentlemen—we don't indeed, at the other side of the channel; our notions regarding you are far, very far from just."

"I hope and trust," said old Burke, 'you 'll help them to a better understanding ere long.'

"Such, my dear sir, will be the proudest task of my life—the facts I have heard here this evening have made so profound an impression upon me, that I burn for the moment when I can make them known to the world at large; to think—just to think, that a portion of this beautiful island should be so steeped in poverty—that the people not only live upon the mere potatoes, but are absolutely obliged to wear the skins for raiment, as Mr. Doolan has just mentioned to me."

"Which accounts for our cultivation of lumpers," added Mr. Coolan, 'they being the largest species of the root, and best adapted for wearing apparel.'

"I should deem myself culpable, indeed I should, did I not inform my countrymen upon the real condition of this great country."

"Why, after your great opportunities for judging," said Phil, 'you ought to speak out—you've seen us in a way, I may fairly affirm, few Englishmen have, and heard more.'

"That's it, that's the very thing, Mr. Macnamara: I've looked at you more closely, I've watched you more narrowly, I've witnessed what the French call your vie intime."

"Begad you have," said old Burke, with a grin, 'and profited by it to the utmost.'

"I've been a spectator of your election contests—I've partaken of your hospitality—I've witnessed your popular and national sports—I've been present at your weddings, your fairs, your wakes—but no, I was forgetting, I never saw a wake."

"Never saw a wake!" repeated each of the company in turn, as though the gentleman was uttering a sentiment of very dubious veracity."

"Never," said Mr. Prettyman, rather abashed at this proof of his incapacity to instruct his English friends upon all matters of Irish interest."

"Well, then," said Macnamara, 'with a blessing, we 'll show you one. Lord forbid that we should 'nt do the honors of our poor country to an intelligent foreigner, when he's good enough to come amongst us.'

"Peter," said he, turning to the servant behind him, 'who 'se dead hereabouts?'

"Sorra one, yer honor. Since the scrimmage at Portumna the place is peaceable."

"Who died lately, in the neighborhood?'

"The widow Macbride, yer honor."

"Could n't they take her up again, Peter? My friend here never saw a wake."

"I'm afereed not; for it was the boys roasted her, and she would n't be a decent corpse for to show a stranger," said Peter in a whisper."

Mr. Prettyman shuddered at these peaceful indications of the neighborhood, and said nothing."

"Well, then, Peter, tell Jimmy Divine to take the old musket in my bed-room, and go over to the Clunagh bog: he can't go wrong: there's twelve families there that never pay a half-penny rent; and when it's done, let him give notice to the neighborhood, and we 'll have a rousing wake."

"You do n't mean, Mr. Macnamara—you do n't mean to say——," stammered out the cockney, with a face like a ghost."

"I only mean to say," said Phil, laughing, 'that you're keeping the decanter very long at your right hand.'

Burke contrived to interpose before the Englishman could ask any explanation of what he had just heard, and for some minutes he could only wait in impatient anxiety, when a loud report of a gun close beside the house attracted the attention of the guests: the next moment old Peter entered, his face radiant with smiles."

"Well, what's that?" said Macnamara."

"Twas Jimmy, yer honor: as the evening was rainy, he said he'd take one of the neighbors, and he had n't to go far; for Andy Moore was going home, and he brought him down at once."

"Did he shoot him?" said Mr. Prettyman, while cold perspiration broke over his forehead. 'Did he murder the man?'

"Sorra murder," said Peter disdainfully; 'but why would n't he shoot him when the master bid him?'

"I need n't tell you more, Charley; but in ten minutes after, feigning some excuse to leave the room, the terrified cockney took flight, and offering twenty guineas for a horse to convey him to Athlone, he left Galway, fully convinced 'that they do n't yet know us on the other side of the channel.'"

CHAPTER XIII.—The Journey.

The election concluded—the turmoil and excitement of the contest over—all was fast resuming its accustomed routine around us, when one morning my uncle informed me that I was at length to leave my native county, and enter upon the great world as a student of Trinity College, Dublin. Although long since in expectation of this eventful change, it was with no slight feeling of emotion I contemplated the step, which, removing me at once from all my early friends and associations, was to surround me with new companions and new influences, and place before me very different objects of ambition from those I had hitherto been regarding.

My destiny had been long ago decided; the army had had its share of the family, who brought little more back with them from the wars, than a short allowance of members and shattered constitutions; the navy had proved on more than one occasion, that the fate of the O'Malleys did not incline to hanging; so that, in Irish estimation but one alternative remained, and that was the bar. Besides, as my uncle remarked with great truth and foresight, "Charley will be tolerably independent of the public, at all events; for, even if they never send him a brief, there's law enough the family to last his time"—a rather novel reason, by the bye, for making a man a lawyer, and which induced Sir Harry, with his usual clearness, to observe to me, "Upon my conscience, boy, you are in luck: if there had been a Bible in the house, I firmly believe he'd have made you a parson."

Considine alone, of all my uncle's advisers, did not concur in this determination respecting me. He set forth, with an eloquence that certainly converted me, that my head was better calculated for bearing hard knocks, than unravelling knotty points; that a shako would become it infinitely better than a wig; and declared roundly, that a boy who began so well, and had such very pretty notions about shooting, was positively thrown away in the Four Courts. My uncle, however, was firm; and as old Sir Harry supported him, the day was decided against us, Considine murmuring, as he left the room, something that did not seem quite a brilliant anticipation of the success awaiting me in my legal career. As for myself, though only a silent spectator of the debate, all my wishes were with the Count. From my earliest boyhood a military life had been my strongest desire: the roll of the drum, and the shrill fife that played through the little village, with its ragged troop of recruits following, had charms for me I cannot describe; and, had a choice been allowed me, I would infinitely rather have been a sergeant in the dragoons, than one of his Majesty's learned in the law. If, then, such had been the cherished feeling of many a year, how much more strongly were my aspirations heightened by the events of the last few days. The tone of superiority I had witnessed in Hammerly, whose conduct to me at parting had placed him high in esteem—the quiet contempt of civilians, implied in a thousand sly ways—the exalted estimation of his own profession, at once wounded my pride and stimulated my ambition; and, lastly, more than all, the avowed preference that Lucy Dashwood evinced for a military life, were stronger allies than my own conviction needed, to make me long for the army. So completely did the thought possess me, that I felt, if I were not a soldier, I cared not what became of me. Life had no other object for me than military renown, no other success for which I cared to struggle, or would value when obtained. Aut Caesar aut nullus, thought I; and when my uncle determined I should be a lawyer, I neither murmured nor objected, but hugged myself in the prophecy of Considine, that hinted pretty broadly, "the devil a stupider fellow ever opened a brief; but he'd have made a slashing light dragoon."

The preliminaries were not long in arranging. It was settled that I should be immediately despatched to Dublin, to the care of Doctor Mooney, then a junior Fellow in the University, who would take me into his especial charge; while Sir Harry was to furnish me with a letter to his old friend Dr. Barret, whose advice and assistance he estimated at a very high price. Provided with such documents, I was informed that the gates of knowledge were more than half ajar for me, without an effort upon my part. One only portion of all the arrangements I heard with any thing like pleasure; it was decided that my man Mickey was to accompany me to Dublin, and remain with me during my stay.

It was upon a clear sharp morning in January, of the year 18—, that I took my place upon the box-seat of the old Galway Mail, and set out on my journey. My heart was depressed, and my spirits were miserably low. I had all that feeling of sadness which leave-taking inspires, and no sustaining prospect to cheer me in the distance. For the first time in my life, I had seen a tear glisten in my poor uncle's eye, and heard his voice falter as he said "farewell!" Notwithstanding the difference of age, we had been perfectly companions together; and, as I thought now over all the thousand kindnesses and affectionate instances of his love I had received, my heart gave way, and the tears coursed slowly down my cheeks. I turned to give one last look at the tall chimneys and the old woods, my earliest friends; but a turn of the road had shut out the prospect, and thus I took my leave of Galway.

My friend Mickey, who sat behind with the guard, participated but little in my feelings of regret. The potatoes in the metropolis could scarcely be as wet as the lumpers in Scariff; he had heard that whisky was not dearer, and looked forward to the other delights of the capital with a longing heart. Meanwhile, resolved that no portion of his career should be lost, he was lightening the road by anecdote and song, and had an audience of four people, a very crusty-looking old guard included, in roars of laughter. Mike had contrived, with his usual savoir faire, to make himself very agreeable to an extremely pretty-looking country girl, around whose waist he had most lovingly passed his arm, under pretence of keeping her from falling, and to whom in the midst of all his attentions to the party at large, he devoted himself considerably, pressing his suit with all the aid of his native minstrelsy.

"Hould me tight, Miss Matilda, dear."

"My name's Mary Brady, av ye please."

"Ay, and I do please."

"Oh, Mary Brady, you are my darlin',
You are my looking-glass from night till morning;
I'd rather have ye without one farthen,
Nor Shuey Gallagher and her house and garden."

"May I never av I wouldn't then, and ye need n't be laughing."

"Is his honor at home?"

This speech was addressed to a gaping country fellow, that leaned on his spade to see the coach pass.

"Is his honor at home? I've something for him from Mr. Davern."

Mickey well knew that few western gentlemen were without constant intercourse with the Athlone attorney. The poor countryman accordingly hastened through the fence, and pursued the coach with all speed for above a mile, Mike pretending all the time to be in the greatest anxiety for his overtaking them; until at last, as he stopped in despair, a hearty roar of laughter told him that, in Mickey's parlance, he was "sould."

"Taste it, my dear: devil a harm it'll do ye; it never paid the king's sixpence."

Here he filled a little horn vessel from a black bottle he carried, accompanying the action with a song, the air to which, if any of my readers feel disposed to sing it, I may observe, bore a resemblance to the well known, "a fig for St. Denis of France."

"POTTEEN, GOOD LUCK TO YE, DEAR."

"Av I was a monarch in state;

Like Romulus or Julius Caysar,

With the best of fine victuals to eat,

And drink, like great Nebuchadnezzar,

A rasher of bacon I'd have,

And potatoes the finest was seen, sir;

And for drink it's no claret I'd crave,

But a keg of ould Mullens' pottteen, sir,

With the smell of the smoke on it still.

"They talk of the Romans of ould,

Whom they say in their own times was frisky;

But, trust me, to keep out the cowl'd

The Romans at home here like whisky.

Sure it warms both the head and the heart,

It's the soul of all readin' and writin';

It teaches both science and art,

And disposes both for love or for fightin'.

Oh, pottteen, good luck to ye, dear."

This very classic production, and the black bottle which accompanied it, completely established the singer's pre-eminence in the company; and I heard sundry sounds resembling drinking, with frequent good wishes to the provider of the feast. "Long life to ye, Mr. Free," "Your health and inclinations, Mr. Free," &c.; to which Mr. Free responded, by drinking those of the company, "av they were virtuous." The amicable relations thus happily established, promised a very lasting reign, and would, doubtless, have enjoyed such, had not a slight incident occurred, which for a brief season interrupted them. At the village where we stopped to breakfast, three very venerable figures presented themselves for places in the inside of the coach: they were habited in black coats, breeches, and gaiters, wore hats of a very ecclesiastic breadth in their brim, and had altogether the peculiar air and bearing which distinguishes their calling, being no less than three Roman Catholic prelates on their way to Dublin to attend a convocation. While Mickey and his friends, with the ready tact which every low Irishman possesses, immediately perceived who and what these worshipful individuals were, another traveller, who had just assumed his place on the outside, participated but little in the feelings of reverence so manifestly displayed, but gave a saucer of a very ominous kind, as the skirt of the last black coat disappeared within the coach. This latter individual was a short, thick-set, bandy-legged man, of about fifty, with an enormous nose, which, whatever its habitual coloring, on the morning in question was of a brilliant purple. He wore a blue coat, with bright buttons, upon which some letters were inscribed, and around his neck was fastened a ribbon of the same color, to which a medal was attached. This he displayed with something of ostentation, whenever an opportunity occurred, and seemed altogether a person who possessed a most satisfactory impression of his own importance. In fact, had not this feeling been participated in by others, Mr. Billy Crow would never have been deputed by No. 13,476 to carry their warrant down to the west country, and establish the nucleus of an Orange Lodge in the town of Foxleigh; such being, in brief, the reason why he, a very well known manufacturer of "leather continuations" in Dublin, had ventured upon the perilous journey from which he was now returning. Billy was going on his way to town rejoicing, for he had had a most brilliant success; the brethren had feasted and feted him; he had made several splendid orations, with the usual number of prophecies about the speedy downfall of Romanism; the inevitable return of Protestant ascendancy; the pleasing prospect that, with increased effort and improved organization, they should soon be able to have every thing their own way, and clear the green isle of the horrible vermin St. Patrick forgot, when banishing the others; and that, if Daniel O'Connell, (whom might the Lord confound,) could only be hanged, and Sir Harcourt Lees made primate of all Ireland there were still some hopes of peace and prosperity to the country.

Mr. Crow had no sooner assumed his place upon the coach than he saw that he was in the camp of the enemy. Happily for all parties, indeed, in Ireland, political differences have so completely stamped the externals of each party, that he must be a man of small penetration, who cannot, in the first five minutes he is thrown among strangers, calculate with considerable certainty, whether it will be more conducive to his happiness to sing, "Croppies lie down," or "the battle of Ross." As for Billy Crow, long life to him, you might as well attempt to pass a turkey upon M. Audubon for a giraffe, as endeavor to impose a papist upon him for a true follower of King William. He could have given you more generic distinctions to guide you in the decisions, than ever did Cuvier to designate an antediluvian mammoth; so that no sooner had he seated himself upon the coach, than he buttoned up his great coat, stuck his hands firmly in his side pockets, pursed up his lips, and looked altogether like a man that, feeling himself out of his element, resolves to "bide his time" in patience, until chance may throw him among more congenial associates. Mickey Free, who was himself no mean proficient in reading a character, at one glance saw his man, and began hammering his brains to see if he could not overreach him. The small portmanteau which contained Billy's wardrobe, bore the conspicuous announcement of his name; and, as Mickey could read, this was one important step already gained.

He accordingly took the first opportunity of seating himself beside him, and opened the conversation by some very polite observation upon the other's wearing apparel, which is always, in the west, considered a piece of very courteous attention. By degrees the dialogue prospered, and Mickey began to make some very important revelations about himself and his master, intimating that the "state of the country" was such that a man of his way of thinking had no peace or quiet in it.

"That's him there, forment ye," said Mickey, "and a better Protestant never hated mass. Ye understand."

"What!" said Billy, unbuttoning the collar of his coat, to get a fairer view of his companion; "why I thought you were—"

Here he made some resemblance of the usual manner of blessing oneself.

"Me, devil a more nor yourself, Mr. Crow."

"Why, do you know me too?"

"Troth, more knows you than you think."

Billy looked very much puzzled at all this; at last he said—

"And ye tell me that your master there 's the right sort?"

"Thru' blue," said Mike, with a wink, "and so is his uncles."

"And where are they, when they are at home?"

"In Galway, no less; but they're here now."

"Where?"

"Here."

At these words he gave a knock of his heel to the coach as if to intimate their "whereabouts."

"You do n't mean in the coach—do ye?"

"To be sure, I do; and troth you can't know much of the west, av ye do n't know the three Mr. Trenchers of Tallybush! them's they."

"You do n't say so?"

"Faix, but I do."

"May I never drink the 12th July, if I did n't think they were priests."

"Priests!" said Mickey, in a roar of laughter, "priests!"

"Just priests."

"Begorra, though, ye had better keep that to yourself; for they're not the men to have that same said to them."

"Of course, I would n't offend them," said Mr. Crow; "faith, it's not me would cast reflections upon such real out-and-outers as they are. And where are they going now?"

"To Dublin straight; there's to be a grand lodge next week; but sure Mr. Crow knows better than me."

Billy after this became silent. A moody reverie seemed to steal over him, and he was evidently displeased with himself for his want of tact in not discovering the three Mr. Trenchers of Tallybush, though he only caught sight of their backs.

Mickey Free interrupted not the frame of mind in which he saw conviction was slowly working its way, but by gently humming, in an under tone, the loyal melody of "Croppies lie down," fanned the flame he had so dexterously kindled. At length they reached the small town of Kinneagad. While the coach changed horses, Mr. Crow lost not a moment in descending from the top, and, rushing into the little inn, disappeared for a few moments. When he again issued forth, he carried a smoking tumbler of whisky punch, which he continued to stir with a spoon. As he approached the coach-door he tapped gently with his knuckles, upon which the reverend prelate of Matonia, or Mesopotamia, I forget which, inquired what he wanted.

"I ask your pardon, gentlemen," said Billy, "but I thought I'd make bold to ax you to taste something warm, this cold day."

"Many thanks, my good friend; but we never do," said a bland voice from within.

"I understand," said Billy, with a sly wink; "but there are circumstances now and then—and one might for the honor of the case, you know. Just put it to your lips, wont you?"

"Excuse me," said a very rosy-cheeked little prelate; "but nothing stronger than water."

"Botheration," thought Billy, as he regarded the speaker's nose. But I thought, said he aloud, "that you would not refuse this."

Here he made a peculiar manifestation in the air, which, whatever respect and reverence it might carry to the honest brethren of 13,476, seemed only to increase the wonder and astonishment of the bishops.

"What does he mean?" said one.

"Is he mad?" said another.

"Tear-and-ages," said Mr. Crow, getting quite impatient at the slowness of his friends' perception, "tear-and-ages, I'm one of yourselves."

"One of us," said the three in chorus, "one of us?"

"Ay, to be sure," here he took a long pull at the punch; "to be sure I am; here's 'no surrender,' your souls! whoop"—a loud yell accompanying the toast as he drank it.

"Do you mean to insult us?" said Father P—.

"Guard, take this fellow."

"Are we to be outraged in this manner?" chorused the priests.

"July the First, in Oldbridge town," sung Billy, "and here it is, 'the glorious, pious, and immortal memory, of the great, and good'—"

"Guard! where is the guard?"

"And good King William, that saved us from popery!"

"Coachman! guard!" screamed Father—.

"Brass money!"

"Policemen! policemen!" shouted the priests.

"Brass-money and wooden shoes," devil may care who hears me," said Billy, who, supposing that the three Mr. Trenchers were skulking the avowal of their principles, resolved to assert the pre-eminence of the great cause, single-handed and alone.

"Here's the Pope in the pillory, and the devil pelting him with priests."

At these words a kick from behind apprized the loyal champion that a very ragged auditory, who, for some time past, had not well understood the gist of his eloquence, had at length comprehended enough to be angry. Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte, certainly, in an Irish row. "The merest urchin may light the train; one handful of mud often ignites a shindy that ends in a most bloody battle;" and here, no sooner did the vis a tergo impel Billy forward, than a severe rap of a closed fist in the eye, drove him back; and in one instant he became the centre to a periphery of kicks, cuffs, pullings, and haulings, that left the poor deputy guard not only orange, but blue.

He fought manfully, but numbers carried the day; and, when the coach drove off, which it did at last without him, the last thing visible to the outsiders was the figure of Mr.

Crow, whose hat, minus the crown, had been driven over his head, down upon his neck, where it remained like a dress cravat, buffeting a mob of ragged vagabonds, who had so completely metamorphosed the unfortunate man with mud and bruises, that a committee of the grand lodge might actually have been unable to identify him.

As for Mickey and his friends behind, their mirth knew no bounds; and, except the respectable insides, there was not an individual about the coach who ceased to think of, and laugh at the incident, till we arrived in Dublin, and drew up at the Hibernian, in Dawson street.

CHAPTER XIV....Dublin.

No sooner had I arrived in Dublin, than my first care was to present myself to Dr. Mooney, by whom I was received in the most cordial manner. In fact, in my utter ignorance of such persons, I had imagined a College-fellow to be a character necessarily severe and unbending; and, as the only two very great people I had ever seen in my life were the Archbishop of Tuam, and the Chief Baron, when on circuit, I pictured to myself that a University-fellow was, in all probability, a cross between the two, and feared him accordingly.

The Doctor read over my uncle's letter attentively, invited me to partake of his breakfast, and then entered upon something like an account of the life before me, for which Sir Harry Boyle had, however, in some degree prepared me.

"Your uncle, I find, wishes you to live in college; perhaps it is better, too; so that I must look out for chambers for you. Let me see: it will be rather difficult, just now, to find them." Here he fell for some moments into a musing fit, and merely muttered a few broken sentences, as, "To be sure, if other chambers could be had—but then—and, after all, perhaps, as he is young—besides, Frank will certainly be expelled before long, and then he will have them all to himself. I say, O'Malley, I believe I must quarter you for the present with a rather wild companion; but, as your uncle says you're a prudent fellow"—here he smiled very much, as if my uncle had not said any such thing—"why, you must only take the better care of yourself, until we can make some better arrangement. My pupil, Frank Webber, is at this moment in want of a 'chum,' as the phrase is; his last three having only been domesticated with him for as many weeks; so that, until we find you a more quiet resting-place, you may take up your abode with him."

During breakfast, the Doctor proceeded to inform me that my destined companion was a young man of excellent family and good fortune, who, with very considerable talents and acquirements, preferred a life of rackets and careless dissipation to prospects of great success in public life, which his connexion and family might have secured for him; that he had been originally entered at Oxford, which he was obliged to leave; then tried Cambridge, from which he escaped expulsion by being rusticated, that is, having incurred a sentence of temporary banishment; and lastly, was endeavoring, with what he himself believed to be a total reformation, to stumble on to a degree in the "silent sister."

"This is his third year," said the Doctor, "and he is only a freshman, having lost every examination, with abilities enough to sweep the university of its prizes. But, come over, now, and I'll present you to him."

I followed him down stairs, across the court, to an angle of the old square, where, up the first floor, left, to use the college direction, stood the name of Mr. Webber, a large No. 2 being conspicuously painted in the middle of the door, and not over it, as is usually the custom. As we reached the spot, the observations of my companion were lost to me, in the tremendous noise and uproar that resounded from within. It seemed as if a number of people were fighting, pretty much as a banditti, in a melo-drama do, with considerably more of confusion than requisite; a fiddle and a French horn also lent their assistance to shouts and cries, which, to say the best, were not exactly the aids to study I expected in such a place.

Three times was the bell pulled, with a vigor that threatened its downfall, when, at last, as the jingle of it rose above all other noises, suddenly all became hushed and still; a momentary pause succeeded, and the door was opened by a very respectable-looking servant, who, recognising the Doctor, at once introduced us into the apartment where Mr. Webber was sitting.

In a large and very handsomely furnished room, where Brussels carpeting and softly cushioned sofas contrasted strangely with the meagre and comfortless chambers of the Doctor, sat a young man at a small breakfast-table, beside the fire. He was attired in a silk dressing-gown and black velvet slippers, and supported his forehead upon a hand of most lady-like whiteness, whose fingers were absolutely covered with rings of great beauty and price. His long silky brown hair fell in rich profusion upon the back of his neck, and over his arm, and the whole air and attitude was one which a painter might have copied. So intent was he upon the volume before him, that he never raised his head at our approach, but continued to read aloud, totally unaware of our presence.

"Dr. Mooney, sir," said the servant.

"Ton dapamey bominos, prosephe, crione Agamemnon." repeated the student in an ecstasy, and not paying the slightest attention to the announcement.

"Dr. Mooney, sir," repeated the servant in a louder tone, while the Doctor looked around on every side for an explanation of the late uproar, with a face of the most puzzled astonishment.

"Be dakivon para thina doloekosion enkos." said Mr. Webber, finishing a cup of coffee at a draught.

"Well, Webber, hard at work, I see," said the Doctor.

"Ah, Doctor, I beg pardon! Have you been long here?" said the most soft and insinuating voice, while the speaker passed his taper fingers across his brow, as if to dissipate the traces of deep thought and study.

While the Doctor presented me to my future companion, I could perceive in the restless and searching look he threw around, that the fracas he had so lately heard was still an unexplained and vexatous question in his mind.

"May I offer you a cup of coffee, Mr. O'Malley?" said the youth with an air of almost timid bashfulness.

"The Doctor, I know, breakfasts at a very early hour."

"I say, Webber," said the Doctor, who could no longer restrain his curiosity, "what an awful row I heard here as I came up to the door. I thought Bedlam was broke loose. What could it have been?"

"Ah, you heard it, too, sir," said Mr. Webber, smiling most benignly.

"Hear it; to be sure I did. O'Malley and I could not hear ourselves talking with the uproar."

"Yes, indeed, it is very provoking; but, then, what's to be done? One can't complain, under the circumstances."

"Why, what do you mean?" said Mooney, anxiously.

"Nothing, sir; nothing. I'd much rather you'd not ask me: for, after all, I'll change my chambers."

"But why? Explain this at once. I insist upon it!"

"Can I depend upon the discretion of your young friend?" said Mr. Webber, gravely.

"Perfectly," said the Doctor, now wound up to the greatest anxiety to learn a secret.

"And you'll promise not to mention the thing, except among your friends."

"I do," said the Doctor.

"Well, then," said he, in a low and confident whisper, "it's the Dean."

"The Dean?" said Mooney, with a start. "The Dean! Why, how can it be the Dean?"

"Too true," said Mr. Webber, making a sign of drinking; "too true, Doctor. And then, the moment he is so, he begins smashing the furniture. Never was anything heard like it. As for me, as I am now becoming a reading man, I must go elsewhere."

Now, it so chanced that the worthy Dean, who, albeit, a man of most abstemious habits, possessed a nose which, in color and development, was a most unfortunate witness to call to character, and as Mooney heard Webber narrate circumstantially the frightful excesses of the great functionary, I saw that something like conviction was stealing over him.

"You'll, of course, never speak of this, except to your most intimate friends," said Webber.

"Of course not," said the Doctor, as he shook his hand warmly, and prepared to leave the room. "O'Malley, I leave you here," said he; "Webber and you can talk over your arrangements."

Webber followed the Doctor to the door, whispered something in his ear, to which the other replied, "Very well, I will write; but if your father sends the money, I must insist—" the rest was lost in his protestations and professions of the most fervent kind, amid which the door was shut, and Mr. Webber returned to the room.

Short as was the interspace from the door without to the room within, it was still ample enough to effect a thorough and remarkable change in the whole external appearance of Mr. Frank Webber; for, scarcely had the oaken panel shut out the Doctor, when he appeared no longer the shy, timid, and silvery-toned gentlemen of five minutes before; but dashing boldly forward, he seized a key-bugle that lay hid beneath a sofa-cushion, and blew a tremendous blast.

"Come forth, ye demons of the lower world," said he, drawing a cloth from a large table, and discovering the figures of three young men, coiled up beneath. "Come forth, and fear not, most timorous freshmen, that ye are," said he, unlocking a pantry, and liberating two others. "Gentlemen, let me introduce to your acquaintance, Mr. O'Malley. My chum, gentlemen. Mr. O'Malley, this is Harry Nesbit, who has been in the college since the days of old Perpendicular, and numbers more cautious than any man who ever had his name on the books. Here is my particular friend, Cecil Cavendish, the only man who could ever devil kidneys. Captain Power, Mr. O'Malley; a dashing dragon, as you see; aid-de-camp to his excellency the Lord Lieutenant, and love-maker-general to Merriam-square, West."

"These," said he, pointing to the late denizens of the pantry, "are Jibs, whose names are neither known to the proctor nor the police office; but, with due regard to their education and morals, we do not despair."

"By no means," said Power; "but come, let us resume our game." At the words he took a folio atlas of maps from a small table, and displayed beneath, a pack of cards, dealt as if for whist. The two gentlemen to whom I was introduced by name, retired to their places; the unknown two put on their boxing gloves, and all resumed the hilarity which Mr. Mooney's advent had so suddenly interrupted.

"Where's Moore?" said Webber, as he once more seated himself at his breakfast.

"Making a spatch-cock, sir," said the servant. At the same instant a little dapper, jovial looking personage appeared with the dish in question. "Mr. O'Malley, Mr. Moore, the gentleman who by repeated remonstrances to the board has succeeded in getting eatable food for the inhabitants of this penitentiary, and has the honored reputation of reforming the commons of college."

"Any thing to Godfrey O'Malley, may I ask, sir," said Moore.

"His nephew," I replied.

"Which of you winged the gentleman the other day for not passing the decanter, or something of that sort?"

"If you mean the affair with Mr. Bodkin, it was I."

"Glorious that, begad I thought you were one of us. I say, Power, it was he pinked Bodkin."

"Ah, indeed," said Power, not turning his head from his game, "a pretty shot I heard—two by honours—and hit him fairly—the odd trick. Hammerly mentioned the thing to me."

"Oh, is he in town?" said I.

"No, he sailed for Portsmouth yesterday; he is to join the 11th—game—I say, Webber, you've lost the rubber."

"Double or quit, and a dinner at Dunleary," said Webber; "we must show O'Malley—confound the Mister—something of the place."

"Agreed."

The whist was resumed; the boxers, now refreshed by a leg of the spatch-cock, returned to their gloves. Mr. Moore took up his violin, Mr. Webber his French horn, and I was left the only unemployed man in the company.

"I say, Power, you'd better bring the drag over here for us; we can all go down together."

"I must inform you," said Cavendish, "that, thanks to your philanthropic efforts of last night, the passage from Grafton-street to Stephen's Green is impracticable." A tremendous roar of laughter followed this announcement; and, though at the time the cause was unknown to me, I may as well mention it here, as I subsequently learned it from my companions.

Among the many peculiar tastes which distinguished Mr. Francis Webber, was an extraordinary fancy for street-begging; he had, over and over, won large sums upon his success in that difficult walk; and so perfect were his disguises, both of dress, voice, and manner, that he actually, at one time, succeeded in obtaining charity from his very opponent in the wager. He wrote ballads with the greatest facility, and sung them with infinite pathos and humor; and the old woman at the corner of College-green was certain of an audience when the severity of the night would leave all other minstrelsy deserted. As these feats of jonglerie usually terminated in a row, it was a most amusing part of the transaction to see the singer's part taken by the mob against the college men, who, growing impatient to carry him off to supper somewhere, would invariably be obliged to have a fight for the booty.

Now it chanced that a few evenings before, Mr. Webber was returning with a pocket well lined with copper, from a musical reunion he had held at the corner of York-street, when the idea struck him to stop at the end of Grafton-street, where a huge stone grating at the time exhibited, perhaps it exhibits still, the descent to one of the great main sewers of the city.

The light was shining brightly from a pastry-cook's shop, and showed the large bars of stone, between which the muddy water was rushing rapidly down, and plashing in the torrent that ran boisterously several feet beneath.

To stop in the street of any crowded city is, under any circumstances, an invitation to others to do likewise, which is rarely unaccepted; but, when in addition to this, you stand fixedly in one spot, and regard with stern intensity any object near you, the chances are ten to one that you have several companions in your curiosity before a minute expires.

Now, Webber, who had at first stood still, without any peculiar thought in view, no sooner perceived that he was joined by others, than the idea of making something out of it immediately occurred to him.

"What is it, aggra?" inquired an old woman, very much in his own style of dress, pulling at the hood of his cloak.

"And can't you see for yourself, darlin'?" replied he sharply, as he knelt down, and looked most intently at the sewer.

"Are ye long there, avick?" inquired he of an imaginary individual below, and then waiting as if for a reply, said, "Two hours!" "Blessed virgin! he's two hours in the drain!"

By this time the crowd had reached entirely across the street, and the crushing and squeezing to get near the important spot, was awful.

"Where did he come from! who is he! how did he get there?" were questions on every side, and various surmises were afloat, till Webber, rising from his knees, said, in a mysterious whisper to those nearest him, "He's made his escape to-night out o' Newgate by the big drain, and lost his way; he was looking for the Liffey, and took the wrong turn."

To an Irish mob, what appeal could equal this? a culprit, at any time, has his claim upon their sympathy; but let him be caught in the very act of cheating the authorities and evading the law, and his popularity knows no bounds. Webber knew this well, and, as the mob thickened around him, sustained an imaginary conversation that Savage Lander might have envied, imparting now and then such hints concerning the runaway as raised their interest to the highest pitch, and fifty different versions were related on all sides—of the crime he was guilty—the sentence that was passed on him—and the day he was to suffer.

"Do ye see the light, dear," said Webber, as some ingeniously benevolent individual had lowered down a candle with a string; "do you see the light; oh! he's fainted, the creature." A cry of horror from the crowd burst forth at these words, followed by an universal shout of "break open the street."

Pick-axes, shovels, spades, and crow-bars, seemed absolutely the walking accompaniments of the crowd, so suddenly did they appear upon the field of action, and the work of exhumation was begun with a vigor that speedily covered nearly half of the street with mud and paving stones; parties relieved each other at the task, and, ere half an hour, a hole, capable of containing a mail coach was yawning in one of the most frequented thoroughfares of Dublin. Meanwhile, as no appearance of the culprit could be had, dreadful conjectures as to his fate began to gain ground. By this time the authorities had received intimation of what was going forward, and attempted to disperse the crowd; but Webber, who still continued to conduct the prosecution, called on them to resist the police, and save the poor creature; and now began a most terrific fray, the stones forming a ready weapon, were hurled at the unprepared constables, who, on their side, fought manfully, but against superior numbers; so that, at last, it was only by the aid of a military force the mob could be dispersed, and a riot, which had assumed a very serious character, got under. Meanwhile, Webber had reached his chambers and changed his costume, and was relating over a supper-table, the narrative of his philanthropy to a very admiring circle of friends.

Such was my chum, Frank Webber, and as this was the first anecdote I had heard of him, I relate it here that my readers may be in possession of the grounds upon which my opinion of that celebrated character was founded, while yet our acquaintance was in its infancy.

CHAPTER XV....Captain Power.

Within a few weeks after my arrival in town, I had become a matriculated student of the university, and the possessor of chambers within its walls, in conjunction with the sage and prudent gentleman I have introduced to my readers in the last chapter. Had my intentions on entering college been of the most studious and regular kind, the companion into whose society I was then immediately thrown, would have quickly dissipated them. He voted morning chapels a bore, Greek lectures a humbug, examination a farce, and pronounced the statute book, with its attendant train of fines and punishment, an "unclean thing." With all my country habits and predilections fresh upon me, that I was an easily won disciple to his code need not be wondered at, and indeed, ere many days had passed over, my thorough indifference to all college rules and re-ulations had given me a high place in the esteem of Webber and his friends. As for myself, I was most agreeably surprised to find that what I had looked forward to as a very melancholy banishment, was likely to prove a most agreeable sojourn. Under Webber's directions, there was no hour of the day that hung heavily upon our hands: we rose about eleven, and breakfasted; after which succeeded fencing, sparring, billiards, or tennis in the park; about three got on horseback, and either cantered in the Phoenix or about the squares till visiting time; after which made our calls, and then dressed for dinner, which we never thought of taking at commons, but had it from Morrison's—we both being reported sick in the Dean's list, and thereby exempt from the meagre fare of the fellow's table. In the evening our occupations became still more pressing; there were balls, suppers, whist parties, rows at the theatre, shindies in the street, devilled drumsticks at Hayes's, select oyster parties at the Carlingford; in fact, every known method of remaining up all night, and appearing both pale and penitent the following morning.

Webber had a large acquaintance in Dublin, and soon made me known to them all; among others, the officers of the—Light Dragoons, in which regiment Power was a captain, were his particular friends, and we had frequent invitations to dine at their mess. There it was that military life presented itself to me, in its most attractive possible form, and heightened the passion I had already so strongly conceived for the army. Power, above all others, took my fancy: he was a gay, dashing-looking, handsome fellow, of about eight-and-twenty, who had already seen some service, having joined while his regiment was in Portugal; was in heart and soul a soldier; and had that species of pride and enthusiasm in all that regarded a military career that form no small part of the charm in the character of a young officer.

I sat near him the second day we dined at the mess, and was much pleased at many slight attentions in his manner toward me. "I called on you to-day, Mr. O'Malley," said he, "in company with a friend, who is most anxious to see you."

"Indeed," said I, "I did not hear of it."

"We left no cards either of us, as we were determined to make you out on another day; my companion has most urgent reasons for seeing you—I see you are puzzled," said he; "and although I promised to keep his secret, I must blab: it was Sir George Dashwood was with me; he told us of your most romantic adventure in the west, and, faith, there is no doubt you saved the lady's life."

"Was she worth the trouble of it?" said the old Major, whose conjugal experience imparted a very crusty tone to the question.

"I think," said I, "I need only tell her name to convince you of it."

"Here's a bumper to her," said Power, filling his glass; "and every true man will follow my example."

When the hip, hiping which followed the toast was over, I found myself enjoying no small share of the attention of the party as the deliverer of Lucy Dashwood.

"Sir George is cudgelling his brain to show his gratitude to you," said Power.

"What a pity, for the sake of his peace of mind, that you're not in the army," said another; "it's so easy to show a man a delicate regard by a quick promotion."

"A devil of a pity for his own sake too," said Power, again; "they're going to make a lawyer of as strapping a fellow as ever carried a sabretash."

"A lawyer!" cried out half a dozen together, pretty much with the same tone and emphasis as though he had said a two-penny postman; "the devil they are."

"Cut the service at once: you'll get no promotion in it," said the Colonel, a fellow with a black eye like you would look much better at the head of a squadron than a string of witnesses. Trust me, you'd shine more in conducting a picquet than a prosecution."

"But if I can't?" said I.

"Then take my plan," said Power, "and make it cut you—"

"Yours," said two or three in a breath; "yours?"

"Ay, mine; did you never know that I was bred to the bar? Come, come, if it was only for O'Malley's use and benefit—as we say in the parchments—I must tell you the story."

The claret was pushed briskly round, chairs drawn up to fill any vacant spaces, and Power began his story.

"As I am not over long-winded, don't be scared at my beginning my history somewhat far back. I began life, that most unlucky of all earthly contrivances for supplying casualties in case any thing may befall the heir of the house—a species of domestic jury-mast, only lagged out in a gale of wind—a younger son. My brother Tom, a thick-skulled, pudding-headed dog, that had no taste for any thing, save his dinner, took it into his wise head one morning, that he would go into the army, and, although I had been originally destined for a soldier, no sooner was his choice made than all regard for my taste and inclinations was forgotten; and, as the family interest was only enough for one, it was decided that I should be put in what is called a 'learned profession,' and let push my fortune. 'Take your choice, Dick,' said my father, with a most benign smile, 'take your choice, boy: will you be a lawyer, a parson, or a doctor?'

"Had he said, 'Will you be put in the stocks, the pillory, or publicly whipped,' I could not have looked more blank than at the question."

"As a decent Protestant, he should have grudged me to the church; as a philanthropist, he might have scrupled at making me a physician; but, as he had lost deeply by law-suits, there looked something very like a lurking malice in sending me to the bar. Now so far I concurred with him, for having no gift for enduring either sermons or senna, I thought I'd make a bad administrator of either, and, as I was ever regarded in the family as rather of a shrewd and quick turn, with a very natural taste for roguery, I began to believe he was right, and that nature intended me for the circuit."

"From the hour my vocation was pronounced, it had been happy for the family that they could have got rid of me. A certain ambition to rise in my profession laid hold on me, and I meditated all day and night how I was to get on. Every trick, every subtle invention to cheat the enemy that I could read of, I treasured up carefully, being fully impressed with the notion, that roguery meant law, and equity was only another name for odd and even."

"My days were spent haranguing special juries of house-maids and laundresses, cross-examining the cook, charging the under-butler, and passing sentence of death upon the pantry boy, who, I may add, was invariably hanged when the court rose."

"If the mutton were overdone, or the turkey burned, I drew up an indictment against old Margaret, and against the kitchen-maid as accomplice; and the family hungered while I harangued; and, in fact, into such disrepute did I bring the legal profession, by the score of annoyance of which I made it the vehicle, that my father got a kind of holy horror of law courts, judges, and crown solicitors, and absented himself from the assizes the same year, for which, being a high sheriff, he paid a penalty of £500."

"The next day I was sent off in disgrace to Dublin to begin my career in college, and eat the usual quartos and folios of beef and mutton which qualify a man for the Wool-sack."

"Years rolled over, in which, after an ineffectual effort to get through college, the only examination I ever got, being a jubilee for the king's birth-day, I was at length called to the Irish bar, and saluted by my friends as Counsellor Power. The whole thing was so like a joke to me, that it kept me in laughter for three terms, and in fact it was the best thing could happen me, for I had nothing else to do. The hall of the Four Courts was a very pleasant lounge, plenty of agreeable fellows that never earned sixpence, or were likely to do so. Then the circuits were so many country excursions, that supplied fun of one kind or other, but no profit. As for me, I was what is called a good junior: I knew how to look after the waiter, to inspect the decanting of the wine, and the airing of the claret, and was always attentive to the father of the circuit, the cross-st old villain that ever was a King's counsel. These eminent qualities, and my being able to sing a song in honor of our own bar, were recommendations enough to make me a favorite, and I was one."

"Now the reputation I obtained was pleasant enough at first, but somehow I wondered that I never got a brief. Somehow, if it rained civil bills or declarations, devil a one would fall upon my head, and it seemed as if the only object I had in life was to accompany the circuit, a kind of deputy-assistant-commissary-general, never expected to come into action. To be sure, I was not alone in misfortune: there were several promising youths who cut great figures in Trinity, in the same predicament, the only difference being, that they attributed to jealousy, what I suspected was forgetfulness, for I don't think a single attorney in Dublin knew one of us."

"Two years passed over, and then I walked the hall with a bag filled with newspapers, to look like briefs, and was regularly called by two or three criers from one court to the other. It never took: even when I used to seduce a country friend to visit the courts, and get him into an animated conversation, in a corner between two pillars, devil a one would believe him to be a client, and I was fairly nonplused."

"How is a man ever to distinguish himself in such a walk as this? was my eternal question to myself every morning as I put on my wig. My face is as well known here as Lord Manners': every one says, 'How are you, Dick?' 'How goes it, Power?' but except Holmes, that said one morning as he passed me, 'Eh, always busy,' no one alluded to the possibility of my having anything to do."

"If I only could get a footing, thought I, Lord how I'd astonish them, as the song says—

'Perhaps a recruit,
Might chance to shoot
Great General Bonaparté.'

So said I to myself, I'll make these halls ring for it some day or other, if the occasion ever presents itself. But, faith, it seemed as if some cunning solicitor overheard me, and told his associates, for they avoided me like a leprosy. The home circuit I had adopted for some time past, for the very palpable reason that, being near town, it was least expense, and it had all the advantage of any other for me, in getting me nothing to do. Well, one morning we were in Philipstown; I was lying awake in bed, thinking how long it would be before I'd sum up resolution to cut the bar, where certainly my prospects were not the most cheering, when some one tapped gently at the door."

"Come in," said I.

"The waiter opened gently, and held out his hand with a large roll of paper tied round with a piece of red tape."

"Counsellor," says he, "handsel."

"What do you mean?" said I, jumping out of bed, "what is it, you villain?"

"A brief."

"A brief; so I see, but it's for Counsellor Kinshella, below stairs." That was the first name written on it.

"Bothershin," said he, "Mr. McGrath bid me give it to you carefully."

By this time I had opened the envelope, and read my own name at full length as junior counsel in the important case of Monaghan v. McShane, to be tried in the record court, at Ballinasloe. "That will do," said I, flinging it on the bed with a careless air, as if it were a very every-day matter with me.

"But Counsellor, darlin', give us a thrille to drink your health, with your first cause, and the Lord send you plenty of them."

"My first," said I, with a smile of most ineffable compassion at his simplicity, "I'm worn out with them: do you know, Peter, I was thinking seriously of leaving the bar, when you came into the room? Upon my conscience, it's in earnest I am."

"Peter believed me, I think, for I saw him give a very peculiar look as he pocketed his half-crown and left the room."

"The door was scarcely closed when I gave way to the free transport of my ecstasy; there it lay at last, the long-looked-for, long-wished-for object of all my happiness, and though I well knew that a junior counsel has about as much to do in the conducting of a case as a rusty handspike has in a naval engagement, yet I suffered not such thoughts to mar the current of my happiness. There was my name in conjunction with the two mighty leaders on the circuit, and though they each pocketed a hundred, I doubt very much if they received their briefs with one half the satisfaction. My joy at length a little subdued, I opened the roll of paper, and began carefully to peruse about fifty pages of narrative regarding a water-course that once had turned a mill; but, for some reasons doubtless known to itself or its friends, would do so no longer, and thus set two respectable neighbors at loggerheads, and involved them in a record that had now been heard three several times."

"Quite forgetting the subordinate part I was destined to fill, I opened the case in a most flowery oration, in which I descanted upon the benefits accruing to mankind from water-communication since the days of Noah; remarked upon the antiquity of mills, and especially of millers, and consumed half an hour in a preamble of generalities that I hoped would make a very considerable impression upon the court. Just at the critical moment when I was about to enter more particularly in the case, three or four of the great unbrieffed came rattling into my room, and broke in upon the oration."

"I say, Power," said one; "come and have an hour's skating on the canal, the courts are filled, and we shan't be missed."

"Skate, my dear friend," said I, in a most dolorous tone, "out of the question; see I am chained to a devilish knotty case with Kinshella and Mills."

"Confound your humbugging," said another, "that may do very well in Dublin for the attorneys, but not with us."

"I do n't well understand you," I replied; "there is the brief. Henesy expects me to report upon it this evening, and I am so hurried."

"Here a very chorus of laughing broke forth, in which, after several vain efforts to resist, I was forced to join, and kept it up with the others."

"When our mirth was over, my friends scrutinized the red-tape-tied packet and pronounced it a real brief, with a degree of surprise that certainly augured little for their familiarity with such objects of natural history."

"When they had left the room, I leisurely examined the all important document, spreading it out before me upon the table, and surveying it as a newly anointed sovereign might be supposed to contemplate a map of his dominions."

"At last," said I to myself, "at last, and here is the foot-step to the wool-sack." For more than an hour I sat motionless, my eyes fixed upon the outspread paper, lost in a maze of reverie. The ambition which disappointments had crushed and delay had chilled, came suddenly back, and all my day-dreams of legal success, my cherished aspirations after silk gowns, and patents of precedence, rushed once more upon me, and I resolved to do or die. Alas! a very little reflection showed me that the latter was perfectly practicable; but that, as a junior counsel, five minutes of very commonplace recitation was all my province, and with the main business of the day I had about as much to do as the call-boy of a play-house has with the success of a tragedy."

"My lord, this is an action brought by Timothy Higgins, &c. and down I go, no more to be remembered and thought of, than if I had never existed. How different it would be were I the leader! Zounds, how I would worry the witnesses, browbeat the evidence, cajole the jury, and soften the judges! If the Lord were, in his mercy, to remove old Mills and Kinshella, before Tuesday, who knows but my fortune might be made? This supposition once started, set me speculating upon all the possible chances that might cut off two king's counsel in the three days, and left me fairly convinced that my own elevation was certain, were they only removed from my path."

"For two whole days, the thought never left my mind; and, on the evening of the second day, I sat moodily over my pint of port, in the Clonbrock Arms, with my friend Timothy Casey, Captain in the North Cork militia, for my companion."

"Fred," said Tim, "take off your wine, man. When does this confounded trial come on?"

"To-morrow," said I, with a deep groan.

"Well, well, and if it does, what matter?" he said; "you'll do well enough, never be afraid."

"Alas!" said I, "you don't understand the cause of my depression." I here entered upon an account of my sorrows, which lasted for above an hour, and only concluded, just as a tremendous noise in the street without announced an arrival. For several minutes, such was the excitement in the house, such running hither and thither—such confusion, and such hubbub, that we could not make out who had arrived."

"At last a door opened quite near us, and we saw the waiter assisting a very portly-looking gentleman off with his great-coat, assuring him the while, that if he would walk into the coffee-room for ten minutes, the fire in his apartment should be got ready. The stranger accordingly entered and seated himself at the fire-place, having never noticed that Casey and myself—the only persons there—were in the room."

"I say, Phil, who is he?" inquired Casey of the waiter. "Counsellor Mills, Captain," said the waiter, and left the room."

"That's your friend," said Casey.

"I see," said I; "and I wish, with all my heart, he was at home with his pretty wife, in Leeson-street."

"Is she good-looking?" inquired Tim.

"Devil a better, said I, 'and he's as jealous as Old Nick.'"

"Hem," said Tim, "mind your cue, and I'll give him a start." Here he suddenly changed his whispering tone for one in a louder key, and resumed: "I say, Power, it will make some work for you lawyers. But who can she be? that's the question." Here he took a much crumpled letter from his pocket, and pretended to read.—"A great sensation was created in the neighbourhood of Merriem-square, yesterday, by the sudden disappearance from her house, of the handsome Mrs. —. Confound it—what's the name?—what a hand he writes! Hill or Miles, or something like that—the lady of an eminent barrister, now on circuit. The gay Lothario is, they say, the Hon. George —."

I was so thunderstruck at the rashness of the stroke, I could say nothing; while the old gentleman started as if he had sat down on a pin. Casey, meanwhile, went on—

"Hell and fury," said the king's counsel, rushing over, "what is it you are saying?"

"You appear warm, old gentleman," said Casey, putting up the letter and rising from the table."

"Show me that letter; show me that infernal letter, sir, this instant!"

"Show you my letter," said Casey; "cool that, any how; you are certainly a good one."

"Do you know me, sir? answer me that!"—said the lawyer, bursting with passion.

"Not at present," said Tim, quietly; "but I hope to do so in the morning, in explanation of your language and conduct. A tremendous ringing of the bell here summoned the waiter to the room."

"Who is that?" inquired the lawyer. The epithet he judged it safe to leave unsaid, as he pointed to Casey.

"Captain Casey, sir; the commanding officer here."

"Just so," said Casey, "and very much at your service, any hour after five in the morning."

"Then you refuse, sir, to explain the paragraph I have just heard you read?"

"Well done, old gentleman; so you have been listening to a private conversation I held with my friend here. In that case we had better retire to our room;" so saying he ordered the waiter to send a fresh bottle and glasses to No. 14, and taking my arm, very politely wished Mr. Mills a good night, and left the coffee-room.

"Before we had reached the top of the stairs, the house was once more in commotion. The new arrival had ordered out fresh horses, and was hurrying every one in his impatience to get away. In ten minutes the chaise rolled off from the door; and Casey, putting his head out of the window, wished him a pleasant journey: while turning to me, he said:

"There's one of them out of the way for you, if we are even obliged to fight the other."

"The port was soon despatched, and with it went all the scruples of conscience I had at first felt for the cruel ruse we had just practised. Scarcely was the other bottle called for, when we heard the landlord calling out, in a stentorian voice:

"Two horses, for Goron-bridge, to meet Counsellor Kinshella."

"That's the other fellow," said Casey.

"It is," said I.

"Then we must be stirring," said he. "Waiter, a chaise and pair, in five minutes—d'ye hear? Power, my boy, I do n't want you; stay here, and study you brief. It's little trouble Counsellor Kinshella will give you in the morning."

"All he would tell me of his plans was, that he did n't mean any serious bodily harm to the counsellor, but that certainly he was not likely to be heard of for twenty-four hours."

"Meanwhile, Power, go in and win, my boy," said he, "such another walk over you may never occur."

"I must not make my story longer. The next morning the great record of Monaghan v. McShane was called on, and, as the senior counsel were not present, the attorney wished a postponement. I, however, was firm; told the court I was quite prepared, and, with such an air of assurance, that I actually puzzled the attorney. The case was accordingly opened by me, in a very brilliant speech, and the witnesses called; but such was my unlucky ignorance of the whole matter, that I actually broke down the testimony of our own, and fought like a Trojan for the credit and character of the perjurers against us! The judge rubbed his eyes—the jury looked amazed—and the whole bar laughed outright. However, on I went, blundering, floundering, and foundering at every step, and, at half-past four, amid the greatest and most uproarious mirth of the whole court, heard the jury deliver a verdict against us, just as old Kinshella rushed into the court covered with mud and splattered with clay. He had been sent for twenty miles to make a will for Mr. Daly of Daly's-mount, who was supposed to be at the point of death, but who, on his arrival, threatened to shoot him for causing an alarm in his family by such an imputation.

"The rest is soon told. They moved for a new trial, and I moved out of the profession. I cut the bar, for it cut me: I joined the gallant 14th as a volunteer, and here I am without a single regret, I must confess, that I did n't succeed in the great record of Monaghan v. McShane."

Once more the claret went briskly round, and while we canvassed Power's story, many an anecdote of military life was told, which every instant extended the charm of that career I longed for.

"Another cooper, Major," said Power.

"With all my heart," said the rosy little officer, as he touched the bell behind him; "and now let's have a song."

"Yes, Power," said three or four together, "let us have 'The Irish Dragoon,' if it's only to convert your friend, O'Malley there."

"Here goes, then," said Dick, taking off a bumper as he began the following chant to the air of "Love is the soul of a gay Irishman":

"THE IRISH DRAGOON."

"Oh, love is the soul of an Irish dragoon
In battle, in bivouac, or in saloon—
From the tip of his spur to his bright sabertache.

With his soldierly gait and his bearing so high,
His gay laughing look, and his light speaking eye,
He frowns at his rival, he ogles his wench,
He springs in his saddle and chassés the French—
With his jingling spur and his bright sabertache.

"His spirits are high, and he little knows care,
Whether sipping his claret, or charging a square—
With his jingling spur and his bright sabertache.

As ready to sing, or to skirmish he's found,
To take off his wine, or take up his ground;
When the bugle may call him, how little he fears,
To charge forth in column, and beat the Mounseers—
With his jingling spur and his bright sabertache.

"When the battle is over, he gaily rides back
To cheer every soul in the night bivouac—
With his jingling spur and his bright sabertache.

Oh! there you may see him in full glory crown'd,
As he sits with his friends on the hardly won ground,
And hear with what feeling the toast he will give,
As he drinks to the land where all Irishmen live—
With his jingling spur and his bright sabertache."

It was late when we broke up; but among all the recollections of that pleasant evening, none clung to me so forcibly, none sunk so deeply in my heart, as the gay and careless tone of Power's manly voice; and as I fell asleep toward morning, the words of the Irish Dragoon were floating through my mind, and followed me in my dreams.

CHAPTER XVI....The Vice-Provost.

I had now been for some weeks a resident within the walls of the University, and yet had never presented my letter of introduction to Dr. Barret. Somehow my thoughts, and occupations had left me little leisure to reflect upon my college course, and I had felt the necessity suggested by my friend Sir Harry of having a supporter in the very learned and gifted individual to whom I was accredited. How long I might have continued in this state of indifference, it is hard to say, when chance brought about my acquaintance with the Doctor.

Were I not inditing a true history in this narrative of my life, to the events and characters of which so many are living witnesses, I should certainly fear to attempt anything like a description of this very remarkable man, so liable would any sketch, however faint and imperfect, be, to the accusation of caricature, when all was so singular and so eccentric.

Dr. Barret was, at the time I speak of, about sixty years of age, scarcely five feet in height, and even that diminutive stature lessened by a stoop. His face was thin, pointed, and russet colored; his nose so aquiline as nearly to meet his projecting chin, and his small gray eyes, red and bleary, peered beneath his well worn cap, with a glance of mingled fear and suspicion. His dress was a suit of the rustiest black, threadbare, and patched in several places, while a pair of large brown leather slippers, far too big for his feet, imparted a sliding motion to his walk, that added an air of indescribable meanness to his appearance; a gown that had been worn for twenty years, browned and coated with the learned dust of the Fagel, covered his rusty habiliments, and completed the equipments of a figure that it was somewhat difficult for the young student to recognise as the Vice-Provost of the University. Such was he in externals. Within, a greater or more profound scholar never graced the walls of the college; a distinguished Grecian, learned in all the refinements of a hundred dialects; a deep Orientalist, cunning in all the varieties of Eastern languages, and able to reason with a Moonshee, or chat with a Persian ambassador. With a mind that never ceased acquiring, he possessed a memory ridiculous for its retentiveness even of trifles; no character in history, no event in chronology, was unknown to him, and he was referred to by his contemporaries for information in doubtful and disputed cases, as men consult a lexicon or a dictionary. With an intellect thus stored with deep and far-sought knowledge, in the affairs of the world he was a child. Without the walls of the college, for above forty years, he had not ventured half as many times, and knew absolutely nothing of the busy active world that fussed and fumed so near him; his farthest excursion was to the Bank of Ireland, to which he made occasional visits to fund the ample income of his office, and add to the wealth which already had acquired for him a well merited repute of being the richest man in college.

His little intercourse with the world had left him, in all his habits and manners, in every respect exactly as when he entered college, nearly half a century before; and, as he had literally risen from the ranks in the university, all the peculiarities of voice, accent, and pronunciation which distinguished him as a youth, adhered to him in old age. This was singular enough, and formed a very ludicrous contrast with the learned and deep-red tone of his conversation; but another peculiarity still more striking belonged to him. When he became a fellow, he was obliged by the rules of the college, to take holy orders, as a sine qua non to his holding his fellowship; this he did, as he would have assumed a red hood or blue one, as bachelor of laws, or doctor of medicine, and thought no more of it; but, frequently, in his moments of passionate excitement, the venerable character with which he was invested was quite forgotten, and he would utter some sudden and terrific oath, more productive of mirth to his auditors than was seemly, and for which, once spoken, the Doctor felt the greatest shame and contrition. These oaths were no less singular than forcible, and many a trick was practised, and many a plan devised, that the learned Vice-Provost might be entrapped into his favorite exclamation of "May the devil admire me," which no place or presence could restrain.

My servant, Mickey, who had not been long in making himself acquainted with all the originals about him, was the cause of my first meeting the Doctor, before whom I received a summons to appear, on the very serious charge of treating with disrespect the heads of the college.

The circumstances were simply these:—Mike had, among the other gossip of the place, heard frequent tales of the immense wealth and great parsimony of the Doctor; of his anxiety to amass money on all occasions, and the avidity with which even the smallest trifle was added to his gains. He accordingly resolved to amuse himself at the expense of this trait, and proceeded thus:—boring a hole in a half-penny, he attached a long string to it, and, having dropped it on the Doctor's step, stationed himself at the opposite side of the court, concealed from view by the angle of the common wall. He waited patiently for the chapel bell, at the first toll of which the door opened, and the Doctor issued forth. Scarcely was his foot upon the step, when he saw the piece of money, and as quickly stooped to seize it; but just as his finger had nearly touched it, it evaded his grasp, and slowly retreated. He tried again, but with the like success. At last, thinking he miscalculated the distance, he knelt leisurely down, and put forth his hand; but, lo! it again escaped him; on which, slowly rising from his posture, he shambled on toward the chapel, where, meeting the senior lecturer at the door, he cried out, "H—to my soul, Wall, but I saw the halfpenny walk away."

For the sake of the grave character whom he addressed, I need not recount how such a speech was received; suffice it to say, that Mike had been seen by a college porter, who reported him as my servant.

I was in the very act of relating the anecdote to a large party at breakfast in my rooms, when a summons arrived, requiring my immediate attendance at the Board, then sitting in solemn conclave at the Examination-hall.

I accordingly assumed my academic costume as speedily as possible, and, escorted by that most august functionary, Mr. M'Allister, presented myself before the seniors.

The members of the Board, with the Provost at their head, were seated at a long oak table, covered with books, papers, &c.; and from the silence they maintained, as I walked up the hall, I augured that a very solemn scene was before me.

"Mr. O'Malley," said the Dean, reading my name from a paper he held in his hand, "you have been summoned here at the desire of the Vice-Provost, whose questions you will reply to."

I bowed: a silence of a few minutes followed, when, at length, the learned Doctor, hitching up his nether garments with both hands, put his old and bleary eyes close to my face, while he croaked out with an accent that no hackney coachman could have exceeded in vulgarity,

"Eh, O'Malley; you're quartus, I believe; an't you?"

"I believe not. I think I am the only person of that name now on the books."

"That's true; but there was three O'Malleys before you. Godfrey O'Malley, that constered calve Neroni to Nero the Calvinist—ha! ha! ha!—was cautioned in 1788."

"My uncle, I believe, sir."

"More than likely, from what I hear of you—ex uno, &c. I see your name every day on the punishment roll. Late hours, never at chapel, seldom at morning lectures. Here ye are, sixteen shillings, wearing a red coat."

"Never knew any harm in that, Doctor."

"Ay, but d'ye see me now; 'grave raiment,' says the statute. And then, ye keep numerous beasts of prey, dangerous in their habits, and unseemly to behold."

"A bull terrier, sir, and two game-cocks, are, I assure you, the only animals in my household."

"Well, I'll fine you for it."

"I believe, Doctor," said the Dean, interrupting, in an under tone, "that you cannot impose a penalty in this matter."

"Ay, but I can. Singing birds, says the statute, are forbidden within the walls."

"And then, ye dazzled my eyes at commons with a bit of looking-glass, on Friday. I saw you. May the devil—ahem—as I was saying. That's casting reflections on the heads of the college; and your servant it was, Michaelis Liber, Mickey Free—may the flames of—ahem—an insolent varlet, called me a sweep."

"You, Doctor; impossible!" said I, with pretended horror.

"Ay, but d'ye see me now; it's true; for I looked about me at the time, and there was n't another sweep in the place but myself. Hell to—I mean—God forgive me for swearing; but I'll fine you a pound for this."

As I saw the Doctor was getting on at such a pace, I resolved, notwithstanding the august presence of the Board, to try the efficacy of Sir Harry's letter of introduction, which I had taken in my pocket, in the event of its being wanted.

"I beg your pardon, sir, if the time be an unsuitable one; but may I take the opportunity of presenting this letter to you?"

"Ha! I know the hand; Boyle's. Boyle secundus. Hem, ha, ay. 'My young friend; and assist him by your advice.' To be sure! O! of course. Eh! tell me, young man, did Boyle say nothing to you about the copy of Erasmus, bound in vellum, that I sold him in Trinity term, 1782?"

"I rather think not, sir," said I, doubtfully.

"Well, then, he might. He owes me two-and-fourpence of the balance."

"Oh! I beg pardon, sir; I now remember he desired me to repay you that sum; but he had just sealed the letter when he recollected it."

"Better late than never," said the Doctor, smiling graciously. "Where's the money? Ay; half-a-crown. I have n't twopence; never mind. Go away, young man; the case is dismissed. Vehementer miror quare huc venisti. You're more fit for anything than a college life. Keep good hours; mind the terms, and dismiss Michaelis Liber. Ha, ha, ha! May the devil—hem, that is, do—" so saying, the little Doctor's hand pushed me from the hall, his mind evidently relieved of all the griefs from which he had been suffering, by the recovery of his long-lost two-and-fourpence.

Such was my first and last interview with the Vice-Provost, and it made an impression upon me that all the intervening years have neither dimmed nor erased.

CHAPTER XVII....Trinity College—A Lecture.

I had not been many weeks a resident of Old Trinity, ere the flattering reputation my chum, Mr. Francis Webber, had acquired, extended also to myself; and, by universal consent, we were acknowledged the most riotous, ill-conducted, and disorderly men on the books of the University. Were the lamps of the squares extinguished and the College left in total darkness, we were summoned before the Dean; was the Vice-Provost serenaded with a chorus of trombones and French horns, to our taste in music was the attention ascribed; did a sudden alarm of fire disturb the congregation at morning chapel, Messrs. Webber and O'Malley were brought before the Board; and I must do them the justice to say, that the most trifling circumstantial evidence was ever sufficient to bring a conviction. Reading men avoided the building where we resided as they would have done the plague. Our doors, like those of a certain classic precinct commemorated by a Latin writer, lay open night and day; while moustached dragoons, knowingly dressed four-in-hand men, fox-hunters in pink issuing forth to the Dubber, or returning splashed from a run with the Kildare hounds, were everlastingly seen passing and repassing. Within, the noise and confusion resembled rather the mess-room of a regiment toward eleven at night, than the chambers of a College student; while, with the double object of affecting to be in ill-health, and to avoid the reflections that day, light occasionally inspires, the shutters were never opened, but lamps and candles kept always burning. Such was No. 2, Old Square, in the goodly days I write of. All the terrors of fines and punishments fell scatheless on the head of my worthy chum: in fact, like a well-known political character, whose pleasure and amusement it has been for some years past to drive through acts of parliament, and deride the powers of the law, so did Mr. Webber tread his way, serpentine through the statute book, ever grazing, but rarely trespassing upon some forbidden ground, which might involve the great punishment of expulsion. So expert, too, had he become in his special pleadings, so dexterous in the law of the University, that it was no easy matter to bring crime home to him; and even when this was done, his pleas in mitigation rarely failed of success.

There was a sweetness of demeanour, a mild, subdued tone about him, that constantly puzzled the worthy heads of the College, how the accusations ever brought against him could be founded on truth; that the pale, delicate-looking student, whose harsh, hacking cough terrified the hearers, could be the boisterous performer on a key bugle, or the terrific assailant of watchmen, was something too absurd for belief; and when Mr. Webber, with his hand upon his heart, and in the most dulcet accents, assured them that the hours he was not engaged in reading for the medal, were passed in the soothing society of a few select and intimate friends of literary tastes and refined minds, who, knowing the delicacy of his health—here he would cough—were kind enough to sit with him for an hour or so in the evening, the delusion was perfect, and the story of the Dean's riotous habits having got abroad, the charge was usually suppressed.

Like most idle men, Webber never had a moment to spare. Except read, there was nothing he did not do—training a hack for a race in the Phoenix—arranging a rowing match—getting up a mock duel between two white-feather acquaintances—were his almost daily avocations; besides that, he was at the head of many organized societies, instituted for various benevolent purposes. One was called "The Association for discountenancing Watchmen," another, "The Board of Works," whose object was principally devoted to the embellishment of the University, in which, to do them justice, their labors were unceasing, and what with the assistance of some black paint, a ladder, a few pounds of gunpowder, they certainly contrived to effect many important changes. Upon an examination morning, some hundred luckless 'jibs' might be seen perambulating the courts, in the vain effort to discover their tutor's chambers, the names having undergone an alteration that left all trace of their original proprietors unattainable. Doctor Francis Mooney having become Doctor Full Moon—Doctor Hare being, by the change of two letters, Doctor Ape—Romney Robinson, Romulus and Remus, &c. While, upon occasions like these, there could be but little doubt of Master Frank's intentions, upon many others, so subtle were his inventions, so well-contrived his plots, it became a matter of considerable difficulty to say whether the mishap which befell some luckless acquaintance were the result of design or mere accident; and not unfrequently well-disposed individuals were found condoling with "poor Frank," upon his ignorance of some College rule or etiquette, his breach of which had been long and deliberately planned. Of this latter description was a circumstance which occurred about this time, and which some who may throw an eye over these pages will perhaps remember.

The Dean having heard (and indeed the preparations were not intended to secure secrecy) that Webber destined to entertain a party of his friends at dinner on a certain day, sent a most peremptory order for his appearance at commons, his name being erased from the sick list, and a pretty strong hint conveyed to him, that any evasion upon his part would be certainly followed by an inquiry into the real reasons for his absence. What was to be done? That was the very day he had destined for his dinner. To be sure the majority of his guests were College men, who would understand the difficulty at once; but still there were some others, officers, of the 14th, with whom he was constantly dining, and whom he could not so easily put off. The affair was difficult, but still, Webber was the man for a difficulty; in fact, he rather liked one. A very brief consideration accordingly sufficed, and he sat down and wrote to his friends at the Royal Barracks, thus:

"Dear Power—I have a better plan for Tuesday than that I had proposed. Lunch here at three—(we'll call it dinner)—in the hall with the great guns: I can't say much for the grub, but the company—glorious! After that we'll start for Lucan in the drag—take our coffee, strawberries, &c. and return to No. 2, for supper, at tea. Advise your fellows of this change, and believe me

"Most unchangeably yours,
"Saturday." "FRANK WEBBER."

Accordingly, as three o'clock struck, six dashing-looking light dragoons were seen slowly sauntering up the middle of the dining-hall, escorted by Webber, who, in full academic costume, was leisurely ciceroning his friends, and expiating upon the excellencies of the very remarkable portraits which grace the walls.

The porters looked on with some surprise at the singular hour selected for sight-seeing, but what was their astonishment to find that the party having arrived at the end of the hall, instead of turning back again, very composedly unbuckled their belts, and having disposed of their sabres in a corner, took their places at the Fellow's table, and sat down amid the collective wisdom of Greek Lecturers and Regius Professors, as though they had been mere mortals like themselves.

Scarcely was the long Latin grace concluded, when Webber, leaning forward, enjoined his friends, in a very audible whisper, that if they intended to dine, no time was to be lost.

"We have but little ceremony here, gentlemen, and all we ask is a fair start," said he, as he drew over the soup, and proceeded to help himself.

The advice was not thrown away, for each man, with an alacrity a campaign usually teaches, made himself master of some neighboring dish—a very quick interchange of good things speedily following the appropriation. It was in vain that the Senior Lecturer looked aghast—that the Professor of Astronomy frowned; the whole table, indeed, were thunderstruck—even to the poor Vice-Provost himself, who, albeit given to the comforts of the table, could not lift a morsel to his mouth, but muttered between his teeth—"May the devil admire me, but they're dragoons."

The first shock of surprise over, the porters proceeded to inform them that except Fellows of the University or Fellow-commoners, none were admitted to the table. Webber, however, assured them that it was a mistake, there being nothing in the statute to exclude the 14th Light Dragoons, as he was prepared to prove. Meanwhile dinner proceeded; Power and his party performing with great self-satisfaction upon the sirloins and saddles about them, regretting only from time to time that there was a most unaccountable absence of wine, and suggested the propriety of napkins whenever they should dine there again. Whatever chagrin these unexpected guests caused among their entertainers of the supper table, in the lower part of the hall the laughter was loud and unceasing, and long before the hour concluded, the Fellows took their departure, leaving to Master Frank Webber the task of doing the honors alone and unassisted. When summoned before the Board for the offence on the following morning, Webber excused himself by throwing the blame upon his friends, with whom, he said, nothing short of a personal quarrel—a thing for a reading man not to be thought of—could have prevented intruding in the manner related. Nothing less than his tact could have saved him on this occasion, and at last he carried the day; while, by an act of the board, the 14th Light Dragoons were pronounced the most insolent corps in the service.

An adventure of his, however, got wind about this time, and served to enlighten many persons as to his real character, who had hitherto been most lenient in their expressions about him. Our worthy tutor, with a zeal for our welfare far more praiseworthy than successful, was in the habit of summoning to his chambers, on certain mornings of the week, his various pupils, whom he lectured in the books for the approaching examinations. Now, as these sittings were held at six o'clock in the winter as well as summer, in a cold, fireless chamber—the lecturer lying snug amid his blankets, while we stood shivering around the walls—the ardor of learning must indeed have proved strong that prompted a regular attendance. As to Frank, he would have as soon thought of attending chapel as of presenting himself on such an occasion. Not so with me. I had not yet grown hackneyed enough to fly in the face of authority, and I frequently left the whistle table, or broke off in a song, to hurry over to the Doctor's chambers and spout Homer and Hesiod. I suffered on in patience, till at last the bore became so insupportable that I told my sorrows to my friend, who listened to me out, and promised me succor.

It so chanced that upon some evening in each week Dr. Mooney was in the habit of visiting some friends who resided a short distance from town, and spending the night at their house. He, of course, did not lecture the following morning—a paper placard, announcing no lecture, being affixed to the door on such occasions. Frank waited patiently till he perceived the Doctor affixing this announcement upon the door one evening; and no sooner had he left College, than he withdrew the paper and departed.

On the next morning he rose early, and, concealing himself on the staircase, waited the arrival of the venerable damsel who acted as servant to the Doctor. No sooner had she opened the door and groped her way into the sitting-room, than Frank crept forward, and, stealing into the bed-room, sprung into the bed, and wrapt himself up in the blankets. The great bell boomed forth at six o'clock, and soon after the sound of feet were heard upon the stairs—one by one they came along—and gradually the room was filled with cold and shivering wretches, more than half asleep, and trying to arouse themselves into an approach to attention.

"Who's there?" said Frank, mimicking the Doctor's voice, as he yawned three or four times in succession, and turned in the bed.

"Collisson, O'Malley, Nesbitt," &c. said a number of voices, anxious to have all the merit such a penance could confer.

"Where's Webber?"

"Absent, sir," chorused the whole party.

"Sorry for it," said the mock Doctor; "Webber is a man of first-rate capacity, and were he only to apply, I am not certain to what eminence his abilities might raise him. Come, Collisson—any three angles of a triangle are equal—are equal to—what are they equal to?" Here he yawned as though he would dislocate his jaw.

"Any three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles," said Collisson, in the usual sing-song tone of a freshman.

As he proceeded to prove the proposition, his monotonous tone seemed to have lulled the Doctor into a doze; for in a few minutes a deep, long-drawn snore announced from the closed curtains that he listened no longer. After a little time, however, a short snort from the sleeper awoke him suddenly, and he called out,

"Go on; I'm waiting.—Do you think I can arouse at this hour of the morning for nothing but to listen to your bungling? Can no one give me a free translation of the passage?"

This digression from mathematics to classics did not surprise the hearers, though it somewhat confused them, no one being precisely aware what the line in question might be.

"Try it, Nesbitt—you, O'Malley—silent all—really this is too bad," an indistinct muttering here from the crowd was followed by an announcement from the Doctor, that "the speaker was an ass, and his head a turnip!—Not one of you capable of translating a chorus from Euripides—'Ou, ou, papai, papai, &c.' which, after all, means no more than—'Oh, whillelu, murder, why did you die,' &c.—'What are you laughing at, gentlemen?—May I ask, does it become a set of ignorant ill-informed savages—yes, savages, I repeat the word—to behave in this manner. Webber is the only man I have with common intellect—the only man among you capable of distinguishing himself. But as for you—I'll bring you before the Board—I'll write to your friends—I'll stop your college indulgences—I'll confine you to the wall—I'll be damned, eh—"

This lapse confused him; he stammered, stuttered, endeavored to recover himself, but by this time we had approached the bed, just at the moment when Master Frank, well knowing what he might expect if detected, had belted from the blankets and rushed from the room. In an instant we were in hot pursuit; but he regained his chambers, and double-locked the door before we could overtake him, leaving us to ponder over the insolent tirade we had so patiently submitted to.

That morning, the affair got wind all over college. As for us, we were scarcely so much laughed at as the Doctor; the world wisely remembering, if such was the nature of our morning's orisons, we might nearly as profitably have remained snug in our quarters.

Such was our life in old Trinity; and strange enough it is that one should feel tempted to the confession; but I really must acknowledge these were, after all, happy times; and I look back upon them with mingled pleasure and sadness. The noble lord who so pathetically lamented that the devil was not so strong in him as he used to be forty years before, has an echo in my regrets, that the student is not as young in me as when those scenes were enacting of which I write.

Alas, and slack! those fingers that were wont to double up a watchman, are now doubled up in gout; the ankles that once astonished the fair, now only interest the faculty; the very jests that set the table in a roar, are become as threadbare as my dress "continuations;" and I, Charles O'Malley, having passed through every gradation of coming years, from long country dances to short whist—from nine times nine, and one cheer more, to weak negus, and a fit of coughing for choros—find myself at the wrong side of—, but stop, this is becoming personal; so I shall conclude my chapter; and with a bow as graceful as rheumatism permits, say to one and all my kind readers, for a brief season, adieu.

CHAPTER XVIII.—The Invitation—The Wager.

I was sitting at breakfast with Webber, a few mornings after the mess dinner I have spoken of, when Power came in hastily.

"Ha, the very man!" said he. "I say, O'Malley, here's an invitation for you from Sir George, to dine on Friday. He desired me to say a thousand civil things about his not having made you out, regrets that he was not at home when you called yesterday, and all that. By Jove, I know nothing like the favour you stand in; and, as for Miss Dashwood, faith the fair Lucy blushed and tore her glove in most approved style when the old General began his laudation of you."

"Pooh, nonsense," said I; "that silly affair in the west." "Oh, very probably; there's reason the less for your looking so excessively conscious. But I must tell you, in all fairness, that you have no chance; nothing short of a dragoon will go down."

"Be assured," said I, somewhat nettled, "my pretensions do not aspire to the fair Miss Dashwood."

"Tant mieux et tant pis, mon cher. I wish to heaven mine did; and, by St. Patrick, if I only played the knight errant half as gallantly as yourself, I should not relinquish my claims to the secretary-at-war himself."

"What the devil brought the old General down to your wild regions?" inquired Webber.

"To contest the county."

"A bright thought, truly. When a man was looking for a seat, why not try a place where the law is occasionally heard of?"

"I'm sure I can give you no information on that head; nor have I ever heard how Sir George came to learn that such a place as Galway existed."

"I believe I can enlighten you," said Power. "Lady Dashwood—rest her soul—came west of the Shannon; she had a large property somewhere in Mayo, and owned some hundred acres of swamp, with some thousand starving tenantry thereupon, that people dignified as an estate in Connaught. This first suggested to him the notion of setting up for the county; probably supposing that the people who never paid in rent might like to do so in gratitude.—How he was undeceived, O'Malley there can inform us. Indeed, I believe the worthy General, who was confoundedly hard up when he married, expected to have got a great fortune, and had little anticipated the three Chancery suits he succeeded to, nor the fourteen rent-charges to his wife's relatives that made the bulk of the dower. It was an unlucky hit for him when he fell in with the old 'maid' at Bath; and, had she lived, he must have gone to the Colonies. But the Lord took her one day, and Major Dashwood was himself again. The Duke of York, the story goes, saw him at Hounslow during a review—was much struck with his air and appearance—made some inquiries—found him to be of excellent family and irreproachable conduct—made him aid-de-camp—and, in fact, made his fortune. I do not believe that, while doing so kind, he could by possibility have done a more popular thing. Every man in the army rejoiced at his good fortune; so that, after all, though he had some hard rubs, he has come well through, the only vestige of his unfortunate matrimonial connection being a correspondence kept up by a maiden sister of his late wife's with him. She insists upon claiming the ties of kindred upon about twenty family eras during the year, when she regularly writes a most loving and ill-spelled epistle, containing the latest information from Mayo, with all particulars of the Macan family, of which she is a worthy member. To her constant hints of the acceptable nature of certain small remittances, the poor General is never inattentive; but to the pleasing prospect of a visit in the flesh from Miss Judy Macan the good man is dead. In fact, not short of being broke by a general court-martial could at all complete his sensations of horror at such a stroke of fortune; and I am not certain, if choice were allowed him, that he would not prefer the latter."

"Then he has never yet seen her?" said Webber.

"Never," replied Power; "and he hopes to leave Ireland without that blessing, the prospect of which, however remote and unlikely, has, I know well, more than once terrified him since his arrival."

"I say, Power, has your worthy General sent me a card for his ball?"

"Not through me, Master Frank."

"Well, now, I call that devilish shabby, do you know.—He asks O'Malley there from my chambers, and never notices the other man, the superior partner in the firm. Eh, O'Malley, what say you?"

"Why, I didn't know you were acquainted."

"And who said we were? It was his fault though entirely, that we were not. I am as I ever have been, the most easy fellow in the world on that score—never give myself airs to military people—endure any thing, every thing—and you see the result—hard aint it?"

"But, Webber, Sir George must really be excused in this matter. He has a daughter, a most attractive lovely daughter, just at that budding unsuspecting age when the heart is most susceptible of impressions; and where, let me ask, could she run such risk as in the chance of a casual meeting with the redoubted lady-killer, Master Frank Webber? If he has not sought you out, then here be his apology."

"A very strong case, certainly," said Frank; "but still, had he confided his critical position to my honor and secrecy, he might have depended on me; now, having taken the other line—"

"Well, what then?"

"Why he must abide the consequences. I'll make fierce love to Louisa: isn't that the name?"

"Lucy, so please you."

"Well, be it so—to Lucy—talk the little girl into a most deplorable attachment for me."

"But how, may I ask, and when?"

"I'll begin at the ball, man."

"Why, I thought you said you were not going."

"There you mistake seriously. I merely said that I had not been invited."

"Then, of course," said I "Webber, you cannot think of going, in any case, on my account."

"My dear friend, I go entirely upon my own. I not only shall go, but I intend to have most particular notice and attention paid me. I shall be prime favorite with Sir George—kiss Lucy—"

"Come, come; this is too strong."

"What do you bet I don't? There now; I'll give you a pony a piece I do. Do you say done?"

"That you kiss Miss Dashwood, and are not kicked down stairs for your pains; are those the terms of the wager?" inquired Power.

"With all my heart. That I kiss Miss Dashwood, and am not kicked down stairs for my pains."

"Then I say done."

"And with you too, O'Malley."

"I thank you," said I coldly, "I am not disposed to make such a return for Sir George Dashwood's hospitality as to make an insult to his family the subject of a bet."

"Why, man, what are you dreaming of? Miss Dashwood will not refuse my chaste salute. Come, Power, I'll give you the other fifty."

"Agreed," said he; "at the same time understand me distinctly—that I hold myself perfectly eligible to winning the wager by my own interference; for, if you do kiss her, by Jove, I'll perform the remainder of the compact."

"So I understand the agreement," said Webber, arranging his curls before the looking-glass. "Well, now, who's for Howth; the drag will be here in half an hour?"

"Not I," said Power; "I must return to the barracks."

"Nor I," said I, "for I shall take this opportunity of leaving my card with Sir George Dashwood."

"I have won my fifty, however," said Power, as we walked out into the courts.

"I am not quite certain—"

"Why, the devil, he would not risk a broken neck for that sum: besides, if he did, he loses the bet."

"He's a devilish keen fellow."

"Let him be. In any case I am determined to be on my guard here."

So chatting, we strolled along to the Royal Hospital, when, having dropped my pasteboard, I returned to the College.

CHAPTER XIX....The Ball.

I have often dreamed for a storming party with less of trepidation than I felt on the evening of Sir George Dashwood's ball. Since the eventful day of the election I had never seen Miss Dashwood; therefore, as to what precise position I might occupy in her favor, was a matter of great doubt in my mind and great import to my happiness. That I myself loved her was a matter of which all the badinage of my friends regarding her made me painfully conscious; but, that in our relative positions, such an attachment was all but hopeless I could not disguise from myself. Young as I was, I well knew to what a heritage of debt, law-suit, and difficulty I was born to succeed. In my resources and means of advancement I had no confidence whatever, had even the profession to which I was destined been more of my choice. I daily felt that it demanded greater exertions, if not far greater abilities, than I could command, to make success at all likely; and then, if such a result were in store, years, at least, must elapse before it could happen, and where would she then be, and where should I—where the ardent affection I now felt and gloried in—perhaps all the more for its desperate hopelessness; when the sanguine and buoyant spirit to combat with difficulties which youth suggests, and which later manhood refuses, should have passed away. And, even if all these survived the toil and labor of anxious days and painful nights, what of her? Alas! I now reflected that although only of my own age, her manner to me had taken all that tone of superiority and patronage which an elder assumes toward one younger, and which, in the spirit of protection it proceeds upon, essentially bars up every inlet to a dearer or warmer feeling—at least, when the lady plays the former part. What then is to be done, thought I; forget her? but how? how shall I renounce all my plans and unweave the web of life I have been spreading around me for many a day, without that one golden thread that lent it more than half its brilliancy and all its attraction? But, then, the alternative is even worse, if I encourage expectations and nurture hopes never to be realized. Well, we meet to-night, after a long and eventful absence: let my future fate be ruled by the results of this meeting. If Lucy Dashwood does care for me, if I can detect in her manner enough to show me that my affection may meet a return, the whole effort of my life shall be to make her mine; if not—if my feelings be all that I have to depend upon, to extort a reciprocal affection—then shall I take my last look of her, and with it the first and brightest dream of happiness my life has hitherto presented.

It need not be wondered at if the brilliant coup d'œil of the ballroom, as I entered, struck me with astonishment, accustomed as I had hitherto been to nothing more magnificent than an evening party of squires and their squires, or the annual garrison ball at the barracks. The glare of wax lights, the well-furnished saloons, and the glitter of uniforms, and the blaze of jewelled and satin dames, with the clang of military music, was a species of enchanted atmosphere, which breathing for the first time, rarely fails to intoxicate. Never before had I seen so much beauty: lovely faces dressed in all the seductive flattery of smiles, were on every side; and, as I walked from room to room, I felt how much more fatal to man's peace and heart's ease the whispered words and silent glances of those fair damsels, than all the loud gayety and boisterous freedom of our country belles, who sought to take the heart by storm and escalade.

As yet I had seen neither Sir George nor his daughter, and while I looked on every side for Lucy Dashwood, it was with a beating and anxious heart I longed to see how she would compare with the blaze of beauty around.

Just at this moment a very gorgeously-dressed hussar stepped from a door-way beside me, as if to make a passage for some one, and the next moment she appeared, leaning upon the arm of another lady. One look was all that I had time for, when she recognised me.

"Ah, Mr. O'Malley—how happy—has Sir George—has my father seen you?"

"I have only arrived this moment; I trust he is quite well?"

"Oh yes, thank you—"

"I beg your pardon with all humility, Miss Dashwood," said the hussar, in a tone of the most knightly courtesy, "but they are waiting for us."

"But, Captain Fortescue, you must excuse me one moment more. Mr. Lechmere, will you do me the kindness to find out Sir George? Mr. O'Malley—Mr. Lechmere." Here she said something in French to her companion, but so rapidly that I could not detect what it was, but merely heard the reply—"pas mal"—which as the lady continued to canvass me most deliberately through her eye-glass, I supposed referred to me. "And now, Captain Fortescue"—and with a look of the most courteous kindness to me, she disappeared in the crowd.

The gentleman to whose guidance I was intrusted was one of the aid-de-camps, and was not long in finding Sir George. No sooner had the good old General heard my name, than he held out both his hands, and shook mine most heartily.

"At last, O'Malley, at last I am able to thank you for the greatest service ever man rendered me. He saved Lucy, my Lord, rescued her under circumstances where any thing short of his courage and determination must have cost her her life."

"Ah! very pretty indeed," said a stiff old gentleman addressed, as he bowed a most superbly-powdered scalp before me; "most happy to make your acquaintance."

"Who is he?" added he, in nearly as loud a tone to Sir George.

"Mr. O'Malley, of O'Malley Castle."

"True, I forgot—why is he not in uniform?"

"Because unfortunately, my Lord, we don't own him; he's not in the army."

"Ha, ha! thought he was."

"You dance, O'Malley, I suppose? I'm sure you'd rather be over there than hearing all my protestations of gratitude, sincere and heartfelt as they really are."

"Lechmere, introduce my friend Mr. O'Malley: get him a partner."

I had not followed my new acquaintance many steps, when Power came up to me. "I say, Charley," cried he, "I have been tormented to death by half the ladies in the room, to present you to them, and have been in quest of you this half hour. Your brilliant exploit in savage land has made you a regular preux chevalier; and if you do not trade on that adventure to your most lasting profit, you deserve to be—a lawyer. Come along here; Lady Muckleman, the adjutant-general's lady and chef, has four Scotch daughters you are to dance with; then, I am to introduce you in all form to the Dean of something's niece: she is a good-looking girl, and has two livings in a safe county. Then there's the town-major's wife, and, in fact, I have several engagements from this to supper time."

"A thousand thanks for all your kindnesses in prospective, but I think, perhaps, it were right I should ask Miss Dashwood to dance, if only as matter of form: you understand?"

"And, if Miss Dashwood should say, 'with pleasure, sir,' only as a matter of form: you understand," said a silvery voice beside me. I turned, and saw Lucy Dashwood, who having overheard my very free and easy suggestion, replied to me in this manner.

I here blundered out my excuses. What I said, and what I did not say, I cannot now remember; but, certainly, it was her turn now to blush, and her arm trembled within mine as I led her to the top of the room. In the little opportunity which our quadrille presented for conversation, I could not help remarking that, after the surprise of her first meeting with me, Miss Dashwood's manner became gradually more and more reserved, and that there was an evident struggle between her wish to appear grateful for what had occurred with a sense of the necessity of not incurring a greater degree of intimacy. Such was my impression, at least, and such the conclusion I drew from a certain quiet tone in her manner, that went farther to wound my feelings, and mar my happiness, than any other line of conduct toward me could have effected.

Our quadrille over, I was about to conduct her to a seat, when Sir George came hurriedly up, his face greatly flushed, and betraying every semblance of high excitement.

"Dear papa, has any thing occurred; pray, what is it?" inquired she.

He smiled faintly and replied, "Nothing very serious, my dear, that I should alarm you in this way; but, certainly, a more disagreeable contre-temps could scarcely occur."

"Do tell me: what can it be?"

"Read this," said he, presenting a very dirty-looking note, which bore the mark of a red wafer, most infernally plain upon its outside.

Miss Dashwood unfolded the billet, and, after a moment's silence, instead of participating, as he expected, in her father's feeling of distress, burst out a-laughing, while she said, "Why, really, papa, I do not see why this should put you out much, after all. Aunt may be somewhat of a character, as her note evinces, but after a few days—"

"Nonsense, child; there's nothing in this world I have such a dread of as that confounded woman—and to come at such a time."

"When does she speak of paying her visit?"

"I knew you had not read the note," said Sir George, hastily; "she's coming here to-night, is on her way this instant, perhaps. What is to be done? If she forces her way in here, I shall go deranged outright. O'Malley, my boy, read this note; and you will not feel surprised if I appear in the humor you see me."

I took the billet from the hands of Miss Dashwood, and read as follows:—

"Dear brother,—When this reaches your hand, I'll not be far off—I'm on my way up to town, to be under Dr. Dease for the old complaint. Cowley mistakes my case entirely; he says it's nothing but religion and wind. Father Magrath, who understands a good deal about females, thinks otherwise—but God knows who's right. Expect me to tea, and, with love to Lucy, believe me yours, in haste, JUDITH MACAN."

"Let the sheets be well aired in my room; and, if you have a spare bed, perhaps we could prevail upon Father Magrath to stop too."

I scarcely could contain my laughter till I got to the end of this very free and easy epistle; when at last I burst forth in a hearty fit, in which I was joined by Miss Dashwood.

From the account Power had given me in the morning, I had no difficulty in guessing that the writer was the maiden sister of the late Lady Dashwood, and for whose relationship Sir George had ever testified the greatest dread, even at the distance of two hundred miles; and for whom, in any nearer intimacy, he was in nowise prepared.

"I say, Lucy," said he, "there's only one thing to be done; if this horrid woman does arrive, let her be shown to her room, and for the few days of her stay in town, we'll neither see nor be seen by any one."

Without waiting for a reply, Sir George was turning away to give the necessary directions, when the door of the drawing-room was flung open, and the servant announced, in his loudest voice, "Miss Macan." Never shall I forget the poor general's look of horror as the words reached him; for as yet, he was too far to catch even a glimpse of its fair owner. As for me, I was already so much interested in seeing what she was like, that I made my way through the crowd toward the door. It is no common occurrence that can distract the various occupations of a crowded ball-room, where, amid the crash of music and the din of conversation, goes on the soft, low voice of insinuating flattery or the light flirtation of a first acquaintance: every clique, every coterie, every little groupe of three or four, has its own separate and private interests, forming a little world of its own, and caring and heeding nothing that goes on around; and even when some striking character or illustrious personage makes his entrée, the attention he attracts is so momentary that the buzz of conversation is scarcely, if at all, interrupted, and the business of pleasure continues to flow on. Not so, now, however. No sooner had the servant pronounced the magical name of Miss Macan, than all seemed to stand still. The spell thus exercised over the luckless general seemed to have extended to his company, for it was with difficulty that any one could continue his train of conversation, while every eye was directed toward the door. About two steps in advance of the servant, who still stood door in hand, was a tall, elderly lady, dressed in an antique brocade silk, with enormous flowers gaudily embroidered upon it. Her hair was powdered, and turned back, in the fashion of fifty years before; while her high pointed and heeled shoes completed a costume that had not been seen for nearly a century. Her short, skinny arms were bare, and partly covered by a falling flower of old point lace, while on her hands she wore black silk mittens; a pair of green spectacles scarcely dimmed the lustre of a most peering pair of eyes, to whose effect a very palpable touch of rouge certainly added brilliancy. There stood this most singular apparition, holding before her a fan about the size of a modern tea-tray, while, at each repetition of her name by the servant, she courtesied deeply, returning the while upon the gay crowd before her a very curious look of maidenly modesty at her solitary and unprotected position.

As no one had ever heard of the fair Judith, save one or two of Sir George's most intimate friends, the greater part of the company were disposed to regard Miss Macan as some one who had mistaken the character of the invitation, and had come in a fancy dress. But this delusion was but momentary, as Sir George, armed with the courage of despair, forced his way through the crowd, and, taking her hand affectionately, bid her welcome to Dublin. The fair Judy, at this, threw her arms about his neck, and saluted him with a hearty smack, that was heard all over the room.

"Where's Lucy, brother? let me embrace my little darling," said the lady, in an accent that told more of Miss Macan, than a three volume biography could have done; "there she is, I'm sure; kiss me my money."

This office Miss Dashwood performed with an effort at courtesy really admirable; while, taking her aunt's arm, she led her to a sofa.

It needed all the poor general's tact to get over the sensation of this most malapropos addition to his party; but, by degrees, the various groups renewed their occupations, although many a smile, and more than one sarcastic glance at the sofa, betrayed that the maiden aunt had not escaped criticism.

Power, whose propensity for fun very considerably outstripped his sense of decorum to his commanding officer, had already made his way toward Miss Dashwood, and succeeded in obtaining a formal introduction to Miss Macan.

"I hope you will do me the favor to dance next set with me, Miss Macan?"

"Really, Captain, it's very polite of you; but you must excuse me; I was never any thing great in quadrilles; but if a reel, or a jig—"

"Oh, dear, aunt, don't think of it, I beg of you."

"Or even Sir Roger de Coverly," resumed Miss Macan.

"I assure you quite equally impossible."

"Then I'm certain you waltz," said Power.

"What do you take me for, young man? I hope I know better; I wish Father Magrath heard you ask me that question, and for all your lace jacket!"

"Dearest aunt, Captain Power did n't mean to offend you; I'm certain he!"

"Well, why did he dare to—sob, sob—did he see any thing light about me? that he—sob, sob, sob—oh, dear, oh, dear! is it for this I came up from my little peaceful place in the west?—sob, sob, sob—general, George, dear; Lucy, my love, I'm taken bad. Oh, dear, dear—is there any whisky negus?"

Whatever sympathy Miss Macan's sufferings might have excited in the crowd about her before, this last question totally routed them, and a most hearty fit of laughter broke forth from more than one of the bystanders.

At length, however, she was comforted, and her pacification completely effected by Sir George setting her down to a whist-table. From this moment I lost sight of her for above two hours. Meanwhile, I had little opportunity of following up my intimacy with Miss Dashwood, and, as I rather suspected that, on more than one occasion, she seemed to avoid our meeting, I took especial care, on my part, to spare her the annoyance.

For one instant only, had I any opportunity of addressing her, and then there was such an evident embarrassment in her manner that I readily perceived how she felt circumstanced, and that the sense of gratitude to one whose farther advances she might have feared, rendered her constrained and awkward. Too true, said I, she avoids me; my being here is only a source of discomfort and pain to her: therefore, I'll take my leave, and, whatever it may cost me, never to return. With this intention, resolving to wish Sir George very good night, I sought him for some minutes. At length, I saw him in the corner conversing with the old nobleman to whom he had presented me early in the evening.

"True, upon my honor, Sir George," said he; "I saw it myself, and she did it just as dexterously as the oldest blackleg in Paris."

"Why, you do n't mean to say that she cheated?"

"Yes, but I do though—turned the ace every time. Lady Herbert said to me, 'Very extraordinary it is—four by honors again.' So I looked, and then I perceived it—a very old trick it is; but she did it beautifully. What's her name?"

"Some western name; I forget it," said the poor general, ready to die with shame.

"Clever old woman, very," said the old Lord, taking a pinch of snuff, "but revokes too often."

Supper was announced at this critical moment, and before I had farther thought of my determination to escape, I felt myself hurried along in the crowd toward the stair-case. The party immediately in front of me were Power and Miss Macan, who now appeared reconciled, and certainly testified most openly their mutual feelings of good-will.

"I say, Charley," whispered Power, as I came along, "it is capital fun—never met anything equal to her; but the poor general will never live through it, and I'm certain of ten days' arrest for this night's proceeding."

"Any news of Webber?" I inquired.

"Oh yes, I fancy I can tell something of him; for I heard of some one presenting himself, and being refused the entrée, so that Master Frank has lost his money. Sit near us, I pray you, at supper: we must take care of the dear aunt for the niece's sake, eh?"

Not seeing the force of this reasoning, I soon separated myself from them, and secured a corner at a side-table. Every supper, on such an occasion as this, is the same scene of soiled white muslin, faded flowers, flushed faces, torn gloves, blanc-mange, cold chicken, jelly, sponge cakes, spooning young gentlemen doing the attentive, and watchful mammas calculating what precise degree of propinquity in the crush is safe or seasonable for their daughters, to the moustached and unmarrying lovers beside them. There are always the same set of gratified elders, like the benchers in King's Inn, marched up to the head of the table, to eat, drink, and be happy—removed from the more profane looks and soft speeches of the younger part of the creation. Then there are the ex polloi of outcasts, younger sons of younger brothers, tutors, governesses, portionless cousins, and curates, all formed in a phalanx round the side-table, whose primitive habits and simple tastes are evinced by their all eating off the same plate and drinking from nearly the same wine-glass. Too happy if some better off acquaintance at the long table invites them to "wine;" though the ceremony on their part is limited to the pantomime of drinking. To this miserable état d'être I belonged, and bore my fate with unconcern; for, alas! my spirits were depressed and my heart heavy. Lucy's treatment of me was every moment before me, contrasted with her gay and courteous demeanor to all, save myself; and I longed for the moment to get away.

Never had I seen her looking so beautiful: her brilliant eyes were lit with pleasure, and her smile was enchantment itself. What would I not have given for one moment's explanation, as I took my leave for ever!—one brief avowal of my love, my unalterable, devoted love; for which I sought not or expected return, but merely that I might not be forgotten.

Such were my thoughts, when a dialogue quite near me aroused me from my reverie. I was not long in detecting the speakers, who, with their backs turned to us, were seated at the great table, discussing a very liberal allowance of pigeon pie, a flask of champagne standing between them.

"Don't now! don't I tell ye, it's little ye know Galway, or you would n't think to make up to me, squeezing my foot."

"Upon my soul, you're an angel, a regular angel; I never saw a woman suit my fancy before."

"Oh, behave now, Father Magrath, says,"

"Who's he?"

"The priest no less."

"Oh! confound him."

"Confound Father Magrath, young man!"

"Well then, Judy, don't be angry: I only meant that a dragoon knows more in these matters than a priest."

"Well, then, I'm not sure of that. But any how, I'd have you to remember it aint a Widow Malone you have beside you."

"Never heard of the lady," said Power.

"Sure it's a song—poor creature—it's a song they made about her in the North Cork, when they were quartered down in our country."

"I wish to heaven you'd sing it."

"What will you give me then, if I do?"

"Any thing—every thing—my heart—my life."

"I would n't give a traunsee for all of them: give me that old green ring on your finger then."

"It's yours," said Power, placing it gracefully upon Miss Macan's finger, "and now for your promise."

"Maybe my brother might not like it."

"He'd be delighted," said Power, "he doats on music."

"Does he now?"

"On my honor he does."

"Well, mind, you get up a good chorus, for the song has one, and here it is."

"Miss Macan's song," said Power, tapping the table with his knife. "Miss Macan's song" was re-echoed on all sides, and before the luckless General could interfere, she had begun. How to explain the air I know not, for I never heard its name, but at the end of each verse, a species of echo followed the last word, that rendered it irresistibly ridiculous.

"THE WIDOW MALONE."

"Did ye hear of the Widow Malone,
Ohone!

Who lived in the town of Athlone
Alone!

Oh! she melted the hearts
Of the swains in them parts,
So lovely the Widow Malone,
Ohone!

So lovely the Widow Malone.

"Of lovers she had a full score,
Or more;
And fortunes they all had galore,
In store;

From the minister down
To the clerk of the crown,
All were courting the Widow Malone,
Ohone!

All were courting the Widow Malone.

"But so modest was Mrs. Malone,
Twas known
No one ever could see her alone,
Ohone!

Let them ogle and sigh,
They could ne'er catch her eye,
So bashful the Widow Malone,
Ohone!

So bashful the Widow Malone.

"Till one Mister O'Brien from Clare,
How quare!
It's little for blushin' they care
Down there;

Put his arm round her waist
Gave ten kisses, at last,
'Oh,' says he, 'you're my Molly Malone,
My own!'

'Oh,' says he, 'you're my Molly Malone.'

"And the Widow they all thought so shy,
My eye!
Ne'er thought of a simper or sigh,
For why?

But 'Lucius,' says she,
'Since you've made now so free,
You may marry your Mary Malone,
Ohone!

You may marry your Mary Malone.'

"There's a moral contained in my song,
Not wrong;
And one comfort it's not very long,
But strong:

If for widows you die,
Larn to kiss, not to sigh;
For they're all like sweet Mistress Malone,
Ohone!

Oh! they're all like sweet Mistress Malone."

Never did song create such a sensation as Miss Macan's, and certainly her desires as to the chorus were followed to the letter; for the "Widow Malone, ohone!" resounded from one end of the table to the other, amid one universal shout of laughter. None could resist the ludicrous effect of her melody, and even poor Sir George, sinking under the disgrace of his relationship, which she had contrived to make public by frequent allusions to her dear brother the "General," yielded at last, and joined in the mirth around him.

"I insist upon a copy of the 'Widow,' Miss Macan," said Power.

"To be sure; give me a call to-morrow; let me see, about two Father Magrath won't be at home," said she, with a coquetish look.

"Where, pray, may I pay my respects?"

"No. 22, South Anne-street, very respectable lodgings. I'll write the address in your pocket-book."

Power produced a card and pencil, while Miss Macan wrote a few lines saying, as she handed it—

"There, now, don't read it here before the people; they'll think it mighty indelicate in me to make an appointment."

Power pocketed the card, and the next minute Miss Macan's carriage was announced.

Sir George Dashwood, who little flattered himself that his fair guest had any intention of departure, became now most considerably attentive—reminded her of the necessity of muffling against the night air—hoped she should escape cold, and wished a most cordial good night, with a promise of seeing her early the following day.

Notwithstanding Power's ambition to engross the attention of the lady, Sir George himself saw her to her carriage, and only returned to the room as a group was collected around the gallant Captain, to whom he was relating some capital traits of his late conquest; for such he dreamed she was.

"Doubt it who will," said he, "she has invited me to call on her to-morrow—written her address on my card—told me the hour she is certain of being alone. See here—" at these words he pulled forth the card, and handed it to Lechmere.

Scarcely were the eyes of the other thrown upon the writing, when he said, "So, this is n't it Power."

"To be sure it is, man," said Power; "Anne-street is devilish seedy; but that's the quarter."

"Why, confound it, man," said the other there's not a word of that here."

"Read it out," said Power; "proclaim aloud my victory."

Thus urged Lechmere read:

"Dear P.—Please pay to my credit, and soon, mark ye, the two ponies lost this evening. I have done myself the pleasure of enjoying your ball, kissed the lady, quizzed papa, and walked into the cunning Fred Power.

"Yours,
FRANK WEBBER.

"The Widow Malone, ohone, is at your service;"

Had a thunderbolt fallen at his feet, his astonishment could not have equalled the result of this revelation. He stamped, swore, raved, laughed, and almost went deranged. The joke was soon spread through the room, and from Sir George to poor Lucy, now covered with blushes at her part in the transaction, all was laughter and astonishment.

"Who is he? that is the question," said Sir George, who, with all the ridicule of the affair hanging over him, felt no common relief at the discovery of the imposition.

"A friend of O'Malley's," said Power, delighted, in his defeat, to involve another with himself.

"Indeed!" said the General, regarding me with a look of a very mingled cast.

"Quite true, sir," said I, replying to the accusation that his manner implied, "but equally so, that I neither knew of his plot, nor recognized him when here."

"I am perfectly sure of it, my boy," said the General; "and, after all, it was an excellent joke, carried a little too far, it's true; eh, Lucy?"

But Lucy either heard not, or affected not to hear; and, after some little further assurance that he felt not the least annoyed, the General turned to converse with some other friends; while I, burning with indignation against Webber, took a cold farewell of Miss Dashwood, and retired.

CHAPTER XX.—The Last night in Trinity.

How I might have met Master Webber after his impersonation of Miss Macan, I cannot possibly figure to myself. Fortunately, indeed, for all parties, he left town early the next morning; and it was some weeks ere he returned. In the meanwhile, I became a daily visitor at the General's, dined there usually three or four times a week, rode out with Lucy constantly, and accompanied her every evening either to the theatre or into society. Sir George, possibly from my youth, seemed to pay little attention to an intimacy which he perceived every hour growing closer, and frequently gave his daughter into my charge in our morning excursions on horseback. As for me, my happiness was all but perfect. I loved, and already began to hope that I was not regarded with indifference; for, although Lucy's manner never absolutely evinced any decided preference toward me, yet many slight and casual circumstances served to show me that my attentions to her were neither unnoticed nor uncared for. Among the many gay and dashing companions of our rides, I remarked that, however anxious for such a distinction, none ever seemed to make any way in her good graces; and I had already gone far in my self-deception that I was destined for good fortune, when a circumstance which occurred one morning at length served to open my eyes to the truth, and blast, by one fatal breath, the whole harvest of my hopes.

We were about to set out one morning on a long ride, when Sir George's presence was required by the arrival of an officer who had been sent from the Horse Guards on official business. After half-an-hour's delay, Col. Cameron, the officer in requisition, was introduced and entered into conversation with our party. He had only landed in England from the Peninsula a few days before, and had abundant information of the stirring events enacting there. At the conclusion of an anecdote—I forget what—he turned suddenly around to Miss Dashwood, who was standing beside me, and said, in a low voice:

"And, now, Miss Dashwood, I am reminded of a commission I promised a very old brother officer to perform. Can I have one moment's conversation with you in the window?"

As he spoke, I perceived that he crumpled beneath his glove something like a letter.

"To me!" said Lucy, with a look of surprise that sadly puzzled me whether to ascribe it to coquetry or innocence—"to me?"

"To you," said the Colonel, bowing; "and I am sadly deceived by my friend Hammersly—"

"Captain Hammersly," said she, blushing deeply as she spoke.

I heard no more. She turned toward the window with the Colonel, and all I saw was, that he handed her a letter, which, having hastily broken open, and thrown her eyes over, she grew first deadly pale—then red, and, while her eyes filled with tears, I heard her say, "How like him!—how truly generous this is!" I listened to no more—I turned and left the room—in another moment was on my horse, galloping from the spot, despair, in all its blackness, in my heart—and, in my broken-hearted misery, wishing for death.

I was miles away from Dublin ere I remembered well what had occurred, and even then not over clearly; the fact that Lucy Dashwood, whom I imagined to be my own in heart, loved another, was all that I really knew. That one thought was all my mind was capable of, and in it my misery, my wretchedness were centered.

Of all the grief my life has known, I have had no moments like the long hours of that dreary night. My sorrow, in turn, took every shape and assumed every guise: now I remember how the Dashwoods had courted my intimacy and encouraged my visits; how Lucy herself had evinced, in a thousand ways, that she felt a preference for me. I called to mind the many equivocal proofs I had given her that my feeling, at least, was no common one; and yet, how had they sported with my affections and jested with my happiness! That she loved Hammersly I now had a palpable proof; that this affection must have been mutual and prosecuted at the very moment I was not only professing my own love for her, but actually receiving—all but an avowal of its return—oh! it was too, too base; and, in my deepest heart, I cursed my folly, and vowed never to see her more.

It was late on the next day ere I retraced my steps toward town, my heart sad and heavy, careless what became of me for the future, and pondering whether I should not at once give up my College career, and return to my uncle. When I reached my chamber, all was silent and comfortable; Webber had not returned; my servant was from home; and I felt myself more than ever wretched in the solitude of what had been so oft the scene of noisy and festive gaiety. I sat some hours in a half-musing state, every sad depressing thought that blighted hopes can conjure up rising in turn before me. A loud knocking at the door at length aroused me. I got up and opened it. No one was there: I looked around, as well as the coming gloom of evening would permit, but saw nothing. I listened, and heard, at some distance off, my friend Power's manly voice, as he sang,

"Oh! Love is the soul of an Irish dragon!"

I hallooed out, "Power."

"Eh, O'Malley, is that you?" inquired he. "Why, then, it seems it required some deliberation whether you opened your door or not. Why, man, you can have no great gift of prophecy, or you wouldn't have kept me so long there."

"And have you been so?"

"Only twenty minutes; for as I saw the key in the lock, I had determined to succeed if noise would do it."

"How strange! I never heard it."

"Glorious sleeper you must be; but come, my dear fellow, you do n't appear altogether awake yet."

"I have not been quite well these few days."

"Oh! indeed. The Dashwoods thought there must have been something of that kind the matter, by your briak retreat. They sent me after you yesterday; but wherever you went, heaven knows; I never could come up with you; so that your great news has been keeping these twenty-four hours longer than need be."

"I am not aware what you allude to."

"Well, you are not over likely to be the wiser, when you hear it, if you can assume no more intelligent look than that. Why, man, there's great luck in store for you."

"As how, pray. Come, Power, out with it, though I can't pledge myself to feel half as grateful for my good fortune as I should do. What is it?"

"You know Cameron?"

"I have seen him," said I, reddening.

"Well, old Camy, as we used to call him, has brought over among other news, your gazette."

"My gazette! What do you mean?"

"Confound your uncommon stupidity this evening: I mean, man, that you are one of us—gazetted to the 14th light—the best fellows for love, war, and whisky, that ever sported a sabertash. 'O, love is the soul of an Irish dragon.' By Jove, I am as delighted to have rescued you from the black harness of the King's Bench, as though you had been a prisoner there. Know, then, friend Charley, that on Wednesday we proceed to Fermoy, join some score of gallant fellows—all food for powder—and, with the aid of rotten transport, and the stormy winds that blow, will be bronzing our beautiful faces in Portugal before the month's out. But come, now let's see about supper; some of ours are coming over here at eleven, and I promised them a devilled bone; and, as it's your last night among these classic precincts, let us have a shindy of it."

While I despatched Mike to Morrison's to provide supper, I heard from Power that Sir George Dashwood had interested himself so strongly for me, that I had obtained my cornetcy in the 14th; that, fearful lest any disappointment might arise, he had never mentioned the matter to me, but that he had previously obtained my uncle's promise to concur in the arrangement, if his negotiation succeeded. It had so done; and now the long-sought-for object of many days was within my grasp; but, alas! the circumstance which lent it all its fascinations was a vanished dream; and what, but two days before, had rendered my happiness perfect, I listened to listlessly and almost without interest. Indeed, my first impulse on finding that I owed my promotion to Sir George, was to return a positive refusal of the cornetcy; but then I remembered how deeply such conduct would hurt my poor old uncle, to whom I never could give an adequate explanation. So I heard Power in silence to the end, thanked him sincerely for his own good-natured kindness in the matter, which already, by the interest he had taken in me, went far to heal the wounds that my own solitary musings were deepening in my heart. At eighteen, fortunately consolations are attainable that become more difficult at eight-and-twenty, and impossible at eight-and-thirty.

While Power continued to dilate upon the delights of a soldier's life—a theme which many a boyish dream had long since made hallowed to my thoughts—I gradually felt my enthusiasm rising, and a certain throbbing at my heart betrayed to me that, sad and dispirited as I felt, there was still within that buoyant spirit which youth possesses as its privilege, and which answers to the call of enterprise as the war-horse to the trumpet. That a career worthy of manhood, great, glorious, and inspiring, opened before me, coming so soon after the late downfall of all my hopes, was, in itself, a source of such true pleasure, that ere long I listened to my friend, and heard his narrative with breathless interest. A lingering sense of pique, too, had its share in all this. I longed to come forward in some manly and dashing part, where my youth might not be ever remembered against me, and when, having brought myself to the test, I might no longer be looked upon and treated as a boy.

We were joined at length by the other officers of the 14th, and, to the number of twelve, sat down to supper.

It was to be my last night in old Trinity, and we resolved that the farewell should be a solemn one. Mansfield, one of the wildest young fellows in the regiment, had vowed that the leave-taking should be commemorated by some very decisive and open expression of our feelings, and had already made some progress in arrangements for blowing up the great bell, which had more than once obtruded upon our morning convivialities; but he was overruled by his more discreet associates, and we at length assumed our places at table, in the midst of which stood a hecatomb of all my college equipments, cap, gown, &c. A funeral pile of classics was arrayed upon the hearth, surmounted by my "Book on the Cellar," and a punishment roll waved its length, like a banner, over the doomed heroes of Greece and Rome.

It is seldom that any very determined attempt to be gay par excellence has a perfect success; but certainly upon this evening ours had. Songs, good stories, speeches, toasts, bright visions of the campaign before us, the wild excitement which such a meeting cannot be free from, gradually, as the wine passed from hand to hand, seized upon all; and about four in the morning, such was the uproar we caused, and so terrific the noise of our proceedings, that the accumulated force of porters, sent one by one to demand admission, was now a formidable body at the door; and Mike, at last, came in to assure us that the Bursar, the most dread official of all collegians, was without, and insisted, with a threat of his heaviest displeasure in case of refusal, that the door should be opened.

A committee of the whole house immediately sat upon the question, and it was at length resolved, nemine contradicente, that the request should be complied with. A fresh bowl of punch, in honor of our expected guest, was immediately concocted, a new broil put on the gridiron, and, having seated ourselves with as great a semblance of decorum as four bottles a man admits of, Curtis, the junior captain, being most drunk, was deputed to receive the Bursar at the door, and introduce him to our august presence.

Mike's instructions were, that immediately on Dr. Stone, the Bursar's entering, the door was to be slammed to, and none of his followers admitted. This done, the Doctor was to be ushered in, and left to our own polite attentions.

A fresh thundering from without scarcely left time for further deliberation; and at last Curtis moved toward the door, in execution of his mission.

"Is there any one there?" said Mike, in a tone of most unsophisticated innocence, to a rapping, that, having lasted three quarters of an hour, threatened now to break in the panel. "Is there any one there?"

"Open the door this instant—the senior Bursar desires you—this instant."

"Sure it's night, and we're all in bed," said Mike.

"Mr. Webber—Mr. O'Malley," said the Bursar, now boiling with indignation. "I summon you, in the name of the Board, to admit me."

"Let the gemmen in," hiccupped Curtis; and, at the same instant, the heavy bars were withdrawn, and the door opened, but so sparingly as with difficulty to admit the passage of the burly figure of the Bursar.

Forcing his way through, and, regardless of what became of the rest, he pushed on vigorously through the ante-chamber, and, before Curtis could perform his functions of usher, stood in the midst of us. What were his feelings at the scene before him, heaven knows. The number of figures in uniform at once betrayed how little his jurisdiction extended to the great mass of the company, and he immediately turned towards me.

"Mr. Webber—"

"O'Malley, if you please, Mr. Bursar," said I, bowing with most ceremonious politeness.

"No matter, sir; arcades ambo, I believe."

"Both archdeacons," said Melville, translating, with a look of withering contempt upon the speaker.

The Doctor continued, addressing me:—

"May I ask, sir, if you believe yourself possessed of any privilege for converting this university into a common tavern?"

"I wished to heaven he did," said Curtis; "capital tap your old commons would make."

"Really, Mr. Bursar," replied I, modestly, "I had begun to flatter myself that our little innocent gaiety had inspired you with the idea of joining our party."

"I humbly move that the old cove in the gown do take the chair," sang out one. "All who are of this opinion say, 'Ay'—a perfect yell of eyes followed this. "All who are of the contrary say, 'No.' The eyes have it."

Before the luckless Doctor had a moment for thought, his legs were lifted from under him, and he was jerked rather than placed upon a chair, and put sitting upon the table.

"Mr. O'Malley, your expulsion within twenty-four hours—"

"Hip, hip, hurra, hurra, hurra!" drowned the rest, while Power, taking off the Doctor's cap, replaced it by a foraging cap, very much to the amusement of the party.

"There is no penalty the law permits of, that I shall not—"

"Help the Doctor," said Melville, placing a glass of punch in his unconscious hand.

"Now for a 'Viva la Compagnie,'" said Telford, seating himself at the piano, and playing the first bars of that well-known air, to which, in our meetings, we were accustomed to improvise a doggerel in turn:—

"I drink to the graces, Law, Physic, Divinity,
Viva la Compagnie;
And here's to the worthy old Bursar of Trinity,
Viva la Compagnie."

"Viva, viva la va," &c. were chorused with a shout that shook the old walls, while Power took up the strain:—

"Though with lace caps and gowns they look so like asses,
Viva la Compagnie,
They'd rather have punch than the springs of Parnassus,
Viva la Compagnie.
What a nose the old gentleman has, by the way,
Viva la Compagnie,
Since he smelt out the devil from Botany Bay.*
Viva la Compagnie."

Words cannot give even the faintest idea of the poor Bursar's feelings while these demoniacal orgies were enacting around him. Held fast in his chair by Lechmere and another, he glowered on the riotous mob around like a maniac, and astonishment that such liberties could be taken with one in his situation seemed to have surpassed even his rage and resentment; and every now and then a stray thought would flash across his mind that we were mad, a sentiment which, unfortunately, our conduct was but too well calculated to inspire.

"So you're the morning lecturer, old gentleman, and have just dropped in here in the way of business: pleasant life you must have of it," said Casey, now by far the most tipsy man present.

"If you think, Mr. O'Malley, that the events of this evening are to end here?"

"Very far from it, Doctor," said Power; "I'll draw up a little account of the affair for 'Saunders.' They shall hear of it in every corner and nook of the kingdom."

"Bursar of Trinity shall be a proverb for a good fellow that loveth his lish," hiccupped out Fegan.

"And if you believe that such conduct is academical," said the Doctor, with a withering sneer—

"Perhaps not," lisped Melvill, tightening his belt; "but it's devilish convivial—eh, Doctor?"

* Botany Bay is the slang name given by College men to a new square rather remotely situated from the remainder of the College.

"Is that like him?" said Moreton, producing a caricature, which he had just sketched.

"Capital—very good—perfect. McCleary shall have it in his window by noon to-day," said Power.

At this instant some of the combustibles disposed among the rejected habiliments of my late vocation caught fire, and squibs, crackers, and detonating shots went off on all sides. The Bursar, who had not been deaf to several hints and friendly suggestions, about setting fire to him, blowing him up, &c., with one vigorous spring burst from his antagonists, and, clearing the table at a bound, reached the floor. Before he could be seized he had gained the door—opened it, and was away. We gave chase, yelling like so many devils; but wine and punch, songs and speeches had done their work, and more than one among the pursuers measured his length upon the pavement: while the terrified Bursar, with the speed of terror, held on his way, and gained his chambers, by about twenty yards in advance of Power and Melville, whose pursuit only ended when the oaken panel of the door shut them out from their victim. One loud cheer beneath his window served for our farewell to our friend, and we returned to my rooms. By this time a regiment of those classic functionaries, yapped porters, had assembled around the door, and seemed bent upon giving battle in honor of their maltreated ruler; but Power explained to them, in a neat speech, replete with Latin quotations, that their cause was a weak one, that we were more than their match, and, finally, proposed to them to finish the punch-bowl, to which we were really incompetent, a motion that met immediate acceptance; and old Duncan, with his helmet in one hand, and a goblet in the other, wished me many happy days, and every luck in this life, as I stepped from the massive archway, and took my last farewell of old Trinity.

Should any kind reader feel interested as to the ulterior course assumed by the Bursar, I have only to say that the terrors of the "Board" were never fulminated against me, harmless and innocent as I should have esteemed them. The threat of giving publicity to the entire proceedings by the papers, and the dread of figuring in a sixpenny caricature in McCleary's window, were too much for the worthy Doctor, and he took the wiser course, under the circumstances, and held his peace about the matter. I too have done so for many a year, and only now recall the scene among the wild transactions of early days and boyish follies.

CHAPTER XXI.—The Phoenix Park.

WHAT a glorious thing it is, when our first waking thoughts not only dispel some dark depressing dream, but arouse us to the consciousness of a new and bright career suddenly opening before us, buoyant in hope, rich in promise for the future. Life has nothing better than this. The bold spring by which the mind clears the depth that separates misery from happiness, is ecstasy itself; and, then, what a world of bright visions come teeming before us; what plans we form; what promises we make to ourselves in our own hearts: how prolific is the dullest imagination; how exursive the tamest fancy, at such a moment! In a few short and fleeting seconds, the events of a whole life are planned and pictured before us. Dreams of happiness and visions of bliss, of which all our after years are insufficient to eradicate the prestige, come in myriads about us; and from that narrow aperture through which this new hope pierces into our heart, a flood of light is poured that illumines our path to the very verge of the grave. How many a success in after days is reckoned as but one step in that ladder of ambition some boyish review has framed, perhaps, after all, destined to be the first and only one! With what triumph we hail some goal attained, some object of our wishes gained, less for its present benefit, than as the accomplishment of some youthful prophecy, when picturing to our hearts all that we would have in life, we whispered within us the flattery of success.

Who is there who has not had some such moment, and who would exchange it, with all the delusive and deceptive influences by which it comes surrounded, for the greatest actual happiness he has partaken of? Alas, alas! it is only in the boundless expanse of such imaginings, unreal and fictitious as they are, that we are truly blessed. Our choicest blessings in life come ever so associated with some sources of care, that the cup of enjoyment is not pure, but dregged in bitterness.

To such a world of bright anticipation did I awake on the morning after the events I have detailed in my last chapter. The first thing my eyes fell upon was an official letter from the Horse Guards:

"The Commander of the Forces desires that Mr. O'Malley will repair immediately on the receipt of this letter to the head quarters of the regiment to which he is gazetted."

Few and simple as the lines were, how brimful of pleasure they sounded to my ears. The regiment to which I was gazetted! and so I was a soldier at last: the first wish of my boyhood was then really accomplished; and my uncle, what will he say? what will he think?

"A letter, sir, by the post," said Mike, at the moment.

I seized it eagerly; it came from home, but was in Conscience's handwriting; how my heart failed me as I turned to look at the seal! "Thank God," said I aloud, on perceiving that it was a red one. I now tore it open and read:—

"My dear Charley,—Godfrey, being laid up with the gout, has desired me to write to you by this day's post.—Your appointment to the 14th, notwithstanding all his prejudices about the army, has given him sincere pleasure. I believe, between ourselves, that your college career, of which he has heard something, convinced him that your forte did not lie in the classics; you know I said so always, but nobody minded me. Your new prospects are all that your best friends could wish for you; you begin early; your corps is a crack one; you are ordered for service.—What could you have more?"

"Your uncle hopes, if you can get a few days' leave, that you will come down here before you join, and I hope so too; for he is unusually low spirited, and talks about his never seeing you again, and all that sort of thing."

"I have written to Merivale, your colonel, on this subject, as well as generally on your behalf; we were cornets together forty years ago; a strict fellow you'll find him, but a trump on service. If you can't manage the leave, write a long letter home at all events; and so God bless you, and all success.

"Yours sincerely,
"W. CONSIDINE."

"I had thought of writing you a long letter of advice for your new career, and, indeed, half accomplished one. After all, however, I can tell you little that your own good sense will not teach you as you go on, and experience is ever better than precept. I know of but one rule in life which admits of scarcely any exception, and having followed it upward of sixty years, approve of it only the more: Never quarrel when you can help it; but meet any man—your tailor, your hair-dresser—if he wishes to have you out."

"W. C."

I had scarcely come to the end of this very characteristic epistle, when two more letters were placed upon my table. One was from Sir George Dashwood, inviting me to dinner, to meet some of my "brother officers." How my heart beat at the expression; the other was a short note, marked "private," from my late tutor, Dr. Mooney, saying, that "if I made a suitable apology to the Bursar, for the late affair at my room, he might probably be induced to abandon any further step;" otherwise—then followed innumerable threats about fine, penalties, expulsion, &c., that fell most harmlessly upon my ears. I accepted the invitation; declined the apology; and, having ordered my horse, cantered off to the barracks to consult my friend Power as to all the minor details of my career.

As the dinner hour drew near, my thoughts became again fixed upon Miss Dashwood, and a thousand misgivings crossed my mind, as to whether I should have nerve enough to meet her, without disclosing in my manner the altered state of my feelings, a possibility which I now dreaded fully as much as I had longed some days before to avow my affection for her, however slight its prospects of return. All my valiant resolves and well-contrived plans for appearing unmoved and indifferent in her presence, with which I stored my mind while dressing, and when on my way to dinner, were, however, needless, for it was a party exclusively of men; and, as the coffee was served in the dinner-room, no move was made to the drawing room by any of the company. Quite as well as it is, was my muttered opinion, as I got into my cab at the door. All at an end as regards me in her esteem, and I must not spend my days sighing for a young lady that cares for another. Very reasonable, very proper resolutions these; but alas! I went home, to bed, only to think half the night of the fair Lucy, and dream of her the remainder of it.

When morning dawned, my first thought was, Shall I see her once more? shall I leave her forever thus abruptly? or, rather, shall I not unburden my bosom of its secret, confess my love, and say farewell? I felt such a course to be more in unison with my wishes, than the day before; and, as Power had told me that before a week we should present ourselves at Fermoy, I knew that no time was to be lost.

My determination was taken. I ordered my horse, and early as it was, rode out to the Royal Hospital. My heart beat so strongly as I rode up to the door, that I half resolved to return. I rang the bell, Sir George was in town. Miss Dashwood had just gone five minutes before to spend some days at Carton. It is fate, thought I, as I turned from the spot, and walked slowly beside my horse towards Dublin.

In the few days that intervened before my leaving town, my time was occupied from morning till night: the various details of my uniform, outfit, &c., were undertaken for me by Power. My horses were sent for to Galway, and I myself, with innumerable persons to see, and a mass of business to transact, contrived, at least three times a day, to ride out to the Royal Hospital, always to make some trifling inquiry for Sir George, and always to hear repeated that Miss Dashwood had not returned.

Thus passed five of my last six days in Dublin, and, as the morning of the last opened, it was with a sorrowing spirit that I felt my hour of departure approach, without one only opportunity of seeing Lucy, even to say good-bye.

While Mike was packing in one corner, and I in another was concluding a long letter to my poor uncle, my door opened, and Webber entered.

"Eh, O'Malley, I'm only in time to say adieu! it seems. To my surprise this morning I found you had cut the "Silent Sister." I feared I should be too late to catch one glimpse of you ere you started for the wars."

"You are quite right, Master Frank, and I scarcely expected to have seen you. Your last brilliant achievement at Sir George's very nearly involved me in a serious scrape."

"A mere trifle. How confounded silly Power must have looked eh? Should like so much as to have seen his face. He looked up next day—very proper fellow. By the bye, O'Malley, I rather like the little girl; she is decidedly pretty: and her foot! did you remark her foot?—capital!"

"Yes, she's very good-looking," said I, carelessly.

"I'm thinking of cultivating her a little," said Webber, pulling up his cravat and adjusting his hair in the glass,—"She's spoiled by all the tinsel vaporing of her hussar and aid-de-camp acquaintances; but something may be done for her, eh?"

"With your most able assistance and kind intentions."

"That's what I mean exactly. Sorry you're going—devilish sorry. You served out Stone gloriously: perhaps it's as well, though; you know they'd have expelled you: but still something might turn up; soldiering is a bad style of a thing, eh? How the old General did take his sister-in-law's presence to heart! But he must forgive and forget, for I'm going to be very great friends with him and Lucy. Where are you going now?"

"I'm about to try a new horse before the troops," said I. "He's staunch enough with the cry of the fox-pack in his ears, but I don't know how he'll stand a peal of artillery."

"Well, come along," said Webber, "I'll ride with you." So saying, we mounted and set off to the Park, where two regiments of cavalry and some horse artillery were ordered for inspection.

The review was over when we reached the exercising ground, and we slowly walked our horses toward the end of the Park, intending to return to Dublin by the road. We had not proceeded far, when some hundred yards in advance, we perceived an officer riding with a lady, followed by an orderly dragoon.

"There he goes," said Webber; "I wonder if he'd ask me to dinner if I were to throw myself in his way?"

"Who do you mean?" said I.

"Sir George Dashwood, to be sure, and, la voila, Miss Lucy. The little darling rides well, too: how squarely she sits her horse. O'Malley, I have a weakness there; upon my soul, I have."

"Very possibly," said I; "I am aware of another friend of mine participating in the sentiment."

"One Charles O'Malley, of his Majesty's—"

"Nonsense, man—no, no. I mean a very different person, and, for all I can see, with some reason to hope for success."

"Oh, as to that, we flatter ourselves the thing does not present any very considerable difficulties."

"As how, pray?"

"Why, of course, like all such matters, a very decisive determination. To be, to do, and to suffer, as Lindley Murray says, carries the day. Tell her she's an angel every day for three weeks. She may laugh a little at first, but she'll believe it in the end. Tell her that you have not the slightest prospect of obtaining her affection, but still persist in loving her. That, finally, you must die from the effects of despair, &c., but rather like the notion of it than otherwise. That you know she has no fortune; that you have not a sixpence; and who should marry if people whose position in the world was similar did not?"

"But halt: pray how are you to get time and place for all such interesting conversations?"

"Time and place! Good heavens, what a question! Is not every hour of the twenty-four the fittest; is not every place the most suitable? A sudden pause in the organ in St. Patrick's did, it is true, catch me once in a declaration of love; but the choir came in to my aid, and drowned the lady's answer. My dear O'Malley, what could prevent you this instant, if you are so disposed, from doing the amiable to the darling Lucy, there?"

"With the father for an umpire, in case we disagreed," said I.

"Not at all. I should soon get rid of him."

"Impossible, my dear friend."

"Come now, just for the sake of convincing your obstinacy. If you like to say good-bye to the little girl without a witness, I'll take off the he-dragon."

"You do not mean—"

"I do, man—I do mean it." So saying, he drew a crimson silk handkerchief from his pocket, and fastened it round his waist like an officer's sash. This done, and telling me to keep in their wake, for some minutes, he turned from me, and was soon concealed by a copse of white-thorn near us.

I had not gone above a hundred yards farther, when I heard Sir George's voice calling for the orderly. I looked, and saw Webber at a considerable distance in front, curvetting and playing all species of antics. The distance between the General and myself was now so short, that I overheard the following dialogue with the sentry:

"He's not in uniform, then?"

"No, sir; he has a round hat."

"A round hat!"

"His sash—"

"A sword and sash. This is too bad. I'm determined to find him out. Follow, then."

"How d'ye do, General?" said Webber, as he rode toward the trees.

"Stop, sir," shouted Sir George.

"Good day, Sir George," replied Webber, retiring.

"Stay where you are, Lucy," said the General, as dashing spurs into his horse, he sprang forward at a gallop, incensed beyond endurance that his most strict orders should be so openly and insultingly transgressed.

Webber led on to a deep hollow, where the road passed between two smooth slopes, covered with furze trees, and from which it emerged afterward in the thickest and most intricate part of the Park. Sir George dashed boldly after, and, in less than half a minute, both were lost to my view, leaving me in breathless amazement at Master Frank's ingenuity, and some puzzle as to my own future movements.

"Now then, or never," said I, as I pushed boldly forward, and in an instant was alongside of Miss Dashwood.

Her astonishment at seeing me so suddenly increased the confusion from which I felt myself suffering, and, for some minutes, I could scarcely speak. At last, I plucked up courage a little, and said—

"Miss Dashwood, I have looked most anxiously, for the last four days, for the moment which chance has now given me. I wished, before I parted for ever with those to whom I owe already so much, that I should, at least, speak my gratitude ere I said good-bye."

"But when do you think of going?"

"To-morrow; Captain Power, under whose command I am, has received orders to embark immediately for Portugal."

I thought—perhaps it was but a thought—that her cheek grew somewhat paler as I spoke; but she remained silent; and I, scarcely knowing what I had said, or whether I had finished, spoke not either.

"Papa, I'm sure, is not aware," said she, after a long pause, "of your intention of leaving so soon; for, only last night, he spoke of some letters he meant to give you to some friends in the Peninsula; beside, I know"—here she smiled faintly—"that he destined some excellent advice for your ears, as to your new path in life, for he has an immense opinion of the value of such to a young officer."

"I am, indeed, most grateful to Sir George, and, truly never did any one stand more in need of counsel than I do." This was said half musingly, and not intended to be heard.

"Then, pray, consult Papa," said she, eagerly; "he is much attached to you, and will, I'm certain, do all in his power—"

"Alas! I fear not, Miss Dashwood."

"Why, what can you mean? has any thing serious occurred?"

"No, no; I'm but misleading you, and exciting your sympathy with false pretences. Should I tell you all the truth, you would not pardon, perhaps not hear me."

"You have, indeed, puzzled me; but, if there is any thing in which my father—"

"Less him than his daughter," said I, fixing my eyes upon her as I spoke. "Yes, Lucy, I feel I must confess it, cost what it may, I love you; stay, hear me out: I know the fruitlessness, the utter despair, that awaits such a sentiment. My own heart tells me that I am not, cannot be, loved in return; yet, would I rather cherish in its core my affection slighted and unblessed, such as it is, than own another heart. I ask for nothing; I hope for nothing; I merely entreat that, for my truth, I may meet belief, and, for my heart's worship of her whom alone I can love, compassion. I see that you at least pity me. Nay, one word more; I have one favor more to ask; it is my last, my only one. Do not, when time and distance may have separated us—perhaps, for ever, think that the expressions I now use are prompted by a mere sudden ebullition of boyish feeling: do not attribute to the circumstances of my youth alone the warmth of the attachment I profess; for I swear to you, by every hope I have, that, in my heart of hearts, my love to you is the source and spring of every aspiration in my heart; and, when I cease to love you, I shall cease to feel.

"And now, farewell: farewell for ever." I pressed her hand to my lips, gave one long last look, turned my horse rapidly away, and, ere a minute, was far out of sight of where I left her.

CHAPTER XXII.—The Road.

Power was detained in town by some orders from the adjutant-general, so that I started for Cork, the next morning, with no other companion than my servant Mike. For the first few stages upon the road, my own thoughts sufficiently occupied me, to render me insensible or indifferent to all else. My opening career—the prospects my new life as a soldier held out—my hopes of distinction—my love of Lucy, with all its train of doubts and fears—passed in review before me, and I took no note of time till far past noon. I now looked to the back part of the coach, where Mike's voice had been, as usual, in the ascendant for some time, and perceived that he was surrounded by an eager auditory of four raw recruits, who, under the care of a sergeant, were proceeding to Cork to be enrolled in their regiment. The sergeant, whose minutes of wakefulness were only these, when the coach stopped to change horses, and when he got down to mix a "summat hot," paid little attention to his followers, leaving them perfectly free in all their movements, to listen to Mike's eloquence, and profit by his suggestions, should they deem fit. Master Michael's services to his new acquaintances, I began to perceive, were not of the same nature as Dibdin is reported to have rendered to our navy in the late war. Far from it; his theme was no contemptuous disdain for danger—no patriotic enthusiasm to fight for home and country—no proud consciousness of British valor, mingled with the appropriate hatred of our mutual enemies; on the contrary, Mike's eloquence was enlisted for the defendant. He detailed, and in no unimpressive way either, the hardships of a soldier's life, its dangers, its vicissitudes, its chances, its possible penalties, its inevitably small rewards, and, in fact, so completely did he work on the feelings of his hearers, that I perceived more than one glance exchanged between the victims, that certainly betokened any thing save the resolve to fight for King George. It was at the close of a long and most powerful appeal upon the superiority of any other line of life, petty larceny and small felony inclusive, that he concluded with the following quotation:—

"Thru' for ye boys!"

"With your red scarlet coat,
You're as proud as a goat,
And your long cap and feather."

"But by the piper that played before Moses, it's more whipping nor gingerbread is going on amongst them; ay ye knew but all, and heered the misfortune that happened to my father."

"And was he a soger?" inquired one.

"Troth was he, more sorrow to him, and was n't he a most whipped, one day, for doing what he was bid."

"Musha, but that was hard."

"To be sure it was hard; but faix, when my father seen that they did n't know their own minds, he thought, anyhow, he knew his, so he ran away; and devil a bit of him they ever cotch afther. Maybe, ye might like to hear the story, and there's instruction in it for ye too."

A general request to this end being preferred by the company, Mike took a shrewd look at the sergeant, to be sure that he was still sleeping, settled his coat comfortably across his knees, and began:

"Well, it's a good many years ago my father listed in the North Cork, just to oblige Mr. Barry, the landlord there; 'for,' says he, 'Phil,' says he, 'it's not a soldier ye'll be at all, but my own man, to brush my clothes and go errands, and the like o' that, and the king, long life to him, will help to pay ye for your trouble—ye understand me.' Well, my father agreed, and Mr. Barry was as good as his word. Never a guard did my father mount, nor as much as a drill had he, nor a roll-call, nor any thing at all, save and except wait on the Captain, his master, just as pleasant as need be, and no inconvenience in life."

"Well, for three years, this went on as I'm telling, and the regiment was ordered down to Banthry, because of a report that the 'boys' was rising down there; and the second evening there was a night party patrolling, with Captain Barry, for six hours in the rain, and the Captain, God be merciful to him, tuk cowl and died; more betoken, they said it was drink, but my father says it wasn't; 'for,' says he, 'after he tuk eight tumblers comfortable,' my father mixed the ninth, and the Captain waved his hand this way, as much as to say he'd have no more. 'Is it that ye mean?' says my father, and the Captain nodded. 'Musha, but it's sorry I am,' says my father, 'to see yow this way, for ye must be bad entirely to leave off in the beginning of the evening.' And thru' for him, the Captain was dead in the morning."

"A sorrowful day it was for my father when he died; it was the finest place in the world: little to do; plenty of diversion; and a kind man he was—when he was drunk. Well, then, when the Captain was buried, and all was over; my father hoped they'd be for letting him away, as he said 'Sure, I'm no use in life to anybody, save the man that's gone, for his ways are all I know, and I never was a soger.' But, upon my conscience, they had other thoughts in their head; for they ordered him into the ranks to be drilled just like the recruits they took the day before."

"Musha, isn't this hard?" said my father; 'here I am an old vitrin that ought to be discharged on a pension, with two-and-sixpence a day, obliged to go capering about the barrack yard practising the goose step, or some other nonsense not becoming my age nor my habits; but so it was. Well, this went on for some time, and, sure, if they were hard on my father, hadn't he his revenge, for he nigh broke their hearts with his stupidity; oh! nothing in life could equal him; devil a thing, no matter how easy, he could learn at all, and, so far from caring for being in confinement it was what he liked best. Every sergeant in the regiment had a trial of him, but all to no good, and he seemed striving so hard to learn all the while, that they were loath to punish him, the ould rogue!

"This was going on for some time, when, one day, news came in that a body of the rebels, as they called them, was coming down from the Gap of Mulnavick, to storm the town, and burn all before them. The whole regiment was of course under arms, and a great preparation was made for a battle; meanwhile patrols were ordered to scour the roads, and sentries posted at every turn of the way and every rising ground, to give notice when the boys came in sight, and my father was placed at the bridge of Drumanag, in the wildest and bleakest part of the whole country, with nothing but furze mountains on every side, and a straight road going over the top of them.

"This is pleasant," says my father, as soon as they left him there alone by himself, with no human creature to speak to, nor a whisky shop within ten miles of him; 'cowl comfort,' says he, 'on a winter's day, and faix but I've a mind to give ye the slip.'

"Well, he put his gun down on the bridge, and he lit his pipe, and he sat down under an ould tree, and began to ruminate upon his affairs.

"Oh, then, it's wishing it well I am," says he, 'for sogering; and, bad luck to the hammer that struck the shilling that listed me, that's all,' for he was mighty low in his heart.

"Just then a noise came rattling down near him; he listened; and before he could get on his legs, down comes the General, ould Cohoon, with an orderly after him.

"Who goes that?" says my father.

"The round," says the General, looking about all the time to see where was the sentry, for my father was snug under the tree.

"What round?" says my father.

"The grand round," says the General, more puzzled than afore.

"Pass on, grand round, and God save you kindly," says my father, putting his pipe in his mouth again, for he thought all was over.

"D—n your soul, where are you?" says the General; for sorrow bit of my father could he see yet.

"It's here I am," says he, 'and a cowl place I have of it; and av it was n't for the pipe I'd be lost entirely.'

"The words was n't well out of his mouth, when the General began laughing till ye'd think he'd fall off his horse: and the dragoon behind him—more by token, they say it was n't right for him—laughed as loud as himself.

"Yer a droll sentry," says the General, as soon as he could speak.

"Be gorra, it's little fun there's left in me," says my father, 'with this drilling, and parading, and blackguarding about the roads all night.'

"And is this the way you salute your officer?" says the General.

"Just so," says my father; 'devil a more politeness ever they taught me.'

"What regiment do you belong to?" says the General.

"The North Cork, bad luck to them," says my father, with a sigh.

"They ought to be proud of ye," says the General.

"I'm sorry for it," says my father, sorrowfully, 'for maybe they'll keep me the longer.'

"Well, my good fellow," says the General, 'I have n't more time to waste here; but let me teach you something before I go. Whenever your officer passes, it's your duty to present arms to him.'

"Arrah, it's jokin' ye are," says my father.

"No, I'm in earnest," says he, 'as ye might learn to your cost, if I brought you to a court-martial.'

"Well, there's no knowing," says my father, 'what they'd be up to; but sure if that's all, I'll do it with all the veins,' whenever yer coming this way again.'

"The General began to laugh again here, but said:—

"I'm coming back in the evening," says he, 'and mind you don't forget your respect to your officer.'

"Never fear, sir," says my father; 'and many thanks to you for your kindness for the telling me.'

"Away went the General, and the orderly after him, and, in ten minutes, they were out of sight.

"The night was falling fast, and one half of the mountain was quite dark already, when my father began to think they were forgetting him entirely. He looked one way, and he looked another, but sorra bit of a sergeant's guard was coming to relieve him. There he was, fresh and fasting, and dare n't go for the bare life. 'I'll give you a quarter of an hour more,' says my father, 'till the light leaves that rock up there: after that,' says he, 'by the mass! I'll be off, av it cost me what it may.'

"Well, sure enough, his courage was not needed this time; for what did he see at the same moment but the shadow of something coming down the road, opposite the bridge; he looked again; and then he made out the General himself, that was walking his horse down the steep part of the mountain, followed by the orderly. My father immediately took up his musket off the wall, settled his belts, shook the ashes out of his pipe, and put it into his pocket, making himself as smart and neat looking as he could be, determining, when ould Cohoon come up, to ask him for leave to go home, at least for the night. Well, by this time, the General was turning a sharp part of the cliff that looks down upon the bridge, from where you might look five miles round on every side. 'He sees me,' says my father; 'but I'll be just as quick as himself.' No sooner said than done; for, coming forward to the parapet of the bridge, he up with his musket to his shoulder, and presented it straight at the General. It was n't well there, when the officer pulled up his horse quite short, and shouted out, 'Sentry—sentry!'

"Anan!" says my father, still covering him.

"Down with your musket, you rascal: don't you see it's the grand round?"

"To be sure I do," says my father, 'never changing for a minute.'

"The ruffian will shoot me," says the General.

"Devil a fear," says my father, 'av it does n't go off itself.'

"What do you mean by that, you villain?" says the General scarce able to speak with fright, for every turn he gave on his horse my father followed with the gun—'What do you mean?'

"Sure, ain't I presenting," says my father: 'blood and ages, do you want me to fire next?'

"With that the General drew a pistol from his holster, and took deliberate aim at my father; and there they both stood for five minutes, looking at each other, the orderly, all the while, breaking his heart laughing behind a rock; for, ye see, the General knew av he retreated that my father might fire on purpose, and av he came on that he might fire by chance; and sorra bit he knew what was best to be done.

"Are ye going to pass the evening up there, Grand Round?" says my father, 'for it's tired I'm getting houldin' this so long?'

"Port arms," shouted the General, as if on parade.

"Sure I can't, till yer passed," says my father, angrily, 'and my hand's trembling already.'

"By heavens! I shall be shot," says the General.

"Be gorra, it's what I'm afraid of," says my father; and the words was n't out of his mouth before off went the musket bang, and down fell the General smack on the ground senseless. Well, the orderly ran out at this, and took him up and examined his wound; but it was n't a wound at all, only the wadding of the gun, for my father—God be kind to him—ye see, could do nothing right, and so he bit off the wrong end of the cartridge when he put it in the gun, and by reason there was no bullet in it. Well, from that day after they never got sight of him, for the instant the General dropped, he sprang over the bridge wall, and got away; and what, between living in a lime-kiln for two months, eating nothing but blackberries and sloes, and other disguises, he never returned to the army, but ever after took to a civil situation, and driv a hearse for many years.

How far Mike's narrative might have contributed to the support of his theory, I am unable to pronounce; for his auditory were, at some distance from Cork, made to descend from their lofty position, and join a larger body of recruits, all proceeding to the same destination, under a strong escort of infantry. For ourselves, we reached the "beautiful city" in due time, and took up our quarters at the Old George Hotel.

CHAPTER XXIII....Cork.

The undress rehearsal of a new piece, with its dusty-booted actors, its cloak and hooded actresses en papalote, bears about the same relation to the gala, wax-lit and enspangled ballet as the raw young gentleman of yesterday to the epauletted, belted, and sabertashed dragoon, whose transformation is due to a few hours of head quarters, and a few interviews with the adjutant.

So, at least, I felt it; and it was with a perfect concurrence in his Majesty's taste in a uniform, and a most entire approval of the regimental tailor, that I strutted down George's-street a few days after my arrival in Cork. The transports had not as yet come round; there was a great doubt of their doing so for a week or so longer; and I found myself, as the dashing cornet, the centre of a thousand polite attentions and most kind civilities.

The officer under whose orders I was placed for the time, was a great friend of Sir George Dashwood's, and paid me in consequence, much attention. Major Dalrymple had been on the staff from the commencement of his military career—and served in the commissariat for some time—was much in foreign stations, but never, by any of the many casualties of his life, never had seen what could be called service. His ideas of the soldier's profession were, therefore, what might almost be as readily picked up by a commission in the battle-axe guards, as one in his Majesty's fifteenth. He was now a species of district paymaster, employed in a thousand ways, either inspecting recruits, examining accounts, revising sick certificates, or receiving contracts for mess beef. Whether the nature of his manifold occupations had enlarged the sphere of his talents and ambition, or whether the abilities had suggested the variety of his duties, I know not; but truly, the Major was a man of all work. No sooner did a young ensign join his regiment at Cork, than Major Dalrymple's card was left at his quarters; the next day came the Major himself; the third brought an invitation to dinner; on the fourth he was told to drop in, in the evening; and from thenceforward, he was the ami de la maison, in company with numerous others as newly fledged and inexperienced as himself.

One singular feature of the society at the house was that, although the Major was as well known as the flag on Spike Island, yet, somehow, no officer above the rank of an ensign was ever to be met with there. It was not that he had not a large acquaintance; in fact, the "how are you, Major—how goes it, Dalrymple," that kept everlastingly going on at he walked the streets, proved the reverse; but, strange enough, his predilections leaned toward the newly-gazetted, far before the bronzed and seared campaigners who had seen the world, and knew more about it. The reasons for this line of conduct were twofold; in the first place, there was not an article of outfit, from a stock to a sword-belt, that he could not, and did not supply to the young officer; from the gergel of the infantry to the shako of the grenadier, all came within his province; not that he actually kept a magasin of these articles, but he had so completely interwoven his interests with those of numerous shopkeepers in Cork, that he rarely entered a shop over whose door Dalrymple and Co. might not have figured on the sign-board. His stables were filled with a perfect infirmiry of superannuated chargers, fattened and conditioned up to a miracle, and groomed to perfection: he could get you—only you—about three dozen of sherry, to take out with you as sea-store: he knew of such a servant; he chanced upon such a camp-furniture yesterday in his walks: in fact, why want for anything? his resources were inexhaustible—his kindness unbounded.

Then, money was no object—hang it, you could pay when you liked—what signified it? In other words, a bill at thirty-one days, cashed and discounted by a friend of the Major's, would always do. While such was the unlimited advantage his acquaintance conferred, the sphere of his benefits took another range. The Major had two daughters: Matilda and Fanny were as well known in the army as Lord Fitzroy Somerset or Picton, from the Isle of Wight to Halifax, from Cape Coast to Chatham, from Belfast to the Bermudas. Where was the subaltern who had not knelt at the shrine of one or the other, if not of both, and avowed eternal love until a change of quarters. In plain words, the Major's solicitude for the service was such, that not content with providing the young officer with all the necessary outfit of his profession, he longed also to supply him with a comforter for his woes, a charmer for his solitary hours, in the person of one of his amiable daughters. Unluckily, however, the necessity for a wife is not enforced by "general orders," as is the cut of your coat, or the length of your sabre; consequently, the Major's success in the home department of his diplomacy was not destined for the same happy results that awaited it when engaged about drill trousers and camp kettles, and the Misses Dalrymple remained Misses through every clime and every campaign. And yet, why was it so? It is hard to say. What would men have? Matilda was dark-haired, dark-eyed, romantic-looking girl, with a tall figure and a slender waist, with more poetry in her head than would have turned an ordinary brain; always unhappy; in need of consolation; never meeting with the kindred spirit that understood her; destined to walk the world alone, her fair thoughts smothered in the recess of her own heart. Devilish hard to stand this, when you began in a kind of platonic friendship on both sides. More than one poor fellow nearly succumbed, particularly when she came to quote Cowley, and told, with tears in her eyes,

"There are hearts that live and love alone," &c.

I'm assured that this coup de grace rarely failed in being followed by a downright avowal of open love, which, somehow, what between the route coming, what with waiting for leave from home, &c., never got farther than a most tender scene, and exchange of love tokens; and, in fact, such became so often the termination, that Power swears Matilda had to make a firm resolve about cutting off any more hair, fearing a premature baldness during the recruiting season.

Now, Fanny had selected another arm of the service. Her hair was fair, her eyes blue, laughing, languishing, mischief-loving blue, with long lashes, and a look in them that was wont to leave its impression rather longer than you exactly knew of; then her figure was petite but perfect; her feet Canova might have copied; and her hand was a study for Titian; her voice, too, was soft and musical, but full of that gaieté du cœur that never fails to charm. While her sister's style was il penseroso, hers was l'allegro; every imaginable thing, place, or person supplied food for her mirth, and her sister's lovers all came in for their share. She hunted with Smith Barry's hounds; she yachted with the Cove Club; she coursed; practised at a mark with a pistol; and played chicken hazard with all the cavalry; for let it be remarked as a physiological fact, Matilda's admirers were almost invariably taken from the infantry, while Fanny's adorers were as regularly dragoons. Whether the former be the romantic arm of the service, and the latter be more adapted to dull realities, or whether the phenomenon had any other explanation, I leave to the curious. Now this arrangement proceeding upon that principle, which has wrought such wonders in Manchester and Sheffield—the division of labor—was a most wise and equitable one, each having her own separate and distinct field of action, interference was impossible; not but that when, as in the present instance, cavalry was in the ascendant, Fanny would willingly spare a dragoon or two to her sister, who likewise would repay the debt when occasion offered.

The mamma—for it is time I should say something of the head of the family—was an excessively fat, coarse-looking, dark-skinned personage, of some fifty years, with a voice like a boatswain in a quincey. Heaven can tell, perhaps, why the worthy Major allied his fortunes with hers, for she was evidently of a very inferior rank in society; could never have been caught than downright ugly; and I never heard that she brought him any money. Spoiled, five, the national amusement of her age and sex in Cork, scandal, the changes in the army list, the failures in speculation of her luckless husband, the forlorn fortunes of the girls, her daughters, kept her in occupation, and her days were passed in one perpetual unceasing current of dissatisfaction and ill temper with all around, that formed a heavy counterpoise to the fascinations of the young ladies. The repeated jiltings to which they had been subjected had blunted any delicacy upon the score of their marriage, and, if the newly introduced cornet or ensign was not coming forward, as became him, at the end of the requisite number of days, he was sure of receiving a very palpable admonition from Mrs. Dalrymple. Hints, at first, dimly shadowed that Matilda was not in spirits this morning; that Fanny, poor child, had a head-ache—directed especially to the culprit in question, grew gradually into those little motherly fondnesses in mamma, that, like the fascinations of the rattle-snake, only lure on to ruin. The doomed man was pressed to dinner when all others were permitted to take their leave; he was treated like one of the family, God help him! After dinner, the Major would keep him an hour over his wine, discussing the misery of an ill-assorted marriage, detailing his own happiness in marrying a woman like the Tonga Islander I have mentioned; hinting that girls should be brought up, not only to become companions to their husbands, but with ideas fitting their station; if his auditor were a military man, that none but an old officer (like him) could know how to educate girls (like his); and that, feeling he possessed two such treasures, his whole aim in life was to guard and keep them, a difficult task when proposals of the most flattering kind were coming constantly before him. Then followed a fresh bottle, during which the Major would consult his young friend upon a very delicate affair, no less than a proposition for the hand of Miss Matilda, or Fanny, whichever he was supposed to be soft upon. This was generally a coup de maître. Should he still resist, he was handed over to Mrs. Dalrymple, with a strong indictment against him, and rarely did he escape a heavy sentence. Now, is it not strange, that two really pretty girls, with fully enough of amiable and pleasing qualities to have excited the attention and won the affection of many a man, should have gone on for years—for, alas! they did so in every climate, under every sun—to waste their sweetness in this miserable career of intrigue and mantrap, and yet nothing come of it? But so it was: the first question a newly-landed regiment was asked, if coming from where they resided, was, "Well, how are the girls?" "Oh, gloriously. Matty is there." "Ah, indeed! poor thing." "Has Fan sported a new habit?" "Is it the old grey with the hussar braiding? confound it, that was seedy when I saw them in Corfu. And mother Dal. as fat and vulgar as ever. Dawson of ours was the last, and was called up for sentence when we were ordered away: of course, he bolted," &c. Such was the invariable style of question and answer concerning them; and, although some few, either from good feeling or fastidiousness, relished but little the mode in which it had become habitual to treat them, I grieve to say that, generally, they were pronounced fair game for every species of flirtation and love-making without any "intentions" for the future. I should not have trespassed so far on my readers' patience, were it not, in recounting these traits of my friends above, narrating matters of history. How many are there who may cast their eyes upon these pages, that will say, "Poor Matilda, I knew her at Gibraltar. Little Fanny was the life and soul of us all in Quebec."

"Mr. O'Malley," said the Adjutant, as I presented myself in the afternoon of my arrival in Cork, to a short punchy little red-faced gentleman, in a short jacket and ducks, "you are, I perceive, appointed to the 14th; you will have the goodness to appear on parade to-morrow morning. The riding-school hours are ———. The morning drill is ———; evening drill ———."

Mr. Minchin, you are a 14th man, I believe; no, I beg pardon, a Carbineer, but no matter—Mr. O'Malley, Mr. Minchin, Captain Dounie, Mr. O'Malley: you'll dine with us to-day, and to-morrow you shall be entered at the mess."

"Yours are at Santarem, I believe," said an old weather-beaten looking officer with one arm.

"I'm ashamed to say, I know nothing whatever of them; I received my gazette unexpectedly enough."

"Ever in Cork before, Mr. O'Malley?"

"Never," said I.

"Glorious place," lisped a white eyelashed, knocker-kneed ensign; "splendid gala, eh?"

"Ah, Branton," said Minchin, "you may boast a little; but we poor devils."

"Know the Dals?" said the hero of the lisp, addressing me.

"I have n't that honor," I replied, scarcely able to guess whether what he alluded to were objects of the picturesque, or a private family.

"Introduce him, then, at once," said the Adjutant; "We'll all go in the evening. What will the old squaw think?"

"Not I," said Minchin; "she wrote to the Duke of York about my helping Matilda at supper, and not having any honorable intentions afterward."

"We dine at 'The George' to-day, Mr. O'Malley, sharp seven; until then ———." So saying, the little man bustled back to his accounts, and I took my leave with the rest, to stroll about the town till dinner time.

CHAPTER XXIV....The Adjutant's Dinner.

THE Adjutant's dinner was as professional an affair as need be. A circuit or a learned society could not have been more exclusively devoted to their own separate and immediate topics, than we; pipeclay in all its varieties came on the topis—the last regulation cap; the new button; the promotions; the general orders; the colonel, and the colonel's wife; stoppages, and the mess fund, were all well and ably discussed; and, strange enough, while the conversation took this wide range, not a chance allusion, not one stray hint ever wandered to the brave fellows who were covering the army with glory in the Peninsula, nor one souvenir of him that was even then enjoying a fame, as a leader, second to none in Europe. This surprised me not a little at the time: but I have, since that, learned how little interest the real services of an army possess for the ears of certain officials, who, stationed at home quarters, pass their inglorious lives in the details of drill, parade, mess-room gossip, and barrack scandal: such, in fact, were the dons of the present dinner. We had a commissary-general, an inspecting brigade-major of something, a physician to the forces, the adjutant himself, and Major Dalrymple; the ot polloi consisting of the raw ensign, a newly fledged cornet, Mr. Sparks, and myself.

The commissary told me very pointless stories about his own department; the doctor read a dissertation upon Walcheren fever; the adjutant got very stupidly tipsy, and Major Dalrymple succeeded in engaging the three juniors of the party to tea, having previously pledged us to purchase nothing whatever of outfit, without his advice; he well knowing (which he did) how young fellows like us were cheated, and resolving to be a father to us, (which he certainly tried to be.)

As we rose from the table about ten o'clock, I felt how soon a few such dinners would succeed in disenchanting me of all my military illusions; for, young as I was, I saw that the commissary was a vulgar bore; the doctor a humbug; the adjutant a sot, and the major himself, I greatly suspected to be an old rogue.

"You are coming with us, Sparks," said Major Dalrymple, as he took me by one arm and the ensign by the other; "we are going to have a little tea with the ladies—not five minutes' walk."

"Most happy, sir," said Mr. Sparks, with a very flattered expression of countenance.

"O'Malley, you know Sparks, and Burton too." This served for a species of triple introduction, at which we all bowed, simpered, and bowed again; we were very happy to have the pleasure, &c.

"How pleasant to get away from these fellows!" said the major; "they are so uncommonly prosy: that commissary with his mess-beef, and old Pritchard with black doses and rigors—nothing so insufferable. Besides, in reality, a young officer never needs all that nonsense: a little medicine chest—I'll get you one each to-morrow for five pounds—no, five pounds ten, the same thing—that will see you all through the Peninsula. Remind me of it in the morning." This we all promised to do, and the major resumed, "I say, Sparks, you've got a real prize in that gray horse, such a trooper as he is. O'Malley, you'll be wanting something of that kind, if we can find it out for you."

"Many thanks, Major, but my cattle are on the way here already: I've only three horses, but I think they are tolerably good ones."

The major now turned to Burton, and said something in a low tone, to which the other replied, "Why, if you say so, I'll get it; but it's devilish dear."

"Dear, my young friend? cheap, dog cheap."

"Only think, O'Malley, a whole brass bed, camp-stool, basin-stand, all complete, for sixty pounds: if it was not that a widow was disposing of it in great distress, one hundred could not buy it. Here we are; come along; no ceremony—mind the two steps; that's it. Mrs. Dalrymple, Mr. O'Malley; Mr. Sparks, Mr. Burton, my daughters. Is tea over, girls?"

"Why, papa, it's near eleven o'clock," said Fanny, as she rose to ring the bell, displaying in so doing, the least possible portion of a very well-turned ankle.

Miss Matilda Dal. laid down her book; but, seemingly lost in abstraction, did not deign to look at us. Mrs. Dalrymple, however, did the honors with much politeness; and having, by a few adroit and well-put queries, ascertained every thing concerning our rank and position, seemed perfectly satisfied that our intrusion was justifiable.

While my confrère, Mr. Sparks, was undergoing his examination, I had time to look at the ladies, whom I was much surprised at finding so very well looking; and, as the ensign had opened a conversation with Fanny, I approached my chair toward the other, and, having carelessly turned over the leaves of the book she had been reading, drew her on to talk of it. As my acquaintance with young ladies hitherto had been limited to those who had "no soul," I felt some difficulty at first in keeping up with the exalted tone of my fair companion; but, by letting her take the lead for some time, I got to know more of the ground. We went on tolerably together, every moment increasing my stock of technicals, which were all that was needed to sustain the conversation. How often have I found the same plan succeed—whether discussing a question of law or medicine—with a learned professor of either; or, what is still more difficult, canvassing the merits of a preacher, or a doctrine, with a serious young lady, whose "blessed privileges" were at first a little puzzling to comprehend.

I so contrived it, too, that Miss Matilda should seem as much to be making a convert to her views as to have found a person capable of sympathizing with her, and thus long before the little supper, with which it was the Major's practice to regale his friends every evening, made its appearance, we had established a perfect understanding together, a circumstance that, a bystander might have remarked, was productive of a more widely-diffused satisfaction than I could have myself seen any just cause for. Mr. Burton was also progressing, as the Yankees say, with the sister. Sparks had booked himself as purchaser of military stores enough to make the campaign of the whole globe, and then we were all evidently fulfilling our various vocations, and affording perfect satisfaction to our entertainers.

Then came the spatch-cock, and the sandwiches, and the negus, which Fanny first mixed for papa, and, subsequently, with some little pressing, for Mr. Burton; Matilda the romantic assisted me. Sparks helped himself; then we laughed and told stories; pressed Sparks to sing, which, as he declined, we only pressed the more. How invariably, by the by, is it the custom to show one's appreciation of any thing like a butt, by pressing him for a song. The major was in great spirits, told us anecdotes of his early life in India, and how he once contracted to supply the troops with milk, and made a purchase in consequence of some score of cattle, which turned out to be bullocks. Matilda recited some lines from Pope in my ear, Fanny challenged Burton to a rowing match, Sparks listened to all around him, and Mrs. Dalrymple mixed a very little weak punch, which Dr. Lucas had recommended to her, to take the last thing at night. Noctes cœnæque deorum. Say what you will, these were very jovial little rétunions. The girls were decidedly very pretty; we were in high favor, and when we took leave at the door, with a very cordial shake hands, it was with no arrière pensée we promised to see them in the morning.

CHAPTER XXV....The Entanglement.

WHEN we think for a moment over all the toils, all the anxieties, all the fevered excitement of a grande passion, it is not a little singular that love should so frequently be elicited by a state of mere idleness; and yet nothing, after all, is so predisposing a cause as this. Where is the man between eighteen and eight-and-thirty—might I not say forty—who, without any very pressing duties, and having no taste for strong liquor and rouge et noir, can possibly lounge through the long hours of his day, without, at least, fancying himself in love. The thousand little occupations it suggests, become a necessity of existence; its very worries are like the wholesome opposition that purifies and strengthens the frame of a free state. Then, what is there half so sweet as the reflective flattery which results from our appreciation of an object who, in return, deems us the ne plus ultra of perfection? There it is, in fact: that confounded bump of self-esteem does it all, and has more imprudent matches to answer for than all the occipital protuberances that ever scared poor Harriet Martineau.

Now, to apply my moralizing. I very soon, to use the mess phrase, got devilish spoony about the "Dals." The morning drill, the riding school, and the parade were all most fervently consigned to a certain military character that shall be nameless, as detaining me from some appointment made the evening before; for, as I supped there each night, a party of one kind or another was always planned for the day following. Sometimes we had a boating excursion to Cove; sometimes a picnic at Foaty; now, a rowing party to Glanmire, or a ride, at which I furnished the cavalry. These doings were all under my especial direction, and I thus became speedily the organ of the Dalrymple family; and the simple phrase, "it was Mr. O'Malley's arrangement," "Mr. O'Malley wished it," was like the "moi le roi" of Louis XIV.

Though all this while we continued to carry on most pleasantly, Mrs. Dalrymple, I could perceive, did not entirely sympathize with our projects of amusement. As an experienced engineer might feel, when watching the course of some storming projectile—some brilliant congregate—flying over a besieged fortress, yet never touching the walls, nor harming the inhabitants, so she looked on at all these demonstrations of attack with no small impatience, and wondered when would the breach be reported practicable.

Another puzzle also contributed its share of anxiety—which of the girls was it? To be sure, he spent three hours every morning with Fanny; but then he never left Matilda the whole evening. He had given his miniature to one; a locket with his hair was a present to the sister. The Major thinks he saw his arm round Matilda's waist in the garden; the house-maid swears she saw him kiss Fanny in the pantry. Matilda smiles when we talk of his name with her sister's; Fanny laughs outright, and says, "Poor Matilda, the man never dreamed of her." This is becoming uncomfortable; the Major must ask his intentions: it is, certainly, one or the other; but, then, we have a right to know which. Such was a very condensed view of Mrs. Dalrymple's reflections on this important topic—a view taken with her usual tact and clear-sightedness.

Matters were in this state, when Power at length arrived in Cork, to take command of our detachment, and make the final preparations for our departure. I had been, as usual, spending the evening at the Major's and had just reached my quarters, when I found my friend sitting at my fire, smoking his cigar, and solacing himself with a little brandy and water.

"At last," said he, as I entered, "at last!—why, where the deuce have you been till this hour—past two o'clock? There is no ball, no assembly going on, eh?"

"No," said I, half blushing at the eagerness of the inquiry; "I've been spending the evening with a friend."

"Spending the evening! say rather the night. Why, confound you, man, what is there in Cork to keep you out of bed till near three?"

"Well, if you must know, I've been supping at a Major Dalrymple's—a devilish good fellow—with two such daughters!"

"Ahem!" said Power, shutting one eye knowingly, and giving a look like a Yorkshire horse-dealer; "go on."

"Why, what do you mean?"

"Go on—continue."

"I've finished—I've nothing more to tell."

"So they're here, are they?" said he, reflectively.

"Who?" said I.

"Matilda and Fanny, to be sure."

"Why, you know them, then?"

"I should think I do."

"Where have you met them?"

"Where have I not? When I was in the rifles, they were quartered at Zante. Matilda was just then coming it rather strong with Villiers of ours, a regular green-horn. Fanny, also, nearly did for Harry Nesbit, by riding a hurdle-race. Then they left for Gibraltar in the year—what year was it?"

"Come, come," said I, "this is a humbug: the girls are quite young; you have just heard their names."

"Well, perhaps so; only tell me which is your peculiar weakness, as they say in the west, and maybe I'll convince you."

"Oh! as to that," said I, laughing, "I'm not very far gone on either side."

"Then Matilda, probably, has not tried you with Cowley, eh?—You look a little pink—There are hearts that live and love alone. Oh, poor fellow, you've got it. By Jove, how you've been coming it though in ten days. She ought not to have got that for a month at least; and how like a young one it was to be caught by the poetry. Oh! master Charley, I thought that the steeple-chaser might have done most with your Galway heart: the girl in the gray habit that sings Muddi-dero ought to have been the prize. Halt! by St. George, but that tickles you also! Why, zounds, if I go on, probably, at this rate, I'll find a tender spot occupied by the 'black lady herself.'"

It was no use concealing, or attempting to conceal, any thing from my inquisitive friend; so I mixed my grog, and opened my whole heart; told how I had been conducting myself for the entire preceding fortnight, and when I concluded, sat silently awaiting Power's verdict, as though a jury were about to pronounce upon my life.

"Have you ever written?"

"Never, perhaps, except a few lines, with tickets for the theatre, or something of that kind."

"Have you copies of your correspondence?"

"Of course not. Why, what do you mean?"

"Has Mrs. Dal. been ever present, or, as the French say, has she assisted at any of your tender interviews with the young ladies?"

"I'm not aware that one kisses a girl before mamma."

"I'm not speaking of that; I merely allude to flirtation."

"Oh! I suppose she has seen me attentive."

"Very awkward, indeed! There is only one point in your favor; for, as your attentions were not decided, and as the law does not, as yet, permit polygamy—"

"Come, come, you know I never thought of marrying."

"Ah! but they did."

"Not a bit of it."

"Ay, but they did. What do you wager but that the Major asks your intentions, as he calls it, the moment he hears the transport has arrived?"

"By Jove, now you remind me, he asked this evening when he could have a few minutes' private conversation with me to-morrow; and I thought it was about some confounded military chest, or sea-store, or one of his infernal contrivances that he every day assures me are indispensable; though, if every officer had only as much baggage as I have got, under his directions, it would take two armies, at least, to carry the effects of the fighting one."

"Poor fellow!" said he, starting upon his legs, "what a burst you've made of it!" So saying, he began in a nasal twang—

"I publish the banns of marriage between Charles O'Malley, of his late Majesty's fourteenth dragoons, and—Dalrymple, spinster, of this city—"

"I'll be hanged if you do, though," said I, seeing pretty clearly by this time something of the estimation my friends were held in. "Come, Power, pull me through, like a dear fellow, pull me through without doing anything to hurt the girl's feelings."

"Well, we'll see about it," said he: "we'll see about it in the morning; but, at the same time, let me assure you, the affair is not so easy as you may, at first blush, suppose. These worthy people have been so often 'done,' to use the cant phrase, before, that scarcely a ruse remains untried. It is of no use pleading that your family won't consent—that your prospects are null—that you are ordered for India —that you are engaged elsewhere—that you have nothing but your pay—that you are too young, or too old: all such reasons, good and valid with any other family, will avail you little here. Neither will it serve your cause that you may be warranted by a doctor as subject to periodical fits of insanity; monomaniacal tendencies to cut somebody's throat, &c. Bless your heart, man, they have a soul above such littlenesses. They care nothing for consent of friends, means, age, health, climate, prospects, or temper. Firmly believing matrimony to be a lottery, they are not superstitious about the number pitched upon; provided only that they get a ticket, they are content."

"Then, it strikes me, if what you say is correct, that I have no earthly chance of escape, except some kind friend will undertake to shoot me."

"That has been also tried."

"Why, how do you mean?"

"A mock duel got up at a mess; we had one at Malta. Poor Vickers was the hero of that affair. It was right well planned too. One of the letters was suffered by mere accident to fall into Mrs. Dal's hands, and she was quite prepared for the event when he was reported shot the next morning. Then, the young lady, of course, whether she cared or not, was obliged to be perfectly unconcerned, lest the story of engaged affections might get wind, and spoil another market. The thing went on admirably, till one day, some few months later, they saw, in a confounded army list, that the late George Vickers was promoted to the eighteenth dragons, so that the trick was discovered, and is, of course, stale at present."

"Then could I not have a wife already, and a large family of interesting babes?"

"No go—only swell the damages when they come to prosecute; beside your age and looks forbid the assumption of such a fact. No, no, we must go deeper to work."

"But where shall we go?" said I, impatiently; "for it appears that these good people have been treated to every trick and subterfuge that ever ingenuity suggested."

"Come, I think I have it; but it will need a little more reflection. So, now, let us to bed. I'll give you the result of my lucubrations at breakfast; and, if I mistake not, we may get you through this without any ill consequences.—Good night, then, old boy; and now dream away of your lady love till our next meeting."

CHAPTER XXVI....The Preparation.

To prevent needless repetitions in my story, I shall not record here the conversation which passed between my friend Power and myself, on the morning following, at breakfast: suffice it to say, that the plan proposed by him for my rescue, was one I agreed to adopt, reserving to myself, in case of failure, a pis aller of which I knew not the meaning, but of whose efficacy Power assured me I need not doubt.

"If all fail," said he; "if every bridge breaks down beneath you, and if no road of escape be left, why, then, I believe you must have recourse to another alternative. Still, I would wish to avoid it, if possible; and I put it to you, in honor, not to employ it unless as a last expedient: you promise me this?"

"Of course," said I, with great anxiety for the final measure. "What is it?"

He paused, smiled dubiously, and resumed: "And, after all; but to be sure, there will be no need for it; the other plan will do—must do. Come, come, O'Malley, the Admiralty say, that nothing encourages drowning in the navy like a life buoy: the men have such a prospect of being picked up, that they don't mind falling overboard: so, if I give you this life preserver of mine, you'll not swim an inch; is it not so, eh?"

"Far from it," said I; "I shall feel in honour bound to exert myself the more, because I now see how much it costs you to part with it."

"Well then, hear it: when everything fails, when all your resources are exhausted; when you have totally lost your memory in fact, and your ingenuity in excuses, say—but mind, Charley, not till then—say, that you must consult your friend, Captain Power of the 14th; that's all."

"And is this it?" said I quite disappointed at the lame and impotent conclusion to all the high sounding exordium; "is this all?"

"Yes," said he, "that is all; but stop, Charley, is not the Major crossing the street there? yes, to be sure it is, and by Jove, he has got on the old braided frock this morning; had you not told me one word of your critical position, I should have guessed there was something in the wind from that: that same vestment has caused many a stout heart to tremble, that never quailed before a shot or shell."

"How can that be? I should like to hear."

"Why, my dear boy, that's his explanation coat, as we called it at Gibraltar; he was never known to wear it except when asking some poor fellow's 'intentions.' He would no more think of sporting it as an every-day affair, than the chief justice would go cock-shooting in his black cap and ermine. Come, he is bound for your quarters, and as it will not answer our plans to let him see you now, you had better hasten down stairs, and get round by the back way into George's street, and you'll be at his house before he can return."

Following Power's directions, I seized my foraging-cap, and got clear out of the premises before the Major had reached them. It was exactly noon as I sounded my well known summons at the Major's knocker: the door was quickly opened, but instead of dashing up stairs, four steps at a time, as was my wont, to the drawing-room, I turned short into a little parlor on the right, and desired Matthew, the venerable servitor of the house, to say that I wished particularly to see Mrs. Dalrymple for a few minutes, if the hour were not inconvenient.

There was something perhaps of excitement in my manner—some flurry in my look, or some trepidation in my voice—or perhaps it was the unusual hour—or the still more remarkable circumstance of my not going at once into the drawing-room, that raised some doubts in Matthew's mind as the object of my visit, and, instead of at once complying with my request to inform Mrs. Dalrymple that I was there, he cautiously closed the door, and taking a quick but satisfactory glance round the apartment, to assure himself that we were alone, he placed his back against it and heaved a deep sigh.

We were both perfectly silent; I in total amazement at what the old man could possibly mean: he, following up the train of his own thoughts, comprehended little or nothing of my surprise, and evidently was so engrossed by his reflections, that he had neither ears nor eyes for aught around him. There was a most singular semi-comic expression in the old withered face, that nearly made me laugh at first; but, as I continued to look steadily at it, I perceived that, despite the long worn wrinkles that low Irish drollery and fun had furrowed around the angles of his mouth, the real character of his look was one of sorrowful compassion.

Doubtless, my readers have read many interesting narratives, wherein the unconscious traveler in some remote land has been warned of a plan to murder him, by some mere passing wink, a look, a sign, which some one, less hardened in iniquity than his fellow, has ventured for his rescue. Sometimes, according to the taste of the narrator, the interesting individual is an old woman, sometimes a young one; sometimes a black-bearded bandit, sometimes a child, and, not unfrequently, a dog is humane enough to do this service. One thing, however, never varies; be the agent biped or quadruped, dumb or speechful, young or old, the stranger invariably takes the hint, and gets off scot free, for his sharpness. This never varying trick on the doomed man, I had often been skeptical enough to suspect; however, I had not been many minutes a spectator of the old man's countenance when I most thoroughly recanted my errors, and acknowledged myself wrong. If ever the look of a man conveyed a warning, his did; but there was more in it than even that: there was a tone of sad and painful compassion, such as an old gray-bearded rat might be supposed to put on at seeing a young and inexperienced one opening the hinge of an iron trap, to try its efficacy upon his neck. Many a little occasion had presented itself, during my intimacy with the family, of doing Matthew some small services, of making him some trifling presents; so that, when he assumed before me the gesture and look I have mentioned, I was not long in deciphering his intentions.

"Matthew," screamed a sharp voice, which I recognized at once for that of Mrs. Dalrymple. "Matthew! where is the old fool?"

But Matthew heard not, or heeded not.

"Matthew, Matthew, I say."

"I'm comin', ma'am," said he, with a sigh, as opening the parlor door, he turned upon me one look of such import, that only the circumstances of my story can explain its force, or my reader's own ingenious imagination can supply.

"Never fear, my good old friend," said I, grasping his hand warmly, and leaving a guinea in the palm: "never fear."

"God grant it, sir," said he, settling on his wig in preparation for his appearance in the drawing-room.

"Matthew! the old wretch."

"Mr. O'Malley," said the often-called Matthew, as, opening the door, he announced me unexpectedly among the ladies there assembled, who, not hearing of my approach, were evidently not a little surprised and astonished.

Had I really been the enamored swain that the Dalrymple family were willing to believe, I half suspect that the prospect before me might have cured me of my passion. A round bullet head, papillote with the "Cork Observer," where still-born babes and maids of all work were de-canted upon in very legible type, was now the substitute for the classic front and Italian ringlets of la belle Matilda; while the chaste Fanny herself, whose feet had been a fortune for a statuary, was in the most slatternly and slipshod attire, pacing the room in a towering rage at some thing, place, or person, unknown (to me.) If the ballet master at the académie could only learn to get his imps, demons, angels, and goblins "off" half as rapidly as the two young ladies retreated on my being announced, I answer for the piece so brought out having a run for half the season. Before my eyes had regained their position parallel to the plane of the horizon, they were gone, and I found myself alone with Mrs. Dalrymple. Now, she stood her ground, partly to cover the retreat of the main body, partly, too, because—representing the baggage wagons, ammunition stores, hospital staff, &c.—her retirement from the field demanded more time and circumspection than the light brigade.

Let not my readers suppose that the mère Dalrymple was so perfectly faultless in costume that her remaining was a matter of actual indifference: far from it. She evidently had a struggle for it; but a sense of duty decided her; and, as Ney doggedly held back to cover the retreating forces on the march from Moscow, so did she resolutely lurk behind till the last flutter of the last petticoat assured her that the fugitives were safe. Then did she hesitate for a moment what course to take; but, as I assumed my chair beside her, she composedly sat down, and, crossing her hands before her, waited for an explanation of this ill-timed visit.

Had the Horse Guards, in the plenitude of their power and the perfection of their state, ordained that the 79th and 42d regiments should, in future, in lieu of their respective tartans, wear flannel kilts and black worsted hose, I could readily have fallen into the error of mistaking Mrs. Dalrymple for a Highlander in the new regulation dress; the philabeg finding no mean representation in a capacious pincushion that hung down from her girdle, while a pair of shears, not scissors, corresponded to the dirk. After several ineffectual efforts upon her part, to make her vestment (I knew not its fitting designation) cover more of her legs than its length could possibly effect, and, after some most bland smiles and half blushes, at dishabille, &c., were over, and that I had apologized most humbly for the unusually early hour of my call, I proceeded to open my negotiations, and unfurl my banner for the fray.

"The old Racehorse has arrived at last," said I, with a half sigh; "and I believe that we shall not obtain a very long time for our leave-taking; so that, trespassing upon your very great kindness, I have ventured upon an early call."

"The Racehorse surely can't sail to-morrow," said Mrs. Dalrymple, whose experience of such matters made her a very competent judge; "her stores—"

"Are taken in already," said I, "and an order from the Horse Guards commands us to embark in twenty-four hours; so that in fact, we scarcely have time to look about us."

"Have you seen the Major?" inquired Mrs. Dalrymple, eagerly.

"Not to-day," I replied, carelessly; "but of course, during the morning we are sure to meet; I have many thanks yet to give him for all his most kind attentions."

"I knew he is most anxious to see you," said Mrs. Dalrymple, with a very peculiar emphasis, and evidently desiring that I should inquire the reason of this anxiety. I, however, most heroically forbore indulging my curiosity, and added, that I should endeavor to find him on my way to the barracks; and then, hastily looking at my watch, I pronounced it a full hour later than it really was, and promising to spend the evening—my last evening with them—I took my leave, and hurried away, in no small flurry, to be once more out of reach of Mrs. Dalrymple's fire, which I every moment expected to open upon me.

CHAPTER XXVII....The Supper.

Power and I dined together tête-à-tête at the hotel, and sat chatting over my adventures with the Dalrymples, till nearly nine o'clock.

"Come, Charley," said he at length, "I see your eye wandering very often toward the time-piece, another bumper and I'll let you off. What shall it be?"

"What you like," said I, upon whom three bottles of strong claret had already made a very satisfactory impression.

"Then champagne for the coup-de-grace. Nothing like your vin mousseux for a critical moment: every bubble that rises sparkling to the surface prompts some bright thought, or elicits some brilliant idea, that would only have been drowned in your more sober fluids. Here's to the girl you love, whoever she be."

"To her bright eyes then be it," said I, clearing off a brimming goblet of nearly half the bottle, while my friend Power seemed multiplied into any given number of gentlemen standing amid something like a glass manufactory of decanters.

"I hope you feel steady enough for this business," said my friend, examining me closely with the candle.

"I'm an archdeacon," muttered I, with one eye involuntarily closing.

"You'll not let them double on you."

"Trust me, old boy," said I, endeavoring to look knowing.

"I think you'll do," said he: "so now march; I'll wait for you here, and we'll go on board together; for old Bloat, the skipper, says he'll certainly weigh by daybreak."

"Till then," said I, as opening the door, I proceeded very cautiously to descend the stairs, affecting all the time considerable nonchalance, and endeavoring as well as my thickened utterance would permit, to hum, "Oh! love is the soul of an Irish dragon."

If I was not in the most perfect possession of my faculties in the house, the change to the open air, certainly, but little contributed to their restoration, and I scarcely felt myself in the street when my brain became absolutely one whirl of maddened and confused excitement. Time and space are nothing to a man thus enlightened, and so they appeared to me; scarcely a second had elapsed when I found myself standing in the Dalrymples' drawing-room.

If a few hours had done much to metamorphose me, certes, they had done something for my fair friends also: any thing more unlike what they appeared in the morning can scarcely be imagined; Matilda in black, with her hair in heavy madonna bands upon her fair cheek, now paler even than usual, never seemed so handsome; while Fanny, in a light blue dress, with blue flowers in her hair, and a blue sash, looked the most lovely piece of coquetry ever man set his eyes upon. The old Major too was smartened up, and put into an old regimental coat that he had worn during the siege of Gibraltar; and lastly, Mrs. Dalrymple herself was attired in a very imposing costume, that made her, to my not over-accurate judgment, look very like an elderly bishop in a flame-colored cassock. Sparks was the only stranger, and wore upon his countenance, as I entered, a look of very considerable embarrassment, that even my thick-sightedness could not fail of detecting.

Parlez moi de l'amitié, my friends. Talk to me of the warm embrace of your earliest friends, after years of absence; the cordial and heartfelt shake-hands of your old school companion when, in after years, a chance meeting has brought you together, and you have had time and opportunity for becoming distinguished and in repute, and are rather a good hit to be known to, than otherwise; of the close grip you give your second when he comes up to say, that the gentleman with the loaded detonator opposite, won't fire—that he feels he's in the wrong. Any or all of these together, very effective and powerful though they be, are light in the balance, when compared with the two-handed compression you receive from the gentleman that expects you to marry one of his daughters.

"My dear O'Malley, how goes it? Thought you'd never come," said he, still holding me fast and looking me full in the face, to calculate the extent to which my potations rendered his flattery feasible.

"Hurried to death with preparations, I suppose," said Mrs. Dalrymple, smiling blandly: "Fanny, dear, some tea for him."

"Oh, mamma, he does not like all that sugar; surely not," said she, looking up with a most sweet expression, as though to say, "I at least know his tastes."

"I believed you were going without seeing us," whispered Matilda, with a very glassy look about the corner of her eyes.

Eloquence was not just then my forte, so that I contented myself with a very intelligible look at Fanny, and a tender squeeze of Matilda's hand, as I seated myself at the table.

Scarcely had I placed myself at the tea-table with Matilda beside, and Fanny opposite me, each vying with the other in their delicate and kind attentions, when I totally forgot all my poor friend Power's injunctions and directions for my management. It is true, I remembered that there was a scrape of some kind or other to be got out of, and one requiring some dexterity too, but what, or with whom, I could not for the life of me determine. What the wine had begun, the bright eyes completed, and amid the witchcraft of silky tresses and sweet looks, I lost all my reflection, till the impression of an impending difficulty remained fixed in my mind, and I tortured my poor, weak, and erring intellect to detect it. At last, and by a mere chance, my eyes fell upon Sparks, and, by what mechanism I contrived it I know not, but I immediately saddled him with the whole of my annoyances, and attributed to him and to his fault any embarrassment I labored under.

The physiological reason of the fact I'm very ignorant of, but for the truth and frequency I can well vouch, that there are certain people, certain faces, certain whiskers, legs, waistcoats, and guard chains, that inevitably produce the most striking effects upon the brain of a gentleman already excited by wine, and not exactly cognisant of his own peculiar fallacies.

These effects are not produced merely among those who are quarrelsome in their cups, for I call the whole 14th to witness that I am not such; but to any person so distinguished, the inoffensiveness of the object is no security on the other hand, for I once knew an eight-day clock kicked down a barrack stairs by an old Scotch major, because he thought it was laughing at him. To this source alone, whatever it be, can I attribute the feeling of rising indignation with which I contemplated the luckless cornet, who, seated at the fire, unnoticed and uncared for, seemed a very unworthy object to vent anger or ill temper upon.

"Mr. Sparks, I fear," said I, endeavoring at the time to call up a look of very sovereign contempt, "Mr. Sparks, I fear, regards my visit here in the light of an intrusion."

Had poor Mr. Sparks been told to proceed incontinently up the chimney before him, he could not have looked more agast. Reply was quite out of his power; so sudden and unexpectedly was this charge of mine made, that he could only stare vacantly from one to the other, while I, warming with my subject, and perhaps—but I'll not swear it—stimulated by a gentle pressure from a soft hand near me, continued: "If he thinks, for one moment, that my attentions in this family are in any way to be questioned by him, I can only say—"

"My dear O'Malley, my dear boy," said the major, with the look of a father-in-law in his eye.

"The spirit of an officer and a gentleman spoke there," said Mrs. Dalrymple, now carried beyond all prudence, by the hope that my attack might arouse my dormant friend into a counter declaration: nothing, however, was farther from poor Sparks, who began to think he had been unconsciously drinking tea with five lunatics.

"If he supposes," said I, rising from my chair, "that his silence will pass with me as any palliation—"

"Oh dear, oh dear! there will be a duel, papa; dear, why do n't you speak to Mr. O'Malley?"

"There now, O'Malley, sit down; do n't you see you are quite in error?"

"Then let him say so," said I, fiercely.

"Ah, yes, to be sure," said Fanny, "do, say it, say anything he likes, Mr. Sparks."

"I must say," said Mr. Dalrymple, "however sorry I may feel in my own house, to condemn any one, that Mr. Sparks is very much in the wrong."

Poor Sparks looked like a man in a dream.

"If he will tell Charles, Mr. O'Malley, I mean," said Matilda, blushing scarlet, "that he meant nothing by what he said—"

"But I never spoke—never opened my lips," cried out the wretched man, at length, sufficiently recovered to defend himself.

"Oh, Mr. Sparks!"

"Oh, Mr. Sparks!"

"Oh, Mr. Sparks!" chorused the three ladies.

While the old Major brought up the rear with an "Oh! Sparks, I must say—"

"Then, by all the saints in the calendar, I must be mad," said he, "but if I have said any thing to offend you, O'Malley, I am sincerely sorry for it."

"That will do, sir," said I, with a look of royal condescension at the amende I considered as somewhat late in coming, and resumed my seat. This little intermezzo, it might be supposed, was rather calculated to interrupt the harmony of our evening: not so, however. I had apparently acquitted myself like a hero, and was evidently in a white heat, in which I could be fashioned into any shape. Sparks was humbled so far, that he would probably feel it a relief to make any proposition; so that, by our opposite courses, we had both arrived at a point at which all the dexterity and address of the family had been long since aiming without success. Conversation then resumed its flow, and, in a few minutes, every trace of our late fracas had disappeared.

By degrees, I felt myself more and more disposed to turn my attention toward Matilda, and, dropping my voice into a lower tone, opened a flirtation of a most determined kind. Fanny had, meanwhile, assumed a place beside Sparks, and, by the muttered tones that passed between them, I could plainly perceive they were similarly occupied. The Major took up the "Southern Reporter," of which he appeared deep in the contemplation, while Mrs. Dal. herself buried her head in her embroidery, and neither heard nor saw any thing around her.

I know, unfortunately, but very little what passed between myself and my fair companion; I can only say that, when supper was announced at twelve, (an hour later than usual,) I was sitting upon the sofa, with my arm round her waist, my cheek so close, that already her lovely tresses brushed my forehead, and her breath fanned my burning brow.

"Supper, at last," said the Major, with a loud voice, to arouse us from our trance of happiness, without taking any mean opportunity of looking unobserved. "Supper, Sparks: O'Malley, come now. It will be sometime before we all meet this way again."

"Perhaps not so long, after all," said I, knowingly.

"Very likely not," echoed Sparks in the same key.

"I've proposed for Fanny," said he, whispering in my ear.

"Matilda's mine," replied I, with the look of an emperor.

"A word with you, Major," said Sparks, his eyes flashing with enthusiasm, and his cheek scarlet; "one word: I'll not detain you."

They withdrew into a corner for a few seconds, during which Mrs. Dalrymple amused herself by wondering what the secret could be; why Mr. Sparks could 'nt tell her; and Fanny, meanwhile, pretended to look for something at a side-table, and never turned round.

"Then give me your hand," said the Major, as he shook Sparks with a warmth of whose sincerity there could be no question. "Bess, my love," said he, addressing his wife: the remainder was lost in a whisper; but, whatever it was, it evidently redounded to Sparks' credit, for the next moment, a repetition of the hand-shaking took place, and Sparks looked the happiest of men.

"A mon tour," thought I, "new," as I touched the Major's arm, and led him toward the window. What I said may be one day matter of Major Dalrymple's memoirs, if he ever writes them; but, for my part, I have not the least idea. I only know that, while I was yet speaking, he called over Mrs. Dal., who in a phrensy of joy seized me in her arms, and embraced me; after which I kissed her, shook hands with the Major, kissed Matilda's hand, and laughed prodigiously, as though I had done something confoundingly droll, a sentiment evidently participated in by Sparks, who laughed too, as did the others, and a merrier, happier party never sat down to supper.

"Make your company pleased with themselves," says Mr. Walker, in his Original work upon dinner-giving, "and every thing goes on well." Now Major Dalrymple, without having read the authority in question, probably because it was not written at the time, understood the principle fully as well as the police-magistrate, and certainly was a proficient in the practice of it.

To be sure, he possessed one grand requisite for success, he seemed most perfectly happy himself. There was that air déagé about him which, when an old man puts it on among his juniors, is so very attractive. Then the ladies, too, were evidently well pleased; and the usually austere mamma had relaxed her "rigid front" into a smile, in which any habitué of the house could have read our fate.

We eat, we drank, we ogled, smiled, squeezed hands beneath the table, and, in fact, so pleasant a party had rarely assembled round the Major's mahogany. As for me, I made a full disclosure of the most burning love, backed by a resolve to marry my fair neighbor, and settle upon her a considerably larger part of my native country than I had ever even rode over. Sparks, on the other side, had opened his fire more cautiously; but, whether taking courage from my boldness, or perceiving with envy the greater estimation I was held in, was now going the pace fully as fast as myself, and had commenced explanations of his intentions with regard to Fanny that evidently satisfied her friends. Meanwhile the wine was passing very freely, and the hints half uttered an hour before, began now to be more openly spoken and canvassed.

Sparks and I bob-nobbed across the table, and looked unspeakable things at each other; the girls held down their heads; Mrs. Dal. wiped her eyes; and the Major pronounced himself the happiest father in Europe.

It was now wearing late, or rather early; some gray streaks of dubious light were faintly forcing their way through the half-closed curtains, and the dread thought of parting first presented itself. A cavalry trumpet, too, at this moment sounded a call that aroused us from our trance of pleasure, and warned us that our minutes were few. A dead silence crept over all, the solemn feeling which leave-taking ever inspires was uppermost, and none spoke. The Major was the first to break it. "O'Malley, my friend; and you, Mr. Sparks; I must have a word with you, boys, before we part."

"Here let it be then, Major," said I, holding his arm, as he turned to leave the room: "here, now; we are all so deeply interested, no place is so fit."

"Well, then," said the Major, "as you desire it, now that I'm to regard you both in the light of my sons-in-law—at least, as pledged to become so—it is only fair as respects—"

"I see, I understand perfectly," interrupted I, whose passion for conducting the whole affair myself was gradually gaining on me; "what you mean is, that we should make known our intentions before some mutual friends ere we part; eh, Sparks? eh, Major?"

"Right, my boy, right on every point."

"Well, then, I thought of all that; and, if you just send your servant over to my quarters for our captain; he's the fittest person, you know, at such a time."

"How considerate!" said Mrs. Dalrymple.

"How perfectly just his idea is!" said the Major.

"We'll, then, in his presence, avow our present and unalterable determination as regards your fair daughters, and as the time is short—"

Here I turned toward Matilda, who placed her arm within mine; Sparks possessed himself of Fanny's hand, while the Major and his wife consulted for a few seconds.

"Well, O'Malley, all you propose is perfect. Now then, for the captain; who shall he inquire for?"

"Oh, an old friend of yours," said I, jocularly; "you'll be glad to see him."

"Indeed!" said all together.

"Quite a surprise, I'll warrant it."

"Who can it be: who on earth is it?"

"You can't guess," added I, with a very knowing look; "knew you at Corfu: a very intimate friend, indeed, if he tell the truth."

A look of something like embarrassment passed around the circle, at these words, while I, wishing to end the mystery, resumed:

"Come, then, who can be so proper for all parties at a moment like this, as our mutual friend, Captain Power?"

Had a shell fallen into the cold grouse pie in the midst of us, scattering death and destruction on every side, the effect could scarcely have been more frightful than that my last words produced. Mrs. Dalrymple fell with a sigh upon the floor, motionless as a corpse; Fanny threw herself screaming upon a sofa; Matilda went off into strong hysterics upon the hearth-rug; while the Major, after giving me a look a maniac might have envied, rushed from the room in search of his pistols, with a most terrific oath to shoot somebody, whether Sparks or myself, or both of us, on his return, I cannot say. Fanny's sobs, and Matilda's cries, assisted by a dunning process by Mrs. Dal.'s heels upon the floor, made a most infernal concert, and effectually prevented anything like thought or reflection; and, in all probability, so overwhelmed was I at the sudden catastrophe I had so innocently caused, I should have waited in due patience for the Major's return, had not Sparks seized my arm, and cried out—

"Run for it, O'Malley, cut like fun, my boy, or we're done for."

"Run—why?—what for?—where?" said I, stupified by the scene before me.

"Here he is," called out Sparks, as, throwing up the window, he sprang out upon the stone sill, and leaped into the street. I followed mechanically, and jumped after him, just as the Major had reached the window: a ball whizzed by me, that soon determined my further movements; so, putting on all speed, I flew down the street, turned the corner, and regained the hotel breathless and without a hat, while Sparks arrived a moment later, pale as a ghost, and trembling like an aspen leaf.

"Safe, by Jove!" said Sparks, throwing himself into a chair, and panting for breath.

"Safe, at last," said I, without well knowing why or for what.

"You've had a sharp run of it, apparently," said Power, coolly, and without any curiosity as to the cause; "and now, let us on board; there goes the trumpet again. The skipper is a surly old fellow, and we must not lose his tide for him." So saying, he proceeded to collect his cloak, cane, &c., and get ready for departure.

CHAPTER XXVIII....The Voyage.

When I awoke from the long sound sleep which succeeded my last adventure, I had some difficulty in remembering where I was, or how I had come there. From my narrow berth I looked out upon the new empty cabin, and, at length, some misty and confused sense of my situation crept slowly over me. I opened the little shutter beside me, and looked out. The bold headlands of the southern coast were frowning, in sullen and dark masses, about a couple of miles distant, and I perceived that we were going fast through the water, which was beautifully calm and still. I now looked at my watch; it was past eight o'clock; and, as it must evidently be evening from the appearance of the sky, I felt that I had slept soundly for above twelve hours.

In the hurry of departure, the cabin had not been set to rights, and there lay every species of lumber and luggage in all imaginable confusion. Trunks, gun-cases, baskets of eggs, umbrellas, hampers of sea-store, cloaks, foraging caps, maps, and sword-belts were scattered on every side—while the débris of a dinner, not over remarkable for its propriety in table equipage, added to the ludicrous effect. The heavy tramp of a foot overhead denoted the step of some one taking his short walk of exercise; while the rough voice of the skipper, as he gave the word to "Go about," all convinced me that we were at last under way, and off to "the wars."

The confusion our last evening on shore produced in my brain was such, that every effort I made to remember any thing about it only increased my difficulty, and I felt myself in a web so tangled and inextricable, that all endeavor to escape free was impossible. Sometimes I thought that I had really married Matilda Dalrymple; then, I supposed that the father had called me out and wounded me in a duel; and, finally, I had some confused notion about a quarrel with Sparks, but what for, when, and how it ended, I knew not. How tremendously tipsy I must have been, was the only conclusion I could draw from all these conflicting doubts; and, after all, it was the only thing like fact that beamed upon my mind. How I had come on board and reached my berth was a matter I reserved for future inquiry; resolving, that about the real history of my last night on shore I should ask no questions, if others were equally disposed to let it pass in silence.

I next began to wonder if Mike had looked after all my luggage, trunks, &c., and whether he himself had been forgotten in our hasty departure. About this latter point I was not destined for much doubt; for a well-known voice from the foot of the companion ladder, at once proclaimed my faithful follower, and evidenced his feelings at his departure from his home and country.

Mr. Free was, at the time I mention, gathered up like a ball opposite a small, low window that looked upon the bluff headlands, now fast becoming dim and misty as the night approached. He was apparently in low spirits; and hummed in a species of low, droning voice, the following ballad, at the end of each verse of which came an Irish chorus, which, to the erudite in such matters will suggest the air of Meddirederoo:—

"MICKEY FREE'S LAMENT."

"Then, fare ye well, ould Erin dear;
To part—my heart does ache well,
From Carrickfergus to Cape Clear,
I'll never see your equal.
And, though to foreign parts we're bound,
Where cannibals may eat us,
We'll ne'er forget the holy ground
Of poteen and potatoes.
Meddirederoo aroo, aroo, &c."

"When geod St. Patrick banished frogs,
And shook them from his garment,
He never thought we'd go abroad,
To live upon such varmint;
Nor quit the land where whisky grew,
To wear King George's button,
Take vinegar for mountain dew,
And toads for mountain mutton.
Meddirederoo aroo, aroo."

"I say, Mike, stop that confounded keen, and tell me where are we."

"Off the ould head of Kinsale, sir."

"Where is Captain Power?"

"Smoking a cigar on deck with the Captain, sir."

"And Mr. Sparks?"

"Mighty sick in his own state room. Oh! but it's himself has enough of glory—bad luck to it—by this time; he'd make your heart break to look at him."

"Who have you got on board besides?"

"The Adjutant's here, sir, and an ould gentleman they call the Major."

"Not Major Dalrymple," said I, starting up with terror at the thought; "eh, Mike?"

"No, sir, another Major, his name Mulroon, or Mudoon, or something like that."

"Monsoon, you son of a lumper potatoe," cried out a surly gruff voice from a berth opposite, "Monsoon. Who's at the other side?"

"Mr. O'Malley—14th," said I, by way of introduction.

"My service to you, then," said the voice; "going to join your regiment?"

"Yes, and you; are you bound on a similar errand?"

"No, Heaven be praised! I'm attached to the commissariat, and only going to Lisbon. Have you had any dinner?"

"Not a morsel: have you?"

"No more than yourself; but I always lie by for three or four days this way, till I get used to the confounded rocking and pitching; and, with a little grog and some sleep, get over the time gayly enough. Steward, another tumbler like the last: there—very good—that will do. Your good health, Mr. —, what was it you said?"

"O'Malley."

"O'Malley—your good health—good night." And so ended our brief colloquy, and, in a few minutes more, a very decisive snore pronounced my friend to be fulfilling his precept for killing the hours.

I now made the effort to emancipate myself from my crib, and at last succeeded in getting on the floor, where, after one chassez at a small looking-glass opposite, followed by a very impetuous rush at a little brass stove, in which I was interrupted by a trunk, and laid prostrate, I finally got my clothes on, and made my way to the deck. Little attuned as was my mind at the moment to admire any thing like scenery, it was impossible to be unmoved by the magnificent prospect before me. It was a beautiful evening in summer; the sun had set above an hour before, leaving behind him in the west one vast arch of rich and burnished gold, stretching along the whole horizon, and tipping all the summits of the heavy rolling sea, as it rolled on, unbroken by foam or ripple, in vast moving mountains from the far coast of Labrador. We were already in blue water, though the bold cliffs that were to form our departing point were but a few miles to leeward. There lay the lofty bluff of old Kinsale, whose crest, overhanging, peered from a summit of some hundred feet into the deep water that swept its rocky base; many a tangled lichen and straggling bough trailing in the flood beneath. Here and there, upon the coast, a twinkling gleam proclaimed the hut of the fisherman, whose swift hookers had more than once shot by us, and disappeared in a moment. The wind, which began to fall at sunset, freshened as the moon rose, and the good ship, bending to the breeze, lay gently over, and rushed through the waters with a sound of gladness. I was alone upon the deck; Power and the Captain, whom I expected to have found, had disappeared somehow, and I was, after all, not sorry to be left to my own reflections uninterrupted.

My thoughts turned once more to my home—to my first, my best, earliest friend, whose hearth I had rendered lonely and desolate; and my heart sunk within me as I remembered it. How deeply I reproached myself for the selfish impetuosity with which I had ever followed any rising fancy—any new and sudden desire, and never thought of him whose every hope was in, whose every wish was for me. Alas! alas! my poor uncle! how gladly would I resign every prospect my soldier's life may hold out with all its glittering promise, and all the flattery of success, to be once more beside you; to feel your warm and manly grasp; to see your smile; to hear your voice; to be again where all our best feelings are born and nurtured, and our cares are assuaged, our joys more joyed in, and our griefs more wept—at home! These very words have more music to my ears than all the softest strains that ever syren sung. They bring us back to all we have loved, by the ties that are never felt but through such simple associations. And in the earlier memories called up, our childish feelings come back once more to visit us, like better spirits, as we walk amid the dreary desolation that years of care and uneasiness have spread around us.

Wretched must he be who never has felt such bliss; and thrice happy he, who, feeling it, knows that still there lives for him that same early home, with all its loved inmates, its every dear and devoted object waiting his coming, and longing for his approach.

Such were my thoughts as I stood gazing at the bold line of coast now gradually growing more and more dim while evening fell, and we continued to stand farther out to sea. So absorbed was I all this time in my reflections, that I never heard the voices which now suddenly burst upon my ears quite close beside me. I turned, and saw for the first time that, at the end of the quarter deck, stood what is called a round-house, a small cabin, from which the sounds in question proceeded. I walked gently forward, and peeped in, and certainly any thing more in contrast with my late reverie need not be conceived. There sat the skipper, a bluff, round-faced, jolly-looking, little tar, mixing a bowl of punch at a table, at which sat my friend Power, the Adjutant, and a tall meagre-looking Scotchman, whom I once met in Cork, and heard that he was the doctor of some infantry regiment. Two or three black bottles, a paper of cigars, and a tallow candle, were all the table equipage; but, certainly, the party seemed not to want for spirits and fun, to judge from the hearty bursts of laughing that every moment pealed forth, and shook the little building that held them. Power, as usual with him, seemed to be taking the lead, and was evidently amusing himself with the peculiarities of his companions.

"Come, Adjutant, fill up: here's to the campaign before us; we at least have nothing but pleasure in the anticipation; no lovely wife behind; no charming babes to fret, and be fretted for, eh?"

"Vara true," said the doctor, who was mated with a tartar; "ye maun have less regrets at leaving home; but a married man is no entirely denied his ain consolations."

"Good sense in that," said the skipper; "a wide berth and plenty of sea room are not bad things now and then."

"Is that your experience also," said Power, with a knowing look. "Come, come, Adjutant, we're not so ill off, you see; but, by Jove, I can't imagine how it is a man ever comes to thirty without having at least one wife, without counting his colonial possessions, of course."

"Yes," said the Adjutant, with a sigh, as he drained his glass to the bottom. "It is devilish strange—women, lovely women!" here he filled and drank again, as though he had been proposing a toast for his own peculiar drinking.

"I say, now," resumed Power, catching at once that there was something working in his mind; "I say, now, how happened it that you, a right good-looking, soldier-like fellow, that always made his way among the fair ones, with that confounded roguish eye and slippery tongue, how the deuce did it come to pass that you never married?"

"I've been more than once on the verge of it," said the Adjutant, smiling blandly at the flattery.

"And nae bad notion yours just to stay there," said the Doctor, with a very peculiar contortion of countenance.

"No pleasing you, no contenting a fellow like you," said Power, returning to the charge; "that's the thing: you get a certain ascendancy; you have a kind of success, that renders you, as the French say l'ête montée, and you think no woman rich enough, or good-looking enough, or high enough."

"No, by Jove, you're wrong," said the Adjutant, swallowing the bait, hook and all, "quite wrong there; for, somehow, all my life, I was decidedly susceptible, not that I cared much for your blushing sixteen or budding beauties in white muslin, fresh from a back board and a governess; no, my taste inclined rather to the more sober charms of two or three-and-thirty, the embon-point, a good foot and ankle, a sensible breadth about the shoulders—"

"Somewhat Dutch like, I take it," said the skipper, puffing out a volume of smoke, "a little bluff in the bows, and great stowage, eh?"

"You leaned then toward the widows," says Power.

"Exactly: I confess, a widow always was my weakness. There was something I ever liked in the notion of a woman who had got over all the awkward girlishness of early years, and had that self-possession which habit and knowledge of the world confer, and knew enough of herself to understand what she really wished, and where she would really go."

"Like the trade winds," puffed the skipper.

"Then, as regards fortune, they have a decided superiority over the spinster class. I defy any man breathing—let him be half police magistrate, half chancellor—to find out the figure of a young lady's dowry. On your first introduction to the house, some kind friend whisper's, 'go it, old boy, forty thousand; not a penny less; a few weeks later as the siege progresses, a maiden aunt, disposed to puffing, comes down to twenty; this diminishes again one half, but then 'the money is in bank stock, hard three-and-a-half.' You go a little farther, and as you sit one day over your wine with papa, he suddenly promulgates the fact that his daughter has five thousand pounds, two of which turn out to be in Mexican bonds, and three in an Irish mortgage."

"Happy for you," interrupted Power, "that it be not in Galway, where a proposal to foreclose would be the signal for your being called out, and shot without benefit of clergy."

"Bad luck to it, for Galway," said the Adjutant. "I was nearly taken in there once to marry a girl that her brother-in-law swore had eight hundred a year, and it came out afterward that so she had, but it was for one year only; and he challenged me for doubting his word too."

"There's an old formula for finding out an Irish fortune," says Power, "worth all the algebra they ever taught in Trinity. Take the half of the assumed sum, and divide it by three, the quotient will be a flattering representative of the figure sought for."

"Not in the north," said the Adjutant, firmly; "not in the north, Power; they are all well off there. There's a race of canny, thrifty, half Scotch niggers—your pardon, Doctor—they are all Irish—linen-weaving, Presbyterian, yarn-factoring, long-nosed, hard-drinking fellows, that lay by rather a snug thing now and then. Do you know I was very near it once in the north. I've half a mind to tell you the story; though, perhaps, you'll laugh at me."

The whole party at once protested that nothing could induce them to deviate so widely from the line of propriety, and the skipper having mixed a fresh bowl, and filled all the glasses round, the cigars were lighted and the Adjutant began:

CHAPTER XXIX.—The Adjutant's Story—Life in Derby.

"It is now about eight, maybe ten years, since, that we were ordered to march from Belfast and take up our quarters in Londonderry. We had not been more than a few weeks altogether, in Ulster, when the order came; and, as we had been, for the preceding two years, doing duty in the south and west, we concluded the island was tolerably the same in all parts. We opened our campaign in the maiden city, exactly as we had been doing with 'unparalleled success' in Cashel, Fermoy, Tuam, &c., that is to say, we announced garrison balls, and private theatricals; offered a cup to be run for in steeple chase; turned out a four-in-hand drag, with mottled grays; and brought over two Deal boats to Challenge the north."

"The 18th found the place stupid," said we.

"To be sure they did; slow fellows, like them, must find any place stupid. No dinners; but they gave none. No fun; but they had none in themselves. In fact, we knew better: we understood how the thing was to be done, and resolved that, as a mine of rich ore lay unworked, it was reserved for us to produce the shining metal that others, less discerning, had failed to discover. Little we knew of the matter; never was there a blunder like ours. Were you ever in Derry?"

"Never," said the listeners.

"Well, then, let me inform you, that the place has its own peculiar features. In the first place, all the large towns in the south and west have, beside the country neighbourhood that surrounds them, a certain sprinkling of gentlefolk, who, though with small fortunes and not much usage of the world, are still a great accession to society, and make up the blank which, even in the most thickly-peopled country, would be sadly felt without them. Now, in Derry, there is none of this. After the great guns and—per Baccho!—what great guns are they! you have nothing but the men engaged in commerce; sharp, clever, shrewd, well-informed fellows; they are deep in flax-seed, cunning in molasses, and not to be excelled in all that pertains to coffee, sassafras, cinnamon, gum, oakum, and elephants' teeth. The place is a rich one, and the spirit of commerce is felt throughout it. Nothing is cared for, nothing is talked of, nothing alluded to, that does not bear upon this; and, in fact, if you have a't a venture in Smyrna figs, Memel timber, Dutch dolls, or some such commodity, you are absolutely nothing, and might as well be at a ball with a cork leg, or go deaf to the opera."

"Now, when I've told thus much, I leave you to guess what impression our triumphal entry into the city produced. Instead of the admiring crowds that awaited us elsewhere, as we marched gayly into quarters, here we saw nothing but grave, sober-looking, and I confess it, intelligent-looking faces, that scrutinized our appearance closely enough, but evidently with no great approval, and less enthusiasm. The men passed on hurriedly to their counting-houses and the wharfs; the women with almost as little interest, peeped at us from the windows, and walked away again. Oh! how we wished for Galway; glorious Galway, that paradise of the infantry, that lies west of the Shannon. Little we knew, as we ordered the band, in lively anticipation of the gayeties before us, to strike up 'Payne's first set,' that, to the ears of the fair listeners in Ship Quay Street, the rumble of a sugar hogshead, or the crank, crank, of a weighing crane were more delightful music."

"By Jove," interrupted Power, "you are quite right. Women are strongly imitative in their tastes. The lovely Italian, whose very costume is a natural following of a Raphael, is no more like the pretty Liverpool damsel, than Genoa is to Glasnevin; and yet, what the deuce have they, dear souls, with their feet upon a soft carpet, and their eyes upon the pages of Scott or Byron, to do with all the cotton or dimity that ever was printed. But let us not repine: that very plastic character is our greatest blessing."

"I'm not so sure that it always exists," said the Doctor dubiously, as though his own experience pointed otherwise.

"Well, go ahead," said the Skipper, who evidently disliked the digression, thus interrupting the Adjutant's story.

"Well, we marched along looking right and left at the pretty faces—and there was plenty of them too—that a momentary curiosity drew to the windows; but, although we smiled, and ogled, and leered, as only a newly arrived regiment can smile, oggle, or leer, by all that's provoking, we might as well have wasted our blandishments upon the Presbyterian meeting-house that frowned upon us, with its high pitched roof and round windows."

"Droll people these," said one: 'rather rum ones,' cried another; 'the black north, by Jove,' said a third; and so we went along to the barracks, somewhat displeased to think that, though the 18th were slow, they might have met their match."

"Disappointed, as we undoubtedly felt, at the little enthusiasm that marked our entrée, we still resolved to persist in our original plan, and accordingly, early the following morning announced our intention of giving amateur theatricals. The mayor, who called upon our colonel, was the first to learn this, and received the information with pretty much the same kind of look as the Archbishop of Canterbury might be supposed to assume, if requested by a friend to ride for the Derby. The incredulous expression of the poor man's face, as he turned from one of us to the other, evidently canvassing in his mind, whether we might not, by some special dispensation of Providence, be all insane, I shall never forget."

"His visit was a very short one; whether concluding that we were not quite safe company, or whether our notification was too much for his nerves, I know not."

"We were not to be balked, however; our plans for gayety, long planned and conned over, were soon announced in all form, and, though we made efforts almost superhuman in the cause, our plans were performed to empty benches, our balls were unattended, our picnic invitations politely declined, and, in a word, all our advances treated with a cold and chilling politeness that plainly said, 'We'll none of you.'"

"Each day brought some new discomfiture, and, as we met at mess, instead of having, as heretofore, some prospect of pleasure and amusement to chat over, it was only to talk gloomily over our miserable failures, and lament the dreary quarters that our fates had doomed us to."

"Some months wore on in this fashion, and at length—what will not time do?—we began, by degrees, to forget our woes. Some of us took to late hours and brandy and water; others got sentimental, and wrote journals, and novels, and poetry; some few made acquaintances among the townspeople, and cut in to a quiet rubber to pass the evening, while another detachment, among which I was, got up a little love affair to while away the tedious hours and cheat the lazy sun."

"I have already said something of my taste in beauty; now, Mrs. Boggs was exactly the style of woman I fancied. She was a widow; she had black eyes—not your jet black, sparkling, Dutch-doll eyes, that roll about and tremble, but mean nothing—no; hers had a soft, subdued, downcast, look about them, and were fully as melting a pair of orbs as any blue eyes you ever looked at."

"Then, she had a short upper lip, and sweet teeth; by Jove, they were pearls! and she showed them, too, pretty often. Her figure was well rounded, plump, and what the French call nette. To complete all, her instep and ankle were unexceptionable, and lastly, her jointure was seven hundred pounds per annum, with a trifle of eight thousand more, that the late lamented Boggs bequeathed, when after four months of interrupted bliss, he left Derry for another world."

"When chance first threw me in the way of the fair widow, some casual coincidence of opinion happened to raise me in her estimation, and I soon afterward received an invitation to a small evening party at her house, to which I alone of the regiment was asked."

"I shall not weary you with the details of my intimacy; it is enough that I tell you I fell desperately in love. I began by visiting twice or thrice a week, and, in less than two months, spent every morning at her house, and rarely left it till the 'roast beef' announced mess."

"I soon discovered the widow's cue; she was serious. Now, I had conducted all manner of flirtations in my previous life; timid young ladies, manly young ladies, musical, artistical, poetical and hysterical. Bless you, I knew them all by heart; but never before had I to deal with a serious one, and a widow to boot. The case was a trying one. For some weeks it was all very up hill work; all the red shot of warm affection I used to pour in on other occasions, was of no use here. The language of love, in which I was no mean proficient availed me not. Compliments and flattery, these rare skirmishers before the engagement, were denied me; and I verily think that a tender squeeze of the hand would have cost me my dismissal."

"How very slow all this," thought I, as, at the end of two months' siege, I still found myself seated in the trenches, and not a single breach in the fortress; "but, to be sure, it's the way they have in the north, and one must be patient."

"While thus I was in no very sanguine frame of mind as to my prospects, in reality my progress was very considerable, having become a member of Mr. McPhun's congregation. I was gradually rising in the estimation of the widow and her friends, whom my constant attendance at meeting, and my serious demeanor, had so far impressed, that very grave deliberation was held whether I should not be made an elder at the next brevet.

"If the Widow Boggs had not been a very lovely and wealthy widow, had she not possessed the eyes, lips, hips, ankles, and jointure aforesaid, I honestly avow that not the charms of that sweet man Mr. McPhun's eloquence, nor even the flattering distinction in store for me, would have induced me to prolong my suit. However, I was not going to despair when in sight of land. The widow was evidently softened; a little time longer, and the most scrupulous moralist, the most rigid advocate for employing time wisely, could not have objected to my daily system of courtship. It was none of your sighing, dying, ogling, hand-squeezing, waist pressing, oath-swearing, everlasting-adoring affairs, with an interchange of rings and lockets; not a bit of it. It was confoundedly like a controversial meeting at the Rotundo, and I myself had a far greater resemblance to Father Tom Maguire than a gay Lothario.

"After all, when mess-time came, when the roast-beef played, and we assembled at dinner, and the soup and fish had gone round, with two glasses of sherry in, my spirits rallied, and a very jolly evening consoled me for all my fatigues and exertions, and supplied me with energy for the morrow; for, let me observe here, that I only made love before dinner. The evenings I reserved for myself, assuring Mrs. Boggs that my regimental duties required all my time after mess hour, in which I was perfectly correct; for at six we dined; at seven I opened the claret No. 1; at eight I had uncorked my second bottle; by half past eight I was returning to the sherry; and, at nine, punctual to the moment, I was returning to my quarters on the back of my servant, Tim Daly, who had carried me safely for eight years, without a single mistake, as the foxhunters say. This was a way we had in the —th; I was always an early riser, and went betimes.

"Now, although I had very abundant proof, from circumstantial evidence, that I was nightly removed from my mess room to my bed in the mode I mention, it would have puzzled me sorely to have proved the fact in any direct way; inasmuch as, by half-past nine, as the clock chimed, Tim entered to take me. I was very innocent of all that was going on, and except a certain vague sense of regret at leaving the decanter, felt nothing whatever.

"It so chanced—what mere trifles are we ruled by in our destiny—that just as my suit with the widow had assumed its most favorable footing, old General Hinks, that commanded the district, announced his coming over to inspect our regiment. Over he accordingly came, and to be sure we had a day of it. We were paraded for six mortal hours; then we were marching and countermarching; moving into line; back again into column; now forming open column, then again into square; till, at last, we began to think that the old General was like the Flying Dutchman, and was probably to keep on drilling us to the day of judgment. To be sure, he enlivened the proceeding to me, by pronouncing the regiment the worst drilled and appointed corps in the service, and the adjutant (me!) the stupidest dunderhead—these were his words—he had ever met with.

"Never mind," thought I; "a few months more, and it's little I'll care for the eighteen manoeuvres. It's small trouble your eyes right or your left shoulders forward will give me. I'll sell out, and with the Widow Boggs and seven hundred a year—but no matter."

"This confounded inspection lasted till half-past five in the afternoon; so that our mess was delayed a full hour in consequence, and it was past seven as we sat down to dinner. Our faces were grim enough as we met together at first; but what will not a good dinner and good wine do for the surliest party? By eight o'clock we began to feel somewhat more convivially disposed; and, before nine, the decanters were performing a quick step round the table, in a fashion very exhilarating, and very jovial to look at.

"No flinching to-night," said the senior major; "we've had a severe day; let us also have a merry evening."

"By Jove, Ormond," cried another, "we must not leave this to-night. Confound the old humbugs and their musty whisk party; throw them over."

"I say, Adjutant," said Forbes, addressing me, "you've nothing particular to say to the fair widow this evening; you'll not bolt, I hope?"

"That he shan't," said one near me; "he must make up for his absence to-morrow; for to-night we all stand fast."

"Beside," said another, "she's at meeting by this. Old what d'ye-call-him—is at fourteenthly before now."

"A note for you, sir," said the mess-waiter, presenting me with a rose-colored, three-cornered billet. It was from la chère Boggs herself, and ran thus:

"Dear Sir—Mr. McPhun and a few friends are coming to tea at my house after meeting; perhaps you will also favor us with your company.
Yours truly,
ELIZA BOGGS."

"What was to be done? Quit the mess—leave a jolly party just at the jolliest moment—exchange Lafite and red hermitage for a soirée of elders presided over by that sweet man Mr. McPhun. It was too bad; but then, how much I was in the scale? What would the widow say if I declined? What would she think? I well knew that the invitation meant nothing less than a full-dress parade of me before her friends, and that to decline was perhaps to forfeit all my hopes in that quarter for ever.

"Any answer, sir?" said the waiter.

"Yes," said I, in a half whisper, "I'll go; tell the servant, I'll go."

"At this moment my tender epistle was subtracted from before me, and, ere I turned round, had made the tour of half the table. I never perceived the circumstance, however, and filling my glass, professed my resolve to sit to the last, with a mental reserve to take my departure at the first opportunity. Ormond and the Paymaster quitted the room for a moment, as if to give orders for a broil at twelve, and now all seemed to promise a well-sustained party for the night.

"Is that all arranged?" inquired the Major, as Ormond entered.

"All right," said he; "and now let us have a bumper and a song, Adjutant, old boy, give us a chant."

"What shall it be, then," inquired I, anxious to cover my intended retreat by an appearance of joviality.

"Give us—
"When I was in the Fusiliers
Some fourteen years ago."

"No, no, confound it, I've heard nothing else since I joined the regiment. Let us have the 'Paymaster's Daughter.'"

"Ah! that's pathetic; I like that," lisped a young ensign.

"If I'm to have a vote," grunted out the senior major, "I pronounce for West India Quarters. Come, give him a glass of sherry, and let him begin."

"I had scarcely finished off my glass, and cleared my throat for my song, when the clock on the chimney-piece chimed half-past nine, and the same instant I felt a heavy hand fall upon my shoulder; I turned, and beheld my servant, Tim. This, as I have already mentioned, was at the hour at which Tim was in the habit of taking me home to my quarters, and, though we had dined an hour later, he took no notice of the circumstance, but, true to his custom, he was behind my chair. A very cursory glance at my 'familiar' was quite sufficient to show me that we had somehow changed sides, for Tim, who was habitually the most sober of mankind, was, on the present occasion, exceedingly drunk, while I, a full hour before that consummation, was perfectly sober.

"What d'ye want, sir?" inquired I, with something of severity in my manner.

"Come home," said Tim, with a hiccup that set the whole table in a roar.

"Leave the room this instant," said I, feeling wrathful at being thus made a butt of for his offences. "Leave the room, or I'll kick you out of it." Now this, let me add, in a parenthesis, was somewhat of a boast, for Tim was six feet three, and strong in proportion, and, when, in liquor, fearless as a tiger.

"You'll kick me out of the room, eh? will you? Try; only try it; that's all." Here a new roar of laughter burst forth, while Tim, again placing an enormous paw upon my shoulder, continued: "Do n't be sitting there, making a baste of yourself, when you've got enough. Do n't you see you're drunk?"

"I sprang to my legs on this, and made a rush to the fireplace, to secure the poker, but Tim was beforehand with me, and seizing me by the waist with both hands, flung me across his shoulder, as though I were a baby, saying, at the same time, 'I'll take you away at half-past eight to-morrow, as you're as rampagous again.' I kicked, I plunged, I swore, I threatened, I even begged and implored to be set down; but, whether my voice was lost in the uproar around me, or that Tim only regarded my denunciations in the light of cursing, I know not, but he carried me bodily down the stairs, steadying himself by one hand on the bannisters, while with the other he held me as in a vice. I had but one consolation all this while; it was this, that, as my quarters lay immediately behind the mess-room, Tim's excursion would soon come to an end, and I should be free once more; but guess my terror to find that the drunken scoundrel, instead of going, as usual, to the left, turned short to the right hand, and marched boldly into Ship Quay street. Every window in the mess-room was filled with our fellows, absolutely shouting with laughter. "Go it, Tim—that's the fellow—hold him tight—never let go," cried a dozen voices, while the wretch, with the tenacity of drunkenness, gripped me still harder, and took his way down the middle of the street.

"It was a beautiful evening in July, a soft summer night, as I made this most pleasing excursion down the most frequented thoroughfare in the maiden city; my struggles every moment exciting roars of laughter from an increasing crowd of spectators, who seemed scarcely less amused than puzzled at the exhibition. In the midst of a torrent of imprecations against my torturer, a loud noise attracted me. I turned my head and saw—horror of horrors!—the door of the meeting-house just flung open, and the congregation issuing forth en masse. Is it any wonder if I remembered no more? There I was—the chosen one of the Widow Boggs—the elder elect—the favored friend and admired associate of Mr. McPhun, taking an airing on a summer's evening on the back of a drunken Irishman. Oh! the thought was horrible; and, certainly, the short and pithy epithets by which I was characterized in the crowd neither improved my temper nor assuaged my wrath; and I feel bound to confess that my own language was neither serious nor becoming. Tim, however, cared little for all this, and pursued the even tenor of his way through the whole crowd, nor stopped till, having made half the circuit of the wall, he deposited me safe at my door, adding, as he set me down, "Oh! as you're as troublesome every evening, it's a wheelbarrow I'll be obliged to bring for you."

"The next day I obtained a short leave of absence, and ere a fortnight expired, exchanged into the —th, preferring Halifax itself to the ridicule that awaited me in Londonderry."

CHAPTER XXX... Fred Power's Adventure in Phillipstown.

The lazy hours of the long summer-day crept slowly over. The sea, unbroken by foam or ripple, shone like a broad blue mirror, reflecting here and there some fleecy patches of snow-white cloud as they stood unmoved in the sky. The good ship rocked to and fro with a heavy and lumbering motion; the cordage rattled; the bulkheads creaked; the sails flapped lazily against the masts; the very sea-gulls seemed to sleep as they rested on the long swell that bore them along; and everything in sea and sky bespoke a calm. No sailor trod the deck; no watch was stirring; the very tiller-ropes were deserted; and, as they traversed back and forward with every roll of the vessel, told that we had no steerage way, and lay a mere log upon the water.

I sat alone in the bow, and fell into a musing fit upon the past and the future. How happily for us it is ordained that, in the most stirring existences, there are every here and there such little resting-spots of reflection, from which, as from some eminence, we look back upon the road we have been treading in life, and cast a wistful glance at the dark vista before us. When first we set out upon our worldly pilgrimage, these are, indeed, precious moments, when, with buoyant heart and spirit high, believing all things, trusting all things, our very youth comes back to us, reflected from every object we meet; and, like Narcissus, we are but worshipping our own image in the water. As we go on in life, the cares, the anxieties, and the business of the world, engross us more and more; and such moments become fewer and shorter. Many a bright dream has been dissolved, and many a fairy vision replaced, by some dark reality; blighted hopes, false friendships, have gradually worn callous the heart once alive to every gentle feeling; and time begins to tell upon us: yet still, as the well-remembered melody to which we listened with delight in infancy brings to our mature age a touch of early years, so will the very association of these happy moments recur to us in our reverie, and make us young again in thought. Then it is, that, as we look back upon our worldly career, we become convinced how truly is the child the father of the man; how frequently are the projects of our manhood the fruit of some boyish predilection; and that, in the emulative ardor that stirs the schoolboy's heart, we may read the prestige of that high daring that makes a hero of its possessor.

These moments, too, are scarcely more pleasurable than they are salutary to us. Disengaged for the time of every wordly anxiety, we pass in review before our own selves; and, in the solitude of our own hearts are we judged. That still, small voice of conscience, unheard and unlistened to amid the din and bustle of life, speaks audibly to us now; and, while chastened on one side by regrets, we are sustained on the other by some approving thought, and, with many a sorrow for the past, and many a promise for the future, we begin to feel "how good it is for us to be here."

The evening wore later: the red sun sank down upon the sea, growing larger and larger; the long line of mellow gold that sheeted along the distant horizon, grew first of a dark ruddy tinge, then paler and paler, till it became almost gray; a single star shone faintly in the east, and darkness soon set in. With night came the wind; for almost imperceptibly the sails swelled slowly out, a slight rustle at the bow followed, the ship lay gently over, and we were once more in motion. It struck four bells; some casual resemblance in the sound to the old pendulum that marked the hour at my uncle's house, startled me so that I actually knew not where I was. With lightning speed, my once home rose up before me with its happy hearts: the old familiar faces were there; the gay laugh was in my ears; there sat my dear old uncle, as with bright eye and mellow voice he looked a very welcome to his guests; there Boyle; there Considine; there the grim-visaged portraits that graced the old walls, whose black oak wainscot stood in broad light and shadow, as the blazing turf fire shone upon it; there was my own place, now vacant; methought my uncle's eye was turned toward it, and that I heard him say, "My poor boy! I wonder where is he now!" My heart swelled; my chest heaved; the tears coursed slowly down my cheeks, as I asked myself, "Shall I ever see them more?" Oh! how little, how very little to us are the accustomed blessings of our life, till some change has robbed us of them; and how dear are they when lost to us! My uncle's dark foreboding that we should never meet again on earth, came, for the first time, forcibly to my mind, and my heart was full to bursting. What could repay me for the agony of that moment, as I thought of him—my first, my best, my only friend—whom I had deserted; and how gladly would I have resigned my bright day-dawn of ambition to be once more beside his chair; to hear his voice; to see his smile; to feel his love for me. A loud laugh from the cabin roused me from my sad, depressing reverie; and, at the same instant, Mike's well-known voice informed me that the Captain was looking for me everywhere, as supper was on the table. Little as I felt disposed to join the party at that moment, as I knew there was no escaping Power, I resolved to make the best of matters; so, after a few minutes, I followed Mickey down the companion, and entered the cabin.

The scene before me was certainly not calculated to perpetuate depressing thoughts. At the head of a rude old-fashioned table, upon which figured several black bottles, and various ill-looking drinking vessels of every shape and material, sat Fred Power; on his right was placed the skipper; on his left the Doctor; the bronzed, merry looking, weather-beaten features of the one, contrasting ludicrously with the pale, ascetic, acute-looking expression of the other. Sparks, more than half-drunk, with the mark of a red-hot cigar upon his nether lip, was lower down; while Major Monsoon, to preserve the symmetry of the party, had protruded his head, surmounted by a huge red night-cap, from the berth opposite, and held out his goblet to be replenished from the punch-bowl.

"Welcome, thrice welcome, thou man of Galway," cried out Power, as he pointed to a seat, and pushed a wine-glass toward me. "Just in time, too, to pronounce upon a new brewery; taste that; a little more of the lemon you would say perhaps; well, I agree with you; rum and brandy; gienlivet and guava jelly; limes, green tea, and a slight suspicion of preserved ginger—nothing else, upon honor—and the most simple mixture for the cure of blue devils and debt I know of; eh, Doctor? you advise it yourself, to be taken before bed-time; nothing inflammatory in it; nothing pugnacious: a mere circulation of the better juices and more congenial spirits of the marley clay, without arousing any of the baser passions; whiskey is the devil for that."

"I canna say that I dinna like whiskey toddy," said the Doctor, "in the cauld winter nights it's no bad."

"Ah! that's it," said Power; "there's the pull you Scotch have upon us, poor Patlanders; cool, calculating, long-headed fellows, you only come up to the mark after fifteen tumblers; whereas we hot-brained devils, with a blood at 212° of Fahrenheit, and a high pressure engine of good spirits always ready for an explosion, we go clean mad whea tipsy; not but I am fully convinced that a mad Irishman is worth two sane people of any other country under heaven."

"If you mean by that insinuation—insinuation to imply any disrespect to the English," stuttered out Sparks, "I am bound to say that I for one, and the Doctor, I am sure for another—"

"Na, na," interrupted the Doctor, "ye manna coont upon me; I'm no disposed to fecht over our liquor."

"Then, Major Monsoon, I'm certain—"

"Are ye, faith," said the Major, with a grin; "blessed are they who expect nothing—of which number you are not—for most decidedly you shall be disappointed."

"Never mind, Sparks, take the whole fight to your own proper self, and do battle like a man; and here I stand, ready at all arms to prove my position—that we drink better, sing better, court better, fight better, and make better punch than every John Bull from Berwick to the Land's End."

Sparks, however, who seemed not exactly sure how far his antagonist was disposed to quiz, relapsed into a half-tipsy expression of contemptuous silence, and sipped his liquor without reply.

"Yes," said Power, after a pause, "bad luck to it for whiskey; it nearly got me broke once, and poor Tom O'Reilly of the 5th, too, the best-tempered fellow in the service; we were as near as touch and go; and all for some confounded Loughrea spirits, that we believed to be perfectly innocent, and used to swill away freely, without suspicion of any kind."

"Let's hear the story," said I, "by all means."

"It's not a long one," said Power; "so I don't care if I tell it; and beside, if I make a clean breast of my own sins, I'll insist upon Monsoon's telling you afterward how he stocked his cellar in Cadiz; eh, Major? there's worse tipple than the King of Spain's sherry?"

"You shall judge for yourself, old boy," said Monsoon, good humoredly; "and, as for the narrative, it is equally at your service. Of course, it goes no farther. The commander-in-chief, long life to him, is a glorious fellow; but he has no more idea of a joke than the Archbishop of Canterbury, and it might chance to reach him."

"Recount and fear not," cried Power; "we are discreet as the worshipful company of apothecaries."

"But you forget you are to lead the way,"

"Here goes then," said the jolly Captain; "not that the story has any merit in it, but the moral is beautiful."

"Ireland, to be sure, is a beautiful country, but somehow it would prove a very dull one to be quartered in, if it were not that the people seem to have a natural taste for the army. From the belle of Merriem-square down to the innkeeper's daughter in Tralee, the loveliest part of the creation seem to have a perfect appreciation of our high acquirements and advantages; and, in no other part of the globe, the Tongo Islands included, is a red coat more in favor. To be sure, they would be very ungrateful if it were not the case; for we, upon our sides, leave no stone unturned to make ourselves agreeable. We ride, drink, play, and make love to the ladies, from Fairhead to Killarney, in a way greatly calculated to render us popular; and, as far as making the time pass pleasantly, we are the boys for the 'greatest happiness' principle. I repeat it; we deserve our popularity. Which of us does not get head and ears in debt with garrison balls and steeple-chases, pic-nics, regattas, and the thousand and one inventions to get rid of one's spare cash, so called for being sparingly dealt out by our governors? Now and then too, when all else fails, we take a newly joined ensign, and make him marry some pretty but penniless lass, in a country town, just to show the rest that we are not joking, but have serious ideas of matrimony, in the midst of all our flirtation. If it were all like this, the green isle would be a paradise; but, unluckily, every now and then, one is condemned to some infernal place, where there is neither a pretty face nor a light ankle; where the priest himself is not a good fellow; and long, ill-paved, straggling streets, filled, on market days, with booths of striped calico and soapy cheese, is the only promenade; and a ruinous barrack, with mouldy walls and a tumbling chimney, the only quarters."

"In vain, on your return from your morning stroll or afternoon canter, you look on the chimney-piece for a shower of visiting cards, and pink notes of invitation; in vain you ask your servant has any one called. Alas! your only visitor has been the gauger, to demand a party to assist in still-hunting, amid that interesting class of the population, who, having nothing to eat, are engaged in devising drink, and care as much for the life of a red coat as you do for that of a crow or a curlew. This may seem overdrawn; but I would ask you, were you ever for you sins quartered in that capital city of the Bog of Allen they call Phillips-town? Oh, but it is a romantic spot! They tell us somewhere that much of the expression of the human face divine depends upon the objects which constantly surround us. That the inhabitants of mountain districts imbibe, as it were, a certain bold and daring character of expression from the scenery, very different from the placid and monotonous look of those who dwell in plains and valleys; and I can certainly credit the theory in this instance, for every man, woman, and child you meet has a brown, baked, scruffy, turf-like face, that fully satisfy you that, if Adam were formed of clay, the Phillipstown people were worse treated, and only made of bog mould."

"Well, one morning, poor Tom and myself were marched off from Birr, where one might 'live and love for ever,' to take up our quarters at this sweet spot. Little we knew of Phillipstown, and, like my friend, the adjutant there, when he laid siege to Derry, we made our entrée with all the pomp we could muster, and though we had no band, our drums and fife did duty for it; and we brushed along through turf creels and wicker baskets of new brogues that obstructed the street till we reached the barrack, the only testimony of admiration we met with being, I feel bound to admit, from a ragged urchin of ten years, who, with a wattle in his hand, imitated me as I marched along, and, when I cried halt, took his leave of us by dexterously affixing his thumb to the side of his nose, and outstretching his fingers, as if thus to convey a very strong hint that we were not half so fine fellows as we thought ourselves. Well, four mortal summer months of hot sun and cloudless sky went over, and still we lingered in that vile village, the everlasting monotony of our days being marked by the same brief morning drill, the same blue-legged chicken dinner, the same smoky Loughrea whiskey, and the same evening stroll along the canal bank, to watch for the Dublin packet-boat, with its never-varying cargo of cattle-dealers, priests, and peelers, on their way to the west country, as though the demand for such colonial productions in these parts was insatiable. This was pleasant, you will say; but, what was to be done? we had nothing else. Now nothing saps a man's temper like ennui. The cranky, peevish people one meets with, would be excellent folk if they had something to do. As for us, I'll venture to say, two men more disposed to go pleasantly down the current of life, it were hard to meet with; and yet, such was the consequence of these confounded four months' sequestration from all other society, we became sour and cross-grained; everlastingly disputing about trifles, and continually arguing about matters which neither were interested in, nor indeed knew any thing about. There were, indeed, it is true, few topics to discuss; newspapers we never saw; sporting there was none; but, then, the drill, the return of duty, the probable chances of our being ordered for service, were all daily subjects to be talked over, and usually with considerable asperity and bitterness. One point, however, always served us, when hard pushed for a bone of contention, and which, begun by mere accident at first, gradually increased to a sore and techy subject, and finally led to the consequences which I have hinted at in the beginning—this was no less than the respective merits of our mutual servants; each everlastingly indulging in a tirade against the other, for awkwardness, incivility, unhandiness, charges, I am bound to confess, most amply proved on either side.

"Well, I am sure, O'Reilly, if you can stand that fellow. It's no affair of mine; but such an ungainly savage I never met; I would say."

"To which he would reply, 'Bad enough he is certainly; but, by Jove, when I only think of your Hottentot, I feel grateful for what I've got.'"

"Then ensued a discussion, with attack, rejoinder, charge and recrimination, till we retired for the night, wearied with our exertions, and not a little ashamed of ourselves at bottom for our absurd warmth and excitement. In the morning the matter would be rigidly avoided by each party, until some chance occasion had brought it on the tapis, when hostilities would be immediately renewed, and carried on with the same vigor, to end as before."

"In this agreeable state of matters we sat one warm summer evening before the mess-room, under the shade of a canvass awning, discussing, by way of refrigerant, our eighth tumbler of whisky punch: we had as usual been jarring away about every thing under heaven. A lately arrived post-chaise, with an old, stiff-looking gentleman in a queue, had formed a kind of 'God-send' for debate, as to who he was, whether he was going, whether he really had intended to spend the night there, or that he only had put up because the chaise was broken; each, as was customary, maintaining his own opinion with an obstinacy we have often since laughed at, though, at the time, we had few mirthful thoughts about the matter."

"As the debate waxed warm, O'Reilly asserting that he positively knew the individual in question to be a United Irishman, traveling with instructions from the French government, while I laughed him to scorn, by swearing he was the rector of Tyrrell's-pass; that I knew him well; and, moreover, that he was the worst preacher in Ireland. Singular enough it was, that all this while the disputed identity was himself standing coolly at the inn window, with his snuff-box in his hand, leisurely examining us as we sat, appearing, at least, to take a very lively interest in our debate."

"Come, now," said O'Reilly, "there's only one way to conclude this, and make you pay for your obstinacy. What will you bet that he's the rector of Tyrrell's-pass?"

"What odds will you take that he's Wolfe Tone?" inquired I, sneeringly.

"Five to one against the rector," said he, exultingly.

"An elephant's molar to a tooth-pick against Wolfe Tone," cried I.

"Ten pound even that I'm nearer the mark than you," said Tom, with a smash of his fist upon the table.

"Done," said I, "done; but how are we to decide the wager?"

"That's soon done," said he; at the same instant he sprang to his legs and called out, "Pat—I say Pat—I want you to present my respects to—"

"No, no, I bar that—no ex-parte statements. Here, Jem, do you simply tell that—"

"That fellow can't deliver a message. Do come here, Pat. Just beg of—"

"He'll blunder it, the confounded fool; so, Jem, do you go."

"The two individuals thus addressed were just in the act of conveying a tray of glasses and a spiced round of beef for supper into the mess-room; and, as I may remark that they fully entered into the feelings of jealousy their respective masters professed, each eyed the other with a look of very unequivocal dislike."

"Arrah, you need n't be pushin' me that way," said Pat, "an' the round o' beef in my hands."

"Devil's luck to ye, it's the glasses you'll be breaking, with your awkward elbow."

"Then why do n't ye leave the way: aint I your superior?"

"Aint I the Captain's own man?"

"Ay, and if you war. Do n't I belong to his betters? Is n't my master the two lieutenants?"

"This, strange as it may sound, was so far true, as I held a commission in an African corps, with my lieutenantancy in the 5th."

"Begorra, av he was six—there now, you don it."

"At the same moment a tremendous crash took place, and the large dish fell in a thousand pieces on the pavement, while the spiced round rolled passively down the yard."

"Scarcely was the noise heard, when, with one vigorous kick, the tray of glasses was sent spinning into the air, and the next moment the disputants were engaged in bloody battle. It was at this moment that our attention was first drawn toward them, and I need not say with what feelings of interest we looked on."

"Hit him, Pat—there, Jem, under the guard—that's it—go in—well done, left hand—by Jove, that was a facer—his eye's closed—he's done—not a bit of it—how do you like that?—unfair, unfair—no such thing—I say it was—not at all—I deny it."

"By this time we had approached the combatants, each man patting his own fellow on the back, and encouraging him by the most lavish promises. Now it was, but in what way I never could exactly tell, that I threw out my right hand to stop a blow that I saw coming rather too near me, when, by some unhappy mischance, my doubled fist lighted upon Tom O'Reilly's nose. Before I could express my sincere regret for the accident, the blow was returned with double force, and the next moment we were at it harder than the others. After five minutes' sharp work, we both stopped for breath, and incontinently burst out a laughing. There was Tom with a nose as large as three; a huge cheek on one side, and the whole head swinging round like a harlequin's; while I, with one eye closed, and the other like a half-shut cockle-shell, looked scarcely less rueful. We had not much time for mirth, for at the same instant a sharp, full voice called out close beside us—

"To your quarters, sirs. I put you both under arrest, from which you are not to be released until the sentence of a court-martial decide if conduct such as this become officers' and gentlemen."

"I looked round and saw the old fellow in the queue."

"Wolfe Tone, by all that's unlucky," said I, with an attempt at a smile.

"The rector of Tyrrell's-pass," cried out Tom, with a snuffle; "the worst preacher in Ireland; eh, Fred?"

"We had not much time for further commentaries upon our friend, for he at once opened his frock coat, and displayed to our horrified gaze the uniform of a general officer."

"Yes, sir, General Johnston, if you will allow me to present him to your acquaintance: and now, guard, turn out."

"In a few minutes more the orders were issued, and poor Tom and myself found ourselves fast confined to our quarters, with a sentinel at the door, and the pleasant prospect that, in a space of about ten days, we should be broke and dismissed the service; which verdict, as the general order would say, the Commander of the Forces has been graciously pleased to approve."

"However, when morning came, the old General, who was really a trump, inquired a little further into the matter, saw it was partly accidental, and, after a severe reprimand, and a caution about Loughrea whiskey after the sixth tumbler, released us from arrest, and forgave the whole affair."

CHAPTER XXXI.—The Voyage.

Ugh! what a miserable thing is a voyage! Here we are now eight days at sea; the eternal sameness of all around growing every hour less supportable. Sea and sky are beautiful things when seen from the dark woods and waving meadows on shore; but their picturesque effect is sadly marred from want of contrast; beside that, the "tousjours pork," with crystals of salt as long as your wife's fingers; the potatoes, that seemed varnished in French polish; the tea, seasoned with geological specimens from the basin of London, cycloped maple sugar; and the butter—ye gods!—the butter! But why enumerate these smaller features of discomfort, and omit the more glaring ones? The utter selfishness which blue water suggests, is inevitably as the cold fit follows the ague; the good fellow that shares his knapsack or his last guinea on land, here forages out the best corner to hang his hammock; jockeys you into a comfortable crib, where the uncalked deck but filters every rain from heaven on your head; he votes you the corner at dinner, not only that he may place you with your back to the thorough draught of the gangway ladder, but that he may eat, drink, and lie down, before you have even begun to feel the qualms of the dinner of a troop ship is well calculated to suggest; cuts his pencil with your best razor; wears your shirts, as washing is scarce; and winds up all by having a good story of you every evening for the edification of the other "sharp gentlemen," who, being too wide awake to be humbugged themselves, enjoy his success prodigiously. This, gentle reader, is neither confession nor avowal of mine. The passage I have here presented to you I have taken from the journal of my brother officer Mr. Sparks, who, when not otherwise occupied, usually employed his time in committing to paper his thoughts upon men, manners, and things at sea in general; though, sooth to say, his was not an idle life: being voted by unanimous consent "a junior," he was condemned to offices that the veriest fog in Eton or Harrow had rebelled against. In the morning, under the pseudonym of Mrs. Sparks, he presided at breakfast, having previously made tea, coffee, and chocolate for the whole cabin, beside boiling about twenty eggs at various degrees of hardness: he was under heavy recognisances to provide a plate of buttered toast of very alarming magnitude, fried ham, kidneys, &c., to no end. Later on, when others sauntered about the deck, vainly endeavoring to fix their attention upon a novel or a review, the poor corset might be seen with a white apron tucked gracefully round his spare proportions, whipping eggs for pancakes, or with up-turned shirt-sleeves, fashioning dough for a pudding. As the day waned, the cook's galley became his haunt, where, exposed to a roasting fire, he inspected the details of a cuisine, for which, whatever his demerits, he was sure of an ample remuneration in abuse at dinner. Then came the dinner itself, that dread ordeal, where nothing was praised, and everything censured. This was followed by the punch-making, where the tastes of six different and differing individuals were to be exclusively consulted, in the self-same beverage: and lastly, the supper at night, when Sparkie, as he was familiarly called toward evening, grown quite exhausted, became the subject of unmitigated wrath, and most unmeasured reprobation.

"I say, Sparks, it's getting late; the spatch-cock, old boy; do n't be slumbering."

"By the by, Sparkie, what a mess you made of that pea-soup to-day! By Jove, I never felt so ill in all my life."

"Na, na, it was na the soup; it was something he pit in the punch, that's burning me ever since I tuk it. Ou, man, but ye're an awfu' creature wif' vittals."

"He'll improve. Major, he'll improve; do n't discourage him; the boy's young; be alive now there—where's the toast—confound you—there's the toast?"

"There, Sparks, you like a drumstick, I know—must n't muzzle the ox, eh? Scripture for you, old boy; eat away; hang the expense: hand him over the jug—empty—eh, Charley? Come, Sparkie, bear a hand, the liquor's out."

"But won't you let me eat?"

"Eat! Heavens, what a fellow for eating! By George, such an appetite is clean against the articles of war! Come, man, it's drink we're thinking of; there's the rum, sugar, limes; see to the hot water. Well, skipper, how are we getting on?"

"Lying our course; eight knots off the log; pass the call. Why, Mister Sparks?"

"Eh, Sparks, what's this?"

"Sparks, my man, confound it!" and then, omnes chorusing "Sparks!" in every key of the gamut, the luckless fellow would be obliged to jump up from his meager fare; and set to work at a fresh brewage of punch for the others. The bowl and the glasses filled, by some little management on Power's part, our friend, the cornet, would be drawn out, as the phrase is, into some confession of his early years, which seemed to have been exclusively spent in love-making, devotion to the fair being as integral a portion of his character as tippling was of the worthy Major's.

Like most men who pass their life in over-studious efforts to please—however ungallant the confession be—the amiable Sparks had had little success; his love if not, as it generally happened, totally unrequited, was invariably the source of some awkward catastrophe, there being no imaginable error he had not at some time or other fallen into, nor any conceivable mischance to which he had not been exposed. Inconsolable widows, attached wives, fond mothers, newly-married brides, engaged young ladies, were, by some contretemps, continually the subject of his attachments; and the least mishap which followed the avowal of his passion was to be heartily laughed at, and obliged to leave the neighborhood. Duels, apologies, actions at law, compensations, &c., were of every-day occurrence; and to such an extent too, that any man blessed with a smaller bump upon the occiput, would eventually have long since abandoned the pursuit, and taken to some less expensive pleasure; but poor Sparks, in the true spirit of a martyr, only gloried the more, the more he suffered: and, like the worthy man who continued to purchase tickets in the lottery for thirty years, with nothing but a succession of blanks, he ever imagined that Fortune was only trying his patience, and had some cool forty thousand pounds of happiness waiting his perseverance in the end. Whether this prize ever did turn up in the course of years, I am unable to say; but certainly up to the period of his history I now speak of, all had been as gloomy and unrequiting as need be. Power, who knew something of every man's adventures, was aware of so much of poor Sparks' career, and usually contrived to lay a trap for a confession that generally served to amuse us during an evening, as much, I acknowledge, from the manner of the recital, as any thing contained in the story. There was a species of serious matter-of-fact simplicity in his detail of the most ridiculous scenes that left you convinced that his bearing upon the affair in question must have greatly heightened the absurdity; nothing, however comic or droll in itself, ever exciting in him the least approach to a smile; he sat with his large light-blue eyes, light hair, long upper lip, and retreating chin, listening out an account of an adventure, with a look of Liston about him, that was inconceivably amusing.

"Come, Sparks," said Power, "I claim a promise you made me the other night, on condition we let you off making the oyster-patties at ten o'clock: you can't forget what I mean." Here the Captain knowingly touched the tip of his ear, at which signal the cornet colored slightly, and drank off his wine in a hurried, confused way. "He promised to tell us, Major, how he lost the tip of his left ear. I have myself heard hints of the circumstance, but would much rather hear Sparks' own version of it."

"Another love story," said the Doctor with a grin "I'll be bound."

"Shot off in a duel?" said I, inquiringly; "close work, too."

"No such thing," replied Power; "but Sparks will enlighten you. It is, without exception, the most touching and beautiful thing I ever heard; as a simple story, it beats the Vicar of Wakefield to sticks."

"You don't say so," said poor Sparks, blushing.

"Ay, that I do, and maintain it too. I'd rather be the hero of that little adventure, and be able to recount it as you do—for, mark me, that's no small part of the effect—than I'd be full colonel of the regiment. Well, I am sure I always thought it affecting; but somehow, my dear friend, you do n't know your powers; you have that within you would make the fortune of half the periodicals going. Ask Monsoon or O'Malley there, if I did not say so at breakfast, when you were grilling the old hen, which, by the way, let me remark, was not one of your chef-d'œuvres."

"A tougher beastie I never put a tooth in."

"But the story; the story," said I.

"Yes," said Power, with a tone of command, "the story, Sparks."

"Well, if you really think it worth telling, as I have always felt it a very remarkable incident, here goes."

CHAPTER XXXII.—Mr. Sparks' Story.

"I sat at breakfast one beautiful morning in the Goat Inn at Barmouth, looking out by one window upon the lovely vale of Barmouth, with its tall trees and brown trout stream struggling through the woods, then turning to take a view of the calm sea, that, speckled over with white-sailed fishing-boats, stretched away in the distance. The eggs were fresh; the trout newly-caught; the cream delicious; before me lay the Plwdwdlwn Advertiser, which, among the fashionable arrivals at the sea, set forth Mr. Sparks, nephew of Sir Toby Sparks, of Manchester, a paragraph, by the way, I always inserted. The English are naturally an aristocratic people, and set a due value upon a title."

"A very just observation," remarked Power seriously, while Sparks continued.

"However, as far as any result from the announcement, I might as well have spared myself the trouble; for not a single person called; not one solitary invitation to dinner; not a picnic; not a breakfast; no, not even a tea-party was heard of. Barmouth, at the time I speak of, was just in that transition state at which the caterpillar may be imagined, when, having abandoned his reptile habits, he still has not succeeded in becoming a butterfly. In fact, it had ceased to be a fishing-village, but had not arrived at the dignity of a watering-place. Now, I know nothing as bad as this. You have not on one hand the quiet retirement of a little peaceful hamlet, with its humble dwellings and cheap pleasures; nor have you the gay and animated tableau of fashion in miniature on the other; but you have noise, din, bustle, confusion, beautiful scenery, and lovely points of view, marred and ruined by vulgar associations; every bold rock and jutting promontory has its citizen occupants; every sandy cove or tide-washed bay has its myriads of squalling babes and red baise-clad bathing-women, those veritable descendants of the nymphs of old. Pink parasols, donkey-carts, baskets of bread and butter, reticules, guides to Barmouth, specimens of ore, fragments of gypsum, meet you at every step, and destroy every illusion of the picturesque.

"I shall leave this, thought I. My dreams, my long-cherished dreams of romantic walks upon the sea-shore, of evening strolls by moonlight, through dell and dingle, are reduced to a short promenade through an alley of bathing-boxes, amid a streaming population of nursery-maids and sick children, with a thorough-bass of 'fresh shrimps,' discordant enough to frighten the very fish from the shores. There is no peace, no quiet, no romance, no poetry, no love. Alas! that most of all was wanting; for after all, what is it which lights up the heart, save the flame of mutual attachment? what gilds the fair stream of life, save the bright ray of warm affection? what—"

"In a word," said Power, "it is the sugar in the punch-bowl of our existence. Perge, Sparks, push on."

"I was not long in making up my mind. I called for my bill; I packed my clothes; I ordered post horses; I was ready to start; one item in the bill alone detained me. The frequent occurrence of the enigmatical word 'cur,' following my servant's name, demanded an explanation, which I was in the act of receiving, when a chaise and four drove rapidly to the house. In a moment the blinds were drawn up, and such a head appeared at the window! Let me pause for one moment to drink in the remembrance of that lovely being; eyes where heaven's own blue seemed concentrated, were shaded by long deep lashes of the darkest brown; a brow, fair noble, expansive, at each side of which masses of dark brown hair waved in ringlets, half in loose falling bands, shadowing her pale and downy cheek, where one faint rosebud tinge seemed lingering; lips slightly parted, as though to speak gave to the features all the play of animation which completed this intellectual character, and made up—"

"What I should say was a devilish pretty girl," interrupted Power.

"Back the widow against her at long odds any day," murmured the Adjutant.

"She was an angel, an angel," cried Sparks, with enthusiasm.

"So was the widow, if you go to that," said the Adjutant, hastily.

"And so is Matilda Dalrymple," said Power, with a sly look at me. "We are all honorable men; eh, Charley?"

"Go ahead with the story," said the skipper; "I am beginning to feel an interest in it."

"Isabella," said a man's voice, as a large well-dressed personage assisted her to alight. "Isabella, love, you must take a little rest here before we proceed further."

"I think she had better, sir," said a matronly-looking woman with a plaid cloak and a black bonnet.

"They disappeared within the house, and I was left alone. The bright dream was passed; she was there no longer; but in my heart her image lived, and I almost felt she was before me. I thought I heard her voice; I saw her move; my limbs trembled; my hands tingled; I rang the bell, ordered my trunks back again to No. 5, and, as I sank upon the sofa, murmured to myself, this is indeed love at first sight."

"How devilish sudden it was," said the skipper.

"Exactly like the camp fever," responded the Doctor: "one moment ye are vera well; the next ye are seized wi' a kind of shivering; then comes a kind of mandering, dandering, travelling a' overness."

"D— the camp fever," interrupted Sparks.

"Well, as I observed, I fell in love; and here let me take the opportunity of observing that all that we are in the habit of hearing about single or only attachments is mere nonsense. No man is so capable of feeling deeply as he who is in the daily practice of it. Love, like everything else in this world, demands a species of cultivation. The mere tyro in an affair of the heart thinks he has exhausted all its pleasures and pains; but only he who has made it his daily study for years, familiarized his mind with every phase of the passion, can properly or adequately appreciate it. Thus the more you love the better you love; the more frequently has your heart yielded."

"It's vera like the mucous membrane," said the Doctor.

"I'll break your neck with the decanter if you interrupt him again!" exclaimed Power.

"For days I scarcely ever left the house," Sparks resumed: "watching to catch one glance of the lovely Isabella. My farthest excursion was to the little garden of the inn, where I used to set every imaginable species of snare, in the event of her venturing to walk there. One day I would leave a volume of poetry; another a copy of Paul and Virginia with a marked page; sometimes my guitar with a broad blue ribbon, would hang pensively from a tree; but, alas! all in vain; she never appeared. At length, I took courage to ask the waiter, about her; for some minutes he could not understand what I meant; but, at last, discovering my object, he cried out, 'Oh! No. 8, sir, is it No. 8 you mean?'"

"It may be," said I, "what of her then?"

"Oh sir, she's gone these three days."

"Gone," said I with a groan.

"Yes, sir; she left this early on Tuesday with the same old gentleman and the old woman in a chaise and four: they ordered horses at Dollgelly to meet them; but I don't know which road they took afterward."

"I fell back in my chair, unable to speak. Here I was enacting Romeo for three mortal days to a mere company of Welch waiters and chambermaids, sighing, serenading, reciting, attitudinizing, rose-plucking, soliloquizing, half-suiciding; and all for the edification of a set of savages, with about as much civilization as their own goats."

"The bill," cried I, in a voice of thunder: "my bill this instant."

"I had been imposed upon shamefully; grossly imposed upon, and would not remain another hour in the house.—Such were my feelings and so thinking, I sent for my servant, abused him for not having my clothes ready packed; he replied; I reiterated and as my temper mounted, vented every imaginable epithet upon his head, and concluded by paying him his wages, and sending him about his business, in one hour more I was upon the road.

"What road, sir?" said the postilion, as he mounted into the saddle.

"To the devil, if you please," said I, throwing myself back in the carriage.

"Very well, sir," replied the boy, putting spurs to his horse.

"That evening I arrived at Bedgellert.

"The little humble inn of Bedgellert, with its thatched roof and earthen floor, was a most welcome sight to me, after eleven hours' traveling on a broiling July day. Behind the very house itself rose the mighty Snowdon, towering high above the other mountains, whose lofty peaks were lost amid the clouds; before me was the narrow valley—"

"Wake me up when he's under way again," said the skipper, yawning fearfully.

"Go on, Sparks," said Power, encouragingly, "I was never more interested in my life; eh, O'Malley?"

"Quite thrilling," responded I, and Sparks resumed.

"Three weeks did I loiter about that sweet spot, my mind filled with images of the past and dreams of the future, my fishing rod my only companion; not, indeed, that I ever caught any thing; for somehow my tackle was always getting foul of some willow tree or water lily, and, at last, I gave up even the pretence of whipping the streams. Well, one day,—I remember it as well as though it were but yesterday: it was the fourth of August,—I had set off upon an excursion to Llanberis. I had crossed Snowdon early, and reached the little lake on the opposite side by breakfast time. There I sat down near the ruined tower of Dolbadern, and, opening my knapsack, made a hearty meal. I have ever been a daydreamer; and there are few things I like better than to lie, upon some hot and sunny day, in the tall grass beneath the shade of some deep boughs, with running water murmuring near, hearing the summer bee buzzing monotonously, and at the distance, the clear, sharp tinkle of the sheep bell. In such a place, at such a time, one's fancy strays playfully, like some happy child, and none but pleasant thoughts present themselves. Fatigued by my long walk, and overcome by heat, I fell asleep. How long I lay there, I cannot tell, but the deep shadows were halfway down the tall mountain when I awoke. A sound had startled me; I thought I heard a voice speaking close to me. I looked up, and for some seconds I could not believe that I was not dreaming. Beside me, within a few paces, stood Isabella, the beautiful vision that I had seen at Barmouth, but far, a thousand times, more beautiful. She was dressed in something like a peasant's dress, and wore the round hat which, in Wales at least, seems to suit the character of the female face so well; her long and waving ringlets fell carelessly upon her shoulders, and her cheek flushed from walking. Before I had a moment's notice to recover my roving thoughts, she spoke: her voice was full and round, but soft and thrilling, as she said—

"I beg pardon, sir, for having disturbed you unconsciously; but having done so, may I request you will assist me to fill this pitcher with water?"

"She pointed at the same time to a small stream which trickled down a fissure in the rock, and formed a little well of clear water beneath. I bowed deeply, and murmured something—I know not what—took the pitcher from her hand, and scaling the rocky cliff, mounted to the clear source above, where, having filled the vessel, I descended. When I reached the ground beneath, I discovered that she was joined by another person, whom, in an instant, I recognised to be the old gentleman I had seen with her at Barmouth, and who in the most courteous manner apologized for the trouble I had been caused, and informed me that a party of his friends were enjoying a little picnic near, and invited me to make one of them.

"I need not say that I accepted the invitation, nor that with delight I seized the opportunity of forming an acquaintance with Isabella, who, I must confess, upon her part, showed no disinclination to the prospect of my joining the party."

"After a few minutes' walking, we came to a small rocky point which projected for some distance into the lake, and offered a view for several miles of the vale of Llanberis. Upon this lovely spot we found the party assembled: they consisted of about fourteen or fifteen persons, all busily engaged in the arrangement of a very excellent cold dinner, each individual having some peculiar province allotted to him or her to be performed by their own hands. Thus, one elderly gentleman was whipping cream under a chestnut tree; while a very fashionably-dressed young man was washing radishes in the lake; an old lady with spectacles was frying salmon over a wood fire, opposite to a short puffy man with a bald head and drab shorts, deep in the mystery of a chicken salad, from which he never lifted his eyes, when I came up. It was thus I found how the fair Isabella's lot had been cast, as a drawer of water; she, with the others, contributing her share of exertion for the common good. The old gentleman who accompanied her seemed the only unoccupied person, and appeared to be regarded as the ruler of the feast; at least, they all called him General, and implicitly followed every suggestion he threw out. He was a man of a certain grave and quiet manner, blended with a degree of mild good-nature and courtesy, that struck me at first, and gained greatly on me, even in the few minutes I conversed with him as we came along. Just before he presented me to his friends, he gently touched my arm, and drawing me aside, whispered in my ear,

"Do n't be surprised at anything you may hear to-day here; for I must inform you, this is a kind of club, as I may call it, where every one assumes a certain character, and is bound to sustain it under a penalty. We have these little meetings every now and then; and, as strangers are never present, I feel some explanation necessary, that you may be able to enjoy the thing; you understand?"

"Oh, perfectly," said I, overjoyed at the novelty of the scene, and anticipating much pleasure from my chance meeting with such very original characters.

"Mr. Sparks, Mrs. Winterbottom. Allow me to present Mr. Sparks."

"Any news from Batavia, young gentleman?" said the sallow old lady addressed. "How is coffee?"

"The General passed on, introducing me rapidly as he went."

"Mr. Doolittle, Mr. Sparks."

"Ah, how do you do, old boy?" said Mr. Doolittle; "sit down beside me. We have forty thousand acres of pickle cabbage spoiling for want of a little vinegar."

"Fie, fie, Mr. Doolittle," said the General, and passed on to another.

"Mr. Sparks, Captain Crosstree."

"Ah, Sparks, Sparks, son of Old Blazes! ha, ha, ha," and the captain fell back into an immoderate fit of laughter.

"Le Roi est servi," said the thin meager figure in nan-keens, bowing cap in hand before the General; and, accordingly, we all assumed our places on the grass.

"Say it again; say it again! and I'll plunge this dagger in your heart!" said a hollow voice, tremulous with agitation and rage, close beside me. I turned my head, and saw an old gentleman with a wart on his nose, sitting opposite a meat pie, which he was contemplating with a look of fiery indignation. Before I could witness the sequel of the scene, I felt a soft hand pressed upon mine. I turned. It was Isabella herself, who looked at me with an expression I shall never forget, said,

"Do n't mind poor Faddy; he never hugs any one."

"Meanwhile the business of dinner went on rapidly: the servants, of whom enormous numbers were now present, ran hither and thither; and duck, ham, pigeon-pie, cold veal, apple tarts, cheese, pickled salmon, mellow and rice-pudding, flourished on every side. As for me, whatever I might have gleaned from the conversation around, under other circumstances, I was too much occupied with Isabella to think of any one else. My suit—for such it was—progressed rapidly. There was evidently something favorable in the circumstances we last met under; for her manner had all the warmth and cordiality of old friendship. It is true, that more than once I caught the General's eye fixed upon us, with anything but an expression of pleasure, and I thought that Isabella blushed and seemed confused also. What care I! however, was my reflection; my views are honorable, and the nephew and heir of Sir Toby Sparks—just in the very act of making this reflection, the old man in the shorts hit me in the eye with a roasted apple, calling out at the moment,

"When did you join, thou child of the pale faces?"

"Mr. Murdock's," cried the General in a voice of thunder, and the little man hung down his head, and spoke not.

"A word with you, young gentleman," said a fat old lady, pinching my arm above the elbow.

"Never mind her," said Isabella, smiling; "poor dear old Dorking, she thinks she's an hour glass; how droll, is n't it?"

"Young man, have you any feelings of humanity?" inquired the old lady, with tears in her eyes as she spoke, "will you, dare you assist a fellow-creature under my circumstances?"

"What can I do for you, madam?" said I, really feeling for her distress.

"Just, like a good dear soul, just turn me up, for I'm just run out."

Isabella burst out a laughing at this strange request, an excess which, I confess, I was unable myself to repress; upon which the old lady putting on a frown of enormous blackness, said,

"You may laugh, madam: but first, before you ridicule the misfortunes of others, ask yourself are you too free from infirmity? When did you see the ace of spades? Madam, answer me that."

Isabella became suddenly pale as death, her very lips blanched; and her voice, almost inaudible, muttered,

"Am I then deceived? Is not this he?" so saying, she placed her hand upon my shoulder.

"That the ace of spades!" exclaimed the old lady, with a sneer: "that the ace of spades!"

"Are you, or are you not, sir," said Isabella, fixing her deep and languid eyes upon me; "answer, as you are honest, are you the ace of spades?"

"He is the King of Tuscarrora; look at his war paint," cried an elderly gentleman, putting a streak of mustard across my nose and cheek.

"Then am I deceived," said Isabella; and, flying at me, she plucked a handful of hair out of my whiskers.

"Cuckoo, cuckoo, shouted one; bow, wow, wow," roared another; "phiz," went a third; and, in an instant, such a scene of commotion and riot ensued; plates, dishes, knives, forks, and decanters flew right and left; every one pitched into his neighbor with the most fearful cries, and hell itself broke loose; the hour-glass and the Moulah of Oude had got me down, and were pummeling me to death, when a short thickset man came on all-fours slap down upon them, shouting out, "Way, make way for the royal Bengal tiger," at which they both fled like lightning, leaving me to the encounter single-handed. Fortunately, however, this was not of long duration, for some well-disposed Christians pulled him from off me; not, however, before he had seized me in his grasp, and bitten off a portion of my right ear, leaving me, as you see, thus mutilated for the rest of my days."

"What an extraordinary club!" broke in the Doctor.

"Club! sir, club! it was a lunatic asylum. The General was no other than the famous Doctor Andrew Moorville, that had the great madhouse at Bangor, and was in the habit of giving his patients every now and then a kind of country party; it being one remarkable feature of their malady that, when one takes to his peculiar flight, whatever it be, the others immediately take the hint, and go off at score: hence my agreeable adventure; the Bengal tiger being a Liverpool merchant, and the most vicious madman in England; while the hour-glass and the Moulah were both on an experimental tour to see whether they should not be pronounced totally incurable for life—"

"And Isabella!" inquired Power.

"Ah! poor Isabella had been driven mad by a card-playing aunt at Bath, and was in fact the most hopeless case there. The last words I heard her speak confirmed my mournful impression of her case."

"Yes," said she, as they removed her to her carriage, "I must, indeed, have but weak intellects, when I could have taken the nephew of a Manchester cotton-spinner, with a face like a printed calico, for a trump card, and the best in the pack!"

Poor Sparks uttered these last words with a faltering accent, and, finishing his glass at one draught, withdrew without wishing us good night.

CHAPTER XXXIII....The Skipper.

In such like gossipings passed our days away, for our voyage itself had nothing of adventure or incident to break its dull monotony; save some few hours of calm, we had been steadily following our seaward track with a fair breeze, and the long pennant pointed ever to the land, where our ardent expectations were hurrying before it.

The latest accounts which had reached us from the Peninsula, told that our regiment was almost daily engaged; and we burned with impatience to share with the others the glory they were reaping. Power, who had seen service, felt less on this score than we who had not "fleshed our maiden swords;" but even he sometimes gave way; and, when the wind fell, toward sunset, he would break out into some exclamation of discontent, half fearing we should be too late; "for," said he, "if they continue in this way, the regiment will be relieved, and ordered home before we reach it."

"Never fear, my boys; you'll have enough of it. Both sides like the work too well to give in; they've got a capital ground and plenty of spare time," said the Major.

"Only to think," cried Power, "that we should be lounging away our idle hours, when these gallant fellows are in the saddle, late and early. It is too bad; eh, O'Malley? you'll not be pleased to go back with the polish on your sabre. What will Lucy Dashwood say?"

This was the first allusion Power had ever made to her, and I became red to the very forehead.

"By the by," added he, "I have a letter for Hammersley, which should rather have been intrusted to your keeping."

At these words I felt cold as death, while he continued: "Poor fellow; certainly he is most desperately smitten; for, mark me, when a man at his age takes the malady, it is forty times as severe as with a young fellow, like you. But then, to be sure, he began at the wrong end in the matter: why commence with papa? When a man has his own consent for liking a girl, he must be a contemptible fellow if he can't get her; and, as to any thing else being wanting, I don't understand it. But the moment you begin by influencing the heads of the house, good-bye to your chances with the dear thing herself, if she have any spirit whatever. It is in fact calling on her to surrender without the honors of war; and what girl would stand that?"

"It's vava true," said the Doctor, "there's a strong speerit of opposition in the sex, from physiological causes."

"Curse your physiology, old Galen: what you call opposition, is that piquant resistance to oppression that makes half the charm of the sex. It is with them—with reverence be it spoken—as with horses: the dull, heavy-shouldered ones that bore away with the bit in their teeth, never caring whether you are pulling to the right or to the left, are worth nothing: the real luxury is in the management of your arching necked curveter, springing from side to side with every motion of your wrist, madly bounding at restraint; yet, to the practised hand, held in check with a silk thread; eh, Skipper: am I not right?"

"Well, I can't say I've had much to do with horse beasts, but I believe you're not far wrong. The lively craft that answers the helm quick, goes round well in stays; luffs up close within a point or two, when you want her; is always a good sea boat, even though she pitches and rolls a bit; but the heavy lugger that never knows whether your helm is up or down; whether she's off the wind or on it; is only fit for fire-wood: you can do nothing with a ship or woman, if she has n't got steerage way on her."

"Come, Skipper, we've all been telling our stories; let us hear one of yours!"

"My yarn won't come so well after your sky-scrapers of love and courting, and all that: but, if you like to hear what happened to me once, I have no objection to tell you."

"I often think how little we know of what's going to happen to us any minute of our lives. To-day we have the breeze fair in our favor; we are going seven knots, studding-sails set, smooth water, and plenty of sea-room; to-morrow the wind freshens to half a gale, the sea gets up, a rocky coast is seen from the lee bow, and maybe—to add to all—we spring a leak forward; but then, after all, bad as it looks, mayhap, we rub through even this, and, with the next day, the prospect is as bright and cheering as ever. You'll, perhaps, ask me what has all this moralizing to do with women and ships at sea? Nothing at all with them, except that I was going to say when matters look worst very often the best is in store for us, and we should never say strike when there is a timber together. Now for my story."

"It's about four years ago, I was strolling one evening down the side of the harbor at Cove, with my hands in my pocket, having nothing to do nor no prospect of it, for my last ship had been wrecked off the Bermudas and nearly all the crew lost; and, somehow, when a man is in misfortune, the underwriters won't have him at no price. Well, there I was looking about me at the craft that lay on every side waiting for a fair wind to run down channel. All was active and busy; every one getting his vessel ship-shape and tidy, tarring, painting, mending sails, stretching new bunting and getting in sea store; boats were plying on every side, signals flying, guns firing from the men-of-war, and every thing was as lively as might be; all but me. There I was, like an old water-logged timber-ship, never moving a spar, but looking for all the world as though I were settling fast to go down stern foremost; maybe as how I had no objection to that same; but that's neither here nor there. Well, I sat down on the fluke of an anchor, and began a thinking if it was n't better to go before the mast than to live on that way. Just before me, where I sat down, there was an old schooner that lay moored in the same place for as long as I could remember; she was there when I was a boy, and never looked a bit the fresher nor newer as long as I recollected; her old bluff bows, her high poop, her round stern, her flush deck, all Dutch alike, I knew them well, and many a time I delighted to think what queer kind of a chap he was that first put her on the stocks, and pondered in what trade she ever could have been. All the sailors about the port used to call her Noah's Ark, and swear she was the identical craft that he stowed away all the wild beasts in during the rainy season: be that as it may since I fell into misfortune I got to feel a liking for the old schooner: she was like an old friend; she never changed to me, fair weather or foul; there she was just the same as thirty years before, when all the world were forgetting and steering wide away from me. Every morning I used to go down to the harbor and have a look at her, just to see that all was right, and nothing stirred: and, if it blew very hard at night, I'd get up and go down to look how she weathered it, just as if I was at sea in her. Now and then I got some of the watermen to row me aboard of her, and leave me there for a few hours, when I used to be quite happy walking the deck, holding the old worm-eaten wheel, looking out ahead, and going down below, just as though I were in command of her. Day after day this habit grew on me, and at last my whole life was spent in watching her and looking after her: there was something so much alike in our fortunes, that I always thought of her. Like myself, she had had her day of life and activity; we had both braved the storm and the breeze; her shattered bulwarks and worn cut-water attested that she had, like myself, not escaped her calamities. We both had survived our dangers, to be neglected and forgotten, and to lie rotting on the stream of life till the crumbling hand of time should break us up, timber by timber. Is it any wonder if I loved the old craft; nor if, by any chance, the idle boys would venture aboard of her to play and amuse themselves, that I hallooed them away; or, when a newly-arrived ship, not caring for the old boat, would run foul of her, and carry away some spar or piece of running rigging, I would suddenly call out to them to sheer off, and not damage us? By degrees they came all to notice this; and I found that they thought me out of my senses, and many a trick was played off upon old Noah, for that was the name the sailors gave me.

"Well, this evening, as I was saying, I sat upon the fluke of the anchor, waiting for a chance boat to put me aboard. It was past sun-set, the tide was ebbing, and the old craft was surging to the fast current that run by with a short impatient jerk, as though she were well weary, and wished to be at rest: her loose backstays creaked mournfully, and, as she yawed over, the sea ran from many a breach in her worn sides, like blood trickling from a wound. Ay, ay, thought I, the hour is not far off: another stiff gale, and all that remains of you will be found high and dry upon the shore. My heart was very heavy as I thought of this; for, in my loneliness, the Old Ark—though that was not her name, as I'll tell you presently—was all the companion I had. I've heard of a poor prisoner who, for many and many years, watched a spider that wove his web within his window, and never lost sight of him from morning till night; and, somehow, I can believe it well the heart will cling to something, and if it has no living object to press to, it will find a lifeless one: it can no more stand alone than the shrouds can with out the mast. The evening wore on, as I was thinking thus; the moon shone out, but no boat came, and I was just determining to go home again for the night, when I saw two men standing on the steps of the wharf below me, and looking straight at the Ark. Now, I must tell you, I always felt uneasy when any one came to look at her, for I began to fear that some ship-owner or other would buy her to break up, though, except the copper fastenings, there was little of any value about her. Now, the moment I saw the two figures stop short and point to her, I said to myself, 'Ah! my old girl, so they won't even let the blue water finish you, but they must set their carpenters and dock-yard people to work upon you. This thought grieved me more and more. Had a stiff sou-wester laid her over, I should have felt it was natural, for her sand was run out: but just as this passed through my mind, I heard a voice from one of the persons that I at once knew to be the Port Admiral's:

"Well, Dawkins," said he to the other, "if you think she'll hold together, I'm sure I've no objection: I don't like the job, I confess, but still the Admiralty must be obeyed."

"Oh, my Lord," said the other, "she's the very thing; she's a rakish-looking craft, and will do admirably; any repair we want, a few days will effect: secrecy is the great thing."

"Ho! ho! thought I, there's something in the wind here: so I laid myself out upon the anchor stock to listen better unobserved. 'We must find a crew for her, give her a few carronades, make her as ship-shape as we can, and, if the skipper—' Ay, but there is the real difficulty," said the Admiral, hastily, "where are we to find the fellow that will suit us? we can't every day find a man willing to jeopardize himself in such a cause as this, even though the reward be a great one."

"Very true, my Lord; but I don't think there is any necessity for our explaining to him the exact nature of the service."

"Come, come, Dawkins, you can't mean that you'll lead a poor fellow into such a scrape blind-folded?"

"Why, my Lord, you never think it requisite to give a plan of your cruise to your ship's crew before clearing out of harbor; they are no worse off than we shall be."

"This may be perfectly just, but I do n't like it," said the Admiral.

"In that case, my Lord, you are imparting the secrets of the Admiralty to a party who may betray the whole plot."

"I wish with all my soul they'd given the order to any one else," said the Admiral, with a sigh; and, for a few moments neither spoke a word.

"Well, then, Dawkins, I believe there is nothing for it but what you say; meanwhile, let the repairs be got in hand, and see after a crew."

"Oh, as to that," said the other, "there are plenty of secondhands in the fleet here fit for nothing else. Any fellow who has been thrice up for punishment in six months, we'll draft on board of her; the fellows who have only been once to the gangway, we'll make the officers."

"A pleasant ship's company, thought I, if the devil would only take the command."

"And with a skipper proportionate to her merit," said Dawkins.

"Begad, I'll wish the French joy of them," said the Admiral.

"Ho, ho! thought I, I've found you out at last; so this is a secret expedition; I see it all: they're fitting her out as a fire-ship, and going to send her slap in among the French fleet at Brest. Well, thought I, even that's better; that, at least, is a glorious end, though the poor fellows have no chance of escape."

"Now then," said the Admiral, "to-morrow you'll look out for the fellow to take the command: he must be a smart seaman, a bold fellow, too, otherwise the ruffianly crew will be too much for him; he may bid high, we'll come to his price."

"So you may, thought I, when you are buying his life. "I hope sincerely," continued the Admiral, "that we may light upon some one without wife or child; I never could forgive myself—"

"Never fear, my Lord," said the other; "my care shall be to pitch upon one whose loss no one would feel; some one without friend or home, who, setting his life for naught, cares not less for the gain than the very recklessness of the adventure."

"That's me," said I springing up from the anchor-stock, and springing between them; "I'm that man."

"Had the very devil himself appeared at the moment, I doubt if they would have been more scared. The Admiral started a pace or two backward, while Dawkins, the first surprise over, seized me by the collar and held me fast."

"Who are you, scoundrel, and what brings you here?" said he, in a voice hoarse with passion.

"I'm Old Noah," said I; for, somehow, I had been called by no other name for so long, I never thought of my real one.

"Noah!" said the Admiral, "Noah! Well, but, Noah, what were you doing down here at this time of night?"

"I was watching the Ark, my Lord," said I, bowing, as I took off my hat.

"I've heard of this fellow before, my Lord," said Dawkins; "he's a poor lunatic that is always wandering about the harbor, and, I believe, has no harm in him."

"Yes, but he has been listening, doubtless, to our conversation," said the Admiral. "Eh, have you heard all we have been saying?"

"Every word of it, my Lord."

"At this the Admiral and Dawkins looked steadfastly at each other for some minutes, but neither spoke; at last Dawkins said, 'Well, Noah, I've been told you are a man to be depended on: may we rely upon your not repeating any thing you overheard this evening—at least for a year to come?'"

"You may," said I.

"But, Dawkins," said the Admiral, in half whisper, "if the poor fellow be mad?"

"My Lord," said I, boldly, "I am not mad. Misfortune and calamity I have had enough to make me so; but, thank God, my brain has been tougher than my poor heart. I was once the part owner and commander of a goodly craft that swept the sea, if not with a broad pennon at her mast head, with as light a spirit as ever lived beneath one. I was rich; I had a home and a child: I am now poor, houseless, childless, friendless, and outcast. If, in my solitary wretchedness, I have loved to look upon that old bark, it is because its fortune seemed like my own. It had outlived all that needed or cared for it; for this reason have they thought me mad, though there are those, and not few either, who can well bear testimony if stain or reproach lie at my door, and if I can be reproached with aught save bad luck. I have heard, by chance, what you have said this night; I know that you are fitting out a secret expedition; I know its dangers, its inevitable dangers; and I here offer myself to lead it; I ask no reward; I look for no price. Alas! who is left to me for whom I could labor now? Give me but the opportunity to end my days with honor on board the old craft where my heart still clings—give me but that. Well, if you will not do so much, let me serve among the crew; put me before the mast. My Lord, you'll not refuse this; it is an old man asks, one whose gray hairs have floated many a year ago before the breeze."

"My poor fellow, you know not what you ask: this is no common case of danger."

"I know it all, my Lord; I have heard it all."

"Dawkins, what is to be done here?" inquired the Admiral.

"I say, friend," inquired Dawkins, laying his hand upon my arm, "what is your real name? Are you he that commanded the Dwarf privateer in the Isle of France?"

"The same."

"Then you are known to Lord Collingwood?"

"He knows me well, and can speak to my character."

"What he says of himself is all true, my Lord."

"True," said I, "true! you did not doubt it, did you?"

"We," said the Admiral, "must speak together again; be here to-morrow night at this hour; keep your own counsel of what has passed, and, now, good night." So saying, the Admiral took Dawkins by the arm, and returned slowly toward the town, leaving me, where I stood, meditating on this singular meeting, and its possible consequences.

"The whole of the following day was passed by me in a state of feverish excitement which I cannot describe; this strange adventure breaking in so suddenly upon the dull monotony of my daily existence had so aroused and stimulated me, that I could neither rest nor eat. How I longed for night to come; for, sometimes, as the day wore later, I began to fear that the whole scene of my meeting with the Admiral had been merely some excited dream of a tortured and fretted mind; and, as I stood examining the ground where I believed the interview to have occurred, I endeavored to recall the position of different objects as they stood around, to corroborate my own failing remembrance."

"At last the evening closed in; but, unlike the preceding one, the sky was covered with masses of dark and watery cloud, that drifted hurriedly across; the air felt heavy and thick, and unnaturally still and calm; the water of the harbor looked of a dull leaden hue, and all the vessels seemed larger than they were, and stood out from the landscape more clearly than usual; now and then a low rumbling noise was heard, somewhat alike in sound, but far too faint for distant thunder; while, occasionally, the boats and smaller craft recked to and fro, as though some ground swell stirred them without breaking the languid surface of the sea above."

"A few drops of thick heavy rain fell just as the darkness came on, and then all felt still and calm as before. I sat upon the anchor stock, my eyes fixed upon the Old Ark, until gradually her outline grew fainter and fainter against the dark sky, and her black hull could scarcely be distinguished from the water beneath. I felt that I was looking toward her; for, long after, I had lost sight of the tall mast and high-pitched bowsprit, and feared to turn away my head, lest I should lose the place where she lay."

"The time went slowly on, and, although in reality I had not been long there, I felt as if years themselves had passed over my head. Since I had come there, my mind brooded over all the misfortunes of my life; as I contrasted its outset, bright with hope and rich in promise, with the sad reality, my heart grew heavy, and my chest heaved painfully; so sunk was I in my reflection, so lost in thought, that I never knew that the storm had broken loose, and that the heavy rain was falling in torrents. The very ground, parched with long drought, smoked as it pattered upon it, while the low wailing cry of the sea-gull, mingled with the deep growl of far-off thunder, told that the night was a fearful one for those at sea. Wet through and shivering, I sat still, now listening, amid the noise of the hurricane and the creaking of the cordage, for any footstep to approach; and, now, relapsing back into a half-despairing dread that my heated brain alone had conjured up the scene of the day before. Such were my dreary reflections, when a loud crash aboard the schooner told me that some old spar had given way. I strained my eyes through the dark to see what had happened, but in vain; the black vapor, thick with falling rain, obscured every thing, and all was hid from view. I could hear that she worked violently, as the waves beat against her worn sides, and that her iron cable creaked as she pitched to the breaking sea. The wind was momentarily increasing, and I began to fear lest I should have taken my last look at the old craft, when my attention was called off by hearing a loud cry out, 'Halloo there! Where are you?'"

"Ay, ay, sir, I'm here." In a moment the Admiral and his friend were beside me.

"What a night!" exclaimed the Admiral, as he shook the rain from the heavy boat cloak, and covered in beneath some tall blocks of granite near. "I began half to hope that you might not have been my poor fellow," said the Admiral; "it's a dreadful time for one so poorly clad for a storm; I say, Dawkins, let him have a pull at your flask." The brandy rallied me a little, and I felt that it cheered my drooping courage.

"This is not a time nor is it a place, for much parley," said the Admiral; "so that we must even make short work of it. Since we met here last night, I have satisfied myself that you are to be trusted, that your character and reputation have nothing heavier against them than misfortune, which, certainly, if I have been rightly informed, has been largely dealt out to you. Now, then, I am willing to accept of your offer of service, if you are still of the same mind as when you made it, and if you are willing to undertake what we have to do, without any question and inquiry, as to points on which we must not and dare not inform you. Whatever you may have overheard last night, may or may not have put you in possession of our secret. If the former, your determination can be made at once; if the latter, you have only to decide whether you are ready to go blindfolded in the business."

"I am ready, my Lord," said I.

"You perhaps are then aware what is the nature of the service?"

"I know it not," said I. "All that I heard, sir, leads me to suppose it one of danger, but that's all."

"I think, my Lord," said Dawkins, "that no more need now be said. Cupples is ready to engage, we are equally so to accept; the thing is pressing. When can you sail?"

"To-night," said I, "if you will."

"Really, Dawkins," said the Admiral, "I don't see why—"

"My Lord, I beg of you," said the other interrupting, "let me now complete the arrangement. This is the plan," said he, turning toward me as he spoke—"as soon as that old craft can be got ready for sea, or some other, if she be not worth it, you will sail from this port with a strong crew, well armed and supplied with ammunition. Your destination is Malta, your object to deliver to the Admiral stationed there the despatches with which you will be intrusted; for certain reasons, cannot be sent through a ship of war, but must be forwarded by a vessel that may not attract peculiar notice. If you be attacked, your orders are to resist; if you be taken, on no account destroy the papers, for the French vessel can scarcely escape re-capture from our frigates, and it is of great consequence that these papers should remain. Such is a brief sketch of our plan; the details can be made known to you hereafter."

"I am quite ready, my Lord: I ask for no terms; I make no stipulations. If the result be favorable, it will be time enough to speak of that. When am I to sail?"

"As I spoke, the Admiral turned suddenly round, and said something in a whisper to Dawkins, who appeared to overrule it, whatever it might be, and finally brought him over to his own opinion."

"Come, Cupples," said Dawkins, "the affair is now settled; to-morrow a boat will be in waiting for you opposite Spike Island, to convey you on board the Semiramis, where every step in the whole business shall be explained to you; meanwhile, you have only to keep your own counsel, and trust the secret to no one."

"Yes, Cupples," said the Admiral, "we rely upon you for that, so good night." As he spoke he placed within my hands a crumpled note for ten pounds, and squeezing my fingers, departed.

"My yarn is spinning out to a far greater length than I intended, so I'll try and shorten it a bit. The next day I went on board the Semiramis, where, when I appeared upon the quarter-deck, I found myself an object of some interest. The report that I was the man about to command the 'Brian'—that was the real name of the old craft—had caused some curiosity among the officers, and they all spoke to me with great courtesy. After waiting a short time, I was ordered to go below, where the Admiral, his Flag-captain Dawkins, and the others were seated. They repeated at greater length the conversation of the night before, and finally decided that I was to sail in three weeks; for, although the old schooner was sadly damaged, they lost no time, but had her already high in deck, with two hundred ship carpenters at work upon her."

"I do not shorten sail here to tell you what reports were circulated about Cove, as to my extraordinary change in circumstances, nor how I bore my altered fortunes. It is enough that I say that, in less than three weeks, I weighed anchor, and stood out to sea one beautiful morning in autumn, and set out upon my expedition."

"I have already told you something of the craft. Let me complete the picture by informing you that, before twenty-four hours passed over, I discovered that so ungainly, so awkward, so unmanageable a vessel never was put to sea: in light winds she scarcely stirred, or moved as if she were water-logged; if it came to blow upon the quarter, she fell off from her helm at a fearful rate; in wearing, she endangered every spar she had, and, when you put her in stays, when half round she would fall back, and nearly carry away every stitch of canvass with the shock. If the ship was bad, the crew was ten times worse. What Dawkins said turned out to be literally true: every ill-conducted, disorderly fellow who had been up the gangway once a week or so, every unreclaimed landsman of bad character and no seamanship, was sent on board of us; and, in fact, except that there was scarcely any discipline and no restraint, we appeared like a floating penitentiary of convicted felons."

"So long as we ran down channel with a slack sea and fair wind, so long all went on tolerably well; to be sure, they only kept watch when they tired below, and reeled about the deck, went down below, and all just as they pleased, and treated me with no manner of respect. After some vain efforts to repress their excesses—vain, for I had no one to second me—I appeared to take no notice of their misconduct, and contented myself with waiting for the time when, my dreary voyage over, I should quit the command, and part company with such associates for ever. At last, however, it came on to blow, and the night we passed the Lizard was indeed a fearful one. As morning broke, a sea running mountains high; a wind strong from the northwest, was hurrying the old craft along at a rate I believed impossible. I shall not stop to recount the frightful scene of anarchy, confusion, drunkenness, and insubordination which our crew exhibited; the recollection is too bad already, and I would spare you and myself the recital; but, on the fourth day from the setting in of the gale, as we entered the Bay of Biscay, come one aloft descried a strange sail to windward, bearing down as if in pursuit of us. Scarcely did the news reach the deck, when, bad as it was before, matters became now ten times worse, some resolved to give themselves up, if the chase happened to be French, and vowing that before surrendering, the spirit-room should be forced and every man let drink as he pleased. Others proposed if there was any thing like equality in the force, to attack, and convert the captured vessel, if they succeeded, into a slave, and sail at once for Africa. Some were for blowing up the old 'Brian' with all on board; and, in fact, every counsel that drunkenness, insanity, and crime combined could suggest was offered and descanted on. Meanwhile the chase gained rapidly upon us, and before noon we discovered her to be a French letter of marque, with four guns, and a long brass swivel upon the poop deck. As for us, every sheet of canvass we could crowd was crammed on, but in vain; and, as we labored through the heavy sea, our riotous crew grew every moment worse, and, sitting down sulkily in groups upon the deck, declared that, come what might, they would neither work the ship nor fight her; that they had been sent to sea in a rotten craft, merely to effect their destruction, and that they cared little for the disgrace of a flag they detested. Half furious with the taunting sarcasm I heard on every side, and nearly mad from passion, and bewildered, my first impulse was to rush in among them with my drawn cutlass, and, ere I fell their victim, take heavy vengeance upon the ringleaders, when suddenly a sharp booming noise came thundering along, and a round shot went flying over our heads."

"Down with the ensign; strike at once," cried eight or ten voices together, as the ball whizzed through the rigging. Anticipating this, and resolving, whatever might happen, to fight her to the last, I had made the mate, a staunch-hearted resolute fellow, to make fast the signal sailyard aloft, so that it was impossible for any one on deck to lower the bunting. Bang went another gun, and, before the smoke cleared away, a third; which, truer in its aim than the rest, went clean through the lower part of our mainsail."

"Steady then, boys, and clear for action," said the mate. "She's a French smuggling craft, that will sheer off when we show fight, so that we must not fire a shot till she comes alongside."

"And harkee, lads," said I, taking up the tone of encouragement he spoke with, "if we take her, I promise to claim nothing of the prize. Whatever we capture you shall divide among yourselves."

"It's very easy to divide what we never had," said one; "nearly as easy as to give it," cried another: "I'll never light match or draw cutlass in the cause," said a third."

"Surrender!" "Strike the flag!" "Down with the colors!" roared several voices together."

"By this time the Frenchman was close up, and ranging his long gun to sweep our decks: his crew were quite perceptible, about twenty bronzed stout-looking fellows, stripped to the waist, and carrying pistols in broad flat belts slung over the shoulder."

"Come, my lads," said I, raising my voice, as I drew a pistol from my side and cocked it, "our time is short now; I may as well tell you that the first shot that strikes us amidship blows up the whole craft and every man on board. We are nothing less than a fire ship, destined for Brest harbor to blow up the French fleet. If you are willing to make an effort for your lives, follow me."

"The men looked aghast. Whatever recklessness, crime and drunkenness had once given them, the awful feeling of death at once repelled. Short as was the time for reflection, they felt that there were many circumstances to encourage the assertion: the nature of the vessel, her riotous disorderly crew, the secret nature of the service, all confirmed it, and they answered with a shout of despairing vengeance, 'We'll board her, lead us on.' As the cry rose up, the long swivel from the chase rang sharply in our ears, and a tremendous discharge flew through our rigging; none of our men however, fell; and, animated now with the desire of battle, they sprang to the binnacle and seized their arms."

"In an instant the whole deck became a scene of excited bustle; and scarcely was the ammunition dealt out and the boarding party drawn up, when the Frenchman broached to and lashed his bowsprit to our own."

"One terrific yell rose from our fellows, as they sprang from the rigging and the poop upon the astonished Frenchmen, who thought that the victory was already their own."

with death and ruin behind, their only hope before, they dashed forward like mad men to the fray.

"The conflict was bloody and terrific, though not a long one; nearly equal in number, but far superior in personal strength, and stimulated by their sense of danger, our fellows rushed onward carrying all before them to the quarter-deck. Here the Frenchmen rallied, and, for some minutes had rather the advantage, until the mate, turning one of their guns against them, prepared to sweep them down in a mass. Then it was that they ceased their fire, and cried out for quarter. All save their captain, a short thickset fellow, with a grisley beard and moustache, who seeing his men fall back, turned on them one glance of scowling indignation, and rushing forward, clove our boatswain to the deck with one blow. Before the example could have been followed, he lay a bloody corpse upon the deck while our people stung to madness by the loss of a favorite among the men, dashed impetuously forward, and dealing death on every side, left not one man living among their unresisting enemies. My story is soon told now. We brought our prize safe into Malta, which we reached in five days. In less than a week our men were drafted into different men-of-war on the station. I was appointed a warrant officer in the Sheerwater, forty-four guns; and, as the Admiral opened the despatch, the only words he spoke puzzled me many a day after.

"You have accomplished your orders too well," said he, "that privateer is but a poor compensation for the whole French navy."

"Well," inquired Power, "and did you never hear the meaning of the words?"

"Yes," said he, "many years after I found out that our despatches were false ones, intended to have fallen into the hands of the French and misled them as to Lord Nelson's fleet, which at that time was cruising to the southward to catch them. This of course, explained what fate was destined for us; a French prison, if not death; and, after all, either was fully good enough for the crew that sailed in the old Brian."

CHAPTER XXXIV....The Land.

It was late when we separated for the night, and the morning was already far advanced ere I awoke; the monotonous tramp over-head showed me that the others were stirring, and I gently moved the shutter of the narrow window beside me to look out.

The sea, slightly rippled upon its surface, shone like a plate of fretted gold; not a wave, not a breaker appeared; but the rushing sound close by showed that we were moving fast through the water.

"Always calm hereabouts," said a gruff voice on deck, which I soon recognized as the skipper's: "no sea whatever."

"I can make nothing out of it," cried out Power, from the forepart of the vessel; "it appears to me all cloud."

"No, no, sir, believe me, it's no fog-bank; that large dark mass to leeward there; that's Cintra."

"Land!" cried I, springing up and rushing upon deck; "where, skipper; where is the land?"

"I say, Charley," said Power, "I hope you mean to adopt a little more clothing, on reaching Lisbon; for, though the climate is a warm one—"

"Never mind, O'Malley," said the Major, "the Portuguese will only be flattered by the attention, if you land as you are."

"Why, how so?"

"Surely, you remember what the niggers said when they saw the 79th Highlanders landing at St. Lucie. They had never seen a Scotch regiment before, and were consequently somewhat puzzled at the costume, till at last, one more cunning than the rest explained it, by saying, 'they are in such a hurry to kill the poor black men, they came away without their breeches.'"

"Now, what say you?" cried the skipper as he pointed with his telescope to a dark blue mass in the distance; "see there!"

"Then, we shall probably be in the Tagus before morning?"

"Before midnight, if the wind holds," said the skipper. We breakfasted on deck, beneath an awning; the vessel scarcely seemed to move, as she cut her way through the calm water.

The misty outline of the coast grew gradually more defined, and at length the blue mountains could be seen, at first but dimly; but, as the day wore on, their many-colored hues shone forth, and patches of green verdure dotted with sheep, or sheltered by dark foliage, met the eye. The bulwarks were crowded with anxious faces; each looked pointedly toward the shore, and many a stout heart beat high as the land drew near, fated to cover with its earth more than one among us.

"And that's Portingale, Mister Charles," said a voice behind me. I turned, and saw my man Mike as, with anxious joy, he fixed his eyes upon the shore.

"They tell me it's a beautiful place, with wine for nothing and spirits for less. Is n't it a pity they won't be reasonable and make peace with us?"

"Why, my good fellow, we are excellent friends: it's the French who want to beat us all."

"Upon my conscience, that's not right. There's an old saying in Connaught—it's not fair for one to fall upon twenty. Sergeant Haggarty says that I'll see none of the diversion at all."

"I do n't well understand."

"He does be telling me that, as I'm only your foot-boy, he'll send me away to the rear, where there's nothing but wounded, and wagons, and women."

"I believe the sergeant is right there; but, after all, Mike, it's a safe place."

"Ah! then, musha, for the safety; I do n't think much of it: sure, they might circumvent us. And, as it was n't displacing to you, I'd rather list."

"Well, I've no objection, Mickey: would you like to join my regiment?"

"By coorse, your honor. I'd like to be near yourself; because, too, if any thing happens to you—the Lord be betune us and harm," here he crossed himself piously—"I'd like to be able to tell the master how you died; and, sure, there's Mister Considine—God pardon him—he'll be beating my brains out as I could n't explain it all."

"Well, Mike, I'll speak to some of my friends here about you, and we'll settle it all properly: here's the Doctor."

"Arrah, Mister Charles, do n't mind him; he's a poor crayture entirely; devil a thing he knows."

"Why, what do you mean, man? he's physician to the forces."

"Oh, by gorra, and so he may be," said Mike, with a toss of his head; "those army doctors is n't worth their salt. It's thruth I'm telling you: sure, did n't he come to see me when I was sick below in the hold?"

"How do you feel?" says he.

"Terrible dhry in the mouth," says I.

"But your bones," says he, "how's them?"

"As if cripples was kicking me," says I.

"Well, with that he went away, and brought back two powders."

"Take them," says he, "and you'll be cured in no time."

"What's them?" says I.

"They're ematics," says he.

"Blood and ages," says I, "are they?"

"Devil a lie," says he; take them immediately."

"And I tuk them—and, would you believe me, Mister Charles?—it's thruth I'm telling you—devil a one o' them would stay on my stomach. So you see what a docther he is!"

I could not help smiling at Mike's ideas of a medicine, as I turned away to talk to the Major, who was busily engaged beside me. His occupation consisted in refurbishing up a very tarnished and faded uniform, whose white seams and threadbare lace betokened many years of service.

"Getting up our traps, you see, O'Malley," said he, as he looked with no small pride at the faded glories of his old vestment; "astonish them at Lisbon, we flatter ourselves. I say, Power, what a bad style of dress they've got into latterly, with their tight waists and strapped trousers—nothing free, nothing easy, nothing dégagé about it. When in a campaign, a man ought to be able to stow prog for twenty-four hours about his person, and no one the wiser. A very good rule, I assure you; though sometimes leads to awkward results. At Vimeira, I got into a sad scrape that way. Old Sir Harry, the commander there, sent for the sick return. I was at dinner when the orderly came; so I packed up the eatables about me, and rode off. Just, however, as I came up to the quarters, my horse stumbled and threw me slap on my head."

"Is he killed," said Sir Harry.

"Only stunned, your Excellency," said some one.

"Then, he'll come to, I suppose. Look for the papers in his pocket."

"So they turned me on my back, and plunged a hand into my side pocket, but, the devil take it, they pulled out a roast hen: Well, the laugh was scarcely over at this, when another fellow dived into my coat behind, and lugged out three sausages; and so they went on, till the ground was covered with ham, pigeon-pie, veal-kidney, and potatoes, and the only thing like a paper was a mess roll of the 4th, with a droll song about Sir Harry, written in pencil on the back of it. Devil of a bad affair for me; I was nearly broke for it; but they only reprimanded me a little; and I was afterward attached to the victualing department."

What an anxious thing is the last day of a voyage! how slowly creep the hours, teeming with memories of the past and expectations of the future.

Every plan, every well-devised expedient to cheat the long and weary days, is at once abandoned; the chess-board and the new novel are alike forgotten; and the very quarter-deck walk, with its merry gossip and careless chit-chat, becomes distasteful. One blue and misty mountain, one faint outline of the far off shore, has dispelled all thought of these, and, with straining eye and anxious heart, we watch for land.

As the day wears on apace, the excitement increases: the faint and shadowy forms of distant objects grow gradually clearer. Where before some tall and misty mountain peak was seen, we now descri patches of deepest blue and sombre olive; the mellow corn and the waving woods, the village spire and the lowly cot, come out of the landscape; and, like some well-remembered voice, they speak of home. The objects we have seen, the sounds we have heard a hundred times before without interest, become to us now things that stir the heart.

For a time, the bright glare of the noonday sun dazzles the view, and renders indistinct the prospect; but, as evening falls, once more all is fair, and bright, and rich before us. Rocked by the long and rolling swell, I lay beside the bowsprit, watching the shore bolls that came to rest upon the rigging, or following some long and tangled sea-weed as it floated by, my thoughts now wandering back to the brow hills and the broad river of my early home—now straying off in dreary fancies of the future.

How flat and unprofitable does all ambition seem at such moments as these; how valueless, how poor, in our estimation, those worldly distinctions we have so often longed and thirsted for, as with lowly heart and simple spirit we watch each humble cottage, weaving to ourselves some story of its inmates, as we pass.

The night at length closed in, but it was a bright and starry one—lending to the landscape a hue of sombre shadow, while the outline of the objects were still sharp as before. One solitary star twinkled near the horizon. I watched it as, at intervals disappearing, it would again shine out, marking the calm sea with a tall pillar of light.

"Come down, Mr. O'Malley," cried the skipper's well-known voice; "come down below, and join us in a parting glass—that's the Lisbon light to leeward, and before two hours we drop our anchor in the Tagus."

CHAPTER XXXV....Major Monsoon.

Of my traveling companions, I have already told my readers something. Power is now an old acquaintance; to Sparks I have already presented them; of the Adjutant they are not entirely ignorant; and it therefore only remains for me to introduce to their notice Major Monsoon. I should have some scruple for the digression which this occasion in my narrative, were it not that with the worthy Major I was destined to meet subsequently, and indeed served under his orders for some months in the Peninsula. When Major Monsoon had entered the army, or in what precise capacity, I never yet met with a man who could tell. There were traditionary accounts of his having served in the East Indies and in Canada, in times long past. His own peculiar reminiscences extended to nearly every regiment in the service, "horse, foot, and dragoons." There was not a clime he had not basked in; not an engagement he had not witnessed. His memory, or, if you will, his invention, was never at fault; and from the siege of Seringapatam to the battle of Corunna he was perfect: beside this, he possessed a mind retentive of even the most trifling details of his profession; from the formation of a regiment to the introduction of a new button, from the laying down of a parallel to the price of a camp-kettle, he knew it all. To be sure, he had served in the commissary-general's department for a number of years, and nothing instils such habits as this.

"The commissaries are to the army what the special pleaders are to the bar," observed my friend Power—"dry dogs; not over creditable on the whole, but devilish useful."

The Major had begun life a two-bottle man, but by a studious cultivation of his natural gifts, and a steady determination to succeed, he had, at the time I knew him, attained to his fifth. It need not be wondered at, then, that his countenance bore some traces of his habits. It was of a deep, sun-set purple, which, becoming tropical at the tip of the nose, verged almost upon a plum color; his mouth was large, thick-lipped, and good humored; his voice rich, mellow and racy, and contributed, with the aid of a certain dry, chuckling laugh, greatly to increase the effect of the stories which he was ever ready to recount; and, as they most frequently bore in some degree against some of what he called his little failings, they were ever well received, no man being so popular with the world as he who flatters its vanity at his own expense. To do this, the Major was ever ready; but at no time more so than when the evening wore late, and the last bottle of his series seemed to imply that any caution regarding the nature of his communication was perfectly unnecessary. Indeed, from the commencement of his evening to the close he seemed to pass through a number of mental changes, all in a manner preparing him for his final consummation, when he confessed any thing, and every thing, and so well-regulated had these stages become, that a friend dropping in upon him suddenly could at once pronounce from the tone of his conversation on what precise bottle the Major was then engaged.

Thus, in the outset he was gastronomic; discussed the dinner from the soup to the stilton; criticised the cutlets; pronounced upon the merits of the mutton; and threw out certain vague hints that he would one day astonish the world by a little volume upon cookery.

With bottle No. 2 he took leave of the cuisine, and opened his battery upon the wine. Bordeaux, Burgundy, hock, and hermitage, all passed in review before him; their flavor discussed, their treatment descanted upon, their virtues extolled; from humble port to imperial tokay, he was thoroughly conversant with them all; and not a vintage escaped as to when the sun had suffered eclipse or when a comet had wagged his tail over it.

With No. 3 he became pipe-clay; talked army list and eighteen manœuvres; lamented the various changes in equipments which modern innovation had introduced; and feared the loss of pig-tails might sap the military spirit of the nation.

With No. 4 his anecdotic powers came into play; he recounted various incidents of the war, with his own individual adventures and experience, told with an honest naïveté that proved personal vanity; indeed, self-respect never marred the interest of the narrative; beside, as he had ever regarded a campaign something in the light of a foray, and esteemed war as little else than a pillage excursion, his sentiments were singularly amusing.

With his last bottle those feelings that seemed inevitably connected with whatever is last, appeared to steal over him: a tinge of sadness, for pleasures fast passing or nearly passed, a kind of retrospective glance at the fallacy of all our earthly enjoyments, insensibly suggesting moral and edifying reflections, led him by degrees to confess that he was not quite satisfied with himself, "though not very bad for a commissary;" and, finally, as the decanter waxed low, he would interlard his meditations by passages of Scripture, singularly perverted, by his misconception, from their true meaning, and alternately throwing out prospect of censure or approval. Such was Major Monsoon: and, to conclude in his own words this brief sketch, he "would have been an excellent officer if Providence had not made him such a confounded drunken old scoundrel."

"Now, then, for the King of Spain's story. Out with it, old boy; we are all good men and true here," cried Power, as we slowly came along upon the tide up the Tagus, "so you've nothing to fear."

"Upon my life," replied the Major, "I don't half like the tone of our conversation. There is a certain freedom young men affect now-a-days regarding morals that is not at all to my taste. When I was five or six and twenty—"

"You were the greatest scamp in the service," cried Power.

"Fie, fie, Fred. If I was a little wild or so,"—here the Major's eyes twinkled maliciously—"it was the ladies that spoiled me; I was always rather something of a favorite, like our friend Sparks there. Not that we fared very much alike in our little adventures; for, somehow I believe I was generally in fault in most of mine, as many a good man and many an excellent man has been before." Here his voice dropped into a moralizing key, as he added, "David, you know, did n't behave well to old Uriah. Upon my life, he did not, and he was a very respectable man."

"The king of Spain's sherry, the sherry," cried I, fearing that the Major's digression might lose us a good story.

"You shall not have a drop of it," replied the Major.

"But the story, Major, the story."

"Nor the story either."

"What," said Power, "will you break faith with us?"

"There's none to be kept with reprobates like you. Fill my glass."

"Hold there! stop!" cried Power. "Not a spoonful till he redeem his pledge."

"Well, then, if you must have a story—for most assuredly I must drink—I have no objection to giving you a leaf from my early reminiscences, and, in compliment to Sparks there, my tale shall be of love."

"I dinna like to loose the king's story. I hae my thoughts it was nae a bad ane."

"Nor I neither, doctor, but—"

"Come, come, you shall have that too, the first night we meet in a bivouac; and as I fear the time may not be very far distant, don't be impatient; beside, a love story—"

"Quite true," said Power; "a love story claims precedence: place aux dames. There's a bumper for you, old Wickedness; so go along."

The Major cleared off his glass, refilled it, sipped twice, and ogled it as though he would have no peculiar objection to sip once more, took a long pinch of snuff from a box nearly as long as, and something of the shape of, a child's coffin; looked round to see that we were all attention, and thus began:

"When I have been in a moralizing mood, as I very frequently am about this hour in the morning, I have often felt surprised by what little, trivial, and insignificant circumstances our lot in life seems to be cast: I mean, especially, as regards the fair sex. You are prospering as it were, to-day; to-morrow a new cut of your whiskers—a novel tie of your cravat, mars your destiny, and spoil your carum et mutabile, as Horace has it. On the other hand, some equally slight circumstances will do what all your ingenuity may have failed to effect. I knew a fellow who married the greatest fortune in Bath, from the mere manner he had of squeezing one's hand. The lady in question thought it particular, looked conscious, and all that; he followed up the blow; and, in a word, they were married in a week. So a friend of mine, who could not help winking his left eye, once opened a flirtation with a lively widow, which cost him a special licence and a settlement. In fact, you are never safe. They are like the guerrillas, and they pick you off when you least expect it, and when you think there is nothing to fear. Therefore, as young fellows beginning life, I would caution you. On this head you can never be too circumspect. Do you know, I was once nearly caught by so slight a habit as sitting thus, with my legs across?"

Here the Major rested his right foot on his left knee, in illustration, and continued:

"We were quartered in Jamaica. I had not long joined, and was about as raw a young gentleman as you could see; the only very clear ideas in my head being, that we were monstrous fine fellows in the 50th, and that the planters' daughters were deplorably in love with us. Not that I was much wrong on either side. For brandy and water, sangaree, Manilla cigars, and the ladies of color, I'd have backed the corps against the service. Proof was, of eighteen, only two ever left the island; for what with the seductions of the coffee plantations, the sugar canes, the new rum, the brown skins, the rainy season, and the yellow fever, most of us settled there."

"It's very hard to leave the West Indies if once you have been quartered there."

"So I have heard," said Power.

"In fine, if you don't knock under to the climate, you become soon totally unfit for living anywhere else. Preserved ginger, yams, flannel jackets, and grog won't bear exportation; and the free and easy chuck under the chin, cherishing, waist-pressing kind of a way we get with the ladies, would be quite misunderstood in less favored regions, and lead to very unpleasant consequences."

"It is a curious fact how much climate has to do with love-making. In our cold country the progress is lamentably slow; fogs, east winds, sleet storms, and cutting March weather, nip many a budding flirtation; whereas, warm, sunny days and bright moonlight nights, with genial air and balmy zephyrs, open the heart, like the cup of a camellia, and let us drink in the soft dew of—"

"Devilish poetical that," said Power, evolving a long blue line of smoke from the corner of his mouth.

"Is it not, though," said the Major smiling graciously.

"Pon my life, I thought so myself. Where was I?"

"Out of my latitude altogether," said the poor skipper, who often found it hard to follow the thread of a story.

"Yes, I remember. I was remarking that sangaree, and calipash mangoes, and Guava jelly, dispose the heart to love, and so they do. I was not more than six weeks in Jamaica when I felt it myself. Now, it was a very dangerous symptom, if you had it strong in you, for this reason. Our Colonel, the most cross-grained old crabstick that ever breathed, happened himself to be taken in when young, and resolving, like the fox who lost his tail, and said it was not the fashion to wear one, to pretend he did the thing for fun, resolved to make every fellow marry upon the slightest provocation. Begad, you might as well enter a powder magazine with a branch of candles in your hand, as go into society in the island with a leaning toward the fair sex. Very hard this was for me particularly; for, like poor Sparks there, my weakness was ever for the petticoats. I had, beside, no petty, contemptible prejudices as to nation, habits, language, color, or complexion; black, brown, or fair, from the Muscovite to the Malabar, from the voluptuous emboupant of the Adjutant's widow—do n't be angry, old boy—to the fairy form of Isabella herself, I loved them all round. But, were I to give a preference anywhere, I should certainly do so to the West Indies, if it were only for the sake of the planters' daughters. I say it fearlessly, these colonies are the brightest jewels in the crown. Let's drink their health, for I'm as husky as a lime-kiln."

This ceremony being performed with suitable enthusiasm, the Major cried out, "Another cheer for Polly Hackett, the sweetest girl in Jamaica. By Jove, Power, if you only saw her, as I did, five-and-forty years ago, with eyes black as jet, twinkling, ogling, leering, teasing, and imploring, all at once, do you mind, and a mouthful of downright pearls pouting and smiling at you, why, man, you'd have proposed for her in the first half hour, and shot yourself the next, when she refused you. She was, indeed, a perfect little beauty—rather dark, to be sure—a little upon the rose-wood tinge, but beautifully polished, and a very nice piece of furniture for a cottage orné, as the French call it. Alas, alas! how these vanities do catch hold of us. My recollections have made me quite feverish and thirsty: is there any cold punch in the bowl? Thank you, O'Malley, that will do—merely to touch my lips. Well, well, it's all passed and gone now. But I was very fond of Polly Hackett, and she was of me. We used to take our little evening walks together through the coffee plantation; very romantic little strolls they were: she in white muslin, with a blue sash and blue shoes; I in a flannel jacket and trousers, straw hat and cravat; a Virginia cigar, as long as a walking-stick, in my mouth, puffing and courting between times: then we'd take a turn to the refining house, look in at the big boilers, quiz the niggers, and come back to Twangberry Moss to supper, where old Hackett, the father, sported a glorious table at eleven o'clock. Great feeding it was. You were always sure of a preserved monkey, a baked land crab, or some such delicacy. And such Madeira! it makes me dry to think of it!

"Talk of West India slavery, indeed! It's the only land of liberty. There is nothing to compare with the perfect free-and-easy, devil-may-care kind-of-a-take-yourself way that every one has there. If it would be any peculiar comfort for you to sit in the saddle of mutton, and put your legs in a soup tureen at dinner, there would be found very few to object to it. There is no nonsense of any kind about etiquette. You eat, drink, and are merry, or, if you prefer, are sad; just as you please. You may wear uniform, or you may not: it's your own affair; and, consequently, it may be imagined how insensibly such privileges gain upon one, and how very reluctant we become ever to resign or abandon them."

"I was the man to appreciate it all. The whole course of proceeding seemed to have been invented for my peculiar convenience, and not a man in the island enjoyed a more luxurious existence than myself, not knowing all the while how dearly I was destined to pay for my little comforts. Among my plenary after-dinner indulgences I had contracted an inveterate habit of sitting cross-legged, as I showed you. Now, this was become a perfect necessity of existence to me. I could have dispensed with cheese, with my glass of port, my pickled mango, my olive, my anchovy toast, my nutshell of curacao, but not my favorite lounge. You may smile; but I've read of a man who could never dance except in the room with an old hair-brush. Now I'm certain my stomach would not digest if my legs were perpendicular. The attitude was not graceful; it was not imposing; but it suited me somehow, and I liked it."

"From what I have already mentioned, you may suppose that West India habits exercised but little control over my favorite practice, which I indulged in every evening of my life. Well, one day, Old Hackett gave us a great blow-out—a dinner of two-and-twenty souls; six days' notice; turtle from St. Lucie, guinea fowl, claret of the year forty, Madeira à discrétion, and all that. Very well done the whole thing: nothing wrong, nothing wanting. As for me, I was in great feather. I took Polly in to dinner, greatly to the discomfiture of old Belson, our Major, who was making up in that quarter; for, you must know, she was an only daughter, and had a very nice thing of it in molasses and niggers. The papa preferred the Major, but Polly looked sweetly upon me. Well, down we went, and really a most excellent feed we had. Now, I must mention here that Polly had a favorite Blenheim spaniel the old fellow detested: it was always tripping him up and snarling at him; for it was, except to herself, a beast of rather vicious inclinations. With a true Jamaica taste, it was her pleasure to bring the animal always into the dinner-room, where, if papa discovered him, there was sure to be a row. Servants sent in one direction to hunt him out; others endeavoring to hide him, and so on: in fact a tremendous hubbub always followed his introduction and accompanied his exit; upon which occasions I invariably exercised my gallantry by protecting the beast, although I hated him like the devil all the time."

"To return to our dinner. After two mortal hours of hard eating, the pace began to slacken; and, as evening closed in, a sense of peaceful repose seemed to descend upon our labors. Pastilles shed an aromatic vapor through the room. The well-iced decanters went with measured pace along; conversation, subdued to the meridian of after-dinner comfort, just murmured; the open jealousies displayed upon the broad verandah the orange-tree, in full blossom, slightly stirring with the cool sea-breeze."

"And the piece of white muslin beside you, what of her?"

"Looked twenty times more bewitching than ever. Well, it was just the hour when, opening the last two buttons of your white waistcoat, (remember we were in Jamaica,) you stretch your legs to the full extent, throw your arms carelessly over the back of your chair, look contemplatively toward the ceiling, and wonder, within yourself, why it is not all after dinner in this same world of ours. Such, at least, were my reflections as I assumed my attitude of supreme comfort, and inwardly ejaculated a health to Sneyd and Barton. Just at this moment I heard Polly's voice gently whisper, 'Isn't he a love?' 'Zounds,' thought I, as a pang of jealousy shot through my heart, 'is it the Major she means?' for old Belson, with his bag wig and rouged cheeks, was seated on the other side of her."

"What a dear old thing it is," said Polly.

"Worse and worse," said I, "it must be him."

"I do so love his mazy face."

"It is him," said I, throwing off a bumper, and almost boiling over with passion at the moment.

"I wish I could take one look at him," said she, laying down her head as she spoke.

"The Major whispered something in her ear, to which she replied—"

"Oh! I dare not; papa will see me at once."

"Do n't be afraid, madam," said I, fiercely; "your father perfectly approves of your taste."

"Are you sure of it," said she, giving me such a look.

"I know it," said I, struggling violently with my agitation.

"The Major leaned over, as if to touch her hand beneath the cloth. I almost sprang from my chair, when Polly, in her sweetest accents, said:

"You must be patient, dear thing, or you may be found out, and then there will be such a piece of work. Though I'm sure, Major, you will not betray me." The Major smiled till he cracked the paint upon his cheeks. "And I'm sure that Mr. Monsoon—"

"You may rely upon me," said I, half sneeringly.

"The Major and I exchanged glances of defiance, while Polly continued—"

"Now, come do n't be restless. You are very comfortable there. Isn't he, Major?" The Major smiled more graciously than before, as he added—

"May I take a look?"

"Just one peep, then, no more!" said she, coquettishly; poor dear Wowski is so timid."

"Scarcely had these words borne balm and comfort to my heart—for I now knew that to the dog, and not to my rival, were all the flattering expressions applied—when a slight scream from Polly, and a tremendous oath from the Major raised me from my dream of happiness.

"Take your foot down, sir. Mr. Monsoon, how could you do so?" cried Polly.

"What the devil, sir, do you mean?" shouted the Major.

"Oh! I shall die of shame," sobbed she.

"I'll shoot him like a riddle," muttered old Belson.

"By this time the whole table had got at the story, and such peals of laughter, mingled with suggestion for my personal mal-treatment, I never heard. All my attempts at explanation were in vain. I was not listened to, much less believed, and the old colonel finished the scene by ordering me to my quarters in a voice I shall never forget. The whole room being, at the time I made my exit, one scene of tumultuous laughter from one end to the other. Jamaica after this became too hot for me. The story was repeated on every side; for, it seems, I had been sitting with my foot on Polly's lap; but, so occupied was I with my jealous vigilance of the Major, I was not aware of the fact until she herself discovered it."

"I need not say how the following morning brought with it every possible offer of amende upon my part; any thing, from a written apology to a proposition to marry the lady, I was ready for; and how the matter might have ended I know not; for, in the middle of the negotiations, we were ordered off to Halifax, where, be assured, I abandoned my attitude à la turque for many a long day after."

CHAPTER XXXVI....The Landing.

WHAT a contrast to the dull monotony of our life at sea did the scene present which awaited us on landing in Lisbon. The whole quay was crowded with hundreds of people eagerly watching the vessel which bore from her mast the broad ensign of Britain. Darkfeatured, swarthy, mustached faces, with red caps rakishly set on one side, mingled with the Saxon faces and fair-haired natives of our own country. Men-of-war boats plied unceasingly to and fro across the tranquil river, some slender reeler in the stern sheets; while behind him trailed the red pennon of some "tall admiral."

The din and clatter of a mighty city mingled with the far-off sounds of military music; and, in the vistas of the opening street, masses of troops might be seen, in marching order; and all betokened the near approach of war.

Our anchor had scarcely been dropped, when an eight-oar gig, with a midshipman steering, came along side.

"Ship ahoy, there! You've troops on board?"

"Ay, ay, sir."

Before the answer could be spoken, he was on the deck. "May I ask," said he, touching his cap slightly, "who is the officer in command of the detachment?"

"Captain Power: very much at your service," said Fred, returning the salute.

"Rear-Admiral Sir Edward Douglas requests that you will do him the favor to come on board immediately; and bring your despatches with you."

"I'm quite ready," said Power, as he placed his papers in his sabretasch; but first tell us what's doing here? Any thing new lately?"

"I have heard nothing, except of some affair with the Portuguese: they've been drubbed again; but our people have not been engaged. I say, we had better get under way; there's our first lieutenant, with his telescope up; he's looking straight at us. So, come along. Good evening, gentlemen!" and in another moment the sharp craft was cutting the clear water, while Power gaily waved us a good-by.

"Who's for shore?" said the skipper, as half a dozen boats swarmed around the side or held on by their boat-hooks to the rigging.

"Who is not?" said Monsoon, who now appeared in his old blue frock covered with tarnished braiding, and a cocked hat that might have roofed a pagoda. "Who is not, my old boy? Is not every man among us delighted with the prospect of fresh prog, cool wine, and a bed somewhat longer than four feet six? I say, O'Malley! Sparks! Where's the Adjutant? Ah, there he is! We'll not mind the Doctor; he's a very jovial little fellow, but a damned bore, entre nous; and we'll have a cosy little supper at the Rua di Toledo. I know the place well. Whew, now! Get away, boy. Sit steady, Sparks, she's only a cockle-shell. There—that's the Plaza de la Regua; there to the left. There's the great cathedral—you can't see it now. Another seventy-four! why, there's the whole fleet here! I wish Power joy of his afternoon with old Douglas."

"Do you know him, then, Major?"

"Do I!—I should rather think I do. He was going to put me in irons here in this river once. A great shame it was: but I'll tell you the story another time. There—gently now; that's it. Thank God! once more upon land. How I do hate a ship! upon my life, a sauce-boat is the only boat endurable in this world."

We edged our way with difficulty through the dense crowd, and at last reached the Plaza. Here the numbers were still greater, but of a different class: several pretty and well-dressed women, with their dark eyes twinkling above their black mantillas, as they held them across their faces, watched with an intense curiosity one of the streets that opened upon the square.

In a few moments the band of a regiment was heard, and very shortly after the regular tramp of troops followed, as the eighty-seventh marched into the Plaza, and formed a line.

The music ceased; the drums rolled along the line; and the next moment all was still. It was really an inspiring sight to one whose heart was interested in the career, to see those gallant fellows, as, with their bronzed faces and stalwart frames, they stood motionless as a rock. As I continued to look, the band marched into the middle of the square, and struck up "Garryowen." Scarcely was the first part played, when a tremendous cheer burst from the troop-ship in the river. The welcome notes had reached the poor fellows there; the well-known sounds, that told of home and country, met their ears; and the loud cry of recognition bespoke their heart's fulness.

"There they go. Your wild countrymen have heard their Ranz des vaches, it seems. Lord! how they frightened the poor Portuguese! look, how they're running!"

Such was actually the case. The loud cheer uttered from the river was taken up by others straggling on shore, and one universal shout betokened that fully one-third of the red-coats around came from the dear island, and, in their enthusiasm, had terrified the natives to no small extent.

"Is not that Ferguson there?" cried the Major, as an officer passed us with his arm in a sling. "Isay Joe—Ferguson: oh! knew it was."

"Monsoon, my hearty, how goes it?—only just arrived I see—delighted to meet you out here once more. Why, we've been dull as a veteran battalion without you. These your friends? pray present me." The ceremony of introduction over, the Major invited Ferguson to join our party at supper. "No, not to-night, Major," said he, "you must be my guests this evening. My quarters are not five minutes' walk from this—I shall not promise you very luxurious fare."

"A carbonade with olives, a roast duck, a bowl of bishop, and, if you will, a few bottles of burgundy," said the Major: "don't put yourselves out for us—soldier's fare, eh?"

I could not help smiling at the native notion of simplicity so cunningly suggested by old Monsoon. As I followed the party through the streets, my step was light, my heart not less so; for what sensations are more delightful than those of landing after a voyage; the escape from the durance vile of shipboard, with its monotonous days and dreary nights; its ill-regulated appointments; its cramped accommodation; its uncertain duration; its eternal round of unchanging amusements; for the freedom of the shore, with a land breeze, and a firm footing to tread upon; and, certainly not least of all, the sight of that brightest part of creation, whose soft eyes and tight ankles are, perhaps, the greatest of all imaginable pleasures to him who has been the dweller on blue water for several weeks long.

"Here we are," cried out Ferguson, as we stopped at the door of a large and handsome house. We followed up a spacious stair into an ample room, sparingly, but not uncomfortably furnished: plans of sieges, maps of the seat of war, pistols, sabres, and belts, decorated the white walls, and a few books, and a stray army-list, betokened the habits of the occupant.

While Ferguson disappeared to make some preparations for supper, Monsoon commenced a congratulation to the party upon the good fortune that had befallen them. "Capital fellow is Joe—never without something good, and a rare one to pass the bottle. Oh! here he comes: be alive there, Sparks; take a corner of the cloth: how deliciously juicy that ham looks; pass the madeira down there: what's under that cover—stewed kidneys?" While Monsoon went on thus, we took our places at the table, and set to with an appetite which only a newly-landed traveller ever knows.

"Another spoonful of the gravy? Thank you. And so they say we've not been faring over well latterly," said the Major; "not a word of truth in the report: our people have not been engaged. The only thing lately was a smart brush we had at the Tamega. Poor Patrick, a countryman of ours, and myself, were serving with a Portuguese brigade, when Laborde drove us back upon the town, and actually routed us. The Portuguese general, caring little for any thing save his own safety, was making at once for the mountains, when Patrick called upon his battalion to face about and charge; and nobly they did it, too. Down they came upon the advancing masses of the French, and literally hurled them back upon the main body. The other regiments, seeing this gallant stand, wheeled about and poured in a volley, and then, fixing bayonets, stormed a little mound beside the hedge, which commanded the whole suburb of Villa Real. The French, who soon recovered their order, now prepared for a second attack, and came in two dense columns, when Patrick, who had little confidence in the steadiness of his people, for any lengthened resistance, resolved upon once more charging with the bayonet. The order was scarcely given when the French were upon us; their flank, defended by some of La Houssaye's heavy dragoons. For an instant, the conflict was doubtful, until poor Patrick fell mortally wounded upon the parapet, when the men, no longer hearing his bold cheer, nor seeing his noble figure in the advance, turned and fled, pell-mell back upon the town. As for me, blocked up amid the mass, I was cut down from the shoulder to the elbow, by a young fellow of about sixteen, who galloped about like a schoolboy on a holiday. The wound was only dangerous from the loss of blood, and so I contrived to reach Amacante without much difficulty; from whence, with three or four others, I was ordered here until fit for service."

"But what news from our head-quarters?" inquired I. "All imaginable kind of rumors are afloat: some say that Graddock is retiring; others, that a part of the army is in motion upon Caldas."

"Then we are not going to have a very long sojourn here after all. Eh, Major? Donna Maria de Tormes will be inconsolable. By the by, their house is just opposite us: have you ever heard Monsoon mention his friends there?"

"Come, come, Joe, how can you be so foolish?" "But, Major, my dear friend, what signifies your modesty? there is not a man in the service does not know it, save those in the last Gazette."

"Indeed, Joe, I am very angry with you." "Well, then, by Jove, I must tell it myself; though faith, lads, you lose not a little for want of Monsoon's tact in the narrative."

"Any thing is better than trusting to a such a biographer," cried the Major, "so here goes:—"

"When I was Acting Commissary General to the Portuguese forces, some few years ago, I obtained great experience of the habits of the people; for, though naturally of an unsuspecting temperament myself, I generally contrive to pick out the little foibles of my associates, even upon a short acquaintance. Now, my appointment pleased me very much on this score; it gave me little opportunities of examining the world: 'the greatest study of mankind is man,'—Sparks would say woman—but no matter."

"Now, I soon discovered that our ancient and very excellent allies, the Portuguese, with a beautiful climate, delicious wines, and very delightful wives and daughters, were the most infernal rogues and scoundrels ever met with.—'Make yourself thoroughly acquainted with the leading features of the natives,' said old Sir Harry to me, in a dispatch from head-quarters; and, faith, it was not difficult; such open, palpable, undisguised rascals never were heard of. I thought I knew a thing or two myself, when I landed; but, Lord love you, I was a babe; I was an infant in swaddling clothes, compared with them; and they humbugged me, ay, me!—till I began to suspect that I was only walking in my sleep."

"Why, Monsoon," said the General, "they told me you were a sharp fellow, and yet the people here seem to work round you every day. This will never do. You must brighten up a little, or I shall be obliged to send you back."

"General," said I, "they used to call me no fool in England, but somehow, here—"

"I understand," said he, "you don't know the Portuguese; there's but one way with them: strike quickly, and strike home. Never give them time for roguery; for, if they have a moment's reflection, they'll cheat the devil himself; but, when you see the plot working, come slap down and decide the thing your own way."

"Well, now, there never was any thing so true as this advice, and, for the eighteen months I acted upon it, I never knew it to fail."

"I want a thousand measures of wheat." "Senhor Excellenza, the crops have been miserably deficient, and —"

"Sergeant-major, I would say, 'these poor people have no corn; it's a wine country; let them make up their rations that way.'"

"The wheat came in that evening." "One hundred and twenty bullocks wanted for the reserve."

"The cattle are up in the mountains." "Let the alcade catch them before night, or I'll catch him."

"Lord bless you! I had beef enough to feed the Peninsula. And in this way, while the forces were eating short allowance and half rations elsewhere, our brigade were as plump as aldermen."

"When we lay in Andalusia this was easy enough.—What a country to be sure! such vineyards, such gardens, such delicious valleys, waving with corn and fat with olives; actually, it seemed a kind of dispensation of Providence to make war in it. There was every thing you could desire; and, then, the people like all your wealthy ones, were so timid, and so easily frightened, you could get what you pleased out of them by a little terror. My scouts managed this very well."

"He is coming," they would say, "after to-morrow."

"Madre de Dios."

"I hope he won't burn the village."

"Questos infernaes Ingleses! how wicked they are."

"You had better try what a sack of moldores or doubloons might do with him; he may refuse them, but make the effort."

"Ha!" said the Major, with a long-drawn sigh, those were pleasant times; alas! that they should come to an end. Well, among the old hidalgos I met, there was one Don Emanuel Selvio de Tormes, an awful old miser, rich as Croesus, and suspicious as the arch fiend himself. Lord, how I melted him down! I quartered two squadrons of horse and a troop of flying artillery upon him. How the fellows did eat! such a consumption of wines was never heard of; and as they began to slacken a little, I took care to replace them by fresh arrivals—fellows from the mountains—casadores they call them. At last, my friend Don Emanuel could stand it no longer, and he sent me a diplomatic convoy to negotiate terms, which, upon the whole I must say, were fair enough, and in a few days the casadores were withdrawn, and I took up my quarters in the château. I have had various chances and changes in this wicked world, but I am free to confess that I never passed a more agreeable time than the seven weeks I spent there. Don Emanuel, when properly managed became a very pleasant little fellow: Donna Maria, his wife was a sweet creature. You need not be winking that way. Upon my life she was; rather fat, to be sure, and her age something verging upon the fifties; but she had such eyes, black as sloes, and luscious as ripe grapes; and she was always smiling, and ogling, and looking so sweet. Confound me if I think she wasn't the most enchanting being in this world, with about ten thousand pounds' worth of jewels upon her fingers and in her ears. I have her before me this instant, as she used to sit in the little arbor in the garden, with a Manillo cigar in her mouth, and a little brandy and water—quite weak you know—beside her."

"Ah! General," she used to say,—she always called me General,—"what a glorious career yours is! a soldier is indeed a man."

"Then she would look at poor Emanuel, who used to sit in a corner holding his hand to his face for hours, calculating interest and cent. per cent. till he fell asleep."

"Now he labored under a very singular malady,—not that I was conscious of it at the time,—a kind of luxation of the lower jaw, which, when it came on, happened somehow to press upon some vital nerve or other, and left him perfectly paralysed till it was restored to its proper place. In fact during the time the agony lasted, he was like one in a trance, for though he could see and hear he could neither speak nor move, and looked as if he had done with both for many a day to come."

"Well, as I was saying, I knew nothing of all this, till a slight circumstance made it known to me. I was seated one evening in the little arbor I mentioned, with Donna Maria; there was a little table before us, covered with wine and fruits, a dish of olives, some Castile oranges, and a fresh pine. I remember it well, my eye roamed over the little dessert, set out in old-fashioned rich silver dishes, then turned toward the lady herself, with rings and brooches, ear-rings and chains enough to reward one for sacking a town; and I said to myself, 'Monsoon, Monsoon, this is better than long marches in the Pyrenees, with a cork tree for a bed curtain and wet grass for a mattress. How pleasantly one might jog on in this world, with this little country-house for his abode, and Donna Maria for his companion!'

"I tasted the port, it was delicious. Now, I knew very little Portuguese, but I made some effort to ask if there was much of it in the cellar."

"She smiled and said, 'O! yes.'"

"What a luxurious life one might lead here!" thought I; "and after all, perhaps Providence might remove Don Emanuel."

"I finished the bottle as I thus meditated. The next was if possible more crusty."

"This is a delicious retreat," said I, soliloquizing.

"Donna Maria seemed to know what was passing in my mind, for she smiled too."

"Yes," said I, in broken Portuguese, "one ought to be very happy here, Donna Maria."

"She blushed, and I continued:

"What can one want for more in this life; all the charms that rendered Paradise what it was,—I took her hand here—and made Adam blessed."

"Ah, General," said she, with a sigh, "you are such a flatterer."

"Who could flatter," said I, with enthusiasm, "when there are not words enough to express what he feels: this was true, for my Portuguese was fast failing me—but if I ever was happy, it is now."

"I took another pull at the port."

"If I only thought," said I, "that my presence here was not thought unwelcome—"

"Fie, General," said she, "how could you say such a thing?"

"If I only thought I was not hated," said I, tremblingly.

"Oh!" said she again.

"Despised."

"Oh!"

"Loathed."

"She pressed my hand; I kissed hers; she hurriedly snatched it from me, and pointed toward a lime tree near, beneath which, in the cool enjoyment of his cigar sat the spare and detested figure of Don Emanuel."

"Yes," thought I, "there he is, the only bar to my good fortune: were it not for him, I should not be long before I became possessor of this excellent old château, with a most indiscretionary power over the cellar. Don Mauricius Monsoon would speedily assume his place among the grandes of Portugal."

"I know not how long my reverie lasted, nor, indeed, how the evening passed; but I remember well the moon was up, and the sky bright with a thousand stars was shining, as I sat beside the fair Donna Maria, endeavoring, with such Portuguese as it pleased fate to bestow on me, to instruct her touching my warlike services and deeds of arms. The fourth bottle of port was ebbing beneath my eloquence, as responsively her heart beat, when I heard a slight rustle in the branches near. I looked, and, heavens, what a sight did I behold! There was little Don Emanuel stretched upon the grass, with his mouth wide open, his face pale as death, his arms stretched out at either side, and his legs stiffened straight out. I ran over and asked if he were ill, but no answer came. I lifted up an arm, but it fell heavily upon the ground as I let it go; the leg did likewise. I touched his nose: it was cold."

"Hollo," thought I, "is it so: this comes of mixing water with your sherry. I saw where it would end."

"Now, upon my life, I felt sorry for the little fellow; but, somehow, one gets so familiarised with this sort of thing in a campaign, that one only half feels in a case like this."

"Yes," said I; "man is but grass; but I, for one, must make hay while the sun shines. Now for the Donna Maria, for the poor thing was asleep in the arbor all this while."

"Donna," said I, shaking her by the elbow, "Donna," said I, "do n't be shocked at what I'm going to say."

"Ah! General," said she, with a sigh, "say no more; I must not listen to you."

"You do n't know that," said I, with a knowing look; "you do n't know that."

"Why, what can you mean?"

"The little fellow is done for; for the port was working strong now, and destroyed all my fine sensibility. 'Yes, Donna,' said I, 'you are free,—here I threw myself on my knees; free to make me the happiest of commissaries and the jelliest grandee of Portugal that ever—'

"But Don Emanuel?"

"Run out—dry—empty," inverting a finished decanter, to typify my words as I spoke."

"He is not dead!" said she, with a scream."

"Even so," said I, with a hiccup; "ordered for service in a better world, where there are neither inspections nor arrears."

"Before the words were well out, she sprung from the bench, and rushed over to the spot where the little Don lay. What she said or did I know not, but the next moment he sat bolt upright in the grass, and, as he held his jaw with one hand and supported himself on the other, vented such a torrent of abuse and insult at me, that, for want of Portuguese enough to reply, I rejoined in English, in which I swore pretty roundly for five minutes. Meanwhile, the Donna had summoned the servants, who removed Don Emanuel to the house; where, on my return, I found my luggage displayed before the door, with a civil hint to deploy in orderly time, and take ground elsewhere."

"In a few days, however, his anger cooled down, and I received a polite note from Donna Maria, that the Don at length began to understand the joke, and begged that I would return to the château, and that he would expect me at dinner the same day."

"With which, of course you complied?"

"Which of course I did. Forgive your enemies, my dear boy; it is only Christian-like; and, really, we lived very happily ever after: the Donna was a mighty clever woman, and a dear good soul beside."

"It was late when the Major concluded his story; so, after wishing Ferguson a good night, we took our leave, and retired for the night to our quarters."

CHAPTER XXXVII.....Lisbon.

The tramp of horses' feet and the sound of voices beneath my window, roused me from a deep sleep. I sprang up, and drew aside the curtain. What a strange confusion beset me as I looked forth! Before me lay a broad and tranquil river, whose opposite shore, deeply wooded, and studded with villas and cottages, rose abruptly from the water's edge: vessels of war lay tranquilly in the stream, their pennants trailing in the tide: the loud boom of a morning gun rolled along the surface, awaking a hundred echoes as it passed, and the lazy smoke rested for some minutes on the glassy water as it blended with the thin air of the morning."

"Where am I?" was my first question to myself, as I continued to look from side to side, unable to collect my scattered senses."

One word sufficed to recall me to myself, as I heard Power's voice, from without, call out,—

"Charley! O'Malley! I say, come down here!"

I hurriedly threw on my clothes, and went to the door. "Well, Charley! I've been put in the harness rather sooner than I expected. Here's old Douglas has been sitting up all night, writing despatches: and I must hasten on to head quarters, without a moment's delay. There's work before us, that's certain; but when, where, and how, of that I know nothing. You may expect the route every moment: the French are still advancing. Meanwhile, I have a couple of commissions for you to execute. First, here's a packet for Hammerly: you are sure to meet him, with the regiment, in a day or two. I have some scruples about asking you this—but, confound it!—you're too sensible a fellow to care—"

Here he hesitated; and, as I colored to the eyes, for some minutes he seemed uncertain how to proceed. At length, recovering himself, he went on:

"Now for the other. This is a most loving epistle from a poor devil of a midshipman, written last night, by a tall candle, in a cockpit, containing vows of eternal adoration and a lock of hair. I promised faithfully to deliver it myself; for the Thunderer sails for Gibraltar next tide, and he cannot go ashore for an instant. However, as Sir Arthur's billet may be of more importance than the reefer's, I must intrust its safe keeping to your hands. Now, then, do n't look so devilish sleepy: but rub your eyes, and seem to understand what I'm saying. This is the address:—'La Senhora Inez da Rebiera, Rua Nuova, opposite the barber's; you'll not neglect it. So, now, my dear boy, till our next meeting, adieu!'"

"Stop! for heaven's sake, not so fast, I pray. Where's the street?"

"The Rua Nuova. Remember Figaro, my boy. 'Cinque perruche.'"

"But, what am I to do?"

"To do! what a question! Any thing; every thing. Be a good diplomat; speak of the torturing agony of the lover, for which I can vouch (the boy is only fifteen); swear that he is to return in a month, first lieutenant of the Thunder Bomb, with intentions that even Madame Dalrymple would approve."

"What nonsense," said I, blushing to the eyes.

"And if that suffice not, I know of but one resource."

"Which is?"

"Make love to her yourself. Ay, even so. Do n't look so confoundedly vinegar: the girl I hear is a devilish pretty one; the house pleasant; and I sincerely wish I could exchange duties with you; leaving you to make your bows to his Excellency the C. O. F., and myself free to make mine to La Senhora. And now, push along, old red cap."

So saying, he made a significant cut of his whip at the Portuguese guide, and in another moment was out of sight.

My first thought was one of regret at Power's departure. For some time past we had been inseparable companions; and, notwithstanding the reckless and wild gaiety of his conduct, I had ever found him ready to assist me in every difficulty, and that with an address and dexterity a more calculating adviser might not have possessed. I was now utterly alone; for, though Monsoon and the Adjutant were still in Lisbon, as was also Sparks, I never could make intimates of them.

I ate my breakfast with a heavy heart; my solitary position again suggesting thoughts of home and kindred. Just at this moment my eyes fell upon the packet destined for Hammerly: I took it up and weighed it in my hand. Alas! thought I, how much of my destiny may lie within that envelope! how fatally may my after life be influenced by it! It felt heavy, as though there was something beside letters. True, too true; there was a picture; Lucy's portrait! The cold drops of perspiration stood upon my forehead, as my fingers traced the outline of a miniature case in the parcel. I became deadly weak, and sank, half-fainting, upon a chair. And such is the end of my first dream of happiness! How have I duped, how have I deceived myself! For, alas! though Lucy had never responded to my proffered vows of affection, yet had I ever nurtured in my heart a secret hope that I was not altogether uncared for. Every look she had given me, every word she had spoken, the tone of her voice, her step, her every gesture were before me; all confirming my delusion. And yet—I could bear no more, and burst into tears.

The loud call of a cavalry trumpet aroused me.

How long I had passed in this state of sad despondency I knew not; but it was long past noon when I rallied myself. My charger was already waiting me: and a second blast of the trumpet told that the inspection in the Plaza was about to commence.

As I continued to dress, I gradually rallied from my depressing thoughts; and, ere I belted my sabretache, the current of my ideas had turned from their train of sadness to one of hardihood and daring. Lucy Dashwood had treated me like a wilful schoolboy. Mayhap, I may prove myself as gallant a soldier as even him she has preferred before me.

A third sound of the trumpet cut short my reflections, and I sprang into the saddle, and hastened toward the Plaza. As I dashed along the streets, my horse, maddened with the impulse that stirred my own heart, curvetted and plunged unceasingly. As I reached the Plaza, the crowd became dense, and I was obliged to pull up. The sound of the music, the parade, the tramp of the infantry, and the neighing of the horses were, however, too much for my mettlesome steed, and he became nearly unmanageable; he plunged fearfully, and twice reared as though he would have fallen back. As I scattered the foot-passengers right and left with terror, my eye fell upon one lovely girl, who, tearing herself from her companion, rushed wildly toward an open doorway for shelter; suddenly, however, changing her intention, she came forward a few paces, and then, as if overcome by fear, stood stock-still, her hands clasped upon her bosom, her eyes upturned, her features deadly pale, while her knees seemed bending beneath her. Never did I behold a more beautiful object: her dark hair had fallen loose upon her shoulder, and she stood the very ideal of the "Madonna supplicating." My glance was short as a lightning flash; for, the same instant, my horse swerved, and dashed forward right at the place where she was standing. One terrific cry rose from the crowd, who saw her danger. Beside her stood a muleteer, who had drawn up his mule and cart close beside the footway for safety: she made one effort to reach it, but her outstretched arms alone moved, and, paralyzed by terror, she sank motionless upon the pavement. There was but one course open to me, now; so, collecting myself for the effort, I threw my horse upon his haunches, and then, dashing the spurs into his flanks, breasted him at the mule cart. With one spring he rose, and cleared it at a bound, while the very air rang with the acclamations of the multitude, and a thousand bravos saluted me as I alighted upon the opposite side.

"Well done, O'Malley!" sang out the little Adjutant, as I flew past and pulled up in the middle of the Plaza.

"Something devilish like Galway in that leap," said a very musical voice beside me; and at the same instant a tall, soldier-like man, in an undress dragoon frock, touched his cap and said,

"A Fourteenth man, I perceive, sir. May I introduce myself—Major O'Shaughnessy."

I bowed, and shook the Major's proffered hand, while he continued:

"Old Monsoon mentioned your name to us this morning. You came out together, if I mistake not?"

"Yes; but somehow, I've missed the Major since my landing."

"Oh, you'll see him presently; he'll be on parade. By-the-by, he wishes particularly to meet you. We dine to-day at the 'Quai de Soderi,' and if you're not engaged—Yes, this is the person," said he turning at the moment toward a servant, who, with a card in his hand, seemed to search for some one in the crowd.

The man approached and handed it to me,

"What can this mean?" said I, "Don Emanuel de Blasas y Silveiro, Rua Nuova."

"Why that's the great Portuguese contractor; the intendant of half the army; the richest fellow in Lisbon.—Have you known him long?"

"Never heard of him till now."

"By Jove, you're in luck! No man gives such dinners; he has such a cellar. I'll wager a fifty it was his daughter you took in the flying leap a while ago. I hear she is a beautiful creature."

"Yes," thought I, "that must be it: and yet, strange enough I think the name and address are familiar to me."

"Ten to one, you've heard Monsoon speak of him; he's most intimate there. But here comes the Major."

And, as he spoke, the illustrious Commissary came forward, holding a vast number of papers in one hand, and his snuff-box in the other; and followed by a long string of clerks, contractors, assistant surgeons, paymasters, &c., all eagerly pressing forward to be heard.

"It's quite impossible; I can't do it to-day. Victualling and physicking are very good things, but must be done in season. I have been up all night at the accounts. Have n't I, O'Malley?"—here he winked at me most significantly;—"and then I have the forage and stoppage fund to look through,—we dine at six sharp," said he, sotto voce—"which will leave me without one minute unoccupied for the next twenty-four hours. Look to your togger this evening; I've something in my eye for you, O'Malley."

"Officers unattached to their several corps will fall into the middle of the Plaza," said a deep voice among the crowd; and, in obedience to the order, I rode forward and placed myself with a number of others, apparently newly joined, in the open square. A short gray-haired old colonel, with a dark eagle look, proceeded to inspect us, reading from a paper, as he came along:

"Mr. Hepton, 6th Foot; commission bearing date 11th January; proceed to Ovar, and join his regiment."

"Mr. Grown, Fusilier Guards; remains with depot."

"Captain Mortimer, 1st Dragoons; appointed aid-de-camp to the general commanding the cavalry brigade."

"Mr. Sparks: where is Mr. Sparks? Mr. Sparks absent from parade: make a note of it."

"Mr. O'Malley, 14th Light Dragoons. Mr. O'Malley: oh, I remember; I have received a letter from Sir George Dashwood concerning you. You will hold yourself in readiness to march. Your friends desire that, before you may obtain any staff appointment, you should have the opportunity of seeing some service. Am I to understand such is your wish?"

"Most certainly."

"May I have the pleasure of your company at dinner to-day?"

"I regret that I have already accepted an invitation to dine with Major Monsoon."

"With Major Monsoon! ah, indeed! Perhaps it might be as well I should mention—but no matter. I wish you good morning."

So saying, the little colonel rode off, leaving me to suppose that my dinner engagement had not raised me in his estimation, though why I could not exactly determine.

CHAPTER XXXVIII....The Strada Nuova.

Our dinner was a long and uninteresting one, and, as I found that the Major was likely to prefer his seat as chairman of the party, to the seductions of ladies' society, I took the first opportunity of escaping, and left the room.

It was a rich moonlight night, as I found myself in the street. My way, which led along the banks of the Tagus, was almost as light as in daytime, and crowded with walking parties, who sauntered carelessly along, in the enjoyment of the cool refreshing night air. On inquiring, I discovered that the Rua Nuova was at the extremity of the city; but as the road led along by the river I did not regret the distance, but walked on with increasing pleasure at the charms of so heavenly a climate and country.

After three quarters of an hour's walk, the streets became by degrees less and less crowded. A solitary party passed me now and then; the buzz of distant voices succeeded to the gay laughter and merry tones of the passing groups, and, at length, my own footsteps alone awoke the echoes along the deserted pathway. I stopped every now and then to gaze upon the tranquil river, whose eddies were circling in the pale silver of the moonlight. I listened with attentive ear, as the night breeze wafted to me the far-off sounds of a guitar, and the deep tones of some lover's rerenade; while again the tender warbling of the nightingale came borne across the stream, on a wind rich with the odor of the orange-tree.

As thus I lingered on my way, the time stole on; and it was near midnight ere I roused myself from the reverie surrounding objects had thrown about me. I stopped suddenly, and for some minutes I struggled with myself to discover if I was really awake. As I walked along, lost in my reflections, I had entered a little garden beside the river; fragrant plants and lovely flowers bloomed on every side; the orange, the camelia, the cactus, and the rich laurel of Portugal were blending their green and golden hues around me, while the very air was filled with delicious music. "Was it a dream, could such ecstasy be real?" I asked myself, as the rich notes swelled upward, in their strength, and sunk in soft cadence to tones of melting harmony, now bursting forth in the full force of gladness, the voices blended together in one stream of mellow music, and, suddenly ceasing, the soft but thrilling shake of a female voice rose upon the air, and its plaintive beauty stirred the very heart. The proud tramp of martial music succeeded to the low wailing cry of agony; then came the crash of battle, the clang of steel; the thunder of the fight rolled on in all its majesty, increasing in its maddening excitement till it ended in one loud shout of victory.

All was still; not a breath moved, not a leaf stirred, and again was I relapsing into my dreamy skepticism, when again the notes swelled upward in concert. But now their accents were changed, and, in low, subdued tones, faintly and slowly uttered, the prayer of thanksgiving rose to heaven, and spoke their gratefulness. I almost fell upon my knees, and already the tears filled my eyes, as I drank in the sounds. My heart was filled to bursting, and, even now as I write it, my pulse throbs as I remember the hymn of the Abencerrages.

When I rallied from my trance of excited pleasure, my first thought was—where was I, and how came I there? Before I could resolve my doubts upon the question, my attention was turned in another direction, for close beside me the branches moved forward, and a pair of arms were thrown around my neck, while a delicious voice cried out, in an accent of childish delight, "Trovado!" At the same instant a lovely head sank upon my shoulder, covering it with tresses of long brown hair. The arms pressed me still more closely, till I felt her very heart beating against my side.

"Mio fradre," said a soft trembling voice, as her fingers played in my hair and patted my temples.

What a situation mine! I well knew that some mistaken identity had been the cause; but, still, I could not repress my inclination to return the embrace, as I pressed my lips upon the fair forehead that leaned upon my bosom: at the same moment she threw back her head, as if to look me more fully in the face. One glance sufficed: blushing deeply over her cheeks and neck, she sprang from my arms, and uttering a faint cry, staggered against a tree. In an instant I saw it was the lovely girl I had met in the morning, and, without losing a second, I poured out apologies for my intrusion, with all the eloquence I was master of, till she suddenly interrupted me by asking if I spoke French? Scarcely had I recommenced my excuses in that language, when a third party appeared upon the stage. This was a short elderly man, in a green uniform, with several decorations upon his breast, and a cocked hat, with a most flowing plume, in his right hand.

"May I beg to know whom I have the honor of receiving?" inquired he, in very excellent English, as he advanced with a look of very ceremonious but distant politeness.

I immediately explained that, presuming upon the card which his servant had presented me, I had resolved on paying my respects, when a mistake had led me accidentally into his garden.

My apologies had not come to an end, when he folded me in his arms and overwhelmed me with thanks; at the same time saying a few words in Portuguese to his daughter, she stooped down and taking my hand gently within her own, touched it with her lips.

This piece of touching courtesy—which I afterward found meant little or nothing—affected me deeply at the time, and I felt the blood rush to my face and forehead, half in pride, half in a sense of shame. My confusion was, however, of short duration; for, taking my arm, the old gentleman led me along a few paces, and turning round a small clump of olives, entered a little summer-house. Here a considerable party were assembled, which, for their picturesque effect, could scarcely have been better managed on the stage.

Beneath the mild lustre of a large lamp of stained glass, half hid in the overhanging boughs, was spread a table, covered with vessels of gold and silver plate, of gorgeous richness; drinking cups and goblets of antique pattern, shone among cups of Sevres china or Venetian glass; delicious fruit, looking a thousand times more tempting for being contained in baskets of silver foliage, peeped from amid a profusion of fresh flowers, whose odor was continually shed around by a slight jet d'eau that played among the leaves. Around, upon the grass, seated upon cushions, or reclining upon Genoa carpets, were several beautiful girls, in most becoming costumes; their dark locks and darker eyes speaking of "the soft south," while the expressive gestures and animated looks betokened a race whose temperament is glowing as their clime. There were several men also, the greater number of whom appeared in uniform—bronzed, soldier-like fellows, who had the jaunty air and easy carriage of their calling—among whom was one Englishman, or at least so I guessed from his wearing the uniform of a heavy dragoon regiment.

"This is my daughter's fête," said Don Emanuel, as he ushered me into the assembly; "her birthday; a sad day it might have been for us, had it not been for your courage and forethought." So saying, he commenced a recital of my adventures to the bystanders, who overwhelmed me with civil speeches and a shower of soft looks, that completed the fascination of the fairy scene. Meanwhile, the fair laez had made room for me beside her, and I found myself at once the lion of the party; each vying with her neighbor who should show me the most attention. La Senhora herself directed her attention exclusively to me; a circumstance which, considering the awkwardness of our first meeting, I felt no small surprise at, and which led me, somewhat maliciously I confess, to make half allusion to it, feeling some interest at ascertaining for whom the flattering reception was really intended.

"I thought you were Charles," said she, blushing, in answer to my question.

"And you were right," said I, "I am Charles."

"Nay, but I meant my Charles."

There was something of touching softness in the tones of these few words that made me half wish I were her Charles. Whether my look evinced as much or not, I cannot tell; but she speedily added:

"He is my brother: he is captain in the cáçadores, and I expected him here this evening. Some one saw a figure pass the gate and conceal himself in the trees, and I was sure it was he."

"What a disappointment," said I.

"Yes; was it not?" said she, hurriedly; and then, as if remembering how ungracious was the speech, she blushed more deeply, and hung down her head.

Just at this moment, as I looked up, I caught the eye of the English officer fixed steadfastly upon me. He was a tall fine-looking fellow, of about two or three and thirty, with marked and handsome features, which, however, conveyed an expression of something sneering and sinister, that struck me the moment I saw him. His glass was fixed in his eye, and I perceived that he regarded us both with a look of no common interest. My attention did not, however, dwell long upon the circumstance, for Don Emanuel, coming behind my shoulder, asked me if I would not take out his daughter in the bolero they were just forming.

To my shame I was obliged to confess that I had never even seen the dance; and, while I continued to express my resolve to correct the errors of my education, the Englishman came up and asked the Senhora to be his partner. This put the very key-stone upon my annoyance, and I had half turned angrily away from the spot, when I heard her decline his invitation, and avow her determination not to dance.

There was something which pleased me so much at this refusal, that I could not help turning upon her a look of most grateful acknowledgment; but, as I did so, I once more encountered the gaze of the Englishman, whose knitted brows and compressed lips were bent upon me in a manner there was no mistaking. This was neither the fitting time nor place to seek any explanation of the circumstance; so, wisely resolving to wait a better occasion, I turned away and resumed my attentions toward my fair companion.

"Then you do not care for the bolero?" said I, as she re-seated herself upon the grass.

"Oh! I delight in it," said she, enthusiastically.

"But you refused to dance?"

She hesitated blushed, tried to mutter something, and was silent.

"I had determined to learn it," said I, half jestingly; "but, if you will not dance with me—"

"Yes; that I will—indeed I will."

"But you declined my countryman. Is it because he is inexperienced?"

The Senhora hesitated; looked confused for some minutes; at length, coloring slightly, she said, "I have already made one rude speech to you this evening; I fear lest I shall make a second. Tell me, is Captain Trevyllian your friend?"

"If you mean that gentleman yonder, I never saw him before."

"Nor heard of him?"

"Nor that either. We are total strangers to each other."

"Well, then, I may confess it. I do not like him. My father prefers him to any one else, invites him daily here, and in fact, installs him as his first favorite. But, still, I cannot like him; and yet I have done my best to do so."

"Indeed!" said I, pointedly. "What are his chief demerits? Is he not agreeable? Is he not clever?"

"Oh! on the contrary, most agreeable; fascinating, I should say, in conversation; has traveled; seen a great deal of the world; is very accomplished, and has distinguished himself on several occasions: he wears as you see, a Portuguese order."

"And, with all that,——?"

"And with all that I cannot bear him. He is a duellist, a notorious duellist. My brother, too, knows more of him, and avoids him. But let us not speak further: I see his eyes are again fixed on us; and, somehow, I fear him, without well knowing wherefore."

A movement among the party; shawls and mantillas were sought for on all sides; and the preparations for leave-taking appeared general. Before, however, I had time to express my thanks for my hospitable reception, the guests had assembled in a circle around the Senhora, and, toast ing her with a parting bumper, they commenced in concert a little Portuguese song of farewell; each verse concluding with a good night, which, as they separated and held their way homeward, might now and then be heard, rising upon the breeze, and wafting their last thoughts back to her. The concluding verse, which struck me much, I have essayed to translate. It ran somehow thus:

The morning breezes chill
Now close our joyous scene,
And yet we linger still,
Where we've so happy been.
How blest were it to live
With hearts like ours so light,
And only part to give
One long and last Good Night,
Good Night!

With many an invitation to renew my visit, most kindly preferred by Don Emanuel, and warmly seconded by his daughter, I, too, wished my good night, and turned my steps homeward.

CHAPTER XXXIX.—The Villa.

The first object which presented itself to my eye, the next morning, was the midshipman's packet, intrusted to my care by Power. I turned it over to read the address more carefully, and what was my surprise to find that the name was that of my fair friend, Donna Inez!

"This certainly thickens the plot," thought I; "and so I have now fallen on the real Simon Pure, and the reefer has had the good fortune to distance the dragon. Well, this much, I cannot say that I regret it. Now, however, for the parade, and then for the villa."

"I say, O'Malley," cried out Monsoon, as I appeared on the Plaza, "I have accepted an invitation for you to-day. We dine across the river. Be at my quarters a little before six, and we'll go together."

I should rather have declined the invitation, but, not well knowing why, and having no ready excuse, acceded and promised to be punctual.

"You were at Don Emanuel's last night; I heard of you."

"Yes: I spent a most delightful evening."

"That's your ground, my boy; a million of moidores, and such a campaign in Valencia; a better thing than the Dalrymple affair. Don't blush. I know it all. But stay; here they come."

As he spoke, the general commanding, with a numerous staff, rode forward. As they passed, I recognized a face which I had certainly seen before, and in a moment remembered it was that of the dragon of the evening before. He passed quite close, and, fixing his eyes steadfastly on me, evinced no sign of recognition.

The parade lasted above two hours, and it was with a feeling of impatience I mounted a fresh horse to canter out to the villa. When I arrived, the servant informed me that Don Emanuel was in the city, but that Senhora was in the garden; offering, at the same time, to escort me. Declining this honor, I intrusted my horse to his keeping, and took my way toward the arbor where last I had seen her.

I had not walked many paces when the sound of a guitar struck on my ear. I listened. It was the Senhora's voice. She was singing a Venetian canzonetta, in a low, soft, warbling tone, as one lost in a reverie, as though the music was a mere accompaniment to some pleasant thought. I peeped through the dense leaves, and there she sat upon a low garden seat; an open book on the rustic table before her; beside her, embroidery, which seemed only lately abandoned. As I looked, she placed her guitar upon the ground, and began to play with a small spangle, that seemed to have waited with impatience for some testimony of favor. A moment more, and she grew weary of this, then heaving a long but gentle sigh, leaned back upon her chair, and seemed lost in thought. I now had ample time to regard her, and, certainly, never beheld any thing more lovely. There was a character of classic beauty, and her brow, though fair and ample, was still strongly marked upon the temples; the eyes, being deep and squarely set, imparted a look of intensity to her features which their own softness alone subdued; while the short upper lip, which trembled with every passing thought, spoke of a nature tender and impressionable, and yet impassioned. Her foot and ankle peeped from beneath her dark robe, and, certainly, nothing could be more faultless; while her hand, fair as marble, blue veined and dimpled, played amid the long tresses of her hair that, as if in the wantonness of beauty, fell carelessly upon her shoulders.

It was some time before I could tear myself from the fascination of so much beauty, and it needed no common effort to leave the spot. As I made a short détour in the garden before approaching the arbor, she saw me as I came forward, and, kissing her hand gayly, made room for me beside her.

"I have been fortunate in finding you alone, Senhora," said I, as I seated myself by her side; "for I am the bearer of a letter to you. How far it may interest you I know not, but to the writer's feelings I am bound to testify."

"A letter to me? you jest, surely."

"That I am in earnest this will show," said I, producing the packet.

She took it from my hands, turned it about and about, examined the seal, while, half doubtfully, she said—

"The name is mine; but, still——"

"You fear to open it: is it not so? But, after all, you need not be surprised if it's from Howard: that's his name, I think."

"Howard! from little Edward!" exclaimed she enthusiastically, and, tearing open the letter, she pressed it to her lips, her eyes sparkling with pleasure, and her cheek glowing as she read. I watched her as she ran rapidly over the lines; and I confess that, more than once, a pang of discontent shot through my heart that the midshipman's letter could call up such interest; not that I was in love with her myself, but yet, I know not how it was, I had fancied her affections unengaged, and, without asking myself wherefore, I wished as much.

"Poor dear boy," said she, as she came to the end.

How these few and simple words sank into my heart as I remembered how they had once been uttered to myself, and in perhaps no very dissimilar circumstances.

"But where is the souvenir he speaks of?" said she.

"The souvenir. I'm not aware——"

"Oh, I hope you have not lost the lock of hair he sent me!"

I was quite dumbfounded at this, and could not remember whether I had received it from Power or not; so answered at random—

"Yes: I must have left it on my table."

"Promise me, then, to bring it to-morrow with you."

"Certainly," said I, with something of pique in my manner. "If I find such a means of making my visit an agreeable one, I shall certainly not omit it."

"You are quite right," said she, either not noticing or not caring for the tone of my reply. "You will, indeed, be a welcome messenger. Do you know, he was one of my lovers?"

"One of them! indeed! Then pray how many do you number at this moment?"

"What a question! as if I could possibly count them. Beside, there are so many absent; some on leave, some deserters, perhaps, that I might be reckoning among my troops, but who, possibly, form part of the forces of the enemy. Do you know little Howard?"

"I cannot say that we are personally acquainted, but I am enabled, through the medium of a friend, to say, that his sentiments are not strange to me. Beside, I have really pledged myself to support the prayer of his petition."

"How very good of you! for which reason, you've forgotten, if not lost, the lock of hair."

"That you shall have to-morrow," said I, pressing my hand solemnly to my heart.

"Well, then don't forget it: but hush; here comes Captain Trevyllian. So you say Lisbon really pleases you," said she, in a tone of voice totally changed, as the dragon of the preceding evening approached.

"Mr. O'Malley, Captain Trevyllian."

We bowed stiffly and haughtily to each other, as two men salute who are unavoidably obliged to bow, with every wish on either side to avoid acquaintance. So, at least, I construed his bow; so I certainly intended my own.

It requires no common tact to give conversation the appearance of unconstraint and ease when it is evident that each person opposite is laboring under excited feelings; so that, notwithstanding the Senhora's efforts to engage our attention by the commonplaces of the day, we remained almost silent, and, after a few observations of no interest, took our several leaves. Here again a new source of awkwardness arose; for, as we walked together toward the house, where our horses stood, neither party seemed disposed to speak.

"You are probably returning to Lisbon?" said he coldly.

I assented by a bow. Upon which, drawing his bridle within his arm, he bowed once more, and turned away in an opposite direction; while I, glad to be relieved of an unsought for companionship, returned alone to the town.

CHAPTER XL.—The Dinner.

It was with no peculiar pleasure that I dressed for our dinner party. Major O'Shaughnessy, our host, was one of that class of my countrymen I cared least for,—a riotous, good-natured, noisy, loud-swearing, punch-drinking western; full of stories of impossible fox hunts, and unimaginable duels, which all were acted either by himself or some member of his family. The company consisted of the Adjutant, Monsoon, Ferguson, Trevyllian, and some eight or ten officers with whom I was unacquainted. As is usual on such occasions, the wine circulated freely, and, amid the din and clamor of excited conversation, the fumes of burgundy, and the vapor of cigar smoke, we most of us became speedily mystified. As for me, my evil destiny would have it that I was placed exactly opposite Trevyllian, with whom, upon more than one occasion, I happened to differ in opinion, and the question was in itself some trivial and unimportant one; yet the tone which he assumed, and of which I too could not divest myself in reply, boded anything rather than an amicable feeling between us. The noise and turmoil about prevented the others remarking the circumstance; but I could perceive in his manner what I deemed a studied determination to promote a quarrel, while I felt within myself a most unchristian-like desire to indulge his fancy.

"Worse fellows at passing the bottle than Trevyllian and O'Malley there, I have rarely sojourned with," cried the Major: "look if they have n't got eight decanters between them: and here we are in a state of African thirst."

"How can you expect him to think of the thirst when such perfumed billets as that come showering upon him?" said the adjutant, alluding to a rose-colored epistle a servant had placed within my hands.

"Eight miles of a stone wall country in fifteen minutes! devil a lie in it!" said O'Shaughnessy, striking the table with his clenched fists: "show me the man 'ld deny it!"

"Why, my dear fellow!"

"Do n't be dearing me. Is it no you'll be saying to me? Listen now: there's O'Reilly there."

"Where is he?"

"He's under the table! well, it's the same thing. His mother had a fox—: bad luck to you, do n't scald me with the jug! his mother had a fox-cover in Shirohan."

When O'Shaughnessy had got thus far in his narrative, I had the opportunity of opening my note, which merely contained the following words:—"Come to the ball at the Casino, and bring the cadeau you promised me."

I had scarcely read this over once, when a roar of laughter at something said, attracted my attention. I looked up and perceived Trevyllian's eyes bent upon me with the fierceness of a tiger: the veins of his forehead were swollen and distorted, and the whole expression of his face betokened rage and passion. Tensed no longer to submit to such evident determination to insult, I was rising from my place at table, when, as if anticipating my intention, he pushed back his chair, and left the room. Fearful of attracting attention by immediately following him, I affected to join in the conversation around me, while my temples throbbed, and my hands tingled with impatience to get away.

"Poor M'Manus," said O'Shaughnessy, "rest his soul, he'd have puzzled the bench of bishops for hard words: upon my conscience I believe he spent his mornings looking for them in the Old Testament: sure ye might have heard what happened to him; at Banagher, when he commanded the Kilkennys—ye never heard the story: well then, ye shall: push the sherry along first though—old Monsoon there always keeps it lingering beside his left arm!"

"Well, when Peter was lieutenant-colonel of the Kilkennys—who, I may remark, en passant, as the French say, were the seediest-looking devils in the whole service; he never let them alone from morning till night, drilling, and pipe-claying, and polishing them up! Nothing will make soldiers of you, said Peter; but, by the rock of Cashel, I'll keep you as clean as a new musket! Now, poor Peter himself was not a very warlike figure; he measured five feet one in his tallest boots; but certainly, if nature denied him length of stature, she compensated for it in another way, by giving him a taste for the longest words in the language! An extra syllable or so in a word, was always a strong recommendation; and, whenever he could not find one to his mind, he'd take some quaint, outlandish one, that more than once led to very awkward results. Well, the regiment was one day drawn up for parade in the town of Banagher, and, as M'Manus came down the lines, he stopped opposite one of the men, whose face, hands, and accoutrements exhibited a most woful contempt of his orders. The fellow looked more like a turf stack than a light-company man! 'Stand out, sir,' cried M'Manus, in a boiling passion. 'Sergeant O'Toole, inspect this individual.' Now the sergeant was rather a favorite with Mac; for he always pretended to understand his phraseology, and, in consequence, was pronounced by the colonel a very superior man for his station in life. 'Sergeant,' said he, 'we shall make an exemplary illustration of our system here!'

"Yes, sir," said the sergeant, sorely puzzled at the meaning of what he spoke!

"Bear him to the Shannon, and lave him there: this he said in a kind of Coriolanus tone, with a toss up of his head, and a wave of his right arm; signs, whenever he made them, incontestably showing that further parley was out of the question, and that he had summed up, and charged the jury for good and all.

"Lave him in the river!" said O'Toole, his eyes starting from the sockets, and his whole face working in strong anxiety; "is it lave him in the river, yer honor means?"

"I have spoken," said the little man, bending an ominous frown upon the sergeant; which, whatever construction he might have put upon his words, there was no mistaking.

"Well, well as it's God's will he's drowned, it will not be on my head," says O'Toole, as he marched the fellow away between two rank and file.

"The parade was nearly over when Mac happened to see the Sergeant coming up, all splashed with water, and looking quite tired.

"Have you obeyed my orders?" said he.

"Yes, yer honor; and tough work we had of it, for he struggled hard."

"And where is he now?"

"Oh, troth, he's there safe! devil a fear he'll get out!"

"Where?" said Mac.

"In the river, yer honor."

"What have you done, you scoundrel?"

"Did n't I do as you bid me?" says he; "did n't I throw him in and lare [leave] him there?" And faith so they did, and if he was n't a good swimmer and got over to Moystown, there's little doubt but he'd have been drowned, and all because Peter M'Manus could not express himself like a Christian."

In the laughter which followed O'Shaughnessy's story, I took the opportunity of making my escape from the party, and gained the street unobserved. Though the note I had just read was not signed, I had no doubt from whence it came: so I hastened at once to my quarters, to make search for the lock of Joe Howard's hair, to which the Senhora alluded. What was my mortification, however, to discover, that no such thing could be found any where! I searched all my drawers; I tossed about my papers and letters; I hunted every likely, every unlikely spot, I could think of, but in vain; now cursing my carelessness for having lost it; now swearing most positively to myself that I never could have received it. What was to be done? it was already late: my only thought was how to replace it. If I only knew the color, any other lock would do as well. The chances were, as Howard was young and an Englishman, that his hair was light; light brown probably: something like my own. Of course it was! why did n't that thought occur to me before? how stupid I was! So saying, I seized a pair of scissors and cut a long lock beside my temple: this in a calm moment I might have hesitated about. Yes, thought I, she'll never discover the cheat; and beside, I do feel—I know not exactly why—rather gratified to think that I shall have left this souvenir behind me, even though it call up other recollections than of me. So thinking, I wrapped my cloak about me, and hastened toward the Casino.

CHAPTER XLI....The Route.

I had scarcely gone a hundred yards from my quarters, when the great tramp of horses' feet attracted my attention. I stopped to listen, and soon heard the jingle of dragoon accoutrements, as the noise came nearer. The night was dark, but perfectly still; and before I stood many minutes, I heard the tones of a voice, which I well knew could belong to but one, and that, Fred Power.

"Fred Power," said I shouting at the same time at the top of my voice, "Power."

"Ah, Charley, that you? come along to the adjutant-general's quarters. I'm charged with some important despatches, and can't stop till I've delivered them. Come along, I've glorious news for you!" So saying he dashed spurs to his horse, and, followed by ten mounted dragoons, galloped past. Power's few and hurried words had so excited my curiosity, that I turned at once to follow him, questioning myself as I walked along, to what he could possibly allude. He knew of my attachment to Lucy Dashwood—could he mean anything of her? but what could I expect there? by what flattery could I picture to myself any chance of success in that quarter? and yet, what other news could I care for or value, than what bore upon her fate upon whom my own depended. Thus ruminating, I reached the door of the spacious building in which the adjutant-general had taken up his abode, and soon found myself among a crowd of persons whom the rumor of some important event had assembled there, though no one could tell what had occurred. Before many minutes the door opened, and Power came out, bowing hurriedly to a few, and whispering a word or two as he passed down the steps, he seized me by the arm and led me across the street. "Charley," said he, "the curtain's rising; the piece is about to begin: a new commander-in-chief is sent out, Sir Arthur Wellesley, my boy, the finest fellow in England, to head us on, and we march to-morrow. There's news for you!" A raw boy unread, uninformed as I was, I knew but little of his career whose name had even then shed such lustre upon our army; but the buoyant tone of Power as he spoke, the kindling energy of his voice aroused me, and I felt every inch of me a soldier. As I grasped his hand in delightful enthusiasm, I lost all memory of my disappointment, and, in the beating throb that shook my head, I felt how deeply slept the ardor of military glory that first led me from my home to see a battle-field.

"There goes the news!" said Frederick, pointing as he spoke to a rocket that shot up into the sky, and, as it broke into ten thousand stars, illuminated the broad stream where the ships of war lay darkly resting: in another moment, the whole air shone with similar fires, while the deep roll of the drum sounded along the silent streets, and the city, so lately sunk in sleep, became, as if by magic, thronged with crowds of people; and the sharp clang of the cavalry trumpet blended with the gay carol of the light infantry bugle, and the heavy tramp of the march was heard in the distance. All was excitement, all bustle; but in the joyous tone of every voice, was spoken the longing anxiety to meet the enemy: the gay reckless tone of an Irish song would occasionally reach us, as some Connaught ranger, or some seventy-eight man passed, his knapsack on his back: or the low monotonous pibroch of the highlander, swelling into a war-cry, as some kilted corps drew up their ranks together. We turned to regain our quarters, when, at the corner of a street, we came suddenly upon a merry party, seated around a table, before a little inn; a large street lamp, unhung for the occasion, had been placed in the midst of them, and showed us the figures of several soldiers in undress at the end, and, raised a little above his comrades, sat one, whom, by the unfair proportion he assumed of the conversation, not less than by the musical intonation of his voice, I soon recognized as my man, Mickey Free.

"I'll be hanged, if that's not your fellow there, Charley," said Power, as he came to a dead stop a few yards off.

"What an impertinent varlet he is: only to think of him there, presiding among a set of fellows that have fought all the battles of the peninsular war. At this moment, I'll be hanged, if he is not going to sing."

Here a tremendous thumping upon the table announced the fact, and, after a few preliminary observations from Mike, illustrative of his respect to the service, in which he had so often distinguished himself, he began to the air of the "Young May Moon," a ditty, of which I only recollect the following verses:

"THE YOUNG MAY MOON."

"The picquets are fast retreating, boys;

The last tattoo is beating, boys;

So let every man

Finish his can,

And drink to our next merry meeting, boys!

The colonel so gayly prancing, boys!

Has a wonderful trick of advancing, boys!

When he sings out so large,

'Fix bayonets and charge.'

He sets all the Frenchmen a-dancing, boys!

Let Mounseer look ever so big, my boys,

Who cares for fighting a fig, boys:

When we play (Garryowen,

He'd rather go home:

For somehow, he's no taste for a jig, my boys!"

This admirable lyric seemed to have a perfect success, if one were only to judge from the thundering of voices, hands, and drinking vessels, which followed; while a venerable gray-haired sergeant rose to propose Mr. Free's health, and speedy promotion to him.

We stood for several minutes in admiration of the party; when the loud roll of the drums beating to arms awakened us to the thought that our moments were numbered.

"Good night, Charley!" said Power, as he shook my hand warmly; "good night! It will be your last night under a curtain for some months to come: make the most of it. Adieu!"

So saying, we parted: he to his quarters, and I to all the confusion of my baggage, which lay in most admired disorder about my room.

CHAPTER XLII....The Farewell.

The preparations for the march occupied me till near morning; and, indeed, had I been disposed to sleep, the din and clamor of the world without would have totally prevented it. Before day-break the advance guard was already in motion, and some squadrons of heavy cavalry had begun their march.

I looked around my now dismantled room as one does usually for the last time ere leaving, and bethought me if I had not forgotten anything. Apparently all was remembered: but stay—what is this? To be sure, how forgetful I had become! It was the packet I had destined for Donna Inez, and which in the confusion of the night before, I had omitted to bring to the Casino.

I immediately despatched Mike to the commissary, with my luggage, and orders to ascertain when we were expected to march. He soon returned, with the intelligence that our corps was not to move before noon; so that I had yet some hours to spare and make my adieu to the Senhora.

I cannot explain the reason, but I certainly did bestow a more than common attention upon my toilette that morning. The Senhora was nothing to me. It is true, she had, as she most candidly informed me, a score of admirers, among whom I was not even reckoned: she was evidently a coquette, whose greatest pleasure was to sport and amuse herself with the passions she excited in others. And even if she were not,—if her heart were to be won to-morrow, what claim—what right had I to seek it? My affections were already pledged; promised, it is true, to one who gave nothing in return, and who perhaps even loved another. Ah, there was the rub: that one confounded suspicion, lurking in the rear, chilled my courage and piqued my spirit.

If there be any thing more disheartening to an Irishman, in his little affaires du cœur, than another, it is the sense of rivalry. The obstinacy of fathers, the ill-will of mothers, the indifference of the lovely object herself,—obstacles though they be—he has tact, spirit and perseverance to overcome them; but, when a more successful candidate for the fair presents himself; when the eye that remains downcast at his suit, lights up with animation at another's coming; when the features, whose cold and chilling apathy to him blended in one smile at another—it is all up with him: he sees the game is lost, and throws his cards upon the table. And yet, why is this? why is it that he, whose birth-right it would seem to be sanguine when others despond,—to be confident when all else are hopeless,—should find his courage fail him here? The reason is simply—but, in good sooth, I am ashamed to confess it!

Having jogged on so far with my reader, in all the sober seriousness which the matter-of-fact material of these memoirs demands, I fear lest a seeming paradox may cause me to lose my good name for veracity; and that, while merely maintaining a national trait of my country, I may appear to be asserting some unheeded and absurd proposition; so far have mere vulgar prejudices gone to sap our character as a people.

The reason then, is this—for I have gone too far to retreat—the Irishman is essentially bashful. Well, laugh if you wish; for I conclude that, by this time, you have given way to a most immoderate excess of risibility; but still, when you have perfectly recovered your composure, I beg to repeat—the Irishman is essentially a bashful man!

Do not, for a moment, fancy that I would by this imply that, in any new or unexpected situation,—that from any unforeseen conjuncture of events—the Irishman would feel confused or abashed, more than any other: far from it. The cold and habitual reserve of the Englishman, the studied caution of the North Tweeder himself, would exhibit far stronger evidences of awkwardness in such circumstances as these. But on the other hand when measuring his capacity, his means of success, his probability of being preferred, with those of the natives of any other country, I back the Irishman against the world for distrust of his own powers, for an under estimate of his real merits: in one word for his bashfulness. Look at Daniel O'Connell! look at Spring Rice! look at Remmy Sheehan! But I promised faithfully never to meddle with living celebrities; beside that, I'm really forgetting myself in the digression. Let us return to Donna Inez.

As I rode up to the Villa, I found the family assembled at breakfast. Several officers were also present, among whom I was not sorry to recognize my friend Monsoon.

"Ah, Charley!" cried he, as I seated myself beside him, "what a pity all our fun is so soon to have an end! Here's this confounded Soult won't be quiet and peaceable; but he must march from Oporto, and heaven knows where beside, just as we were really beginning to enjoy life. I had got such a contract for blankets! and now they've ordered me to join Beresford's corps in the mountain: and you,"—here he dropped his voice—"and you were getting on so devilish well in this quarter: upon my life, I think you'd have carried the day: old Don Emanuel, you know he's a friend of mine, he likes you very much. And then, there's Sparks—"

"Ay, Major, what of him? I have not seen him for some days."

"Why they've been frightening the poor devil out of his life. O'Shaughnessy and a set of them—they tried him by court-martial yesterday, and sentenced him to mount guard with a wooden sword and a shooting jacket, which he did. Old Colbourne, it seems, saw him; and faith, there would have been the devil to pay if the route had not come.—Some of them would certainly have got a long leave to see their friends."

"Why is not the Senhora here, Major? I do n't see her at table."

"A cold; a sore throat; a wet feet affair of last night, I believe. Pass that cold pie down here. Sherry, if you please. You did n't see Power to-day?"

"No: we parted last night; I have not been to bed."

"Very bad preparation for a march: take some burnt brandy in your coffee."

"Then you do n't think the Senhora will appear?"

"Very unlikely; but, stay, you know her room; the small drawing-room that looks out upon the flower-garden; she usually passes the morning there. Leap the little wooden paling round the corner, and the chances are ten to one you find her."

I saw from the occupied air of Don Antonio that there was little fear of interruption on his part; so, taking an early moment to escape unobserved, I rose and left the room. When I sprang over the oak fence, I found myself in a delicious little garden, where roses, grown to a height never seen in our colder climate, formed a deep bower of rich blossom.

The Major was right: the Senhora was in the room, and in one moment I was beside her.

"Nothing but my fears of not bidding you farewell, could palliate my thus intruding, Donna Inez; but as we are ordered away—"

"When? not so soon, surely!"

"Even so; to-day, this very hour; but you see that, even in the hurry of departure, I have not forgotten my trust; this is the packet I promised you."

So saying, I placed the paper with the lock of hair within her hand, and, bending downward, pressed my lips upon her taper fingers. She hurriedly snatched her hand away, and, tearing open the enclosure, took out the lock. She looked steadily for a moment at it, then at me, and again at it, and at length, bursting into a fit of laughing, threw herself upon a chair in a very ecstasy of mirth.

"Why, you do n't mean to impose this auburn ringlet upon me for one of poor Howard's jetty curls. What downright folly to think of it! and then, with how little taste the deception was practiced: upon your very temples, too. One comfort is, you are utterly spoiled by it."

Here she again relapsed into a fit of laughter leaving me perfectly puzzled what to think of her, as she resumed:—

"Well, tell me now, am I to reckon this as a pledge of your own allegiance, or am I still to believe it to be Edward Howard's? Speak, and truly."

"Of my own, most certainly," said I, "if it will be accepted."

"Why, after such treachery, perhaps it ought not; but, still, as you have already done yourself such injury, and look so very silly withal—"

"That you are resolved to give me cause to look more so," added I.

"Exactly," said she; "for here, now, I reinstate you among my true and faithful admirers. Kneel down, sir knight, in token of which you will wear this scarf—"

A sudden start which the donna gave at these words, brought me to my feet. She was pale as death and trembling.

"What means this?" said I. "What has happened?"

She pointed with her finger towards the garden; but, though her lips moved, no voice came forth. I sprang through the open window. I rushed into the copse, the only one which might afford concealment for a figure, but no one was there. After a few minutes' vain endeavor to discover any trace of an intruder, I returned to the chamber. The donna was there still; but how changed! her gayety and animation were gone, her pale cheek and trembling lip bespoke fear and suffering, and her cold hand lay heavily beside her.

"I thought—perhaps it was merely fancy—but I thought I saw Trevyllian beside the window."

"Impossible," said I. "I have searched every walk and alley. It was nothing but imagination—believe me, no more. There, be assured; think no more of it."

While I endeavored thus to reassure her, I was very far from feeling perfectly at ease myself; the whole bearing and conduct of this man had inspired me with a growing dislike of him, and I felt already half-convinced that he had established himself as a spy upon my actions.

"Then you really believe I was mistaken," said the donna, as she placed her hand within mine.

"Of course I do; but speak no more of it. You must go! forget how few my moments are here. Already I have heard the tramp of horses without; ah! there they are; in a moment more I shall be missed; so, once more, farewell! Nay, I beg pardon if I have dared to call you thus; but think, if it be the first it may also be the last time I shall ever speak it."

Her head gently drooped as I said these words, till it sunk upon my shoulder, her long and heavy hair falling upon my neck and across my bosom. I felt her heart almost beat against my side; I muttered some words, I know not what; I felt them like a prayer; I pressed her cold forehead to my lips; rushed from the room; cleared the fence at a spring, and was far upon the road to Lisbon ere I could sufficiently collect my senses to know whither I was going. Of little else was I conscious: my mind was full of bursting, and, in the confusion of my excited brain, fiction and reality were so inextricably mingled as to defy every endeavor at discrimination. But little time had I for reflection: as I reached the city, the brigade to which I was attached was already under arms, and Mike impatiently waiting my arrival with the horses.

CHAPTER XLIII....The March.

What a strange spectacle did the road to Oliviera present upon the morning of the 7th of May. A hurried or incautious observer might, at first sight, have pronounced the long line of troops which wended their way through the valley, as the remains of a broken and routed army, had not the ardent expression and bright eye that beamed on every side, assured him that men who looked thus could not be beaten ones. Horse, foot, baggage, artillery, dismounted dragoons, even the pale and scarcely recovered inhabitant of the hospital, might have been seen hurrying on; for the order—forward—had been given at Lisbon, and those whose wounds did not permit their joining were more pitied for their loss than its cause. More than one officer was seen at the head of his troop with an arm in a sling, or a bandaged forehead; while among the men, similar evidences of devotion were not unfrequent. As for me, long years and many reverses have not obliterated—scarcely blunted—the impression that sight made on me. The splendid spectacle of a review had often excited and delighted me; but here, there was the glorious reality of war; the bronzed faces, the worn uniforms, the well tattered flags, the roll of the heavy guns mingling with the wild pibroch of the highlander or scarcely less wild recklessness of the Irish quick step; while the long line of cavalry, their helmets and accoutrements shining in the morning sun, brought back one's boyish dreams of joust and tournament, and made the heart beat high with chivalrous enthusiasm.

"Yes," said I, half aloud, "this is indeed a realization of what I longed and thirsted for," the clang of the music and the tramp of the cavalry responding to my throbbing pulses as we moved along.

"Close up there. Trot," cried out a deep manly voice, and immediately a general officer rode by, followed by an aid-de-camp.

"There goes Cotton," said Power. "You may feel easy in your mind now, Charley; there's some work before us."

"You have not heard our destination?" said I.

"Nothing is known for certain, yet. The report goes that Soult is advancing upon Oporto; and the chances are, Sir Arthur intends to hasten us to its relief. Our fellows are at Ovar, with General Murray."

"I say, Charley, old Monsoon is in a devil of a flurry; he expected to have been peaceably settled down in Lisbon for the next six months, and he has received orders to set out for Beresford's headquarters immediately; and, from what I hear, they have no idle time."

"Well, Sparks, how goes it, man? Better fun this than the cook's galley, eh?"

"Why, do you know, these hurried movements put me out confoundedly. I found Lisbon very interesting, the little I could see of it last night."

"Ah! my dear fellow, think of the lovely Andalusian lasses, with their brown transparent skins and liquid eyes; why, you'd have been over head and ears in love in twenty-four hours more, had we stayed."

"Are they really so pretty?"

"Pretty!—downright lovely, man. Why they have a way of looking at you, over their fans—just one glance, short and fleeting, but so melting, by Jove!—Then their walk—if it be not profane to call that springing elastic gesture by such a name—why, it's regular witchcraft. Sparks, my man, I tremble for you. Do you know, by-the-bye, that same pace of theirs is a devilish hard thing to learn. I never could come it; and yet, somehow, I was formerly rather a crack fellow at a ballet. Old Alberto used to select me for a pas de zephyr among a host; but there's a kind of a hop and a slide, and a spring: in fact, you must have been wearing petticoats for eighteen years, and have an Andalusian instep, and an India-rubber soul to your foot, or it's no use trying it. How I used to make them laugh at the old San Josef convent, formerly, by my efforts in the cause."

"Why, how did it ever occur to you to practice it?"

"Many a man's legs have saved his head, Charley, and I put it to mine to do a similar service for me."

"True; but I never heard of a man that performed a pasuel before the enemy."

"Not exactly; but still you're not very wide of the mark. If you'll only wait till we reach Pontalegue, I'll tell you the story; not that it is worth the delay, but talking at this brisk pace I do n't admire."

"You have a detachment here, Captain Power," said an aid-de-camp, riding hastily up, "and General Cotton requests you will send a subaltern and two sergeants forward toward Berar, to reconnoitre the pass. Franchessa's cavalry are reported in that quarter;" so speaking he dashed spurs to his horse, and was out of sight in an instant.

Power, at the same moment, wheeled to the rear, from which he returned in an instant, accompanied by three well-mounted light dragoons. "Sparks," said he, "now for an occasion of distinguishing yourself. You heard the order, lose no time, and, as your horse is an able one and fresh, lose not a second, but forward."

No sooner was Sparks despatched on what, it was evident, he felt to be anything but a pleasant duty, than I turned toward Power and said, with some tinge of disappointment in the tone, "Well, if you really felt there was anything worth doing there—I flattered myself that—that"

"Speak out, man—that I should have sent you; eh, is it not so?"

"Yes, you've hit it."

"Well, Charley, my peace is easily made on this head: why, I selected Sparks, simply, to spare you one of the most unpleasant duties that can be imposed upon a man: a duty which, let him discharge it to the uttermost, will never be acknowledged, and the slightest failure in which will be remembered for many a day against him; beside, the pleasant and very probable prospect of being selected as a bull's eye for a French rifle, or carried off a prisoner; eh, Charley? there's no glory, devil a ray of it. Come, come, old fellow, Fred Power's not the man to keep his friend out of the mêlée—if anything can be made by being in it. Poor Sparks, I'll swear, is as little satisfied with the arrangement as yourself, if one knew but all."

"I say, Power," said a tall, dashing-looking man of about five-and-forty, with a Portuguese order in his breast; "I say, Power, dine with us at the halt."

"With pleasure, if I may bring my young friend here."

"Of course, pray introduce us."

"Major Hixley, Mr. O'Malley—a 14th man, Hixley."

"Delighted to make your acquaintance, Mr. O'Malley. Knew a famous fellow in Ireland of your name, a certain Godfrey O'Malley, member for some county or other."

"My uncle," said I, blushing deeply with a pleasurable feeling, at even this slight praise of my old friend.

"Your uncle! give me your hand. By Jove, his nephew has a right to good treatment at my hands; he saved my life in the year '98; and how is old Godfrey?"

"Quite well when I left him some months ago; a little gout now and then."

"To be sure he has; no man deserves it better; but it's a gentlemanly gout, that merely jogs his memory in the morning of the good wine he has drunk over night; by-the-by, what became of a friend of his, a devilish eccentric fellow, who held a command in the Austrian service?"

"Oh, Considine—the Count."

"The same."

"As eccentric as ever; I left him on a visit with my uncle. And Boyle, did you know Sir Harry Boyle?"

"To be sure I did: shall I ever forget him and his capital blunders, that kept me laughing the whole time I spent in Ireland? I was in the house when he concluded a panegyric upon a friend, by calling him 'the father to the poor, and uncle to Lord Donoughmore.'"

"He was the only man who could render by a bull what it was impossible to convey more correctly," said Power; "you've heard of his duel with Harry Toler?"

"Never; let's hear it."

"It was a bull from beginning to end. Boyle took it into his head that Harry was a person with whom he had a serious row in Cork. Harry, on the other hand, mistook Boyle for old Caples, whom he had been pursuing with horse-whipping intentions for some months; they met in Kildare street Club, and very little colloquy satisfied them that they were right in their conjectures; each party being so eagerly ready to meet the views of the other. It never was a difficult matter to find a friend in Dublin; and to do them justice, Irish seconds, generally speaking, are perfectly free from any imputation upon the score of good-breeding. No men have less curiosity as to the cause of the quarrel: wisely supposing that the principals know their own affairs best, they cautiously abstain from indulging any prying spirit, but proceed to discharge their functions as best they may. Accordingly, Sir Harry and Dick were set, as the phrase is, at twelve paces, and to use Boyle's own words, for I have heard him relate the story—

"We blazed away, sir, for three rounds. I put two in his hat, and one in his neckcloth; his shots went all through the skirt of my coat."

"We'll spend the day here," says Considine, 'at this rate: could n't you put them closer?'

"And give us a little more time in the word," says I.

"Exactly," said Dick.

"Well, they moved us forward two paces, and sat to loading the pistols again."

"By this time we were so near that we had full opportunity to scan each other's faces; well, sir, I stared at him, and he at me."

"What!" said I.

"Eh!" said he.

"How's this?" said I.

"You're not Billy Caples," said he.

"Devil a bit," said I, 'nor I don't think you're Archy Devine, and, faith, sir, so it appeared, we were fighting away all the morning for nothing; for somehow it turned out it was neither of us.'"

What amused me most in this anecdote was the hearing it at such a time and place; that poor Sir Harry's eccentricities should turn up for discussion on a march in Portugal, was singular enough; but, after all, life is full of such incongruous accidents. I remember once supping with King Calzoo on the Blue Mountains in Jamaica. By way of entertaining his guests, some English officers, he ordered one of his suite to sing. We were of course pleased at the opportunity of hearing an Indian war-chant, with a skull and thigh bone accompaniment; but what was our astonishment to hear the Indian, a ferocious looking dog, with an awful scalp lock, and two streaks of red paint across his chest—clear his voice well for a few seconds, and then begin, without discomposing a muscle of his gravity, 'The Laird of Cockpen,' I need not say, that the 'Great Raccoon' was a Dumfries man, who had quitted Scotland forty years before, and, with characteristic prosperity, had attained his present rank in a foreign service.

"Halt, halt!" cried a deep-toned manly voice in the leading column, and the word was repeated from mouth to mouth to the rear.

We dismounted, and picketing our horses beneath the broad-leaved foliage of the cork trees, stretched out at full length upon the grass, while our mess men prepared the dinner. Our party at first consisted of Hixley, Power, the Adjutant, and myself; but our number was soon increased by three officers of the 6th foot, about to join the regiment.

"Barring the ladies, God bless them," said Power, "there's no such pic-nics as campaigning presents; the charms of scenery are greatly enhanced by their coming unexpectedly on you. Your chance good fortune in the prog has an interest that no ham and cold chicken affair, prepared by your servants beforehand, and got ready with a degree of fuss and worry that converts the whole party into an assembly of cooks, can ever afford; and, lastly, the excitement that this same life of ours is never without, gives a zest—"

"There you've hit it," cried Hixley: "it's that same feeling of uncertainty, that those who meet now, may never do so again, full as it is of sorrowful reflection, that still teaches us, as we become inured to war, to economise our pleasures and be happy when we may. Your health, O'Malley, and your uncle Godfrey's too."

"A little more of the pastry."

"What a capital guinea-fowl this is!"

"That's some of old Monsoon's particular port."

"Pass it round here; really this is pleasant."

"My blessing on the man who left that vista yonder; see what a glorious valley stretches out there, undulating in its richness; and look at those dark trees, where just one streak of soft sunlight is kissing their tops, giving them one chaste good-night—"

"Well done, Power."

"Confound you, you've pulled me short, and I was about becoming downright pastoral: à propos of kissing, I understand Sir Arthur won't allow the convents to be occupied by troops."

"And, à propos, of convents," said I, "let's hear your story; you promised it, a while ago."

"My dear Charley, it's far too early in the evening for a story. I should rather indulge my poetic fancies here, under the shade of melancholy boughs; and, beside, I'm not half screwed up yet!"

"Come, Adjutant, let's have a song."

"I'll sing you a Portuguese serenade when the next bottle comes in. What capital port! have you much of it?"

"Only three dozen. We got it late last night; forged an order from the commanding officer, and sent it up to old Monsoon,—'for hospital use.' He gave it, with a tear in his eye; saying, as the sergeant marched away, 'Only think of such wine for fellows that may be in the next world before morning! It's downright sin.'"

"I say, Power, there's something going on there."

At this instant the trumpet sounded "boot and saddle," and, like one man, the whole mass rose up; when the scene, late so tranquil, became one of excited bustle and confusion. An aid-de-camp galloped past toward the river, followed by two orderly sergeants; and the next moment Sparks galloped up; his whole equipment giving evidence of a hurried ride, while his cheek was deadly pale and haggard.

Power presented to him a goblet of sherry, which, having emptied at a draught, he drew a long breath, and said: "They are coming—coming in force."

"Who are coming?" said Power; "take time, man, collect yourself."

"The French! I saw them a devilish deal closer than I liked; they wounded one of the orderlies, and took the other prisoner."

"Forward!" cried out a hoarse voice in the front; "March—trot."

And before we could obtain any further information from Sparks, whose faculties seemed to have received a terrific shock, we were once more in the saddle, and moving at a brisk pace onward.

Sparks had barely time to tell us that a large body of French cavalry occupied the pass of Berar, when he was sent for by General Cotton to finish his report.

"How frightened the fellow is!" said Hixley.

"I don't think the worse of poor Sparks for all that," said Power; "he saw those fellows for the first time, and no bird's-eye view of them, either."

"Then we are in for a skirmish, at least," said I.

"It would appear not from that," said Hixley, pointing to the head of the column, which, leaving the high road upon the left, entered the forest by a deep cleft, that opened upon a valley traversed by a broad river.

"That looks very like taking up a position, though," said Power.

"Look! look down yonder!" cried Hixley, pointing to a dip in the plain beside the river; "is not a cavalry picket there?"

"Right, by Jove! I say, Fitzroy," said Power to an aid-de-camp as he passed, "What's going on?"

"Soult has carried Oporto," cried he; "and Franchessa's cavalry have escaped."

"And who are these fellows in the valley?"

"Our own people coming up."

In less than half an hour's brisk trotting we reached the stream, the banks of which were occupied by two cavalry regiments advancing to the main army; and what was my delight to find that one of them was our own corps, the 14th Light Dragoons.

"Hurra!" cried Power, waving his cap as he came up.

"How are you, Sedgewick? Baker, my hearty, how goes it? How is Hampton, and the Colonel?"

In an instant we were surrounded by our brother officers, who all shook me cordially by the hand, and welcomed me to the regiment with most gratifying warmth.

"One of us," said Power, with a knowing look, as he introduced me; and the free-masonry of these few words secured me a hearty greeting.

"Halt, halt! Dismount!" sounded again from front to rear; and, in a few minutes, we were once more stretched upon the grass, beneath the deep and mellow moonlight; while the bright stream ran placidly beside us, reflecting, on its calm surface, the varied groups as they lounged or sat around the blazing fires of the bivouac.

CHAPTER XLIV....The Bivouac.

When I contrasted the gay and lively tone of the conversation which ran on around our bivouac fire, with the dry monotony and prosaic tediousness of my first military dinner at Cork, I felt how much the spirit and adventure of a soldier's life can impart of chivalrous enthusiasm to even the dulllest and least susceptible. I saw even many who, under common circumstances, would have possessed no interest, nor excited any curiosity, but now, connected as they were with the great events occurring around them, absolutely became heroes. And it was with a strange, wild throbbing of excitement I listened to the details of movements and marches, whose objects I knew not, but in which the magical words Corunna, Vimiera, were mixed up, and gave to the circumstance an interest of the highest character; how proud, too, I felt, to be the companion in arms of such fellows; here they sat, the tried and proved soldiers of a hundred fights, treating me as their brother and their equal. Who need wonder if I felt a sense of excited pleasure: had I needed such a stimulant, that night beneath the cork trees had been enough to arouse a passion for the army in my heart, and an irrepressible determination to seek for a soldier's glory.

"Fourteenth!" called out a voice from the wood behind; and, in a moment after, the aid-de-camp appeared with a mounted orderly.

"Colonel Merivale," said he, touching his cap to the stalwart soldier-like figure before him.

The Colonel bowed.

"Sir Stapleton Cotton desires me to request that at an early hour to-morrow you will occupy the pass, and cover the march of the troops. It is his wish that all the reinforcements should arrive at Oporto by noon. I need scarcely add, that we expect to be engaged with the enemy."

These few words were spoken hurriedly, and again saluting our party, he turned his horse's head and continued his way toward the rear.

"There's news for you, Charley," said Power, Slapping me on the shoulder. "Lucy Dashwood or Westminster Abbey!"

"The regiment was never in finer condition, that's certain," said the Colonel, "and most eager for a brush with the enemy."

"How your old friend the Count would have liked this work," said Hixley; "gallant fellow he was."

"Come," cried Power, "here's a fresh bowl coming. Let's drink to the ladies wherever they be: we, most of us have some soft spot on that score."

"Yes," said the Adjutant, singing:

"Here's to the maiden of blushing fifteen,
Here's to the damsel that's merry,
Here's to the flaunting extravagant queen—"

"And," sang Power, interrupting,

"Here's to the 'Widow of Derry.'"

"Come, come, Fred, no more quizzing on that score. It's the only thing ever gives me a distaste to the service, is the souvenir of that adventure. When I reflect what I might have been, and think what I am; when I contrast a Brussels carpet with wet grass, silk hangings with a canvass tent, Sneyd claret with ration brandy, and Sir Arthur for a commander-in-chief vice Boggs a widow."

"Stop there," cried Hixley, "without disparaging the fair widow, there's nothing beats campaigning after all: eh, Fred?"

"And to prove it," said the Colonel, "Power will sing a song."

Power took his pencil from his pocket, and placing the back of a letter across his shako, commenced inditing his lyric; saying, as he did so—

"I'm your man in five minutes: just fill my glass in the mean time."

"That fellow beats Dibdin hollow," whispered the Adjutant. "I'll be hanged if he'll not knock you off a song like lightning."

"I understand," said Hixley, "they have some intention at the Horse Guard of having all the general orders set to popular tunes, and sung at every mess in the service. You've heard that, I suppose, Sparks?"

"I confess I had not before."

"It will certainly come very hard on the subalterns," continued Hixley, with much gravity; "they'll have to brush up their sol mi fas; all the solos are to be their part."

"What rhymes with slaughter?" said Power.

"Brandy and water," said the Adjutant.

"Now, then," said Power, "are you all ready?"

"Ready."

"You must chorus, mind; and, mark me, take care you give the hip, hip, hurra, well; as that's the whole force of the chant. Take the time from me. Now for it. Air, 'Garryowen,' with spirit, but not too quick.

"Now that we've pledged each eye of blue,
And every maiden fair and true,
And our green island home—to you
The ocean's wave adoring,
Let's give one hip, hip, hurra,
And drink e'en to the coming day,
When, squadron square,
We'll all be there,
To meet the French in the morning.

"May his bright laurels never fade,
Who leads our fighting fifth brigade,
Those lads so true in heart and blade,
And famed for danger scorning;
So join me in one hip, hurra,
And drink e'en to the coming day,
When, squadron square,
We'll all be there,
To meet the French in the morning.

"And when with years and honors crowned
You sit some homeward hearth around,
And hear no more the stirring sound,
That spoke the trumpet's warning,
You'll fill, and drink, one hip, hurra,
And pledge the memory of the day,
When, squadron square,
They all were there,
To meet the French in the morning."

"Gloriously done, Fred!" cried Hixley. "If I ever get my deserts in this world, I'll make you Laureate to the Forces, with a hogshead of your own native whiskey for every victory of the army."

"A devilish good chant," said Merivale; "but the air surpasses any thing I ever heard: thoroughly Irish, I take it." "Irish! upon my conscience, I believe you!" shouted O'Shaughnessy, with an energy of voice and manner that created a hearty laugh on all sides. "It's a few people ever mistook it for a Venetian melody. Hand over the punch—the sherry, I mean. When I was in the Clare militia, we always went in to dinner to 'Tatter Jack Walsh,' a sweet air, and had 'Garryowen' for a quick step. Ould MacManus, when he got the regiment, wanted to change; he said they were damned vulgar tunes, and wanted to have 'Rule Britannia,' or the 'Hundredth Psalm'; but we would not stand it: there would have been a mutiny in the corps."

"The same fellow, was n't he, that you told the story of, the other evening, in Lisbon?" said I.

"The same. Well, what a character he was! As pompous and conceited a little fellow as ever you met with: and, then, he was so bullied by his wife; he always came down to revenge it on the regiment. She was a fine, showy, vulgar woman, with a most cherishing affection for all the good things in this life, except her husband, whom she certainly held in due contempt. 'Ye little crayture,' she'd say to him with a sneer, 'it'll become you to drink and sing, and be making a man of yourself. If you were like O'Shaughnessy there, six feet three in his stockings.' Well, well: it looks like boasting; but no matter: here's her health any way."

"I knew you were tender in that quarter," said Power. "I heard it when quartered in Limerick."

"Maybe you heard, too, how I paid off Mac, when he came down on a visit in this county?"

"Never: let's hear it now."

"Ay, O'Shaughnessy, now's your time; the fire's a good one, the night fine, and liquor plenty."

"I'm convenient," said O'Shaughnessy, as, depositing his enormous legs on each side of the burning fagots, and placing a bottle between his knees, he began his story:—

"It was a cold rainy night in January, in the year '98, I took my place in the Limerick mail, to go down for a few days to the west country. As the waiter of the Hibernian came to the door with a lantern, I just caught a glimpse of the other insides; none of whom were known to me, except Colonel MacManus, that I met once in a boarding-house in Molesworth-street. I did not, at the time, think him a very agreeable companion; but, when morning broke, and we began to pay our respects to each other in the coach, I leaned over, and said, 'I hope you're well, Colonel MacManus,' just by way of civility like. He did n't hear me at first; so that I said it again, a little louder.

"I wish you saw the look he gave me: he drew himself up to the height of his cotton umbrella, put his chin inside his cravat, pursed up his dry shrivelled lips, and with a voice he meant to be awful, replied:—

"You appear to have the advantage of me."

"Upon my conscience, you're right," said I, looking down at myself, and then over at him, at which the other travelers burst out a-laughing; 'I think there's few who will dispute that point.' When the laugh was over I resumed, for I was determined not to let him off so easily: 'Sure I met you at Mrs. Cayle's,' said I; 'and, by the same token—it was a Friday, I remember it well—maybe you did n't pitch into the salt cod! I hope it did n't disagree with you.'

"I beg to repeat, sir, that you are under a mistake," said he.

"Maybe so, indeed," said I. 'Maybe you're not Colonel MacManus at all; maybe you was n't in a passion for losing seven and sixpence at loo, with Mrs. Moriarty; maybe you did n't break the lamp in the hall with your umbrella, pretending you touched it with your head, and wasn't within three foot of it; maybe Counsellor Brady was n't going to put you in the box of the Foundling Hospital, if you would n't behave quietly in the streets—'

"Well, with this the others laughed so heartily, that I could not go on; and the next stage the bold Colonel got outside with the guard, and came in till we reached Limerick. I'll never forget his face, as he got down at Swinburne's Hotel. 'Good-bye, Colonel,' said I; but he would n't take the least notice of my politeness; but, with a frown of utter defiance, he turned on his heel and walked away.

"I have n't done with you yet," said I; and, faith, I kept my word.

"I had n't gone ten yards down the street, when I met my old friend Darby O'Grady."

"Shaugh, my boy," says he—he called me that way for shortness—"dine with me to-day, at Mosey's: a green goose and gooseberries; six to a minute."

"Who have you?"

"Tom Keane and the Wallers, a counsellor or two, and one MacManus from Dublin."

"The Colonel?"

"The same," said he.

"I'm there, Darby!" said I: 'but mind, you never saw me before.'

"What!" said he.

"You never set eyes on me before; mind that."

"I understand," said Darby with a wink, and we parted.

"I certainly was never very particular about dressing for dinner, but on this day I spent a considerable time at my toilet; and, when I looked in my glass at its completion, was well satisfied that I had done myself justice. A waistcoat of brown rabbit-skin with flaps, a red worsted comforter round my neck, an old grey shooting-jacket, with a brown patch on the arm, corduroys and leather gaiters, with a tremendous oak cudgel in my hand, made a most presentable figure for a dinner party.

"Shall I do, Darby?" says I, as he came into my room before dinner.

"If it's for robbing the mail you are," says he, "nothing could be better. Your father would n't know you."

"Would I be the better of a wig?"

"Leave your hair alone," said he. 'It's painting the lily to alter it.'

"Well, God's will be done," says I, 'so come, now.'

"Well, just as the clock struck six I saw the Colonel come out of his room, in a suit of most accurate sable, stockings and pumps. Down stairs he went, and I heard the waiter announce him.

"Now's my time," thought I, as I followed slowly after.

"When I reached the door I heard several voices within, among which I recognized some ladies. Darby had not told me about them: 'but no matter,' said I; 'it's all as well; so I gave a gentle tap at the door with my knuckles.

"Come in," said Darby.

"I opened the door, slowly, and putting in only my head and shoulders, took a cautious look round the room.

"I beg pardon, gentlemen," said I, 'but I was only looking for one Colonel MacManus, and, as he is not here—'

"Pray walk in, sir," said O'Grady with a polite bow. 'Colonel MacManus is here. There's no intrusion whatever. I say, Colonel,' said he, turning round, 'a gentleman here desires to—'

"Never mind it now," said I, as I stepped cautiously into the room; 'he's going to dinner, another time will do just as well.'

"Pray come in."

"I could not think of intruding—"

"I must protest," said MacManus, coloring up, 'that I cannot understand this gentleman's visit.'

"It is a little affair I have to settle with him," said I, with a fierce look, that I saw produced its effect.

"Then perhaps you would do me the very great favor to join him at dinner," said O'Grady. 'Any friend of Colonel MacManus—'

"You are really too good," said I; but, as an utter stranger—"

"Never think of that for a moment. My friend's friend, as the adage says."

"Upon my conscience, a good saying," said I, 'but you see there's another difficulty. I've ordered a chop and potatoes up in No. 5.'

"Let that be no obstacle," said O'Grady. 'The waiter shall put it in my bill; if you will only do me the pleasure.'

"You're a trump," said I. 'What's your name?'

"O'Grady, at your service."

"Any relation of the counsellor," said I. 'They're all one family, the O'Gradies. I'm Mr. O'Shaughnessy, from Ennis; won't you introduce me to the ladies?'

"While the ceremony of presentation was going on, I caught one glance at MacManus, and had hard work not to roar out laughing. Such an expression of surprise, amazement, indignation, rage, and misery, never was mixed up in one face before. Speak he could not; and I saw that, except for myself, he had neither eyes, ears, nor senses for any thing around him. Just at this moment dinner was announced, and in we went. I never was in such spirits in my life: the trick upon MacManus had succeeded perfectly: he believed in his heart that I had never met O'Grady in my life before, and that, upon the faith of our friendship, I had received my invitation. As for me, I spared him but little. I kept up a running fire of droll stories; had the ladies in fits of laughter; made everlasting allusions to the Colonel; and, in a word, ere the soup had disappeared, except himself, the company were entirely with me.

"O'Grady," said I, 'forgive the freedom, but I feel as if we were old acquaintances.'

"As Colonel MacManus's friend," said he, 'you can take no liberty here which is not perfectly welcome.'

"Just what I expected," said I. 'Mac and I,—I wish you saw his face when I called him Mac—Mac and I were school-fellows five-and-thirty years ago; though he forgets me, I don't forget him: to be sure it would be hard for me. I'm just thinking of the day Bishop Oulahan came over to visit the college. Mac was coming in at the door of the refectory as the bishop was going out. "Take off your caubeen, you young scoundrel, and kneel down for his reverence to bless you," said one of the masters, giving him a blow at the same moment that sent it flying to the other end of the room, and, with it, about twenty ripe pears that Mac had just stolen in the orchard, and had in his hat. I wish you only saw the bishop; and Mac himself, he was a picture. Well, well, you forget it all now, but I remember it as if it was only yesterday. Any champagne, Mr. O'Grady, I'm mighty dry?'

"Of course," said Darby. 'Waiter, some champagne here.'

"Ah, it's himself was the boy for every kind of fun and devilment, quiet and demure as he looks over there. Mac, your health. It's not every day of the week we get champagne."

"He laid down his knife and fork as I said this: his face and temples grew deep purple, his eyes started as if they would spring from his head, and he put both his hands to his forehead, as if trying to assure himself that it was not some horrid dream.

"A little slice more of the turkey," said I, 'and then, O'Grady, I'll try your heck. It's wine I'm mighty fond of, and so is Mac there. Oh! it's seldom, to tell the truth, it troubles us. There, fill up the glass; that's it. Here now, Darby—that's your name, I think—you'll not think I'm taking a liberty in giving a toast; here, then, I'll give MacManus's health, with all the honors; though it's early yet, to be sure, but we'll do it again, by-and-by, when the whiskey comes. Here's MacManus's good health; and, though his wife, they say, does not treat him well, and keeps him down—"

"The roar of laughter that interrupted me here, was produced by the expression of poor Mac's face. He had started up from table, and, leaning with both his hands upon it, stared round upon the company like a maniac—his mouth and eyes wide open, and his hair actually bristling with amazement. Thus he remained for a full minute, gasping like a fish in a landing-net. It seemed a hard struggle for him to believe he was not deranged. At last his eyes fell upon me; he uttered a deep groan, and, with a voice tremulous with rage, thundered out—

"The scoundrel! I never saw him before."

"He rushed from the room, and gained the street. Before our roar of laughter was over, he had secured post-horses, and was galloping toward Ennis at the top speed of his cattle.

"He exchanged once into the line; but they say that he caught a glimpse of my name in the army list, and sold out the next morning; be that as it may, we never met since."

I have related O'Shaughnessy's story here, rather from the memory I have of how we all laughed at it at the time, than from any feeling as to its real desert; but, when I think of the voice, look, accent, and gesture of the narrator, I can scarcely keep myself from again giving way to laughter.

CHAPTER XLV.—The Douro.

Never did the morning break more beautifully than on the 12th of May, 1809. Huge masses of fog-like vapor had succeeded to the starry cloudless night, but, one by one, they moved onward toward the sea, disclosing, as they passed, long traces of lovely country, bathed in a rich golden glow. The broad Douro, with its transparent current, shone out like a bright-colored ribbon, meandering through the deep garment of fairest green; the darkly shadowed mountains, which closed the background, loomed even larger than they were; while their summits were tipped with the yellow glew of the morning. The air was calm and still, and the very smoke that arose from the peasant's cot, labored as it ascended through the perfumed air, and, save the ripples of the stream, all was silent as the grave.

The squadrons of the 14th, with which I was, had diverged from the road beside the river, and to obtain a shorter path, had entered the skirts of a dark pine wood; our pace was a sharp one; an orderly had been already despatched to hasten our arrival, and we pressed on at a brisk trot. In less than an hour we reached the verge of the wood, and, as we rode out upon the plain, what a spectacle met our eyes! Before us, in a narrow valley, separated from the river by a narrow ridge, were picketed three cavalry regiments; their noiseless gestures and perfect stillness bespeaking at once, that they were intended for a surprise party. Farther down the stream, and upon the opposite side, rose the massive towers and tall spires of Oporto, displaying from their summits the broad ensign of France; while, far as the eye could reach, the broad dark masses of troops might be seen; the intervals between their columns glittering with the bright equipments of their cavalry, whose steel caps and lances were sparkling in the sunbeams. The bivouac fires were smouldering, and marking where some part of the army had passed the night; for, early as it was, it was evident that their position had been changed; and, even now, the heavy masses of dark infantry might be seen moving from place to place, while the long line of the road to Valonga was marked with a vast cloud of dust. The French drum and the light infantry bugle told, from time to time, that orders were passing among the troops; while the glittering uniform of a staff officer, as he galloped from the town, bespoke the note of preparation.

"Dismount. Steady: quietly, my lads," said the Colonel, as he alighted upon the grass. "Let the men have their breakfast."

The little amphitheatre we occupied, hid us entirely from all observation on the part of the enemy, but equally so excluded us from perceiving their movements. It may readily be supposed, then, with what impatience we waited here, while the din and clangor of the French force, as they marched and countermarched so near us, were clearly audible. The orders were, however, strict that none should approach the bank of the river, and we lay anxiously awaiting the moment when this inactivity should cease. More than one orderly had arrived among us, bearing despatches from head-quarters: but where our main body was, or what the nature of the orders, no one could guess. As for me my excitement was at its height, and I could not speak for the very tension of my nerves. The officers stood in little groups of two and three, whispering anxiously together; but all I could collect was, that Soult had already begun his retreat upon Amarante, and that, with the broad stream of the Douro between us, he defied our pursuit.

"Well, Charley," said Power, laying his arm upon my shoulder, "the French have given us the slip this time; they are already in march, and, even if we dared force a passage, in the face of such an enemy, it seems there is not a boat to be found. I have just seen Hammersly."

"Indeed! Where is he?" said I.

"He's gone back to Ville de Conde: he asked after you most particularly; do n't blush, man: I'd rather back your chance than his, notwithstanding the long letters that Lucy sends him. Poor fellow! he has been badly wounded, but, it seems, declines going back to England."

"Captain Power," said an orderly, touching his cap, "General Murray desires to see you."

Power hastened away, but returned in a few moments.

"I say, Charley, there's something in the wind here. I have just been ordered to try where the stream is fordable. I've mentioned your name to the General, and I think you'll be sent for soon. Good-bye."

I buckled on my sword, and looking at my girths, stood watching the groups around me; when, suddenly, a dragon pulled his horse short up, and asked a man near me if Mr. O'Malley was there?

"Yes; I am he."

"Orders from General Murray, sir," said the man, and rode off at a canter.

I opened and saw that the despatch was addressed to Sir Arthur Wellesley, with the mere words "with haste," on the envelope.

Now which way to turn I knew not; so springing into the saddle, I galloped to where Colonel Merivale was standing talking to the colonel of a heavy dragoon regiment.

"May I ask, sir, by which road I am to proceed with this despatch?"

"By the river, sir," said the heavy; a large dark-browed man, with a most forbidding look. "You'll soon see the troops: you'd better stir yourself, sir, or Sir Arthur is not very likely to be pleased with you."

Without venturing a reply to what I felt a somewhat unnecessary taunt, I dashed spurs to my horse, and turned toward the river. I had not gained the bank above a minute, when the loud ringing of a rifle struck upon my ear: bang went another, and another. I hurried on, however, at the top of my speed, thinking only of my mission and its pressing haste. As I turned an angle of the stream, the vast column of the British came in sight, and scarcely had my eye rested upon them when my horse staggered forward, plunged twice with his head nearly to the earth, and then rearing madly up, fell backward upon the ground. Crushed and bruised as I felt by my fall, I was soon aroused to the necessity of exertion; for, as I disengaged myself from the poor beast, I discovered he had been killed by a bullet in the counter; and scarcely had I recovered my legs when a shot struck my shako and grazed my temples. I quickly threw myself to the ground, and, creeping on for some yards, reached at last some rising ground, from which I rolled gently downward into a little declivity, sheltered by the bank from the French fire.

When I arrived at head-quarters, I was dreadfully fatigued and heated; but resolving not to rest till I had delivered my despatches, I hastened toward the convent of La Sierra, where I was told the Commander-in-chief was.

As I came into the court of the convent, filled with general officers and people of the staff, I was turning to ask how I should proceed, when Hixley caught my eye.

"Well, O'Malley, what brings you here?"

"Despatches from General Murray."

"Indeed! O, follow me."

He hurried me rapidly through the buzzing crowd, and ascending a large gloomy stair, introduced me into a room, where about a dozen persons in uniform were writing at a long deal table.

"Captain Gordon," said he, addressing one of them, "despatches requiring immediate perusal have just been brought by this officer."

Before the sentence was finished the door opened, and a short, slight man, in a gray undress coat, with a white cravat and a cocked hat, entered. The dead silence that ensued was not necessary to assure me he was one in authority; the look of command his bold, stern features presented; the sharp piercing eye; the compressed lip; the impressive expression of the whole face, told plainly that he was one who held equally himself and others in mastery.

"Send General Sherbrooke here," said he to an aid-de-camp. "Let the light brigade march into position," and then, turning suddenly to me, "whose despatches are these?"

"General Murray's, sir."

I needed no more than that look to assure me that this was he of whom I had heard so much, and of whom the world was still to hear so much more.

He opened them quickly, and glancing his eye across the contents, crushed the paper in his hand. Just as he did so, a spot of blood upon the envelope attracted attention.

"How's this? are you wounded?"

"No, sir; my horse was killed—"

"Very well, sir; join your brigade. But, stay, I shall have orders for you. Well, Waters, what news?"

This question was addressed to an officer in a staff uniform, who entered at the moment, followed by the short and bulky figure of a monk, his shaven crown and large cassock strongly contrasting with the gorgeous glitter of the costumes around him.

"I say, who have we here?"

"The Prior of Amarante, sir," replied Waters, "who has just come over. We have already, by his aid, secured three large barges—"

"Let the artillery take up position in the convent at once," said Sir Arthur, interrupting. "The boats will be brought round to the small creek beneath the orchard. You, sir," turning to me, "will convey to General Murray—but you appear weak— You, Gordon, will desire Murray to effect a crossing at Avintas with the Germans and the 11th. Sherbrooke's division will occupy the Villa Nuova. What number of men can the seminary take?"

"From three to four hundred, sir, the padre mentions that all the vigilance of the enemy is limited to the river below the town."

"I perceive it," was the short reply of Sir Arthur, as, placing his hands carelessly behind his back, he walked toward the window and looked out upon the river.

All was still as death in the council: not a lip murmured; the feeling of respect for him in whose presence we were standing, checked every thought of utterance, while the stupendous gravity of the events before us, engrossed every mind and occupied every heart. I was standing near the window; the effect of my fall had stunned me for a time, but I was gradually recovering, and watched with a thrilling heart the scene before me. Great and absorbing as was my interest in what was passing without, it was nothing compared with what I felt as I looked at him upon whom our destiny was then hanging. I had ample time to scan his features and their every lineament. Never before did I look upon such perfect impassibility: the cold determined expression was crossed by no show of passion or impatience. All was rigid and motionless, and, whatever might have been the workings of the spirit within, certainly no external sign betrayed them; and yet what a moment for him must that have been! Before him, separated by a deep and rapid river, lay the conquering legions of France, led on by one second alone to him, whose very name had been the prestige of victory. Unprovided with every regular means of transport, in the broad glare of day, in open defiance of their serried ranks and thundering artillery, he dared the deed. What must have been his confidence in the soldiers he commanded! what must have been his reliance upon his own genius! As such thoughts rushed through my mind, the door opened and an officer entered hastily, and whispering a few words to Colonel Waters, left the room.

"One boat is already brought up to the crossing-place, and entirely concealed by the wall of the orchard."

"Let the men cross," was the brief reply.

No other word was spoken as, turning from the window, he closed his telescope, and, followed by all the others, descended to the court-yard.

This simple order was enough; an officer, with a company of the Buffs, embarked, and thus began the passage of the Douro.

So engrossed was I in my vigilant observation of our leader, that I would gladly have remained at the convent, when I received an order to join my brigade, to which a detachment of artillery was already proceeding.

As I reached Avintas all was in motion. The cavalry was in readiness beside the river; but as yet no boats had been discovered, and, such was the impatience of the men to cross, it was with difficulty they were prevented trying the passage by swimming, when suddenly Power appeared, followed by several fishermen. Three or four small skiffs had been found, half sunk in mud, among the rushes, and with such frail assistance we commenced to cross.

"There will be something to write home to Galway soon, Charley, or I'm terribly mistaken," said Fred, as he sprang into the boat beside me; "Was I not a true prophet when I told you, 'We'd meet the French in the morning!'"

"They're at it already," said Hixley, as a wreath of blue smoke floated across the stream below us, and the loud boom of a large gun resounded through the air.

Then came a deafening shout, followed by a rattling volley of small arms, gradually swelling into a hotly sustained fire, through which the cannon pealed at intervals. Several large meadows lay along the river-side, where our brigade was drawn up as the detachments landed from the boats; and here, although nearly a league distant from the town, we now heard the din and crash of battle, which increased every moment. The cannonade from the Sierra convent, which at first was merely the fire of single guns, now thundered away in one long roll, amid which the sounds of falling walls and crashing roofs was mingled. It was evident to us, from the continual fire kept up, that the landing had been effected, while the swelling tide of musketry told that fresh troops were momentarily coming up.

In less than twenty minutes our brigade was formed, and we now only waited for two light four-pounders to be landed, when an officer galloped up in haste, and called out:

"The French are in retreat," and, pointing at the same moment to the Vallonga road, we saw a long line of smoke and dust leading from the town, through which, as we gazed, the colors of the enemy might be seen, as they defiled, while the unbroken line of the wagons and heavy baggage proved that it was no partial movement, but the army itself retreating.

"Fourteenth, threes about, close up, trot," called out the loud and manly voice of our leader, and the heavy tramp of our squadron shook the very ground, as we advanced toward the road to Vallonga.

As we came on, the scene became one of overwhelming excitement; the masses of the enemy that poured unceasingly from the town could now be distinguished more clearly, and, amid all the crash of gun carriages and caissons, the voices of the staff officers rose high as they hurried along the retreating battalions. A troop of flying artillery galloped forth at top speed, and, wheeling their guns into position with the speed of lightning, prepared by a flanking fire to cover the retreating column. The gunners sprang from their seats, the guns were already unlimbered, when Sir George Murray, riding up at our left, called out: "Forward; close up; charge!"

The word was scarcely spoken, when the loud cheer answered the welcome sound, and the same instant the long line of shining helmets passed with the speed of a whirlwind; the pace increased at every stride, the ranks grew closer, and, like the dread force of some mighty engine, we fell upon the foe. I have felt all the glorious enthusiasm of the fox-hunt, when the loud cry of the hound, answered by the cheer of the joyous huntsman, stirred the very heart within, but never till now did I know how far higher the excitement reaches, when man to man, sabre to sabre, arm to arm, we ride forward to the battle field. On we went, the loud shout of "forward" still ringing in our ears. One broken, irregular discharge from the French guns shook the head of our advancing column, but stayed us not as we galloped madly on.

I remember no more: the din, the smoke, the crash—the cry for quarter, mingled with the shout of victory—the flying enemy—the agonizing shrieks of the wounded—are all co-mingled in my mind, but leave no trace of clearness or connection between them; and it was only when the column wheeled to re-form, behind the advancing squadrons, that I awoke from my trance of maddening excitement, and perceived that we had carried the position, and cut off the guns of the enemy.

"Well done, fourteenth!" said an old gray-headed colonel, as he rode along our line; "gallantly done, lads!" The blood trickled from a sabre cut on his temple, along his cheek, as he spoke; but he either knew it not, or heeded it not.

"There go the Germans!" said Power, pointing to the remainder of our brigade, as they charged furiously upon the French infantry, and rode them down in masses.

Our guns came up at this time, and a plunging fire was opened upon the thick and retreating flanks of the enemy; the carnage must have been terrific, for the long breaches in their lines showed where the squadrons of the cavalry had passed, or the most destructive tide of the artillery had swept through them. The speed of the flying column grew momentarily more; the road became blocked up, too, by broken carriages and wounded; and, to add to their discomfort, a damaging fire now opened from the town upon the retreating column, while the brigade of Guards and the 29th pressed hotly on their rear.

The scene was now beyond any thing maddening in its interest. From the walls of Oporto the English infantry poured forth in pursuit: while the whole river was covered with boats, as they still continued to cross over. The artillery thundered from the Sierra, to protect the landing, for it was even still contested in places; and the cavalry, charging in flank, swept the broken ranks, and bore down upon their squares.

It was now, when the full tide of victory ran highest in our favor, that we were ordered to retire from the road. Column after column passed before us, unmolested and unassailed; and not even a cannon-shot arrested their steps.

Some unaccountable timidity of our leader directed this movement; and, while before our very eyes the gallant infantry were charging the retreating columns, we remained still and inactive.

How little did the sense of praise we had already won repay us for the shame and indignation we experienced at this moment, as, with burning cheek and compressed lip, we watched the retreating files. "What can he mean?" "Is there not some mistake?" "Are we never to charge?" were the muttered questions around, as a staff officer galloped up with the order to take ground still farther back, and nearer to the river.

The word was scarcely spoken, when a young officer, in the uniform of a general, dashed impetuously up; he held his plumed cap high above his head, as he called out, "fourteenth, follow me! Left face—wheel—charge!"

So, with the word, we were upon them. The French rear-guard was at this moment at the narrowest part of the road, which opened by a bridge upon a large open space; so that, forming with a narrow front, and favored by a declivity in the ground, we actually rode them down. Twice the French formed, and twice were they broken. Meanwhile the carnage was dreadful on both sides; our fellows dashing madly forward where the ranks were thickest—the enemy resisting with the stubborn courage of men fighting for their last spot of ground. So impetuous was the charge of our squadrons, that we stopped not till, piercing the dense column of the retreating mass, we reached the open ground beyond. Here we wheeled, and prepared once more to meet them; when suddenly some squadrons of cuirassiers debouched from the road, and, supported by a field-piece, showed front against us. This was the moment that the remainder of our brigade should have come to our aid; but not a man appeared. However, there was not an instant to be lost; already the plunging fire of the four-pounder had swept through our files, and every moment increased our danger.

"Once more, my lads, forward!" cried our gallant leader, Sir Charles Stewart, as, waving his sabre, he dashed into the thickest of the fray.

So sudden was our charge, that we were upon them be fore they were prepared. And here ensued a terrific struggle; for, as the cavalry of the enemy gave way before us, we came upon the close ranks of the infantry at half-pistol distance, who poured a withering volley into us as we approached. But what could arrest the sweeping torrent of our brave fellows, though every moment falling in numbers!

Harvey, our major, lost his arm near the shoulder; scarcely an officer was not wounded. Power received a deep sabre cut in the cheek, from an aid-de-camp of Gen. Foe, in return for a wound he gave the General; while I, in my endeavor to save General Laborde, when unhorsed, was cut down through the helmet, and so stunned that I remembered no more around me: I kept my saddle, it is true, but I lost every sense of consciousness; my first glimmering of reason coming to my aid as I lay upon the river bank, and felt my faithful follower Mike bathing my temples with water, as he kept up a running fire of lamentations for my being murdered so young.

"Are you better, Mister Charles? Spake to me, alannah! say that you're not kilt, darling; do now. Oh, wirra; what'll I ever say to the master? and you doing so beautiful! Would n't he give the best baste in his stable to be looking at you to-day? There, take a sup; it's only water. Bad luck to them, but it's hard work beatin' them; they're only gone now. That's right; now you're coming to."

"Where am I, Mike?"

"It's here you are, darling, resting yourself."

"Well, Charley, my poor fellow, you've got sore bones too," cried Power, as his face swathed in bandages, and covered with blood, he lay upon the grass beside me. "It was a gallant thing while it lasted, but has cost us dearly. Poor Hixley—"

"What of him?" said I, anxiously.

"Poor fellow! he has seen his last battle-field. He fell across me as we came out upon the road: I lifted him up in my arms, and bore him along above fifty yards; but he was stone dead: not a sigh, not a word escaped him; shot through the forehead." As he spoke, his lips trembled, and his voice sunk to a mere whisper at the last words,—"You remember what he said last night—'Poor fellow! he was every inch a soldier.'"

Such was his epitaph.

I turned my head toward the scene of our late encounter: some dismounted guns and broken wagons alone marked the spot; while, far in the distance, the dust of the retreating columns showed the beaten enemy, as they hurried toward the frontiers of Spain.

CHAPTER XLVI....The Morning.

There are few sadder things in life than the day after a battle. The high-beating hope, the bounding spirits, have passed away; and in their stead comes the depressing reaction by which every overwrought excitement is followed. With far different eyes do we look upon the compact ranks and glistening files,

With helm arrayed,
And lance and blade,
And plume in the gay wind dance:

and upon the cold and barren heath, whose only memory of the past is the blood-stained turf, a mangled corpse, the broken gun, the shattered wall, the well-trodden earth where columns stood, the cut-up ground where cavalry had charged: these are the sad relics of all the chivalry of yesterday.

The morning which followed the battle of the Douro was one of the most beautiful I remember. There was that kind of freshness and elasticity in the air which certain days possess, and communicate by some magic their properties to ourselves. The thrush was singing gayly out from every grove and wooded dell; the very river had a sound of gladness as it rippled on against its sedgy banks; the foliage, too, sparkled in the fresh dew, as if in its robes of holiday, and all looked bright and happy.

We were picketed near the river, upon a gently rising ground, from which the view extended for miles in every direction. Above us, the stream came winding down amid broad and fertile fields of tall grass and waving corn, backed by deep and mellow woods, which were lost to the view upon the distant hills: below, the river, widening as it went, pursued a straighter course, or turned with bolder curves, till, passing beneath the town, it spread into a large sheet of glassy water, as it opened to the sea. The sun was just rising as I looked upon this glorious scene, and already the tall spires of Oporto were tipped with a bright rosy hue, while the massive towers and dark walls threw their lengthened shadows across the plain.

The fires of the bivouac still burned; but all slept around them; not a sound was heard, save the tramp of a patrol, or the short quick cry of the sentry. I sat lost in meditation, or rather in that state of dreamy thoughtfulness in which the past and the present are combined, and the absent are alike before us as the things we look upon.

One moment I felt as though I were describing to my uncle the battle of the day before, pointing out where we stood, and how we charged: then again I was at home beside the broad bleak Shannon, and the brown hills of Scariff. I watched with beating heart the tall Sierra, where our path lay for the future, and then turned my thoughts to him whose name was so soon to be received in England with a nation's pride and gratitude; and panted for a soldier's glory.

As thus I followed every rising fancy, I heard a step approach: it was a figure muffled in a cavalry cloak, which I soon perceived to be Power.

"Charley!" said he, in a half-whisper, "get up and come with me. You are aware of the general order, that, while in pursuit of an enemy, all military honors to the dead are forbidden; but we wish to place our poor comrade in the earth before we leave."

I followed down a little path, through a grove of tall beech trees that opened upon a little grassy terrace beside the river. A stunted olive tree stood by itself in the midst, and there I found five of our brother officers standing, wrapped in their wide cloaks. As we pressed each other's hands, not a word was spoken: each heart was full; and hard features that never quailed before the foe were now shaken with the convulsive spasm of agony, or compressed with stern determination to seem calm.

A cavalry helmet and a large blue cloak lay upon the grass. The narrow grave was already dug beside it; and, in the deathlike stillness around, the service for the dead was read: the last words were over; we stooped and placed the corpse, wrapped up in the broad mantle, in the earth; we replaced the mould, and stood silently around the spot. The trumpet of our regiment at this moment sounded the call; its clear notes ran sharply through the thin air: it was the soldier's requiem! and we turned away without speaking, and returned to our quarters.

I had never known poor Hixley till a day or two before, but somehow my grief for him was deep and heartfelt. It was not that his frank and manly bearing, his bold and military air, had gained upon me. No, these were indeed qualities to attract and delight me; but he had obtained a stronger and faster hold upon my affections: he spoke to me of home!

Of all the ties that bind us to the chance acquaintances we meet with in life, what can equal this one? What a claim upon your love has he who can, by some passing word, some fast-fitting thought, bring back the days of your youth? What interest can he not excite by some anecdote of your boyish days, some well-remembered trait of youthful daring, or early enterprise? Many a year of sunshine and of storm has passed above my head; I have not been without my moments of gratified pride, and rewarded ambition; but my heart has never responded so fully, so thankfully, so proudly to these—as they were—as to the simple, touching words of one who knew my early home and loved its inmates.

"Well, Fitzroy, what news?" inquired I, roused from my musing, as an aid-de-camp galloped up at full speed.

"Tell Merivale to get the regiment under arms at once. Sir Arthur Wellesley will be here in less than half an hour. You may look for the route immediately. Where are the Germans quartered?"

"Lower down; beside the grove of beech trees, next the river."

Scarcely was my reply spoken when he dashed spurs to his horse, and was soon out of sight. Meanwhile, the plain beneath me presented an animated and splendid spectacle. The different corps were falling into position to the calving sounds of their quick-step, the trumpets of the cavalry rang loudly through the valley, and the clatter of sabres and sabretaches, joined with the hollow tramp of horses, as the squadrons came up.

I had not a moment to lose; so, hastening back to my quarters, I found Mike waiting with my horse.

"Captain Power's before you, sir," said he, "and you'll have to make haste: the regiments are under arms already."

From the little mound where I stood, I could see the long line of cavalry as they deployed into the plain, followed by the horse artillery, which brought up the rear.

"This looks like a march," thought I, as I pressed forward to join my companions.

I had not advanced above a hundred yards through a narrow ravine when the measured tread of infantry fell upon my ears. I pulled up to slacken my pace, just as the head of a column turned round the angle of the road and came in view. The tall caps of a grenadier company were the first thing I beheld, as they came on without roll of drum and sound of file. I watched with a soldier's pride the manly bearing and gallant step of the dense mass as they defined before me. I was struck no less by them than by a certain look of steady and sombre cast which each man wore.

"What can this mean?" thought I.

My first impression was, that a military execution was about to take place: the next moment solved my doubt; for, as the last files of the grenadiers wheeled round, a dense mass behind came in sight, whose unarmed hands, and downcast air, at once bespoke them prisoners of war.

What a sad sight it was! There was the old and weather-beaten grenadier, erect in frame and firm in step, his gray moustache scarcely concealing the scowl that curled his lip, handcuffed with the young and daring conscript, even yet a mere boy: their march was regular, their gaze steadfast; no look of flinching courage there. On they came, a long unbroken line. They looked not less proudly than their captors around them. As I looked with heavy heart upon them, my attention was attracted to one who marched alone behind the rest. He was a middle-sized but handsome youth of some eighteen years at most: his light helmet and waving plume bespoke him a chasseur à cheval, and I could scarcely perceive, in his careless, half-saucy air, how indignantly he felt the position to which the fate of war had reduced him. He caught my eyes fixed upon him, and, for an instant, turned upon me a gaze of open and palpable defiance, drawing himself up to his full height and crossing his arms upon his breast; but, probably, perceiving in my look more of interest than triumph, his countenance suddenly changed, a deep blush suffused his cheek, his eye beamed with a softened and kindly expression, and carrying his hand to his helmet, he saluted me, saying, in a voice of singular sweetness, "Je vous souhaite un meilleur sort, camarade."

I bowed, and muttering something in return, was about to make some inquiry concerning him, when the loud call of the trumpet rang through the valley, and apprized me that, in my interest for the prisoners, I had forgotten all else, and was probably incurring censure for my absence.

CHAPTER XLVII....The Review.

When I joined the group of my brother officers, who stood gayly chattering and laughing together before our lines, I was much surprised—nay, almost shocked—to find how little seeming impression had been made upon them by the sad duty we had performed that morning.

When last we met, each eye was downcast, each heart was full: sorrow for him we had lost from among us for ever, mingling with the awful sense of our own uncertain tenure here, had laid its impress on each brow; but now, scarcely an hour elapsed, and all were cheerful and elated. The last shovelful of earth upon the grave seemed to have buried both the dead and the mourning. And such is war! and such the temperament it forms! Events so strikingly opposite in their character and influences succeed so rapidly one upon another, that the mind is kept in one whirl of excitement and at length accustoms itself to change with every phase of circumstances; and between joy and grief, hope and despondency, enthusiasm and depression, there is neither breadth nor interval: they follow each other as naturally as morning succeeds to night.

I had not much time for such reflections: scarcely had I saluted the officers about me, when the loud prolonged roll of the drums along the line of infantry in the valley, followed by the sharp clatter of muskets as they were raised to the shoulder, announced the troops were under arms and the review begun.

"Have you seen the general order this morning, Power?" inquired an old officer beside me.

"No; they say, however, that our sars mentioned."

"Harvey is going on favorably," cried a young cornet, as he galloped up to our party.

"Take ground to the left!" sung out the clear voice of the Colonel, as he rode along in front. "Fourteenth! I am happy to inform you that your conduct has met approval in the highest quarter. I have just received the general orders, in which this occurs:

"The timely passage of the Douro, and subsequent movements upon the enemy's flank, by Lieutenant-General Sherbrooke, with the Guards and 29th Regiment, and the bravery of the two squadrons of the 14th Light Dragoons, under the command of Major Harvey, and led by the Honorable Brigadier General Charles Stewart, obtained the victory."—Mark that, my lads!—obtained the victory—"which has contributed so much to the honor of the troops on this day."

The words were hardly spoken, when a tremendous cheer burst from the whole line at once.

"Steady, Fourteenth! steady, lads!" said the gallant old Colonel, as he raised his hand gently; "the staff is approaching."

At the same moment, the white plumes appeared rising above the brow of the hill. On they came, glittering in all the splendor of aiguillettes and orders; all, save one. He rode foremost, upon a small, compact, black horse; his dress, a plain gray frock, fastened at the waist by a red sash; his cocked hat alone bespoke, in its plume, the general officer. He galloped rapidly on till he came to the centre of the line: then, turning short around, he scanned the ranks from end to end with an eagle glance.

"Colonel Merivale, you have made known to your regiment my opinion of them, as expressed in general orders!"

The Colonel bowed low in acquiescence.

"Fitzroy, you have got the memorandum, I hope?"

The aid-de-camp here presented to Sir Arthur a slip of paper, which he continued to regard attentively for some minutes.

"Captain Powell—Power, I mean. Captain Power!"

Power rode out from the line.

"Your very distinguished conduct yesterday has been reported to me. I shall have sincere pleasure in forwarding your name for the vacant majority."

"You have forgotten, Colonel Merivale, to send in the name of the officer who saved General Laborde's life."

"I believe I have mentioned it, Sir Arthur. Mr. O'Malley."

"True, I beg pardon; so you have—Mr. O'Malley: a very young officer indeed—ha, an Irishman! the south of Ireland, eh?"

"No, sir, the west."

"Oh! yes. Well, Mr. O'Malley, you are promoted. You have the lieutenantancy in your own regiment. By-the-by, Merivale,"—here his voice changed into a half laugh and tone, "ere I forget it, pray let me beg of you to look in this honest fellow's claim; he has given me no peace the entire morning."

As he spoke I turned my eyes in the direction he pointed, and, to my utter consternation beheld my man Mickey Free standing among the staff; the position he occupied, and the presence he stood in, having no more perceptible effect upon his nerves than if he were assisting at an Irish wake: but so completely was I overwhelmed with shame at the moment, that the staff were already far down the lines, ere I recovered my self-possession, to which, certainly, I was in some degree recalled by Master Mike's addressing me in a somewhat imploring voice:

"Arrah, spake for me, Master Charles, alannah; sure they might do something for me now, av it was only to make me a gauger."

Mickey's ideas of promotion, thus insinuatingly put forward, threw the whole party around into one burst of laughter.

"I have him down there," said he, pointing as he spoke to a thick grove of cork trees at a little distance.

"Who have you got there, Mike?" inquired Power.

"Devil a one o' me knows his name," replied he; "maybe it's Bony himself."

"And how do you know he's there still?"

"How do I know, is it? Did n't I tie him last night?"

Curiosity to find out what Mickey could possibly allude to, induced Power and myself to follow him down the slope to the clump of trees I have mentioned. As we came near, the very distinct denunciations that issued from the thicket, proved pretty plainly the nature of the affair. It was nothing less than a French officer of cavalry, that Mike had unhorsed in the mêlée, and wishing, probably, to preserve some testimony of his prowess, had made prisoner, and tied fast to a cork tree, the preceding evening.

"Sacrebleu!" said the poor Frenchman, as we approached, "que ce sont des sauvages!"

"Av it's making your sowl, ye are," said Mike, "you're right; for, maybe, they won't let me keep you alive."

Mike's idea of a tame prisoner threw me into a fit of laughing, while Power asked,

"And what do you want to do with him?"

"The sorra one o' me knows, for he spakes no decent tongue. Theginn thou," said he, addressing the prisoner, with a poke in the ribs at the same moment: "but sure, Master Charles, he might tache me French."

There was something so irresistibly ludicrous in his tone and look as he said these words, that both Power and myself absolutely roared with laughter. We began, however, to feel not a little ashamed of our position in the business, and explained to the Frenchman, that our worthy countryman had but little experience of the usages of war, while we proceeded to unbind him, and liberate him from his miserable bondage.

"It's letting him loose, you are, Captain? Master Charles, take care: begorra, av you had as much trouble in catching him as I had, you'd think twice about letting him out. Listen to me, now,"—here he placed his closed fist within an inch of the poor prisoner's nose;—"listen to me: as you say pleas, by the mortel, I'll not lave a whole bone in your skin."

With some difficulty we persuaded Mike that his conduct, so far from leading to his promotion, might, if known in another quarter, procure him an acquaintance with the provost marshal, a fact which, it was plain to perceive, gave him but a very poor impression of military gratitude.

"Oh, then, if they were in swarms forment me, devil receive the prisoner I'll take again."

So saying, he slowly returned to the regiment, while Power and I, having conducted the Frenchman to the rear, cantered toward the town to learn the news of the day.

The city on that day presented a most singular aspect—the streets, filled with the town's-people and the soldiery, were decorated with flags and garlands—the cafés were crowded with merry groups, and the sounds of music and laughter resounded on all sides. The houses seemed to be inadequate to afford accommodation to the numerous guests, and, in consequence, bullock cars and forage wagons were converted into temporary hotels, and many a jovial party were collected in both. Military music, church bells, drinking chorusses, were all commingled in the din and turmoil; processions in honor of our "Lady of Succor," were jammed up among bacchanalian orgies, and their very chaunt half-drowned in the cries of the wounded, as they passed on to the hospitals. With difficulty we pushed our way through the dense mob, as we turned our steps toward the seminary. We both felt naturally curious to see the place where our first detachment landed, and to examine the opportunities of defence it presented. The building itself was a large and irregular one, of an oblong form, surrounded by a high wall of solid masonry, the only entrance being by a heavy iron gate.

At this spot the battle appeared to have raged with violence; one side of the massive gate was torn from its hinges, and lay flat upon the ground; the walls were breached in many places: and pieces of torn uniforms, broken bayonets, and bruised shakos, attested that the conflict was a close one. The seminary itself was in a falling state; the roof, from which Paget had given his orders, and where he was wounded, had fallen in. The French cannon had fissured the building from top to bottom, and it seemed only awaiting the slightest impulse to crumble it to ruin. When we regarded the spot, and examined the narrow doorway which, opening upon a flight of a few steps to the river, admitted our first party, we could not help feeling struck anew with the gallantry of that mere handful of brave fellows, who thus threw themselves amid the overwhelming legions of the enemy, and at once, without waiting for a single reinforcement, opened a fire upon their ranks. Bold as the enterprise unquestionably was, we still felt with what consummate judgment it had been planned; a bend of the river concealed, entirely, the passage of the troops, the guns of the Sierra covered their landing, and completely swept one approach to the seminary. The French, being thus obliged to attack by the gate, were compelled to make a considerable detour before they reached it, all of which gave time for our division to cross, while the brigade of Guards, under General Sherbrooke, profiting by the confusion, passed the river below the town, and took the enemy unexpectedly in the rear.

Brief as was the struggle within the town, it must have been a terrific one; the artillery were firing at musket range; cavalry and infantry were fighting hand to hand in narrow streets, a destructive musketry pouring all the while from windows and house tops.

At the Amaranthe gate, where the French defiled, the carnage was also great: their light artillery unlimbered some guns here, to cover the columns as they deployed; but Murray's cavalry having carried these, the flank of the infantry became entirely exposed to the galling fire of small arms from the seminary, and the far more destructive shower of grape that poured unceasingly from the Sierra.

Our brigade did the rest; and in less than one hour from the landing of the first man, the French were in full retreat upon Vallonga.

"A glorious thing, Charley," said Power, after a pause, "and a proud souvenir for hereafter."

A truth I felt deeply at the time, and one my heart responds to not less fully as I am writing.

CHAPTER XLVIII....The Quarrel.

On the evening of the 12th, orders were received for the German brigade and three squadrons of our regiment to pursue the French upon the Terracina road, by day-break on the following morning.

I was busily occupied in my preparations for a hurried march, when Mike came up to say that an officer desired to speak with me; and the moment after, Captain Hammersly appeared. A sudden flash colored his pale and sickly features, as he held out his hand, and said:

"I've come to wish you joy, O'Malley; I just this instant heard of your promotion. I am sincerely glad of it; pray tell me the whole affair."

"This is the very thing I am unable to do. I have some very vague, indistinct remembrance of warding off a sabre cut from the head of a wounded and unhorsed officer, in the mêlée of yesterday; but more I know not. In fact, it was my first day under fire: I've a tolerably clear recollection of all the events of the morning; but the word 'charge' once given, I remember very little more. But you, where have you been? How have we not met before?"

"I've exchanged into a heavy dragoon regiment, and am now employed upon the staff."

"You are aware that I have letters for you?"

"Power hinted, I think, something of the kind; I saw him very hurriedly."

"These words were spoken with an effort at nonchalance that evidently cost him much."

As for me, my agitation was scarcely less, as fumbling for some seconds in my portmanteau, I drew forth the long destined packet. As I placed it in his hands, he grew deadly pale, and a slight spasmodic twitch in his upper lip bespoke some unusual struggle. He broke the seal suddenly, and, as he did so, the morocco case of a miniature fell upon the ground. His eyes ran rapidly across the letter; the livid color of his lips, as the blood forced itself to them, added to the corpse-like hue of his countenance.

"You, probably are aware of the contents of this letter, Mr. O'Malley?" said he, in an altered voice, whose tones, half in anger, half in suppressed irony, cut to my very heart.

"I am in complete ignorance of them," said I calmly.

"Indeed, sir!" replied he, with a sarcastic curl of his mouth as he spoke. "Then, perhaps, you will tell me, too, that your success is a secret to you."

"I'm really not aware—"

"You think, probably, sir, that the pastime is an amusing one, to interfere where the affections of others are concerned. I've heard of you, sir; your conduct at Lisbon is known to me; and though Captain Trevyllian may bear—"

"Stop, Captain Hammersly!" said I, with a tremendous effort to be calm: "Stop! you have said enough, quite enough to convince me of what your object was in seeking me here to-day. You shall not be disappointed. I trust that assurance will save you from any further display of temper."

"I thank you: most humbly I thank you for the quickness of your apprehension; and I shall now take my leave. Good evening, Mr. O'Malley. I wish you much joy: you have my very fullest congratulations upon all your good fortune."

The sneering emphasis the last words were spoken with remained fixed in my mind long after his departure; and, indeed, so completely did the whole seem like a dream to me, that, were it not for the fragments of the miniature that lay upon the ground, where he crushed them with his heel, I could scarcely credit myself that I was awake.

My first impulse was to seek Power, upon whose judgment and discretion I could with confidence rely.

I had not long to wait: for scarcely had I thrown my cloak around me, when he rode up. He had just seen Hammersly, and learned something of our interview.

"Why Charley my dear fellow! what is this? How have you treated poor Hammersly?"

"Treated him! say rather how has he treated me?"

I here entered into a short, but accurate detail of our meeting; during which, Power listened with great composure while I could perceive, from the questions he asked, that some very different impression had been previously made on his mind.

"And this was all that passed?"

"All."

"But what of the business at Lisbon?"

"I do not understand."

"Why he speaks—he has heard some foolish account of your having made some ridiculous speech there, about your successful rivalry of him in Ireland—Lucy Dashwood, I suppose, is referred to. Some one was good-natured enough to repeat the thing to him."

"But it never occurred: I never did."

"Are you sure, Charley?"

"I am sure: I know I never did."

"The poor fellow, he has been duped! Come, Charley, you must not take it ill. Poor Hammersly has never recovered from a sabre wound he received some months since upon the head: his intellects are really affected by it. Leave it all to me: promise not to leave your quarters till I return; and I'll put everything right again."

I gave the required pledge, while Power, springing into the saddle, left me to my own reflections.

My frame of mind, as Power left me, was by no means an enviable one. A quarrel is rarely a happy incident in one's life, still less is it so when the difference arises with one we are disposed to like and respect. Such was Hammersly: his manly, straightforward character had won my esteem and regard, and it was with no common scrutiny I tasked my memory to think what could have given rise to the impression he labored under, of my having injured him. His chance mention of Trevyllian suggested to me some suspicion that his dislike of me, wherefore arising I knew not, might have a share in the matter; and in this state of doubt and uncertainty, I paced impatiently up and down, anxiously watching for Power's return, in the hope of at length getting some real insight into the difficulty.

My patience was fast ebbing, Power had been absent above an hour, and no appearance of him could I detect, when suddenly the tramp of a horse came rapidly up the hill. I looked out, and saw a rider coming forward at a very fast pace. Before I had time for even a guess as to who it was, he drew up, and I recognised Captain Trevyllian. There was a certain look of easy impertinence and half-smiling satisfaction about his features I had never seen before, as he touched his cap in salute and said—

"May I have the honor of a few words' conversation with you?"

I bowed slightly, while he dismounted, and passing his bridle beneath his arm, walked on beside me.

"My friend, Captain Hammersly, has commissioned me to wait upon you about this unpleasant affair."

"I beg pardon for the interruption, Captain Trevyllian, but as I have yet to learn to what you or your friend alludes, perhaps it may facilitate matters if you will explicitly state your meaning."

He grew crimson on the cheek as I said this, while, with a voice perfectly unmoved, he continued:

"I am not sufficiently in my friend's confidence to know the whole of the affair in question, nor have I his permission to enter into any of it, he probably presuming, as I certainly did myself, that your own sense of honor would have deemed further parley and discussion both unnecessary and unseasonable."

"In fact, then, if I understand, it is expected that I should meet Captain Hammersly for some reason unknown?"

"He certainly desires a meeting with you," was the dry reply.

"And as certainly I shall not give it, before understanding upon what grounds."

"And such I am to report as your answer," said he, looking at me at the moment with an expression of ill-repressed triumph as he spoke.

There was something in these few words, as well as in the tone in which they were spoken, that sunk deeply in my heart. Was it that by some trick of diplomacy he was endeavoring to compromise my honor and character? was it possible that my refusal might be construed in any other than the real cause? I was too young, too inexperienced in the world to decide the question for myself, and no time was allowed me to seek another's counsel. What a trying moment was that for me: my temples throbbed, my heart beat almost audibly, and I stood almost afraid to speak; dreading, on the one hand, lest my compliance might involve me in an act to inhibit my life for ever, and fearful, on the other, that my refusal might be reported as a trait of cowardice.

He saw, he read my difficulty at a glance, and, with a smile of most supercilious expression, repeated coolly his former question. In an instant all thought of Hammersly was forgotten. I remembered no more. I saw him before me; he who had, since my first meeting, continually contrived to pass some inappreciable slight upon me. My eyes flashed, my hands tingled with ill-repressed rage, as I said—

"With Captain Hammersly I am conscious of no quarrel, nor have I ever shown by any act or look an intention to provoke one. Indeed, such demonstrations are not always successful; there are persons most rigidly scrupulous of a friend's honor, little disposed to guard their own."

"You mistake," said he, interrupting me, as I spoke these words with a look as insulting as I could make it; "you mistake. I have sworn a solemn oath never to send a challenge."

The emphasis upon the word "send," explained fully his meaning, when I said—

"But you will not decline?"

"Most certainly not," said he, again interrupting, while with sparkling eye and elated look he drew himself up to his full height. "Your friend is—"

"Captain Power: and yours?"

"Sir Harry Beaumont. I may observe that as the troops are in marching order, the matter had better not be delayed."

"There shall be none on my part."

"Nor mine," said he, as with a low bow, and a look of most ineffable triumph, he sprang into his saddle; "then au revoir, Mr. O'Malley," said he, gathering up his reins; "Beaufort is on the staff, and quartered at Oporto," so saying, he cantered easily down the slope, and once more I was alone.

CHAPTER XLIX....The Route.

I was leisurely examining my pistols—poor Considine's last present to me on leaving home—when an orderly sergeant rode rapidly up, and delivered into my hands the following order:

"Lieutenant O'Malley will hold himself in immediate readiness to proceed on a particular service. By order of his Excellency the Commander of the forces."

[Signed,] S. GORDON, Military Secretary.

"What can this mean?" I thought I. "It is not possible that any rumor of my intended meeting could have got abroad, and that my present destination could be intended as a punishment?"

I walked hurriedly to the door of the little hut which formed my quarters; below me, in the plain, all was activity and preparation; the infantry were drawn up in marching order; baggage wagons, ordnance stores, and artillery seemed all in active preparation, and some cavalry squadrons might be already seen, with forage allowances behind the saddle, as if only waiting the order to set out. I strained my eyes to see if Power was coming, but no horseman approached in the direction. I stood, and I hesitated whether I should not rather seek him at once, than to wait on in my present uncertainty; but, then, what if I should miss him? and I pledged myself to remain till he returned.

While I deliberated thus with myself, weighing the various chances for and against each plan, I saw two mounted officers coming toward me at a brisk trot. As they came nearer, I recognised one as my colonel: the other was an officer of the staff.

Supposing that their mission had some relation to the order I had so lately received, and which, until now, I had forgotten, I hastily returned, and ordered Mike to my presence.

"How are the horses, Mike?" said I.

"Never better, sir. Budger was wounded slightly by a spent shot in the counter, but he's never the worse this morning, and the black horse is capering like a filly."

"Get ready my pack, feed the cattle, and be prepared to set out at a moment's warning."

"Good advice, O'Malley," said the colonel, as he overheard the last direction to my servant. "I hope the nags are in condition."

"Why, yes, sir; I believe they are."

"All the better; you've a sharp ride before you. Meanwhile, let me introduce my friend; Captain Beaumont, Mr. O'Malley. I think we had better be seated."

"These are your instructions, Mr. O'Malley," said Captain Beaumont, unfolding a map as he spoke. "You will proceed from this, with half a troop of your regiment, by forced marches, toward the frontier, passing through the town of Calenoco, and Guarda, and the Estrella pass. On arriving at the head-quarters of the Lusitanian Legion, which you will find there, you are to put yourself under the orders of Major Monsoon, commanding that force. Any Portuguese cavalry he may have with him, will be attached to yours, and under your command; your rank, for the time, being that of captain. You will, as far as possible, acquaint yourself with the habits and capabilities of the native cavalry, and make such report as you judge necessary thereupon to his Excellency the Commander of the Forces. I think it only fair to add, that you are indebted to my friend Colonel Merivale for the very flattering position thus opened to your skill and enterprise."

"My dear Colonel, let me assure you—"

"Not a word, my boy. I knew the thing would suit you, and I am sure I can count upon your not disappointing my expectations of you. Sir Arthur perfectly remembers your name: he only asked two questions:

"Is he well mounted?"

"Admirably," was my answer.

"Can you depend upon his promptitude?"

"He'll leave in half an hour."

"So you see, O'Malley, I have already pledged myself for you; and now I must say adieu: the regiments are about to take up a more advanced position; so good-bye. I hope you'll have a pleasant time of it till we meet again."

"It is now twelve o'clock, Mr. O'Malley," said Beaumont: "we may rely upon your immediate departure. Your written instructions and despatches will be here within a quarter of an hour."

I muttered something—what, I cannot remember; I bowed my thanks to my worthy colonel, shook his hand warmly, and saw him ride down the hill, and disappear in the crowd of soldiery before I could recall my faculties, and think over my situation.

Then, all at once, did the full difficulty of my position break suddenly upon me. If I accepted my present employment, I must certainly fail in my engagement to Trevisan; but I had already pledged myself to its acceptance. What was to be done? No time was left for deliberation. The very minutes I should have spent in preparation were fast passing. Would that Power might appear. Alas! he came not. My state of doubt and uncertainty increased every moment. I saw nothing but ruin before me, even at a moment when fortune promised most fairly for the future, and opened a field of enterprise my heart had so often and so ardently desired. Nothing was left me but to hasten to Colonel Merivale and decline my appointment: to do so, was to prejudice my character in his estimation for ever; for I dared not allege my reasons, and, in all probability, my conduct might require my leaving the army.

"Be it so, then," said I, in an accent of despair; "the die is cast."

I ordered my horse round. I wrote a few words to Power, to explain my absence, should he come while I was away, and leaped into the saddle. As I reached the plain my pace became a gallop, and I pressed my horse with all the impatience my heart was burning with. I dashed along the lines toward Oporto, neither hearing nor seeing aught around me, when suddenly the clank of cavalry accoutrements behind induced me to turn my head, and I perceived an orderly dragoon at full gallop, in pursuit. I pulled up till he came alongside.

"Lieutenant O'Malley, sir," said the man saluting, "these despatches are for you."

I took them hurriedly, and was about to continue my route, when the attitude of the dragoon arrested my attention. He had reined in his horse to the side of the narrow causeway, and, holding him still and steadily, sat motionless as a statue. I looked behind, and saw the whole staff approaching at a brisk trot. Before I had a moment for thought they were beside me.

"Ah! O'Malley," cried Merivale, "you have your orders; do not wait; his Excellency is coming up."

"Get along, I advise you," said another, "or you'll catch it, as some of us have done this morning."

"All is right, Charley; you can go in safety," said a whispering voice, as Power passed in a sharp canter.

That one sentence was enough; my heart bounded like a deer, my cheek beamed with the glow of delighted pleasure, I closed my spur upon my gallant gray, and dashed across the plain.

When I arrived at my quarters the men were drawn up in waiting, and provided with rations for three days' march; Mike was also prepared for the road, and nothing more remained to delay me.

"Captain Power has been here, sir, and left a note."

I took it and thrust it hastily into my sabretasch. I knew from the few words he had spoken, that my present step involved me in no ill consequences; so, giving the word to wheel into column, I rode to the front, and set out upon my march to Alcantara.

CHAPTER L. The Watch-Fire.

There are few things so inspiring to a young soldier, as the being employed with a separate command: the picket and out-post duty have a charm for him no other portion of his career possesses. The field seems open for individual boldness and heroism: success, if obtained, must redound to his own credit; and what can equal, in spirit-stirring enthusiasm, that first moment when we become in any way the arbiters of our fortunes?

Such were my happy thoughts, as, with a proud and elated heart, I set forth upon my march. The notice the commander-in-chief had bestowed upon me had already done much: it had raised me in my own estimation, and implanted within me a longing desire for further distinction. I thought, too, of those far, far away, who were yet to hear of my successes.

I fancied to myself how they would severally receive the news. My poor uncle, with tearful eye and quivering lip, was before me, as I saw him read the despatch, then wipe his glasses, and read on, till at last, with one long-drawn breath his manly voice, tremulous with emotion, would break forth—"My boy! my own Charley!" Then I pictured Considine, with port erect, and stern features, listening silently; not a syllable, not a motion, betraying that he felt interested in my fate, till, as if impatient, at length, he would break in—"I knew it—I said so; and yet you thought to make him a lawyer!" And then old Sir Harry: his warm heart glowing with pleasure, and his good-humored face beaming with happiness. How many a blunder he would make in retelling the news, and how many a hearty laugh his version of it would give rise to.

I passed in review before me the old servants, as they lingered in the room to hear the story. Poor old Matthew, the butler, fumbling with his corkscrew to gain a little time; then looking in my uncle's face, half entreatingly, as he asked—"Any news of Master Charles, sir, from the wars?"

While thus my mind wandered back to the scenes and faces of my early home, I feared to ask myself how she would feel to whom my heart was now turning? Too deeply did I know how poor my chances were in that quarter to nourish hope, and yet I could not bring myself to abandon it altogether. Hammersley's strange conduct suggested to me that he, at least, could not be my rival, while I plainly perceived that he regarded me as his. There was a mystery in all this I could not fathom, and I ardently longed for my next meeting with Power, to learn the nature of his interview, and also in what manner the affair had been arranged.

Such were my passing thoughts as I pressed forward. My men, picked no less for themselves than their horses, came rapidly along; and ere evening, we had accomplished twelve leagues of our journey.

The country through which we journeyed, though wild and romantic in its character, was singularly rich and fertile—cultivation reaching to the very summits of the rugged mountains, and patches of wheat and Indian corn peeping amid masses of granite rock and tangled brushwood: the vine and the olive grew wild on every side; while the orange and the arbutus, loading the air with perfume, were mingled with prickly-pear trees and variegated hollies. We followed no regular track, but cantered along over hill and valley, through forest and prairie: now in long file through some tall field of waving corn, now in open order upon some level plain; our Portuguese guide riding a little in advance of us, upon a jet black mule, carolling merrily some wild Gallician melody as he went.

As the sun was setting, we arrived beside a little stream, that, flowing along a rocky bed, skirted a vast forest of tall cork trees. Here we called a halt; and, picketing our horses, proceeded to make our arrangements for a bivouac.

Never do I remember a more lovely night: the watch-fires sent up a delicious odor from the perfumed shrubs; while the glassy water reflected on its still surface the starry sky that, unshadowed and unclouded, stretched above us. I wrapped myself in my trooper's mantle, and lay down beneath a tree—but not to sleep: there was a something so exciting, and withal so tranquillizing, that I had no thought of slumber, but fell into a musing reverie. There was a character of adventure in my position that charmed me much. My men were gathered in little groups beside the fires; some sunk in slumber, others sat smoking silently, or chatting, in a low and undertone, of some bygone scene of battle or bivouac; here and there were picketed the horses; the heavy panoply and piled carbines flickering in the red glare of the watch-fires, which ever and anon threw a flitting glow upon the stern and swarthy faces of my bold troopers. Upon the trees around, sabres and helmets, holsters and cross-belts, were hung like armorial bearings in some antique hall, the dark foliage spreading its heavy shadow around us. Farther off, upon a little rocky ledge, the erect figure of the sentry, with his short carbine resting in the hollow of his arm, was seen slowly pacing in measured tread, or standing for a moment silently, as he looked upon the fair and tranquil sky—his thoughts doubtless far, far away, beyond the sea, some humble home, where—

"The hum of the spreading sycamore,

That grew beside his cottage door," was again in his ears, while the merry laugh of his children stirred his bold heart. It was a Salvator Rosa scene, and brought me back in fancy to the bandit legends I had read in boyhood. By the uncertain light of the wood-embers I endeavored to sketch the group that lay before me.

The night wore on. One by one the soldiers stretched themselves to sleep, and all was still. As the hours rolled by, a drowsy feeling crept gradually over me: I placed my pistols by my side, and, having replenished the fire by some fresh logs, disposed myself comfortably before it.

It was during that half-dreamy state that intervenes between waking and sleep, that a rustling sound of the branches behind attracted my attention. The air was too calm to attribute this to the wind, so I listened for some minutes; but sleep, too long deferred, was over-powerful and my head sunk upon my grassy pillow, and I was soon sound asleep. How long I remained so I know not; but I awoke suddenly. I fancied some one had shaken me rudely by the shoulder; but yet all was tranquil; my men were sleeping soundly as I saw them last; the fires were becoming low, and a gray streak in the sky, as well as a sharp, cold feeling in the air, betokened the approach of day. Once more I heaped some dry branches together, and was about again to stretch myself to rest, when I felt a hand upon my shoulder. I turned quickly round, and, by the imperfect light of the fire, saw the figure of a man standing motionless beside me; his head was bare, and his hair fell in long curls upon his shoulders; one hand was pressed upon his bosom, and with the other he motioned me to silence. My first impression was that our party were surprised by some French patrol; but, as I looked again, I recognized, to my amazement, that the individual before me was the young French officer I had seen that morning a prisoner beside the Douro.

"How came you here?" said I, in a low voice, to him in French.

"Escaped: one of my own men threw himself between me and the sentry; I swam the Douro, received a musket-ball through my arm, lost my shako—and here I am."

"You are aware you are again a prisoner?"

"If you desire it, of course I am," said he, in a voice full of feeling, that made my very heart creep. "I thought you were a party of Lorge's Dragoons, scouring the country for forage; tracked you the entire day, and have only now come up with you."

The poor fellow, who had neither eaten nor drunk since daybreak, wounded and foot-sore, had accomplished twelve leagues of a march, only once more to fall into the hands of his enemies. His years could scarcely have numbered nineteen; his countenance was singularly prepossessing; and, though bleeding and torn, with tattered uniform and without a covering to his head, there was no mistaking for a moment that he was of gentle blood. Noiselessly and cautiously I made him sit down beside the fire, while I spread before him the sparing remnant of my last night's supper, and shared my solitary bottle of sherry with him.

From the moment he spoke, I never entertained a thought of making him a prisoner; but, as I knew not how far I was culpable in permitting, if not actually facilitating, his escape, I resolved to keep the circumstance a secret from my party, and, if possible, get him away before daybreak.

No sooner did he learn my intentions regarding him, than in an instant all memory of his past misfortune, all thoughts of his present destitute condition, seemed to have fled; and, while I dressed his wound and bound up his shattered arm, he chatted away as unconcerned about the past and the future as though seated beside the fire of his own bivouac, and surrounded by his own brother officers.

"You took us by surprise the other day," said he. "Our marshal looked for the attack from the mouth of the river: we received information that your ships were expected there. In any case, our retreat was an orderly one, and must have been effected with slight loss."

I smiled at the self-complacency of this reasoning, but did not contradict him.

"Your loss must indeed have been great: your men crossed under the fire of a whole battery."

"Not exactly," said I; "our first party were quietly stationed in Oporto before you knew anything about it."

"Ah! sacre Dieu! Treachery!" cried he, striking his forehead with his clenched fist.

"Not so: mere daring—nothing more. But come, tell me something of your own adventures. How were you taken?"

"Simply thus: I was sent to the rear, with orders to the artillery to cut their traces, and leave their guns; and when coming back my horse grew tired in the heavy ground, and I was spurring him to the utmost, when one of your heavy dragoons, an officer too, dashed at me, and actually rode me down, horse and all. I lay for some time bruised by the fall, when an infantry soldier, passing by, seized me by the collar, and brought me to the rear. No matter, however, here I am now. You will not give me up; and, perhaps, I may one day live to repay the kindness."

"You have not long joined."

"It was my first battle; my epaulettes were very smart things yesterday, though they do look a little passées to-day. You are advancing, I suppose?"

I smiled, without answering this question.

"Ah, I see, you don't wish to speak; never mind, your discretion is thrown away upon me; for, if I rejoined my regiment to-morrow, I should have forgotten all you told me,—all but your great kindness." These last words he spoke, bowing slightly his head, and coloring as he said them.

"You are a dragoon, I think?" said I, endeavoring to change the topic.

"I was, two days ago, chasseur à cheval, a sous-lieutenant in the regiment of my father, the General St. Croix."

"The name is familiar to me," I replied; "and I am sincerely happy to be in a position to serve the son of so distinguished an officer."

"The son of so distinguished an officer is most deeply obliged; but wishes with all his heart and soul he had never sought glory under such very excellent auspices."

"You look surprised, mon cher; but, let me tell you, my military ardor is considerably abated in the last three days; hunger, thirst, imprisonment, and this," lifting his wounded limb as he spoke, "are sharp lessons in so short a campaign, and for one, too, whose life hitherto had much more of ease than adventure to boast of. Shall I tell you how I became a soldier?"

"By all means; give me your glass first; and now for a fresh log to the fire; I'm your man."

"But stay, before I begin, look to this."

The blood was flowing rapidly from his wound, which, with some difficulty, I succeeded in staunching. He drank off his wine hastily, held out his glass to be refilled, and then began his story.

"You have never seen the Emperor?"

"Never."

"Sacre bleu! What a man he is! I'd rather stand under the fire of your grenadiers than meet his eye. When in a passion, he does not say much, it is true; but what he does, comes with a kind of hissing, rushing sound, while the very fire seems to kindle in his look. I have him before me this instant, and, though you will confess that my present condition has nothing very pleasing in it, I should be sorry, indeed, to change it for the last time I stood in his presence."

"Two months ago, I sported the gay light blue and silver of a page to the Emperor, and certainly, what with balls, boudoirs, flirtation, gossip, and champagne suppers, led a very gay, reckless, and indolent life of it. Somehow—I may tell you more accurately at another period, if we ever meet—I got myself into disgrace, and, as a punishment, was ordered to absent myself from the Tuileries, and retire, for some weeks, to St. Cloud. Siberia, to a Russian, would scarcely be a heavier infliction than was this banishment to me. There was no court, no levee, no military parade, no ball, no opera. A small household of the Emperor's chosen servants quietly kept house there. The gloomy walls re-echoed to no music; the dark alleys of the dreary garden seemed the very impersonation of solitude and decay. Nothing broke the dull monotony of the tiresome day, except when, occasionally, near sunset, the clash of the guard would be heard tumbling out, and the clank of presenting arms, followed by the roll of a heavy carriage into the gloomy court-yard. One lamp, shining like a star, in a small chamber on the second floor, would remain till near four, some times five o'clock in the morning. The same sounds of the guard and the same dull roll of the carriage would break the stillness of the early morning; and the Emperor—for it was he—would be on his way back to Paris."

"We never saw him: I say we; for, like myself, some half-dozen others were also there, expiating their follies by a life of cheerless ennui."

"It was upon a calm evening in April, we sat together chatting over the various misdeeds which had consigned us to exile, when some one proposed, by way of passing the time, that we should visit the small flower-garden that was parted off from the rest, and reserved for the Emperor alone. It was already beyond the hour he usually came: beside that, even should he arrive, there was abundant time to get back before he could possibly reach it. The garden we had often seen, but there was something in the fact that our going there was a transgression that so pleased us all, that we agreed at once, and set forth. For above an hour we loitered about the lonely and deserted walks, where already the Emperor's foot-tracks had worn a marked pathway, when we grew weary, and were about to return, just as one of the party suggested, half in ridicule of the sanctity of the spot, that we should have a game of leap-frog ere we left it. The idea pleased us, and was at once adopted. Our plan was this: each person stationed himself in some by-walk or alley, and waited till the other, whose turn it was, came and leaped over him; so that, beside the activity displayed, there was a knowledge of the local necessary; for, to any one passed over, a forfeit was to be paid. Our game began at once, and certainly I doubt if ever those green alleys and shady groves rang to such hearty laughter. Here would be seen a couple rolling together over the grass; there some luckless wight counting out his pocket money, to pay his penalty. The hours passed quietly over, and the moon rose, and at last it came to my turn to make the tour of the garden. As I was supposed to know all its intricacies better than the rest, a longer time was given for them to conceal themselves; at length the word was given, and I started."

"Anxious to acquit myself well, I hurried along at top speed, but guess my surprise to discover that nowhere could I find one of my companions; down one walk I csampered, up another, across a third, but all was still and silent; not a sound, not a breath, could I detect; there was still one part of the garden unexplored. It was a small open space before a little pond, which usually contained the gold fish the Emperor was so fond of: thither I bent my steps, and had not gone far when, in the pale moonlight, I saw, at length, one of my companions waiting patiently for my coming; his head bent forward, and his shoulders rounded. Anxious to repay him for my own disappointment, I crept silently forward at tiptoe, till quite near, when, rushing madly on, I sprang upon his back; just, however, as I rose to leap over, he raised his head, and staggered by the impulse of my spring, he was thrown forward, and, after an ineffectual effort to keep his legs, fell flat upon his face in the grass. Bursting with laughter, I fell over him on the ground, and was turning to assist him, when suddenly he sprang upon his feet, and—horror of horrors—it was Napoleon himself; his usually pale features were purple with rage; but not a word, not a syllable escaped him.

"Qui êtes vous?" said he at length.

"St. Croix, sire," said I, still kneeling before him, while my very heart leaped into my mouth.

"St. Croix! toujours St. Croix. Come here; approach me," cried he, in a voice of stifled passion.

"I rose, but before I could take a step forward, he sprang at me, and, tearing off my epaulettes, trampled them beneath his feet, and then he shouted out, rather than spoke, the one word 'allez.'"

"I did not wait for a second intimation, but clearing the paling at a spring, was many a mile from Fontainebleau before daybreak."

CHAPTER LI....The March.

Twice the réveillée sounded; the horses champed impatiently their heavy bits; my men stood waiting for the order to mount, ere I could arouse myself from the deep sleep I had fallen into. The young Frenchman and his story were in my dreams, and, when I awoke, his figure, as he lay sleeping beside the wood-embers, was the first object I perceived. There he lay, to all seeming, as forgetful of his fate as though he still inhabited the gorgeous halls and gilded saloons of the Tuileries; his pale and handsome features were even a placid smile as, doubtless, some dream of other days flitted across him; his long hair waved in luxurious curls upon his neck, and his light brown moustache, slightly curled at the top, gave to his mild and youthful features an air of saucy fierté that heightened their effect. A narrow blue riband which he wore round his throat, gently peeped from his open bosom. I could not resist the curiosity I felt to see what it meant, and, drawing it softly forth, I perceived that a small miniature was attached to it. It was beautifully painted, and surrounded with brilliant of some value. One glance showed me—for I had seen more than one engraving before of her—that it was the portrait of the Empress Josephine. Poor boy! he doubtless was a favorite at court; indeed, every thing in his air and manner bespoke him such. I gently replaced the precious locket, and turned from the spot, to think over what was best to be done for him. Knowing the vindictive feeling of the Portuguese toward their invaders, I feared to take Pietro, our guide, into my confidence. I accordingly summoned my man Mike to my aid, who, with all his country's readiness, soon found out an expedient. It was to pretend to Pietro that the prisoner was merely an English officer, who had made his escape from the French army, in which, against his will, he had been serving for some time.

This plan succeeded perfectly; and when St. Croix, mounted upon one of my led horses, set out upon his march beside me, none was more profuse of his attentions than the dark-browed guide, whose hatred of a Frenchman was beyond belief.

By thus giving him safe conduct through Portugal, I knew that when we reached the frontier, he could easily manage to come up with some part of Marshal Victor's force, the advanced guard of which lay on the left bank of the Tagus.

To me the companionship was the greatest boon; the gay and buoyant spirit that no reverse of fortune, no untoward event, could subdue, lightened many an hour of the journey; and though, at times, the gasconade tone of the Frenchman would peep through, there was still such a fund of good-tempered raillery in all he said, that it was impossible to feel angry with him. His implicit faith in the Emperor's invincibility also amused me. Of the unbounded confidence of the nation in general, and the army in particular, in Napoleon, I had till then no conception. It was not that in the profound skill and immense resources of the general they trusted; but they actually regarded him as one placed above all the common accidents of fortune, and revered him as something more than human.

"Il viendra et puis—" was the continued exclamation of the young Frenchman. Any notion of our successfully resisting the overwhelming might of the Emperor, he would have laughed to scorn; and so I let him go on prophesying our future misfortunes till the time, when, driven back upon Lisbon, we should be compelled to evacuate the Peninsula, and, under favor of a convention, be permitted to return to England. All this was sufficiently ridiculous, coming from a youth of nineteen, wounded, in misery, a prisoner; but further experience of his nation has shown me, that St. Croix was not the exception, but the rule. The conviction in the ultimate success of their army, whatever be the merely momentary mishap, is the one present thought of a Frenchman; a victory with them is a conquest; a defeat—if they are by any chance driven to acknowledge one—a fatalité.

I was too young a man, and still more, too young a soldier, to bear with this absurd affectation of superiority as I ought, and consequently glad to wander, whenever I could, from the contested point of our national superiority to other topics. St. Croix, although young, had seen much of the world, as a page in the splendid court of the Tuileries; the scenes passing before his eyes were calculated to make a strong impression; and, by many an anecdote of his former life, he lightened the road as we passed along.

"You promised, by-the-by, to tell me of your banishment. How did that occur, St. Croix?"

"Ah! par Dieu, that was an unfortunate affair for me: then began all my mishaps; but for that, I should never have been sent to St. Cloud; never have played leap-frog with the Emperor; never have been sent a soldier into Spain. True," said he, laughing, "I should never have had the happiness of your acquaintance. But still, I'd much rather have met you first in the Place des Victoires than in the Estrella Mountains."

"Who knows?" said I; "perhaps your good genius prevailed in all this?"

"Perhaps," said he, interrupting me, "that's exactly what the Empress said—she was my god-mother—'Jules will be a Maréchal de France yet.' But, certainly, it must be confessed, I have made a bad beginning. However, you wish to hear of my disgrace at court. Allons donc. But had we not better wait for a halt?"

"Agreed," said I; "and so let us now press forward."

CHAPTER LII....The Page.

UNDER the deep shade of some tall trees, sheltered from the noonday sun, we lay down to rest ourselves, and enjoy a most patriarchal dinner—some dry biscuits, a few bunches of grapes, and a little weak wine, savoring more of the borscht-skin than the vine-juice, were all we boasted; yet they were not ungrateful at such a time and place.

"Whose health did you pledge, then?" inquired St. Croix, with a half malicious smile, as I raised the glass silently to my lips.

I blushed deeply, and looked confused.

"A ses beaux yeux, whoever she be," said he, gayly tossing off his wine: "and now, if you feel disposed, I'll tell you my story. In good truth, it is not worth relating, but it may serve to set you asleep, at all events."

"I have already told you I was a page. Alas, the impressions you may feel of that functionary, from having seen Cherubino, give but a faint notion of him when pertaining to the household of the Emperor Napoleon.

"The farfallone amoroso basked in the soft smiles and sunny looks of the Countess Almaviva: we met but the cold impassive look of Talleyrand, the piercing and penetrating stare of Savary, or the ambiguous smile, half-menace, half-mockery, of Monsieur Fouché. While on service, our days were passed in the ante-chamber, beside the salle d'audience of the Emperor—reclining against the closed door, watching attentively for the gentle tinkle of the little bell which summoned us to open for the exit of some haughty diplomat, or the entrée of some redoubted general. Thus passed we the weary hours; the illustrious visitors by whom we were surrounded had no novelty, consequently no attraction for us, and the names already historical were but household words with us.

"We often remarked, too, the proud and distant bearing the Emperor assumed toward those of his generals who had been his former companions in arms. Whatever familiarity or freedom may have existed in the campaign or in the battle field, the air of the Tuileries certainly chilled it. I have often heard that the ceremonious observances and rigid etiquette of the old Bourbon court were far preferable to the stern reserve and unbending stiffness of the imperial one.

"The ante-chamber is but the reflection of the reception room, and whatever be the whims, the caprices, the littleness of the Great Man, they are speedily assumed by his inferiors, and the dark temper of one casts a lowering shadow on every menial by whom he is surrounded.

"As for us, we were certainly not long in catching somewhat of the spirit of the Emperor; and I doubt much if the impertinence of the waiting-room was not more dreaded and detested than the abrupt speech and searching look of Napoleon himself.

"What a malicious pleasure have I not felt in arresting the step of M. de Talleyrand, as he approached the Emperor's closet! with what easy insolence have I lisped out, 'Pardon Monsieur, but his Majesty cannot receive you'—or, 'Monsieur le Duc, his majesty has given no orders for your admission.'—How amusing it was to watch the baffled look of each, as he retired once more to his place among the crowd; the wily diplomat covering his chagrin with a practised smile, while the stern marshal would blush to his very eyes with indignation. This was the great pleasure our position afforded us; and, with a boyish spirit of mischief, we cultivated it to perfection, and became at last the very horror and detestation of all who frequented the levees; and the ambassador, whose fearless voice was heard among the councils of kings, became soft and conciliating in his approaches to us: and the hardy general, who would have charged upon a brigade of artillery, was timid as a girl in addressing us a mere question.

"Among the amiable class thus characterized, I was most conspicuous, preserving cautiously a tone of civility that left nothing openly to complain of. I assumed an indifference and impartiality of manner that no exigency of affairs, no pressing haste, could discompose or disturb, and my bow of recognition to Soult or Massena was as coolly measured, as my monosyllabic answer was accurately coned over.

"Upon ordinary occasions, the Emperor, at the close of each person's audience, rang his little bell for the admission of the next in order as they arrived in the waiting-room; yet, when any thing important was under consideration, a list was given us in the morning of the names to be presented in rotation, which no casual circumstance was ever suffered to interfere with.

"It is now about four months since, one fine morning, such a list was placed within my hands. His Majesty was just then occupied with an inquiry into the naval force of the kingdom; and, as I cast my eyes carelessly over the names, I read little else than Vice-admiral so and so, Commander such a one, and Chief d'Escadron such another, and the levee presented accordingly, instead of its usual brilliant array of gorgeous uniform and aiguilletted marshals, the simple blue-and-gold of the naval service.

"The marine was not in high favor with the Emperor, and, truly, my reception of these unfrequent visitors was any thing but flattering. The early part of the morning was, as usual, occupied by the audience of the Minister of Police and the Duc de Bassano, who, evidently, from the length of time they remained, had matters of importance to communicate. Meanwhile, the ante-chamber filled rapidly, and, before noon, was actually crowded. It was just at this moment that the folding-door slowly opened, and a figure entered, such as I had never before seen in our brilliant saloon: he was a man of five or six-and-fifty, short, thickset, and strongly built, with a bronzed and weather-beaten face, and a broad open forehead, deeply scarred with a sabre-cut; a shaggy gray moustache curled over, and concealed his mouth, while eyebrows of the same color shaded his dark and piercing eyes. His dress was a coarse coat of blue cloth, such as the fishermen wear in Brittany, fastened at the waist by a broad belt of black leather, from which hung a short broad-bladed cutlass: his loose trousers, of the same material, were turned up at the ankles, to show a pair of strong legs coarsely cased in blue stockings and thin-soled shoes—a broad-leaved oil-skin hat was held in one hand, and the other stuck carelessly in his pocket, as he entered; he came in with a careless air, and, familiarly saluting one or two officers in the room, he sat himself down near the door, appearing lost in his own reflections.

"Who can you be, my worthy friend?" was my question to myself, as I surveyed this singular apparition, at the time casting my eyes down the list, I perceived that several pilots of the coast of Havre, Calais, and Boulogne, had been summoned to Paris to give some information upon the soundings and depth of water along the shore.

"Ha," thought I, "I have it—the good-man has mistaken his place, and instead of remaining without, has walked boldly forward to the ante-chamber." There was something so strange and so original in the grim look of the old fellow, as he sat there alone, that I suffered him to remain quietly in his delusion, rather than order him back to the waiting-room without; beside, I perceived that a kind of sensation was created among the others by his appearance there, which amused me greatly.

"As the day wore on, the officers formed into little groups of three or four, chatting together in an undertone of voice; all, save the old pilot: he had taken a huge tobacco-box from his capacious breast pocket, and inserting an immense piece of the bitter weed in his mouth, began to chew it as leisurely as though he were walking the quarter-deck. The cool insouciance of such a proceeding amused me much, and I resolved to draw him out a little.

"His strong, broad Breton features, his deep voice, his dry, blunt manner, were all in admirable keeping with his exterior, and amused me highly.

"Par Dieu, my lad," said he, after chatting some time, "had you not better tell the Emperor that I am waiting?—It's now past noon, and I must eat something.

"Have a little patience," said I; "his Majesty is going to invite you to dinner."

"Be it so," said he, gravely, "provided the hour be an early one. I'm his man."

"With difficulty did I keep down my laughter, as he said this, and continued—

"So you know the Emperor already, it seems?"

"Yes, that I do! I remember him when he was no higher than yourself."

"How delighted he'll be to find you here: I hope you have brought up some of your family with you, as the Emperor would be so flattered by it?"

"No, I've left them at home; this place do n't suit us over well. We have plenty to do beside spending our time and money among all you fine folks here—"

"And not a bad life of it, either," added I, "fishing for cod and herrings—stripping a wreck now and then."

"He stared at me, as I said this, like a tiger on the spring, but spoke not a word.

"And how many young sea-wolves may you have in your den at home?"

"Six; and all of them able to carry you with one hand, at arm's length!"

"I have no doubt; I shall certainly not test their ability. But you, yourself, how do you like the Capital?"

"Not over well, and I'll tell you why—"

"As he said this, the door of the audience-chamber opened, and the Emperor appeared: his eyes flashed fire, as he looked hurriedly around the room.

"Who is in waiting here?"

"I am, please your Majesty," said I, bowing deeply, as I started from my seat.

"And where is the Admiral Truguet? Why was he not admitted?"

"Not present, your Majesty," said I, trembling with fear.

"Hold there, young fellow: not so fast; here he is."

"Ah, Truguet, mon ami!" cried the Emperor, placing both hands on the fellow's shoulders; how long have you been in waiting?"

"Two hours and a half," said he; producing in evidence a watch like a saucer.

"What! two hours and a half, and I not know it!"

"No matter: I am always happy to serve your Majesty. But if that fine fellow had not told me that you were going to ask me to dinner—"

"He! he said so; did he?" said Napoleon, turning on me a glance like a wild beast. "Yes, Truguet, so I am: you shall dine with me to-day. And you, sir," said he, dropping his voice to a whisper, as he came closer toward me, "and you have dared to speak thus? Call in a guard there; Capitaine, put this person under arrest; he is disgraced: he is no longer page of the palace. Out of my presence! away, air!"

"The room wheeled round; my legs tottered, my senses reeled; and I saw no more.

"Three weeks' bread and water in St. Pélagie, however, brought me to my recollection; and at last my kind—my more than kind friend, the Empress, obtained my pardon, and sent me to St. Cloud, till the Emperor should forget all about it. How I contrived again to refresh my memory I have already told you; and certainly you will acknowledge that I have not been fortunate in my interviews with Napoleon."

I am conscious how much St. Croix's story loses in my telling. The naïveté expressions, the grace of the narrative, were its charm; and these, alas! I can neither translate nor imitate, no more than I can convey the strange mixture of deep feeling and levity, shrewdness and simplicity, that constituted the manner of the narrator.

With many a story of his courtly career he amused me as we trotted along: when, toward nightfall of the third day, a peasant informed us that a body of French cavalry occupied the convent of San Cristoval, about three leagues off. The opportunity of his return to his own army pleased him far less than I expected; he heard without any show of satisfaction that the time of his liberation had arrived, and when the moment of leave-taking drew near, he became deeply affected.

"Eh bien, Charles," said he, smiling sadly through h dimmed and tearful eyes. "You've been a kind friend to me. Is the time never to come when I can repay you?"

"Yes, yes: we'll meet again, be assured of it. Meanwhile, there is one way you can more than repay anything I have done for you."

"Oh! name it at once."

"Many a brave fellow of ours is now, and doubtless many more will be, prisoners with your army in this war. Whenever, therefore, your lot brings you in contact with such—"

"They shall be my brothers," said he, springing toward me, and throwing his arms round my neck. "Adieu, adieu!" With that he rushed from the spot, and, before I could speak again, was mounted upon the peasant's horse, and waving his hand to me in farewell.

I looked after him as he rode at a fast gallop down the slope of the green mountain, the noise of the horse's feet echoing along the silent plain. I turned at length to leave the spot, and then perceived, for the first time, that he had hung around my neck his miniature of the Empress. Poor boy! how sorrowful I felt thus to rob him of what he held so dear! how gladly would I have overtaken him to restore it! It was the only keepsake he possessed, and knowing that I would not accept it, if offered, he took this way of compelling me to keep it.

Through the long hours of the summer's night I thought of him; and when, at last, I slept, toward morning, my first thought on waking was of the solitary day before me. The miles no longer slipped imperceptibly along; no longer did the moon and night seem fast to follow. Alas! that one should grow old! the very sorrows of our early years have something soft and touching in them. Arising less from deep wrong than slight mischances; the grief they cause comes ever with an alloy of pleasant thoughts, telling of the tender past; and, mid the tears called up, forming some bright rainbow of future hope.

Poor St. Croix had already won greatly upon me; and I felt lonely and desolate when he departed.

CHAPTER LIII... Alvas.

Nothing of incident marked our further progress toward the frontiers of Spain, and at length we reached the small town of Alvas. It was past sunset as we arrived; and, instead of the usual quiet and repose of a little village, we found the streets crowded with people on horseback and on foot: mules, bullocks, carts, and wagons, blocked up the way, and the oaths of the drivers, and the screaming of women and children resounded on all sides.

With what little Spanish I possessed, I questioned some of those near me, and learned, in reply, that a dreadful engagement had taken place that day between the advanced guard of the French, under Victor, and the Lusitanian legion; that the Portuguese troops had been beaten and completely routed, losing all their artillery and baggage; that the French were rapidly advancing, and expected hourly to arrive at Alvas; in consequence of which, the terror-stricken inhabitants were packing up their possessions, and hurrying away.

Here, then, was a point of considerable difficulty for me at once. My instructions had never provided for such a conjuncture, and I was totally unable to determine what was best to be done. Both my men and their horses were completely tired by a march of fourteen leagues, and had a pressing need of some rest. On every side of me, the preparations for flight were proceeding with all the speed that fear inspires; and, to my urgent request for some information as to food and shelter, I could obtain no other reply than muttered menaces of the fate before me if I remained, and exaggerated accounts of French cruelty.

Amid all this bustle and confusion, a tremendous fall of heavy rain set in, which at once determined me, come what might, to house my party, and provide forage for our horses.

As we pushed our way slowly through the encumbered streets, looking on every side for some appearance of a village inn, a tremendous shout rose in our rear, and a rush of the people toward us induced us to suppose that the French were upon us. For some minutes, the din and uproar were terrific—the clatter of horses' feet, the braying of trumpets, the yelling of the mob, all mingling in one frightful concert.

I formed my men in close column, and waited steadily for the attack, resolving, if possible, to charge through the advancing files; any retreat through the crowded and blocked-up thoroughfares being totally out of the question. The rain was falling in such torrents, that nothing could be seen a few yards off; when suddenly a pause of a few seconds occurred, and from the clash of accoutrements, and the hoarse tones of a loud voice, I judged that the body of men before us were forming for attack.

Resolving, therefore, to take them by surprise, I gave the word to charge; and, spurring our jaded cattle, onward we dashed. The mob fled right and left from us as we came on; and through the dense mist, we could just perceive a body of cavalry before us.

In an instant we were among them; down they went on every side, men and horses rolling pell-mell over each other—not a blow, not a shot striking us as we passed on. Never did I witness such total consternation: some threw themselves from their horses, and fled toward the house; others turned, and tried to fall back; but the increasing pressure from behind held them, and finally succeeded in blocking us up among them.

It was just at this critical moment that a sudden gleam of light from a window fell upon the disordered mass, and to my astonishment—I need not say to my delight—I perceived that they were Portuguese troops. Before I had well time to halt my party, my convictions were pretty well strengthened by hearing a well known voice in the rear of the mass call out—

"Charge, ye devils! charge, will ye? illustrious hidalgos; cut them down; los infidels, sacrificados los: scatter them like chaff!"

One roar of laughter was my only answer to this energetic appeal for my destruction; and the moment after, the dry features and pleasant face of old Monsoon beamed on me by the light of a pine torch he carried in his right hand.

"Are they prisoners? have they surrendered?" inquired he, riding up.

"It was well for them; we'd have made mince meat of them otherwise: now they shall be well treated, and ransomed if they prefer."

"Gracias excellenze," said I, in a feigned voice.

"Give up your sword," said the major, in an under tone. "You behaved gallantly, but you fought against invincibles. Lord love them, but they are the most terrified invincibles."

I nearly burst aloud at this.

"It was a close thing which of us ran first," muttered the major, as he turned to give some directions to an aide-de-camp. "Ask them who they are," said he, in Spanish.

By this time, I came closely alongside of him; and placing my mouth close to his ear, hallooed out

"Monsoon, old fellow, how goes the King of Spain's sherry?"

"Eh, what—why—upon my life, and so it is—Charley, my boy, so it's you is it; egad, how good, and we were so near being the death of you.—My poor fellow, how came you here?"

A few words of explanation sufficed to inform the major why we were there, and still more, to comfort him with the assurance that he had not been charging the general's staff, and the commander-in-chief himself.

"Upon my life, you gave me a great start; though, as long as I thought you were French, it was very well."

"True, Major; but certainly the invincibles were merciful as they were strong."

"They were tired, Charley, nothing more; why, lad, we've been fighting since daybreak; beat Victor at six o'clock; drove him back behind the Tagus; took a cold dinner, and had at him again in the afternoon. Lord love you, we've immortalized ourselves; but you must never speak of this little business here; it tells devilish ill for the discipline of your fellows, upon my life it does."

This was rather an original turn to give the transaction, but I did not oppose, and, thus chatting, we entered the little inn, where, confidence once restored, some semblance of comfort already appeared.

"And so you're come to re-enforce us," said Monsoon; "there was never any thing more opportune; though we surprised ourselves to-day with valor, I don't think we could persevere."

"Yes, Major, the appointment gave me sincere pleasure; to see a little service under your orders, I greatly desired. Shall I present you with my despatches?"

"Not now, Charley—not now, my lad. Supper is the first thing at this moment; beside, now that you remind me, I must send off a despatch myself. Upon my life, it's a great piece of fortune that you're here; you shall be Secretary at War, and write it for me; here, now—how lucky that I thought of it, to be sure! and it was just a mere chance; one has so many things—" Muttering such broken, disjointed sentences, the major opened a large portfolio with writing materials, which he displayed before me; as he rubbed his hands with satisfaction, and said, "Write away, lad."

"But, my dear Major, you forget; I was not in the action. You must describe; I can only follow you."

"Begin then thus:

"Head Quarters, Alvas, June 26.

"Your Excellency, "Having learned from Don Alphonzo Xaviero da Minto, an officer upon my personal staff—"

"Luckily sober at that moment—"

"That the advanced guard of the eighth corps of the French Army—"

"Stay though, was it the eighth?—Upon my life, I'm not clear as to that; blot the word a little, and go on—"

"That the corps, under Marshal Victor, had commenced a forward movement toward Alcantara. I immediately ordered a flank movement of the light infantry regiment to cover the bridge over the Tagus. After breakfast—"

"I'm afraid, Major, this is not decisive enough."

"Well about eleven o'clock, the French skirmishers attacked and drove in our pickets that were posted in front of our position, and following rapidly up with cavalry, they took a few prisoners, and killed old Alphonzo; he ran like a man, they say, but they caught him in the rear—"

"You need n't put that in, if you do n't like."

"I now directed a charge of the cavalry brigade under Don Asturias Y'Hajos, that cut them up in fine style. Our artillery, posted on the heights, mowing away at their columns like fun."

"Victor did n't like this, and got into a wood, when we all went to dinner: it was about two o'clock then."

"After dinner the Portuguese light corps under Silva da Onorha, having made an attack upon the enemy's left, without my orders, got devilishly well trounced, and served them right; but, coming up to their assistance, with the heavy brigade of guns, and the cavalry, we drove back the French and took several prisoners, none of whom we put to death—"

"Dash that—Sir Arthur likes respect for the usages of war. Lord how dry I'm getting."

"The French were soon seen to retire to their heavy guns, and speedily afterward retreated. Your Excellency will perceive, by the enclosed return, that our loss has been considerable."

"I send this despatch by Don Emanuel Forgaes, whose services—"

"I back him for mutton hash with onions against the whole regiment—"

"Have been of a most distinguished nature, and beg to recommend him to your Excellency's favor."

"I have the honor, &c."

"Is it finished, Charley?—Egad, I'm glad of it, for here comes supper."

The door opened as he spoke, and displayed a tempting tray of smoking vianda, flanked by several bottles—an officer of the major's staff accompanied it, and showed, by his attentions to the etiquette of the table, and the proper arrangement of the meal, that his functions in his superior's household were more than military.

We were speedily joined by two others in uniform, whose names I now forget, but to whom the major presented me in all form; introducing me, as well as I could interpret his Spanish, as his most illustrious ally and friend Don Carlos O'Malley.

CHAPTER LIV... The Supper.

I have often partaken of more luxurious cookery and rarer wines; but never do I remember enjoying a more welcome supper than on this occasion.

Our Portuguese guests left us soon, and the major and myself were once more tête à tête beside a cheerful fire; a well-chosen array of bottles guaranteeing that, for some time at least, no necessity of leave-taking should arise from any deficiency of wine.

"That sherry is very near the thing, Charley; a little, a very little sharp; but the after-taste perfect: and now, my boy, how have you been faring since we parted?"

"Not so badly, Major. I have already got a step in promotion. The affair at the Douro gave me a lieutenancy."

"I wish you joy, with all my heart. I'll call you captain always while you're with me. Upon my life, I will. Why, man, they style me Your Excellency, here. Bless your heart! we are great folks among the Portuguese; and no bad service after all."

"I should think not, Major. You seem to have always made a good thing of it."

"No, Charley; no, my boy. They overlook us greatly in general orders—and despatches. Had the brilliant action of to-day been fought by the British—but no matter; they may behave well in England, after all; and, when I'm called to the Upper House as Baron Monsoon of the Tagus—is that better than Lord Alcantara?"

"I prefer the latter."

"Well, then, I'll have it. Lord! what a treaty I'll move for with Portugal, to let us have wine cheap. Wine, you know, as David says, gives us a pleasant countenance; and oil—I forget what oil does,—pass over the decanter. And how is Sir Arthur, Charley? A fine fellow, but sadly deficient in knowledge of the supplies. Never would have made any character in the commissariat. Bless your heart, he pays for every thing here, as if he were in Cheapside."

"How absurd, to be sure!"

"Isn't it, though; that was not my way, when I was commissary-general about a year or two ago. To be sure, how I did puzzle them! They tried to audit my accounts; and what do you think I did? I brought them in three thousand pounds in my debt. They never tried on that game any more. 'No! no!' said the Junta, 'Beresford and Monsoon are great men, and must be treated with respect; do you think we'd let them search our pockets? But the rogues doubled on us after all: they sent us to the northward—a poor country—'"

"So that, except a little common-place pillage of the convents and nunneries, you had little or nothing?"

"Exactly so; and then I got a great shock, about that time, that affected my spirits for a considerable while."

"Indeed, Major! some illness?"

"No, I was quite well; but—Lord! how thirsty it makes me to think of it; my throat is absolutely parched—I was near being hanged!"

"Hanged?"

"Yes. Upon my life it's true—very horrible, aint it? It had a great effect upon my nervous system; and they never thought of any little pension to me, as a recompense for my sufferings."

"And who was barbarous enough to think of such a thing, Major?"

"Sir Arthur Wellesley himself; none other, Charley."

"Oh, it was a mistake, Major, or a joke."

"It was devilish near being a practical one, though. I'll tell you how it occurred. After the battle of Vimeira, the brigade to which I was attached had their head-quarters at San Pietro, a large convent, where all the church plate for miles around was stored up for safety. A sergeant's guard was accordingly stationed over the refectory, and every precaution taken to prevent pillage, Sir Arthur having given particular orders on the subject. Well, somehow—I never could find out how—but in leaving the place, all the wagons of our brigade had got some trifling articles of small value scattered, as it might be, among their stores—gold cups, silver candlesticks, Virgin Marys, ivory crucifixes, saints' eyes set in topazes, and martyrs' toes in silver filagree, and a hundred other similar things."

"One of these confounded bullock-carts broke down just at the angle of the road where the commander-in-chief was standing with his staff to watch the troops file, and out rolled among bread rations and salt beef, a whole avalanche of precious relics and church ornaments. Every one stood aghast! Never was there such a misfortune. No one endeavored to repair the mishap; but every one looked on in terrified amazement as to what was to follow."

"Who has command of this detachment?" shouted out Sir Arthur, in a voice that made more than one of us tremble.

"Monsoon, your excellency—Major Monsoon, of the Portuguese brigade."

"The d—d old rogue!—I know him." Upon my life, that's what he said. "Hang him up on the spot," pointing with his finger as he spoke—"we shall see if this practice cannot be put stop to." And with these words he rode leisurely away, as if he had been merely ordering dinner for a small party.

"When I came up to the place, the halberds were fixed, and Gronow, with a company of the fusiliers, under arms beside them."

"Devilish sorry for it, Major," said he. "It's confoundedly unpleasant; but can't be helped. We've got orders to see you hanged!"

"Faith, it was just so he said it, tapping his snuff-box as he spoke, and looking carelessly about him. Now, had it not been for the fixed halberds and the provost-marshal, I'd not have believed him; but one glance at them, and another at the bullock-cart with all the holy images, told me at once what had happened."

"He only means to frighten me a little? Isn't that all, Gronow?" cried I, in a supplicating voice.

"Very possibly, Major," said he; "but I must execute my orders."

"You'll surely not—" Before I could finish, up came Dan Mackinnon, cantering smartly. "Going to hang old Monsoon; eh, Gronow? What fun?"

"Ain't it, though!" said I, half blubbering.

"Well, if you're a good Catholic, you may have your choice of a saint, for, by Jupiter, there's a strong muster of them here." This cruel allusion was made in reference to the gold and silver effigies that lay scattered about the highway.

"Dan," said I, in a whisper, "intercede for me—do, like a good, kind fellow. You have influence with Sir Arthur."

"'You old sinner,' said he; 'it's useless.'
 "'Dan, I'll forgive you the fifteen pounds.'
 "'That you owe me,' said Dan, laughing.
 "'Who'll ever be the father to you I've been? Who'll mix your punch with burnt Madeira, when I'm gone?' said I.

"Well, really, I am sorry for you, Monsoon—I say, Gronow, do n't tuck him up for a few minutes; I'll speak for the old villaia, and if I succeed, I'll wave my handkerchief."
 "Well, away went Dan at a full gallop. Gronow sat down on a bank, and fidgeted about in no very enviable frame of mind, the confounded provost-marshal eyeing me all the while."

"I can only give you five minutes more, Major," said Gronow, placing his watch beside him on the grass: I tried to pray a little, and said three or four of Solomon's proverbs, when he again called out—"There, you see it won't do! Sir Arthur is shaking his head."

"What's that waving yonder?"
 "'The colors of the 6th foot.—Come, Major, off with your stock!"

"Where is Dan now—what is he doing?—for I could see nothing myself."

"He's riding beside Sir Arthur; they all seem laughing."
 "'God forgive them! what an awful retrospect this will prove for some of them.'"

"Time's up," said Gronow jumping up and replacing his watch in his pocket.

"Provost-marshal, be quick now!"
 "'Eh! what's that?—there, I see it waving!—there's a shout, too!'"

"Ay, by Jove, so it is; well, you're saved this time, Major—that's the signal."

"So saying, Gronow formed his fellows in line and resumed his march quite coolly, leaving me alone on the roadside to meditate over martial law and my pernicious taste for relics."

"Well, Charley, this gave me a great shock, and I think, too, it must have had a great effect upon Sir Arthur himself; but, upon my life, he has wonderful nerves; I met him one day afterward at dinner in Lisbon; he looked at me very hard for a few seconds—'Eh! Monsoon! Major Monsoon, I think!'"

"Yes, your excellency," said I briefly, thinking how painful it must be for him to meet me.

"Thought I hanged you—know I intended it—no matter—a glass of wine with you."

"Upon my life, that was all; how easily some people can forgive themselves! But, Charley, my hearty, we are getting on slowly with the tittle, are they all empty? so they are! let us make a sortie on the cellar; bring a candle with you, and come along."

We had scarcely proceeded a few steps from the door, when a most vociferous sound of mirth arising from a neighboring apartment, arrested our progress.

"Are the Dons so convivial, Major?" said I, as a hearty burst of laughter broke forth at the moment.

"Upon my life, they surprise me; I begin to fear they have taken some of our wine."

We now perceived that the sounds of merriment came from the kitchen, which opened upon a little court-yard. Into this we crept stealthily, and approaching noiselessly to the window, obtained a peep at the scene within.

Around a blazing fire, over which hung by a chain, a massive iron pot, sat a goodly party of some half-dozen people. One group lay in dark shadow, but the others were brilliantly lighted up by the cheerful blaze, and showed us a portly Dominican friar, with a beard down to his waist; a buxom, dark-eyed girl of some eighteen years; and between the two, most comfortably leaning back with an arm around each, no less a person than my trusty man, Mickey Free.

It was evident, from the alternate motion of his head, that his attentions were evenly divided between the church and the fair sex. Although, to confess the truth, they seemed much more favorably received by the latter than the former—a brown earthen flagon appearing to absorb all the worthy monk's thoughts that he could spare from the contemplation of heavenly objects.

"Mary, my darlin', don't be looking at me that way, through the corner of your eyes;—I know you're fond of me—but the girls always was—you think I'm joking, but, troth, I would n't say a lie before the holy man beside me; sure I would n't, father?"

The friar granted out something in reply, not very unlike in sound, at least, a hearty anathema.

"Ah, then, is n't it yourself has the illegant time of it, father dear," said he, tapping him familiarly upon his ample paunch, "and nothing to trouble you; the best of diversion wherever you go, and whether its Badajos or Ballykilruddery, it's all one; the women is fond of ye. Father Murphy, the coadjutor in Scariff, was just such another as yourself, and he'd coax the birds off the trees with the tongue of him. Give us a pull at the pipkin before its all gone, and I'll give you a chant."

With this he seized the jar, and drained it to the bottom; the smack of his lips as he concluded, and the disappointed look of the friar, as he peered into the vessel, throwing the others, once more, into a loud burst of laughter.

"And now, your reverence, a good chorus is all I'll ask, and you'll not refuse it for the honor of the church."

So saying, he turned a look of most droll expression upon the monk, and began the following ditty, to the air of

"St Patrick was a gentleman."

"What an illegant life a friar leads,
 With a fat round paunch before him;
 He mutters a prayer and counts his beads,
 And all the women adore him.
 Its little he's troubled to work or think,
 Wherever devotion leads him:
 A 'pater' pays for his dinner and drink,
 For the church—good luck to her!—feeds him."

"From the cow in the field to the pig in the sty,
 From the maid to the lady in satin,
 They tremble, wherever he turns an eye;
 He can talk to the devil in Latin!
 He's mighty severe to the ugly and ould,
 And curses like mad when he's near 'em;
 But one beautiful trait of him I've been told,
 The innocent craytures don't fear him."

"Its little for spirits or ghosts he cares:

For 'tis true, as the world supposes,
 With an awe he'd make them march down stairs,

Av they dared to show their noses.

"The devil himself's afraid," 'tis said,
 And dares not to deride him:

For 'angels make each night his bed,
 And then—lie down beside him."

A perfect burst of laughter from Monsoon prevented my hearing how Mike's minstrelsy succeeded within doors—but, when I looked again, I found that the friar had decamped, leaving the field open to his rival—a circumstance, I could plainly perceive, not disliked by either party.

"Come back, Charley—that villain of yours has given me the cramp, standing here on the cold pavement. We'll have a little warm posset—very small—thin, as they say in Tom Jones, and then to bed."

Notwithstanding the abstemious intentions of the major, it was day-break ere we separated, and neither party in a condition for performing upon the tight-rope.

CHAPTER LV....The Legion.

My services, while with the legion, were of no very distinguished character, and require no lengthened chronicle. Their great feat of arms, the repulse of an advanced guard of Victor's corps, had taken place the very morning I had joined them, and the ensuing month was passed in soft repose upon their laurels.

For the first few days, indeed, a multiplicity of cares beset the worthy major. There was a despatch to be written to Beresford—an order to the supreme Junta—a letter to Wilson, at that time with a corps of observation to the eastward. There were some wounded to be looked after—a speech to be made to the conquering heroes themselves—and, lastly, a few prisoners were taken, whose fate seemed certainly to partake of the most uncertain of war's proverbial chances.

The despatches gave little trouble: with some very slight alterations, the great original, already sent forward to Sir Arthur, served as a basis for the rest. The wounded were forwarded to Alcantara, with a medical staff, to whom Monsoon, at parting, pleasantly hinted that he expected to see all the sick at their duty by an early day, or he would be compelled to report the doctors. The speech, which was intended as a kind of general order, he deferred for some favorable afternoon, when he could get up his Portuguese; and lastly came the prisoners, by far the most difficult of all his cares. As for the few common soldiers taken, they gave him little uneasiness; as Sir John has it, they "were mortal men, and food for powder;" but there was a staff-officer among them, aiguilleted and epauletted. Now, the major deliberated a long time with himself, whether the usages of modern war might not admit of the ancient time-honored practice of ransom. The battle, save in glory, had been singularly unproductive—plunder there was none—the few ammunition-wagons and gun-carriages were worth little or nothing; so that, save the prisoners, nothing remained. It was late in the evening—the mellow hour of the major's meditations—when he ventured to open his heart to me upon the matter.

"I was just thinking, Charley, how very superior they were in olden time, to us moderns, in many matters, and nothing more than in their treatment of prisoners. They never took them away from their friends and country; they always ransomed them—if they had wherewithal to pay their way. So good-natured—upon my life, it was a most excellent custom. They took any little valuables they found about them, and put them up at auction. Moses and Eleazer, a priest, we are told, took every piece of gold, and their wrought jewels—meaning their watches and ear-rings. You need n't laugh, they all wore ear-rings, those fellows did. Now, why should n't I profit by their good example? I have taken Agag the king of the Amalekites—no, but, upon my life, I have got a French major, and I'd let him go for fifty doubloons."

It was not without much laughing and some eloquence that I could persuade Monsoon that Sir Arthur's military notions might not accept of even the authority of Moses; and, as our head-quarters were at no great distance, the danger of such a step as he meditated was too considerable at such a moment.

As for ourselves, no fatiguing drills, no harassing field-days, and no provoking inspections interfered with the easy current of our lives. Foraging parties there were, it is true, and some occasional outpost duty was performed; but the officers for both were selected with a tact that proved the major's appreciation of character; for while the gay, joyous fellow that sung a jovial song and loved his liquor was certain of being entertained at head-quarters, the less gifted and less congenial spirit had the happiness of scouring the country for forage, and presenting himself as a target to a French rifle.

My own endeavors to fulfil my instructions met with but little encouragement or support; and, although I labored hard at my task, I must confess that the soil was a most ungrateful one. The cavalry were, it is true, composed mostly of young fellows well appointed, and in most cases well mounted; but a more disorderly, careless, undisciplined, set of good-humored fellows never formed a corps in the world.

Monsoon's opinions were felt in every branch of the service, from the adjutant to the drum-boy—the same reckless, indolent, plunder-loving spirit prevailed everywhere. And although, under fire, they showed no lack of gallantry, or courage, the moment of danger passed, discipline departed with it, and their only conception of benefiting by a victory consisted in the amount of pillage that resulted from it.

From time to time the rumors of great events reached us. We heard that Soult, having succeeded in reorganizing his beaten army, was, in conjunction with Ney's corps, returning from the north; that the marshals were consolidating their forces in the neighborhood of Talavera, and that King Joseph himself, at the head of a large army, had marched for Madrid.

Menacing as such an aspect of affairs was, it had little disturbed the major's equanimity: and when our advanced post reported daily the intelligence, that the French were in retreat, he cared little with what object of concentrating their retired, provided the interval between us grew gradually wider. His speculations upon the future were singularly prophetic. You'll see, Charley, what will happen; old Cuesta will pursue them, and get thrashed. The English will come up, and, perhaps, get thrashed too; but we—God bless us—are only a small force, partially organized and ill to depend on; we'll go up the mountains till all is over." Thus did the major's discretion not only extend to the avoidance of danger, but he actually disqualified himself from even making its acquaintance.

Meanwhile, our operations consisted in making easy marches to Almaraz, halting wherever the commissaries reported a well-stocked cellar or well-furnished hen-room; taking the primrose path in life, and being, in the words of the major, "contented and grateful, even amid great perils!"

CHAPTER LVI....The Departure.

On the morning of the 10th July, a despatch reached us announcing that Sir Arthur Wellesley had taken up his head-quarters at Placentia, for the purpose of communicating with Cuesta, then at Case del Puerto, and ordering me immediately to repair to the Spanish head-quarters, and await Sir Arthur's arrival, to make my report upon the effective state of our corps. As for me, I was heartily tired of the inaction of my present life, and, much as I relished the eccentricities of my friend the major, longed ardently for a different sphere of action.

Not so Monsoon: the prospect of active employment, and the thoughts of being left once more alone—for his Portuguese staff afforded him little society—depressed him greatly, and, as the hour of my departure drew near, he appeared lower in spirits than I had ever seen him.

"I shall be very lonely without you, Charley," said he, with a sigh, as we sat the last evening together beside our cheerful wood-fire. "I have little intercourse with the Dons; for my Portuguese is none of the best, and only comes when the evening is far advanced, and, beside, the villans, I fear, may remember the sherry affair. Two of my present staff were with me then."

"Is that the story Power so often alluded to, Major, the King of Spain's?"

"There, Charley, hush: be cautious, my boy; I'd rather not speak about that till we get among our own fellows."

"Just as you like, Major; but, do you know, I have a strong curiosity to hear the narrative."

"If I'm not mistaken there is some one listening at the door: gently; that's it, eh?"

"No; we are perfectly alone; the night's early; who knows when we shall have as quiet an hour again together? Let me hear it, by all means."

"Well, I don't care: the thing, Heaven knows, is tolerably well known; so, if you'll amuse yourself making a devil of the turkey's legs there, I'll tell you the story; it's very short, Charley, and there's no moral: so you're not likely to repeat it."

So saying, the major filled up his glass, drew a little closer to the fire, and began:

"When the French troops under Laborde were marching upon Alcobaca, in concert with the Loison's corps, I was ordered to convey a very valuable present of sherry the Duc d'Albuquerque was making to the Supreme Junta—no less than ten hogheads of the best sherry the royal cellars of Madrid had formerly contained."

"It was stored in the San Vincente convent; and the junta, knowing a little about monkish tastes and the wants of the church, prudently thought it would be quite as well at Lisbon. I was accordingly ordered, with a sufficient force to provide for its safe conduct and secure arrival, and set out upon my march one lovely morning in April, with my precious convoy."

"I do n't know, I never could understand why temptations are thrown in our way in this life, except for the pleasure of yielding to them. As for me, I'm a stoic when there's nothing to be had; but, let me get a scent of a well-kept haunch, the odor of a wine-bin once in my nose, I forget every thing but appropriation. That bone smells deliciously, Charley; a little garlic would improve it vastly."

"Our road lay through cross paths and mountain tracts—for the French were scouring the country on every side—and my fellows, only twenty altogether, trembled at the very name of them; so that our only chance was to avoid falling in with any forage parties. We journeyed along for several days, rarely making more than a few leagues between sunrise and sunset, a scout always in advance to assure us that all was safe. The road was a lonesome one, and the way weary—for I had no one to speak to or converse with—so I fell into a kind of musing fit about the old wine in the great brown casks: I thought on its luscious flavor, its rich straw tint, its oily look as it flowed into the glass, the mellow after-taste, warming the heart as it went down, and I absolutely thought I could smell it through the cask."

"How I longed to broach one of them, if it were only to see if my dreams about it were correct; maybe it's brown sherry, thought I, and I am all wrong. This was a very distressing reflection: I mentioned it to the Portuguese intendant, who travelled with us as a kind of supercargo; but the villain only grinned, and said something about the junta and the galleys for life: so I did not recur to it afterward. Well, it was upon the third evening of our march that the scout reported that at Merida, about a league distant, he had fallen in with an English cavalry regiment, who were on their march to the northern provinces, and remaining that night in the village. As soon, therefore, as I had made all my arrangements for the night, I took a fresh horse, and cantered over to have a look at my countrymen, and hear the news. When I arrived it was dark night; but I was not long in finding out our fellows: they were the 11th Light Dragoons, commanded by my old friend, Bowes, and with as jolly a mess as any in the service."

"Before half an hour's time I was in the midst of them, hearing all about the campaign, and telling them in return about my convoy—dilating upon the qualities of the wine as if I had been drinking it every day at dinner."

"We had a very mellow night of it, and before four o'clock the senior major, and four captains, were under the table, and all the subs in a state unprovided for by the articles of war. So I thought I'd be going, and, wishing the sober ones a good-bye, set out on my road to join my own party."

"I had not gone above a hundred yards when I heard some one running after, and calling out my name."

"I say, Monsoon! Major! confound you, pull up."
 "Well, what's the matter? has any more lush turned up?" inquired I; for we had drunk the tap dry when I left.
 "Not a drop, old fellow—" said he; "but I was thinking of what you've been saying about that sherry."
 "Well! What then?"
 "Why, I want to know how we could get a taste of it?"
 "You'd better get elected one of the Cortes," said I, laughing; "for it does not seem likely you'll do so in any other way."
 "I'm not so sure of that," said he, smiling. "What road do you travel to-morrow?"
 "By Cavalhos and Reina."
 "Whereabouts may you happen to be toward sunset?"
 "I fear we shall be in the mountains," said I, with a knowing look, "where ambushes and surprise parties would be highly dangerous."
 "And your party consists of—?"
 "About twenty Portuguese, all ready to run at the first shot."
 "I'll do it, Monsoon! I'll be hanged if I don't."
 "But, Tom," said I, "don't make any blunder; only blank cartridge, my boy."
 "Honor bright!" cried he; "your fellows are armed, of course?"
 "Never think of that; they may shoot each other in the confusion; but, if you only make plenty of noise coming on, they'll never wait for you."
 "What capital fellows they must be!"
 "Crack troops, Tom; so don't hurt them; and now good-night."
 "As I cantered off, I began to think over O'Flaherty's idea, and, upon my life, I did n't half like it: he was a reckless devil-may-care fellow, and it was just as likely he would really put his scheme into practice."
 "When morning broke, however, we got under way again, and I amused myself all the forenoon detailing stories of French cruelty; so that, before we had marched ten miles, there was not a man among us not ready to run at the slightest sound of attack on any side. As evening was falling we reached Morento, a little mountain pass which follows the course of a small river, and where in many places, the mule carts had barely space enough to pass between the cliffs and the stream. What a place for Tom O'Flaherty and his foragers! thought I, as we entered the little mountain gorge; but all was silent as the grave: except the tramp of our party, not a sound was heard. There was something solemn and still in the great brown mountain, rising like vast walls on either side, with a narrow streak of gray sky at top, and in the dark, sluggish stream, that seemed to awe us, and no one spoke; the muleteer ceased his merry song, and did not crack or flourish his long whip as before, but chid his beasts in a half-muttered voice, and urged them faster, to reach the village before night-fall."
 "Egad, somehow I felt uncommonly uncomfortable; I could not divest my mind of the impression that some disaster was impending, and I wished O'Flaherty and his project in a very warm climate. He'll attack us, thought I, where we can't run: fair play for ever; but, if they are not able to get away, even the militia will fight. However, the evening crept on, and no sign of his coming appeared on any side, and, to my sincere satisfaction, I could see, about half a league distant, the twinkling light of the little village where we were to halt for the night. It was just at this time that a scout I had sent out some few hundred yards in advance came galloping up, almost breathless."
 "The French, captain; the French are upon us!" said he, with a face like a ghost.
 "Whew! Which way? how many?" said I, not at all sure that he might not be telling the truth.
 "Coming in force!" said the fellow; "dragoons! by this road."
 "Dragoons? By this road?" repeated every man of the party, looking at each other like men sentenced to be hanged.
 "Scarcely had they spoken, when we heard the distant noise of cavalry advancing at a brisk trot. Lord, what a scene ensued! The soldiers ran hither and thither like frightened sheep; some pulled out crucifixes and began to say their prayers; others fired off their muskets in a panic; the mule drivers cut their traces, and endeavored to get away by riding; and the intendant took to his heels, screaming out to us, as he went, to fight manfully to the last, and that he'd report us favorably to the junta."
 "Just at this moment the dragoons came in sight: they came galloping up, shouting like madmen. One look was enough for my fellows; they sprang from their legs from their devotions, fired a volley straight at the new moon, and ran like men."
 "I was knocked down in the rush. As I regained my legs, Tom O'Flaherty was standing beside me, laughing like mad."
 "Eh, Monsoon! I've kept my word, old fellow! What legs they have! we shall make no prisoners, that's certain. Now, lads, here it is! put the horses to—here. We shall take but one, Monsoon, so that your gallant defence of the take will please the junta. Good night; good night! I will drink your health every night these two months."
 "So saying, Tom sprang to his saddle, and in less time than I've been telling it the whole was over, and I sitting by myself in the gray moonlight, meditating on all I saw, and now and then shouting for my Portuguese friends to come back again. They came in time, by twos and threes, and at last the whole party re-assembled, and we set forth again—every man, from the intendant to the drummer, lauding my valor, and saying that Don Monsoon was a match for the Cid."
 "And how did the junta behave?"
 "Like trumps, Charley. Made me a Knight of Battalha, and kissed me on both cheeks, having sent twelve dozen of the rescued wine to my quarters, as a small testimony of their esteem. I have laughed very often at it since. But, hush! Charley: what's that I hear without there?"
 "Oh, it's my fellow, Mike. He asked my leave to entertain his friends before parting, and I perceive he is delighting them with a song."
 "But what a confounded air it is! are the words He brew?"
 "Irish, Major; most classical Irish, too, I'll be bound."
 "Irish! I've heard most tongues; but that certainly surprises me. Call him in, Charley, and let us have the article."

In a few minutes more, Mr. Free appeared in a state of very satisfactory elevation, his eyebrows alternately rising and falling, his mouth a little drawn to one side, and a side motion in his knee joints that might puzzle a physiologist to account for.

"A very sweet little song of yours, Mike," said the major; "a very sweet thing, indeed. Wet your lips, Mickey."

"Long life to your honor and Master Charles there, too, and them that belongs to both of yer. May a gooseberry skin make a nightcap for the man that would harm either of yer."

"Thank you, Mike. And now about that song?"

"It's the oldest tune ever was sung," said Mike, with a hiccup, "barring Adam had a taste for music; but the words—the poetry is not so old."

"And how comes that?"

"The poetry, ye see, was put to it by one of my ancestors; he was a great inventor in times past, and made beautiful songs; and ye'd never guess what it's all about."

"Love, mayhap?" quoth Monsoon.

"Sorry taste of kissing from beginning to end."

"A drinking song?" said I.

"Whisky is never mentioned."

"Fighting is the only other national pastime. It must be in praise of sudden death?"

"You're out again: but, sure, you'd niver guess it," said Mike. "Well, ye see, here's what it is. It's the praise and glory of ould Ireland in the great days that's gone, when we were all Phenayceans and Armenians, and when we worked all manner of beautiful contrivances in gold and silver; bracelets, and collars, and tea-pots, elegant to look at; and red roosin and Latin, and played the harp and the barrel-organ; and eat and drank of the best, for nothing but asking."

"Blessed times, upon my life," quoth the Major. "I wish we had them back again."

"There's more of your mind," said Mike, steadying himself. "My ancestors was great people in them days; and, sure, it is n't in my present situation I'd be, as we had them back again: sorra bit, faith! It is n't come here, Mickey—bad luck to you, Mike—or that blackguard, Mickey Free—people'd be calling me. But, no matter. Here's your health again, Major Monsoon—"

"Never mind vain regrets, Mike. Let us hear your song: the major has taken a great fancy to it."

"Ah, then, it's joking you are, Mister Charles," said Mike, affecting an air of most bashful coyness.

"By no means. We want to hear you sing it."

"To be sure we do. Sing it, by all means. Never be ashamed. King David was very fond of singing: upon my life he was."

"But you'd never understand a word of it, sir."

"No matter: we know what it's about. That's the way with the Legion: they don't know much English, but they generally guess what I'm at."

This argument seemed to satisfy all Mike's remaining scruples; so, placing himself in an attitude of considerable pretensions as to grace, he began, with a voice of no very measured compass, an air of which, neither by name or otherwise, can I give any conception—my principal amusement being derived from a tol de rol chorus of the major, which concluded each verse, and, indeed, in a lower key, accompanied the singer throughout.

Since that, I have succeeded in obtaining a free-and-easy translation of the lyric; but, in my anxiety to preserve the metre and something of the spirit of the original, I have made several blunders and many anachronisms: Mr. Free, however, pronounces my version a good one, and the world must take his word till some more worthy translator shall have consigned it to immortal verse.

With this apology, therefore, I present Mr. Free's song.

Air—"No Guilloch y' Goulen."

"Oh! once we were illigant people,
 Though we now live in cabins of mud;
 And the land that ye see from the steeple
 Belonged to us all from the flood,
 My father was then king of Connaught,
 My grandam't viceroi of Tralee;
 But the Sassanach came, and, signs on it!
 The devil an acre have we."

"The least of us then were all earls,
 And jewels we wore without name;
 We drank punch out of rubies and pearls—
 Mr. Petrie can tell you the same.—
 But, except some turf mould and potatoes,
 There's nothing our own we can call:
 And the English—bad luck to them!—hate us,
 Because we've more fun than them all!"

"My grandam't was niece to St. Kevin,
 That's the reason my name's Mickey Free!
 Priests' nieces—but sure he's in heaven,
 And his failins is nothin to me.
 And we still might get on without doctors,
 If they'd let the ould island alone,
 And if purple men, priests, and tithe-proctors,
 Were crammed down the great gun of Athlone."

As Mike's melody proceeded, the Major's thorough bass waxed beautifully less: now and then, it's true, roused by some momentary strain, it swelled upward in full chorus; but gradually these passing flights grew rarer, and finally all ceased, save a long, low, droning sound, like the expiring sigh of a wearied bagpipe. His fingers still continued mechanically to beat time upon the table, and still his head nodded sympathetically to the music; his eye-lids closed in sleep, and, as the last verse concluded, a full-drawn snore announced that Monsoon, if not in the land of dreams, was, at least, in a happy oblivion of all terrestrial concerns, and caring as little for the woes of green Erin and the altered fortunes of the Free family as any Saxon that ever oppressed them.

There he sat, the finished decanter and empty goblet testifying that his labors had only ceased from the pressure of necessity; but the broken half-uttered words that fell from his lips evinced that he reposed on the last bottle of the series.

"Oh, thin! he's a fine ould gentleman," said Mike, after a pause of some minutes, during which he had been contemplating the major with all the critical acumen Chantrey or Canova would have bestowed upon an antique statue: "A fine ould gentleman, every inch of him; and it's the master would like to have him up at the castle."

"Quite true, Mike: but let us not forget the road. Look to the cattle, and be ready to start within an hour."

When he left the room for this purpose, I endeavored to shake the major into momentary consciousness ere we parted.

"Major, Major," said I, "time is up. I must start."

"Yes, it's all true, your Excellency: they pillaged a little; and, if they did change their facings, there was a great temptation. All the red velvet they found in the churches—"

"Good-bye, old fellow, good bye!"

"Stand at ease!"

"Can't, unfortunately, yet a while: so farewell. I'll make a capital report of the legion to Sir Arthur; shall I add anything particularly from yourself?"

This, and the shake that accompanied it, aroused him: he started up, and looked about him for a few seconds.

"Eh, Charley! You did n't say Sir Arthur was here, did you?"

"No, Major, do n't be frightened; he's many a league off. I asked if you had anything to say when I met him?"

"Oh, yes, Charley. Tell him we're capital troops in our own little way in the mountains; would never do in pitched battles; skirmishing's our forte; and, for cutting off stragglers or sacking a town, back them at any odds."

"Yes, yes, I know all that: you've nothing more?"

"Nothing," said he, once more closing his eyes and crossing his hands before him, while his lips continued to mutter on, "nothing more, except you may say from me—he knows me, Sir Arthur does. Tell him to guard himself from intemperance: a fine fellow if he would n't drink."

"You horrid old humbug, what nonsense are you muttering there?"

"Yes, yes; Solomon says, who hath red eyes and caruncles—they that mix their lash. Pure mejd never injured any one. Tell him so from me: it's an old man's advice, and I have drunk some hogheads of it."

With these words he ceased to speak, while his head, falling gently forward upon his chest, proclaimed him sound asleep.

"Adieu! then, for the last time," said I, slapping him gently on the shoulder: "and now for the road."

CHAPTER LVII....Cuesta.

The second day of our journey was drawing to a close as we came in view of the Spanish army.

The position they occupied was an undulating plain beside the Teitar river: the country presented no striking feature of picturesque beauty; but the scene before us needed no such aid to make it one of the most interesting kind. From the little mountain path we travelled, we beheld beneath a force of thirty thousand men drawn up in battle array; dense columns of infantry, alternating with squadrons of horse or dark masses of artillery, dotted the wide plain, the bright steel glittering in the rich sunset of a July evening, when not a breath of air was stirring: the very banners hung down listlessly; and not a sound broke the solemn stillness of the hour. All was silent: so impressive and so strange was the spectacle of a vast army thus resting mutely under arms, that I reigned in my horse, and almost doubted the reality of the scene as I gazed upon it. The dark shadows of the tall mountain were falling across the valley, and a starry sky was already replacing the ruddy glow of sunset as we reached the plain; but still no change took place in the position of the Spanish army.

"Who goes there?" cried a hoarse voice, as we issued from the mountain gorge, and in a moment we found ourselves surrounded by an outpost party. Having explained as well as I was able who I was, and for what purpose I was there, I proceeded to accompany the officer toward the camp.

On my way thither I learned the reason of the singular display of troops which had been so puzzling to me. From an early hour of that day Sir Arthur Wellesley's arrival had been expected, and old Cuesta had drawn up his men for inspection, and remained thus for several hours patiently awaiting his coming; he himself, overwhelmed with years and infirmity, sitting upon his horse the entire time.

As it was not necessary that I should be presented to the General, my report being for the ear of Sir Arthur himself, I willingly availed myself of the hospitality proffered by a Spanish officer of cavalry; and, having provided for the comforts of my tired cattle, and taken a hasty supper, issued forth to look at the troops, which, although it was now growing late, were still in the same attitude.

Scarcely had I been half an hour thus occupied, when the stillness of the scene was suddenly interrupted by the loud report of a large gun, immediately followed by a long roll of musketry, while, at the same moment, the bands of the different regiments struck up; and, as if by magic, a blaze of red light streamed across the dark ranks: this was effected by pine torches, held aloft at intervals, throwing a lurid glow upon the grim and swarthy features of the Spaniards, whose brown uniforms and slouching hats presented a most picturesque effect as the red light fell upon them.

The swell of the thundering cannon grew louder and nearer; the shouldering of muskets, the clash of sabres, and the hoarse roll of the drum, mingling in one common din. I at once guessed that Sir Arthur had arrived, and as I turned the flank of a battalion, I saw the staff approaching.

Nothing can be conceived more striking than their advance. In the front rode old Cuesta himself, clad in the costume of a past century; his slashed doublet and trunk hose reminding one of a more chivalrous period; his heavy unwieldy figure looming from side to side, and threatening at each moment to fall from his saddle. On each side of him walked two figures gorgeously dressed, whose duty appeared to be to sustain the chief in his seat. At his side rode a far different figure: mounted upon a slight made, active thoroughbred, whose drawn flanks bespoke a long and weary journey, sat Sir Arthur Wellesley; a plain blue frock and gray trousers being his unpretending costume; but the eagle glance which he threw around on every side, the quick motion of his hand as he pointed hither and thither among the dense battalions, bespoke him every inch a soldier. Behind them came a brilliant staff, glittering in aiguillettes and golden trappings, among whom I recognized some well remembered faces; our gallant leader at the Douro, Sir Charles Stewart, among the number.

As they passed the spot where I was standing, the torch of a foot soldier behind me flared suddenly out, and threw a strong flash upon the party. Cuesta's horse grew frightened and plunged so fearfully for a minute, that the poor old man could scarcely keep his seat. A smile shot across Sir Arthur's features at the moment; but the next instant he was grave and steadfast as before.

A wretched hovel, thatched and in ruins, formed the head quarters of the Spanish army, and thither the staff now bent their steps; a supper being provided there for our commander-in-chief and the officers of his suite. Although not of the privileged party, I lingered round the spot for some time, anxiously expecting to find some friend or acquaintance, who might tell me the news of our people, and what events had occurred in my absence.

CHAPTER LVIII....The Letter.

The hours passed slowly over, and I at length grew weary of waiting. For some time I had amused myself with observing the slouching gait and unsoldier-like air of the Spaniards as they lounged carelessly about; looking in dress, gesture and appointment, far more like a guerilla than a regular force; then, again, the strange contrast of the miserable hut with falling chimney and ruined walls, to the glitter of the mounted guard of honor who sat motionless beside it, served to pass the time; but, as the night was already far advanced, I turned toward my quarters, hoping that the next morning might gratify my curiosity about my friends.

Beside the tent where I was billeted I found Mike in waiting, who, the moment he saw me, came hastily forward with a letter in his hand. An officer of Sir Arthur's staff had left it while I was absent, desiring Mike on no account to omit its delivery the first instant he met me. The hand—not a very legible one—was perfectly unknown to me, and the appearance of the billet such as betrayed no over-scrupulous care in the writer.

I trimmed my lamp leisurely; threw a fresh log upon the fire; disposed myself completely at full length beside it; and then proceeded to form acquaintance with my unknown correspondent. I will not attempt any description of the feelings which gradually filled me as I read on. The letter itself will suggest them to those who know my story. It ran thus:

"Placentia, July 8th, 1809.

"Dear O'Malley,

"Although I'd rather march to Lisbon barefoot than write three lines, Fred Power insists upon my turning scribe, as he has a notion you'll be up at Cuesta's head quarters about this time. You're in a nice scrape, devil a lie in it: here has Fred been fighting that fellow Trevillian for you; all because you would not have patience and fighting him yourself, the morning you left the Douro. So much for haste: let it be a lesson to you all your life.

"Poor Fred got the ball in his hip, and the devil a one of the doctors can find it: but he's getting better, any way, and going to Lisbon for change of air. Meanwhile, since Power's been wounded, Trevillian's speaking very hardly of you, and they all say here you must come back—no matter how—and put matters to rights. Fred has placed the thing in my hands, and I'm thinking we'd better call out the 'heavies' by turns for most of them stand by Trevillian. Maurice Quill and myself sat up considering it last night; but, somehow, we do not clearly remember to-day a beautiful plan we hit upon: however, we'll have at it again this evening. Meanwhile, come over here, and let us be doing something. We hear that old Monsoon has blown up a town, a bridge, and a big convent: they must have been hiding the plunder very closely, or he'd never have been reduced to such extremities. We'll have a brush with the French soon. Yours, most eagerly,

"S. O'SHAUGHNESSY."

My first thought, as I ran my eyes over these lines, was to seek for Power's note, written on the morning we parted. I opened it, and to my horror found that it only related to my quarrel with Hammerly. My meeting with Trevillian had been during Fred's absence, and—when he assured me that all was satisfactorily arranged and a full explanation tendered; that nothing interfered with my departure—I utterly forgot that he was only aware of one-half my troubles; and, in the haste and bustle of my departure, had not a moment left me to collect myself and think calmly on the matter. The two letters lay before me, and, as I thought over the stain upon my character thus unwittingly incurred—the blast I have thrown upon my reputation, the wound of my poor friend, who exposed himself for my sake—I grew sick at heart, and the bitter tears of agony burst from my eyes.

That weary night passed slowly over; the blight of all my prospects when they seemed fairest and brightest, presented itself to me in a hundred shapes; and when, overcome by fatigue and exhaustion, I closed my eyes to sleep, it was only to follow up in my dreams my waking thoughts. Morning came at length; but its bright sunshine and balmy air brought no comfort to me: I absolutely dreaded to meet my brother officers; I felt that, in such a position as I stood, no half or partial explanation could suffice to set me right in their estimation: and yet, what opportunity had I for aught else? Irresolute how to act, I sat leaning my head upon my hands, when I heard a footstep approach: I looked up and saw before me no other than my poor friend Sparks, from whom I had been separated so long. Any other adviser at such a moment would, I acknowledge, have been as welcome; for the poor fellow knew but little of the world and still less of the service. However, one glance convinced me that his heart at least was true, and I shook his outstretched hand with delight. In a few words, he informed me that Merivale had secretly commissioned him to come over, in the hope of meeting me; that, although all the 14th men were persuaded that I was not to blame in what had occurred; yet, that reports so injurious had gone abroad, so many partial and imperfect statements were circulated, that nothing but my return to head-quarters would avail, and that I must not lose a moment in having Trevillian out, with whom all the misrepresentation had originated.

"This, of course," said Sparks, "is to be a secret; Merivale being our colonel."

"Of course," said I: "he can not countenance, much less counsel such a proceeding. Now, then, for the road."

"Yes; but you cannot leave before making your report. Gordon expects to see you at eleven: he told me so last night."

"I cannot help it: I shall not wait; my mind is made up. My career here matters but little in comparison with this horrid charge. I shall be broke, but I shall be avenged."

"Come, come, O'Malley; you are in our hands now, and you must be guided. You shall wait; you shall see Gordon: half an hour will make your report, and I have relays of horses along the road, and we shall reach Placentia by nightfall."

There was a tone of firmness in this, so unlike anything I ever looked for in the speaker, and withal so much of foresight and precaution, that I could scarcely credit my senses as he spoke. Having, at length, agreed to his proposal, Sparks left me to think over my return to the legion, promising that, immediately after my interview with the military secretary, we should start together for head-quarters.

CHAPTER LIX....Major O'Shaughnessy.

"This is Major O'Shaughnessy's quarters, sir," said a sergeant, as he stopped short at the door of a small low house in the midst of an olive plantation; an Irish wolf dog—the well-known companion of the major—lay stretched across the entrance, watching with eager and bloodshot eyes the process of cutting up a bullock, which two soldiers in undress jackets were performing within a few yards of the spot.

Stepping cautiously across the savage-looking sentinel, I entered the little hall, and, finding no one near, passed into a small room, the door of which lay half open.

A very palpable odor of cigars and brandy proclaimed, even without his presence, that this was O'Shaughnessy's sitting-room; so I sat myself down upon an old-fashioned sofa to wait patiently for his return, which I heard would be immediately after the evening parade. Sparks had become knocked out during our ride; so that for the last three leagues I was alone, and, like most men in such circumstances, pressed on only the harder. Completely worn-out for want of rest, I had scarcely placed myself on the sofa when I fell sound asleep. When I awoke, all was dark around me, save the faint flickering of the wood-embers on the hearth, and, for some moments, I could not remember where I was; but, by degrees, recollection came, and, as I thought over my position and its possible consequences, I was again nearly dropping to sleep, when the door suddenly opened, and a heavy step sounded on the floor.

I lay still and spoke not as a large figure in a cloak approached the fire-place, and, stooping down, endeavored to light a candle at the fast-expiring fire.

I had little difficulty in detecting the major, even by the half light: a muttered execration upon the candle, given with an energy that only an Irishman ever bestows upon slight matters, soon satisfied me on this head.

"May the devil fly away with the commissary and the chandler to the forces! Ah! you've lit at last."

With these words he stood up, and, his eyes falling on me at the moment, he sprang a yard or two backward, exclaiming, as he did so, "The blessed Virgin be near us, what's this!"—a most energetic crossing of himself accompanying his words: my pale and haggard face, when suddenly presented to his, having suggested to the worthy major the impression of a supernatural visitor: a hearty burst of laughter, which I could not resist, was my only answer; and the next moment O'Shaughnessy was wrenching my hand in a grasp like a steel vice.

"Upon my conscience, I thought it was your ghost; and, if you kept quiet a minute longer, I was going to promise you Christian burial, and as many masses for your soul as my uncle the bishop could say between this and Easter. How are you, my boy?—a little thin and something paler, I think, than when you left us."

Having assured him that fatigue and hunger were in a great measure the cause of my sickly looks, the major proceeded to place before me the débris of his day's dinner, with a sufficiency of bottles to satisfy a mess table, keeping up as he went a running fire of conversation.

"I'm as glad as if the Lord took the senior major, to see you here this night. With the blessing of Providence, we'll shoot Trevillian in the morning, and any more of the heavies that like it. You are an ill-treated man, that's what it is; and Dan O'Shaughnessy says it. Help yourself, my boy: crusty old port in that bottle as ever you touched your lips to. Power's getting all right. It was contract powder, warranted not to kill. Bad luck to the commissaries once more! With such ammunition, Sir Arthur does right to trust most to the bayonet. And how is Monsoon, the old rogue?"

"Gloriously: living in the midst of wine and olives."

"No fear of him, the old sinner: but he is a fine fellow, after all: Charley, you are eating nothing, boy."

"To tell you the truth, I'm far more anxious to talk with you at this moment than aught else."

"So you shall: the night's young. Meanwhile, I had better not delay matters: you want to have Trevillian out; is not that so?"

"Of course, you are aware how it happened?"

"I know every thing. Go on with your supper, and don't mind me; I'll be back in twenty minutes or less."

Without waiting for any reply, he once more threw his cloak around him, and strode out of the room. Once more I was alone: but already my frame of mind was altered: the cheering tone of my reckless, gallant countryman had raised my spirits, and I felt animated by his very manner.

An hour elapsed before the major returned, and, when he did come, his appearance and gestures bespoke anger and disappointment. He threw himself hurriedly into a seat, and for some minutes never spoke.

"The world's beautifully changed, any how, since I began it, O'Malley—when you thanked a man civilly that asked you to fight him: the devil take the cowards, say I."

"What has happened? tell me, I beseech you?"

"He won't fight," said the major, blurring out the words as if they would choke him.

"He'll not fight! and why?"

The major was silent: he seemed confused and embarrassed; he turned from the fire to the table, from the table to the fire, filled out a glass of wine, drank it hastily off, and, springing from his chair, paced the room with long, impatient strides.

"My dear O'Shaughnessy, explain, I beg of you. Does he refuse to meet me for any reason?"

"He does," said the major, turning on me a look of deep feeling as he spoke; "and he does it to ruin you, my boy; but, as sure as my name is Dan, he'll fail this time. He was sitting with his friend Beaufort when I reached his quarters, and received me with all the ceremonious politeness he well knows how to assume. I told him in a few words the object of my visit; upon which Trevillian, standing up, referred me to his friend for a reply, and left the room. I thought that all was right, and sat down to discuss, as I believed, preliminaries, when the cool puppy, with his back to the fire, carelessly lisped out, 'It can't be, major: your friend is too late.'"

"Too late! too late!" said I.

"Yes, precisely so: not up to time; the affair should have come off some six weeks since. We won't meet him now."

"This is really your answer?"

"This is really my answer; and not only so, but the decision of our mess."

"What I said after this, he may remember. Devil take me if I can; but I have a vague recollection of saying something, the aforesaid mess will never petition the Horse Guards to put on their regimental colors: and here I am—"

With these words the major gulped down a full goblet of wine, and once more resumed his walk through the room. I shall not attempt to record the feelings which agitated me during the major's recital. In one rapid glance I saw the aim of my vindictive enemy. My honor, not my life, was the object he sought for; and ten thousand times more than ever did I pant for the opportunity to confront him in a deadly combat.

CHAPTER LX....Preliminaries.

I awoke refreshed on the following morning, and came down to breakfast with a lighter heart than I had even hoped for; a secret feeling that all would go well had somehow taken possession of me, and I longed for O'Shaughnessy's coming, trusting that he might be able to confirm my hopes. His servant informed me that the major had been absent since daybreak, and left orders that he was not to be waited for at breakfast.

I was not destined, however, to pass a solitary time in his absence; for every moment brought some new arrival to visit me, and during the morning the colonel and every officer of the regiment not on actual duty came over. I soon learned that the feeling respecting Trevillian's conduct was one of unmixed condemnation among my own corps; but that a kind of party spirit which had subsisted for some months between the regiment he belonged to and the fourteenth, had given a graver character to the affair, and induced many men to take up his views of the transaction; and, although I heard of none who attributed my absence to any dislike to a meeting, yet there were several who conceived that, by not going at the time, I had forfeited all claim to satisfaction at his hands.

"Now that Merivale is gone," said an officer to me, as the colonel left the room, "I may confess to you that he sees nothing to blame in your conduct throughout, and, even had you been aware of how matters were circumstanced, your duty was too imperative to have preferred your personal considerations to it."

"Does any one know where Conyers is?" said Baker. "The story goes that Conyers can assist us here. Conyers is at Zarza la Mayor with the 28th: but what can he do?"

"That I'm not able to tell you: but I know O'Shaughnessy heard something at parade this morning, and has set off in search of him on every side."

"Was Conyers ever out with Trevillian?"

"Not as a principal, I believe. The report is, however, that he knows more about him than other people, as Tom certainly does of everybody."

"It is rather a new thing for Trevillian to refuse a meeting. They say, O'Malley, he has heard of your shooting!"

"No, no," said another, "he cares very little for any man's pistol. If the story be true, he fires a second or two before his adversary; at least, it was in that way he killed Caryfort!"

Here comes the great O'Shaughnessy! cried some one at the window; and the next moment the heavy gallop of a horse was heard along the causeway.

In an instant we all rushed to the door to receive him.

"It's all right, lads," cried he as he came up, "we have him this time."

"How? when? why? In what way have you managed?" fell from a dozen voices, as the major elbowed his way through the crowd to the sitting-room.

"In the first place," said O'Shaughnessy, drawing a long breath, "I have promised secrecy as to the steps of this transaction: secondly, if I had n't it would puzzle me to break it for I'll be hanged if I know more than yourselves. Tom Conyers wrote me a few lines for Trevillian; and Trevillian pledges himself to meet our friend; and that's all we need know or care for."

"Then you have seen Trevillian this morning?"

"No, Beaufort met me at the village: but even now it seems this affair is never to come off. Trevillian has been sent with a forage party toward Lesca: however, that can't be a long absence. But, for Heaven's sake! let me have some breakfast."

While O'Shaughnessy proceeded to the attack of the viands before him, the others chatted about in little groups, but all wore the pleased and happy looks of men who had rescued their friend from a menaced danger. As for myself, my heart swelled with gratitude to the kind fellows around me.

"How has Conyers assisted us at this juncture?" was my first question to O'Shaughnessy, when we were once more alone.

"I am not at liberty to speak on that subject, Charley. But, be satisfied, the reasons for which Trevillian meets you are fair and honorable."

"I am content."

"The only thing now to be done is, to have the meeting as soon as possible."

"We are all agreed upon that point," said I; "and the more so, as the matter had better be decided before Sir Arthur's return."

"Quite true; and now, O'Malley, you had better join your people as soon as may be, and it will put a stop to all talking about the matter."

The advice was good, and I lost no time in complying with it, and, when I joined the regiment that day at mess, it was with a light heart and a cheerful spirit; for, come what might of the affair, of one thing I was certain—my character was now put above any reach of aspersion, and my reputation beyond attack.

CHAPTER LXI....All Right.

Some days after coming back to head-quarters, I was returning from a visit I had been making to a friend at one of the outposts, when an officer whom I knew slightly, overtook me and informed me that Major O'Shaughnessy had been to my quarters in search of me, and had sent persons in different directions to find me.

Suspecting the object of the major's haste, I hurried on at once, and, as I rode up to the spot, found him in the midst of a group of officers, engaged, to all appearance, in most eager conversation. "O, here he comes," cried he as I cantered up. "Come, my boy, doff the blue frock, as soon as you can, and turn out in your best fitting black. Every thing has been settled for this evening at seven o'clock, and we have no time to lose."

"I understand you," said I, "and shall not keep you waiting." So saying, I sprang from the saddle and hastened to my quarters; as I entered the room I was followed by O'Shaughnessy, who closed the door after him as he came in; and, having turned the key in it, sat down beside the table, and, folding his arms, seemed buried in reflection. As I proceeded with my toilet, he returned no answers to the numerous questions I put to him, either as to the time of Trevillian's return, the place of the meeting or any other part of the transaction.

His attention seemed to wander far from all around and about him: and, as he muttered indistinctly to himself, the few words I could catch bore not in the remotest degree upon the matter before us.

"I have written a letter or two here, Major," said I, opening my writing-desk; in case any thing happens, you will look to the few things I have mentioned here. Somehow, I could not write to poor Fred Power; but you must tell him from me that his noble conduct toward me was the last thing I spoke of."

"What confounded nonsense you are talking!" said O'Shaughnessy, springing from his seat and crossing the room with tremendous strides, "croaking away there as if the bullet was in your thorax. Hang it, man, bear up!"

"But, Major, my dear friend, what the deuce are you thinking of! The few things I mentioned—"

"The devil! you are not going over it all again, are you?" said he, in a voice of no measured tone.

I now began to feel irritated in turn, and really looked at him for some seconds in considerable amazement. That he should have mistaken the directions I was giving him, and attributed them to any cowardice, was too insulting a thought to bear; and yet how otherwise was I to understand the very coarse style of his interruption?

At length, my temper got the victory, and, with a voice of most measured calmness, I said, "Major O'Shaughnessy, I am grateful, most deeply grateful, for the part you have acted toward me in this difficult business: at the same time, as you now appear to disapprove of my conduct and bearing, when I am most firmly determined to alter nothing, I shall beg to relieve you of the unpleasant office of my friend."

"Heaven grant that you could do so!" said he, interrupting me, while his clasped hands and eager look attested the vehemence of his wish. He paused for a moment; then, springing from his chair, rushed toward me, and threw his arms around me. "No, my boy, I can't do it; I can't do it. I have tried to bully myself into insensibility for this evening's work—I have endeavored to be rude to you, that you might insult me, and steel my heart against what might happen: but it won't do, Charley; it won't do."

With these words the big tears rolled down his stern cheeks, and his voice became thick with emotion.

"But for me, and all this need not have happened. I know it; I feel it; I hurried on this meeting: your character stood fair and unblemished without that; at least they tell me so now; and I still have to assure you—"

"Come, my dear, kind friend, don't give way in this fashion. You have stood manfully by me through every step of the road; don't desert me on the threshold of—"

"The grave, O'Malley?"

"I don't think so, Major; but see, half-past six. Look to these pistols for me. Are they likely to object to hair triggers?"

A knocking at the door turned off our attention, and the next moment Baker's voice was heard.

"O'Malley, you'll be close run for time: the meeting-place is all three miles from this!"

I seized the key and opened the door; at the same instant O'Shaughnessy rose and turned toward the window, holding one of the pistols in his hand.

"Look at that Baker; what a sweet tool it is," said he, in a voice that actually made me start: not a trace of his late excitement remained. His usually dry, half-humorous manner had returned, and his droll features were as full of their own easy, devil-may-care fun as ever.

"Here comes the drag," said Baker. "We can drive nearly all the way, unless you prefer riding."

"Of course not. Keep your hand steady, Charley, and, if you don't bring him down with that saw-handle, you're not your uncle's nephew."

With these words we mounted into the tax-cart, and set off for the meeting-place.

CHAPTER LXII....The Duel.

A small and narrow ravine between two furze-covered dells led to the open space where the meeting had been arranged for. As we reached this, therefore, we were obliged to descend from the drag, and proceed the remainder of the way afoot. We had not gone many yards when a step was heard approaching, and the next moment Beaufort appeared. His usually easy and déagé air was certainly tinged with somewhat of constraint; and, though his taily tinged and half smile was as perfect as ever, a slightly soft voice and about the lip, and a quick and nervous flurried expression about the eye, bespoke a heart not completely at motion of his eyebrow, bespoke a heart not completely at ease. He lifted his foraging cap most ceremoniously to salute us as we came up, and casting an anxious look to see if any others were following, stood quite still.

"I think it right to mention, Major O'Shaughnessy," said he, in a voice of most dulcet sweetness, "that I am the only friend of Captain Trevillian on the ground; and, though I have not the slightest objection to Captain Baker being present, I hope you will see the propriety of limiting the witnesses to the three persons now here."

"Upon my conscience, as far as I am concerned, or my friend either, we are perfectly indifferent if we fight before three or three thousand. In Ireland, we rather like a crowd."

"Of course, then, as you see no objection to my proposition, I may count upon your co-operation in the event of any intrusion; I mean, that while we, upon our side, will not permit any of our friends to come forward, you will equally exert yourself with yours."

"Here we are, Baker and myself; neither more nor less: we expect no one, and want no one; so that I humbly conceive all the preliminaries you are talking of will never be required."

Beaufort tried to smile, and bit his lips, while a small red spot upon his cheek told that some deeper feeling of irritation than the mere careless manner of the major could account for, still rankled in his bosom. We now walked on without speaking, except occasionally some passing observation of Beaufort upon the fineness of the evening, or the rugged nature of the road, broke the silence. As we emerged from the little mountain pass into the open meadow land, the tall and soldier-like figure of Trevillian was the first object that presented itself; he was standing beside a little stone cross, that stood above a holy well, and seemed occupied in deciphering the inscription. He turned at the noise of our approach, and calmly waited our coming. His eye glanced quickly from the features of O'Shaughnessy to those of Baker; but seeming rapidly reassured as he walked forward, his face at once recovered its usual severity and its cold impressive look of sternness.

"All right," said Beaufort, in a whisper, the tones of which I overheard, as he drew near to his friend. Trevillian smiled in return, but did not speak. During the few moments which passed in conversation between the seconds, I turned from the spot with Baker, and had scarcely time to address a question to him, when O'Shaughnessy called out, "Hollo, Baker!—come here a moment!" The three seemed now in eager discussion for some minutes, when Baker walked toward Trevillian, and saying something, appeared to wait for his reply. This being obtained, he joined the others, and the moment afterward came to where I was standing. "You are to toss for the first shot, O'Malley. O'Shaughnessy has made that proposition, and the others agree that, with two crack marksmen, it is perhaps the fairest way. I suppose you have no objection?"

"Of course, I shall make none. Whatever O'Shaughnessy decides for me I am ready to abide by."

"Well, then, as to the distance?" said Beaufort, loud enough to be heard by me where I was standing. O'Shaughnessy's reply I could not catch, but it was evident from the tone of both parties, that some difference existed on the point.

"Captain Baker shall decide between us," said Beaufort, at length, and they all walked away to some distance. During all the while I could perceive that Trevillian's uneasiness and impatience seemed extreme—he looked from the speakers to the little mountain pass, and strained his eyes in every direction. It was clear that he dreaded some interruption. At last, unable any longer to control his feelings, he called out, "Beaufort, I say, what the devil are we waiting for now?"

"Nothing, at present," said Beaufort, as he came forward with a dollar in his hand. "Come, Major O'Shaughnessy, you shall call for your friend."

He pitched the piece of money as he spoke, high into the air, and watched it as it fell on the soft grass beneath.

"Head! for a thousand," cried O'Shaughnessy, running over and stooping down; "and head it is!"

"You've won the first shot," whispered Baker; "for Heaven's sake, be cool!"

Beaufort grew deadly pale as he bent over the crown piece, and seemed scarcely to have courage to look his friend in the face. Not so Trevillian; he pulled off his gloves without the slightest semblance of emotion, buttoned up his well-fitting black frock to the throat, and, throwing a rapid glance around, seemed only eager to begin the combat.

"Fifteen paces, and the words 'one—two.'"

"Exactly. My cane shall mark that spot—"

"Devilish long paces you make them," said O'Shaughnessy, who did not seem to approve of the distance. "They have some confounded advantage in this, depend upon it," said the major, in a whisper, to Baker.

"Are you ready?" inquired Beaufort.

"Ready, quite ready!"

"Take your ground, then!"

As Trevillian moved forward to his place, he muttered something to his friend. I did not hear the first part, but the latter words which met me were ominous enough—"for as I intend to shoot him, 'tis just as well as it is."

Whether this was meant to be overheard, and intimidate me, I knew not; but its effect proved directly opposite. My firm resolution to hit my antagonist was now confirmed, and no compunctious visitings unnerved my arm. As we took our places, some little delay again took place, the flint of my pistol having fallen; and thus we remained full ten or twelve seconds, steadily regarding each other. At length, O'Shaughnessy came forward, and, putting my weapon in my hand, whispered low, "Remember you have but one chance."

"You are both ready?" cried Beaufort.

"Ready!"

"Then, one—two—"

The last word was lost in the report of my pistol, which went off at the instant. For a second, the flash and smoke obstructed my view; but the moment after, I saw Trevillian stretched upon the ground, with his friend kneeling beside him. My first impulse was to rush over, for now all feeling of enmity was buried in most heartfelt anxiety for his fate; but, as I was stepping forward, O'Shaughnessy called out, "Stand fast, boy, he's only wounded!" and the same moment he rose slowly from the ground, with the assistance of his friend, and looked with the same wild gaze around him. Such a look! I shall never forget it; there was that intense expression of searching anxiety, as if he sought to trace the outlines of some visionary spirit as it receded before him: quickly re-assured, as it seemed, by the glance he threw on all sides, his countenance lighted up, not with pleasure, but with a fiendish expression of revengeful triumph, which even his voice evinced as he called out,—"It's my turn now."

I felt the words in their full force, as I stood silently awaiting my death-wound; the pause was a long one; twice did he interrupt his friend, as he was about to give the word, by an expression of suffering, pressing his hand upon his side, and seeming to writhe with torture; yet this was mere counterfeit.

O'Shaughnessy was now coming forward to interfere and prevent these interruptions, when Trevillian called out, in a firm tone, "I'm ready!" The words "one—two," the pistol slowly rose, his dark eye measured me coolly, steadily; his lip curled, and just as I felt that my last moment of life had arrived, a heavy sound of a horse galloping along the rocky causeway seemed to take off his attention. His frame trembled, his hand shook, and, jerking up his weapon, the ball passed high above my head.

"You bear me witness, I fired in the air," said Trevillian, while large drops of perspiration rolled from his forehead, and his features worked, as if in a fit.

"You saw it, sir, and you, Beaufort, my friend—you also—speak! Why will ye not speak?"

"Be calm, Trevillian; be calm, for Heaven's sake. What's the matter with you?"

"The affair is then ended," said Baker, "and most happily so. You are, I hope, not dangerously wounded."

As he spoke, Trevillian's features grew deadly livid: his half-open mouth quivered slightly; his eyes became fixed, and his arm dropped heavily beside him, and, with one low, faint moan, he fell fainting to the ground.

As we bent over him, I now perceived that another person had joined our party: he was a short, determined-looking man, of about forty, with black eyes and aquiline features. Before I had time to guess who it might be, I heard O'Shaughnessy address him as Colonel Conyers.

"He is dying!" said Beaufort, still stooping over his friend, whose cold hand he grasped within his own: "poor, poor fellow!"

"He fired in the air," said Baker, as he spoke in reply to a question from Conyers: what he answered I heard not; but Baker rejoined,

"Yes, I am certain of it. We all saw it."

"Had you not better examine his wounds?" said Conyers, in a tone of sarcastic irony, I could almost have struck him for.

"Is your friend not hit? perhaps, he is bleeding?"

"Yes," said O'Shaughnessy, "let us look to the poor fellow now." So saying, with Beaufort's aid, he unbuttoned his frock, and succeeded in opening the waistcoat: there was no trace of blood anywhere, and the idea of internal hemorrhage at once occurred to us; when Conyers, stooping down, pushed me aside, saying, at the same time, "Your fears for his safety need not distress you much: look here." As he spoke, he tore open his shirt, and disclosed to our almost doubting senses a vest of chain mail armor, fitting close next the skin, and completely pistol proof.

I cannot describe the effect this sight produced upon us. Beaufort sprang to his feet with a bound, as he screamed out, rather than spoke, "No man believes me to have been aware—"

"No, no, Beaufort; your reputation is very far removed from such a stain," said Conyers.

O'Shaughnessy was perfectly speechless; he looked from one to the other, as though some unexplained mystery still remained, and only seemed restored to any sense of consciousness as Baker said, "I can feel no pulse at his wrist: his heart, too, does not beat." Conyers placed his hand upon his bosom, then felt along his throat, lifted up an arm, and, letting it fall heavily upon the ground, he muttered, "He is dead."

It was true. No wound had pierced him: the pistol bullet was found within his clothes. Some tremendous conflict of the spirit within, had snapped the cords of life, and the strong man had perished in his agony.

CHAPTER LXIII....News from Galway.

I have but a vague and most imperfect recollection of the events which followed this dreadful scene; for some days my faculties seemed stunned and paralyzed, and my thoughts clung to the minute detail of the ground—the persons about—the mountain path—and most of all, the half-stifled cry that spoke the broken heart, with a tenacity that verged upon madness.

A court martial was appointed to inquire into the affair; and although I have been since told that my department was calm, and my answers were firm and collected, yet I remember nothing of the proceedings.

The inquiry, through a feeling of delicacy for the friends of him who was no more, was made as brief and as private as possible. Beaufort proved the facts, which exonerated me from any imputation in the matter; and upon the same day, the court delivered the decision, "that Lieutenant O'Malley was not guilty of the charges preferred against him, and that he should be released from arrest, and join his regiment."

Nothing could be more kind and considerate than the conduct of my brother officers; a hundred little plans and devices for making me forget the late unhappy event were suggested and practised: and I look back to that melancholy period, marked, as it was, by the saddest circumstance of my life, as one in which I received more of truly friendly companionship, than even my palmiest days of prosperity boasted.

While, therefore, I deeply felt the good part my friends were performing toward me, I was still totally unsuited to join in the happy current of their daily pleasures and amusements: the gay and unreflecting character of O'Shaughnessy—the careless merriment of my brother officers, jarred upon my nerves, and rendered me irritable and excited; and I sought in lonely rides and unfrequented walks, the peace of spirit that calm reflection and a firm purpose for the future rarely fail to lead to.

There is, in deep sorrow, a touch of the prophetic. It is at seasons when the heart is bowed down with grief, and the spirit wasted with suffering, that the veil which conceals the future seems to be removed, and a glance, short and fleeting as the lightning flash, is permitted us, into the gloomy valley before us.

Misfortunes, too, come not singly—the scared heart is not suffered to heal from one affliction ere another succeeds it; and this anticipation of the coming evil, is, perhaps, one of the most poignant features of grief—the ever watchful apprehension—the ever rising question, "What next?" is a torture that never sleeps.

This was the frame of my mind for several days after I returned to my duty—a morbid sense of some threatened danger being my last thought at night, and my first on awakening. I had not heard from home since my arrival in the Peninsula: a thousand vague fancies haunted me now, that some brooding misfortune awaited me. My poor uncle never left my thoughts. Was he well—was he happy? Was he, as he ever wished to be, surrounded by the friends he loved—the old familiar faces, around the hospitable hearth, his kindness had hallowed in my memory as something sacred? O! could I but see his manly smile, or hear his voice! Could I but feel his hand upon my head, as he was wont to press it, while words of comfort fell from his lips, and sunk into my heart!

Such were my thoughts one morning, as I sauntered from my quarters alone and unaccompanied. I had not gone far, when my attention was aroused by the noise of a mule cart, whose jingling bells and clattering timbers announced its approach by the road I was walking. Another turn of the way brought it into view; and I saw from the gay costume of the driver, as well as a small orange flag which decorated the conveyance, that it was the mail cart, with letters from Lisbon.

Full as my mind was with thoughts of home, I turned hastily back, and retraced my steps toward the camp. When I reached the adjutant-general's quarters, I found a considerable number of officers assembled; the report that the post had come was a rumor of interest to all, and accordingly every moment brought fresh arrivals, pouring in from all sides, and eagerly inquiring "if the bags had been opened?" The scene of riot, confusion, and excitement when that event did take place, exceeded all belief, each man reading his letter half aloud, as if his private affairs and domestic concerns must interest his neighbors, amid a volley of exclamations of surprise, pleasure, or occasionally anger, as the intelligence severally suggested—the disappointed expectants, cursing their idle correspondents, bemoaning their fate about remittances that never arrived, or drafts never honored, while here and there some public benefactor, with an outspread "Times," or "Chronicle," was retelling the narrative of our own exploits in the Peninsula, or the more novel changes in the world of politics, since we left England. A cross-fire of news and London gossip ringing on every side, made up a perfect Babel, most difficult to form an idea of. The jargon partook of every accent and intonation the empire boasts of; and from the sharp precision of the North Tweeder to the broad doric of Kerry, every portion, almost every county of Great Britain had its representative. Here was a Scotch paymaster, in a lugubrious tone detailing to his friend the apparently not over-welcome news, that Mistress M'Elwain had just been safely delivered of twins, which, with their mother, were doing as well as possible. Here an eager Irishman, turning over the pages rather than reading his letter, while he exclaimed to a friend—

"O, the devil a rap she's sent me. The old story about runaway tenants and distress notices—sorrow else tenants seem to do in Ireland than run every half-year."

A little apart, some sentimental-looking cockney was devouring a very crossed epistle, which he pressed to his lips whenever any one looked at him, while a host of others satisfied themselves by reading in a kind of buzzing undertone, every now and then interrupting themselves with some broken exclamation as commentary—such as, "of course she will!"—"never knew him better!"—"that's the girl for my money!"—"fifty per cent.—the devil!"—and so on. At last I was beginning to weary of the scene, and, finding that there appeared to be nothing for me, was turning to leave the place, when I saw a group of two or three endeavoring to spell the address of a letter.

"That's an Irish post-mark, I'll swear," said one, "but who can make anything of the name? It's devilish like Otaheite—is n't it?"

"I wish my tailor wrote as illegibly," said another; "I'd keep up a most animated correspondence with him."

"Here, O'Shaughnessy, you know something of savage life—spell us this word here."

"Show it here—what nonsense—it's as plain as the nose on my face!—Master Charles O'Malley, in foreign parts!"

A roar of laughter followed the announcement, which, at any other time, perhaps, I should have joined in, but which now grated sadly upon my ruffled feelings.

"Here, Charley, this is for you," said the major; and added in a whisper—"and, upon my conscience, between ourselves, your friend, whoever he is, has a strong action against his writing-master—devil such a flat ever I looked at!"

One glance satisfied me as to my correspondent. It was from Father Rush, my old tutor. I hurried eagerly from the spot—and, regaining my quarters, locked the door, and with a beating heart broke the seal, and began as well as I was able to decipher his letter. The hand was cramped and stiffened with age, and the bold upright letters were gnarled and twisted like a rustic fence, and demanded great patience and much time in unravelling. It ran thus:

"The Priory, Lady-day, 1809.

"MY DEAR MASTER CHARLES: Your uncle's feet are so big and so uneasy that he can't write, and I am obliged to take up the pen myself, to tell you how we are doing here since you left us. And, first of all, the master lost the law-suit in Dublin, all for want of a Galway jury; but they don't go up to town for strong reasons they had; and the Curranolick property is gone to Ned M'Manus, and may the devil do him good with it! Peggy Maher left this on Tuesday; she was complaining of a weakness; she's gone to consult the doctors. I'm sorry for poor Peggy.

"Owen M'Neil beat the Slattery's out of Portumna on Saturday, and Jem, they say, is fractured. I trust it's true, for he never was good, root nor branch, and we've strong reasons to suspect him for drawing the river with a net at night. Sir Harry Boyle sprained his wrist, breaking open his bed-room, that he locked when he was inside. The count and the master were laughing all the evening at him. Matters are going very hard in the county; the people paying their rents regularly, and not caring half as much as they used to about the real gentry, and the old families.

"We kept your birth-day at the Castle in great style—had the militia band from the town, and all the tenants. Mr. James Daly danced with our old friend Mary Green, and sang a beautiful song; and was going to raise the devil, but I interfered; he burnt down half the blue drawing-room the last night with his tricks; not that your uncle cares, God preserve him to us—it's little any thing like that would fret him. The count quarrelled with a young gentleman in the course of the evening, but found out he was only an attorney from Dublin, so he did n't shoot him, but he was ducked in the pond by the people, and your uncle says he hopes they have a true copy of him at home, as they'll never know the original.

"Peter died soon after you went away, but Tim hunts the dogs just as well; they had a beautiful run last Wednesday, and the Lord* sent for him, and gave him a five pound note, but, he says, he'd rather see yourself back again than twice as much: they killed near the big turnip field, and all went down to see where you leaped Badger over the sunk fence; they call it 'Hammerly's Nose' ever since. Bodkin was at Ballinasloe the last fair, limping about with a stick; he's twice as quiet as he used to be, and never beat any one since that morning.

"Nelly Guire, at the cross-roads, wants to send you four pair of stockings she knitted for you; and I have a keg of poteen of Barney's own making this two months, not knowing how to send it; may be Sir Arthur himself would like a taste; he's an Irishman himself, and one we're proud of, too! The Maynooth chaps are flying all about the country, and making us all uncomfortable,—God's will be done, but we used to think ourselves good enough! Your foster sister, Kitty Doolan, had a fine boy: it's to be called after you; and your uncle's to give a christening. He bids me tell you to draw on him when you want money, and that there's £400 ready for you now somewhere in Dublin: I forget the name, and as he's asleep I do n't like asking him. There was a droll devil down here in the summer that knew you well—a Mr. Webber. The master treated him like the lord lieutenant; had dinner parties for him, and gave him Oliver Cromwell to ride over to Meelish. He is expected again for the cock-shooting; for the master likes him greatly. I'm done at last; for my paper is finished and the candle just out: so, with every good wish and every good thought, remember your own old friend, PETER RUSH."

"P. S.—It's Smart and Sykes, Fleet Street, has the money. Father O'Shaughnessy of Ennis bids me ask if you ever met his nephew. If you do, make him jimp! Larry McHale: I hear it's a treat.

"How is Mickey Free going on? There are three decent young women in the parish he promised to marry; and I suppose he's pursuing the same game with the Portuguese. But he was never remarkable for minding his duties. Tell him I am keeping my eye on him. "P. R."

Here concluded this long epistle, and, though there were many parts I could not help smiling at, yet, upon the whole, I felt sad and dispirited. What I had long foreseen and anticipated was gradually accomplishing; the wreck of an old and honored house; the fall of a name once the watchword for all that was benevolent and hospitable in the land.

The termination of the law-suit I knew must have been a heavy blow to my poor uncle, who, every consideration of money apart, felt in a legal combat all the enthusiasm and excitement of a personal conflict: with him there was less a question of to whom the broad acres reverted, so much as whether that "scoundrel, Tom Bassett, the attorney at Athlone, should triumph over us;" or "M'Manus live in the house as master, where his father had officiated as butler." It was at this his Irish pride took offence, and straitened circumstances and narrowed fortunes bore little upon him in comparison with this feeling.

I could see, too, that, with breaking fortunes, bad health was making heavy inroads upon him: and while, with the reckless desperation of ruin, he still kept open house, I could picture to myself his cheerful eye and handsome smile but ill concealing the slow but certain march of a broken heart.

My position was doubly painful; for any advice, had I been calculated to give it, would have seemed an act of delicate interference from one who was to benefit by his own counsel; and, although I had been reared and educated as my uncle's heir, I had no title nor pretension to succeed him other than his kind feelings respecting me. I could, therefore, only look on in silence, and watch the painful progress of our downfall without a power to arrest it.

These were sad thoughts, and came when my heart was already bowed down with its affliction. That my poor uncle might be spared the misery which sooner or later seemed inevitable, was now my only wish; that he might go down to the grave without the imbittering feelings which a ruined fortune and a fallen house bring home to the heart, was all my prayer. Let him but close his eyes in the old wainscoted bedroom, beneath the old roof where his fathers and grandfathers have done so for centuries. Let the faithful followers he has known since his childhood, stand round his bed: while his fast-failing sight recognises each old and well remembered object, and the same bell which rung its farewell to the spirit of its ancestors, toll for him—the last of his race; and as for me, there was the wide world before me, and a narrow resting-place would suffice for a soldier's sepulchre.

As the mail cart was returning the next day to Lisbon, I immediately sat down and replied to the worthy father's letter: speaking as encouragingly as I could of my own prospects. I dwelt much upon what was nearest my heart, and begged of the good priest to watch over my uncle's health, to cheer his spirits, and support his courage; and that I trusted the day was not far distant when I should be once more among them, with many a story of fray and battle field to enliven their fire-sides; pressing him to write frequently to me, I closed my hurried letter, and, having despatched it, sat sorrowfully down to muse over my fortunes.

* To excuse Father Rush for any impiety, I must add, that, by the "Lord," he means "Lord Clanricarde."

CHAPTER LXIV....An Adventure with Sir Arthur.

The events of the last few days impressed me with the weight of years. The awful circumstances of that evening lay heavily at my heart, and, though guiltless of Trevillian's blood, the reproach that conscience ever carries, when one has been involved in a death-scene, never left my thoughts.

For some time previously I had been depressed and dispirited, and the awful shock I had sustained, broke my nerve and unmanned me greatly.

There are times when our sorrows tinge all the colorings of our thoughts, and one pervading hue of melancholy spreads like a pall upon what we have of fairest and brightest on earth. So was it now: I had lost hope and ambition—a sad feeling that my career was destined to misfortune and mishap, gained hourly upon me; and all the bright aspirations of a soldier's glory—all my enthusiasm for the pomp and circumstance of glorious war, fell coldly upon my heart; and I looked upon the chivalry of a soldier's life as the empty pageant of a dream.

In this sad frame of mind I avoided all intercourse with my brother officers—their gay and joyous spirits only jarred upon my brooding thoughts, and, feigning illness, I kept almost entirely to my quarters.

The inactivity of our present life weighed also heavily upon me. The stirring events of a campaign—the march, the bivouac, the piquet, calls forth a certain physical exertion that never fails to react upon the torpid mind.

Forgetting all around me, I thought of home; I thought of those whose hearts I felt were now turning toward me, and considered within myself how I could have exchanged the home—the days of peaceful happiness there, for the life of misery and disappointment I now endured.

A brooding melancholy gained daily more and more upon me. A wish to return to Ireland—a vague and indistinct feeling that my career was not destined for aught of great and good, crept upon me, and I longed to sink into oblivion, forgotten and forgot.

I record this painful feeling here, while it is still a painful memory, as one of the dark shadows that cross the bright sky of our happiest days.

Happy, indeed, are they, as we look back to them, and remember the times we have pronounced ourselves "the most miserable of mankind." This, somehow, is a confession we never make later on in life, when real troubles and true afflictions assail us. Whether we call in more philosophy to our aid, or that our senses become less acute and discerning, I'm sure I know not.

As for me, I confess by far the greater portion of my sorrows seemed to come in that budding period of existence when life is ever fairest and most captivating. Not, perhaps, that the fact was really so, but the spoiled and humored child, whose caprices were law, felt heavily the threatening difficulties of his first voyage. While, as he continued to sail over the ocean of life, he braved the storm and the squall, and felt only gratitude for the favoring breeze that wafted him upon his course.

What an admirable remedy for misanthropy is the being placed in a subordinate condition in life. Had I, at the period I write, been Sir Arthur Wellesley—had I even been Marshal Beresford, to all certainty I'd have played the very devil with his majesty's forces. I'd have brought my rescals to where they'd have been well peppered. That's certain.

But as, luckily for the sake of humanity in general, and the well being of the service in particular, I was merely Lieutenant O'Malley, 14th Light Dragoons—the case was very different. With what heavy censure did I condemn the commander of the forces in my own mind for his want of daring and enterprise. Whole nights did I pass endeavoring to account for his inactivity and lethargy. Why he did not seriatim fall upon Soult, Ney and Victor, and annihilate the French forces, and sack Madrid, I looked upon as little less than a riddle; and yet there he waited, drilling, exercising, and foraging, as if we were at Hounslow. Now, most fortunately here again, I was not Sir Arthur.

Something in this frame of mind I was taking one evening a solitary ride some miles from the camp. Without noticing the circumstance, I had entered a little mountain tract, when, the ground being broken and uneven, I dismounted and proceeded afoot, with the bridle within my arm. I had not gone far when the clatter of a horse's hoofs came rapidly toward me, and, though there was something startling in the pace over such a piece of road, I never lifted my eyes as the horseman came up, but continued my slow progress onward, my head sunk upon my bosom.

"Holloa, sir," cried a sharp voice, whose tones seemed somehow not heard for the first time. I looked up, saw a slight figure, closely buttoned up in a blue horseman's cloak, the collar of which almost entirely hid his features; he wore a plain cocked hat without a feather, and was mounted upon a sharp, wiry-looking hack.

"Holloa, sir! What regiment do you belong to?"

As I had nothing of the soldier about me, save a blue foraging cap, to denote my corps, the tone of the demand was little calculated to elicit a very polished reply; but, preferring as most impertinent to make no answer, I passed on without speaking.

"Did you hear, sir?" cried the same voice in a still louder key. "What's your regiment?"

I now turned round, resolved to question the other in turn, when, to my inexpressible shame and confusion, he had lowered the collar of his cloak, and I saw the features of Sir Arthur Wellesley.

"Fourteenth Light Dragoons, sir," said I, blushing as I spoke.

"Have you not read the general order, sir? Why have you left the camp?"

Now I had not read a general order, nor even heard one for above a fortnight. So I stammered out some bungling answer.

"To your quarters, sir, and report yourself under arrest. What's your name?"

"Lieutenant O'Malley, sir."

"Well, sir, your passion for rambling shall be indulged. You shall be sent to the rear with despatches; and, as the army is in advance, probably the lesson may be serviceable." So saying, he pressed spurs to his horse, and was out of sight in a moment.

CHAPTER LXV....Talavera.

Having been despatched to the rear with orders for General Crawford, I did not reach Talavera till the morning of the 25th. Two days' hard fighting had left the contending armies still face to face, and without any decided advantage on either side.

When I arrived upon the battle-field the combat of the morning was over. It was then ten o'clock, and the troops were at breakfast, if the few ounces of wheat, sparingly dealt out among them, could be dignified by that name. All was, however, life and animation on every side: the merry laugh, the passing jest, the careless look, bespoke the free and daring character of the soldiery, as they sat in groups upon the grass; and, except when a fatigue party passed by, bearing some wounded comrade to the rear, no touch of seriousness rested upon their hardy features. The morning was indeed a glorious one; a sky of unclouded blue stretched above a landscape unsurpassed in loveliness. Far to the right rolled on in placid stream the broad Tagus, bathing in its eddies the very walls of Talavera, the ground from which, to our position, gently undulated across a plain of most fertile richness, and terminated on our extreme left in a bold height, protected in front by a ravine, and flanked by a deep and rugged valley.

The Spaniards occupied the right of the line, connecting with our troops at a rising ground, upon which a strong redoubt had been hastily thrown up. The fourth division and the guards were stationed here, next to whom came Cameron's brigade and the Germans; Mackenzie and Hill holding the extreme left of all, which might be called the key of our position. In the valley beneath the latter were picketed three cavalry regiments, among which I was not long in detecting my gallant friends of the twenty-third.

As I rode rapidly past, saluting some old familiar face at each moment, I could not help feeling struck at the evidence of the desperate battle that had so lately raged there. The whole surface of the hill was one mass of dead and dying, the bear skin of the French grenadier lying side by side with the tartan of the Highlander. Deep furrows in the soil showed the track of the furious cannonade, and the terrible evidences of a bayonet charge were written in the mangled corpses around.

The fight had been maintained without any intermission from daybreak till near nine o'clock that morning, and the slaughter on both sides was dreadful; the mounds of fresh earth on every side told of the soldier's sepulchre, and the unceasing tramp of the pioneers struck sadly upon the ear, as the groans of the wounded blended with the funeral sounds around them.

In front were drawn up the dark legions of France; massive columns of infantry, with dense bodies of artillery alternating along the line. They, too, occupied a gently rising ground; the valley between the two armies being crossed halfway by a little rivulet, and here, during the sultry heat of the morning, the troops on both sides met and mingled to quench their thirst ere the trumpet again called them to the slaughter.

In a small ravine, near the centre of our line, were drawn up Cotton's brigade, of whom the fusiliers formed a part. Directly in front of this were Campbell's brigade, to the left of which, upon a gentle slope, the staff were now assembled. Thither, accordingly, I bent my steps, and, as I came up the little scarp, found myself among the generals of division, hastily summoned by Sir Arthur to deliberate upon a forward movement. The council lasted scarcely a quarter of an hour, and when I presented myself to deliver my report, all the dispositions for the battle had been decided upon, and the commander of the forces, seated upon the grass at his breakfast, looked by far the most unconcerned and uninterested man I had seen that morning.

He turned his head rapidly as I came up, and, before the aid-de-camp could announce me, called out:

"Well, sir, what news of the re-enforcements?"

"They cannot reach Talavera before to-morrow, sir."

"Then, before that we shall not want them. That will do, sir."

So saying, he resumed his breakfast, and I retired, more than ever struck with the surprising coolness of the man upon whom no disappointment seemed to have the slightest influence.

I had scarcely rejoined my regiment, and was giving an account to my brother officers of my journey, when an aide-de-camp came galloping at full speed down the line, and communicating with the several commanding officers as he passed.

What might be the nature of the orders we could not guess at; for no word to fall in followed, and yet it was evident something of importance was at hand. Upon the hill where the staff were assembled, no unusual bustle appeared, and we could see the grey cob of Sir Arthur still being led up and down by the groom, with a dragoon's mantle thrown over him. The soldiers, overcome by the heat and fatigue of the morning, lay stretched around upon the grass, and every thing bespoke a period of rest and refreshment.

"We are going to advance, depend upon it," said a young officer beside me; "the repulse of this morning has been a smart lesson to the French, and Sir Arthur won't leave them without impressing it upon them."

"Hark, what's that?" cried Baker; "listen."

As he spoke, a strain of most delicious music came wafted across the plain. It was from the band of a French regiment, and, mellowed by the distance, it seemed in the calm stillness of the morning air, like something less of earth than heaven. As we listened, the notes swelled upward yet fell; and one by one the different bands seemed to join, till at last the whole air seemed full of the rich flood of melody.

We could now perceive the dragoons were rapidly falling back, while, high above all other sounds, the clanging notes of the trumpet were heard along the line. The hoarse drum now beat to arms, and, soon after, a brilliant staff rode slowly from between two dense bodies of infantry, and, advancing some distance into the plain, seemed to reconnoitre us. A cloud of Polish cavalry, distinguished by their long lances and floating banners, loitered in the rear.

We had not time for further observation, when the drums on our side beat to arms, and the hoarse cry, "Fall in, fall in there, lads!" resounded along the line.

It was one o'clock, and before half an hour the troops had resumed the position of the morning, and stood silent and anxious spectators of the scene before them.

Upon the table land, near the centre of the French position, we could descry the gorgeous tent of King Joseph, around which a large and splendidly accoutred staff were seen standing. Here, too, the bustle and excitement seemed considerable, for to this point the dark masses of the infantry seemed converging from the extreme right, and here we could perceive the royal guards and the reserve now forming in column of attack.

From the crest of the hill down to the valley, the dark, dense ranks extended, the flanks protected by a powerful artillery and deep masses of heavy cavalry. It was evident that the attack was not to commence on our side, and the greatest and most intense anxiety pervaded us as to what part of our line was first to be assailed.

Meanwhile, Sir Arthur Wellesley, who, from the height, had been patiently observing the field of battle, despatched an aid-de-camp at full gallop toward Campbell's brigade, posted directly in advance of us. As he passed swiftly along, he called out, "You're in for it, fourteenth. You'll have to open the ball to-day."

Scarcely were the words spoken, when a signal gun from the French boomed heavily through the still air. The last echo was growing fainter, and the heavy smoke breaking into mist, when the most deafening thunder ever my ears heard, came pealing around us: eighty pieces of artillery had opened upon us, sending a very tempest of bullets upon our line, while midst the smoke and dust we could see the light troops advancing at a run, followed by the broad and massive column in all the terror and majesty of war.

"What a splendid attack. How gallantly they come on!" cried an old veteran officer beside me, forgetting all rivalry in his noble admiration of our enemy.

The intervening space was soon passed, and the tirailleurs falling back as the column came on, the towering masses bore down upon Campbell's division with a loud cry of defiance. Silently and steadily the English infantry awaited the attack, and, returning the fire with one withering volley, were ordered to charge. Scarcely were the bayonets lowered, when the head of the advancing column broke and fled, while Mackenzie's brigade, overlapping the flank, pushed boldly forward, and a scene of frightful carnage followed: for a moment a hand to hand combat was sustained, but the unbroken files and impregnable bayonets of the English conquered, and the French fled back, leaving six guns behind them.

The gallant enemy were troops of tried and proved courage, and scarcely had they retreated when they again formed; but just as they prepared to come forward, a tremendous shower of grape opened upon them from our batteries, while a cloud of Spanish horse assailed them in flank, and nearly cut them in pieces.

While this was passing on the right, a tremendous attack menaced the hill upon which our left was posted. Two powerful columns of French infantry, supported by some regiments of light cavalry, came steadily forward to the attack. Anson's brigade were ordered to charge.

Away they went at top speed; but had not gone above a few hundred yards, when they were suddenly arrested by a deep chasm: here the German hussars pulled short up; but the twenty-third dashing impetuously forward, a scene of terrific carnage ensued—men and horses rolling indiscriminately together under a withering fire from the French squares. Even here, however, British valor quailed not; for Major Francis Ponsonby, forming all who came up, rode boldly upon a brigade of French chasseurs in the rear. Victor, who from the first had watched the movement, at once despatched a lancer regiment against them, and then these brave fellows were absolutely cut to atoms; the few who escaped having passed through the French columns, and reached Bassecour's Spanish division on the far right.

During this time, the hill was again assailed, and even more desperately than before, while Victor himself led on the fourth corps to an attack upon our right and centre.

The guards waited, without flinching, the impetuous rush of the advancing columns; and when, at length, within a short distance, dashed forward with the bayonet, driving every thing before them. The French fell back upon their sustaining masses, and, rallying in an instant, again came forward, supported by a tremendous fire from their batteries. The guards drew back, and the German legion, suddenly thrown into confusion, began to retire in disorder—This was the most critical moment of the day; for, although successful upon the extreme right and left of our line, our centre was absolutely broken. Just at this moment Gordon rode up to our brigade: his face was pale, and his look hurried and excited.

"The forty-eighth are coming: here they are; support them, fourteenth."

These few words were all he spoke; and the next moment the measured tread of a column was heard behind us. On they came like one man, their compact and dense formation looking like some massive wall. Wheeling by companies, they suffered the guards and Germans to retire behind them, and then re-forming into line, they rushed forward with the bayonet. Our artillery opened with a deafening thunder behind them, and then we were ordered to charge.

We came on at a trot: the guards, who had now recovered their formation, cheering us as we proceeded; the smoke of the cannonade obscured everything until we had advanced some distance; but just as we emerged from the line of the gallant forty-eighth, the splendid panorama of the battle-field broke suddenly upon us.

"Charge! forward!" cried the hoarse voice of our colonel, and we were upon them. The French infantry, already broken by the withering musketry of our people, gave way before us, and, unable to form a square, retired fighting, but in confusion, and with tremendous loss, to their position. One glorious cheer from left to right of our line proclaimed the victory, while a deafening discharge of artillery from the French replied to this defiance, and the battle was over. Had the Spanish army been capable of a forward movement, our success at this moment would have been much more considerable; but they did not dare to change their position, and the repulse of our enemy was destined to be all our glory. The French, however, suffered much more severely than we did; and, retiring during the night, fell back behind the Alberche, leaving us the victory and the battle-field.

CHAPTER LXVI.—Night after Talavera.

The night which followed the battle was a sad one.

Through the darkness, and under a fast-falling rain, the hours were spent in searching for our wounded comrades amid the heap of slain upon the field: and the glimmering of the lanterns, as they flickered far and near across the wide plain, bespoke the track of the fatigue parties in their mournful round; while the groans of the wounded rose amid the silence with an accent of heart-rending anguish: so true was it, as our great commander said, "there is nothing more sad than a victory, except a defeat."

Around our bivouac fires, the feeling of sorrowful depression was also evident. We had gained a great victory, it was true: we had beaten the far-famed legions of France upon a ground of their own choosing, led by the most celebrated of their marshals, and under the eyes of the Emperor's own brother; but still we felt all the hazardous daring of our position, and had no confidence whatever in the courage or discipline of our allies; and we saw that in the very mêlée of the battle the efforts of the enemy were directed almost exclusively against our line, so confidently did they undervalue the efforts of the Spanish troops. Morning broke at length, and scarcely was the heavy mist clearing before the red sunlight, when the sounds of file and drum were heard from a distant part of the field. The notes swelled or sunk as the breeze rose or fell, and many a conjecture was hazarded as to their meaning, for no object was well visible for more than a few hundred yards off: gradually, however, they grew nearer and nearer, and at length, as the air cleared, and the hazy vapor evaporated, the bright scarlet uniform of a British regiment was seen advancing at a quick step.

As they came nearer, the well known march of the gallant forty-third was recognized by some of our people, and immediately the rumor fled like lightning—it "is Crawford's brigade;" and so it was: the noble fellow had marched his division the unparalleled distance of sixty English miles in twenty-seven hours. Over a burning sandy soil, exposed to a raging sun, without rations, almost without water, these gallant troops pressed on in the unwearied hope of sharing the glory of the battle-field. One tremendous cheer welcomed the head of the column as they marched past, and continued till the last file had deployed before us.

As these splendid regiments moved by, we could not help feeling what signal service they might have rendered us but a few hours before; their soldierlike bearing, their high and effective state of discipline, their well-known reputation, were in every mouth; and I scarcely think that any corps who stood in the brunt of the mighty battle were the subject of more encomium than the brave fellows who had just joined us.

The mournful duties of the night were soon forgotten in the gay and buoyant sounds on every side. Congratulations, shaking of hands, kind inquiries went round; and, as we looked to the hilly ground where so lately were drawn up in battle array the dark columns of our enemy, and where not one sentinel now remained, the proud feeling of our victory came home to our hearts with the ever thrilling thought, "What will they say at home?"

I was standing amid a group of my brother officers, when I received an order from the colonel to ride down to Talavera for the return of our wounded, as the arrival of the commander-in-chief was momentarily looked for. I threw myself upon my horse, and, setting out at a brisk pace, soon reached the gates.

On entering the town, I was obliged to dismount and proceed on foot. The streets were completely filled with people, treading their way among wagons, forage-carts, and tick-litters: here was a booth filled with all imaginable wares for sale; there, a temporary gin shop established beneath a broken baggage wagon; here, might be seen a merry party throwing dice for a turkey or a kid—there a wounded man with bloodless cheek and tottering step, inquiring the road to the hospital; the accents of agony mingled with the drunken chorus, and the sharp crack of the provost-marshal's whip was heard above the boisterous revelling of the debauchee. All was confusion, bustle, and excitement. The staff-officer, with his flowing plume and glittering epaulettes, wended his way on foot amid the din and bustle unnoticed and uncared for; while the little drummer amused an admiring audience of simple country folk by some wondrous tale of the great victory.

My passage through this dense mass was necessarily a slow one. No one made way for another; discipline for the time was at an end, and with it all respect for rank or position. It was what nothing of mere vicissitude in the fortune of war can equal—the wild orgies of an army the day after a battle.

On turning the corner of a narrow street, my attention was attracted by a crowd which, gathered round a small fountain, seemed, as well as I could perceive, to witness some proceeding with a more than ordinary interest. Exclamations in Portuguese expressive of surprise and admiration were mingled with English oaths and Irish ejaculations, while high above all rose other sounds—the cries of some one in pain and suffering; forcing my way through the dense group, I at length reached the interior of the crowd, when, to my astonishment, I perceived a short, fat, punchy looking man, stripped of his coat and waistcoat, and with his shirt sleeves rolled up to his shoulders, busily employed in operating upon a wounded soldier. Amputation knives, tourniquets, bandages, and all other imaginable instruments for giving and alleviating torture were strewn about him, and from the arrangement and preparation, it was clear that he had pitched upon this spot as an hospital for his patients. While he continued to perform his function with a singular speed and dexterity, he never for a moment ceased a running fire of small talk, now addressed to the patient in particular, now to the crowd at large—sometimes as soliloquy to himself, and, not unfrequently, abstractedly, upon things in general. These little specimens of oratory, delivered in such a place at such a time, and, not least of all in the richest imaginable Cork accent, were sufficient to arrest my steps, and I stopped for some time to observe him.

The patient, who was a large, powerfully-built fellow, had been wounded in both legs by the explosion of a shell, but yet not so severely as to require amputation.

"Does that please you, then?" said the doctor, as he applied some powerful caustic to a wounded vessel, "there's no satisfying the like of you. Quite warm and comfortable ye'll be this morning after that. I saw that same shell coming, and I called out to Maurice Blake, 'by your leave, Maurice, let that fellow pass, he's in a hurry;' and, fai h, I said to myself, there's more where you came from: you're not an only child, and I never liked the family—what are ye grinning for, ye brown thieves?—this was addressed to the Portuguese—"There, now, keep the limb quiet and easy. Upon my conscience, if that shell fell into old Lundy Foot's shop this morning, there'd be plenty of sneezing in Sackville street. Who's next?" said he, looking round with an expression that if no wounded man was ready, that he was quite prepared to carve out a patient for himself. Not exactly relishing the invitation, in the searching that accompanied it, I backed my way through the crowd, and continued my path toward the hospital.

Here the scene which presented itself was shocking beyond belief—frightful and ghastly wounds from shells and cannon shot were seen on all sides; every imaginable species of suffering that man is capable of, was presented to view; while, amid the dead and dying, operations the most painful were proceeding with a haste and bustle that plainly showed how many more waited their turn for similar offices. The stairs were blocked up with fresh arrivals of wounded men, and even upon the corridors and landing-places, the sick were strewn on all sides.

I hurried to that part of the building where my own people were, and soon learned that our loss was confined to about fourteen wounded; five of them were officers: but, fortunately, we lost not a man of our gallant fellows, and Talavera brought us no mourning for a comrade to dampen the exultation we felt in our victory.

CHAPTER LXVII.—The Outpost.

During the three days which succeeded the battle, all things remained as they were before: the enemy had gradually withdrawn all his forces, and our most advanced pickets never came in sight of a French detachment. Still, although we had gained a great victory, our situation was anything but flattering. The most strenuous exertions of the commissariat were barely sufficient to provision the troops; and we had even already but too much experience of how little trust or reliance could be reposed in the most lavish promises of our allies. It was true, our spirits failed us not, but it was rather from an implicit and never-failing confidence in the resources of our great leader, than that any among us could see his way through the dense cloud of difficulty and danger that seemed to envelope us on every side.

To add to the pressing emergency of our position, we learned on the evening of the 31st that Soult was advancing from the north, and, at the head of fourteen thousand chosen troops was in full march upon Placentia; thus threatening our rear, at the very moment too when any further advance was evidently impossible.

On the morning of the first of August, I was ordered with a small party to push forward in the direction of the Alberche, upon the left bank of which it was reported that the French were again concentrating their forces, and, if possible, to obtain information as to their future movements. Meanwhile the army was about to fall back upon Oropesa, there to await Soult's advance, and, if necessary, to give him battle—Cuesta engaging with his Spaniards to secure Talavera, with its stores and hospitals, against any present movement from Victor.

After a hearty breakfast, and a kind "Good-bye!" from my brother officers, I set out. My road along the Tagus, for several miles of the way, was a narrow path scraped from the rocky ledge of the river, shaded by rich olive plantations, that threw a friendly shade over us during the noon-day heat.

We travelled along silently, sparing our cattle from time to time, but endeavoring ere nightfall to reach Torrijos, in which village we had heard several French soldiers were in hospital. Our information leading us to believe them very inadequately guarded, we hoped to make some prisoners, from whom the information we sought could in all likelihood be obtained. More than once during the day our road was crossed by parties similar to our own, sent forward to reconnoitre, and, toward evening, a party of the twenty-third light dragoons returning toward Talavera, informed us that the French had retired from Torrijos, which was now occupied by an English detachment, under my old friend O'Shaughnessy.

I need not say with what pleasure I heard this piece of news, and eagerly pressed forward, preferring the warm shelter and hospitable board the major was certain of possessing, to the cold blast and dripping grass of a bivouac. Night, however, fell fast; darkness, without an intervening twilight, set in, and we lost our way. A black table land, with here and there a stunted, leafless tree, was all that we could discern by the pale light of a new moon. An apparently interminable heath, uncrossed by path or foot-track, was before us, and our jaded cattle seemed to feel the dreary uncertainty of the prospect as sensitively as ourselves—stumbling and overreaching at every step.

Cursing my ill-luck for such a misadventure, and once more picturing to my mind the bright blazing hearth and smoking supper I had hoped to partake of, I called a halt, and prepared to pass the night. My decision was hastened by finding myself suddenly in a little grove of pine trees, whose shelter was not to be despised; beside that, our bivouac fires were now sure of being supplied.

It was fortunate the night was fine, though dark. In a calm, still atmosphere, when not a leaf moved, nor a branch stirred, we picked out our tired horses, and, shaking out their forage, heaped up in the midst a blazing fire of the fir tree. Our humble supper was procured, and even with the still lingering revelry of the major and his happier destiny, I began to feel comfortable.

My troopers, who probably had not been flattering their imaginations with such gourmand reflections and views, sat happily around their cheerful blaze, chatting over the great battle they had so lately witnessed, and mingling their stories of some comrade's prowess with sorrows for the dead, and proud hopes for the future. In the midst, upon his knees beside the flame, was Mike, disputing, detailing, guessing, and occasionally inventing—all his arguments only tending to one view of the late victory—"that it was the Lord's mercy the most of the forty-eighth was Irish, or we would n't be sitting there now!"

Despite Mr. Free's conversational gifts, however, his audience one by one dropped off in sleep, leaving him sole monarch of the watch-fire, and—what he thought more of —a small brass kettle nearly full of brandy and water. The latter, I perceived, he produced when all was tranquil, and seemed, as he cast a furtive glance around, to assure himself that he was the only company present.

Lying some yards off, I watched him for about an hour, as he sat rubbing his hands before the blaze, or lifting the little vessel to his lips; his droll features ever and anon seeming acted upon by some passing dream of former devils, as he smiled and muttered some sentences in an under-voice. Sleep at length overpowered me; but my last waking thoughts were haunted with a singular ditty, by which Mike accompanied himself as he kept burning the buttons of my jacket before the fire, now and then interrupting the melody by a recourse to the copper.

"Well, well; you're clean enough now, and sure it's little good brightening you up, when you'll be as bad to-morrow. Like him; like his father's son, devil a lie in it. Nothing would serve him but his best blue jacket to fight in, as if the French were particular what they killed us in. Pleasant trade, upon my conscience! Well, never mind. That's beautiful sperrets, any how. Your health Mickey Free; it's yourself that stands to me?"

"It's little for glory I care;

Sure ambition is only a fable:

I'd as soon be myself as Lord Mayor,

With lashings of drink on the table.

I like to lay down in the sun

And drame when my faytures is scorchin'.

That when I'm too ould for more fun;

Why, I'll marry a wife with a fortune.

"And in winter, with bacon and eggs,

And a place by the turf-fire basking,

Sip my punch, as I roasted my legs,

Oh! the devil a more I'd be asking.

For I have n't a janias for work—

It was never the gift of the Bradies—

But I'd make a most illigant Turk,

For I'm fond of tobacco and ladies."

This confounded refrain kept ringing through my dream, and "tobacco and ladies" kept mingled with my thoughts of storm and battle-field, long after their very gifted author had composed himself to slumber.

Sleep, and sound sleep, came at length, and many hours elapsed ere I awoke. When I did so, my fire was reduced to its last embers. Mike, like the others, had sunk in slumber, and mid the gray dawn that precedes the morning, I could just perceive the dark shadows of my troopers as they lay in groups around.

The fatigues of the previous day had so completely overcome me, that it was with difficulty I could arouse myself so far as to heap logs upon the fire. This I did with my eyes half closed, in that listless dreamy state, which seems the twilight of sleep.

I managed so much, however, and was returning to my couch beneath a tree, when suddenly an object presented itself to my eyes that absolutely rooted me to the spot. At about twenty or thirty yards distant, where but the moment before the long line of horizon terminated the view, there now stood a huge figure of some ten or twelve feet in height—two heads—which surmounted this colossal personage, moved alternately from side to side; while several arms waved loosely to and fro in the most strange and uncouth manner. My first impression was, that a dream had conjured up this distorted image; but when I had assured myself by repeated pinchings and shakings that I was really awake, still it remained there. I was never much given to believe in ghosts: but even had I been so, this strange apparition must have puzzled me as much as ever, for it could not have been the representative of anything I ever heard of before.

A vague suspicion that some French trickery was concerned, induced me to challenge it in French, so without advancing a step I halloed out, "Qui va la?"

My voice aroused a sleeping soldier, who, springing up beside me, had his carbine at the cock; while, equally thunderstruck with myself, he gazed at the monster.

"Qui va la?" shouted I again, and no answer was returned, when suddenly the huge object wheeled rapidly around, and without waiting for any further parley, made for the thicket.

The tramp of a horse's feet now assured me as to the nature of at least part of the spectacle, when click went the trigger behind me, and the trooper's ball rushed whistling through the brushwood. In a moment the whole party were up and stirring.

"This way, lads!" cried I, as, drawing my sabre, I dashed into the pine wood.

For a few moments all was dark as midnight; but as we proceeded further we came out upon a little open space, which commanded the plain beneath for a great extent.

"There it goes," said one of the men, pointing to a narrow beaten path in which the tall figure moved, at a slow and stately pace, while still the same wild gestures of heads and limbs continued.

"Do n't fire, men; do n't fire!" I cried; "but follow me," as I set forward as hard as I could.

As we neared it, the frantic gesticulations grew more and more remarkable, while some stray words which we half caught sounded like English in our ears. We were now within pistol shot distance, when suddenly the horse, for that much at least we were assured of, stumbled and fell forward, precipitating the remainder of the object headlong into the road.

In a second we were upon the spot, when the first sounds which greeted me were the following, uttered in an accent by no means new to me.

"Oh! blessed Virgin; was n't it yourself that threw me in the mud, or my nose was done for? Shaugh, Shaugh, my boy, since we are taken, tip them the blarney, and say we're generals of division."

I need not say with what a burst of laughter I received this very original declaration.

"I ought to know that laugh," cried a voice I at once knew to be my friend O'Shaughnessy. "Are you Charles O'Malley by any chance in life?"

"The same, major; and delighted to meet you; though, faith, we were near giving you a rather warm reception. What in the devil's name did you represent just now?"

"Ask Maurice, there, bad luck to him. I wish the devil had him when he persuaded me into it."

"Introduce me to your friend," replied the other rubbing his shins as he spoke. "Mr. O'Malley"—so he called me—"I think; happy to meet you: my mother was a Ryan of Killdooley, married to a first cousin of your father's before she took Mr. Quill, my respected progenitor. I'm Dr. Quill of the forty-eighth, more commonly called Maurice Quill. Tear and ages! how sore my back is. It was all the fault of the bastie, Mr. O'Malley; we set out in search of you this morning, to bring you back with us to Torrijos, but we fell in with a very pleasant funeral at Barcaventer, and joined them; they invited us, I may say, to spend the day, and a very jovial day it was. I was a chief mourner, and carried a very big candle through the village, in consideration of as fine a meat pie, and as much lush as my grief permitted me to indulge in afterward: but, my dear sir, when it was all finished, we found ourselves nine miles from our quarters, and as neither of us were in a very befitting condition for pedestrian exercise, we stole one of the leaders out of the hearse,—velvet, plumes, and all, and set off for home."

"When we came upon your party, we were not over clear whether you were English or Portuguese, or French; and that was the reason I called out to you, 'God save all here,' in Irish; your polite answer was a shot, which struck the old horse in the knee, and although he wheeled about in double quick, we never could get him out of his professional habits on the road. He had a strong notion he was engaged in another funeral,—as he was very likely to be; and the devil a bit faster than a dead march could we get him to, with all our thrashing. Orderly time, for men in a hurry, with a whole platoon blazing away behind them! but long life to the cavalry, they merit any thing."

While he continued to run on in this manner, we reached our watch-fire, when what was my surprise to discover in my newly made acquaintance the worthy doctor I had seen a day or two before, operating at the fountain at Talavera.

"Well, Mr. O'Malley," said he, as he seated himself before the blaze: "What is the state of the larder? Any thing savory—anything drink-inspiring to be had?"

"I fear, doctor, my fare is of the very humblest; but still—"

"What are the fluids, Charley?" cried the major; "the cruel performance I have been enacting on that cursed beast has left me in a fever."

"This was a pigeon pie, formerly," said Dr. Quill, investigating the ruined walls of a pasty; "and—but come, here's a duck; and if my nose deceive me not, a very tolerable ham. Peter—Lary—Patsy—What's the name of your familiars there?"

"Mickey—Mickey Free."

"Mickey Free, then: come here, avick! Devise a little drink, my son—not of the weakest—no lemon—hot! You understand, hot! That chap has an eye for punch; there's no mistaking an Irish fellow, nature has endowed them richly—fine features, and a beautiful absorbent system! that's the gift; just look at him, blowing up the fire,—is n't he a picture? Well, O'Malley, I was fretting that we had n't; you up at Torrijos; we were enjoying life very respectably we established a little system of small tithes upon fowl—sheep—pig's heads and wine skins, that throve remarkably for the time. Here's the lush! Put it down there, Mickey, in the middle; that's right. Your health, Shaugh. O'Malley, here's a troop to you; and in the meantime I'll give you a chaunt."

"Come, ye jovial souls, do n't over the bowl be sleeping, Nor let the grog go round like a cripple creeping; If your care comes up—in the liquor sink it, Pass along the lush—I'm the boy can drink it."

Is n't that so, Mrs. Mary Callaghan?

Is n't that so, Mrs. Mary Callaghan?

Shaugh, my hearty, this begins to feel comfortable. Your man, O'Malley, has a most judicious notion of punch for a small party; and though one has prejudices about a table, chairs, and that sort of thing, take my word for it, it's better than fighting the French, any day."

"Well, Charley, it certainly did look quite awkward enough the other day toward three o'clock, when the legion fell back before that French column, and broke the guards behind them."

"Yes, you're quite right; but I think every one felt that the confusion was but momentary; the gallant forty-eighth was up in an instant."

"Faith! I can answer for their alacrity," said the Doctor, "I was making my way to the rear with all convenient despatch, when an aid-de-camp called out—"

"Cavalry coming! take care forty-eighth."

"Left face, wheel! Fall in there, fall in there! I heard on every side, and soon found myself standing in a square, with Sir Arthur himself, and Hill, and the rest of them all around me."

"Steady, men! Steady, now!" said Hill, as he rode around the ranks, while we saw an awful column of cuirassiers forming on the rising ground to our left.

"Here they come!" said Sir Arthur, as the French came powdering along, making the very earth tremble beneath them.

"My first thought was, 'The devils are mad! and, they'll ride down into us, before they know they're kilt!' and, sure enough, smash into our first rank they pitched, sabring and cutting all before them; when at last the word 'Fire,' was given, and the whole head of the column broke like a shell, and rolled horse over man on the earth."

"Very well done! very well, indeed!" said Sir Arthur, turning as coolly round to me, as if he was asking for more gravy.

"Mighty well done," said I, in reply, and resolving not to be outdone in coolness, I pulled out my snuff-box and offered him a pinch, saying "The real thing, Sir Arthur; our own countryman—blackguard."

"He gave a little grim kind of a smile, took a pinch, and then called out—"

"Let Sherbrooke advance!" while, turning again toward me, he said, "Where are your people, colonel?"

"Colonel!" thought I; "Is it possible he's going to promote me?" but before I could answer, he was talking to another. Meanwhile, Hill came up, and looking at me steadily, burst out with—

"Why the devil are you here, sir? Why ain't you at the rear?"

"Upon my conscience," said I, "that's the very thing I'm puzzling myself about this minute! but if you think it's pride in me, you're greatly mistaken, for I'd rather the greatest scoundrel in Dublin was kicking me down Sackville-street, than be here now!"

"You'd think it was fun I was making, if you heard how they all laughed, Hill and Cameron and the others, louder than any."

"Who is he?" said Sir Arthur, quickly.

"Dr. Quill, surgeon of the thirty-third, where I exchanged, to be near my brother, sir, in the thirty-fourth."

"A doctor—a surgeon! That fellow a surgeon! Damn him, I took him for Colonel Grosvenor! Isay, Gordon, these medical officers must be docked of their fine feathers, there's no knowing them from the staff; look to that in the next general order."

"And sure enough, they left us bare and naked the next morning; and if the French sharpshooters pick us down now, devil mend them for wasting powder, for if they look in the orderly books, they'll find their mistake."

"Ah, Maurice, Maurice," said Shaugh, with a sigh; "You'll never improve—you'll never improve!"

"Why the devil would I?" said he; "Ain't I at the top of my profession—full surgeon—with nothing to expect—nothing to hope for? Oh, if I only remained in the light company, what would n't I be now!"

"Then you were not always a doctor?" said I.

"Upon my conscience I was n't," said he. "When Shaugh knew me first, I was the Adonis of the Roscommon militia, with more heiresses in my list than any man in the regiment, but Shaugh and myself were always un-ucky."

"Poor Mrs. Rogers!" said the major, pathetically, drinking off his glass and heaving a profound sigh.

"Ah, the darling," said the doctor; "if it was n't for a jug of punch that lay on the hall table, our fortune in life would be very different."

"True for you, Maurice!" quoth O'Shaughnessy.

"I should like much to hear that story," said I, pushing the jug briskly round.

"He'll tell it you," said O'Shaughnessy, lighting his cigar, and leaning pensively back against a tree, "he'll tell it you."

"I will, with pleasure," said Maurice. "Let Mr. Free, meantime, amuse himself with the punch-bowl, and I'll relate it."

But the relation itself, for reasons mentioned in the following page, must be left to our next volume.

L'Envoy.

MOST KIND PUBLIC,

It is now nearly two years since we opened an acquaintance with you. With what pleasure to ourselves the intimacy has been cultivated, we need not repeat here. Your indulgence, your good nature, your untiring kindness, have been present with us through every page we wrote; and, whether our heart was heavy or our spirits light, toward you we had but one feeling—the deepest gratitude for all your favors, with an ardent wish to preserve them to the last.

A hundred times have we asked ourselves, Why were you pleased with us, and for what?—which among the characters of our voracious history had taken your fancy, and wherefore?

Have you sympathized in the Irish waywardness and reckless good-nature of Fred Power? Have you felt for the unmerited sorrows of the fair Dalrymples? Have you warmed with generous enthusiasm for the moral sentiments and pious effusions of Monsoon? Or have you smiled at the vagrant fancies and cunning conceits of Mickey Free? Alas, we know not. We are merely aware, upon the whole, that you are not altogether weary of us: but which is the attraction of the piece, which the star of our company, we are totally ignorant.

Such were our wandering thoughts as we sat beside our Christmas fire, and in a bumper of our oldest and raciest, pledged you—ay, your own excellent self—as the best of patrons and most kind of masters. Many a passing thought of friendly import suggested itself, as we puzzled our brains how we best might testify our gratitude at this season of mutual good wishes. Many a plan presented itself in turn, and in turn was rejected, as far too weak for the expression of our feelings; when, suddenly, the current of our thoughts received a sad and fatal shock, which, while it rendered our present desire unattainable, only promised to lay us under deeper obligations for the future.

The misfortune we allude to was briefly this:

In a fire which took place in Dublin on the morning of the 2d of January, the whole of the premises in which the printing of our book was carried on, were burned to the ground. The violence of the flames even melted the very type in the flames; and where a tall and goodly building had stood but yesterday, a mouldering and smoking ruin now marks the spot. In this sad conjuncture, our first thought was for the proprietor, an upright and industrious man, whose calamity is a most heavy one. His property was, we believe, uninsured, and the loss involves a great part of that competence which years of toil and labor had accumulated.

Our next regret—believe us, it came after a long interval—was for ourselves. Our own misfortunes—nothing in comparison with his—consisted in the loss of our MSS. The record of our campaigns—our days of battle and nights of bivouac met the fate of many worthier pages, and were utterly consumed.

It is needless to express our regrets for the mishap; and, indeed, we should not have obtruded our sorrows upon you, were it not that an apology is requisite to account for our maimed and imperfect appearance. The melting pathos that was destined to stir your bosom, the merry tale we calculated on for a laugh, the song we hoped you'd sing, are lost to us for ever; and the heavy plash of the "Sun" and the "Phoenix" have done more to extinguish our fire, than, unhappily, they have effected for that of our printer.

It is but poor sport to tell you what deeds of prowess we effected, what battles we braved, what skirmishes we fought, how Monsoon preached and Mike chanted, how Peter laughed and O'Shaughnessy blundered. Alas, and alas, the record was not fated to elicit laughter; and the only tears it called forth, came from the fire-engines.

That we were about to become most interesting, most witty, most moving, and most melancholy, we are ready to swear before any justice in the commission; that any thing we had hitherto done was as nothing compared to what we had in store, we solemnly adjure; and we entreat you to believe, what we ourselves are convinced of, that what we held in reserve was the whole force of our history.

Lend us, then, most amiable reader, all your spare sympathy; the compliments of the season, despite the temperature we write in, have been far too warm for us, and we must be excused desiring "many returns of them for the future."

Meanwhile our worthy publisher, who has as much compassion for a burnt MS. as the steward of a steamer has for the sufferings of a passenger, bids us be of "good cheer."

"Never mind it," quoth he. "It's provoking, to be sure; but come out with a capital number in February, and they'll think nothing of it."

They—meaning you, my Public—you'll think nothing of what? Of what took us months to indite—of Mike's songs, of which no copies are in existence—of the various sayings and doings, thoughts, acts, and opinions of Messrs. Monsoon, Power, Webber, Quill, O'Shaughnessy and Co., who are at this moment scattered here and there about the globe, and, except Monsoon, not a man of them to be bribed by hock or hermitage to recount a single incident of their lives.

Some of our characters have grown serious, and do n't like this mention of them at all. Others are married, and have vixenish wives, highly indignant at the early pranks of their venerable partners. Many want to write their own adventures, and do n't fancy our poaching over their manor; and not a few are diners-out, depending for their turtle and claret upon the very stories we have been giving you this year past.

Notwithstanding all these obstacles, we are told "not to mind it." A capital No.—plenty of drollery—none of your long yarns about the Douro, but fun—Irish fun—Mickey Free and Monsoon—that's what we want." Confound the man! does he think we're inventing our life? does he suppose we are detailing a fictitious and not a real history? No, no; there is no one better than himself aware that our characters are real people, who, however little pleased they may be at being painted at all, will never condescend to be caricatured. Never did a man stand more stoutly upon his prerogative, and resolutely reject all advances, till he gently hinted that our very amiable friend, Frank Webber, had offered himself to complete the volume—this threat was really too much for us, and we knocked under.

The next question was as to time. It was impossible for us at a moment to rewrite our lost pages; and, in our distress, we sought the aid and assistance of our literary friends; among others, the talented author of "Darnley" and "The Gipsy." He came to our succor with a readiness no less a proof of his friendship than his genius; and in a story of intense interest and great beauty, has done much to console us. It is now before us; we intend also that it should be before you.

Though little apology is necessary, that having invited you to partake of tough mutton, we have presented you with racy venison, and though well knowing that when enjoying "James," you have no regrets for "Harry," we deem it only respectful toward you, or fitting in us to explain what has occurred, and to add that, before the next period of appearance before you, we shall have done every thing in our power to recover the true web of our narrative. Here, then, you have our story and our apology—while we earnestly entreat you to believe none genuine except signed by Charles O'Malley. There is no reliance to be placed in the many versions abroad. It is not true that our book is pronounced "doubly hazardous," by the Insurance Companies, and not acceptable under a "parson premium;" there is no truth in the story that the fire was a malicious act, originating among the junior bar; there is no truth in the statement that a gigantic and powerful individual interposed his strong arm to prevent the engines playing upon the manuscript-room, declaring at the time, that he "should see us burned to ashes."

We cannot conclude without publicly testifying our gratitude to O'Shaughnessy. He arrived here post from Strassburg, the moment he heard of our mishap, and has been administering every comfort and consolation in his power.

"It's maybe the best thing ever happened you, Charley. It's truth I'm telling you—hear me out. My father—God rest him—had two pounds ten in French's notes, when the bank broke, and to the hour of his death, he never paid a creditor, always alleging if it had n't been for that d—d bank, he'd not owe sixpence! Take the hint, my boy. If they complain that you're dull—that you are growing prosy and tiresome—that Monsoon is a bore, and yourself not much better, tell them it's all the fault of the fire; and if you manage it well, the excuse will last your lifetime."

Let me now conclude with this assurance, while I forestall the moral of my friend James's beautiful story, and assure you that I feel a fire can be a happy incident; for, had not my pages been burnt, I should never have been able to present you with this.

I am most respectfully and faithfully yours,

CHARLES O'MALLEY.

Brussels, Jan. 18 1841.

TO G. P. R. JAMES, ESQ.

Hotel de Regence.

With a scrap of note paper, just saved from the flames, I sit down to write you a line, my dear James, And explain, if I'm able my spirits to rally. The misfortune that's happened to poor Charles O'Malley. In Ireland, where once they were proud of their learning, They've taken, of late years, to roasting and burning; And, not satisfied now with destroying a parson, They've given a poor author a touch of their arson. About these good people I rarely was critical, Seldom religious, and never political; I neither subscribed to the "Post" nor the "Mail," Nor cried, "No Surrender," nor "Up with Repale." Though I've listened to arguments over and over, I've confounded M'Hale with the King of Hanover; And never by chance could find out what they mean, When asked, if I did n't like blue before green; In a word, my dear friend—I confess, as a man—

I relished Young Butt, admired too old Dan.

They were Irishmen both—not a touch of the Norman, No more than great Nicholas Purcell O'Gorman.

From Kinsale to the Causeway—Athlone or Armagh— They are Paddies all over, from Erin go brag;

I loved the gay fellows, and cared not a crown, Did they sing "Bloody Billy," or "Croppies lie down;"

As ready with one as the other to tope, [Pope.] To cry "Down with the Church"—"Bloody end to the

They might wear in their neckcloth pea-green or sky-blue, Provided their hearts were but honest and true;

And, however whigs, Tories, and radicals talk, Like the leaves of the shamrock, they spring from one stalk;

They've their root in the soil, and they wish not to sever, But adorn the hills of their country for ever.

But, at last, to come back, for I'm sure you suppose

I've lost, in digressing, all sight of my woes, And forget how the devil—the printer's, I say—

Set fire to my book on the last New Year's Day; And, just as the ribbonmen treated old Kinsela,

They roasted the heroes that fought the Peninsula. They left not a character living for me,

Frank Webber, and Power, and poor Mickey Free, And even the "Dals," and the Major Monsoon,

They sent up in fragments, as high as the moon— On my conscience, they finished the Irish Dragoon!

Not a man could escape, nor lie hid in a nook, The wretches, they even laid hands on the "Duke;"

And from what I have heard—this between me and you— He shone full as bright as at great Waterloo;

And though firemen played, like some journals we'd name, They could not extinguish one spark of his fame,

As when rising on high, and upon earth no more he Illumined the land of his birth with his glory.

But to come back once more—these eternal digressions

Are like record appeals from the last quarter sessions, Where the judges wish both sides were fast in the stocks,

And the jury are all sound asleep in the box— They've burnt my book—not a story nor sally,

Not a love-scene, nor fight, now remains of O'Malley; Not a battle or bivouac, ever you'll see,

Nor even a chaunt from our friend Mickey Free.

* * * * *

So, with laboring brain, and with faculties turning, I sit trying to find out a cause for this burning—

Was it some scheme of a clique, or a closet? or Was it the fault of a drowsy compositor?

Was it some story with which I've been rash in? Or was it some foe to my good friend M'Glashan?

Was it Otway or Carleton, or was it Sam Lover? Alas I'm afraid I shall never discover.

I don't think it true, but it's whispered to me, That Moore had grown jealous of poor Mickey Free,

For he sings his own songs—when he's asked out to tea, But come over, dear friend, and partake of my prog,

And suggest what to do for an unlucky dog; Who never gives way long to grief and to sorry care,

For somehow they but ill suit your friend, HARRY LORREQUER.

JAMES'S ANSWER.

VOLUME THE FIRST.

MY DEAR LORREQUER,

When I received your note, the sun was shining as brightly as if it had been summer, and on the golden background of the evening sky the thin tracery of the leafless twigs was finely marked, offering many a beautiful form and graceful line, though the foliage of a brighter season had departed. They were like the memories of hopes long passed away; and I could not help thinking, as I read the account of what had befallen you, that you, like those bare branches—though you had lost one crop of leaves in this untimely manner, might very soon produce another as fertile of hopes as those which were gone. The news of the burning of the printing-house, and the loss it occasioned you, grieved me deeply, but did not surprise me in the least. I have always expected it; for who would doubt that, after you had gone on eating fire so long, fire would some time or another turn round and eat you. Beside, my dear Lorrequer, there is something so very inflammatory in your nature, that I wonder any printer would let your sheets within his door. No one ever speaks of you without finding ideas of combustion naturally suggest themselves: and the wife of a great general, in describing to me, the other day, a visit you had paid her with a worthy gentleman from Scotland, said, that it was the strongest contrast she had ever seen, for he burned like a port-fire, while you went off like a skyrocket. Why, your good and your bad qualities all tend to the same effect, and your very books are enough to make a man call a fire-engine. Warm-hearted though you be, you cannot deny that you are as fiery as a box of lucifers, and have been in a flame of one kind or another all your life; and when we take into consideration your flashy wit, and your blazing style, I cannot but think that the printer who takes in your MS. without warning his neighbors, might be indicted for a nuisance. I have a strong notion that you are Swing, in disguise, so lay the fault upon nobody but yourself.

However, let me see if I can give you some consolation; and, first, in the true style of all comforters, let me try to persuade you, that a great misfortune is the best possible thing that could happen to you. After all is done and over, my good friend, a fire is not so bad a thing. You may say, "granted; a small quantity of the element; but that one may have too much of a good thing. That a fire in a grate is a good thing in its way, but a house on fire is to be avoided, when possible." Still, however, I hold to my text and reply, that a house on fire is not always so bad a thing as people think. I recollect a very sweet girl being saved from drowning in the middle of the Atlantic by a house on fire. Come, I will tell you the story, and that shall be—

VOLUME THE SECOND.

"There was once a great banker in London, who had a very fine house in Portland Place, and a very dirty old house in the city; and if the latter looked the image of business and riches, the former looked the picture of luxury and display. He himself was a mild man, whose ostentation was of a quiet, but not the less of an active kind. His movements were always calm and tranquil, and his clothes plain; but the former were stately, the latter were in the best fashion. Holditch was his coachmaker in those days; Ude's first cousin was his cook; his servants walked up stairs to announce a visitor to the tune of the Dead March in Saul, and opened both valves of the folding-doors at once with a grace that could only be acquired by long practice. Every thing seemed to move in his house by rule, and nothing was ever seen to go wrong. All the lackeys wore powder, and the women-servants had their caps prescribed to them. His wife was the daughter of a country gentleman of very old race, a woman of good manners and a warm heart. Though there were two carriages always at her especial command, she sometimes walked on her feet, even in London, and would not suffer an account of her parties to find its way into the 'Morning Post.' The banker and his wife had but one child, a daughter, and a very pretty and very sweet girl she was as ever my eyes saw. She was not very tall, though very beautifully formed, and exquisitely graceful. She was the least affected person that ever was seen; for, accustomed from her earliest days to perfect ease in every respect—denied nothing that was virtuous and right—taught by her mother to estimate high qualities—too much habituated to wealth to regard it as an object—and too frequently brought in contact with rank to estimate it above its value—she had nothing to covet, and nothing to assume. Her face was sweet and thoughtful, though the thoughts were evidently cheerful ones, and her voice was full of melody and gentleness. Her name was Alice Herbert, and she was soon the admired of all admirers. People looked for her at the opera and the park, declared her beautiful, adorable, divine; she became the wonder, the rage, the fashion; and every body added, when they spoke about her, that she would have half a million at the least. Now, Mr. Herbert himself was not at all anxious that his daughter should marry any of the men that first presented themselves, because none of them were above the rank of a baron: nor was Mrs. Herbert anxious either, because she did not wish to part with her daughter; nor was Alice herself—I do not know well why—perhaps she thought that a part of the men who surrounded her were fops, and as many were libertines, and the rest were fools, and Alice did not feel more inclined to choose out of those three classes than her father did out of the three inferior grades of our nobility. There was, indeed, a young man in the Guards, distantly connected with her mother's family, who was neither fop, libertine, nor fool—a gentleman, an accomplished man, and a man of good feeling, who was often at Mr. Herbert's house, but father, mother, and daughter, all thought him quite out of the question: the father, because he was not a duke; the mother, because he was a soldier; the daughter, because he had never given her the slightest reason to believe that he either admired or loved her. As he had some two thousand a year, he might have been a good match for a clergyman's daughter, but could not pretend to Miss Herbert. Alice certainly liked him better than any man she had ever seen, and once she found his eyes fixed upon her from the other side of a ball-room with an expression that made her forget what her partner was saying to her. The color came up into her cheek, too, and that seemed to give Henry Ashton courage to come up, and ask her to dance. She danced with him on the following night, too; and Mr. Herbert, who remarked the fact, judged that it would be but right to give Henry Ashton a hint. Two days after, as Alice's father was just about to go out, the young guardsman himself was ushered into his library, and the banker prepared to give him a hint, and give it plainly, too. He was saved the trouble, however; for Ashton's first speech was, 'I have come to bid you farewell, Mr. Herbert. We are ordered to Canada, to put down the evil spirit there. I set out in an hour to take leave of my mother, in Staffordshire, and then embark with all speed.'

"Mr. Herbert economized his hint, and wished his young friend all success. 'By the way,' he added, 'Mrs. Herbert may like to write a few lines by you to her brother at Montreal. You know he is her only brother: he made a sad business of it, what with building and planting, and farming, and such things. So I got him an appointment in Canada just that he might retrieve. She would like to write, I know. You will find her up stairs. I must go out myself. Good fortune attend you.'

"Good fortune did attend him, for he found Alice Herbert alone in the very first room he entered. There was a table before her, and she was leaning over it, as if very busy, but when Henry Ashton approached her, he found that she had been carelessly drawing will leaves on a scrap of paper, while her thoughts were far away. She colored when she saw him, and was evidently agitated; but she was still more so when he repeated what he had told her father. She turned red, and she turned pale, and she sat still, and she said nothing. Henry Ashton became agitated himself. 'It is all in vain,' he said to himself. 'It is all in vain. I know her father too well; and he rose, asking where he should find her mother.'

"Alice answered, in a faint voice, 'in the little room beyond the back drawing-room.'

"Henry paused a moment longer: the temptation was too great to be resisted; he took the sweet girl's hand; he pressed it to his lips, and said, 'Farewell, Miss Herbert! farewell! I know I shall never see any one like you again! but, at least, it is a blessing to have known you—though it be but to regret that fortune has not favored me still farther; farewell! farewell!'

"Henry Ashton sailed for Canada, and saw some service there. He distinguished himself as an officer, and his name was in several despatches. A remnant of the old chivalrous spirit made him often think, when he was attacking a fortified village, or charging a body of insurgents, 'Alice Herbert will hear of this!' but often, too, he would ask himself, 'I wonder if she be married yet?' and his companions used to jest with him upon always looking first at the woman's part of the newspaper; the births, deaths, and marriages.

"His fears, if we can venture to call them such, were vain. Alice did not marry, although, about a year after Henry Ashton had quitted England, her father descended a little from his high ambition, and hinted that if she thought fit, she might listen to the young Earl of——. Alice was not inclined to listen, and gave the earl plainly to understand that she was not inclined to become his countess. The earl, however, persevered, and Mr. Herbert now began to add his influence; but Alice was obdurate, and reminded her father of a promise he had made, never to press her marriage with any one. Mr. Herbert seemed more annoyed than Alice expected, walked up and down the room in silence, and on hearing it, shut himself up with Mrs. Herbert for nearly two hours. What took place Alice did not know; but Mrs. Herbert from that moment looked grave and anxious. Mr. Herbert insisted that the earl should be received at the house as a friend, though, he urged his daughter no more; and balls and parties succeeded each other so rapidly, that the quieter inhabitants of Portland Place wished the banker and his family, where Alice herself wished to be—in Canada. In the mean time, Alice became alarmed for her mother, whose health was evidently suffering from some cause; but Mrs. Herbert would consult no physician, and her husband seemed never to perceive the state of weakness and depression into which she was sinking. Alice resolved to call the matter to her father's notice, and as he now went out every morning at an early hour, she rose one day sooner than usual, and knocked at the door of his dressing-room. There was no answer, and, unclosing the door, she looked in to see if he were already gone. The curtains were still drawn, but through them some of the morning beams found their way, and by the dim sickly light, Alice beheld an object that made her clasp her hands and tremble violently. Her father's chair was vacant; but beside it lay, upon the floor, something like the figure of a man asleep. Alice approached, with her heart beating so violently that she could hear it; and there was no other sound in the room. She knelt down beside him: it was her father. She could not hear him breathe, and she drew back the curtains. He was pale as marble, and his eyes were open, but fixed. She uttered not a sound, but with wild eyes gazed round the room, thinking of what she should do. Her mother was in the chamber, at the side of the dressing-room; but Alice, thoughtful, even in the deepest agitation, feared to call her, and rang the bell for her father's valet. The man came and raised his master, but Mr. Herbert had evidently been dead some hours. Poor Alice wept terribly, but still she thought of her mother, and she made no noise, and the valet was silent too; for, in lifting the dead body to the sofa, she had found a vial, and was gazing on it intently.

"'I had better put this away, Miss Herbert,' he said at length, in a low voice; 'I had better put this away before some one else comes.'

"Alice gazed at the vial with her tearful eyes. It was marked 'Prussic acid! poison!'

"This was but the commencement of many sorrows. Though the coroner's jury pronounced that Mr. Herbert had died a natural death, yet every one declared he had poisoned himself, especially when it was found that he had died utterly insolvent. That all his last great speculations had failed, and that the news of his absolute beggary had reached him on the night preceding his decease. Then came all the horrors of such circumstances to poor Alice and her mother; the funeral; the examination of the papers; the sale of the house and furniture; the tiger claws of the law rending open the house in all its dearest associations; the commiseration of friends; the taunts and scoffs of those who had envied and hated in silence. Then for poor Alice herself, came the last worst blow, the sickness and death of a mother; sickness and death in poverty. The last scene was just over; the earth was laid upon the coffin of Mrs. Herbert, and Alice sat with her eyes dropping fast, thinking of the sad 'What next?' when a letter was given to her, and she saw the handwriting of her uncle in Canada. She had written to him on her father's death, and now he answered full of tenderness and affection, begging his sister and niece instantly to join him in the new land which he had made his country. All the topics of consolation which philosophy ever discovered or devised to soothe man under the manifold sorrows and cares of life are not worth a blade of rye-grass in comparison with one word of true affection. It was the only balm that Alice Herbert's heart could have received, and though it did not heal the wound, it tranquilized its aching.

"Mrs. Herbert, though not rich, had not been altogether portionless, and her small fortune was all that Alice now condescended to call her own. There had been, indeed, a considerable jointure, but that Alice renounced with feelings that you will understand. Economy, however, was now a necessity, and after taking a passage in one of the cheapest vessels she could find bound for Quebec—a vessel that all the world has heard of, named the St. Lawrence—she set out for the good city of Bristol, where she arrived in safety on the 16th day of May, 183—. I must now, however, turn to the history of Henry Ashton, and that shall be

VOLUME THE THIRD.

"It was just after the business in Canada was settled that he entered a room in Quebec, where several of the officers of the regiment were assembled in various occupations—one writing a letter to go by the packet which was just about to sail, two looking out of the window at the nothing which was doing in the streets, and one reading the newspaper. There were three or four other journals on the table, and Ashton took up one of them. As usual, he turned to the record of the three great things in life, and read, first the marriages—then the deaths; and, as he did so, he saw, 'Suddenly, at his house, in Portland Place, William Anthony Herbert, Esq.' The paper did not drop from his hand, although he was much moved and surprised; but his sensations were very mixed; and although, be it said truly, he gave his first thoughts, and they were sorrowful, to the dead, the second were given to Alice Herbert, and he asked himself, 'Is it possible that she can ever be mine? She was certainly much agitated when I left her!'

"Here 's a bad business!' cried the man who was reading the other newspaper. 'The Herberts are all gone to smash, and I had six hundred pounds there. You are in for it too, Ashton. Look there! They talk of three shillings on the pound.'

"Henry Ashton took the paper and read the account of all that had occurred in London, and he then took his hat and walked to head-quarters. What he said or did there is no body's business but his own; but certain it is that by the beginning of the very next week he was in the gulf of St. Lawrence. Fair winds wafted him soon to England; but in St. George's channel all went contrary, and the ship was knocked about for three days without making much way. A fit of impatience had come upon Henry Ashton, and when he thought of Alice Herbert and all she must have suffered, his heart beat strangely. One of those little incidents occurred about this time that make or mar men's destinies. A coasting-boat from Swansea to Wiston came within hail, and Ashton, tired of the other vessel, put a portmanteau, a servant, and himself into the little skimmer of the seas, and was in a few hours landed safely at the pleasant watering place of Wiston super mare. It wanted yet an hour or two of night, and therefore a postchaise was soon rolling the young officer, his servant, and his portmanteau toward Bristol, on their way to London. He arrived at a reasonable hour, but yet some of many things that fill inns, had happened in Bristol that day, and Henry drove to the Bush, to the Falcon, and the Fountain, and several others, before he could get a place of rest. At length he found two comfortable rooms in a small hotel near the port, and had sat down to his supper by a warm fire, when an Irish sailor put his head into the room and asked if he were the lady that was to go down to the St. Lawrence the next day? Henry Ashton informed him that he was not a lady, and that as he had just come from the St. Lawrence, he was not going back again, upon which the man withdrew to seek further.

"Ten, eleven, twelve o'clock struck, and Henry Ashton pulled off his boots and went to bed. At two o'clock he awoke feeling heated and feverish; and to cool himself he began to think of Alice Herbert. He found it by no means a good plan, for he felt warmer than before, and soon a suffocating feeling came over him, and he thought he smelt a strong smell of burning wood. His bed-room was one of those unfortunate inn bed-rooms that are placed under the immediate care and protection of a sitting-room, which, like a Spanish duenna, will let nobody in who does not pass by their door. He put on his dressing gown, therefore, and issued out into the sitting-room, and there the smell was stronger: there was a considerable crackling and roaring too, which had something alarming in it, and he consequently opened the outer door. All he could now see was a thick smoke filling the corridor, through which came a red glare from the direction of the staircase; but he heard those sounds of burning wood which are not to be mistaken, and in a minute after, loud knocking at doors, ringing of bells, and shouts of 'Fire! fire!' showed that the calamity had become apparent to the people in the street. He saw all the rushing forth of naked men and women which generally follows such a catastrophe, and the opening all the doors of the house, as if for the express purpose of blowing the fire into a flame. There were hallooings and shoutings, there were screamings and tears, and what between the rushing sound of the devouring element, and the voice of human suffering or fear, the noise was enough to wake the dead.

"Henry Ashton thought of his portmanteau, and wondered where his servant was; but seeing, by a number of people driven back from the great staircase by flames, that there was no time to be lost, he made his way down by a smaller one, and in a minute or two reached the street. The engines by this time had arrived; an immense crowd was gathering together, the terrified tenants of the inn were rushing forth, and in the midst Henry Ashton remarked one young woman wringing her hands and exclaiming, 'Oh, my poor young mistress! my poor young lady!'

"'Where is she, my good girl?' demanded the young soldier.

"'In number eleven,' cried the girl, 'in number eleven! Her bed-room is within the sitting-room, and she will never hear the noise.'

"'There she is, cried one of the bystanders who overheard; 'there she is, I dare say.'

"Ashton looked up toward the house, through the lower windows of which the flames were pouring forth; and, across the casement which seemed next to the very room he himself had occupied, he saw the figure of a woman, in her night dress, pass rapidly.

"'A ladder,' he cried, 'a ladder, for God's sake! There is some one there, whoever it be!'

"No ladder could be got, and Henry Ashton looked round in vain.

"'The back staircase is of stone,' he cried; 'she may be saved that way!'

"'Ay, but the corridor is on fire,' said one of the waiters; 'you'd better not try, sir: it cannot be done.'

"Henry Ashton darted away; into the inn; up the staircase; but the corridor was on fire, as the man had said, and the flames rushing up to the very door of the rooms he had lately tenanted. He rushed on, however, recollecting that he had seen a side door out of his own sitting-room; He dashed in, caught the handle of the lock of the side door, and shook it violently, for it was fastened.

"'I will open it,' cried a voice from within, that sounded strangely familiar to his ear.

"The lock turned—the door opened—and Henry Ashton and Alice Herbert stood face to face.

"'God of Heaven,' he exclaimed, catching her in his arms. But he gave no time for explanation, and hurried back with her toward the door of his own room. The corridor, however, was impassable.

"'You will be lost! you will be lost!' he exclaimed, holding her to his heart.

"'And you have thrown away your own life to save mine!' said Alice.

"'I will die with you, at least!' replied Henry Ashton; 'that is some consolation. But no! thank God, they have got a ladder—they are raising it up—dear girl, you are saved!'

"He felt Alice lie heavy on his bosom, and when he looked down, whether it was fear, or the effect of the stifling heat, or hearing such words from his lips, he found that she had fainted.

"'It is as well,' he said; 'it is as well!' and, as soon as the ladder was raised, he bore her out, holding her firmly yet tenderly to his bosom. There was a death-like stillness below. The ladder shook under his feet; the flames came forth and licked the rounds on which his steps were placed; but steadily, firmly, calmly, the young soldier pursued his way. He bore all that he valued on earth in his arms, and it was no moment to give thought to fear.

"When his last footstep touched the ground, a universal shout burst from the crowd, and even reached the ear of Alice herself; but, ere she could recover completely, she was in the comfortable drawing-room of a good merchant's house, some way further down the same street.

"The St Lawrence sailed on the following day for Quebec, and, as you well know, went down in the terrible hurricane which swept the Atlantic in the summer of that year, bearing with her, to the depths of ocean, every living thing that she had carried out from England. But on the day that she weighed anchor, Alice sat in the drawing-room of the merchant's house, with her hand clasped in that of Henry Ashton; and, ere many months were over, the tears for those dear beings she had lost, were chased by happier drops, as she gave her hand to the man she loved with all the depth of first affection, but whom she would never have seen again, had it not been for THE FIRE."

Such, my dear Lorrequer, is the story; and now let us consider what can be done to remedy the burning of your new number. On my honor, I see nothing for it but to publish the "O'Malley Correspondence" on the subject, with a portrait of the fire-engine, and a wood-cut of Fire.

Think of it, my dear fellow, and, whether you take my advice or not, believe me ever yours, G. P. R. JAMES.

GHOST GOSSIPS AT BLAKESLEY HOUSE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "STEPHEN DUGARD."

"Well," said Simon Barnardiston, looking boldly round the room, but wishing he could see the further end of it, "I do like good ghost stories, because I do not believe them."

"And I," rejoined Hugh Buckner, "like them, because I do believe them; for nobody shall persuade me that there are no such things as ghosts."

"With respect to there actually being such things as ghosts," remarked Ebenezer Carliel, gravely, "I do not know exactly what to say, after what happened to my own uncle."

"What was that?" inquired Mary Falconer (a pretty laughter-loving lass of eighteen,) as she drew her chair nearer to the fire, and asked Mr. Carliel to stir it up and make a blaze.

"Why," replied Ebenezer, taking out his watch as he spoke, "it is almost too late to tell you."

"Oh, do!" said Mrs. Dagleish, snuffing the candles, as if she liked to have plenty of light for a ghost story.

"Yes, do," echoed Mary Falconer.

"Do you know it is just twelve?" observed Mr. Carliel.

"Capital!" exclaimed Simon Barnardiston. "When it strikes, who knows but we may have the ghost himself."

"Do not be foolish," said Mrs. Dagleish; "there's many a true word spoken in jest."

"Ay," replied Hugh Buckner, "and many a jest that's spoken in bravado. I warrant Simon would be the first to walk out of the window, if he saw a ghost walking in at the door."

"Try me," said Barnardiston.

"Try me," repeated a hollow sepulchral voice, which seemed to come down the chimney close to Simon's elbow, but which in reality came from a half-opened door by the side of the fire-place, that led into the best parlor.

Simon sprang from his chair as if he had been shot out of it by a bomb underneath—Mary Falconer gave a scream—Mrs. Dagleish cried, "Lord! what is it?"—Hugh Buckner felt a curious sensation run down his back, and at his toes—while Mr. Carliel ejaculated "Humph!" and deliberately finished the pinch of snuff he had just taken from his box; an act of calm self-possession for which he was solely indebted to the accidental circumstance of being seated opposite the door, where he saw at that instant the twinkling eye and good-humored roguish face of Stephen Falconer, Mary's brother, who now burst into the room with an uproarious laugh at poor Simon.

"How can you make such a fool of yourself?" said Simon, nettled at having been frightened out of his valor before he had well put it on.

"Why, I never heard you come in," said his sister.

"Who opened the door?"

"Jesse," replied Stephen, still laughing at his friend Simon, in which he was now joined by the whole party, each having by this time discovered that nobody was afraid but Simon, because he happened to be the only one who had given proof of the agility which fear sometimes produces.

Presently they were once more seated round the fire, with the addition of Stephen Falconer, when the church bell began to toll the midnight hour.

"Now for your story, Mr. Carliel," said Hugh Buckner, "and then we will go to bed. Tell us what happened to your uncle."

"Well," replied Mr. Carliel, "if Mrs. Dagleish will suffer such late hours in her house—"

"Oh!" interrupted Mrs. Dagleish, "it's Christmas time, so we may stretch a point;" and the cups were forthwith replenished with elder wine from a spacious jug which stood upon the hob. Mr. Carliel then began:

"My uncle, Dr. De Burgh, was a great reader, you must know, and very fond of poring over his books when all the rest of the family were in bed. One December night, as he was thus sitting alone in his study, the door of which was carefully locked, for he was terribly afraid of thieves, and always had a pair of loaded pistols on the table at such times, he laid down his book to snuff the candles, when he saw sitting in an elbow-chair on the other side of the fire-place an elderly gentleman in a black velvet gown. His face was exceedingly thin and pale, shaded by long grey hair, which descended to his shoulders, and in his hand he held a small branch of rosemary. His eyes were fixed upon my uncle with a mild, benignant expression; and a smile of the same character gently spread itself over his countenance, when he perceived the alarm which his presence created."

"Who are you?" said the Doctor, looking toward the door to see whether by any chance he had that night forgotten to fasten it; but it was closed, and the key turned in it as usual.

"I am come," said the mysterious visitor, "to do an act of charity and justice through your means; and I have selected you for the office, because I know your integrity."

"The voice of the speaker was low and solemn, but nothing ghost-like. The Doctor repeated his question, however, as to who he was, with the additional inquiry of whence he came, and how he got into the room; for he did not then suppose it to be a spectre. The old gentleman remained silent, but looked displeased; and my uncle, resolving to clear up the mystery, thought he would ring for the servants, who had not long gone to bed. He found, however, that he had no power to move from his chair."

"Rather unpleasant," observed Simon Barnardiston.

"Particularly to persons who like to spring out of their chairs," remarked Hugh Buckner, significantly.

"There, hold your tongue," said Mary Falconer, impatiently, "and let Mr. Carliel go on."

"When the apparition perceived the Doctor's agitation, it addressed him in a tone of great gentleness, and begged he would not be alarmed, as it had no intention to do him the least injury."

"In the name of God, who are you?" said the Doctor.

"Were I to tell you," replied the apparition, "it would be of no use, for you do not know me. Listen to my errand. When I was of this world, I lived in the county of —, where I died possessed of large estates. These now belong to my grandson; but a suit has been commenced by my two nephews, the sons of my younger brother, to wrest them from him. You must prevent it."

"I!" exclaimed my uncle.

"You. It is for that purpose I am here. My words surprise you, and you are incredulous. Attend to what I am now going to say. The grand deed of settlement, the conveyance of the inheritance, is lost, and, for want of this deed, my grandson cannot maintain his right."

"Well," said my uncle, "and what can I do?"

"This," rejoined the spectre: "go down to my grandson's house, and I will give you such instructions as shall enable you to find it for him."

"Why not give those instructions to your grandson himself?" said the Doctor, becoming a little more at his ease with his unknown guest.

"Ask me not about that; there are divers reasons (some of which you may know hereafter) why I have preferred to do it through you. Your answer, therefore—will you undertake the office?"

"After some further discourse, my uncle consented, and then the spectre disclosed his name, the residence of his grandson, and such other particulars as were necessary to enable him to fulfil his mission."

"When you arrive," continued the old gentleman, "you can say you have seen me, but without mentioning where, or under what circumstances. I will prepare him for your visit. Ask to see the house, and in going over it you will come to an upper room or loft, filled with lumber. In one corner of the room there is an old chest with a broken lock, and a key in it, which can neither be turned in the lock nor pulled out of it. In that chest lies the grand deed which conveys the inheritance, and without the production of which my grandson and his family will be ruined. One thing more I would mention, which I wish you to take down in writing."

"My uncle drew to the table, and spreading a sheet of paper before him, sat with his pen ready to write whatever the spectre might dictate. Several minutes elapsed, during which not a word was spoken, when raising his eyes, he perceived the chair empty! The vision had disappeared. He looked around the room, examined the door and windows, but could discover nothing which indicated how it had made its exit."

"I suppose the candles burned tolerably blue," remarked Simon Barnardiston.

"Of course," responded Hugh Buckner.

"And what did your uncle do?" inquired Mary Falconer.

"Why, he went down to the old gentleman's grandson, by whom he was received with unexpected civility, though a perfect stranger to him. In the course of conversation, he mentioned that he knew his grandfather, and that he was aware of the circumstances under which it was likely he would be troubled in his possession of the estates."

"Ay," observed the gentleman, shaking his head; "my father died so young, and my grandfather left his affairs so confused, that, for want of one principal writing, I am in danger of being dispossessed of this fine property by my cousins."

"It is to be hoped you will be able to find it," said my uncle.

"I think I shall," replied the gentleman, looking significantly at the doctor, "now you are come."

"I!" exclaimed my uncle, in great astonishment.

"Yes, you. I had a dream last night, in which I saw a stranger resembling yourself, who said he had come to assist me in the search."

"Very odd," said the doctor, "that you should have had such a dream. But I suppose you have already examined every place where it was at all likely the writing could have been deposited?"

"Every drawer, every box, every cupboard, every chest, every nook and corner in the house, from top to bottom," replied the gentleman.

"And what did you do with the boxes and chests after you had thus ransacked them?"

"I piled them up in an old loft full of rubbish, which leads out upon the clock turret."

"I should like to see that old loft," said the Doctor.

"That you may; but it is not there you'll find the deed of settlement, I promise you."

"Perhaps not," rejoined my uncle, musing.

"Certainly not," answered the gentleman. "However, if you'll follow me, I'll show you the place."

"So away they went, and when they entered the room, my uncle found everything just as the old gentleman had described, including the old chest with the rusty lock upon it, and the key—which would neither turn round nor come out."

"How wonderful!" exclaimed Mrs. Dagleish.

"Yes," continued Mr. Carliel; "and, what was yet more wonderful, my uncle saw the old gentleman himself seated near the window, smiling at him, and silently encouraging him by his gestures to proceed with his task; but he had sufficient self-command to suppress any expression of astonishment. He glanced at his companion to observe whether he was aware of his grandfather's presence, and perceiving him quite unmoved, he was satisfied the spectre was visible only to himself."

"And you say you have ransacked every trunk and chest in this room?" said the Doctor.

"Every one."

"That's a queer looking old box, with the key sticking out," he continued.

"Ah!" replied the gentleman, "that disappointed me the most of all. It was full of dusty parchments, and I made sure I should find the one I wanted; but it was not there."

"I have a strange fancy come into my head," said the Doctor, "and I wish you would gratify it."

"What is it?"

"I should like to examine that box myself."

"There's nothing to examine; it's empty."

"Never mind; just indulge me," rejoined my uncle.

"Certainly," said the gentleman; and calling a servant, he bade him drag it out from the heap of chests beneath which it lay. While thus employed, his master addressed him, "Do not you remember that box, Will?"

"Yes, sir," says Will, "that I do. I remember you were so weary with taking out all the old parchments and examining them, that when you had done you were ready to faint."

"By this time Will had lugged the box out, and it now stood before the Doctor on the middle of the floor, with the lid up, and perfectly empty."

"I told you there was nothing in it," said the gentleman.

"You were right," replied my uncle, chopping his cane to the bottom of the box, and then leaning upon it, as if to support himself. "Have you got a hammer and chisel handy?" he asked.

"Go and fetch one, Will," said the gentleman.

"In a few minutes Will returned with a hammer and chisel, which he gave to the Doctor, who immediately began to knock upon the flat of the bottom."

"Do you hear that?" said he, addressing the gentleman eagerly.

"Hear what? I do not understand you."

"Why, the chest has a double bottom, sir—a false bottom. Do not you hear how hollow it sounds?"

"They immediately split the inner bottom open, and there lay the long-sought and much-desired parchment spread flat along the whole breadth of the chest."

"Well, only think!" exclaimed Mrs. Dagleish, lifting up her hands with astonishment. "No wonder, Mr. Carliel, you did not know what to say about there being such things as ghosts, after this wonderful appearance of one to your own uncle."

"It does not appear, though," said Simon Barnardiston, "that the ghost told him anything about the double bottom. He found that out himself, and that was the principal thing, after all."

"Not exactly so," replied Mr. Carliel; "for whenever my uncle told the story—and he was frequently asked to do so—he always added, 'I should never have thought of the double bottom; but the fact is, while I stood looking into the empty box, and thinking I had been made a fool of by the old gentleman, I saw him rise from his seat near the window, and advance toward me. I had much ado to prevent myself from showing a little uneasiness; for I was convinced I had to do with a being of another world, whatever might be the reason of it; and there is a sort of shrinking from such visitors, in spite of ourselves. He stood on the opposite side of the box, close to his grandson, upon whom he looked with an expression of countenance that was quite heavenly in its benevolent and affectionate character, as if rejoicing in the approaching disclosure, that was to relieve him from all further anxiety and danger. My own eyes were fixed steadily upon him, which he perceiving, his countenance immediately changed to an expression of intense satisfaction with me; and motioning me to look into the box he gently waved his rosemary branch to and fro, when the bottom of it seemed to grow transparent: for I saw, as plainly as it appeared after the false bottom was removed, the parchment lying in the way I have described. The whole of this passed in less than a minute; and when I again directed my look toward him he had vanished, the same as on his first visit.'"

"Well, I suppose it's all true," remarked Simon Barnardiston, "because your uncle said so; but it was a deuced roundabout way of doing the thing. Had I been the ghost, I would just have gone into the loft myself, took out the parchment, and placed it on my grandson's breakfast table some fine morning, instead of troubling the Doctor. I dare say he never gave any of the reasons he promised for sending him on the errand."

"I believe not," replied Mr. Carliel. "But my uncle had some very good reasons, nevertheless, for being satisfied; for the gentleman insisted upon his accepting a thousand-pound bank-note, as a slight acknowledgment of the great and signal service he had rendered him."

"And depend upon it that was the reason why the old gentleman sent him; that was what he meant when he said there were divers reasons why he preferred doing it through him," observed Stephen Falconer.

"How that may be, I cannot tell," said Mr. Carliel; "but the fact of the thousand pounds I do know, for I was with the Doctor when he received the letter containing it."

"You'll think what I'm going to say very foolish," said Mrs. Dagleish, "but if that note had come to me I wouldn't have touched it for all the world. Anything I bought with it I should have expected would do me no good."

"Pooh!" exclaimed Simon Barnardiston, laughing; "it was not the ghost of a bank-note, I dare say."

"Very likely not," replied Mrs. Dagleish, with increased gravity; "but I could never have looked upon it like other money."

"And, strange to say," added Mr. Carliel, "it never did my uncle any good; though, for my part, I see no reason why it should have happened so."

"There now!" exclaimed Mrs. Dagleish, casting a look of triumph at Simon.

"He bought a field with it," continued Mr. Carliel, "and built a house there; but before the house was finished, the field was the scene of an awful murder; and after it was finished, it was struck by lightning, and burned down. He re-built it, and planted the field with trees, which all withered away, and nobody would live in the house, because it was said to be haunted; and there it stands to this day, empty and falling to pieces."

"And was the house haunted?" inquired Mary Falconer. "Don't ask me," replied Mr. Carliel, shuddering as he spoke. "I was one of those who used to ridicule the idea of haunted houses; but I lived to change my opinion."

"In what way?" asked Hugh Buckner.

"A terrible way: too terrible to tell."

If Mr. Carliel really did not want to tell how he became a convert to the belief that houses may be haunted, he adopted the worst possible method of seeking his end: for his mysterious words and disturbed manner excited the most lively curiosity in his auditors, one and all of whom beset him with entreaties to go on. These he resisted as long as he could; but a taunt from Simon Barnardiston, insinuating that he had nothing to tell, made him resolve to relate his adventure with the SCREAMING WOMAN: and so eager was the little circle to have it, that nobody thought this time of asking about the hour; the only preparation for the story being a little closer drawing together of chairs, a glance or two at the door by Mary Falconer, her brother, and Hugh Buckner, and an adroit turning over of the log on the fire, edge-ways, by Mrs. Dagleish, so as to make it blaze up bonny.

"The field which my uncle bought," said Mr. Carliel, commencing his story with evident reluctance, and in a tone of voice which betrayed strong emotion, "was about seven miles from —, the county town of —shire. In this town, or rather in the outskirts of it, was a private mad-house, kept by the celebrated Dr. —, who was reputed eminently skilful in the treatment of insanity, but without the reputation of using great severity, not to say cruelty, and was moreover accused of receiving patients whom friends or relations might wish to put out of the way; and who, it was said, once committed to his care, never troubled them afterwards. The noises issuing from this place, especially during the night, were so frightful and appalling that few persons liked to pass it after dark, and those who were compelled to do so, hurried along, as if they expected to see at their heels some of the poor wretches who were howling, cursing, and blaspheming within."

"Among the stories current in the neighborhood was one relating to a female lunatic, whom they called MARTHA. It was said that about twenty years before, a stranger, who stated himself to be her husband, arrived with her in a carriage one night. He informed Dr. —, apparently with the greatest affliction, that she was laboring under frenzy of so violent and outrageous a character, that nothing but the severe discipline which was understood to be part of his system of treatment, could have any effect upon her. He advanced a large sum of money; saw her lodged in one of the strongest cells of the establishment; and renewing his assurances that the unsparing application of the scourge was absolutely necessary, departed. His meaning was not misunderstood. So, at least, ran the story—for the shrieks of poor Martha were heard day and night, as if the lash were indeed not spared."

"This at length attracted so much notice, and there were so many strange rumors circulating, that it was determined by the magistrates to make some inquiry into the business, which, reaching the ears of Dr. —, he himself voluntarily fixed a day for receiving them. In the interim, however, Martha was found dead in the very field I have mentioned."

"Dear me!" exclaimed Mrs. Dagleish, "how shocking!"

"Poor creature!" said Mary Falconer, with a sigh, "how did she get there, and who killed her?"

"I cannot answer either of your questions," replied Mr. Carliel, "and those who can, hold their tongues. It was given out that she had made her escape from the asylum, and destroyed herself; but though nobody could say she did not do so, nobody believed she did. Suppose the first improbability, that she could break out of her cell, and snap the heavy iron chain by which she was fastened to the wall, and elude the vigilance of all the keepers stationed in different parts of the asylum, was it likely she could have traversed the frequented road leading to the spot where she was found, without meeting some person whose notice she would have excited by her wild appearance, and half-clad form? Besides, what were her means of self-destruction? Nothing was found near the body, or in any part of the field. In her clenched hand, indeed, she grasped a piece of ragged iron, and with that, it was pretended, she had so mangled her throat as to cause death. No—no; depend upon it the wretched woman never left the asylum alive. Marks of the chain and the whip were conspicuous on every part of her emaciated body, and long tufts of her thin gray hair were matted together with the blood which had issued from a deep gash on the back of her head. A lone cottager, too, whose hut stood in a lane adjoining the field, was awake in the middle of the night by the sound of men's voices, and when they were heard no more, such terrific screams rang through the air every five minutes that the affrighted woman buried her face beneath the bedclothes in an agony of terror."

"How does that agree with what you have just said, that she did not leave the asylum alive?" said Simon Barnardiston.

"How did it happen," replied Mr. Carliel, "that the same screams were heard night after night, and every night on the same spot? How did it happen that scores of persons testified to this fact, until at last no one would come within a mile of the field after dark? How did it happen that those same persons who heard the screaming, saw also the dim shadowy form of a female flying round and round the field, as if pursued, and then suddenly disappearing in the very place where the body was found? How did it happen that a pale, bloodless face was seen pressing against the bedroom windows of the house which stood in that field, and this so constantly just after midnight, that the family were forced to quit it, and no one since has ever ventured to live in it? How did all these things happen?"

"Nay, I know not," replied Simon Barnardiston; "besides, I don't know that they did happen."

"Well, then, listen to what I know," said Mr. Carliel, somewhat nettled at Simon's incredulity, which in this case implied a sort of reproach upon what would seem to be his own credulity.

There was something rather startling in his solemn invitation to listen, after the glimpse he had given of what might be expected; especially as the candles had been neglected, till their snuffs were become dimly long, and the log of wood had been suffered gradually to flicker down to a red heat, without any blaze.

"Snuff the candles, Stephen," said Mary Falconer to her brother in a whisper.

"And give that wood a poke," said Hugh Buckner, addressing Simon, who sat next the fire.

The candles were certainly all the better for being snuffed: but the log was poked in vain. It merely splintered into red-hot ashes, without emitting as much flame as lights up a glow-worm's tail.

"My uncle," resumed Mr. Carliel when the little group had again settled down into silence, "told me all these circumstances with much chagrin, observing that the foolish notions which had thus got abroad would have the effect, he feared, of ruining his property in that quarter. I joined with him in ridiculing the whole thing, and proposed that he should go down, and by sleeping in the house himself put an end to the delusion. I found, however, that, much as he laughed at the idea of the 'SCREAMING WOMAN,' and the pale bloodless face that was seen pressing against the windows, he had no fancy for undertaking the task I had assigned him; but he jumped at my proposal to undertake it myself. I accordingly went down, and was most cordially received by the family, who seemed half to believe, and quite to wish, that my presence might dissolve the spell. I inquired, as you may be sure, very minutely into all the particulars, and asked whether there was any one room in the house which the lady fancied more than another, because if there was, I should prefer that one for my bed-chamber. I was promised the room at the window of which she had appeared three several times the preceding night; an occurrence, it seemed, which had never happened before. With this I declared myself satisfied; and supper being announced, we were just about to go into the apartment where it was laid, when I saw the gentleman's eldest daughter, a young lady about twenty, turn suddenly pale."

"Now it's coming!" said she. "I know by that low moaning sound which the wind seems to make. O God! what shall I do while it lasts!" and covering her ears with her hands, she crouched down upon a chair in one corner of the room.

"She had scarcely done so before the very apartment in which we were all standing appeared to vibrate with a prolonged piercing scream, which made my blood run cold. It died away, and again it came, still louder, and still more piercing; so as to give one the notion of some poor wretch upon whom the most exquisite torments were being inflicted. A third time it came; but now it was faint, and tremulous, and broken by languid sobs, as if life were ebbing fast under the torture. Never while I live shall I forget the terrible sound of those screams, or of that agonising one which seemed to denote exhausted suffering yielding up its worn-out spirit!"

"Let us go to the door," said I, wishing to ascertain whether the other part of the story was true, that the dim shadowy form of a female might be seen flying round and round the field. I did so. The master of the house accompanied me. The night was very dark, and not an object of any kind was visible. I strained my sight into the darkness in every direction, but could see nothing. This was a sort of relief to me; the screaming had a little staggered my resolution; but I now began to think that possibly it was either delusion, or some trick, being unaccompanied by that which it would have been more difficult to contrive, if there were any artifice at the bottom. But the relief, such it was, soon vanished. "There!" said my companion, suddenly grasping my arm, and whispering in my ear, "there! there! do you see? there she goes! round and round, like lightning!"

"I looked in the direction he pointed, and as plainly as I now see you," said Mr. Carliel, addressing himself to Mary Falconer.

"Lord! don't look at me," exclaimed the affrighted girl, who had been listening with breathless attention, and whom this appeal startled. "I shall fancy you see the SCREAMING WOMAN here."

"As plainly as I now see you," repeated Mr. Carliel, "I saw, whirling round the field, but not touching the ground, the form of a tall, thin woman, with outstretched arms, and her long white dress streaming behind her. Nay, as the spectral shadow seemed to pass within a few feet of where we were standing in its rapid flight, I could distinctly hear the rushing sound of a body passing through the air with great velocity. This continued for three or four minutes, when the phantom suddenly darted towards the middle of the field, sunk down, and disappeared."

"That's the exact spot where the body was found," observed my companion. "Now are you satisfied? We may go in; she will appear no more till after midnight."

"I was indeed satisfied: more than satisfied—I was convinced. I had had ocular demonstration of a thing which could not be the effect either of imagination or contrivance; and to tell you the plain truth, if shame would have let me, I should have dispensed with the remaining part of my task. However, I kept my fears to myself, put a bold face upon the matter, admitted it was very strange; but like our friend Simon there in the corner, affected to believe that, whatever it might be, it could be nothing supernatural; and thus trying to 'screw my courage to the sticking-place,' I took possession of my bedchamber, gayly promising to give a good account of the ghost next morning at breakfast."

"That was very venturesome, I think," observed Mrs. Dagleish. "I hope you said your prayers as soon as you were alone."

"I said them before I went to bed, as I always do," replied Mr. Carliel, "but I do not remember that I put up any special one for the occasion."

"What did you go to bed?" inquired Mary Falconer, "and put out the candle?"

"I went to bed; but, to confess the truth, I did not put out the candle."

"I would have had half-a-dozen candles had I been you," observed Hugh Buckner. "I always think one doesn't feel so afraid of anything when there's plenty of light. It wasn't a rushlight, I hope? Rushlights are nasty things—they burn so dim, and are so apt to gutter and go out."

"Did you go to sleep?" asked Mrs. Dagleish.

"Oh yes; for I did not want to lie awake: but may the next slumber (if ever I am doomed to have such slumbers,) that is to end in so horrible a way, never—never be broken! A dream was upon me full of blood and death. The shrieking maniac flitted through my brain in a thousand shapes. At one moment she seemed to be standing over me, brandishing a sword of fire. The next, she advanced from a dark corner of the room, bearing in her right hand a skull filled with some loathsome fluid. Lord! how she glared upon me as she presented this draught to my lips, and with her long bony fingers thrust into my mouth, forced me to swallow it. I felt it trickle down to my very heart in slow, cold drops,—and when there, methought it burned like a raging fire. The torment maddened me; I attempted to spring upon the hag by whom it was inflicted; but a long, sallow arm held me down. I struggled with her; and in the struggle I awoke. The first sound that struck my ears was that unearthly scream, which I had heard a few hours before. It was repeated: it came from the window: the casement flapped as if shaken by a strong wind: and though my very sinews seemed shrunk and withered by the sound, I threw myself out of bed, and staggered towards the window. I tore the curtains asunder, and there, pressed close against the glass, I saw a pale, bloodless visage, the glare of whose red eyes seemed to sear my own. I well remember what followed—the impulse, which I could not resist, to dash my hand through the panes. As I did so, the lips of the phantom quivered, the scream rang again through the apartment, and I fell senseless on the floor. The noise of the broken glass awakened the master of house, who hastened into my room, and found me in a swoon, with my hand dreadfully cut and bleeding. Here are the scars still remaining," continued Mr. Carliel, showing the back and wrist of his right hand, "and I never look at them without a shuddering recollection of how they came there."

"And was it never known," said Mrs. Dagleish, "how that poor creature came by her death?"

"Never. The matter was hushed up; no inquiries were made by any of her family, and strangers, whatever they might think, did not care to come forward. I believe, indeed, not even Dr. — himself was acquainted with her name or history."

"Poor soul!" ejaculated Mary Falconer, yawning as she spoke.

This set them all a yawning, which produced a general declaration that it was very late, and time to go to bed. But nobody moved.

"And you saw the face quite plain through the glass, did you?" asked Hugh Buckner, addressing Mr. Carliel, at the same time directing his looks toward the window of the room in which they were sitting.

"Oh, yes," replied Mr. Carliel; "there was no mistake about the matter; and I have seen it many a time since."

"Good gracious! where?" said Mrs. Dagleish.

"I see it now," he continued calmly, turning his eyes upward to the ceiling. Immediately all their eyes were hurried upward to the ceiling. "And I can bring the hideous image before me at any time, so strong was the impression it produced. In like manner I often hear the scream ringing in my ears."

He had scarcely uttered the words when a terrific screaming was heard, which appeared to come from below stairs. Mrs. Dagleish and Mary Falconer screamed in chorus; Mr. Carliel grew pale; Stephen Falconer caught up the poker; Hugh Buckner held fast by his chair; and Simon Barnardiston made for an old-fashioned cupboard in one corner of the room, into which he vanished in the twinkling of an eye.

The screaming continued,—footsteps were heard hurrying along the passage,—the door flew open,—and Jesse, the servant wench, rushed in.

"Oh, ma'am!" said she, addressing her mistress, "I have been so frightened!"

"Frightened!" cried Simon, issuing from his hiding-place the moment he heard her voice, "what the devil was there to frighten you, you foolish girl?"

"Oh, so frightened!" continued Jesse, dropping into a chair, and beginning to cry most lustily, holding her apron to her eyes with both hands.

"She ought to be ashamed of herself," quoth Hugh Buckner, his teeth chattering as he spoke.

Stephen Falconer gently restored the poker to its place, advanced towards his sister, who seemed very much inclined to go into hysterics, called it "a capital joke," and tried to laugh.

"I don't know what it all means," said Mrs. Dagleish, recovering from her alarm, "but it is very trying to one's nerves to have such a scream in the house, just as we were all thinking about the poor screaming woman."

"The coincidence is certainly curious," remarked Mr. Carliel; "but, though startled at first, hang me if I can help laughing at it now;" and forthwith they all began laughing at each other, which put a stop to Jesse's crying: she thought they were laughing at her, but wondered why. At last she laughed too, partly from the infectious nature of that "inarticulate expression of sudden merriment," (as Johnson defines it,) and partly from the recollection of what had caused her own fright.

"It was certainly very ridiculous!" exclaimed Mary Falconer, the tears running down her cheek.

"Very," added Mrs. Dagleish.

"Plenty of screaming, down stairs and up," said Stephen.

"I sha'n't forget how you looked when you laid hold of the poker," quoth Simon Barnardiston.

"Nor I how you looked when you bolted into the cupboard in double-quick time," retorted Stephen.

"Nor, how we all looked," observed Mr. Carliel; at which the laugh began again, and continued till their very sides ached, and their temples throbbed.

Jesse, meanwhile, who knew nothing of how the family had been amusing themselves since supper, could not for the soul of her understand why her screaming should be the cause of such excessive merriment.

At last they ceased laughing, and then she was called upon to explain what had happened to her, which she did in few words. Waiting to go to bed, she had fallen asleep by the kitchen fire; but was awakened by something tickling her left ear. "Putting up my hand," she continued, "to scratch my ear, I laid hold of I did not know what; it was soft and warm, like a mouse; but how a mouse could get behind my ear I could not think. However, it jumped out of my hand, and came with such a bounce upon the floor that I thought it would run up my petticoats perhaps; so I set up a skreek, (I could n't help it,) and ran out o the kitchen.

The mystery thus solved, the Christmas gossipers soon after separated for the night, but not before it was settled that Mrs. Dagleish should tell her story of "THE BLACK RIBAND" next morning at breakfast.

TROUBLE.

Often, when there is an appearance of an epidemic in the city, proper caution is necessary in the papers about announcing its existence, before its character and extent are understood, lest fears should be excited abroad, unwarranted by any danger, and the business of the city should thereby suffer. Sporadic cases of particular diseases are, therefore, more referred to as evidences of the prevalence of the disorder, because every season has some of the cases of a disease, which, in times of calamity, distinguishes that season by its extent and mortality. But when once a contagious disorder becomes prevalent, or when any disease is epidemic, then it behoves the conductors of papers to sound the alarm, lest additions should be made to the sufferers, by new accessions of citizens, or to the sufferings, perhaps, from the same cause.

Such a case occurred in 1832, when the cholera raged, and the press promptly announced the appearance of the disease, and the extent of its ravages. And a case has again occurred, and with becoming promptness, we give notice of its existence and danger.—"Cassett Monitor."

The disease may be considered annual in our city. If we mistake not, it is endemic, and also epidemic; and in its operations, at the present moment, it is making sad havoc in family comforts. We have noticed that, like the "malaria" of Italy, it commences in the upper portions of a dwelling, but soon works downward through all the premises. We saw, last week, its operation, and noticed the progress of the disorder in a house. The female portions of the family appear to be seized with a certain giddiness. All ordinary pursuits suddenly ceased. Several persons, who seemed to partake of the same infirmity, had found their way into the house; and all who were thus affected were, in the upper rooms of the dwelling, in a most distressed and distressing situation. They had torn up the carpets, disturbed the beds, thrust the chairs out of the room, and upset buckets of water upon the floor, while one of the unfortunates, a colored woman, with a long handled brush, was daubing the ceiling with a compound of water and lime, parts of which had descended upon her person, presenting an appearance of leprosy spots most alarming.

Meantime the disease descended from the head to the heart of the house, and chambers, parlors, dining rooms, boudoirs, and even the culinary apartments, shared in the general derangement. Nor was this all. Passengers in the street, if not infected, were, at least, invaded; for so high did the excitement rage, that water was thrown from the upper windows of the house, and made to descend in torrents upon the hats, coats, shawls, and dresses of honest, unsuspecting passengers.

We saw, too, business friends, only Friday, sneaking out of their own houses at an early hour, steering with great circumspection through defiles of blue pots, white wash buckets, wash tubs, brushes, scrubbing brooms, mops, and servants, with the mistress in the rear; and having gained the step of the door, they sprang to the centre of the street, to avoid any outpouring from above. At noon, these gentlemen took dinner at some of the hotels, omitted tea, and at a late hour got home, and found little or no hope, that the disorder in the family was abated.

Connected with the violence of this disease, we ought to mention another type of the disorder; and that is a peculiar acerbity of temper manifested by a wild swinging of the hands, not unfrequently with the broom and mop handle held fast.

So general is the operation of the disease, that we should not have made mention of it, excepting to warn those at a distance, that it is now at its height; and if they are coming to the city, they may calculate the time of visitation accordingly.

We ought to mention, that the complaints are most frequent among the literary men. Libraries are daubed, and papers mislaid. But we have seen no one unwise enough to attempt to stem the torrent in his own family, and venture to oppose any obstacle to "CLEANING HOUSE."—[U. S. Gazette.

COMMERCIAL COURTSHIP—A merchant, originally from Liverpool, having acquired a large fortune in one of the West India Islands, concluded that he could not be happy in the enjoyment of it unless he shared it with a woman of merit, and knowing of none to his fancy he wrote to a worthy correspondent of his in Liverpool, to procure a "help-mate for him."

He was not acquainted with any style except in business; therefore treating of affairs of love as matters of merchandize, after giving his friend several commissions, and reserving this for the last, he went on thus: "Item—Seeing that I have taken a resolution to marry, and that I do not find a suitable match for me here, do not fail to send by the next ship bound hither, a young woman of form and qualifications following:—As to portion I demand none; let her be of an honest family, between twenty and twenty-five years of age, of a middle stature, and well-proportioned; her face agreeable, her temper mild, her character blameless, her health good, and her constitution strong enough to bear the changes of climate, that there may be no occasion to look out for a second, through loss of the first soon after she comes to hand, which must be provided against as much as may be considering the danger of the sea. If she arrive here conditioned as above said, with the present letter endorsed by you, or at least a true copy thereof, that there may be no mistake or imposition, I hereby engage and bind myself to satisfy the said letter by marrying the bearer at 15 days sight. In witness whereof, I subscribe, &c."

The correspondent read over and over this odd article which put the future spouse on the same footing with the bale of goods he was to send to his friend, and after admiring the prudent exactness of the West Indian, (whose ingenuousness he well knew,) and his laconic style in enumerating qualifications he insisted on, he endeavored to serve him to his mind, and after making many enquiries, he judged he had found a lady fit for his purpose—of reputable family but slender fortune; of good temper and polite education, well shaped and more than commonly beautiful. He made the proposal to her, and the young woman, whose dependence was chiefly upon a cross old aunt, with whom she lived in a state of perpetual uneasiness, accepted it.

A ship bound for the West Indies, was that week fitting up at Liverpool; the young woman, together with the bale of goods, put on board; being well provided with necessities, and particularly with a certificate in due form and endorsed by the correspondent. She was also included in the invoice, the last article of which ran thus:—"Item—A young lady of 24 years of age, quality, shape, condition, as per order, as appears from the certificate and affidavits she has produced." The writings which were thought necessary for so exact a man as her future husband, were, an extract from the parish register, a certificate of her character attested by the clergyman; an attestation of her neighbors setting forth that she had patiently lived three years with an old aunt, who was intolerably peevish, and had not during all that time given the said aunt, the least occasion for complaint; and lastly, goodness of constitution, was attested by four physicians. Before the gentle woman's departure, the correspondent sent letters of advice by other ships to his friend, informing him that by such a ship he should send a woman of such an age, character, condition, &c.—in a word, such as he himself had requested to be sent.

The letter of advice, the bales, and the young woman, got safe into port, and the West Indian, who was one of the foremost on the pier at the lady's landing, was charmed to see so handsome and interesting a female, more especially when she, approached him in the most graceful and modest manner, said, "Sir, I have a bill of exchange upon you, I beg you will be pleased to honor it." At the same time she delivered his correspondent's letter, on reading which he exclaimed, "Ah! madam, I never yet suffered my bills to be protested, and I assure you that this shall not be the first."

This interview was in a few days followed by the nuptials, which were very magnificent, and the new married couple were well satisfied with the happy union, negotiated by a bill of exchange."

BUSTS OF THE TWELVE CÆSARS.—Singular recovery of Splendid Works of Art.—About the year 1518, twelve busts of the Roman Emperors, executed in terra cotta, beautifully enamelled and nearly the size of life, were forwarded to Cardinal Wolsey, to decorate the palace of Hampton Court, by Pope Leo the Tenth. Eight of these splendid works of art have always existed in the first and second courts of the palace; but not one of the remaining four, to complete the valuable series, could be found, until within the last few months, although many years ago a strict search had been made for them by the various authorities connected with Hampton Court. In the reign of George the Fourth the search and inquiries were again renewed, but without any discovery of their hiding places resulting from the labors of those to whom the task was confided of endeavoring to trace them. A few months ago one of the missing four was, by mere chance, discovered in one of the back rooms of Hampton Court Palace, attached to one of the private apartments, in a fine state of preservation.

Since then another of the series has been recovered, and by the merest chance also, in a small cottage, close to the Stag Paddock, in Windsor Great Park. It appears that this cottage has just undergone some repairs, preparatory to its being occupied by one of Prince Albert's gamekeepers. The workmen, in the course of their labors, found a bust fixed in the wall, about ten feet from the ground; and upon the discovery reaching the ears of a gentleman connected with the court, he found it was one of the four long lost works, perfectly free from injury, and in a most excellent state of preservation. It was immediately taken down, and soon afterward forwarded to Hampton Court.

Within the last few days another of these valuable works of art was discovered by Mr. Jesse, the surveyor of woods and work at one of the royal lodges in the Great Park, known as the World's-end Lodge, inhabited by one of the barkeepers. It was found let into the external wall, about ten or twelve feet from the ground, where it must have been for considerably more than a century. It was almost considered by the persons living at the lodge to be a bust of Queen Anne! Of so little value was it supposed to be, that the boys of the neighborhood, as they have passed by the house, have frequently been known to amuse themselves by pelting it with stones and clay. Notwithstanding the rough and Gothic-like usage it has been subjected to for years past, it is but very slightly injured—portions of the enamel being chipped off but here and there. In all other respects it is perfect. It has just been carefully removed from the building, and will be forwarded to Hampton Court Palace in the course of a few days, where, with the other two alluded to, it will be placed in appropriate niches in the first and second courts. There is only one now wanting of the complete set.—[London paper.

A ROMANCE OF THE REVOLUTION.

The night had already settled down gloomily and forbidding, on the evening of the 15th of July, 1789, when the advancing column of a little army, whose uniform betokened it to be American, emerged from a thick wood on the shore of the Hudson, and in an instant the whole dim and shadowy prospect, disclosed to them along the bank of the river, opened to the sight. Far away lay Verplank's Point, now buried in a mass of shadow, while on the other side of the river, dark, gloomy and frowning, rose up the craggy heights of Stony Point. Washed on three sides by the Hudson, and protected on the other, except along a narrow road by a morass, the fort was deemed one of the most impregnable on the river, and its capture regarded as almost impossible. Yet to achieve that gallant purpose this little army was on its march.

A turn in the road soon hid them from the river, and after a silent march of some minutes duration they arrived within a mile and a half of the enemy's lines, and, halting at the command of their officer, formed into columns for the attack. Beginning again their march, they soon reached the marshy ground at the base of the hill.

"Halt!" said the low voice of the general, from the front "we are nigh enough now—HALT!"

The order passed in a whisper down the line, and the column paused on the edge of the morass. It was a moment of suspense and peril. Every man felt that in a few minutes the fate of their hazardous enterprise would be determined, and that they would either be cold in death, or the American flag waving in triumph over the dark promontory ahead, now scarcely discernible through the thick gloom of midnight. Yet not a lip quivered nor a cheek blanched in that crisis. About twenty paces in front of the column had halted the forlorn-hope of 150 men, with unloaded pieces and bayonets fixed, while farther on, a similar group of shadowy forms could be seen through the obscurity, accoutred with axes to cut through the abattis. Each man had a piece of white paper in his hat to distinguish him from the foe in the approaching melee. The pause, however, which afforded this prospect was but momentary. The general had already reconnoitered the approaches to the still silent promontory; and, waving his sword on high, he gave the order. In another instant the dark massive column was moving steadily to the attack.

It was a thrilling moment, during which that devoted band had crossed rapidly over the marsh. As yet, the enemy had not discovered them. Even the hearts of the oldest veterans trembled with the eagerness of that moment of suspense. Already had the foremost of the pioneers reached the abattis, and the quick, rapid blows of their axes rung upon the night, when suddenly a shout of alarm burst from the fort, the gun of a sentry flashed through the gloom, and in an instant all was uproar and confusion within the astonished fortification. Not a moment was to be lost.

"Advance! advance!" shouted Wayne, as he pressed rapidly on towards the abattis, followed in death-like silence by the indomitable troops.

"To arms!" came borne on the night breeze from the fort—"to arms! to arms!" and then followed the quick roll of the drum. In an instant the enemy were at their posts, and as the gallant continentals still maintained their silent but steady march, a fire, such as only desperation could produce, burst from every embrasure of the fort. The incessant rattle of the musketry, the roar of artillery, the crashing of the grape-shot, and the lurid light flung over the scene by the explosion of the shells, and the streams of fire pouring from the fort, formed a picture which no pen can describe. Yet, amid it all, the daring assailants steadily advanced, though not a trigger had been pulled in their ranks. Faithful to the commands of their general, though trembling in every limb with eagerness, they kept up their silent march, amid that fiery tempest, as if impelled by some god-like power. On—they passed. The whirlwind of fire from the fort ceased not; yet still they dashed along, charged at the point of the bayonet, over abattis and bulwark, until the enemy, borne back by their impetuous onset, quailed before them. The works were forced. Then, and not till then, was the death-like silence broken. A sound rang out from the victorious troops over all the thunder of the battle. It was heard by the head of the column behind, it passed down their line, was caught up by the rear, and a wild shout, making the very welkin tremble, rang out as they dashed on to the attack.

The contest was short, but terrific. Over bulwark, battery, and prostrate foes the gallant continentals, headed by Wayne, pressed on, and driving all before them, met the column of their little army, with an enthusiastic cheer, in the very centre of the enemy's works. In another moment, the starry flag of America waved triumphantly over the battlements.

The enthusiasm of the victors cannot be described. But though the contest had been so bloody, not a man of the enemy fell, after resistance ceased. The prisoners were disarmed, a guard placed over them, and sentries posted on all the commanding positions around the works. The morning gun announced to the British fleet in the river that Stony Point was won.

MILTON'S HOUSE.—Milton's house at Horton was pulled down about fifty years since, and another—apparently of similar dimensions—built in its stead. The garden and grounds are the same; and an old pigeon-house belonging to the former mansion has been preserved. In the garden is a decayed apple-tree, under which the poet is said—with no great probability—to have composed the Arcades. The situation of the house is low and marshy. Though near the public road, it is concealed by the shrubbery and a cluster of 'hedge-row-elm.' We had some difficulty in finding the house, as the villagers considered our inquiries to be directed towards a more aristocratic mansion, the manor-house, which has recently been destroyed, to the great regret of the people, who described it as a noble old residence, that had stood for hundreds of years. The Milton house was the second in importance in the village. Having traced out the spot, we found the proprietor, Mr. Cooke, a hale, cheerful old gentleman, engaged in the fields superintending his hay-makers. He came with great alacrity to shew us the house, pointed out the pigeon-house and apple-tree, and dwelt with peculiar delight on the appearance of two tall poplars on the lawn, about a hundred feet in height, which were visible, he said, all the way to Slough, near Windsor, and on the London road. There is not a hill betwixt Horton and London. In this secluded spot, 'shrouded in cheerful shade,' the poet had nothing to withdraw him from the studies in which he delighted. Mr. Cooke called one of his laborers to accompany us to Horton Church, in which, he said, no doubt the Miltons often sat, and where the poet's mother lay buried. The honest peasant was as civil and cheerful as his master, of whom he spoke with the affection of the 'olden time,' that still lingers in these remote nooks and corners, where society is much the same as it was two hundred years since. His master, he said, had suffered much affliction; all his family had died before him, and their tombs were in the church. There is, fortunately, in some minds an elasticity and ever-springing cheerfulness—the result of a happy nature and calm reliance on the goodness of Providence—that enables them to surmount the heaviest calamities that befall humanity. Horton Church is like the village, low and antique; it has its yew-trees and ivy-mantled walls, the characteristic and interesting accompaniments of such spots. An ancient font is in the interior. The chancel is paved with red bricks, among which the blue flagstone over the grave of the poet's mother is conspicuous. The stone is inscribed, 'Here lyeth the body of Sara Milton, the wife of John Milton, who died the 3d of April, 1637.' Fraser's Mag. for May.

MILTON'S MANUSCRIPTS AT CAMBRIDGE.—Among Milton's manuscripts are outlines of various subjects, intended by the poet for tragedies. Sixty-two are scriptural subjects, thirty-two from English history, and five from Scottish history. A 'century of inventions!' Such stupendous labor had the young poet marked out for himself! The Old Testament, as abounding in picturesque and striking incidents, furnished most of the scriptural plans; seven only are from the New Testament. One of these he entitles Christus Patiens, founded on the scene in the garden. 'His agony may receive noble expressions,' are the concluding words of this sketch; and noble they would have been if Milton, in the full maturity of his powers, had tasked himself to his high theme. One of the poet's historical plans was wisely abandoned—the subject of Macbeth preoccupied by Shakespeare. Milton proposed beginning at the arrival of Malcolm at Macduff, and he adds, 'The matter of Duncan may be expressed by the appearing of his ghost.' The splendid success of Shakespeare in the early and preternatural scenes of the play—heightened by the character of Lady Macbeth, a character superior in tragic power and terror to the grandest creations of the Grecian drama—must have deterred Milton independently of his respect for the unities of the drama, from the thought of commencing before the murder, or probably his severe classical taste would lead him to shun the representation of a murder on the stage. He did right, however, in not measuring swords with Shakespeare. 'Within that circle none durst walk but he.' Milton's panoply of learning would have impeded his motions and contracted his power. Shakespeare, swift and unencumbered, like Ithuriel, with 'touch of celestial temper,' reached the heart at once. By a happy institution he achieved what even Aristotle admits to be the great end of tragedy—to excite admiration, compassion, and sympathy. His moral is as just and complete as it is terrible. He trusted, not to classical taste and the unities, but to his command over the strong, ever-living passions of human nature, shaping our actions and destiny, beating in every breast and agitating every frame. Milton would have found 'fit audience but few.' Shakespeare has civilized man in every country to melt at his tenderness and pity, kindle at his ardor, and shudder at his sublimity.

Fraser's Magazine for May.

The following lines from the London Times, are the only ones among many we have seen, that touch with power, or in the right vein, upon what must now be deemed the lost ship.

THE PRESIDENT.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'ECCLESIA'

Speak! for thou hast a voice, perpetual sea!
Lift up thy surges, with some signal word,
Show where the pilgrims of the water be,
For whom a nation's thrilling heart is surr'd.
Down to thy waves they went in joyous pride,
They trod with steadfast feet thy billowy way;
The eyes of wondering men beheld them glide
Swift in the arrowy distance—where are they?
Didst thou arise upon that mighty frame,
Mad that the strength of man with thee should strive,
And proud thy rival element to tame,
Didst swallow them in conscious depths alive?
Or, shorn and powerless, hast thou bade them lie
Their stately ship, a carcass on the foam?
Where still they watch the ocean and the sky,
And fondly dream that they have yet a home!
Dost hope still soothe their souls or gladness thrill?
Is peace amid those wanderers of the foam?
Say, is the old affection yearning still
With all the blessed memories of home?
Or is it over? Life and breath, and thought,
The living feature and the breathing form?
Is the strong man become a thing of nought,
And the rich blood of rank no longer warm?
Thou answer'st not, thou stern and haughty sea,
There is no sound in earth, or wave, or air.
Roll on, ye tears! Oh what can comfort be
To hearts that pant for hope, but breathe despair?
Nay, mourner, there is sunlight on the deep,
A gentle rainbow on the darkling cloud;
A voice, more mighty than the floods, will sweep
The shore of tempests when the storm is loud!
What, tho' they woke the whirlwinds of the West,
Or rous'd the tempest from the Eastern lair,
Or clave the cloud with thunder in its breast—
Lord of the awful waters, Thou wert there!
All merciful! The fate—the day—were thine;
Thou didst receive them from the seething sea;
Thy love too deep, Thy mercy too divine,
To quench them in an hour unworthy Thee.
If storms were mighty, Thou wert in the gale!
If their feet fail'd them, in Thy paths they trod:
Man cannot urge the bark, or guide the sail,
Or force the quivering helm, away from God!

ERGOT, OR SPURRED RYE.—At a late meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society of England, a lecture was delivered by Professor Henslow on the diseases of corn, which, from the summary which we have seen, must have been of a highly valuable character. The following abstract of the remarks relating to ergot, or Spurred Rye—to the character and properties of which, public attention has been considerably directed within a few years, is highly interesting:—
"Ergot was regarded as a monstrous state of the grain of Rye, produced by the external action of a minute fungus causing the grain to lengthen into a horn something like cocks spur. It is so exceedingly oily, that it will burn like an almond in the flame of a candle. The action of ergotized corn has been ascertained to be highly deleterious, both to man and animals; the latter, indeed, preferred starvation to feeding upon it, even when mixed with good flour. A duck, which had been fed with ergot mixed with flour, in the proportion (say) of 1 in 17, died in ten days, after having had the end of its tongue rotted off, and drops of blackish blood oozing from its nostrils. A pig was poisoned in like manner in twenty-three days; the ears and flesh of the tail having rotted away, and the legs having mortified. Fortunately we know little of this pest in England; for it is equally fatal in its horrible effects upon man, as has been amply proved in France. A case, however, was mentioned as being recorded in the parish register of Wattisham, a place in Suffolk, which occurred in 1762, when as it was thought, in consequence of witchcraft, a poor family were lamentably poisoned, their legs and feet rotting off. A girl of sixteen lost both her legs, and died; of the mother, both the feet came off at the ankles, and the flesh decayed from the leg-bones; a girl of fourteen lost one foot at the ankle, and the other leg at the knee; a child of ten years old lost a foot; of two boys, one lost his feet, and the other his legs.

This dreadful calamity was referred by the Professor, with great probability, to the action of ergot, which he finds attacks the Rye-wheat of the neighborhood of Wattisham, a kind of grain on which this ill-fated family was fed. Draining was mentioned as the only known preventive of ergot."

A MAY-MORNING CAROL.

My soul is glad. I would essay
A soul-born, sweet, spontaneous lay—
A song of joy to thee, thou ever charming May!
From grove and glade, through bower and bush,
O Heaven! what melody doth gush;
To hear herself so praised, the Morning well may blush.
The lark yon crimson'd clouds among,
Pours an exuberance of song;
An age that song to list would not seem lost or long.
The blackbird by the woodland stream,
The spirit of some Bard ye'd deem—
One who had lived and died in love's delicious dream.
Thrice welcome Minstrel!—hark! at hand
The cuckoo joins the vocal band,
With notes that might be sung in bowers of Fairy-land.
O May! thou art a wizard crown'd,
That with enchanted wand the ground
Dost touch;—and lo! the bright, the beautiful abound.
The wonted torrent from the hill,
Thou changest to a gentle rill—
A thread of liquid pearl that gently murmurs still.
Thou comest, and the clouds are not;
The North-wind has his wrath forgot;
The gossamer alone is on the air aloft.
Thine is the blossom bursting tree,
The leafy bower to deck for me—
Thine first to show the heaven in each blue lake that be.
Cheer'd by thy smile, the herd-boy gay
Oft sings the rock repeated lay,
And wonders who can be the mocker in his way.
The lambskins sport, or lie at ease
Like little snow-wreaths on the leas;
The butterfly doth glide, like blossom on the breeze.
Flowers of Elysian form and hue
Around me drink the freshening dew;
Some gaze on the young Sun—his worshippers, I trow.
Some here and there with bashful grace
Shrink from the wild bee's rude embrace;
Some, as with filial love, do earthward turn their face.
Above, below, all; all doth seem
So wondrous that I almost deem Myself asleep, and these, creations of a dream.

FEMALE DUELISTS.—The most celebrated female duelist was the actress Maupin, one of the performers at the Opera. Serane, the famous fencing-master, was one of her lovers, and from him she received many valuable lessons. Being insulted one day by an actor by the name of Dumény, she called him out; but as he refused to give her satisfaction, she carried away his watch and his snuff-box as trophies of her victory. Another performer having presumed to offend her, on his declining a meeting, was obliged to kneel down before her and implore forgiveness. One evening at a ball, having behaved in a very rude manner to a lady, she was requested to leave the room, which she did on the condition that those gentlemen who had warmly espoused the offended lady's cause should accompany her. To this proposal they agreed; when, after a hard combat, she killed them all, and quietly returned to the ball-room. Louis XIV. granted her a pardon, and she withdrew to Brussels, where she became the mistress of the Elector of Bavaria. However, she soon after returned to the Parisian Opera, and died in 1707, at the age of thirty-seven. Under the regency, a pistol meeting took place between the Marquise de Nesle and the Countess Polignac for the possession of the Due de Richelieu; and in more modern time, so late, indeed, as 1827, a Madame A—at St. Rambert received a challenge to fight with pistols; and about the same period, a lady of Chateauroux, whose husband had received a slap in the face without resenting the insult, called out the offender, and fighting him with swords, severely wounded him.

Milligen's History of Dueling.

LIFE IN A CAMP.—After having seen the provisions distributed, I set about looking out for some accommodation for my wife; for we had not as yet been accustomed to lie on the open field, as in bivouac, nor ever seen the like, and the tent was far from comfortable for a poor wearied young woman: I shall not mention delicacy, for that would be out of place—we must submit to circumstances. The names of the seventeen men were on the tent beside myself; so it may be easily guessed how crowded it must have been, had the whole been off duty, but this was seldom the case. However, as no other shelter was to be had, we took a berth under it. Eleven soldiers lay in it that night along with us, all stretched with their feet to the centre, and their heads to the curtain of the tent, every man's knapsack below his head, and his clothes and accoutrements on his body; the one-half of the blankets under and the other spread over the whole, so that we lay in one bed. Often did my poor wife look up to the thin canvass that screened her face from the night dew, and wish for the approaching morn. It was announced, at last, before daybreak, by an exclamation of 'Rouse!' which passed from tent to tent along the lines, when every man started up, folded his blanket, and strapped it on the back of his knapsack, ready for a march.

CURIOUS MARRIAGE CUSTOM AMONG THE COSSACKS.—There are said to be no old maids among the Cossacks of Ukraine, since the custom allows the young women to choose their husbands. When a young woman in the Ukraine feels a tender passion for a young man, she goes to his parent's house and says to him, 'be blessed of God.' She then sits down, and addresses herself to the object of her affections in the following terms: 'Iran, Theodore, (or whatever else may be his name) the goodness I see written in your countenance is a sufficient assurance to me that you are capable of loving and ruling a wife; and your excellent qualities encourage me to hope that you will make a good husband. It is the belief, that I have taken the resolution to come and beg of you with all due humility to accept me for your spouse.' She afterwards addresses the father and mother in words to the same effect, and solicits them earnestly to consent to the marriage. If she meets with a refusal, she answers, 'that she will not quit the house till she has married the object of her love.' If she be sufficiently persevering, and have patience to stay a few days or weeks in their house, the parents are not only forced to give their consent, but frequently persuade their son to marry her. The young man, likewise, is generally moved by her perseverance and affection, and gradually accustoms himself to the idea of making her his wife, and at length consents. It is said that the parents never employ any force to compel her to leave their house, because they believe that by so doing they should draw down the vengeance of heaven upon their heads; and the girl's family would not fail to resent such an action as a grievous affront.

DURATION OF LITERARY COPYRIGHT IN DIFFERENT COUNTRIES.—In Prussia, the exclusive right of publication is guaranteed to authors during their lives, and to their heirs for thirty years afterward. This refers only to literary works. In works of art, plays, or music, the duration of copyright extends only to ten years after the author's death. In the Germanic Confederation, literary productions of all kinds, even works of art, are protected for ten years; but this period may be extended to twenty in favor of large works, requiring much labor and expense. The Germanic Confederation intend, however, to take the subject into deliberation next year, with a view to extend the minimum duration of copyright in literary works. In Russia, any author or translator of a book has the exclusive property in the work during his life, and his heirs or assigns for twenty years subsequent to his decease. In Belgium, the right is conceded to the author during his life, and to his widow and his heirs during their lives; but all right terminates after the death of the first generation of the author's heirs. In the Pontifical States, by an edict dated in 1826, authors and artists have the exclusive right to publish their works during their lives, and their heirs for twelve years after their death. In the United States, by an act of Congress, dated in 1831, the copyright, which previously only lasted for fourteen years, was extended to twenty-eight years, with the right to further extension for fourteen years if the author should survive the first term.

The New World.

A New Enlarged Quarto Volume.

COMMENCING THE FIRST WEEK IN JULY.

The Third Volume of the QUARTO form of the NEW WORLD will commence on the 3d of July, when it will be much enlarged, and four columns given on each page, instead of three, making sixty-four columns of choice reading, without any increase in the price. New Volumes will always begin on the 1st of July and 1st of January, making two in each year, of 416 pages each, to which a handsome title page and a copious index will be given.

The NEW WORLD is a Journal of Popular Literature, Criticism, Science and the Arts. It is supplied with articles by the first living writers of the United States and Great Britain. The first number was issued in June, 1840, and its circulation has steadily increased to this day, till it counts more readers than any other newspaper of its kind in the world. This is owing to the fact of its having given to the public, for so many years, and always in advance of any other print, the most popular works of the most approved authors.

A novel and striking feature of the New World is, that it has given besides the great literary productions of the day, the discourses of eminent divines. In future these discourses will be presented even more frequently than heretofore; but not too often to interfere with other interesting articles.

In addition to all these new and popular works, these eloquent discourses, this comprehensive journal has given the best poems and periodical papers which have appeared in the English and American Magazines. What has been done is an earnest of what will be done.

The New World is divided into various departments, viz:—Original Articles; First American Editions; Periodical Literature; The Scrap Book; The Literary World; The Musical World; The Dramatic World; The Political World; The World of Science and Art; Patchwork; Latest Intelligence.

We cannot forbear to add in conclusion, that the New World studiously avoids all party politics; and is conducted on principles of the strictest morality. No profane or improper jest, no vulgar allusion or irreverent sentiment, is allowed to soil its pages. Reverence of God and respect to man govern it always. The rule of the Editor is never to publish a line which he would hesitate to read aloud in the hearing of virtuous and intelligent females. Thus the New World is made an unexceptionable Family Newspaper, and is earnestly recommended to the regard of every friend of a pure literature, as well as of correct morals and the public good.
